The older theology held that the Hebrew was the primitive language, the sacred language employed by God and the angels, which existed alone until others were added in the confusion of tongues at Babel.² Recent inquiries have shown that the Hebrew language was not perfected before the time of David, and have given rise to different opinions concerning the language of the Canaanitish and Phœnician tribes that occupied Palestine before the immigration of the Abrahamidæ. The importance of the Hebrew language for the Christian theologian, so generally conceded in our day, was not always recognized. The primitive Christians generally made use of versions, particularly the Alexandrian by the LXX. Origen and Jerome (the latter especially) were distinguished for their knowledge of Hebrew, while Augustine was deficient in this regard. During the middle ages Hebrew was almost wholly neglected by Christians; though a learned acquaintance with the language was preserved to some extent, after it ceased to be a spoken tongue, among the Jews (Talmudists, Masorites). The school of Tiberias was especially famous; and Jerome among others, was instructed by Palestinian Jews. The Alexandrians, however, devoted less attention to the ancient language of their people (Philo). Between the eighth and ninth centuries grammatical studies were greatly neglected by the Jews likewise, until they were revived by the Spanish Jews (in the time of the Moorish suprem-

The study of Hebrew in the several ages of the Church.

Study of Hebrew in the Middle Ages.

¹ While Luther strongly recommends the study of the Hebrew, he yet writes (against Erasmus, who prided himself on his knowledge of languages), "Vides, quod non ideo quispiam sit Christianus vere sapiens, quia Græcus sit et Hebraeus, quando et beatus Hieronymus quinque linguis monoglossos Augustinum non adæquavit"—to J. Lange, in de Wette, Briefe, Sendschreiben, etc., i, No. 29, p. 52.

² This view has been defended in recent times by Father Hy. Gossler, in Die heil. Schrift in ihrer Ursprache (Lippstadt, 1850). The author asserts that "no accurate Hebrew grammar can be found outside the (Roman Catholic) Church!"—P. 16.

acy). The twelfth century produced a number of prominent rabbins, among others David Kimchi.

The knowledge of Hebrew among Christians was renewed by the aid of Jewish teachers. At the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth centuries Elias Levita, by birth a German Jew, was teaching in Italy, where his doctrine of the modern origin of the vowel signs in Hebrew drew upon him persecution from his co-religionists, though Christians also regarded his teaching as heretical. Such prejudices were not favourable to impartial grammatical studies. The renewed study of Hebrew in the Christian world, however, with which the Reformation is (partially) involved, is closely connected with the so-called renaissance of learning. Nicholas Lyra, in the fourteenth century, applied his limited knowledge of Hebrew to the interpretation of the Scriptures; but the proper impulse was given by Reuchlin, who must be considered the restorer of the study of Hebrew among Christians. His three books De Rudimentis Hebraicis, prefaced by the Exegi monumentum aere perennius of Horace, appeared in the year 1506. He was followed by J. Böschenstein, Seb. Münster († in 1552), the two Buxtorfs. John B., the elder, professor at Basle from 1591, († 1629,) wrote a Thesaurus linguæ sacræ, a grammar, 1605, and a lexicon Hebr. et Chald., Basle, 1607; John B., the younger, († 1636), disputed on the age of the vowel-signs at Saumur with Louis Capellus. They were succeeded by Drusius († 1616), Schickard († 1635), Glassius († 1656), Vorstius († 1676). In the middle of the seventeenth century the method of the demonstrative philosophy, corresponding to the scholastic temper of the time, came into prominence, being represented more especially by Danz (1696) in Germany and by Jac. Alting († 1679) in the Netherlands. A new influence was exerted by Albert Schultens at Franecker and Leyden († 1750), who consulted the Arabic and traced Hebrew words back to Arabic roots, but carried the method to excess. About the middle of the eighteenth century J. D. Michaelis prosecuted the study of Oriental languages over a broader field and aroused an interest in others also for such pursuits. Gesenius († 1842), having been preceded by Hezel (1777), Vater (1797–1814) and Weckherlin (1797, sqq.), was the first to adopt a settled and clear method, which still has decided adherents, though a more systematic mode, based on the nature of the language and complete in itself, has been attempted particularly by Ewald. This latter scholar has brought to the study of Hebrew philosophical analysis, and a wide comparison of kindred languages.

The first great English lexicographer of Hebrew and its cognate

Reuchlin the restorer of Hebrew learning.

languages was Edmund Castell. He published his Lexicon Heptaglotton in two volumes folio, London, 1669. A Hebrew, Chaldee, and English Lexicon was published (London, 1840) by Samuel Lee, Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge. This important work is quoted with approbation by Gesenius. The Hebrew Lexicon of Gesenius has been translated into English and republished in England and America. The edition by Dr. Robinson (Boston, 1836, and subsequently) is considered "the best full Hebrew Lexicon extant in our language." The compendious Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon of Davies has been revised and republished by Dr. Edward C. Mitchell, of Chicago (Andover, 1859). Fürst's Hebräisches und Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament has been edited in English by Dr. S. Davidson (London, 1867). Professor Moses Stuart, of Andover, Mass., published in 1821 a Hebrew grammar, with a copious Syntax and Praxis (Andover, octavo). Isaac Nordheimer, Professor of Hebrew in the University of New York, published a Hebrew Grammar distinguished for its philosophical treatment of the subject (1838, 1842, 2 vols., 8vo). Professor Lee is also the author of a Grammar of the Hebrew Language (London, 3d ed., 1841). The Hebrew Grammar of Horwitz (London, 1835) is well approved by scholars. The Hebrew Grammar of Gesenius, on the basis of the revisions of Rödiger, Kautzsch, and Davies, has been issued by Dr. Edward C. Mitchell (Andover, 1880). Professor W. H. Green, of Princeton, is the author of an excellent Hebrew Grammar (3d ed., New York, 1876). Compare:

A. Th. Hartmann, Linguistische Einleitung in das Studium der Bücher des A. T. Bremen, 1817.

W. Gesenius, Geschichte der Hebr. Sprache und Schrift. Lpz., 1815.

See also the Introductions to the Old Testament, (e. g., de Wette, §§ 30-33, and the literature there given.)

(G.) H. (A.) Ewald, kritische Grammatik der hebr. Sprache. S. 1 ff.

Hoffmann in Allg. Encyclopädie. Abth. II. Thl. 3.

Hävernick, Einleitung in's A. T. I. 1. Cap. 2: Geschichte der Grundsprachen des A. T. English edition (Edinburgh), pp. 81-221.

Kiel, Einleitung in die Schriften des A. T. S. 13 ff., treats of the literature of the Old Testament considered with regard to its progressive development and character, and also to its language.

1. *Hebrew Grammars.*¹

W. Gesenius, Hebr. Grammatik. Halle, 1813. Latest ed. (by Rödiger,) Lpz., 1872.

— Ausführliches grammatisch-kritisches Lehrgebäude der Hebr. Sprache mit Vergleichung der verwandten Dialekte. Lpz., 1817.

¹ Older works by Seb. Münster (1689), F. Buxtorf (1696, and often reprinted), J. A. Danz (1696), A. Schultens (1737), J. D. Michaelis (1745), F. W. Hezel (1777). Later works by J. S. Vater (1797, 1814), J. F. Weckherlin (Stuttg., Bd. I, 1797, 1798, 1818; Bd. II, 1805, 1819), M. Hartmann (1798, 1819), R. Hanno, (1825, 1836), Böckel (1826), Uhlemann, 1837.

- H. Ewald, Kritische Grammatik der Hebr. Sprache. Lpz., 1827. Complete textbook.
 — Grammatik der Hebr. Sprache des A. T. in vollständiger Kürze neu bearbeitet. Lpz., 1828; 6. Aufl. 1855. (Gött., 1870.) The 7th ed. is entitled Ausführliches Lehrbuch der Hebr. Sprache des A. Bundes.
 — Hebr. Sprachlehre für Anfänger. 3. Aufl. Gött., 1862.
 R. Stier, Neugeordnetes, Lehrgebäude der Hebr. Sprache. Lpz., 1833. 2 Parts.
 D. G. W. Freitag, Kurzgef. Grammatik der Hebr. Sprache für den Schul- und Universitätsgebrauch. Halle, 1835.
 Preiswerk, Grammaire Hebraïque. Genève, 1838. 8.
 H. Hupfeld, Ausführl. Hebr. Grammatik. 1. Thl. Cassel, 1841.
 Lib. Stengel, Hebr. Grammatik. Karlsruhe, 1841.
 J. Hymann, Anfangsgründe der Hebr. Sprache. Frankf. a. M., 1852. Also in French, Paris, 1852.
 H. Goldstein, Hebr. Sprachschüler. Ratib., 1853.
 J. B. Lobositz, Aus der Hebr. Grammatik. Prag., 1853.
 C. H. Bosen, Anleitung zum Erlernen der Hebr. Sprache. 3. Aufl. Freiburg i. B., 1864.
 G. Bickell, Grundriss der Hebräischen Grammatik. 2 Parts. Lpz., 1869-70.
 C. H. Clausa, Werth des Hebr. Unterrichts für das Gymnasium. Dreed., 1863.
 A. Müller, Hebr. Schulgrammatik. Halle, 1878.
 B. Stade, Lehrb. der Hebr. Grammatik. 1 Th. Lpz., 1879.
 A. Berliner, Beiträge zur Hebr. Gram. in Talmud u. Midrasch. Berl., 1879.

2. Elementary Textbooks.

- * W. Gesenius, Hebr. Lesebuch. Halle, 1814. Latest (10th) ed. (by Heiligstedt) Lpz., 1873.
 S. W. Wirthgen, Materialien zur praktischen Einübung der Hebräischen Sprache. Lpz., 1825.
 J. F. Böttcher, Hebräisches Elementarbuch für Schulen. Dreed., 1826.
 G. Brückner, Hebräisches Lesebuch für Anfänger und Geübtere. Lpz., 1844. 3. Aufl. 1863.
 G. H. Seffer, Elementarbuch der Hebräischen Sprache. Lpz., 1845. 3. Aufl., 1861.
 C. Schwarz, Hebr. Lesebuch mit Beziehung auf Ewald's Hebr. Sprachlehre für Anfänger. Lpz., 1847.
 H. Leeser, Hebr. Uebungsbuch. Coesfeld, 1853.
 C. L. Fr. Mezger, Hebräisches Uebungsbuch für Anfänger. Lpz., 1855; 3. Aufl., 1878.
 Stier, Hebräisches Vocabularium zum Schulgebrauch. Lpz., 1859.
 W. A. Hollenberg, Hebr. Schulbuch. 3. Aufl., Berlin, 1873.
 Schick, Hebräisches Uebungsbuch. 1. Thl. Die Formenlehre. Lpz., 1861.

3. *Lexicons.*¹

- * W. Gesenius, Hebräisch-deutsches Handwörterbuch über die Schriften des A. T. mit Einschluss der Chald. Wörter. Lpz., 1810-12. 2 Bde.
 — Hebr. und Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch über das A. T. Lpz., 1815. 7. Aufl. v. F. E. C. Dietrich. 1868.
 — Lexicon manuale Hebr. et Chald. in V. T. libros. Post edit. germ. tertiam Latine elaboravit, etc. Lips., 1833; ed. alt. ab A. Th. Hoffmanno recogn., 1847.

¹ Older works by J. Buxtorf (1607, 1654), J. Coccejus (1669, 1774), J. Ch. Wolf, (1707), Stock (1727), Simonis (1752), Castelli (1784).

- * G. B. Winer, Simonis lexicon manuale Hebr. et Chald. Eichhornii curas denuo castigavit, etc. Lips., 1828.
 Orelli, Die Hebräischen Synonyma der Zeit und Ewigkeit. Lpz., 1871.
 Ryssel, Die Synonyma des Wahren und Guten in den Semitischen Sprachen. Lpz., 1872.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. Hebrew Grammars and Chrestomathies.

- Ball, C. J. The Merchant Taylor's Hebrew Grammar. The Formal Principles of Hebrew Grammar, as understood by modern Scientists, stated in a manner suited to beginners. 8vo. London, 1882.
 Bowman, T. A New, Easy, and Complete Hebrew Course. Part I. Edinburgh.
 Craik, Henry. Principia Hebraica. The Principles of Hebrew Grammar. In 24 large folio Tables. Folio. London, 1882.
 Crawford, F. J. Horæ Hebraicæ. 16mo, pp. 191. London, 1868. (Hebrew prefixes.)
 Davidson, Prof. Introductory Hebrew Grammar. 4th ed., 8vo, pp. viii, 198. Edinb., 1880.
 Deutsch, Solomon. A Key to the Pentateuch Explanatory of the Text and the Grammatical Forms. Part I. Genesis. 8vo. New York, 1871.
 — A New Practical Hebrew Grammar, with Hebrew-English, and English-Hebrew Exercises, and a Hebrew Chrestomathy. 8vo. New York, 1868.
 Ewald, Heinrich. Introductory Hebrew Grammar. Translated by J. F. Smith. 8vo, pp. 279. London, 1870.
 — Syntax of the Hebrew Language of the Old Testament. From the 8th German ed. 8vo, pp. viii, 328. Edinburgh, 1879.
 Gesenius, William. Hebrew Grammar. Translated by Benjamin Davis, LL.D., from Roediger's ed., thoroughly Revised and Enlarged, on the Basis of the Latest ed. of Prof. E. Kautzsch, D.D., and from other recent authorities, by Edward C. Mitchell, D.D. 8vo, pp. xxiii, 423. Andover, 1880.
 Green, W. H. Elementary Hebrew Grammar. 12mo, pp. viii, 194. 2d rev. ed. N.Y., 1872.
 Kalisch, M. M. A Hebrew Grammar with Exercises. In two Parts. 8vo, pp. xv, 374, and xvi, 324. London, 1862-3.
 Leathe, Stanley. Practical Hebrew Grammar, with the Hebrew Text of Genesis i-vi, and Psalms i-vi. Grammatical Analysis and Vocabulary. Post 8vo, London, 1868.
 Mitchell, Alexander. The Book of Jonah. Analyzed, Translated, and the Accents named; being an Easy Introduction to the Hebrew Language. 8vo. London, 1882.
 Mitchell, E. C. A Concise Statement of the Principles of Hebrew Grammar. For the Use of Teachers. 8vo, paper. Andover.
 Nordheimer, Isaac. A Critical Grammar of the Hebrew Language. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 212, 379. New York, 1842.
 Strong, James. Epitome of Hebrew Grammar. 8vo, pp. 80. Published by the Author, at Madison, N. J., 1875.
 Stuart, Moses. Course of Hebrew Study for Beginners. Vol. II. Bds. Andover, 1880.
The Study of the Hebrew Vowel Points. Parts I, II. A series of Exercises in very large Hebrew type, printed upon writing paper, with space between the lines for the addition in manuscript of Vowel Points and Accents. 4to. London, 1882.
 Tregelles, S. P. The Heads of the Hebrew Grammar. 8vo, pp. viii, 126. London, 1852.
 — Hebrew Reading Lessons. 8vo, pp. vi, 70. London.
 Vibbert, W. H. A Guide to Reading the Hebrew Texts; for the Use of Beginners 12mo, pp. viii, 67. Andover, 1852.
 Wolf, J. R. A Practical Hebrew Grammar. 8vo, pp. xiv, 204. London, 1852.

2. Hebrew Lexicons.

- Davies, Benjamin. A Compendious and Complete Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon to the Old Testament; with an English-Hebrew Index. Carefully revised by E. C. Mitchell. 8vo, pp. xxxii, 752. Andover, 1879.
- Davidson, B. The Analytical Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon, consisting of an Alphabetical Arrangement of every Word and Inflection contained in the Old Testament Scriptures, precisely as they occur in the Sacred Text. 2d ed., 4to, pp. 877. London.
- Fuerst, Julius. A Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon to the Old Testament. 3d ed. Improved and Enlarged. Translated by Samuel Davidson, D.D. Royal 8vo, pp. 1547. London, 1867. Improved and enlarged, 1871.
- Gesenius, William. Hebrew Lexicon. Translated and edited with Additions and Corrections, by S. P. Tregelles. 4to. London, 1846-52.
- A Hebrew and English Lexicon to the Old Testament, including the Biblical Chaldee. Translated by Edward Robinson. 20th ed., 8vo, pp. ix, 1160. New York.
- Potter, Jos. L. An English-Hebrew Lexicon, being a complete Verbal Index to Gesenius's Hebrew Lexicon, as Translated by Prof. Edward Robinson. 8vo, Boston, 1872.
- Wilson, William. An English Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon and Concordance, by Reference to the Original Hebrew. 2d ed. Carefully revised. 4to. London, 1866.

THE REMAINING SEMITIC DIALECTS.

A familiar acquaintance with other Semitic languages is necessary for a learned examination of the Hebrew, and for the exposition of certain parts of the Old Testament, and is useful in many respects to the New Testament exegete and the scientific theologian; but it cannot be required that every Christian theologian, as such, should possess it to its full extent.

On the importance of treating the Hebrew in connexion with other Semitic dialects compare the preceding section. At this point, however, scientific philology must serve the purposes of theology; and for such purposes a thorough acquaintance with the Hebrew, as facilitated by the lexical and grammatical labors of other minds, is fully adequate.¹ There always will and must be individuals whose inclinations and talents will urge them onward in the path of inquiry; but here again "one thing will not do for all," and it is certainly more desirable that a definite knowledge of the Hebrew be secured, than that too many studies be engaged in at the same time. The chief interest for Old Testament exegesis attaches to the Chaldee, which, however, has been incorporated with Hebrew lexicology (by Ge-senius), in so far as it enters into the language of the Bible. The Syriac is useful for the study of the Syriac version (the Peshito), and also for New Testament exegesis, besides being an available help for the Church historian (comp. Ecclesiastical philology, infra). This applies also to the Arabic, aside from its philological value for comparison with the Hebrew. In this way, however, the circle might be infinitely extended, for it cannot be denied that, on the one hand the Rabbinical, on the other the Oriental languages in their further manifestations through the Indian (Sanskrit and Prakrit), the Old Persic (Zend-language), the Chinese, etc., will also yield fruit which possesses value. Our concern is, however, primarily with what may be justly required, and this is and must continue to be the Hebrew,¹ together with the language of the New Testament originals.

¹ The Christian theologian cannot choose otherwise than to make Christianity the central object of his studies. This is historically rooted in the East (though we should scarcely term it a purely Oriental phenomenon); but its true home and life-development have been found in the West.

SECTION X.

THE HELLENISTIC-GREEK LANGUAGE—THE ORIGINAL LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT SCRIPTURES.

E. Reuss, articles Hellenisten und Hellenistisches Idiom in Herzog's Encykl., v, p. 701, sqq.

While an acquaintance with Hebrew is requisite for the study of the Old Testament and also of the New, it is yet not sufficient, even ¹ Comp. Schleiermacher, Darstellung, etc., § 131. With regard to the necessary aids for the study of the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic comp. Danz, Encykl., p. 184–190, and Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. p. 124, sq. (2 ed., 1838–40; 3d ed., 1842). Valuable aids for the study of the Syriac are, the grammars by Uhlemann (Berlin, 1829, 2d ed., 1857) and A. G. Hoffmann (Halle, 1827; revised ed. by A. Merx, ibid., 1867), and the chrestomathies by Roediger (Halle, 1838) and Kirsch (publ. by Bernstein, Leips., 1836–41); for the Samaritan, Uhlemann (Leips., 1837); for the Chaldee, Buxtorf (Lexicon chald., etc., Leips., 1866), Levy (Chald. Wörterbuch, 2 parts, Leips., 1867–68), Winer, Grammatik (2d ed., Leips., 1842) and Lesebuch (1825, 2d ed., 1864), Jul. Fuerst, (Leips., 1835, 2d ed., 1864), Luzzatto (Elementi grammaticali, Padova, 1865, German by Krüger, Breslau, 1873), and the chrestomathy by Kaerle, 1852; for the Arabic, Tychsen (Gött., 1823), Ewald (Leips., 1831 and 1833), Schier (Grammaire Arabe, Paris, 1849), C. P. Caspari (Leips., 1859), Freytag's Arabic-Latin Lexicon abridged ed. for beginners, (Halle, 1837, 4to.) and the chrestomathies by Kosegarten (Leips., 1828) and Arnold (Halle, 1853); for the Phœnician, Schröder, Die Phœnicische Sprache (Halle, 1869); for the Coptic, the grammars by Schwartz (1850) and Uhlemann (Leips., 1853.) On the Semitic languages generally see Ernest Renan, Histoire générale et système comparé des langues Sémitiques, Paris, 1855, 2d ed., 1863, vol. i.

Other works are: Longfield, Introduction to Chaldee (London, 1859); Riggs, Manual of the Chaldee Language (New York, 1858); Davidson, Analytical Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon (London and New York); Uhleman, Syriac Grammar, translated by Hutchinson (New York); Henderson, Syriac Lexicon to the New Testament (London and New York); Nichols, Samaritan Grammar, (London and New York); Catafego, Arabic Dictionary (London and New York); Wright, Arabic Grammar (London and New York). All of Bagster's Elementary Arabic, Chaldee, Samaritan, and Syriac books are useful.

when supplementing a knowledge of classical Greek, to meet the demands of the New Testament exegete, whose work requires in addition that attention should be given to the elements of language which mediate between the two and upon which the phraseology of the New Testament is based.

The New Testament was written in Greek; but it is now generally conceded that the language of its authors is not pure Greek in either a lexical or grammatical view.¹ This, however, is merely a negative statement; and the mere collecting of Hebrew fragments yields no profitable result. The recognition of the Hebraistic character of the language of the New Testament would naturally cause many expressions, such as a "consuming fire," a "child of death," etc., to be explained as Hebraisms, which occur in all languages as figurative forms of speech. The essential thing required is that the transition from the Hebrew to the Greek (from the Oriental to the Occidental) mode of thought and speech be clearly apprehended, a subject which directs attention to the Alexandrian period as being the point of transition between the East and the West. The ordinary Greek (κοινή) of the later periods forms the basis of New Testament idiom based on the later Greek. idiom, which, however, receives a peculiar colouring from the admixture of Jewish-Hellenistic elements, for which reason it will be found profitable to study especially the Alexandrian version of the Old Testament (the LXX), the Apocrypha, Philo, and Josephus, in addition to authors who employ the common dialect (Polybius, Plutarch, Artemidorus). It is to be remembered, however, that as the New Testament opened a new spiritual world to view, it was also obliged to create a specifically Christian language, and that many expressions (e. g., ἐλπίς ὑμῶν, etc.) possessed a larger and deeper meaning in the Christian than in the ordinary usage. Three elements are consequently to be distinguished in the language of the New Testament,² the Greek, the Jewish, and the

¹ Simple as this matter is, an erroneous conception of the doctrine of inspiration has led to much controversy, concerning which see Morus. Acroas. herm. T. I.; Winer, Grammatik, § 1. "The presumption of a former age that no imperfection can be acknowledged in the New Testament language because the Scriptures came forth from the Holy Ghost, has, itself being false, led to the adoption of erroneous maxims which unhappily still exist and exert their influence." Schleiermacher, Hermeneut., p. 131. Examples of such influence are afterward given. The work by Joachim Jungius on the original language of the N. T. (1637, republished by Geffcken in 1863) affords a recent illustration.

² "The Hellenistic idiom in the Jewish period and sphere bore the character of a slavish translation; in the Christian it became independent and entered into the formation of a language, without on that account renouncing its nativity." Reuss, l. c.

Christian (comp. the first paragraphs of de Wette's Einleitung and Schleiermacher's Hermeneutik, p. 27). A different meaning, too, was acquired by Greek words in the New Testament, from that which attached to them in the classical language, e. g., ταπεινοφροσύνη, humility, which the ancient Grecian would understand to signify baseness of disposition (comp. ταπεινοφροσύνειν in Arrian's Epict.), and the petition in the Lord's prayer, ἄφεσις ἡμῖν τὰ ὀφειλόμενα ἡμῶν (Matt. vi, 12), which he would regard as a request for the remission of a pecuniary debt. The language of the New Testament varies, moreover, with the different writers. Some Hebraize more than others — Luke and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews least of all — some possess greater facility in the use of the current Greek (St. Paul) than others (Peter and James), and in the specifically Christian field each of them employed a class of words which harmonized with his own modes of thought (λόγος, ζωή, φῶς with St. John, πίστις, δικαιοσύνη, χάρις with St. Paul, πίστις with St. James, in a meaning different from that of St. Paul, etc.). Such differences, furthermore, are not confined to the lexical department; the grammatical form, both in etymology and syntax, also varies in many respects from the classical forms, e. g., Luke xxiv, 15, ἐγένετο ἐν τῷ θυμῷ αὐτοῦ καὶ συζητεῖν, where the Greek would require the genitive absolute, or Luke xx, 11, προσέθετο πέμψαι, (חָלַף וְשָׁלַח) for πάλιν ἐπεμψεν, etc. The use of the prepositions ἐν, ἐκ, κατὰ, is a further illustration (e. g., οἱ ἐκ πίστεως, for οἱ πιστεύοντες, etc.).

BRIEF HISTORICAL SKETCH.

The first to bring together the grammatical peculiarities of New Testament diction was the philologist Solomon Glasius († 1656) of Jena, in his Philologia sacra. Casper Wyss, Professor of Greek at Zürich († 1659), followed with his Dialectologia sacra (1650), in which still greater attention was bestowed on the peculiarities of the New Testament. George Pasor, Professor of Greek at Franeker († 1697), published a small lexicon of the New Testament, and left a grammar which was published by his son, Matthias, professor at Gröningen. Pasor continued to be the standard during an extended period, in which only isolated attempts at observation were made. Ph. H. Haab attempted to provide a suitable work in his Hebr.-griechisch. Grammatik f. das N. T., Tüb., 1815, but without success. Winer established New Testament grammar on scientific principles, and elevated it to the rank of a theological History of the exposition of character of New Testament Greek.

and philological science, since when praiseworthy researches, including special branches, have been made. A translation of Winer was made from the first edition by Professors Stuart and Robinson (Andover, 1825). A translation of the seventh edition revised by Lüneman has also been issued by Professor J. Henry Thayer (Andover, 1869). The same American editor has prepared a revised translation of Alexander Buttman's Grammar of New Testament Greek (Andover, 1873). Thomas Sheldon Green is the author of a brief Grammar of the New Testament (London, 1862). Professor Stuart, of Andover, prepared a Grammar of the New Testament Dialect which is deserving of honorable mention (Andover; also in Clark's Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh, 1835). Planck's Sacred Philology and Interpretation was translated by Professor Samuel H. Turner, of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary, of New York (republished in Clark's Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh, 1834). Dr. Edward Robinson's Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament, originally based on Wahl's Clavis, but recast and made an original work, carefully traces the differences between classical and New Testament usage. But most valuable for the student is Cremer's Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek (3d English ed., Edinburgh, 1880). It traces the words which are distinctive of the New Testament from the classics to the Septuagint, and thence on "till they reach the fullness of New Testament thought."

1. Grammars of New Testament Language.

- * B. G. Winer, Grammatik des Neutestamentlichen Sprachidioms, als sichere Grundlage der Neutestamentlichen Exegese. Lpz., 1822. 7. ed. v. G. Lünemann, 1867.
- J. C. W. Alt, Grammatica linguae Graecae, qua N. T. scriptores uti sunt. Halae, 1829.
- † J. Th. Beelen, Grammatica Graecitatis N. T. Lovanii, 1857.
- Alex. Buttmann, Grammatik des Neutestamentlichen Sprachgebrauchs, in Anschluss an Ph. Buttmanns griechische Grammatik bearbeitet. Berlin, 1859.
- S. C. Schirlitz, die Hellenistischen, besonders Alexandrinischen und sonst schwierigen Verbalformen im griechischen N. Testamente. For schools and private study. Arranged in alphabetical order, and grammatically elucidated. Erfurt, 1852.
- Grundzüge der Neutestamentlichen Gräcität. Nach den besten Quellen für Studierende der Theologie u. Philologie. Giessen, 1861.
- Anleitung zur Kenntniss der Neutestamentlichen Grundsprache, zugleich als Griechische Neutestamentliche Schulgrammatik für Gymnasien. Erfurt, 1863.
- C. H. Lipsius, Grammatische Untersuchungen, über die biblische Gräcität, herausgegeben von R. A. Lipsius. Lpz., 1863.

2. *Concordances and Lexicons.*¹

Erasmi Schmidii, ταμειον τῶν τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης λέξεων s. concordantiae omnium vocum N. T. (Viteb., 1638); new ed. by E. S. Cyprian (Goth., 1717), and Glasg.,

¹ Older works by G. Pasor (1631, 1735), Stock (1725, 1752), Mintert (1728), Simonis (1762), J. F. Fischer (Proluss., etc. 1772), Kypke (Vocab. Lips., 1795).

- 1819; latest ed. ("nunc sec. critices et hermeneutices nostrae aetatis rationes emendatae, auctae, meliore ordine dispositae") by C. H. Bruder. Lips., 1853. 2 partt., 4. ed. 3. Lips., 1867.
- Schmoller, Ταμειον τῆς καυῆς διαθήκης ἐγχειρίδιον, od. Handconcordanz zum Griechischen N. Testament (548 S. 16), Stuttg., 1869.
- Chr. Schoettgen. Novum Lexicon graeco-lat. in N. T. Post J. T. Krebs., rec. aux. G. L. Spohn. Hal., 1819.
- J. F. Schleusner, Nov. Lex. gr.-lat. in N. T. Lips., 1792, (1801, 1808,) 1819. 2 voll.
- * Chr. Abr. Wahl, Clavis N. T. philologica usibus scholarum et juvenum theologiae studiosorum accommodata. Lips., 1822, 1843. 2 voll.
- * C. G. Bretschneider, Lexicon manuale gr.-lat. in libros N. T. Lips., 1824. Edit. 3., 1840.
- Ch. G. Wilke, Lexicon graeco-latinum in libros N. T. Dresdae, 1839, 1840. 2 voll. Edit. 2., ibid., 1850.
- S. C. Schirlitz, Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zum N. T. Giessen, 1851. 2 ed., 1858. 3 ed., ibid., 1868.
- E. F. Dalmer, Lexicon breve graeco-latinum ad voces et vocabula librorum N. T. explicanda concinnatum. Gothae, 1859.
- Ch. G. Wilkii, Clavis N. T. philologica usibus scholarum et juvenum theologiae studiosorum accommodata. Quem librum ita castigavit et emendavit, ut novum opus haberi possit, C. L. W. Grimm. Lips., 1862-1868.
- H. Cremer, Biblich-theologisches Wörterbuch der Neutestamentlichen Gräcität. Gothae, 1866; 2d ed., 1872.

3. Other Philological Helps for Explaining the New Testament.

- J. Vorst, De Hebraismis N. T. commentarius, cur. J. F. Fischer. Lips., 1778.
- Lamb. Bos, Exercitatt. philologicae, in quibus N. T. loca nonnulla ex profanis auctoribus illustrantur. Franeq., 1700, 1713.
- J. Alberti, Observatt. philol.-crit. in sacros N. T. libros. Lugd., 1714.
- G. D. Kypke, Observatt. sacrae in N. T. libros. Vratisl., 1755. 2 voll.
- G. Raphael, Annotatt. in N. T. ex Xenoph. (Ham., 1709), Polybio et Arriano (ibid., 1715) et Herodoto (Luneb., 1731) collectae; nunc in unum corpus redactae. Lugd., Bat., 1747. 2 voll.
- Jac. Elsner, Obs. sacrae in N. T. libros. Traj. ad Rhen., 1728.
- E. Palaiet, Observatt. phil.-crit. in sacros N. T. libros. Lugd., Bat., 1752.
- K. H. Lange, Spec. obs. philol. in N. T. ex Luciano potissimum et Dion. Halic. Lub., 1732.
- Csp. F. Munthe, Obs. philologicae in sacros N. T. libros ex Diodoro Siculo collectae. Hafn. et Lips., 1755.
- J. B. Ott, Excerpta ex Flav. Josepho ad N. T. illustr. cura Havercamp. Lugd., Bat., 1741.
- C. F. Loesner, Obs. ad N. T. e Philone Alexandrino. Lips., 1777.
- A. F. Kuehn, Spicil. Loesn. obs. ad N. T. e Philone. Lips., 1785.
- J. T. Krebs, Obs. in N. T. e Flavio Josepho. Lips., 1755.
- K. L. Bauer, Philologia Thucydideo-Paulina. Hal., 1773.
- C. G. Kuinoel, Observatt. ad N. T. ex libris apocr. N. T. Lips., 1794.
- Other matter of this sort taken from Plutarch by v. Seelen (1719); from Polyb. by Kirchmaier (1725); from Aristophanes by Eckhard (1738); from Euripides by Lange (1734); from Diog. Laert. by Richter (1739); from Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, by Porschberger (1744); from Callimachus by Peucer (1751); from Musaeus by Adlung (1756); from Homer by Bellermann (1785).

On the method as a whole:—

- K. B. Hauff, über den Gebrauch Griech. Profanscribenten zur Erläuterung des N. T. Lpz., 1708.
 C. G. Gersdorf, Beiträge zur Sprachcharakteristik der neutestamentlichen Schriftsteller. Bd. 1. Lpz., 1816.
 J. D. Schulze, Der Schriftstellerische Charakter und Werth des Petrus, Judas, und Jacobus. Weissenf., 1802. Lpz., 1811.
 — Der schriftstellerische Charakter und Werth des Johannes. Weissenf., 1808. Lpz., 1811.
 Wilke, Die neutestamentliche Rhetorik. Ein Seitenstück zur Grammatik des neutestamentl. Sprachidioms. Dresden u. Leipzig, 1848.
 Lasonder, De linguae Paulinae idiomate. 2. Partt. Traj. ad Rhen., 1866.

TEXT-BOOKS IN GREEK.

1. Greek Grammars.

- Buttmann, Alexander. A Grammar of the New Testament Greek, with numerous Additions and Corrections by the Author. By J. H. Thayer. 8vo, pp. xvi, 474. Andover, 1878.
 Greek Students' Manual, The, containing: I. A Practical Guide to the Greek Testament. II. The New Testament, Greek and English. III. A Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament. Fcap, 8vo, pp. 676. London, 1868.
 Greek New Testament, Hand-Book to the Grammar of, with Vocabulary and the chief New Testament Synonymes. 8vo. London.
 Green, T. S. A Grammar of the New Testament Dialect. 8vo, pp. viii, 244. London.
 Jelf, W. E. A Grammar of the Greek Language. 3d ed., enlarged and improved. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 517, 700. Oxford, 1861.
 Middleton, Thos. F. The Doctrine of the Greek Article, applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament. New ed., 8vo. London, 1855.
 Stuart, Moses. A Grammar of the New Testament Dialect. 8vo, pp. 312. Andover, 1846.
 Trollope, William. A Greek Grammar to the New Testament, and to the Common or Hellenic Diction of the Later Greek Writers. 8vo, pp. 257. London, 1841.
 Winer, George Benedict. A Grammar of the Idiom of the New Testament. 7th ed., enlarged and improved by Gottlieb Lünemann. Revised and authorized translation. 8vo, pp. xviii, 728. Andover, 1877.

2. Greek Lexicons.

- Analytical Greek Lexicon to the New Testament, The. 4to, pp. 490. London, 1868; also New York.
 An Etymological Vocabulary of all the words in the Greek New Testament. 8vo, pp. 224. London, 1882.
 A Practical Guide to the Greek New Testament. Designed for those who have no knowledge of the Greek language. 8vo. London, 1882.
 Cremer, Hermann. Biblico-Theological Lexicon of the New Testament Greek. Translated from the 2d German ed. 4to, pp. viii, 608. Edinburgh, 1878. 3d English ed., 1880.
 Greenfield's Greek Lexicon to the New Testament. 8vo. London, 1882.
 Robinson, Edward. A Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament. New ed., royal 8vo, pp. xii, 804. New York, 1878.

Schleusner, J. F. Novus Thesaurus Philologico-Criticus, sive Lexicon in LXX. et Reliquos Interpretes Graecos, ac Scriptores Apocryphos Veteris Testamenti, etc. 2 vols., 8vo. Glasguae, 1824.

Sophocles, E. A. A Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Periods. From B. C. 146 to A. D. 1100. 4to, pp. 1202. Boston, 1870.

8. Greek Synonymes.

Synonymes of the New Testament, and Disquisitions on Various Grammatical and Philological Subjects. By John Aug. Henry Tittmann, D.D. Edinburgh, 1837.

Trench, R. C. Synonymes of the New Testament. 12mo, pp. 250. New York, 1854. 2d part, 12mo, pp. 214, 1866. 9th ed., 8vo, pp. xxx, 405. London, 1880.

Webster, William, Syntax and Synonymes of the Greek Testament. 8vo. London, 1864.

SECTION XL

THE PRACTICAL SCIENCES AUXILIARY TO EXEGETICAL THEOLOGY—BIBLICAL ARCHÆOLOGY.

Comp. Schliermacher, § 140, sqq.; Herzog, Encykl., 1, p. 411.

A knowledge of the historical, physical, geographical, statistical, and politico-economical conditions under which a work was written, is the indispensable means for any explanation of its matter intended to be at all exhaustive, in like manner as grammatical proficiency is necessary for the interpretation of its language. For this reason the range of Biblical studies includes a scientific investigation of the history of the Jewish people and their relations to other nations, the constitution of their State, their politico-economical and ecclesiastical arrangements, etc., the geography of Palestine and other Eastern countries as well as of all countries referred to in the Bible, and the natural products of these regions, together with the corresponding industries and the manner of life and the customs of their inhabitants. All of this is comprehended under the vague title of Biblical archæology—a branch which is, in one point of view, preparatory to exegesis, but in another results from exegesis.

It may be held that the science of language is itself a branch of archæology; for it certainly belongs to archæology to ascertain the spoken and written language of a people. In an inverse direction archæology must be included in the domain of language, inasmuch as the lexicon is obliged to explain a multitude of terms by means of archæological and geographical inquiries (proper names, technical terms, e. g., מִנְהָג, כֶּתֶן, יָכֹחַ, אֶחָל, etc.). Strictly speaking, however, the term archæology is too narrow, because matters relating to physical geography and natural history (physica sacra), with all else of a similar nature, are not included in archæological inquiry. The manners and customs of the East have, moreover, undergone so little change in many respects, that descriptions of travel in our own day frequently throw light upon statements of the Bible; and this feature likewise cannot be assigned to the department of historical archæology, but must be classed with statistical and ethnographical knowledge.¹

The scope of Biblical archæology.

The term archæology too narrow.

Biblical archæology, on the other hand, includes more than Jewish and Hebrew antiquities. It cannot even be restricted in its researches to the East alone, especially as regards the New Testament, for whose exposition it is necessary that "the historical apparatus should embrace a knowledge of the spiritual and civil conditions of all the regions in and for which the New Testament Scriptures were composed."² This involves a thorough familiarity with the state of the Roman world from Augustus to Domitian, and of the state of the Jewish people in this period, Josephus being the principal source for the latter information. A broader inquiry would include the range of ideas prevalent at this time, though it cannot always be determined whether ideas, drawn, for instance, from the rabbins, were actually current in the time of Christ, or belong to a later age instead. In this direction archæological inquiries lead back, as Schleiermacher has remarked,³ to the domain of apologetics.

The Old Testament must always be the principal source for Biblical Archæology,⁴ and consequently the science is compelled to move in a kind of circle, archæological knowledge being needed for a thorough understanding of the Bible, while that knowledge receives further additions from a profounder study of the Scriptures. The Bible thus becomes at one time the object and at another the means of archæological research, while this research is sometimes a preparation for exegesis and again its result. Archæology may consequently be reckoned among the auxiliaries to exegetical theology, or be classed as a product of exegetical studies with historical theology, in proportion as one or the other point of view prevails.

A more careful distribution of the material of archæology will warrant its classification under:

Classification
of the material of Biblical archæology—geography.

1. The geography of the Bible (on its importance to Biblical exegesis, comp. the work by Furrer under that

¹ Comp. de Wette's Bibl. Archæol., § 1 and 2, where reference is also made to the still more extended meaning of the word ἀρχαιολογία in Josephus and Dion. Halicarn. Gesenius defines Biblical Archæology to be "the science which makes us acquainted with the natural and social conditions of the peoples among whom the Scriptures originated and to whom they relate," (Hall, Encykl., x, 74), which is still correct in an empirical point of view.

² Schleiermacher, § 141.

³ § 143, note.

⁴ Schleiermacher, § 141, note.

title, Zürich, 1871). The geography of Palestine¹ forms its central feature, but it is not confined to Palestine. It begins historically with the country in which the sources of the Euphrates and the Tigris are situated, the Asiatic highlands in the region of Ararat), and extends, in the Old Testament, over Egypt, Arabia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia.² New Testament geography extends its range farther into the West, the incidents of the New Testament record being located in Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece, and Italy (Rome), in addition to those of which the scene was in Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. Topography, the description of remarkable places, especially of Jerusalem and the temple, forms a special element of this geography, for the study of which the records of ancient and modern travel render valuable aid.

2. The Natural science of the Bible (Physica sacra), which is most intimately connected with its geography. The importance of securing a vivid idea of the natural (geological, topographical, and climatic) conditions of the country is heightened by the fact that the religious thought of the Hebrews was closely related thereto, and that the most important features of revelation connect themselves with the natural scenery of the Orient. Man is an object of natural science, in the whole of his physical constitution, in proportion as he is moulded by natural conditions. This applies, among the rest, to the entire subject of diseases and their peculiar form in the East (leprosy). In proportion, however, as man becomes superior to nature and assumes a social character, the physical and anthropological element will become subordinate to the ethnographical. Hence :—

3. Biblical Ethnography, the description of manners and customs, first of Eastern peoples, and then of the ancient world in general. This involves the study (1) of man's relation to nature (agriculture, herding cattle, hunting, and fishing) and of his modes of preparing the raw materials provided by nature for his use (dwellings, clothing, ornaments, food, utensils, handicrafts, navigation, etc.); and (2) man's relations to society (social customs, marriage, domestic life, general intercourse; journeys, hospitality, relations with strangers, war, and slavery).¹ Inasmuch, however, as such relations of ordinary life were, among the Hebrews, regulated by the law of the Theocracy, it becomes necessary to examine:

¹ This name was primarily applied to the country of the Philistines, in the southwestern part of Canaan; but it was subsequently given to the entire region embraced between the Jordan, the Mediterranean Sea, and Mt. Lebanon. Canaan (כְּנָעַן), derived from the fourth son of Ham, Gen. x, 6, was the older designation; and it was also called the "land of Jehovah," the "land of promise," the "pleasant land." In later periods the name Judea denoted the entire country. The expression, "land of the Hebrews" (אֶרֶץ הָעִבְרִים) occurs but once in the Bible, in Gen. xl, 15, and the designation was not common until after the time of Josephus (ἡ Ἑβραίων χώρα). For additional information see J. G. Müller, Die Semiten in ihrem Verhältniss zu Chamiten und Japhetiten, Gotha, 1872.

² In strictness, the extreme western limit would be the ancient Tarshish (Tartessus); but this appears only as an isolated point.

4. The Biblical (Mosaic) legislation and political constitution with which the codes of laws and the constitutions of the other nations embraced within the range of the Scriptural records are to be compared (the Roman law, consequently, in connexion with the New Testament). The constitution of the theocratic State and its laws, were, moreover, intimately connected with the system of worship, so that in this point of view also the religious feature forms the central object of theological study; and Biblical archæology must accordingly give a prominent place to:—

5. The sacred institutions of the Hebrews (sacra) in comparison with the other religions of antiquity as mentioned in the Bible. Many writers have limited the idea of Biblical archæology wholly to this branch of antiquities. It is usually subdivided into (1) The sacred places (the tabernacle, the temple, and, later, the synagogue); (2) the sacred seasons (the Sabbath, the new moons, the Hebrew feasts); (3) sacred and theocratic persons, the judges, prophets, priests, Levites, scribes; and (4) sacred usages, circumcision, sacrifice, anointings, purifications, ceremonies, etc. The religions of non-Israelitish peoples and their polytheistic and nature-worship (worship of animals in Egypt, the worship of Baal, Astarte, and Moloch, witchcraft and divination) must receive special attention inasmuch as the Israelites were constantly exposed to their influence. For the study of the New Testament the Græco-Roman mythology is likewise important. Finally, the worship having taken art into its service (music and poetry among the Hebrews) and the religion having developed a theology, it becomes necessary to give attention to:—

6. The sciences and arts of the Hebrews and the nations with whom they came into contact. For the interpretation of the poetical sections of the Bible it is especially important that the nature of Hebrew poetry and music be understood. The development of theology among the later Jews into Phariseism and Sadduceeism, and into the Alexandrian philosophy of religion (Philo),¹ belongs more appropriately to the history of Bible doctrines, but is nevertheless entitled to a place in this department also.²

¹ For this inquiry also travels are especially valuable. "You will find the reading of travels in the East, in which the life, manners, and customs of the nomads are described, and from which conclusions respecting these earlier times of innocence and strength may be drawn, to be the best commentary." Herder, Briefe, No. 3, p. 42.

The real task of the Biblical archæologist will be to combine all these threads into an organic whole, through which runs the principle of a higher intelligent life; to represent the Biblical matter both in its development in time and in its extension in space, as contrasted with contemporary ethnical facts, and thus to bring before the mind of the inquirer a living picture in which the lights and shadows are accurately disposed.³

HISTORICAL SKETCH.

The history of archæology is rooted in the science itself. A circle is involved at this point. The Bible is the most ancient source for Hebrew and the related archæologies of the East, and yet the exposition of the Bible requires archæological knowledge. We become acquainted with the Bible History of Biblical archæology.

¹ Opp. ed. Mangey (Lond., 1742), 2 Tom.; Pfeiffer (Erl., 1785-92, 1820) 5 Tom.; Ed. Tauchnitziana (Lips., 1851-53), 8 Tom. English version in Bohn's Ecclesiastical Library (Lond., 1854). Comp. J. G. Müller, Textkritik der Schriften des Philo, Basle, 1839, 4to.

² The Talmud (from תלמוד, the doctrine), a collection of Jewish traditions, becomes a rich, though confused, source at this point. It consists of two parts, the Mishna, dating in the second century A.D., and the Gemara, formed in the third century. The Babylonian Talmud, which was completed as late as the sixth century, must be distinguished from the Jerusalem. On the editions comp. Winer, Handb. der Lit. i, p. 523, and M. Pinner, Compend. des hierosolym. u. babyl. Talmud, with preface by Belermann, Berl., 1832. Lightfoot, Schoettgen, Surenhusius, Wetstein, Meuschen, Danz, and others, have made extracts from the mass of the rabbinical literature. Comp. Winer, Chrestomathia talmudica et rabbinica, Leips., 1822; F. Nork, Rabbin. Quellen u. Parallelen zu N. T. Schriftstellern, Leips., 1839. Concerning the later Judaism see J. A. Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, Frankf., 1700, 2 vols., 4to.; A. F. Gfrörer, das Jahrhundert des Heils, Stuttg., 1838, 2 vols.; S. Grünwald, Glaubens und Sitten-Lehre des Talmud. Heilbronn, 1854.

³ George remarks, in his work, Die Jüdischen Feste, pp. xii-xiv (see below, Literature), "The tendency still prevails to regard Biblical Archæology as a garner into which the separate grains may be brought, without attempting to combine them into a scientific whole, to which every individual object will sustain a definite and necessary relation. . . . Archæology is the science which first opens to our view the real life of a people, by placing before our eyes its conditions in all the different periods and situations of its history. Its office is to point out all the features in that life in their necessary connexion, and thereby to explain one in the light of the others and each one in its principles. It is, so to speak, the interior of the various phenomena, which spring from it as from a root. It is the complement of history, to which it stands related as the soul to its body, since it presents to view the conditions from which may be deduced the phenomena in the life of a people recorded by history."

through the Bible. In addition to the Bible, mention must be made of Josephus, the son of a Jewish priest (born A. D. 37) and a Pharisee, an eye-witness and participant in the Jewish war (A.D. 70). He wrote a history of his nation, extending down to the close of Nero's reign, in twenty books—Antiquitates Judaicae; and also described the Jewish wars in seven books, besides treating of other matters.¹ For acquiring a knowledge of the country the study of Herodotus, Strabo (ii, 16), Ptolemy, Dio Cassius, Pliny (Hist. Nat., v, 13–19), Diodorus Siculus, and others, is also useful. The beginnings of Bible geography were laid by the Christian Church historian Eusebius (in the fourth century) in his work Περὶ Τοπικῶν Ὀνομάτων ἐν τῇ θείᾳ Γραφῇ. This work was known only in the translation by Jerome: Onomasticon urbium et locorum Scripturae Sacrae, until the Jesuit Bonfrère published it in 1659 (later editions by Clericus, 1707, Larsow and Parthey, 1862, Lagarde, 1870). The itineraries of Christian pilgrims are not without historical importance, though they contain much fabulous matter (the oldest is the Itinerarium Burdigalense, dating since 333), and this is especially true of the statements by crusaders, e. g., William of Tyre, James de Vitri, etc. (the whole published in Bongars. Gesta Dei per Francos, Hanover, 1611, 2 vols.). The journey of Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela (1160–1173), a Spanish Jew, has again commanded attention in recent times (published in Hebrew and English by A. Asher, London and Berlin, 2 vols.). A more critical character belongs to works of the sixteenth century. The Roman Catholic priest Chr. Adrichomius († 1585), among others, published a description of Jerusalem in the time of Christ and a Theatrum terrae sanctae, with maps (Col. 1590), and the Reformed theologian S. Bochart († 1667) laid the beginnings for a Bible geography in his Phaleg et Canaan, (1646, 1674) and of a Biblical natural history in his Hiero-zoicon (Lond., 1663, 1690). These were followed by the works of H. Reland († 1718), Antiquitates sacrae veterum Hebraeorum (Traj., 1708 and often), and Palaestina (1714); J. D. Michaelis, Spicilegium geographiae Hebr. (1769, 1780), Mosaisches Recht (1770–1775, 6 vols.) and others. The numerous and predominantly scientific Travels, begun more than a century ago and still continued, have afforded much valuable information. Of such works those by Berggren, Buckingham, Cha-

The ancient writers on archaeology.

Eusebius the first of Biblical geographers.

Geographical explorers and writers of the 18th century.

¹ Editions by Havercamp (Amst., 1726, 2 vols., fol.), Oerthür (Leips., 1782–85, 3 vols.), Richter (Leips., 1826–27), Dindorf (Par., 1845–47, 2 vols., ed. Tauchnitziana Leips., 1850), Bekker (Leips., 1855–56, 6 vols.); also translated into English by Whiston, various editions.

teaubriand, Clarke, Hasselquist, Joliffe, Maundrell, Niebuhr, Pococke, Prokesch, Richardson, Seetzen, Shaw, Volney,¹ etc., belong more or less to an earlier period. Of more recent works we notice, J. E. Burckhardt, Reisen in Syrien u. Palaestina (with notes by Gesenius, Weimar, 1822-24, 2 vols.); A. Lamartine, Voyage en Orient, 1832-33 (Paris, 1835); G. H. v. Schubert, Reise in d. Morgenland (Erl., 1838-40, 3 vols.); E. Robinson, Biblical Researches, etc. (2d ed., 1856, 2 vols.), Physical Geography of the Holy Land (1865); Tischendorf, Reise in den Orient (Leips., 1846, 2 vols.); Lynch, Narrative of Exploring Expedition to the Dead Sea (1849; 9th ed., 1854); and Official Report of expedition (1852, 4to.); Ph. Wolff, Reise, etc. (Stuttgart, 1849); F. A. Neale, Eight Years in Syria and Palestine (Lond., 1851, 2 vols.). G. H. van Senden, Het heilige Land, (Gorinch., 1851); Gossler, Pilgerreise nach Jerusalem (Paderb., 1852); J. S. Schiferle, Reise ins h. Land (Augsb., 1852, 2 vols.); F. J. Gehlen, Wanderung n. Jerusalem, (Münst., 1853); J. Hilber, Pilgerreise ins heil. Land (Innspruch, 1853); Plitt, Skizzen einer Reise n. d. heil. Lande (Carlsruhe, 1853); Schulz, Reise ins gel. Land 3 ed., Mülheim, 1855); F. A. Strauss, Sinai u. Golgatha, etc. (7 ed., Berl., 1857); Tobler, Denkblätter aus Jerus. (St. Gall, 1853) and Dritte Wanderung n. Palaest. (1859); K. Graul, Reise n. Ostindien, Part i, Palestine (Leips., 1854); de Saulcy, Voyage autour de la mer morte (Par., 1853, 2 vols.); Delessert, Voyage aux villes maudites, etc. (Par., 1853); M. Sachs, Stimmen vom Jordan (Berl., 1854); Leibetrut, Reise n. d. Morgenl., etc. (Hamb., 1854, new ed., 1858); Thomson, The Land and Book (1880; new ed., revised); Van de Velde, Journey through Syria and Palest. (1854, 2 vols.); Roroff, Reise n. Palaest. (Leips., 1862, 2 vols.); Bovet, Voyage en terre Sainte (4 ed., Par., 1864); Furrer, Wanderungen durch Palaest. (Zürich, 1865); Ludwig, Bethlehem in the Summer of 1864 (Berne, 1865); Petermann, Reisen in den Orient (Leips., 1865); Macédo, Pélerinage aux lieux saints (Paris, 1867); Rigggenbach (Balse, 1873); Dean Stanley, Sinai and Palestine (London, 1853; New York, 1870); E. H. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus (London; also New York, 1872); J. L. Porter, Handbook for Syria and Palestine, (last London ed., 1875); Lieuts. Conder and Hitchen, Survey of Western Palestine: Memoirs of its Topography, Orography, Hydrography, and Archæology;

¹ Comp. Paulus, Sammlung der merkwürdigsten Reisen in den Orien., Jena, 1792-94, 7 vols. Continued by Rink (Königsberg, 1801); Winer, Handb. d. theol. Lit., p. 161. For New Test. times see the imaginary journey, Helons Wallfahrt nach Jerusalem, 109 Jahre vor der Geburt des Herrn, by Fr. Strauss, Elberfeld, 1820-28, 4 vols.—an imitation of the Voyage du jeune Anacharsis en Grèce.

6 vols., 4to; 3 vols. yet to appear (London, 1881). See also Quarterly Statements of Palestine Exploration Fund, London; also the Egyptological and Assyriological researches of Bonomi, Botta, Bunsen, Brugsch, Fergusson, Grotefend, Layard, Lepsius, Rawlinson, Reinisch, Unger, Seyffarth, Vaux, Geo. Ebers (Aegypten u. d. Bücher Mosais, etc. (vol. i, Leips., 1868), Schrader, Die Keilschriften u. d. Alte Testament (Giessen, 1872), Smith, and others. The Phœnician studies of Mövers, Renan (1864), and others, and the numerous reports by missionaries stationed in the East, are likewise valuable in many respects. (Comp., too, the Ausland and the different geographical magazines).

Concerning the recently discovered "Moabite stone" recording the triumphs of the Moabite king Mesha (ninth century B.C.) comp. the works by Nöldeke, Schlottmann, Kämpf, Ginsburg, and others.

1. *Archæological works on the Bible of a general character.*¹

J. J. Bellermann, Handbuch der biblischen Literatur, comprising Biblical Archæology, Chronology, Genealogy, History, Natural Philosophy and History, Mythology and History of Idolatries, Antiquities, History of Art, and Sketches of the Scriptural Writers. Erfurt, 1787-99, 4 vols. (Also published with separate titles.)

† J. Jahn, Bibl. Archæologie. Wien, 1796-1805. 8 Bde., I. Bd., 2. Aufl., 1818. 2. Bd., 2. Aufl., 1825.

— Archæologia biblica in compend. redacta. Ib. 1805, 1814.

† F. Ackermann, Archæologia biblica breviter exposita. Vienna, 1826.

E. F. K. Rosenmüller, Das alte und neue Morgenland oder Erläuterungen der heil. Schrift aus der natürlichen Beschaffenheit, den Sagen, Sitten und Gebräuchen des Morgenlandes. Lpz., 1818-20. 4 Bde., (in 6 Abth.).

— Handbuch der bibl. Alterthumskunde. Lpz., 1823-31. 4 Bde.

* G. B. Winer, Bibl. Realwörterbuch, zum Handgebrauche für Studierende Candidaten, Gymnasiallehrer und Prediger. 8. Aufl. 1847, 1848. 2 Bde.

E. W. Löhn, Bibl. Sachwörterbuch zum Handgebrauch. 1884.

O. G. Haupt, Bibl. Real- und Verbal-Encyklopädie. Quedlinb., 1823-27. 2 Bde.

K. F. Keil, Handbuch der biblischen Archæologie. Frankf., 1859.

† Scholz, Die heiligen Alterthümer des Volkes Israel. Regensb., 1868.

* † Bonif. Haneberg, Die religiösen Alterthümer der Bibel. München, 1869.

* Biblexikon, Realwörterbuch zum Handgebrauch für Geistliche und Gemeinde, publ. by Dan. Schenkel, in connexion with Bruch, Diestel, u. Dillmann. Bd. 1-4. Lpz., 1869-72.

Hamburger, Real-Encyklopädie für Bibel und Talmud. 1. Abth. Die Biblischen Artikel. In 5 Heften. 1866-70.

Herzog's Real-Encyklopædie, contains a multitude of articles belonging to this department (by Arnold, Kurtz, Rütschi, Oehler, Vaihinger, and others). For popular use we recommend

H. Zeller, Biblisches Wörterbuch für das christliche Volk; an alphabetical handbook

¹ Older works: A. Calmet, dictionnaire historique, critique, chronolog., géograph. et littéral de la Bible. Par., 1730. 4 voll. f. F. W. Hezel, bibl. Reallexicon. Lpz., 1788-85. Elas. Ugo- lini, thesaurus antiquitatt. sacrar. 1744-68. 34 voll. f.

for the promotion of a knowledge of the Scriptures among all readers of the Bible. 2d ed., Gotha, 1865-67, 2 vols.; and also Biblische Alterthümer, published by the Calwer Publication Society. New series, 1871.

2. *Hebrew Antiquities.*¹

- H. E. Warnekros, Entwurf der Hebr. Alterth. Weim., 1792-94; 3d revised ed., by A. G. Hofmann. Weim., 1832.
G. L. Bauer, kurzes Lehrbuch der Hebräischen Alterthümer d. A. und N. T. Lpz., 1797.
* W. M. L. de Wette, Lehrbuch der Hebr.-jüd. Archäologie, nebst einem Grundriss der Hebr.-jüd. Geschichte. Lpz., 1814; 4. sehr verm. u. verb. Aufl. 1864.
J. H. Pareau, Antiquit. Hebr. breviter descriptae. Traj. ad Rhen. 1817. 1823.
† J. M. A. Scholz, Handbuch der Biblischen Archäologie. Bonn, 1834.
† J. M. A.* Löhnis, Das Land und Volk der alten Hebräer. Regensb., 1844.
H. Ewald, Die Alterthümer des Volkes Israel. (Appendix to vol. 2 of the Gesch. des Volkes Israel.) Gött., 1844. 2d ed. ibid. 1854. Comp. the review by Mezger in Stud. und Krit., 1853. 1. S. 133-204.
J. L. Saalschütz, Archäologie der Hebräer, für Freunde des Alterthums und zum Gebrauche bei akadem. Vorl. Königsb., 1855, 1856. 2 Bde.
K. F. Keil, Handbuch der Bibl. Archäologie. 2d ed. Frankf., 1875.

3. *Sacred Antiquities (connected with church and religion in particular).*²

- G. L. Bauer, Beschreibung der Gottesdienstlichen Verfassung der alten Hebräer. Lpz., 1805, 1806. 2 Bde.
* K. Ch. W. Bähr, Symbolik des Hebräischen Cultus. Heidelb., 1837-39. 2 Bde.
J. F. L. George, Die ältern jüdischen Feste; mit einer Kritik der Gesetzgebung des Pentateuch. Berl., 1835.
Cäsar von Lengerke, Kanaan, Volks- und Religionsgeschichte Israels. 1. Thl. Königsb., 1844.
E. W. Hengstenberg, Die Opfer der h. Schrift. Berl., 1852. (Reprinted from the Evang. KZ.)
J. H. Kurtz, Beiträge zur Symbolik des alttest. Cultus. Lpz., 1851.³
B. Scholz, die Bib. Alterth. des Volkes Israel. Regensb., 1868.
B. Haneberg, die relig. Alterth. der Bibel. München, 1869.
B. Schäfer, die relig. Alterth. der Bibel. Münster, 1878.

With reference to the Mosaic Tabernacle, consult the works of Friederich (1841), Knobel (1858), Keil und Delitzsch (1861), Kamphausen und Fries (Stud. und Krit., 1858-59), * W. Neumann (1861), and Riggensbach (1862; 2d ed. 1867); and with reference to the Synagogues (in addition to Vitringa, infra, note*), Zunz, der Ritus des synagogischen Gottesdienstes geschichtl. entwickelt. Berl., 1859.

4. *Sacred Geography.*⁴

- E. F. K. Rosenmüller, Bibl. Erd- und Länderkunde (Part 1 of the Handb.).
K. Ritter, Erdkunde (Berl., 1832-49). 15. Thl. 1. Abth.

¹ Older works by Waechner (1748, 2 vols.), Carpzov (1748), Iken (1782, 1764), Reland (1706.)

² Older works: Goodwin (Moses et Aaron, 1618), Spencer (1686-1727), Vitringa (de synag. vet. libri III., 1696, 1726), Rau (1736).

³ On non-Israelitish religions: F. O. Movers, die Religion der Phöniciër. Bonn, 1841. 2 Bde. F. Münter, die Religion der Karthager. Kopenh., 1821. 4. Ibid., die Religion der Babylonier. Same, 1827. (Comp. the History of Religion, appended to our paragraph on Church History.)

⁴ With reference to the older geographical works and to Oriental Travels, comp. the historical matter given above, and the Art. Palästina (by Arnold) in Herzog's Encykl., xl, p. 1 seq. The fullest statement of the literature is given in Tobler, Bibliographia geographica Palestinae. Lips., 1897.

C. F. Klöden, Landeskunde von Palästina. Berl., 1817.

* Karl von Raumer, Palästina. Lpz., 1835. (To which is added, Der Zug der Israeliten aus Aegypten nach Kanaan, 1837. With a map and contributions on the Geography of the Bible, 1843.) 4th ed., 1860. Comp. the review by Gross in Stud. u. Krit., 1845.

M. Russel u. J. B. Fraser, Ländergemälde des Orients; a. d. Engl. von A. Diezmann u. J. Sporschill. Pesth, 1840. 6 Bde. (Bd. 3, 4, das h. Land.)

F. A. Arnold, Palästina. Halle, 1845.

A. Knobel, Die Völkertafel der Genesis. Giessen, 1850.

Ludw. Völter, Das heil. Land und das Land der Israelitischen Wanderung. (With a map of Palestine and Arabia Petrea.) Stuttg., 1855. 2d ed., 1864.

Bräm, Israels Wanderung von Gosen bis zum Sinai. Elberfeld, 1859.

Unruh, Zug der Israeliten aus Aegypten nach Kanaan. 1860.

G. Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai. Lpz., 1872.

D. Koriath, Geogr. von Palästina. 2d ed. Freib., 1874.

A. Driow, Jerusalem et la Terre Sainte. Limoges, 1877.

Popular works: F. Bässler, Das heil. Land (Merseb., 1846; new ed., Lpz., 1856); P. W. Behrends, Kurze Beschreibung des h. Landes (Helmst., 1829); O. Beiling, Der christl. Führer in das h. Land (Landsh., 1854); A. Bräm, Beschreibung des h. Landes (2d ed., Meurs., 1838); F. Gessert, Palästina bis auf Christi Zeit (Essen; 3d ed., 1835); H. v. Gerstenbergk, Palästina (Eisenb., 1850); Hornung, Handb. zur Erläuterung der bibl. Geschichte und Geogr. (Lpz., 1825-27); S. Löwisohn, Bibl. Geographie (Wien, 1821); J. G. Melos, Beschreibung des jüd. Landes (Weim., 1822-30); A. Rathgeber, Palästina, Land und Volk (Langens., 1853; 4th ed., 1861); J. F. Röhr, Hist.-geographische Beschr. des jüd. Landes (Zeits., 1816; 8th ed., Lpz., 1851); R. J. Schwarz, Das heil. Land nach seiner ehemaligen und jetzigen Beschaffenheit (Frankf. a. M., 1852); Karl Ritter, Ein Blick auf Palästina u. seine christ. Bevölkerung (Berl., 1852); L. Th. Westhaus, Palästina oder das h. Land zur Zeit Jesu (Soest, 1856); F. A. und O. Strauss, Die Länder und Stätten der heiligen Schrift, in ausgewählten Bildern (Stuttg., 1861); † J. R. Sepp, Jerusalem u. das heil. Land, oder Pilgerbuch nach Palästina, Syrien und Aegypten (Schaffh., 1862; 2. Aufl., 1872); Dixon, W. H., Das heilige Land, from the English by J. E. A. Martin, with woodcuts and two steel plates (Jena, 1870).

Scarcely any of these works are unprovided with means of some sort for illustrating their subject (maps, plans, etc.), and in this regard the following possess distinguished merit:

J. M. Bernatz, Bilder aus dem h. Lande, mit Text von G. H. v. Schubert (Stuttg., 1842), und Bernatz, Album des heil. Landes, 50 ausgew. Orig.-Ansichten bibl. wichtiger Orte nach der natur gez., mit Text von G. H. v. Schubert (Stuttg., 1855); A. Eltzner, Das bibl. Jerusalem aus der Vogelschau (3d ed., Lpz., 1863). — Charts of Syria and Palestine in the Atlases of d'Anville and Reichardt, * Berghaus; single, by Klöden (1817), Grimm (1836), Rosenmüller (1830), Mayr (1842), * Kiepert, publ. by Ritter (1842), * Karl Zimmermann, Karte von Syrien und Palästina (15 maps, Berl., 1850); Riess, Karte von Palästina (1861), Altmüller, Aegypten, Sinai-Halbinsel und Palästina (1861). Manuals: C. Ackermann und C. F. Weiland, Bibel-Atlas, nach den neuesten und besten Hilfsmitteln Weimar, 1832; 3d unchanged ed., 1855 (where see additional literature on p. 1 sq.); * Kiepert, Bibel-Atlas; 3d unchanged ed., Berl., 1867, with 8 charts and 8 tabular illustrat. (to accompany Peter's Uebersichtskarten der Reisen Jesu nach den 4 Evangelisten); new revision by Lionnet, 1864; * Van de Velde, Map of the Holy Land. 8 leaves. (Gotha, 1858.) 2d ed., ibid., (1866.) Menke, Bibel-atlas in 8 Blättern. (Gotha, 1868.)

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. Hebrew Antiquities.

- Benisch, A. Judaism Surveyed; a Sketch of the Rise and Development of Judaism from Moses to our Days. 12mo. London, 1874.
- Cox, F. A. The Manners and Customs of the Israelites in relation to their Religion and Civil Polity. 12mo. London, 1852.
- De Costa, B. F. The Moabite Stone. 8vo. New York, 1871.
- Ewald, Heinrich. The Antiquities of Israel. From the German. 8vo, pp. 398. London, 1876.
- Freeman, James M. Hand-Book of Bible Manners and Customs. 12mo, pp. 515. New York, 1874.
- Ginsburg, C. D. The Moabite Stone; a Fac-simile of the Original Inscription, with an English Translation, and an Historical and Critical Commentary. 4to. London, 1871.
- Jahn, John. Biblical Archæology. From the Latin. 5th ed., 8vo, pp. xii, 578. New York, 1859.
- Jamieson, Robert. Eastern Manners, Old and New Testament. New ed., 2 vols., 12mo. Edinburgh, 1859.
- Josephus, Flavius, Works of. Translated by Wm. Whiston, A.M. Many editions.
- King, J. Moab's Patriarchal Stone; being an account of the Moabite Stone. 8vo. London, 1878.
- Madden, F. W. History of Jewish Coinage and of Money in the Old and New Testaments. With 264 Engravings of all the Jewish Coins mentioned in the Bible. 8vo, pp. 373. London, 1864.
- Maimonides, Rabbi. The laws of the Hebrews relating to the Poor and the Stranger. Translated by James W. Peppercorn. 8vo. London, 1841.
- Michaelis, J. D. Commentaries on the Law of Moses. Four vols., 8vo. London, 1814.
- Pierotti, E. Customs and Traditions of Palestine, illustrating the Manners of the Ancient Hebrews. Translated by T. G. Bonney. 8vo, pp. 288. London, 1864.
- Rawlinson, G. Historical Illustrations of the Old Testament. With Additions by Prof. H. B. Hackett. Boston, 1874.
- Snowden, J. R. The Coins of the Bible and its Money Terms. 18mo. Philadelphia, 1864.
- The History of the Hebrew Commonwealth, from the Earliest Times to the Destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 72. With a continuation to the time of Adrian.* 3d ed., 8vo, pp. xvi, 592. Oxford, 1840.
- Townley, James. The Reason of the Law of Moses. With Notes, Dissertations, and a Life of the Author. 8vo, pp. 451. London, 1827.
- Warburton, William. The Divine Legation of Moses Demonstrated. Three vols., 8vo, pp. 526, 518, 512. London, 1846.
- Wines, E. C. Commentaries on the Laws of Ancient Hebrews. 8vo, pp. 640. New York, 1852.

2. Biblical Natural History.

- Abbott, Gorham. Scripture Natural History. 12mo. Boston.
- Calcott, Maria. Scripture Herbal. 8vo, pp. 568. London, 1842.
- Harris, T. M. The Natural History of the Bible. 8vo. London, 1820.
- Kurtz, J. H. The Bible and Astronomy. An Exposition of the Biblical Cosmology and its Relations to Natural Science. 12mo. Philadelphia, 1861.

- Mitchell, O. M. Astronomy of the Bible. 12mo, pp. 322. New York, 1863.
- Natural History of the Bible; being a review of the Physical Geography, Geology, and Meteorology of the Holy Land*. 12mo, pp. 526. London, 1867.
- Osborn, Henry S. Plants of the Holy Land, with their Fruits and Flowers. 8vo. Philadelphia, 1860.
- Tristram, H. B. The Land of Israel, a Journal of Travels in Palestine undertaken with special Reference to its Physical Character. 2d ed., 8vo, pp. 671. London, 1866.
- Wood, J. G. Bible Animals; being a Description of every Living Creature mentioned in the Scriptures. 8vo, pp. 652. New York, 1869.

3. Biblical Geography.

Arabia.

- Lowth, Geo. T. The Wanderer in Arabia; or, Western Footsteps in Eastern Tracks. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 724. London, 1855.
- Palgrave, W. G. Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1869.
- Stephens, J. L. Travels in Egypt, Arabia Petrea, and the Holy Land. 2 vols., 12mo. New York, 1851.
- Taylor, B. Travels in Arabia. New York, 1874.

Armenia.

- Curzon, Robert. Armenia; a Year at Erzeroum. 12mo, pp. xiv, 226. New York, 1854.
- Smith, Eli, and Dwight, H. G. O. Researches in Armenia, with a visit to the Nestorian and Chaldean Christians of Oroomiah. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 679. Boston, 1830.
- Wheeler, C. H. Ten Years on the Euphrates; or, Primitive Missionary Policy Illustrated. 12mo. Boston.

Asia Minor.

- Fellows, Charles. A Journal written during an Excursion in Asia Minor, 1838. Royal 8vo, pp. 358. London, 1839. New ed., 1852.
- Hamilton, William J. Researches in Asia Minor, Pontus, and Armenia. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 1069. London, 1842.
- Leake, W. M. A Journal of a Tour in Asia Minor, with Comparative Remarks on the Ancient and Modern Geography of that Country. 8vo, pp. 391. London, 1824.
- Van Lennep, H. J. Travels in Little-Known Parts of Asia Minor. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1870.

Assyria.

- Assyrian Discoveries; an Account of Explorations and Discoveries on the site of Nineveh, during 1873 and 1874, with Illustrations*. 8vo, pp. xvi, 461. New York, 1875.
- Smith, George. The Chaldean Account of Genesis. 8vo, pp. xvi, 319. New York, 1876.

Babylon.

- Newman, John P. Thrones and Palaces of Babylon from Sea to Sea. 8vo, pp. 455. New York, 1876.

Chaldea.

- Loftus, William K. Travels in Chaldea and Susiana. 8vo, pp. 436. New York, 1857.

Crete.

- Postlethwaite, E. Tour in Crete. 12mo. London, 1868.
 Skinner, J. E. H. Roughing it in Crete in 1867. 8vo. London, 1867.

Cyprus.

- Di Cesnola, Louis P. Cyprus: its Ancient Cities, Tombs, and Temples. A Narrative of Researches and Excavations during Ten Years' Residence in that Island. 8vo, pp. xix, 456. New York, 1878.
 Löher, Franz von. Cyprus. Historical and Descriptive, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. 8vo, pp. vii, 324. New York, 1878.

Damascus.

- Porter, J. L. Five Years in Damascus; with Travels to Palmyra, Lebanon, and other Scripture Sites. 2 vols., 8vo, London, 1855.

Dead Sea.

- De Saulcey, L. F. J. C. Narrative of a Journey round the Dead Sea and in Bible Lands. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 968. London, 1854.
 Lynch, W. F. Narrative of the United States Expedition to the River Jordan and the Dead Sea. 8vo, pp. 516. Philadelphia, 1848.

Desert and the Exodus.

- Bartlett, W. H. Forty Days in the Desert on the Track of the Israelites; or, a Journey from Cairo to Mount Sinai and Petra. New ed., 8vo. London, 1867.
 Brugsch Bey, Henry. The True Story of the Exodus of Israel. Edited by Francis H. Underwood. 12mo, pp. 260. Boston, 1880.
 Foster, Charles. Israel in the Wilderness. 12mo, pp. 319. London, 1865.
 Palmer, E. H. The Desert of the Exodus; Journeys on Foot in the Wilderness of the Forty Years' Wanderings. 8vo, pp. 470. New York, 1872.

Egypt.

- Bartlett, W. H. The Nile Boat; or, Glimpses of the Land of Egypt. 12mo, pp. 236. New York, 1851.
 Bunsen, Ernest de. Egypt's Place in Universal History. New ed., 5 vols., 8vo. London, 1867.
 Brugsch Bey, Henry. A History of Egypt under the Pharaohs, derived entirely from the Monuments. Edited by Philip Smith. 2 vols., 8vo. London.
 De Leon, Edwin. The Khedive's Egypt; or, the Old House of Bondage under New Masters. 12mo, pp. 435. New York, 1877.
 Galloway, W. B. Egypt's Record of Time to the Exodus of Israel, critically investigated. London, 1869.
 Harman, Henry M. A Journey to Egypt and the Holy Land in 1869-70. Pp. xii, 331. Philadelphia, 1873.
 Hengstenberg, E. W. Egypt and the Books of Moses. 12mo, pp. 312. Andover, 1843.
 Jones, J. Foulkes. Egypt in its Biblical Relations and Moral Aspect. 8vo, pp. viii, 326. London, 1860.
 Lane, E. W. An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians. 2 vols., 16mo, pp. xx, 418; viii, 429. London, 1836. 5th ed., enlarged, 1871.
 Lepsius, C. R. Tour from Thebes. 8vo. London, 1847.
 Lepsius, Ric. Discoveries in Egypt, Ethiopia, and the Peninsula of Sinai, 1842-45. Edited, with Notes, by K. R. H. Mackenzie. 8vo, pp. 471. London, 1858.

- Lindsay, A. W. C. Letters on Egypt, etc. Boston and New York.
- Osburn, William. The Monumental History of Egypt as recorded on the Ruins of her Temples, Palaces, and Tombs. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 481, 643. London, 1854.
- Israel in Egypt; or, Genesis and Exodus. 2d ed. London, 1856.
- Palmer, William. The Egyptian Chronicles; with a Harmony of Sacred and Egyptian Chronology. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 1053. London, 1861.
- Schaff, Philip. Through Bible Lands: Notes of Travel in Egypt, the Desert, and Palestine. 12mo, pp. 413. New York, 1879.
- Sharpe, Samuel. The History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till the Conquest by the Arabs, A. D. 640. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 628. London, 1846. 5th ed., 1870.
- Taylor, Bayard. Egypt and Iceland in 1874. New York, 1875.
- Taylor, W. C. Illustrations of the Bible from the Monuments of Egypt. 12mo, pp. xvi, 200. London, 1838.
- Wilkinson, J. Gardner. Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians. New ed., revised and corrected by Samuel Birch, LL.D. 3 vols., 8vo, pp. xxx, 510; xii, 515; xi, 528. London, 1878.
- Zincke, F. Barham. Egypt of the Pharaohs and the Khedive. 8vo. London, 1871.

Ephesus.

- Wood, J. T. Discoveries of Ephesus. New ed., 4to. London, 1876.

Greece.

- Anderson, Rufus. Observations upon the Peloponnesus and Greek Islands. 12mo. Boston, 1830.
- Baird, Henry M. Modern Greece; a Narrative of a Residence and Travels in that Country. 12mo, pp. xii, 380. New York, 1856.
- Wordsworth, C. Greece, Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical. 8vo. Boston.

Jerusalem.

- Barclay, J. T. The City of the Great King; or, Jerusalem as it was, as it is, and as it is to be. 8vo, pp. 647. Philadelphia, 1858.
- Bartlett, W. H. Walks about the City and Environs of Jerusalem. 8vo. London, 1852.
- Palmer, E. H., and Besant, Walter. Jerusalem: the City of Herod and Saladin. 8vo. London, 1871.
- Pierotti, E. Jerusalem Explored; Ancient and Modern. 2 vols., folio. London, 1864.
- Thrupp, J. F. Ancient Jerusalem; a new Investigation into the History, Topography, and Plan of the City, Environs, and Temple. 8vo, pp. 428. London, 1855.
- Warren, Charles. Underground Jerusalem; an Account of some of the Principal Difficulties encountered in its Exploration, and the Results obtained. 8vo, pp. 579. London, 1876.
- Williams, George. The Holy City. Historical, Topographical, and Antiquarian notices of Jerusalem. 2d ed. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 601, 629. London, 1849.
- Wilson and Warren. The Recovery of Jerusalem. A Narrative of Exploration and Discovery in the City and Holy Land. 8vo, pp. 459. New York, 1871.

Lebanon.

- Burton, R. F., and Drake, C. T. Unexplored Syria. Visits to the Libanus, the Anti-Libanus, the Northern Libanus, etc. 2 vols., 8vo, London, 1872.

Macedonia.

- Walker, U. A. Macedonia to the Albanian Lakes. 8vo. London, 1864.

Moab.

Tristram, H. B. The Land of Moab: Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. 8vo, pp. 416. New York, 1873.

Nineveh.

Fergusson, J. The Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis Restored; an Essay on Ancient Assyrian and Persian Architecture. 8vo, pp. 384. London, 1851.

Layard, A. H. Nineveh and its Remains. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1848-49.

— Discoveries among the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon, with Travels in Armenia, Kurdistan, and the Desert. Second Exploration. 8vo, pp. 586. New York, 1853.

Rich, C. J. Narrative of a Residence on the Site of Ancient Nineveh. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1836.

Smith, George. Assyrian Discoveries: Explorations and Discoveries on the Site of Nineveh, 1873, 1874. New York, 1875.

Vaux, W. S. W. Nineveh and Persepolis. A Historical Sketch of Ancient Assyria, etc. 2d ed., 12mo, pp. 444. London, 1850. New ed., 1855.

Palestine.

Bartlett, W. H. The Footsteps of our Lord and his Apostles in Palestine, Syria, Greece, and Italy. 8vo. London, 1856. New ed., 1862.

Benjamin, I. J. Eight Years in Asia and Africa, from 1846 to 1855. 8vo, pp. 347. Hanover, 1859.

Buchanan, Claudius. Christian Researches in Asia. 12mo, pp. 275. Philadelphia, 1813.

Burt, N. C. The Land and its Story; or, The Sacred Historical Geography of Palestine. 8vo. New York, 1869.

Conder, Claude Reignier. Tent Work in Palestine. A Record of Discovery and Adventure. Published for the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund. With Illustrations by J. W. Whymper. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. xxvi, 381; viii, 352. London, 1878.

Dixon, William H. The Holy Land, with Illustrations. 8d ed., 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1867.

Keith, Alexander. The Land of Israel, according to the Covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. 12mo. New York, 1851.

Kinglake, W. Eöthen; or, Travels in the East. New ed., 12mo. London, 1871.

Merrill, Selah. Galilee in the Time of Christ. With an Introduction by A. P. Peabody. Pp. 159. Boston. 1881.

— East of the Jordan. A Record of Travel in the Countries of Moab, Gilead, and Bashan. With an Introduction by Prof. R. D. Hitchcock. 8vo, pp. 549. New York, 1881.

Macleod, Norman. Eastward: Travels in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria. 3d ed., 8vo. London, 1872.

Ridgaway, Henry B. The Lord's Land: A Narrative of Travels in Sinai, Arabia Petræ, and Palestine, from the Red Sea to the entering in of Hamath. 8vo, pp. 744. New York, 1876.

Robinson, Edward. Biblical Researches in Palestine and in the Adjacent Regions. A Journal of Travels in the Year 1838. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. xxx, 614; xiv, 600. Boston, 1868.

— Later Biblical Researches in Palestine and in the Adjacent Regions. A Journal of Travels in 1852. New Maps and Plans. 2d ed., 8vo, pp. xxx, 664. Boston, 1871.

- Sandie, George. Horeb and Jerusalem. Pp. 417. Edinburgh, 1864.
- Thomson, W. M. The Land and the Book; or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and Scenery, of the Holy Land. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 560, 614. New York, 1859. New ed., vol. i, pp. xx, 592.
- Tillotson, John. History of Palestine and the Holy Land. Illustrated with 350 Engravings and Maps. With a History of the Crusades, compiled by W. and R. Chambers. 8vo. New York, 1875.
- Tristram, H. B. Bible Places; or, the Topography of the Holy Land. 8vo, pp. xvi, 367. London, 1871. 8th ed. New York, 1878.
- Wright, Thomas. Early Travels in Palestine, Comprising the Narratives of Arculf, Willibald, Bernard, Saewulf, Sigurd, Benjamin of Tudela, Sir John Mandeville, De la Brooquiere, and Maundrell. 12mo, pp. 548. London, 1848.

Palmyra.

- Myers, H. M. Remains of Lost Empires. Sketches of the Ruins of Palmyra, Nineveh, Babylon, and Persepolis, etc. 8vo, pp. 531. New York, 1875.

Persia.

- Loftus, William K. Travels and Researches in Chaldea and Susiana. 8vo, pp. 436. New York, 1857.
- Wagner, M. Travels in Persia and Georgia. 3 vols., 8vo. London, 1856.

Phœnicia.

- Phœnicia and Israel. A Historical Essay. London, 1871.

Samaria.

- Mills, John. Nablus and the Modern Samaritans. 12mo, pp. xii, 335. London, 1864.
- Shelaby, Jacob Esh. Notices of the Modern Samaritans. 8vo, pp. 55. London, 1855.

Seven Churches.

- Cathcart, M. The Seven Churches of Asia. 4to. London, 1869.
- Tristram, H. B. The Seven Golden Candlesticks. 8vo. London, 1871.

Sinai.

- Bartlett, S. C. From Egypt to Palestine through Sinai, the Wilderness, and the South Country. 8vo, pp. 555. New York.
- Gausson, L. From Egypt to Sinai. The Exodus of the Children of Israel. 12mo. London, 1869.
- Ritter, C. Comparative Geography of Palestine and the Sinaitic Peninsula; translated and adapted to the use of students by W. L. Gage. 4 vols., 8vo. New York.
- Stanley, Arthur P. Sinai and Palestine in Connection with their History. 8vo, pp. iv, 535. New York, 1857.

4. Hebrew Poetry and Music.

- Carhart, J. Wesley. The Poets and Poetry of the Hebrews. New York, 1865.
- Herder, J. G. The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry. From the German. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 293, 320. Burlington, Vt., 1838.
- Hutchinson, Enoch. The Music of the Bible; or, Explanatory Notes upon all the Passages of the Sacred Scriptures relating to Music. 8vo, pp. 513. Boston, 1864.
- Lowth, R. The Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews. London and Andover. Many ed.
- Taylor Isaac. The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry. 8vo, pp. xvi, 347. London, 1861.

SECTION XII.

BIBLICAL ISAGOGICS. (Introduction. Canonicus).

Comp. Dav. Schulz, Review of Eichhorn's and de Wette's Einleitungen in Stud. u. Krit., 1839, No. 3, pp. 570-72; Hupfeld, Begriff u. Methode der sog. Bibl. Einl., Marb., 1844; Rudelbach, Begriff der N. T. Theologie u. Isagogik, in his Zeitschrift, 1848, 1; Baur, Die Einl. in das N. T. als theol. Wissensch. in Theol. Jahrb., 1850-51; Delitzsch, Begriff u. Methode der sog. Biblischen u. insbeson. A. T. Einleitung, in Thomasius and Hofmann's Zeitschr. für Prot. u. Kirche, xxviii, No. 3; Eri., 1854, p. 138, sqq.; Hahn, in Herzog's Encykl., iii, p. 736, sqq. (s. v. Einl. ins A. T.); Articles Biblical Introduction in M'Clintock & Strong's Cyclopædia, vol. iv, p. 630, and Kitto's Cyclopædia, vol. ii, p. 27; Brooke Foss Westcott, Introduction to the Study of the Gospels; Henry Alford, How to Study the New Testament.

The Bible is a body of writings which originated in different periods and under various circumstances and conditions, which were from different authors, and were gradually collected into a whole; and it is consequently necessary for a proper appreciation of its character that the origin and fortunes of the entire collection and also of its several parts be understood. To afford this knowledge is the office of the history of the canon or the science of Biblical Introduction (Isagogics in the limited sense), which is divided either into Introduction to the New or to the Old Testament, or into general and special. General introduction discusses the origin and progress the establishing of the canon, the history of manuscripts, editions, versions, revisions of the holy Scriptures, etc. Special introduction, on the other hand, inquires, in partial connexion with criticism, into the authenticity and integrity of the several writings, and deals, in addition, with the history of their authors as such, the design, plan, form, and style of their works, and finally with the date, place, and circumstances in which the writings were composed.

The objects of a history of the canon.

Introduction is either general or special.

The idea of Introduction itself is vague, and opinion is still divided with regard to its importance and extent as a Biblical science. De Wette denies that Introduction is a science in the proper sense, and views it as a mere aggregation of preliminary knowledge, which lacks both "a true scientific principle and a necessary connexion of its parts;"¹ but in more recent times scholars (e. g., Schulz, Credner,

The scope and limits of Introduction not precisely determined.

¹ De Wette, Einl. § 1. Schleiermacher (Herm. u. Krit., p. 379) observes in a similar spirit that the so-called N. T. Introduction is "a science that has no limits whatever, and into which anything that is desired may be thrown. A going back to principles is wholly out of the question in such a case. . . . But it is pertinent to ask, 'Are there no such principles?'" Comp. p. 36; "N. T. introduction is not properly a constituent part of the organism of theological science, but it is practically useful for both the beginner and the master, because it facilitates the bringing together upon a single point of all the inquiries that are involved." Scholz, a Roman Catholic writer on in-Reuss, Hupfeld) have directed attention to the necessity for a sifting of the material to be treated by Introduction, and also for the application of principles to such treatment. The indefinite character of the word "introduction"¹ will be apparent to every mind.

At the bottom, all that our treatment of encyclopædia has touched upon or shall hereafter discuss, relating either to the Bible itself or to the aids necessary for its interpretation, may be included under Introduction to the Bible; and, in point of fact, the Hebrew and New Testament languages, archæology, hermeneutics, etc., have been thus disposed of in some instances. Some writers have accord-

The name "Canonics" proposed as a substitute for "Introduction."

ingly preferred to lay aside this indefinite term, and the name canonics has been proposed as a substitute.² Others (like Reuss) have exchanged it for the name "History of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments." The vague idea of introduction is certainly confined within wholesome limits in one direction by this method; but in another direction the present science of introduction is extended to cover a field that lies beyond the bounds of introductory matter, since the later fortunes of the Bible—the dissemination of the sacred writings, the history of their employment and their exposition—are included.

roduction, likewise speaks of it as being simply an aggregation of multifarious matters, in connexion with which the important feature is that they be "conveniently distributed." He divides introduction into criticism, hermeneutics, and archæology (see pp. 1 and 2). Comp. Delitzsch, l. c., "Every science is an organism; but the term organic applies only to what is not simply a means for promoting an object external to itself, but is itself a whole, an object to itself, in which the individual with its peculiarities is lost in the idea of the whole, and only that is an instrument (organ) which aids the development of the whole in its identity with itself. The so-called introduction lacks this organic character. It is not without idea and aim, but it lacks the immanent, self-developing idea, the principle of teleological self-reference, which is necessary to a science."

¹ The name is first employed by Adrian, a writer probably of the fifth century, in the small hermeneutical work εἰσαγωγή εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς; afterward by Cassiodorus (in the sixth century), and later in the Middle Ages. In Germany Michaelis first used it in connexion with the N. T., and Eichhorn with the O. T. Comp. Hahn in Herzog's Encykl., iii, p. 727, sqq.

² Zyro, in Stud. u. Krit., 1837, No. 3, considers canonics to be merely a branch of isagogics. In his view, the latter comprehends everything that is necessary for the interpretation of the Scriptures, i. e., 1. the nature and importance of the Bible, together with its history (canonics); 2. its compass, or the genuineness of its matter (criticism); 3. its language and contents (hermeneutics). He then divides canonics into two parts, in abstracto, in which character canonics unfolds the nature of the Scriptures under the forms of authenticity, credibility, and genuineness, and canonics in concreto, or what is usually termed introduction in the more limited sense, which is again divided into general and special or into Old and New Testament canonics. Comp. Pelt, Encykl., p. 121.

It will not be denied that great interest attaches to such an all-sided historical knowledge respecting the Bible; but methodological considerations require nevertheless that what is introductory to the study of Scripture (the history of its origin and the collection of its parts into a canon), and what relates to the further history of the already completed collection of the Scriptures, should be kept apart. Only the former, though likewise historical in its nature, is an exegetical auxiliary science, because it affords a correct position to the exegete from which to operate; while the latter must be assigned to the department of Church history and the history of literature, and may be reserved for a later stage of theological study. It does not appear to us a matter which the science need be ashamed of, that the "reader of the Bible" (i. e., the student) must before all "be well-grounded in historical knowledge in order to correctly understand and properly appreciate the Bible as a whole and in its parts;"¹ but such preliminary knowledge needs a careful discrimination of its elements among themselves, and a proper distribution of its parts in the organism of the sciences. If, in harmony with this principle, the grammatical and archæological elements be excluded, and a distinct place be assigned to hermeneutics, there will be left only what is generally denoted by the still current name of introductory science, namely, the history of the canon (within the limits hitherto assigned to it) and criticism. These may not be wholly separated from each other, for the history of the canon is not to be a mere review, but history involving the discussion of principles—critical history; in which connexion it may be remembered that what is now called introduction was formerly known as critica sacra or histoire critique du V. et N. T. (Richard Simon). This does not forbid, however, that criticism as such, i. e., the whole of the science of critical principles, should constitute a distinct branch of study, as does hermeneutics, which embraces the theory of interpretation. The science of introduction is thus confined to critical and historical inquiry concerning the books of Scripture and their collection into a canon, instituted for purposes of exegesis.

Introduction properly limited to history of the canon and criticism.

The division into Old and New Testament introduction results from the nature of the case; but the relation of general to special introduction is more difficult to determine. The usual method is to begin with the general (the collection of the canon, history of the text, versions, etc.), and to supplement this with introductions to the several books; but the opposite course may be adopted with Reuss, and the origin of the different books discussed, so that the formation of the canon from its first beginnings to its final completion is presented in a genetic view. In the latter case, however, the special introduction would need to be very brief and to steadily approach its object, as is the case with Reuss, the more extended discussion being reserved for the exegesis of the books. Here, again, the intervention of the different sciences comes into view. Introduction provides the point of view from which the exegete is to regard the Bible; but the progress of exegesis reacts upon introduction and alters the position of isagogics.

Relation of general to special introduction.

¹ The words of Hupfeld, p. 8.

Encyclopædia is concerned with the material of introduction only in so far as it is necessary to give preliminary information with regard to its general character. The question concerning the period in which the formation of the canon was first undertaken, is connected with the inquiry respecting the time when the art of writing was invented. It is certain that the canon as a whole appears for the first time after the captivity. The traditional view that Ezra (B.C. 478) and Nehemiah (2 Macc. ii, 13) took measures for collecting the different books, has been doubted by the criticism of recent times.¹ The first to receive a completed form was probably the Pentateuch, and to this the other books were added in various collections and at different times. The earliest constituents of the New Testament canon were the Pauline epistles, which were written as occasion required (those to the Thessalonians being the oldest); and to these were gradually added the (catholic) epistles of other apostles, together with the written memorabilia of the life of Jesus (Gospels), the latter being probably first in point of time. The ancient Church knew of but two collections, the εὐαγγέλιον and the ἀπόστολος (according to the assumption which has become current since the time of Semler, though it is not fully established).² The former included the four Gospels, which had already been distinguished from the spurious gospels and recognized by the Church, and the latter embraced the apostolical epistles and the Book of Acts. Opinion was long divided with regard to the Apocalypse and certain of the catholic epistles, and a distinction was made between ὁμολογούμενα and ἀντιλεγόμενα and νόθα (Euseb., H. E. iii, 25) as late as the fourth century. The first class included the four Gospels, the book of Acts, the fourteen Pauline epistles,¹ and 1 Peter and 1 John; to the second were assigned the 2d ep. by Peter, 2 and 3 John, James, and Jude; and the third was limited to the Apocalypse, though many classed it among the writings whose authenticity was acknowledged (comp. the canon of Origen in Euseb., vi, 25, and that of Eusebius himself, ibid., iii, 25, as also the somewhat divergent so-called Muratorian canon of Milan, in Kirchhofer, Quellensammlung, p. 1, sqq.; also Westcott on the Canon of the New Test., p. 184, sqq., and Harman's Introduction, pp. 428-438). The canon of the New Testament as it now stands was gradually formed by the actions of councils (comp. Canon Laodic., 364, and the canon of the third council of Carthage in 397). This may suffice to enable the beginner to understand the relation of the early Christian Church to the canon, and to demonstrate to him that the former had already attained to a high degree of independence ("sine charta et atramento."—Irenæus) before the canonical boundaries of the letter of the Bible had been definitely fixed.² But this by no means involves the conclusion that the canon is a mere accident; the religious disposition will still recognize its providential, though not necessarily miraculous, character.

¹ Comp. Leyrer's art. in Herzog's Encykl., xv, p. 296, sqq. A reference to an already completed canon cannot, of course, be looked for in the canonical books themselves. The apocryphal Book of Wisdom, however (not later than B.C. 180), affords proof that a collection of sacred writings existed (chap. xlv-xlix), though it cannot be shown that the entire canon, as we possess it, is intended; for this purpose a formal catalogue would be required. The first to furnish a list (of twenty-two books) was Josephus (contr. Ap. i, 8), from whom the tradition referred to in the text is also derived.

² Pelt, p. 144, under reference to Orelli: Selecta patrum capita ad εὐαγγελικὰν sacra pertin. p. 1, 11, sq., note. Comp. Landerer in Herzog's Encykl., vii, p. 270, sqq.

1. *Introductions to the Bible as a whole.*³

Leonh. Bertholdt, Historisch-kritische Einleitung in sämmtl. kanonische u. apokryphische Schriften des A. u. N. T. Erl., 1812-19. 6 Bde.

* W. M. L. de Wette, Lehrbuch der histor.-krit. Einleitung in die Bibel A. u. N. T.

¹ Including that to the Hebrews, though its Pauline character is denied by some churches.

² Comp. Schleiermacher, § 104, sqq.; Goethe, p. 140, "The Bible itself—and this receives too little attention—exerted almost no influence in the older times. The books of the Old Testament had scarcely been collected, and the nation in which they originated was utterly dispersed. The latter alone formed the nucleus about which its members gathered and still gather. The books of the New Testament had scarcely been brought together before Christendom divided into endless differences of opinions. And thus it appears that people do not busy themselves with the work so much as about the work."

³ Older works by Rivetus (1627), Walther (1686), A. Calov (1648-78), Brian Walton (1657; Edit. von Wrangham, 1828), Heidegger (1681), Pfeiffer (Ultraj., 1704), van Till (1720-22), du Pin (1701), Calmet 1720; translated by Mosheim (1738-47), Moldenhauer (1744), Börner (1758), † Goldhagen (1765-68), Wagner (1795).

- Part 1: Einleit. in's A. T. Berl., 1817; 7th ed., 1852. Part 2: Einleit. in's N. T. 1826-30; 6th ed., by Messner and Lünemann, 1860.
- K. A. Credner, Beiträge zur Einl. in die Bibl. Schriften. 1 Bd. Halle, 1832.
- † J. M. A. Scholz, Einl. in die heil. Schriften des A. u. N. T. (1st part: allgemeine Einl.) Köln, 1845.
- † D. Haneberg, Versuch einer Geschichte der bibl. Offenbarung als Einleit. in's A. u. N. T. Regensb., 1850. 3d ed., 1863.
- J. J. Prins, Handboek to de kennis van de heil. Schriften des Ouden en Nieuwen Verbonds. Rotterd., 1851, 1852. 2 parts.
- O. R. Hertwig, Tabellen zur Einl. in die kanonischen u. apokryphischen Bücher des A. T. Berl., 1856.
- F. Kaulen, Einl. in die heil. Schrift Alt. u. N. T. Freib., 1876.

Practical, and in popular style:

- Huber, Einleit. in die sämmtl. Bücher der h. Schrift. Basel, 1803. (3. Aufl., 1841.)
- A. Schumann, Prakt. Einleit. in die Bücher des A. und N. T. Berl., 1847.
- J. Kirchhofer, Leitfaden zur Bibelkunde für Bürgerschulen, Elementarschullehrer-Seminarien, etc. 2d ed. Stuttg., 1860.
- R. F. Grau, Entwicklungsgeschichte des Neu Testamentlichen Schriftthums. Gütersl., 1871.
- F. W. Weber, Kurtzges. Einl. in die heil. Schriften Alten u. N. Test. 4th ed. Nörd., 1874.
- E. Zittel, die entstehung der Bibel. 8d ed. Karlsr., 1875.
- C. A. Witz, Einl. in die Schriften A. u. N. Test. Wien., 1876.

Apologetical:

- L. Gaussen, Die Echtheit der heiligen Schriften vom Standpunkt der Geschichte und des Glaubens. From the French, by J. E. Grob. Basel and Ludwigsh., 1864 and 1865. 2 parts.

2. Introductions to the Old Testament.

- Dillmann, Ueber die Bildung der Sammlung der h. Schrift A. T. (Jahrb. für deutsche Theolog., 1858. 3.)
- Diestel, Ueber den gegenwärtigen Stand der Einl. ins A. T. (Deutsche Zeitschr. für christliche Wissenschaft und christl. Leben. April, 1861.)
- R. Simon, Histoire critique du Vieux Testament. Par., 1678. 4. Rotterd., 1685. 4.¹
- * J. G. Eichhorn, Einleitung in's A. T. Lpz., 1780, 1783, 1787, 1803. 3 Bde; 1823, 1824. 5 Bde.
- Einleitung in die apokryphischen Schriften des A. T. Lpz., 1795.
- G. L. Bauer, Entwurf einer krit. Einleit. in die Schriften des A. T. Nürnberg, 1794, 1801, 1806.
- † J. Jahn, Einleitung in die göttlichen Bücher des A. T. Wien, 1793, 1802. 2 Bde.
- Introductio in libros sacros Vet. Foed. in compend. redacta. Vienn., 1804-15.
- * Bertholdt and de Wette. (See above, under 1.)
- W. M. L. de Wette, Beiträge zur Einl. in das A. T. Halle, 1809. 2 Bde.
- J. Ch. W. Augusti, Grundriss einer histor.-krit. Einleitung in's A. T. Lpz., 1806-27
- † F. Ackermann, Introductio in libros Vet. Foed. Vienn., 1825.

¹ Works in Latin: Natalis Alb. de Versé, hist. critica V. T. auctore R. P. Ricardo Simonio. Amst., 1681-85. Franceq., 1698. 4. With which comp. (le Clerc): Sentimens des quelques Theologiens de Hollande sur l'histoire critique, etc. Amst., 1685. Germ. by Corrodi. Zürich, 1792. 2 Bde. Other older works by J. A. Fabricius (1610), J. H. Hottinger (1649-96), J. Leusden (1663-1739), J. G. Carpzeov (Introductio, 1714-31-41. Critica Sacra, 1728-43), J. S. Somler (Apparatus 1773), H. E. Gütte (1787), J. D. Michaelis (1787).

- Hengstenberg, Beiträge zur Einl. in's A. T. Berl., 1831-39. 3 Bde.
 * H. A. Ch. Hävernick, Handbuch der histor.-krit. Einleit. in das A. T. Erl., 1837-49. 3 Bde. (Vol. 3 by K. F. Keil.) (Vols. 1 and 2 in a 2d ed., 1854-56, by Keil.)
 K. F. Keil, Lehrbuch der hist.-krit. Einleit. in die kanon. Schriften des A. T. Frankf. a. M., 1853. 2. Aufl. 1859.
 * Fr. Bleek, Einleit. in's A. T. Published by J. F. Bleek and A. Kamphausen, with preface by C. J. Nitzsch. Berl., 1860. 3. Aufl., 1870.
 * J. J. Stähelin, Specielle Einleit. in die kanonischen Bücher des A. T. Elberf., 1862.
 † Reusch, Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das Alte Testament. 4th ed. Freib., 1870.
 Volckmar, Handb. der Einleit. in die Apokryphen. 2 vols. Tüb., 1862, 1863.
 Th. Nöldeke, die älteste Liter. in e. Reihe von Aufsätzen. Lpz., 1868.
 T. S. Bloch, Studien zur Gesch. der Sammlung der althebr. Liter. Bresl., 1876.

3. Introductions to the New Testament.

- O. R. Hertwig, Tabellen zur Einl. in's N. T. Berl., 1849. 4th ed., prepared by Weingarten, 1872.
 R. Simon, Histoire critique du texte du N. T., où l'on établit la vérité des actes, sur lesquels la religion chrétienne est fondée. Rotterd., 1689. 4.¹
 H. K. A. Hänlein, Handbuch der Einleitung in die Schriften des N. T. Erl., 1794-1800. 2d ed., 1801-9. 3 Bde.
 ——— Lehrbuch der Einleitung. Ebend., 1802.
 J. E. Chr. Schmidt, Historisch-kritische Einleitung in's N. T. Giessen, 1804. 2 Bde.
 J. G. Eichhorn, Einleit. in's N. T. Lpz., Bd. 1, 1804. 2d ed., 1820. Bd. 2 and 3, 1810-14. Bd. 4 and 5, 1827.
 * † J. L. Hug, Einleitung in die Schriften des N. T. Tüb. u. Stuttg., 1800-21-26-47. 2 Bde.
 Bertholdt and de Wette. (See above, under 1.)
 H. E. F. Guericke, Beiträge zur hist.-krit. Einleitung in's N. T. besonders mit polem. Rücksicht auf das Lehrbuch des Herrn de Wette. Halle, 1828. Fortges. Beiträge, 1831.
 * H. A. Schott, Isagoge hist.-crit. in libros N. T. sacros. Jen., 1830.
 † A. B. Feilmoser, Einleitung in die Bücher des N. T. Innsbr., 1810-30.
 M. Schneckenburger, Beiträge zur Einl. in's N. T. Stuttg., 1832.
 H. Ohlshausen, Nachweis der Echtheit sämtlicher Schriften des N. T. Hamb., 1832.
 K. A. Credner, Einleitung in das N. T. Part 1. Halle, 1836.
 ——— Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanon, publ. by G. Volkmar. Berl., 1860.
 C. G. Neudecker, Lehrb. der hist.-krit. Einleitung in das N. T. Lpz., 1840.
 * E. Neuss, Die Geschichte der heiligen Schriften des N. T. Halle, 1842. 2d ed. Braunsch., 1853. 2 vols. 3d ed., ibid., 1864.
 † A. Maier, Einl. in die Schriften des N. T. Freib., im Br., 1852.
 † F. X. Reithmayr, Einleitung in die kanonischen Bücher des N. T. Regensb., 1852.
 H. E. F. Guericke, Gesamtgeschichte des N. T. oder neutestamentl. Isagogik. 2d ed. Lpz., 1854. 3d ed., ibid., 1868.

¹ With which connect: Histoire critique des versions du N. T., où l'on fait connaître quel a été l'usage de la lecture des livres sacrés dans les principales églises du monde. Rot., 1690. 4., and Nouvelles observations sur le texte et les versions du N. T. Par., 1695. 4. (Translated by Matth. H. Cramer, with preface and notes by Semler. Halle, 1776-80). Other older works by J. Leusden (1684-1739), J. G. Pritius (1704; published by Hofmann, 1737-64), E. Harwood (Schulz, Halle, 1770-73), J. Dav. Michaelis (Einl. in die göttl. Schriften des N. B. Gött., 1750. 4th ed., 1787, 1793. 2 vols. 4.), Herth. Marsh (Anmm. und Zusätze zu Michaelis Einl. Cambr., 1793; übers. von E. F. K. Rosenmüller. Gött., 1. Thl., 1795. 2. Thl., 1803. 4.).

F. Bleek, Einleitung in das N. T. Berl., 1862. 2d ed., ibid., 1866.

† Langen, Grundriss der Einleitung in das Neue Testament. Freib., 1868.

Grau, Entwicklungsgeschichte des neutestamentlichen Schriftthums. 2 Bd. Gütersl., 1871.

A. Hilgenfeld, histor.-krit. Einleitung in das N. T. Lps., 1875.

M. von Aberle, Einl. in das N. T. Hersg. v. P. Schanz. Freib., 1877.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. Introduction to the whole Bible.

Angus, Joseph. The Bible Hand-Book: An Introduction to the Study of the Sacred Scripture. 12mo, pp. 727. Philadelphia, 1865.

Bissell, E. Cone. The Historic Origin of the Bible: a Hand-Book of Principal Facts from the best recent authorities. German and English. New York, 1873.

Fairbairn, P. The Typology of Scripture, viewed in connection with the whole series of the Divine Dispensations. 5th ed., 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 420, 484. New York, 1880.

Gaussen, L. The Canon of the Holy Scriptures. Examined in the Light of History. From the French, by Ed. N. Kirk. 12mo, pp. x, 463. Boston, 1863.

Harman, Henry M. Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures. 8vo, pp. 762. New York, 1880.

Hitchcock, R. D. New and Complete Analysis of the Holy Bible: or, the Old and New Testaments arranged according to subjects. 8vo. New York, 1870.

Horne, Thomas Hartwell. An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 464, 493, and 193. Philadelphia, 1841. Thirteenth English edition, with the aid of Ayre and Tregelles. 4 vols., 8vo. London, 1872.

Lightfoot's Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae. 4 vols., 8vo. London, 1880.

Rogers, Henry. The Superhuman Origin of the Bible. Inferred from itself. 8vo, pp. 475. New York, 1874.

Stowe, C. E. Origin and History of the Books of the Bible, both Canonical and Apocryphal. In Two Parts. Part I, The New Testament. 8vo, pp. 583. Hartford, 1867.

Townley, James. Illustrations of Biblical Literature, exhibiting the History and Fate of the Sacred Writings from the Earliest Period to the Present Century. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 602, 604. New York, 1847.

2. To the Old Testament.

Birka, T. R. The Pentateuch and its Anatomists; or, the Unity and Authenticity of the Books of Moses Vindicated. 12mo. London, 1869.

Bleek, Johannes. An Introduction to the Old Testament. Translated by G. H. Venables. 2 vols., pp. 967. London, 1875.

Cowles, Henry. The Pentateuch in its Progressive Revelations of God to Men. Pp. 414. New York, 1874.

Curtiss, Samuel Ives. The Levitical Priests: a Contribution to the Criticism of the Pentateuch. With Preface by Dr. Delitzsch. 12mo, pp. xxix, 254. Edinburgh, 1877.

Davidson, Samuel. An Introduction to the Old Testament, Critical, Historical, and Theological. 3 vols., 8vo. London, 1862.

- Davison, John. Discourses on Prophecy. In which are considered its Structure, Use, and Inspiration. 8vo. London, 1870.
- Delitzsch, Franz. Messianic Prophecies. Translated from Manuscript Lectures by S. Ives Curtiss. New York, 1880.
- De Wette, W. M. L. A Critical and Historical Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the Old Testament. Translated and enlarged by Theodore Parker. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 517, 570. Boston, 1843.
- Ewald, Heinrich. The History of Israel. Translated and Revised. 5 vols., 8vo. London, 1869-1871. (Discusses the formation of the Old Testament Canon.)
- Fairbairn, P. Prophecy, viewed in Respect to its Distinctive Nature, its Special Function, and Proper Interpretation. 2d ed., 8vo. New York, 1866.
- Gloag, James Paton. The Messianic Prophecies. Baird Lectures for 1879. 12mo, pp. 368. Edinburgh, 1879.
- Godet, F. Biblical Studies on the Old Testament. Edited by W. H. Lyttleton. 16mo. New York and London.
- Green, W. H. Moses and the Prophets. New York, 1883. (A reply to Prof. Robertson Smith and Kuenen.)
- Hävernick, H. A. Ch. A Historico-Critical Introduction to the Pentateuch. From the German. 8vo, pp. 450. Edinburgh, 1850.
- A General Historico-Critical Introduction to the Old Testament. From the German. 8vo, pp. 389. Edinburgh, 1852.
- Hengstenberg, E. W. Dissertations on the Genuineness of Daniel, and the Integrity of Zechariah. Translated from the German. 8vo. Edinburgh, 1858.
- Dissertations on the Genuineness of the Pentateuch. From the German. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 462, 543. Edinburgh, 1847.
- Jehovah and Elohim in the Pentateuch, On the Use of, as Consistent with, and Confirmatory of, its Mosaic Authorship. By H. T. 8vo. London, 1869.
- Keil, Karl F. Manual of Historico-Critical Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the Old Testament. Translated by M. Douglas. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 545, 444. Edinburgh, 1869.
- Leathes, Stanley. The Structure of the Old Testament: a Series of Popular Essays. 16mo, pp. 198. Philadelphia, 1873.
- M'Donald, Donald. Introduction to the Pentateuch. 8vo, pp. 487, 489. Edinburgh, 1861.
- Norton, Andrews. The Pentateuch and its Relations to the Jewish and Christian Dispensations. 12mo. London, 1870.
- Oehler, G. F. Theology of the Old Testament. Translated by Sophia Taylor. 8vo, pp. 497. Edinburgh, 1875.
- Phelps, Austin. Studies in the Old Testament. 12mo, pp. 333. Boston, 1879.
- Porter, J. L. The Pentateuch and the Four Gospels: a Statement of our Lord's Testimony to the Mosaic Authorship, Historic Truth, and the Divine Authority of the Pentateuch. 12mo. London, 1865.
- Quaney, John. Genesis and its Authorship. Two Demonstrations: I. On the Import of the Introductory Chapters. II. On the Use of the Names of God in the Book of Genesis. 8vo. London and Edinburgh, 1866.
- Smith, R. Payne. Prophecy a Preparation for Christ. Bampton Lectures for 1869. 12mo, pp. 397. Boston, New York, and Cincinnati, 1870.
- Stebbins, Rufus P. A Study of the Pentateuch for Popular Reading, with an Introductory Examination of recent Dutch Theories, as represented by Dr. Kuenen's Religion of Israel. 12mo, pp. 283. Boston, 1881.

- Stuart, Moses. Critical History and Defense of the Old Testament Canon. 12mo. Revised ed., pp. 422. Andover, 1872.
- Watts, Robert. The Newer Criticism and the Analogy of Faith. A Reply to Prof. Robertson Smith. Edinburgh, 1881.
- Williams, Rowland. The Prophets of Israel and Judah, during the Assyrian Empire. 8vo, pp. 450. London, 1866.
- Wright, W. The Book of Jonah, in Four Oriental Versions, namely, Chaldee, Syriac, Ethiopic, and Arabic; with Glossaries. 8vo, pp. xii, 148. London, 1857.

3. To the New Testament.

- Abbott, Ezra. The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel. 8vo, pp. 104. Boston, 1880.
- Alexander, Jos. A. Notes on the New Testament Literature and Ecclesiastical History. 12mo, pp. 319. New York, 1873. New ed., 1875.
- Alford, Henry. How to Study the New Testament. First Section, The Gospels and Acts. Second Section, The Epistles. Third Section, The Epistles and the Revelation. 3 vols., 12mo. London, 1865-69.
- Bleek, Friedrich. An Introduction to the New Testament. From the Second Edition of the German. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 900. Edinburgh, 1869-70.
- Conder, Josiah. Literary History of the New Testament. 8vo, pp. 624. London, 1845.
- Conybeare and Howson. The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. 2 vols.; also 2 vols. in one, 12mo, pp. 556. New York, 1869.
- Davidson, D. Connection of the Sacred and Profane History, from the Close of the Old Testament History till the Establishment of Christianity. 3 vols. in one. 12mo. New York, 1857. New ed., 24mo. London, 1868.
- Davidson, Samuel. An Introduction to the Study of the New Testament. 3 vols., 8vo, pp. 458, 495, 688. London, 1851.
- Ebrard, J. H. A. The Gospel History. A Critical Investigation in Support of the Historical Character of the Gospels. Translated by James Martin. 8vo, pp. 602. Edinburgh, 1863.
- Gloag, Paton J. Introduction to the Pauline Epistles. 8vo, pp. 488. Edinburgh and New York.
- Godet, F. Studies in the New Testament. 12mo, pp. 398. New York, 1877.
- Gregory, D. S. Why Four Gospels? or, the Gospel for all the World. 12mo, pp. 348. New York and Cincinnati, 1880.
- Howson, John S. The Metaphors of St. Paul, and Companions of St. Paul. With an Introduction by H. B. Hackett. 2 vols. in one, 16mo, pp. v, 91, 211. New York, 1872.
- Hug, John Leonard. An Introduction to the Writings of the New Testament. From the German. 8vo, 2 vols., pp. 529, 682. London, 1827.
- Hutton, Richard H. The Historical Problems of the Fourth Gospel. In Essays, Theological and Literary. 2 vols. London, 1871.
- Kelley, Wm. Lectures Introductory to the Study of the Gospels. 12mo. London, 1867.
- Lectures Introductory to the Study of the Acts, the Catholic Epistles, and the Revelation. 12mo. London, 1870.
- Introduction to the Study of the Epistles of Paul. 12mo. London, 1869.
- Less, Godfrey. The Authenticity, Uncorrupted Preservation, and Credibility of the New Testament. Translated by R. Kingdom. 8vo. London, 1864.

- Lewin, Thomas. Fasti Sacri; or, a Key to the Chronology of the New Testament. 8vo, pp. 429. London, 1866.
- The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, with Numerous Illustrations, finely engraved on wood; Maps, Plans, etc. 2 vols., 4to, pp. xxxiv, 414; xxii, 487. London, 1878.
- Luthardt, C. E. St. John the Author of the Fourth Gospel. From the German. 8vo, pp. 369. Edinburgh, 1875.
- Martin, James. Origin and History of New Testament. 2d ed., 16mo. London, 1872.
- Michaelis, J. D. Introduction to the New Testament; Translated, with Notes, etc., by Herbert Marsh. 6 vols., 8vo. London, 1823.
- Mitchell, E. C. The Critical Hand-Book. A Guide to the Authenticity, Canon, and Text of the New Testament. 12mo. Andover.
- Monod, Adolphe. St. Paul. Five Discourses. From the French, by J. H. Myers. New ed., 12mo. Andover, 1876.
- Nast, Wm. The Gospel Records. Their Genuineness, Authenticity, etc. 12mo, pp. 373. Cincinnati, 1878.
- Norton, Andrews. The Evidence of the Genuineness of the Gospels. Abridged ed., 12mo, pp. 584. Boston, 1867.
- Roberts, Alexander. Discussions of the Gospels. Part I, on the Language used by our Lord. Part II, on the Original Language of Matthew's Gospel. 8vo, pp. 571. Cambridge and London, 1864. (Argues that Jesus spoke Greek.)
- Sandy, Wm. The Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel considered in reference to the Contents of the Gospel itself. A Critical Essay. 12mo. London, 1872.
- Scrivener, F. H. Six Lectures on the Text of the New Testament, and the Ancient MSS. which contain it. Crown 8vo, pp. 607. Cambridge, 1861.
- Tischendorf, Constantine. Origin of the Four Gospels. Translated by William L. Gage. 16mo, pp. 287. Boston, 1868.
- When were our Gospels Written? An Argument; with a Narrative of the Discovery of the Sinaitic Manuscript. 16mo. New York, 1867.
- Tregelles, S. P. Canon Muratorianus. The Earliest Catalogue of the Books of the New Testament. Edited, with Notes, and a Fac-simile of the Manuscript in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. 4to. London, 1868.
- Upham, Francis W. Thoughts on the Holy Gospels: How they came to be in Manner and Form as they are. 12mo, pp. 378. New York and Cincinnati, 1881.
- Westcott, B. F. A History of the New Testament Canon during the first Four Centuries. 12mo. Cambridge, 1870.
- Introduction to the Study of the Gospels; with Historical and Explanatory Notes. 12mo, pp. 476. Boston.
- Whately, Richard. Difficulties in the Writings of the Apostle Paul and other parts of the New Testament. From the 8th London edition. 12mo, pp. 376. Andover, 1865.
- For Literature of the disputed origin of the Fourth Gospel, see Appendix to Luthardt's work on St. John; and also Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, American edition, sub voce, pp. 1437-1439.

SECTION XIII.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

J. S. Semler, Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Kanon, Halle, 1771-75, 4 vols.; Jod. Herings, Ueber d. rechten Gebrauch u. Mißbrauch d. bibl. Kritik, from the Dutch, by Beckhaus, Offenbach, 1804; F. Hitzig, Begriff der Kritik, am A. T. praktisch erörtert, Heidelberg, 1831; M. Drechsler, Die Unwissenschaftlichkeit im Gebiete d. Kritik, etc., Leipz., 1837; G. A. Hauff, Offenbarungsglaube u. Kritik d. bibl. Geschichtsbücher, am Beispiele d. B. Josua in ihrer nothwendigen Einheit dargehan, Stuttg., 1843; G. L. Hahn, Gegenwärtigen Stand d. N. T. Kritik, Breslau, 1848; Ebrard, in Herzog's Encykl., s. v. Kritik; B. B. Edwards, Certain Erroneous Methods and Principles of Biblical Criticism, Bib. Sacra., vi, p. 185; Kitto's Cyclopedia, vol. 1, p. 487.

Biblical Criticism operates on the historical ground opened to our view by the study of isagogics. Its task is, to determine, on the one hand, the authenticity of the Scriptures as a whole; on the other, the uncorrupted character (integrity) of single passages or the entire text, and also to restore the true reading where it has been lost or crowded out. It conducts its work on scientific principles, and makes use of available historical monuments and of the evidence afforded by internal marks in the writings themselves under examination.

No pious mind need be startled by the phrase "Biblical Criticism,"¹ as though it implied a purpose to criticise and force the text. Of such criticism there has been no lack; but here no criticism of the contents, whether historical or dogmatical, is intended, but simply an examination into the authenticity of the text as it exists, either in its parts or as a whole. At the first glance even such inquiry may seem to conflict with the reverence we owe to the Bible, though this reverence itself, when more correctly understood, invites to conscientious investigation of the Scriptures.² The thought that God has always watched over the Bible, is, in this general form, the presumption of a pious consciousness, which may be

¹ "It is very difficult to conceive of this word (criticism) as denoting a real unity in the technical meaning which has been attached to it." Schleiermacher, Herm. u. Kritik (at the beginning); comp. his Abhandl. üb. Begriff u. Eintheilung der philolog. Kritik in Akadem. Reden u. Abhandlungen (Sämmtl. Werke zur Phil., vol. iii, p. 38); and also Rothe, Zur Dogmatik, p. 310: "There assuredly exists a criticism that springs from the full confidence of faith as well as one that takes its rise in doubt; and the former is inborn with Christian piety, at least with that of the evangelical type. God has not made, and did not intend to make, the task a trifling one for us. He gives nothing whatever to man in its finished state; all his gifts are imparted in such a way as to abundantly tax human energy—this for the reason that we are human. This applies also to the Scriptures; and if we consent to undertake the labor imposed on us by God and subject the Bible to historical criticism, it does not follow that we thereby exalt ourselves above and constrain it, but rather that we are sincerely endeavoring to learn its true meaning."

² Upon this point comp. esp. Hauff, supra, p. 19, sqq.

sustained at the bar of science, and even finds its justification at the hands of science. But to decide beforehand how God should have watched, what things he must have guarded against to prevent the Bible from becoming a book like other books, is an arrogant assumption equal to that of rationalistic criticism in the other direction. It is an historical fact to which we are, in all humility, to assent, that God has chosen to permit the Bible to pass through the same human processes by which other written monuments have been and are being tested. This will be apparent to every person who has looked with an unprejudiced eye into the history and fortunes of the canon.¹

The Bible providentially guarded, yet subject to human vicissitudes.

It is doubtless true that (in recent times, especially) criticism has been often employed for perverse and even frivolous ends,² and rarely has a book been subjected to so much abuse as has the Bible; but it is by no means wise to oppose uncritical to hypercritical arbitrariness. Only a strictly scientific procedure, unbiassed by dogmatic preconceptions of any kind, will meet the demands of the case.³ While it is true Biblical Criticism, though often perverted, still of great value.

¹ Comp. Herder, Briefe, No. 1, "Banish the last remains of the leaven of the opinion that this book is unlike other books in its outward form and matter, so that, for instance, no various readings can occur in it, because it is a Divine book. Various readings do occur (and yet but one can be the correct reading)—this is fact, not opinion. . . . Whether a person who makes a copy of the Bible thereby becomes at once a faultless God? . . . No parchment acquires a firmer nature because it bears the Bible, and no ink becomes thereby indelible." Similarly, Eichhorn, Einl. ins. A. T., p. 57, sq. (2d ed.), "Every person who censures the Biblical scholar, or even sighs with pious anxiety because he examines one book after another of the Old (or New) Testament for this purpose, applying critical exactness and judicial strictness to his work, must either remain unacquainted with antiquity and profane literature, together with the processes employed in that field, or be so extremely weak in mental powers as to fail to see the serious consequences resulting from the neglect of such tests, as well as the invincible host of doubts which can only be driven from their entrenchments by the proposed (i. e., critical) method."

² It must be admitted, however, that complaints upon this point have been exaggerated, as, for instance, by Drechsler, who is governed by the idea that "every assault upon the genuineness of a Scriptural book is at the same time an attack directed against the belief in salvation through Christ."—Page 12, etc.; comp. Hauff, p. 255.

³ "Every person is sufficiently protected against the arbitrary tendencies of his own nature who enters on the investigation animated by a sincere love of truth, and against the arbitrariness of others by the liberty to test assertions and arguments made by them," Hauff, p. 45; "It is the especial task of our age to place this department of theology (criticism) in a new and clearer light, to provide new fundamental conceptions and a new basis for this science, since the old has become decayed and unserviceable," Hahn, p. 7; "I am convinced that in order to renew the Christian faith we need, not less, but more, investigation," Bunsen, Hippolytus, i, 88; "On its bright side, criticism is the self-rejuvenating element of the Church as a whole, the boast of that the authenticity of many a book or single passage has been doubted because it gave discomfort to the critic's subjectivity, it yet appears, from the history of criticism, that genuine critics, while abstaining from all passion, have brought within the range of their researches matters having no immediate connexion with the faith, and have given them the most conscientious consideration, and that upon the whole, and on the large scale, their judgment has been controlled by other than predetermined dogmatical reasons. How can a dogmatical system derive advantage from the fact that the account of the adulterous woman (John viii) is assigned to a different Gospel; that a doxology (Rom. xvi) is assigned to a different place; or even that the genuineness of Second Peter is by some surrendered? Not a single Bible truth is thereby deprived of its support. Criticism has also been frequently denounced as paltry, and that Biblical Criticism is often paltry.

it may doubtless surprise the layman or the beginner that extensive investigation should be made into the transposition of a word, or concerning a particle, which might seem to exert no immediate influence on the meaning. Precisely this devotion to the letter of the Scriptures (which was cultivated "for the glory of Jesus Christ" by the pious Bengel) constitutes, with all its apparent dryness, the finest flower of scientific earnestness and the most effectual restraint upon recklessness, while, on the contrary, uncritical ignorance, which, for instance, would, in order to possess an additional proof-text, retain passages like 1 John v, 7, though known to be not genuine, is rendering but poor service to the interests of piety. The glory of science is this, that it presses onward in the course marked out by an incorruptible love of truth, without yielding to the power of outside influences.

SECTION XIV.

CONDITIONS OF CANONICITY.

The claim of a book to be canonical is only partially established by the acknowledgment of its genuineness; but the canonical character of the Bible certainly depends on the integrity of the separate passages contained in it, and consequently on the purity of the text.

Genuineness of books and passages to be determined by Biblical Criticism. The word spurious (spurius, νόθος) is, in its harshest meaning, applied to works intentionally ascribed to an author with whom they did not originate; and a number of such works was known to the early Church, the evangelical Church and theology; on the darker side, criticism has, by its deformity, filled one of the most pungent pages in the history of the Protestant Church." J. P. Lange, Das Apostol. Zeitalter, i, p. 9; comp. also the Periodisirung der krit. Operationen in der evangel. Kirche, p. 10, by the same author.

bearing the names of Peter, James, Thomas, etc., and seeking to intrude themselves into the canon, from which they were, however, subsequently rejected as apocryphal.¹ In this instance the denial of genuineness² involved the loss of canonicity also. But the question of genuineness may relate to more than the canonicity of a book. The admission that a book possesses the highest title to a place in a collection of sacred and even Divinely-inspired books, does not necessarily preclude inquiry into the propriety with which it is attributed to the author to whom tradition or the inscription (of later date than the work itself) ascribes it. It will hardly do, however, to claim inspiration for a book whose very first sentence is a forgery. If the pastoral epistles, for example, are not Paul's, then some one has palmed off a deception in his name, and they are not deserving of respectful consideration. It will be useless to argue that, though written under false pretences, they may be yet canonical, although this concession has very unwisely been made.

The greatest caution is, therefore, required at this point. The good name of the Bible would be damaged seriously by the assumption of well-meant imitations of apostolical productions; for such an hypothesis throws a very equivocal light upon the question of the integrity of the Biblical writers, and attributes to them arts which can hardly be made to consist with the character of sincere disciples of Christ. Fortunately, the results of the destructive criticism applied to the authorship of New Testament books are not yet so well established as its originators would persuade themselves they are. Criticism finds here a proper field for a frank discussion of the reasons for and against, by which means the questions involved can be brought to a final settlement; but let the thought that it might possibly become necessary even to give up one book or another cause no alarm in advance, as though our salvation

¹ The N. T. Apocrypha has been published by J. A. Schmid, Pseudo-Nov. Test., Helmst., 1809, 4to.; J. A. Fabricius, Cod. Apocryphus N. T., Hamb., 1719, 3 vols.; C. Ch. L. Schmid, Corpus vet. Apocryph. extra Biblia, Hadam., 1806; J. C. Thilo, Cod. Apocryphus N. T., etc., tom. i, Lips., 1832 (incomplete); Tischendorf, Evangelia Apocrypha, Lips., 1853; same, Acta Apostol. Apocrypha, 1851, and Apocalypses Apocryphæ, Lips., 1866; K. W. Borberg, Bibliothek der N. T. Apocryphen, Stuttg., 1840-41, 2 vols. J. F. Kleuker, Die Apocryphen des N. T., Hamb., 1790; Nitzsch, De Apocr. Evv., etc., Viteb., 1804, 4to.; Arens, De Evang. Apocryph., etc., Gott., 1836, 4to.; Tischendorf, De Evang. Apocryph., origine et usu, Hague, 1851, (prize essay). See also Hone's Apocryphal N. T., Lond., 1820, and N. Y., 1849, 8vo., and Abp. Wake's Apost. Fathers, Lond., 1830, and Hartford, 1834, 8vo.).

² The word has reference solely to the authorship of a book, and not to its fitness to rank as canonical.

depended on such a contingency; unlikely as that contingency may be.¹

The principle applies to the Old Testament as well. Let it be proven that certain Psalms were not composed by the royal singer himself, but merely ad modum Davidis—would this destroy their religious worth? We should no more exclude them from the canon, than we would exclude from the hymn book a beautiful poem by an unknown author of the seventeenth century, concerning which we learn that it has been erroneously attributed to Paul Gerhard. Is the description of God's servant in Isa. liii less applicable to Christ on the supposition that Isa. xl-lx was written by another (later) than Isaiah, a deutero-Isaiah?² Who, moreover, would find the book of Job to be less impressive because its author is unknown? Even Pope Gregory I. was able to form a more independent judgment upon this question than many Protestants living ten centuries later. It follows that the canonicity of a book may be maintained, even when its authorship is left in doubt, provided the book itself contains nothing that conflicts with the normal character of the theocracy in the Old, or of the Gospel in the New, Testament. But should criticism extend its investigations to the question of canonicity also? If so, to what extent? That it did so in the ancient Church is a matter of fact, and it is to the exercise of such criticism that we owe the rejection of apocryphal writings. Whether the exclusion of such writings was absolute, or whether the boundary line between canonical and apocryphal is still in dispute, is a different question. The recognition of a distinct class of ἀντιλεγόμενα, and the distinction between proto- and deutero-canonical writings are of themselves evidence that such criticism was exercised. The Reformation asserted in its own behalf this right of the ancient Church,¹ and more recent times have likewise recognized it as a right and so employed it. We readily admit that the common feeling of the Church is not likely to consent that the slightest alteration in the canon be attempted, and cannot even desire it for ourselves;² but the right of judgment must be conceded and science must steadily respect it. However unlikely it may now be that at this late day books will be excluded from the canon by general consent, it is yet more unlikely that the canon will receive any addition or be enriched by the ^{Changes in the} incorporation with it of such writings as were formerly not known ^{canon unlikely.} at all or were misunderstood.³

¹ A very correct and much more intelligent view than that entertained by many pious people of to-day was advanced by Richard Baxter (died 1691) in his work De casibus conscientiarum, T. iii, p. 174: "Non est ad salutem necessarium, ut quis credat singulos libros aut versus Scripturæ esse canonicos aut scriptos per spiritum Dei. Si liber aliquis periret aut in dubium vocaretur, v. g. epistola Judæ, non inde sequeretur, una cum ipso omnem veram fidem spemque salutis perituram." Comp. also Episcopii Institut. iv, 1. "It must become evident at some time," says J. L. Rückert, Theologie, i, Leips., 1851, Pref., p. 4, "that all the results of criticism may be acknowledged, and a thoroughly independent mode of thinking may be followed, without destruction to the Christian character. It must become evident that Christian faith and volition do not depend upon our judgment respecting this or that particular book." Even Kahnis (Dogmat.), occupying the strict confessional ground of Lutheranism, has asserted his right to an independent position with regard to the canon; comp. his Zeugnias v. d. Grundwahrheiten d. Protestantismus gegen Dr. Hengstenberg, Leips., 1862.

² Umbreit (Prakt. Comm. zum Jesaja, p. 308) beautifully observes, "The auroral light of grace and salvation breaks forth from the joyously animated discourses which are appended to the book of Isaiah in a well-ordered succession. We hear the voice of one of the greatest prophets at the close of the Babylonish exile. Even though his name is not Isaiah, his high importance is apparent from every word proclaimed by him. . . . Well may we term him (this anonymous) the evangelist of the old covenant, for no one of the prophets has declared like him the glad tidings of the day-star from on high." The thorough discussions in relation to Daniel, which Bunsen places in the mouth of his Hippolytus, ii, p. 296, sqq., are very similar.

It is not the genuineness of the sacred writings alone, however, that engages attention, but their integrity as well; and the latter is even more directly necessary to the canonical reception of a book than the former. Whole books or extended paragraphs, as well as particular expressions, or even single adjectives, particles, etc., may have slipped into a completed work or have been attached to a revered name, whether by a designed insertion (interpolation) or through mistake, by which, e. g., a marginal note (gloss) written by a later hand was transferred to the text. The text may, moreover, have become corrupt in places or be defective by reason of the carelessness or inexperience of copyists, or for other reasons to be discussed in connexion with introduction itself (faded characters, abbreviations, absence of divisions between words, etc.). That such things have occurred is, as Herder observes, not supposition, but fact.¹ Who can even assure us that, despite the great number of MSS. of the Scriptures, none of which reach back to the time of the original founding, the original form of expression was not lost here and there, and that this could not have been the case at a very early period, perhaps at the time when the first copy was made from the autograph?

¹ Comp. Luther's criticisms of the Epistle of St. James and of the Apocalypse. With this comp. the opinion of L. Osiander (1614): In eo autem erratum est, quod epistolam Jacobi et Judae et posteriores duas Joannis inter canonica scripta numerant, quae scripta non longe post apostolorum tempora non pro scriptis canonicis habita sunt. . . . Recte autem omissa Apocalypsis; ea enim non est Joannis Apostoli, sed cujusdam Joannis Theologi, et multa habet adeo obscura et perplexa, ut non multi dextre in ejus lectione versari queant—in Spittler, Ueber d. 60 Laod. Kanon, p. 16. This citation is not designed as an approval of such opinions in themselves, but simply as a proof that independent views respecting the elements of the canon may consist with a decided faith in the Divine nature of Christianity.

² Comp. Schleiermacher, § 114, sq.

³ Discoveries made up to the present time (e. g., of a lost letter by Paul to the Corinthians) have not, however, been sufficiently attested. But comp. Schleiermacher, § 111.

Upon the purity of the text depends the internal value and character of our Biblical canon. It may be said that as a book may be canonical, though found to emanate from another than the reputed author, even so a single passage, e. g., 1 John v, 7, may be allowed to stand in the Bible if it does not contradict the A pure text indispensable. analogia fidei. Reverence for the Bible, however, requires that every thing within our power be done to secure it in a form of the highest attainable purity, though the nature of the case is such as to prevent more than an approximate accomplishment of the task.

SECTION XV.

CRITICAL METHODS.

Criticism is, according to its objects, divided into external and internal, and, according to its results, into negative and positive. A further distinction is sometimes made between the criticism of books and that of words or texts;² but the two cannot easily be kept apart, though they are employed on different objects—the former being more concerned with the authenticity of entire books or separate paragraphs, the latter with the genuineness and purity of the text (comp. the preceding §). It is usual, though inappropriate, to designate the criticism of sections and books the higher, and that of words and separate passages the lower criticism.³ Not less misleading is the usage of others, who endeavor to include in the higher criticism what we would, more appropriately, term the internal, and in the lower criticism what we characterize as the external.⁴ The truth is that the business of the critic deals with ¹ "The evidence which lies on the surface long ago destroyed all the prejudices which formerly prevailed on this subject."—Schleiermacher, § 116. To this we add, "Ought, at least, to have destroyed them." Wetstein, Proleg., p. 4, adduces a noteworthy example from the Aldine ed. of the LXX, in Gen. xiv, which reads οι άνθρωποι αυτων, instead of οι υιοι αυτων (אֲנָשֵׁי). The MS. had υιοι instead of δνοι, which was taken for an abbreviation of ανθρωποι, and in this way asses were transformed into men!

² Danz, p. 210.

³ Schleiermacher, § 118. Note.

⁴ Some writers apply the phrase, "the lower criticism," to the genuineness, etc., of single letters and words, and that of "the higher criticism" to entire books and sections. Schleiermacher has, however, forcibly demonstrated the mechanical and untenable character of this distinction. Comp. Herm. u. Krit., p. 267; comp. 277.

various combinations which are all equally important, but which are sometimes directed toward the external, historical, empirical, and sometimes toward the internal and psychological side. We accordingly give the name of external criticism to that which seeks to demonstrate the authenticity and genuineness of a book, and also to discover the true readings from existing facts, viz.: from existing testimonies taken from Christian antiquity, from MSS. versions, etc. This is by no means to be denominated a lower criticism, as if it were contrasted with another kind, which might proudly claim a higher place, or even disregard its existence, but rather constitutes the necessary basis of all critical procedure, unless we intend to build on air. But this external application of the so-called critical apparatus is not alone sufficient; for on the one hand that apparatus is itself subject to higher critical conditions, since the age and the importance of MSS. versions, etc., must first be ascertained,¹ and on the other hand the most perfectly constructed critical apparatus cannot accomplish everything. It is necessary that internal criticism be brought in to complement the other. In this way conclusions may be arrived at respecting the authenticity of a written work, even though the testimony from external sources be indefinite or conflicting, or though no such testimony exist—the means employed being comparison with other works by the same author (e. g., the Ep. to the Hebrews compared with the acknowledged writings of St. Paul, the Apocalypse with the gospel and the epistles by St. John, 2d with 1st Peter and with discourses in the Acts by the same apostle), the collocation and estimating of historical conditions (e. g., in connexion with disputed predictions in the prophets), and finally the careful observation and comparison of the language in any particular period, its grammatical forms, figures of speech, etc. Upon the question of integrity the disturbance of the natural connexion caused by an interpolated passage (1 John v, 7–8) may be sufficient to arouse the suspicion of spuriousness, even before the authority of MSS. is appealed to; or with regard to the choice between different existent readings an important influence may be exerted, in addition to that exercised by the external superiority of some particular MS., by the internal relation of the passage to the whole connexion. It also becomes possible occasionally to show by internal criticism how a false reading could have originated, and not rarely is it compelled to decide whether the preference is to be given to an easy or a more difficult reading; for while it is certain that words have been changed because they were not understood in such a sense or such a connexion, it is equally certain that many a difficult reading was introduced into the text by ill-timed polishing or thoughtless want of care on the part of copyists.

External criticism defined.

The office of internal criticism.

¹ In this regard compare the different critical systems by Bentley, Mill, Bengel, Wetstein, Griesbach, Hug, Matthaei, Scholz, Lachmann, Tischendorf. At this point criticism and introductory science interpenetrate each other. See Schleiermacher, § 120; de Wette, Einl., § 37, sqq.

To discover the proper bounds to be observed between external and internal criticism in their application, is conceded Carefully fixed limits to be set to internal criticism. to be difficult. Great care is certainly required in connexion with the latter, and much mischief has already been caused by its use; but we cannot on that account give an unqualified assent to the idea that the critic's work should be of a purely mechanical nature, and that the authority of MSS. should alone be allowed to decide.¹ Harmonious activity of the intellectual powers, the combination of external with internal circumstances, comprehension and judgment, doctrina and ingenium, must go hand in hand in this pursuit. Who will deny that even the earliest and best codices were exposed to accidents, the very thing which the keen scent of criticism, certainly a natural endowment which is to be ennobled by learning, is to discover when possible? Above all arbitrariness and accident, however, stands science, combined with liberty and a higher necessity.

SECTION XVI.

POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE CRITICISM.

The negative criticism endeavours simply to ascertain and cast out Negative and positive criticism; functions of each. what is spurious as a whole or in part; while the positive criticism seeks, with reference to authenticity, to discover the real authors of anonymous and pseudonymous works, and with reference to integrity to restore the text to its original condition. The former, when sufficient external evidence is wanting, is done by hypothesis, the latter by conjecture.

It is generally more easy to determine with certainty that a work was not written by the author to whom tradition has attributed it, than to discover who the real author was; and it is likewise more easy to arrive at the conclusion that a passage has been corrupted or mutilated than at a definite result in settling the true reading. Positive criticism receives occasional aid from external helps, however, even though they be not wholly adequate. Thus, e. g., the testimony of Tertullian (De pudic. c. 20) led many to adopt the theory that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by Barnabas. Sometimes, however, hypothesis puts forth claims, based solely upon possibilities, as in the case of Eichhorn's assumption of a primitive Gospel, and in many other instances of recent times. The claim of hypothesis upon our approval is even less authoritative in the latter class of cases (i. e., of appeal to bare possibilities) than in the former, and many writers have accordingly forsaken the way of hypothesis, as being entirely too uncertain, and have ceased altogether from making use of the so-called positive criticism; bolder inquirers, however, still continue to employ it.¹ Similar considerations apply to conjectures relating to the readings. A former age was entirely too prone to apply conjecture, at first in the department of profane, and subsequently also in that of sacred, literature; but they are likewise wrong who unconditionally reject conjecture, for it is known that conjectures have occasionally been confirmed by readings that were afterward discovered. While therefore it may be advisable in general to insist upon the rule that "whatever of correct results may be obtained in the way of conjecture must be supported by facts connected with the history of the text," the rule must yet be so modified as not to forbid conjectural attempts in needful cases.²

¹ Comp., e. g., Rettig's notice of Lachmann's N. T. in Studd. u. Krit., 1832, No. 4. Baur (contra Thiersch et al.) has said much that is worthy of note, in opposition to pure mechanism in critical processes.

Frequent fallacies of critical hypotheses.

¹ Comp. Hitzig, supra. The positive criticism is especially recommended by Hahn; understanding thereby not a criticism which so dreads negation as to cling with firmer grasp to the traditional, but that which conquers the negative, and which by concentrating its attention upon its object—the several books of the Bible and the circumstances of history—assigns to such books their definite and assured historical place.

² Schleiermacher, §§ 119 and 121, and Kritik, p. 291: "The canon that the divinational process (conjecture) is to be allowed only where documentary aids are wanting, or even that when the latter are not wanting, the right to employ conjectural processes does not exist, the best that manuscripts afford being all that we are authorized to ask—this canon does not apply absolutely, and may not even be assumed, because the interests of hermeneutics would suffer loss thereby." But see p. 312, and comp. Herder. "Conjecture, in the critical sense, resembles the scalpel of the surgeon. It may unfortunately become necessary and beneficial, but only terribly necessary, terribly advantageous; and the wretch who plays and whittles with it, cutting away at pleasure, now an ear, now an eye, now a nose, that does not suit his fancy—but mutilates himself." Specimens of vain conjecture are given by Herder in the Appendix to the Briefe zweener Brüder Jesu (Werke z. Rel. u. Theol., viii, p. 291). Similarly, Lücke, "Divinational criticism involves a dangerous element, and is least of all the concern of everybody; but it is needed for complementing the theological sciences of the canon." (Stud. u. Krit., 1834, No. 4, p. 267). Comp. Rosenkranz, Encykl., p. 121, sqq.; de Wette, Einl., § 59.

SECTION XVII.

THE RELATION OF CRITICISM TO EXEGESIS.

Although criticism is, in its idea, distinguished from exegesis, assuming the relation of an auxiliary to the latter, it can yet be conceived of in reality only in connexion with the functions of interpretation ; for an interest in criticism must be aroused, and a sense for it be quickened, by exegesis. The two sciences must accordingly be conceived of as continually acting upon each other, and therefore as conditioning and aiding each other.

Nothing is more hurtful, and nothing has done more to damage criticism in the estimation of pious people, than the ill-timed and superficial dabbling with it of persons who, before having properly read a single book in the Bible, or having been tested in the work of exposition, undertake to deal exclusively with the surface results of criticism, and swear by them as though they were established facts—who pronounce their dictum about the Bible without being well read in the Bible, or having learned anything of value from it. How frequently has a taste for the Bible been destroyed at the outset by forcing upon the notice of young men such oracular decisions of criticism, before they had become well acquainted with the sacred text ! If it is highly unpedagogical to trouble pupils who have not thoroughly read an ode of Horace or an oration by Cicero, with criticism in connexion with the explanation of the classics, it is nothing less than sin to disgust young theologians with the study of the Bible from the beginning, or, what is worse, to lead them to cultivate a foolish self-conceit, by means of depreciatory criticisms. It might therefore be sufficient for the beginner at first if he were to make himself acquainted with the tasks which criticism is to perform, leaving the practical employment of its operations for a later time, when he shall have become familiarly acquainted with his Bible, and shall have tasted somewhat of its positive contents, even having refreshed and nourished his soul thereby. This is possible, however, only in the rugged way of a thorough exegesis. Critical virtuosity, as

Relation of criticism to exegesis.
Mischief done by dabblers in criticism.
Critical and exegetical skill the result of practice.

Schleiermacher terms it, is to be attained only as the result of practice ; and exegetical virtuosity is its necessary prerequisite, although neither of them can attain to its completion without the aid of the other. Such reciprocal action between exegesis and criticism is self-evident, however. If the choice of a reading affects the interpretation, or, rather, if it pro vides the matter for interpretation, it is conversely true that the correct explanation of a passage throws needed light upon the various readings which exist, so that, not unfrequently, a more accurate comprehension of the connexion inclines us to readopt a reading which we had rejected, or to reject one which we believed ourselves obliged to hold, before the passage itself was understood. The authenticity of a book and the acknowledgment of its author may likewise be affected, and suspicion against the book itself be excited, by the misunderstanding of a passage, while a profounder apprehension of the writer's spirit and of the situation may restore its genuineness. Conversely, a superficial knowledge respecting the authenticity of a book may allay all questionings, while a thorough examination of the matter may excite doubts warranted by the facts, and call for a more exhaustive discussion of the points in doubt. It will thus be seen how necessary it is, first, in every case, and before the judgment has been formed, to have regard to the results obtained by others, and in this way to employ in reading the Bible a text as critically correct as may be possible; but, second, while making use of the best critical aids at command, to preserve unbiassed the keenness of our own mental vision in the work of interpretation.

¹ Schleiermacher, § 122, sq.

Criticism and exegesis act on each other.

HISTORY OF CRITICISM.

To provide the history of criticism fully is the task of Introduction. The text of the Old Testament, upon which the copyists expended conscientious care (the synagogues-rolls), engaged the attention first of all of the Masorites, Jewish scholars, whose principal school flourished at Tiberias in the beginning of the sixth century. They compared the codices, noted the various readings, (Keri and Chetib,) and even anxiously numbered the words and syllables. To them we likewise owe the vowel-signs, pointings, etc. Among Christians, meritorious services were rendered by Origen († 254), who compared the Greek versions of the LXX, of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus with the Hebrew original (Hexapla); and by Jerome, who improved the existing Latin version (Itala) and published a version of his own (Vulgata), which soon came into general use and acquired ecclesiastical authority in the Western Church. The prejudices which this man, usually so anxiously cautious, was compelled to encounter in connexion with this work, are well known. The "two-legged asses," as he terms his opponents, even went to the length of calling him falsarius, sacrilegus, corruptor sanctarum Scripturarum! The New Testament was gradually collected. The originals are no longer extant. The most ancient MSS. do not reach back further than the fourth century. An inclination to adulterate the text was apparent at an early day, against which the Church was obliged to guard. Copies were made, in the first instance, for the use of Churches, and "without any philological supervision." It was reserved for science in later ages to divide the different codices, according to their age (Uncials and Cursives), or according to the countries in which they originated (Oriental and Occidental), into families and recensions. The most important MSS. of the New Testament are, The Cod. Alexandrinus (A) in the British Museum at London; the Vaticanus (B) at Rome; the Codex Regius (Parisiensis); also the Cod. Ephraem Syr. (a palimpsest) at Paris (C); and the Codex Cantabrigiensis (D). To these must be added, as of highest importance, the Codex Sinaiticus (Ⲙ), discovered by Tischendorf in 1859 and published in 1862; comp. Stud. u. Krit., 1860, 4; 1862, 1, 4; 1864, 3 (by Wieseler); Gött. Gelehrt. Anzeigen, 1860, No. 177; Prot. Kirchenzeitung, 1862, No. 50; Zarncke's Centralbl., 1860; Literaturbl., 1863, No. 69; Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr., 1864, 1, and *Volbeding: Constantin Tischendorf, 1862; Tischendorf, Die Sinaibibel, etc., 1871. See also article on Sinaitic Manuscript in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia, and Harman's Introduction, Appendix. This Codex is distinguished not only by its age (Tischendorf assigns it to the former half of the fourth century, which is, however, already denied by others) but also by its completeness, even the Epistle of Barnabas, in the Greek text, and the Shepherd of Hermas being included in it.

Historical sketch of Biblical Criticism.
The Masorites.

But little was done for criticism during the Middle Ages. Alcuin, about A. D. 802, improved the Vulgata based on the translation of Jerome, by the command of Charlemagne. New revisions were undertaken by Lanfranc in the eleventh century and Cardinal Nicholas in the twelfth. At about this time the Correctoria biblica appeared (concerning which see De Wette, Einleitung, p. 108, sq.). The work of Cardinal Hugo de St. Caro in the thirteenth century, who divided the Bible into chapters, was rather mechanical than critical. The division of the New Testament into verses was not performed until the sixteenth century, when Robert Stephens devised the present arrangement. The undertaking of the Cardinal Ximenes, shortly before the Reformation, was, on the other hand, a magnificent conception, to which we owe the so-called Complutensian Polyglot, which was followed by those of Antwerp, Paris, and London, being critical collocations of the text and versions after the manner of Origen. A rich bibical apparatus was given in the prolegomena to the London Polyglot (also published separately) of Brian Walton († 1661). The first critical edition of the New Testament was issued by Erasmus (Basle, 1516) at nearly the time when the Complutensian Polyglot was completed.

Biblical Criticism in the Middle Ages.

First critical edition of the New Testament.

All this work was text criticism; but the Reformation called into life a universal spirit of inquiry. Luther permitted himself to form independent opinions respecting various parts of the Scriptures, though he was rather influenced by subjective feeling than by scientific considerations. The progress of an unbiassed criticism was long hindered afterward by the strictness with which the Protestant Church clung to the principle of adherence to the letter of Scripture, and to the idea of inspiration connected with that principle. The Reformed Formula Consensus raised even the inspiration of the vowel-points into a dogma! A new critical impulse was given, on the other hand, to the Roman Catholic Church in the seventeenth century by Richard Simon, who expressed independent views, among other things, with regard to the composition of the Pentateuch, etc. (In relation to him see Bernus, Richard Simon et son histoire critique du vieux Test., Lausanne, 1869.) The dogmatists of both Churches were, however, unceasing in their efforts to fill up the way which he had opened, to use Lessing's expression, "with floods of rubbish constantly renewed." The criticism of the text likewise came to an end, after the age had become accustomed to regard the textus receptus of the sixteenth century as an authority. A new interest in it was excited by the English scholars Fell, Mill, Bentley, and Kennicott (the latter in Old Testament criticism). When Wetstein, having been encouraged by Bentley, was preparing his critical edition of the New Testament, about the middle of the eighteenth century, he was exposed to severe attacks of opposition (comp. Hagenbach in Illgen's Zeitschr. f. hist. Theologie, 1839, 1); but Bengel nevertheless undertook to perform in behalf of orthodox theology what Wetstein had begun in sympathy with a more sceptical habit of thought. While these scholars confined their efforts more particularly to the department of text-criticism, Semler, on the other hand, after the middle of the eighteenth century, excited numerous doubts with regard to the genuineness of entire books in the Bible by his Free Examination of the Canon.

Revival of Biblical Criticism in the 18th century.

Beginning with Semler of the Rationalistic Criticism.

With Semler begins the period of independent research in this field, but also of abuse and subjective arbitrariness. Sober science, however, continued to pursue its assured course in the midst of such fluctuations. On the one hand, diplomatic text-criticism continued to gain in settled principles and in historic ground through paleographic researches which were steadily prosecuted, through the comparison of MSS., etc., and various systems were developed in this direction, upon which the processes of criticism rest. (The labours of Hug, Griesbach, Schulz, Scholz, Lachmann, Tischendorf.) On the other hand, inquiry was more intelligently directed toward the several parts of the Old and the New Testament canon. Single books in either Testament were at first attacked, without the recognition of any definite principle, but rather under the influence of the personal impressions of critics; but the investigation gradually secured firmer points of connexion with historical facts. The inquiry has been chiefly directed upon the Pentateuch, the Books of Chronicles, the Prophets, (the second part of Isaiah, Daniel,) the Psalms, and the writings of Solomon in the Old Testament, and the Gospels, (their origin and relation to each other,) the Pastoral epistles and the second epistle to the Thessalonians, the epistle to the Hebrews, Second Peter, and the Apocalypse in the New. Such fragmentary operations do not cover the whole ground that has been gone over, however; but after the latest speculative (Tübingen) school, Baur, Zeller, Schwegler, & tendency critics. al., had attempted an historical construction of Christianity from its principles, it involved the entire canon of the New Testament books in the critical process of disintegration connected with that attempt, assigning most of them to a later date, and, at the same time, charging them with subserving tendencies which are not always reconcilable with the purity of purpose belonging to an apostle. It can be confidently affirmed that despite the bold, though often widely divergent, conclusions of the more recent critics, (Hilgenfeld, Volckmar, Holsten, Overbeck,) genuine science can still hold an assured footing for a further advance in the service of truth.

The leadership in biblical criticism was successfully maintained by English scholars in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries for eighty years (1657-1737). The fifth volume of Brian Walton's London Polyglot contained the text of the New Testament in six languages, with a large collection of various readings. He did not, however, undertake to form a revised text. Bishop Fell (1625-1686) added much to this stock of critical material, and was besides the friend and patron of Dr. John Mill (1645-1707.) Thirty laborious years were spent by Mill on his Greek Testament. He recollated all the codices used by Walton for the London Polyglot, and accumulated a mass of readings from many sources, which he exhibits in his prolegomena. "Of the criticism of the New Testament in the hands of Dr. John Mill," says Scrivener, "it may be said that he found the edifice of wood and left it marble." Richard Bentley (1662-1742) projected a revision of the text of the New Testament, which he never completed. We can readily conjecture what his extraordinary critical sagacity would have accomplished in this field. From the time of Bentley little was done by English scholars in New Testament criticism for more than a hundred years. Samuel Prideaux Tregelles issued from 1857 to 1872 his Greek Testament from the most ancient MSS. and from ancient versions. Tregelles bases his text on a small number of manuscripts. Frederick Henry Scrivener has contributed a valuable Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament (Cambridge, 1861, 1874). Messrs. Westcott and Hort have, since the appearance of the revised English Testament, published a text which has been long in preparation, and also a companion volume containing an appendix and introduction to their work. Although the revisers of the English Testament have not attempted "to construct a continuous and complete Greek text," the text adopted by them has been published by their secretary, E. Palmer. (Oxford, 1881.)

1. *Critically revised portable editions of the Old Testament of recent date.*¹

- * Biblia hebraica manualia ad praestt. edit. edita a Joh. Simonis. Halle, 1752, 1767, 1822, 1828. Various books of this edition (Genesis, Psalms, Isaiah, etc.) have also been separately published.
- * Biblia hebraica digressit et graviore lect. variet. adj. J. Jahn. Vien., 1806. 4 voll. Ed. 4., 1839.
- Biblia hebr. ad Eb. v. d. Hooght ed. nov., recogn. et emend. a Judah d'Allemand.* Lond., 1825.
- * Biblia hebraica ad optim. edit. fidem summa diligentia ac studio recensa. Basileae, 1837. (Largely after van der Hooght.)

¹ With regard to the history of the text and other critical apparatus for the Old Test. comp. Franke, p. 96, sqq.; Rosenmüller's Handbuch, and the Introductions to the Old Test. (de Wette's, §. 76, sqq.); Strack, Prolegomena critica in Vetus Test. Hebr., quibus agitur, I. de codicibus et deperditis et adhuc exstantibus, II. de textu biblicorum hebr. qualis talmudistarum temporibus fuerit. Lips., 1873. Ancient versions: a) Greek (the Alexandrian of the so-called seventy translators, and those by Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, etc.); b) Oriental (the Syriac [Peshito], Ethiopic [ed. by Dillmann], Egyptian, Arabian, Armenian, Georgian); c) Latin (ante-Hieronymian [Itala], Vulgate); d) Slavic; e) Chaldaee Paraphrases; comp. de Wette, §. 89, sqq. Concerning the Hexapla of Origen comp. ibid., §. 45, sqq.: F. O. Tischendorf, Anecdota sacra et profana ex oriente et occidente allata sive notitia codicum graecorum, arabicorum, syriacorum, etc., cum excerptis multis maximam partem graecis et 35 scripturarum antiquissimarum exemplis. Lips., 1861, 4.

Older, and usually large, editions of the Old Testament: (de Wette, §. 95. Rosenmüller, I, 189 ff. Benj. Kennicott, dissertationes super ratione textus hebr. V. T. in libris editis. Latine vertit et auxit W. Abr. Teller. Lips., 1757-65. 2 voll.): von Soncino (1488-94), in der complutens. Polyglotte (1514-17), Bomberg I. (1518-21), Bomberg II. (1526), S. Münster (Froben, 1536), R. Stephan I. (1539-43), R. Stephan II. (1544-46), Plantinus (1566-71-84), E. Hutter (1587), J. Buxtorf (1611-18, 1619, etc.), J. Athias (1661), Jablonsky (1699, Handausg.), van der Hooght (1705. Lond., 1822, Handausg.), Optiz (1709), Michaelis (1730, Handausg.), Houbigant (1753), Kennicott (1776, 80), Reineccius (1735, Handausg.), Döderlein u. Meisner (1793).

- תורה נביאים וכתובים. Biblia hebr. sec. edit. Athiae, J. Leusdeni, Jo. Simonis, impr. Eberh. van der Hooght rec. A. Hahn. Ed. ster. Lips., 1831-39.
- Biblia hebr. ad optimas editiones, imprimis Eb. van der Hooght ex rec. A. Hahnii impressa (cur. K. W. Landschreiber; praef. est E. F. K. Rosenmüller). Ed. stereot. Lips., 1834-38. 12.
- תורה נביאים וכתובים. Biblia hebr. ad optimas edit. expressa. Curavit et indices nec non clavem masoreticam add. C. G. Giul. Theile. Ed. stereot. Lips., 1849. (Genesis, Psalms, Job, Isaiah, etc., also published separately.) New ed. 1859.
- Testament utrumq. edd. Theile et Tischendorf (V. T. hebr.; N. T. gr.) Lips., 1850. 2d ed., 1862.
- ספר הקודש. Vien., 1852.
- * Polyglottenbibel, Zum prakt. Handgebrauch. Prepared by Dr. Rud. Stier and Dr. K. G. W. Theile. A. u. N. T. Bielef., 1846-55. 5 vols. 3d ed. of the O. T. and 4th ed. of the N. T., 1868-64. (Embraces the Original, the LXX, the Vulgate, Luther's translation, and the most important various readings of ancient and modern versions.)

Separate portions of the Old Testament,

- Pentateuchus in usum scholarum academicarum ex editione utriusque testamenti Tauchnitziana separatim edendum curavit C. G. G. Theile. Lips., 1861. Ed. ster.
- Liber Geneseos sine punctis exscriptus curaverunt F. Muehlau et Aem. Kautzsch. Lips., 1868.
- Liber Genesis. Textum Masorethicum accuratissime expressit, e fontibus Masorae varie illustravit, notis criticis confirmavit S. Baer. Praefatus est Fr. Delitzsch. Lips., 1869.
- Jesajae, Liber. ספר ישעיהו. Textum Masorethicum accuratissime expressit, e fontibus Masorae varie illustravit, notis criticis confirmavit S. Baer. Praefatus est Fr. Delitzsch. Lips., 1872.
- Liber Psalmorum hebraicus. Textum Masorethicum accuratius quam adhuc factum est expressit, brevem de accentibus metricis institutionem praemisit, notas criticas adjecit S. Baer. Praefatus est Fr. Delitzsch. Lips., 1861.

a) Large Editions of the Septuagint:

- V. T. ex versione LXX interpr. — post Grabe et Lee ed. J. J. Breitinger. Turic., 1730-32. 4 voll. 4.
- V. T. graecum, cum. var. lectt. edd. R. Holmes et Parsons. Ox., 1798-1827. 5 voll. f.

b) Manual Editions:

- V. T. Graec. ex versione LXX una cum libris apocr. ed. Ch. Rheineccius. Lips., 1730-57.
- V. T. gr. juxta LXX interpr. cur. L. v. Ess. Lips., 1824. Ed. nova, 1855.
- V. T. gr. juxta LXX interpr. ed. J. N. Jager. Par., 1834.
- V. T. gr. juxta LXX int. Textum Vatic. emendatus ed., argumenta et locos N. T. parall. notavit, lect. var. subj., comment. isag. praetexuit C. Tischendorf. Lips., 1850. 2 voll. Ed. 4. 1869. Ed. 5. 1875.
- For the history of this version: Aristae historia LXXII interpr.; gr. et lat. Oxon., 1692. (New ed. in Merx' Archiv I, 3. 1868.) Comp. the works of Hody, van Dale, Ussher, Voss, u. A. Comp. Winer, Handb. d. theol. Lit. P. 49.
- L. T. Muecke, de origine vers. LXX interpr. Zulich., 1789.
- Thiersch, de Pentateuchi versione Alexandrina. Erl., 1841.

Editions of the Vulgate:

- Biblia S. vulg. edit. ad conc. Trid. praescriptum emend. et a Sixto V. recogn. Rom., 1590. fol.
- Biblia S. vulg. ed. Sixti V. jussu rec. et ausp. Clementis VIII. ed. Rom., 1593-4.
- Portable editions by L. van Ess (Tüb., 1822-24. 3 Bde.), J. H. Kistemaker (Münst., 1823-46), B. Galura (Innsbr., 1834-35. 3 Bde. 4.), B. Loch (Regensb., 1849. 2. Aufl., ebend., 1867 ff.), J. F. v. Allioli (Landsh., 1853), Fleck (Neues Test. Lpz., 1840).
- Important for critical purposes: Codex Amiatinus. N. T. latine interprete Hieronymo, ex celeberrimo cod. Amiatino omnium et antiquissimo et praestantissimo nunc primum ed. Const. Tischendorf. Lips., 1850-54. Codex Fuldensis. Novum Testamentum latine interprete Hieronymo ex manuscripto Victoris Capuani edidit. prolegomenis introduxit, commentariis adornavit Ernest. Ranke. Marb., 1868.
- The Gothic version by Ulfilas, with parallel Greek and Latin versions, by H. Massmann. Stuttg., 1855.

2. Editions of the New Testament.¹

- Novum Testamentum graece, recogn. atque insign. lectt. varietat. et argument. notat. subjunxit G. Chr. Knapp. Halle, 1797, 1813, 1822, 1830. Ed. 5. 1840.
- * N. T. graece. E rec. Griesb. nova vers. lat. illustr., indice brevi praecip. lectt. et interprett. diversitatis indice instr., auct. H. A. Schott. Lips., 1806, 1811, 1825. Ed. 4. 1839.
- N. T. graece. Ad fidem optimor. librr. rec. J. A. H. Tittmann. Ed. ster. Lips., 1820. 28. Ed. nov. cur. A. Hahn, 1840; 1861.
- N. T. textum gr. Griesb. et Knappii denuo recognovit, delectu variet. lectt. testim. confirm., adnott. tum criticis tum exegeticis, indicibus, etc., instruxit J. S. Vater. Halle, 1824.
- N. T. graece. Ex rec. C. Lachmanni. Ed. ster. Berol., 1831.
- N. T. graece nova versione lat. donatum ed. F. A. Naebe. Lips., 1831.
- N. T. graece et latine. Ex rec. Knappiana adjectis variis Griesb. et Lachm. lectionibus ed. A. Goeschen. Lips., 1832.
- N. T. ad optt. librr. fidem rec. A. Jaumann. Mün., 1832.
- N. T. graece, ex recogn. Knappii emendatus ed., C. G. Guil. Theile. Ed. ster. Lips., 1841. Ed. 7., 1858. Ed. 8. 1865. Ed. 11. 1875. Also in Greek and Latin (Vulg.) 1854, and Greek and German, 1852, by the same publishers.
- N. T. gr. et lat. (Vulg.) ed. F. X. Reithmayr. Mün., 1847.
- * N. T. graece. Textum ad fidem antiquorum testium recensuit, brevem apparatus criticum una cum var. lectt. Elzeviriorum, Knappii, Scholzii, Lachmanni subjunxit C. Tischendorf. Lips., 1841, 1848, 1849. 7th ed., 1859. 8th ed., 1869-72.
- Editio stereotypa. Lips., 1850. Ed. nova, 1873. (A good manual edition.)
- N. T. gr. Par., 1842. 12; gr. et lat., ed. Jager et Tischendorf. Par., 1842.
- Ἡ καὶ διαθήκη. N. T. graece, recens. inque usum academicum omni modo instruxit C. Tischendorf. Lips., 1855, 1861. 16. Edit. 5., ibid., 1867. Ed. 9. 1876.
- H. A. W. Meyer, das N. T. griechisch, nach den besten Hilfsmitteln kritisch revidirt, mit einer deutschen Uebersetzung (see Commentaries).

¹ For the history of the N. T. text comp. de Wette, II, §. 37, sqq.; with regard to versions, see §. 10, sqq. Polyglotts: a) the Complutensian (1514-17); b) Antwerp (1569-72); c) Paris (1645); d) London (by Walton, 1657). Comp. Franke, p. 139, sqq. With regard to the different classes of editions (1. such as exactly reproduce the text of a given MS.; 2. such as are based upon several MSS. and other helps; and 3. such as merely reproduce earlier editions with unimportant changes); and also, with reference to the so-called Textus Receptus (vulgaris) of the Elsevir edition, comp. Danz, §. 19, and the works there mentioned, Franke, p. 161, sqq.

- N. T. græce ad fidem potissimum cod. Vat. rec., Phil. Buttmann. Lips., 1856, 1862. Edit. 3., ibid. (without date).
- Testamentum novum triglottum, græce, latine, germanice . . . ed. Tischendorf. Lips., 1854. 4. Edit. 2., 1865.
- N. T. tetraglottum. Archetypum græcum c. versionibus vulgata latina, germanica Lutheri et anglica authentica, in usum manulem edend. curaverunt C. G. G. Theile et R. Stier. Bielef., 1855. Edit. 2. 1858.
- Ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη. Nov. Test. ad fidem Codicis Vaticani ediderunt A. Kuenen et C. G. Cobel. Lugd. Bat., 1860.
- Novum Testamentum Vaticanum. Post Angeli Maii aliorumque imperfectos labores ex ipso codice edidit. Tischendorf. Lips., 1867.
- Bibliorum sacrorum græcus codex Vaticanus studiis Caroli Vercellone et Josephi Cozza editus. Tom. V, (contains the N. T.) Fol. Rom., 1869.
- Testamentum Nov. post Lachmannum et Tischendorffium ad fidem optimorum librorum denuo diligenter recognovit lectionumque varietatem notavit Aug. Hahn. Edit. ster. Lips., 1861.
- * Bibliorum Codex Sinaiticus Petropolitanus. Auspiciis aug. Imperatoris Alexandri II. ex tenebris protraxit, in Europam transtulit, ad juvandas sacras litteras ed. Constantinus Tischendorf. 4 voll. Petrop., 1862. (A costly library edition.)
- A cheaper edition is Testamentum Novum Sinaiticum s. Nov. Test. cum epist. Barnabæ et fragmentis Pastoris ex codice Sinaitico, etc. Lips., 1863.¹ 8vo. 1864.
- E. Reuss, Bibliotheca Novi Testamenti Græci, Brunsvigæ, 1872, gives a descriptive list of all the published editions of the New Testament.

Synopses.

- Synopsis evv. Matth., Marc. et Luc., una cum iis Jo. pericopis, quæ hist. pass. et resurr. Chr. complectt.; textum recogn. etc., J. J. Griesbach. Hal., 1776-97-1809. St. John's Gospel is wanting in the 1st ed., 1774.
- Synopsis evv., etc.; ex rec. Griesb. edd. W. M. L. de Wette et F. Luecke. Berol., 1818, 1841. 4.
- Synopsis Mt., Mc. et Luc. c. Jo. peric. parallelis, ed. M. Roediger. Hal., 1829-39.
- R. Anger, Synopsis evv. Mt., Mc., Lc. cum locis qui supersunt parall. literarum et tradit. evv. Irenæo antiquiorum. Lips., 1851. Ed. 2, 1863.
- C. Tischendorf, syn. ev. ex 4 evv. ord. chron. concinnata. Lips., 1851; ed. 4, 1878.
- J. H. Friedlieb, quatuor evv. in harmoniam redacta. Vratisl., 1847.
- H. N. Clausen, quat. evv. tabulae synopticae. Havn., 1829.
- Sevin, die drei ersten Evangelien synoptisch zusammengestellt. Wiesb., 1866.
- Synopses in German by H. Planck (Gött., 1809), Fr. A. Beck (Berl., 1826), G. C. R. Matthäi (Gött., 1826), J. Gehringer (Tüb., 1842), P. J. Sindler (Augsb., 1852).
- A Harmony of the Gospels by Sevin, 1867.
- Upon the whole of this richly endowed branch of literature comp. Hase, Leben Jesu (4th ed. Lpz., 1854), pp. 20-26.

¹ Older editions of the New Test., aside from those contained in the Polyglotta: (Comp. de Wette, §. 41, sqq.); 5 by Erasmus (1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, 1535), 3 by Robert Stephens (1546, 1549, 1565), 4 larger eds. by Theodore Beza, (published by Stephens, 1565, 1582, 1589, and 1598), and 6 smaller, 1554-91; upon the 3d ed. of Stephens, as improved by Beza, depends the authority of the so-called Textus Receptus; John Fell (following the London Polyglott, 1675), John Mill (1707), Kistler (1710-23), J. A. Bengel (1734; republished in manual eds. 1739, 1753, 1762, 1776, and by his son, Ernst Bengel, in 1790), J. J. Wetstein (1761; new ed. by Lotze, Rotterdam., 1831). Larger critical editions of more recent date: * J. J. Griesbach (Halle, 1774, 1775, 2 vols.; Leipz., 1806, 1807, 4 vols.), Chr. Fr. Matthæi (1788-88), F. C. Alter (1786, 1787), Andr. Birch (1788, 1801), David Schulz (Griesb. T. Berl., 1827), M. A. Scholz (Lpz., 1830), K. Lachmann u. Ph. Buttmann, (Berl., 1842, 1850. 2 Bde.), E. v. Muralt (Hamb., 1846, 1848), W. Greenfield u. J. P. Engles (Philad., 1851).

3. *Theoretical works on Criticism and Critical Helps.*¹

- L. Cappelli Critica sacra s. de variis quae in sacris V. T. libris occurrunt lectionibus libri VI. Rec. multisque animadversa. auxit G. J. L. Vogel. Vol. 1. Hal., 1775 Voll. 2, 3, ed. J. G. Scharfenberg., 1778, 1786.
- J. J. Griesbach, symbolae criticae ad suppl. et corrig. variarum N. T. lectt. collectiones. Hal., 1785-93. 2 voll.
- Commentarius criticus in textum graec. N. T. Jen., 1798-1811.
- J. G. Reiche, commentarius crit. in N. T. 3 Tom. Gött., 1853-62.
- * F. Schleiermacher, Hermeneutik u. Kritik mit bes. Beziehung auf N. T., published by Lücke. Berl., 1838. (Vol. 2 of the Nachl. zur Theol.)
- † J. M. A. Löhns, Grundzüge d. bibl. Hermeneutik und Kritik. Giessen, 1839.
- Convenient for students: * Quellensammlung zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanon bis auf Hieronymus, published by J. Hirschhofer. Zürich, 1844.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. Critical Editions of the Old Testament in Hebrew.

- An Interlinear Hebrew-English Psalter. The Book of Psalms in Hebrew, with a closely literal English Translation under each word. 8vo, pp. 240. London, 1882.
- Davidson, Samuel. Revision of the Hebrew Text of the Old Testament. Synopsis of Readings, Revised from Critical Sources. 8vo, pp. 234. London, 1882.
- Hahn's Hebrew Bible. New ed. Revised by Isaac Leeser and Joseph Jaquett. 8vo. Philadelphia.
- Hebrew and English Psalms. The Hebrew Text of Van der Hooght, with the Authorized Translation of 1611. In parallel columns. 8vo, pp. 100. London, 1882.
- Hebrew Psalter. 32mo. Andover, 1864.
- Hughes, Joseph. The Prophecy of Joel. The Hebrew Text printed Metrically, with a new English Translation and Critical Notes. 8vo. London, 1882.
- Letteris, Myer Levi. The Hebrew Bible, Revised and carefully Examined. With a Key to the Masoretic Notes. 8vo, pp. 1404. New York, 1872.
- Modern Polyglot Bible in Eight Languages. Giving the Hebrew Text, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate, and a Series of the best European Translations. To which is added the Peshito-Syriac New Testament, with Tables of the various Readings of the Hebrew, the Septuagint, the Greek, and Syriac New Testaments, etc. Crown folio, 2 vols. London, 1882.
- ספר תהלים. The Book of Psalms, in Hebrew and English. Arranged in Parallelisms. Andover, 1862.
- The Hebrew and English Scriptures of the Old Testament. Consisting of the Original Hebrew Text, and the Authorized English Version. With Appendices and Clavis to the Masoretic Notes. 4to, small. London, 1882.

¹ See the more general critical and philological works of Valesius (1740), Heumann (1747), Morell (1768), J. Clericus (1778), Beck (1791), in Ast (In the work mentioned under Hermeneutics, at the end). "A barely sufficient guide (to New Test. Criticism) is found partly in the prolegomena to the critical editions (by Bengel, Wetstein, etc.) and is partly contained in that olla podrida to which the title of Introduction to the New Test. is commonly applied." Schleiermacher, §. 123, note. Hence comp. the literature under Introduction, supra.

The Hebrew Bible of the Polyglot Series: The Text after Van der Hooght. Also the various Readings of the Samaritan Pentateuch. 8vo, pp. 635. London, 1882.

Walton's Polyglot. Biblia Sacra Polyglotta. Edidit Brianus Waltonus. 6 vols., folio. With Castell's Lexicon Heptaglotton, Hebrew, Chald., Syr., Samar., etc. 2 vols., folio. Together, 8 vols., folio. 1657-69.

Wright, C. H. H. The Book of Genesis in Hebrew; with a Critically Revised Text, various Readings, and Grammatical and Critical Notes. 8vo. London, 1859.

2. Critical Editions of the Septuagint.

Hexaglot Bible; comprising the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments in the Original Tongues; together with the Septuagint, the Syriac, (of the New Testament,) the Vulgate, the Authorized English and German, and the most approved French Versions, arranged in parallel columns. Vols. I, II, III, (to be completed in 6 vols.) 4to. London, 1871-3.

Septuagint Text, with Variorum Readings. 5 vols., folio. London, 1880.

The Greek Septuagint. With an English Translation in parallel columns. 4to. London, 1882.

The Septuagint according to the Vatican edition. Together with the real Septuagint Version of Daniel and the Apocrypha, including the Fourth Book of Maccabees, and an Historical Account of the Septuagint and of the Principal Texts in which it is Current. 8vo, pp. 958. London, 1882.

The Septuagint Version of the Old Testament. Tables of the Various Readings of the Alexandrine Text, and the Septuagint according to the Vatican Text. 8vo, pp. 689. London, 1882.

Tischendorf, Constantinus. Vetus Testamentum Græce Juxta LXX. Interpretes. 8vo. Leipsic, 1869.

Vetus Testamentum, Græce. Juxta LXX. Interpretes. Pp. 1088. Oxford, 1859. (Gives the Hebrew and Greek Texts in parallel columns.)

3. Editions of the Vulgate.

The Latin Bible. Biblia Sacra Vulgata Editionis Sixti V. et Clementis VIII. 8vo, pp. 773. London, 1882.

The Vulgate New Testament, compared with the Douay Version of 1582. Parallel columns. Small 4to. London, 1882.

4. Critical Editions of the New Testament.

Alford, Henry. The Greek Testament, with a Critically Revised Text; a Digest of various Readings, etc., and a Critical and Exegetical Commentary. 4 vols., 8vo, pp. clv, 924; lxxxvii, 723; cxxix, 435; cclxxxviii, 750. London, 1868.

— Greek Testament with English Notes. Abridged by B. H. Alford. 8vo. London, 1869.

Bagster's Large Print Greek Testament, with various Readings from Griesbach, Scholz, Lachmann, and Tischendorf, and references to Parallel Passages. 8vo. London.

— Critical New Testament, Greek and English, containing the Greek Text of Scholz, with Readings, both Marginal and Textual of Griesbach, and variations of Stephens, Beza, and the Elzevir. 16mo, pp. 624. New York, 1868.

Bloomfield, S. T. The Greek Testament with English Notes, Critical, Philological, and Exegetical. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 629, 631. Philadelphia, 1868.

- Butts, Henry A. The Epistle to the Romans in Greek, etc. With References to the New Testament Grammars of Winer and Buttmann. 8vo, pp. 42. New York, 1876.
- Cambridge Greek Testament. Ex Editione Stephani Tertia, 1550. 12mo. Cambridge.
- Codex Vaticanus. Novum Testamentum Graece ex Antiquissimo Codice Vaticano edidit Angelus Maius S. R. E. Card. Ad fidem Editionis Romanae Accuratus Impressum. 8vo, pp. 502. London, 1859.
- Cowper, B. H. Codex Alexandrinus, H KAINH ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ, etc. Ad Fidem Ipsius Codicis Denuo Accuratus edidit. 8vo. London, 1866.
- Dobbin, Orlando T. The Codex Montfortianus. A Collation of this Celebrated MS. throughout the Gospels and Acts, with the Greek Text of Wetstein, and with certain MSS. in the University of Oxford. 8vo, pp. 280. London, 1882.
- Fairbairn, P. The Pastoral Epistles; the Greek Text and Translation. 12mo. New York.
- Green, T. S. The Twofold New Testament. A newly-formed Greek Text, with new Translation into English. In parallel columns. 4to, pp. 466. London, 1882.
- Grinfield, E. V. Novum Testamentum Graecum, Editio Hellenistica. Scholia Hellenistica in Novum Testamentum. 4 vols., 8vo. London, 1843-48.
- Hahn, A. Greek Testament, edited by E. Robinson. 12mo, pp. 536. New York, 1842.
- Hansell, E. H. The New Testament. The most Ancient MSS. of the Original Greek, printed in parallel columns, with a Collation of the Sinaitic Codex. 3 vols., 8vo. London, 1880.
- Major, J. R. The Gospel According to St. Mark, in the Original Greek, with a Digest of Notes from various Commentators. 16mo. London, 1871.
- New Testament, Griesbach's Text, with the various Readings of Mill and Scholz, Marginal References, and Parallels, and a Critical Introduction. 12mo, pp. 650. London, 1859.
- Novum Testamentum Textus Stephanici, A. D. 1550. Accedunt variae Lectiones editionum Bezae, Elzeviri, Lachmannii, Tischendorfii, et Tregellesii. Curante F. H. Scrivener. 18mo. Cambridge, 1872.
- Scrivener, F. H. An Exact Transcript of the Codex Augiensis, a Graeco-Latin MS. of St. Paul's Epistles, etc., etc. With a Critical Introduction. 8vo. Cambridge, 1859.
- A Full Collation of the Codex Sinaiticus, with the Received Text of the New Testament; to which is Prefixed a Critical Introduction. 16mo. London, 1867.
- Bezae Codex Cantabrigiensis, being an exact copy, in ordinary type, of the celebrated Uncial Graeco-Latin MS. of the Four Gospels and Acts, etc., etc. With a Critical Introduction, etc. 8vo. Cambridge, 1864.
- Novum Testamentum Graecum. 18mo. New York.
- Stuart, C. E. Textual Criticism of the New Testament, for English Bible Students. 2d ed. Revised and Corrected. The Authorized Version compared with Critical Texts. 8vo. London, 1882.
- The Codex Zacynthius. Edited by S. P. Tregelles. Folio. London, 1882.
- The Englishman's Greek New Testament. Giving the Greek Text of Stephens, 1550: With various Readings of Elzevir, 1624, Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Alford, and Wordsworth; with an Interlinear Literal Translation. To which is added the Authorized Version of 1611. Crown 8vo. London, 1882.

- The Greek Testament. With the Readings adopted by the Revisers of the Authorized Version. 16mo, pp. 560. Oxford, 1881.
- The New Testament. Greek and English, in parallel columns. Edited by J. Scholefield. New edition with Marginal References. By Dr. Scrivener. 16mo. London, 1880.
- The New Testament. Greek Text. Ex Editione Stephani Tertia. 16mo. London, 1880.
- Tregelles, S. P. A Collation of the Critical Texts of Griesbach, Sholz, Lachmann, and Tischendorf, with the Received Text. 8vo, pp. 96. London, 1882.
- The Greek New Testament, edited from Ancient Authorities. 5 parts, 4to. London, 1879.
- Westcott, B. F., and Hort, F. J. A. The New Testament in the Original Greek. With an Introduction by Philip Schaff. 12mo, pp. 580. New York, 1881.
- Wordsworth, Chris. The New Testament in the Original Greek. With Notes and Introductions. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1866.

5. Synopes and Harmonies.

- Alexander, Wm. Lindsay. The Connection and Harmony of the Old and New Testaments. 12mo. London, 1858.
- Andrews, Samuel J. The Life of our Lord upon Earth. Considered in its Historical, Chronological, and Geographical Relations. 8vo, pp. xxiv, 624. New York, 1868. (A harmony of the Gospels with each other, and with contemporary history.)
- Buck, D. D. The Closing Scenes of the Life of Christ. Being a Harmonized Combination of the Four Gospel Histories of the last Year of the Saviour's Life. 12mo, pp. 293. Philadelphia, 1869.
- Calvin, John. A Harmony of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Translated by Rev. W. Pringle. 3 vols., 8vo. Edinburgh, 1845.
- Clark, George W. A new Harmony of the Four Gospels in English, according to the Common Version. 12mo, pp. 365. New York, 1870.
- Fuller, J. M. The Four Gospels, arranged in the form of a Harmony from the Text of the Authorized Version; with four maps. 12mo. New York, 1875.
- Gardiner, Frederick. A Harmony of the Four Gospels in Greek, according to the Text of Tischendorf, with a Collation of the Textus Receptus, and of the Texts of Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tregelles. Revised ed., 8vo. Andover, 1882.
- A Harmony of the Four Gospels in English, according to the Authorized Version. 8vo, pp. 287. Andover, 1871.
- Diatessaron. The Life of our Lord in the Words of the Gospels. 16mo, pp. 259. Andover, 1871.
- Greswell, Edward. Dissertations upon the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels. 2d ed., 4 vols., 8vo, pp. 618, 654, 708, 930. Oxford, 1837.
- Haley, John W. An Examination of the Alleged Discrepancies of the Bible. With an Introduction by Alvah Hovey. 8vo, pp. xii, 478. Andover, 1882.
- Macknight, James. Harmony of the Gospels with Paraphrase and Notes. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1819.
- Robinson, Edward. A Harmony of the Four Gospels in Greek, according to the Text of Hahn; newly arranged, with Explanatory Notes. 8vo. Boston, 1868.
- Harmony of the Four Gospels in English. 12mo. Boston, 1868.
- Strong, James. Harmony of the Gospels in Greek of the Received Text, for the use of Students and Others. 12mo, pp. 406. New York, 1854.
- Harmony and Exposition in English. 8vo, pp. 569. New York, 1852.

- Stroud, Wm. A new Greek Harmony of the Four Gospels, comprising a Synopsis and a Diatessaron; together with an Introductory Treatise, and numerous Tables, Indexes, and Diagrams. 4to, pp. 602. London, 1853.
- The Gospels Consolidated. The Four Gospels Consolidated into one Continuous Narrative. 4to. London, 1882.
- The Treasury of Scripture Knowledge. A Selection of more than 500,000 Scripture References and Parallel Passages; together with a Harmony of the four Evangelists. 8vo. London, 1882.
- Wiesler, Karl. Chronological Synopsis of the Four Gospels. Translated by E. Venables. 8vo, pp. 459. London, 1864.

6. Helps to the Study of Criticism.

- Barrett, Richard. Synopsis of Criticisms upon those Passages of the Old Testament in which Modern Commentators have differed from the Authorized Version. 5 vols., 8vo. London, 1847.
- Birks, F. R. Essay on the Right Estimation of Manuscript Evidence in the Text of the New Testament. London, 1880.
- Boyce, W. B. The Higher Criticism of the Bible. A Manual for Students. 12mo, pp. xxi, 473. London, 1881.
- Burton, John W. The last Twelve Verses of the Gospel according to St. Mark Vindicated against Recent Critical Objectors and Established. 8vo. Oxford, 1871.
- Crowfoot, J. R. Observations on the Collation in Greek of Cureton's Syriac Fragments of the Gospel. 4to. London, 1872.
- Davidson, Samuel. A Treatise on Biblical Criticism, exhibiting a Systematic View of that Science. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 463, 484. Boston, 1853.
- Gerard, Gilbert. Institutes of Biblical Criticism; or, Heads of the Course of Lectures on that Subject, read in the University of King's College, Aberdeen, 8vo. Boston, 1823.
- Green, Thomas S. A Course of Developed Criticism on Passages of the New Testament materially affected by various Readings. 8vo, pp. 202. London, 1882.
- Hammond, C. E. Outlines of Textual Criticism applied to the New Testament. (Clarendon Press Series.) 16mo, pp. 146. Oxford, 1872.
- Horsley, Samuel. Biblical Criticism; or, the First Fourteen Historical Books of the Old Testament; also the First Nine Prophetical Books. 2d ed., 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 484, 511. London, 1845.
- Milligan, William, and Roberts, Alexander. The Words of the New Testament, as Altered by Transmission and Ascertained by Modern Criticism. 12mo, pp. 262. Edinburgh, 1873.
- Porter, J. S. Principles of Textual Criticism. 8vo. London, 1848.
- Roberts, Alex. Companion to the Revised Version of the English New Testament. 12mo, pp. viii, 213. New York, 1881.
- Sargent, Frederick. A Compendium of Biblical Criticism on the Canonical Books of the Holy Scriptures; Revised and Enlarged. 8vo. London, 1871.
- Schaff, Philip. Companion to the Greek Testament and English Version. New York, 1883.
- Scrivener, F. H. Lectures on the Text of the New Testament and the Ancient MSS. which contain it. Crown 8vo. New York. Third ed., London, 1883.
- Stuart, C. E. Textual Criticism of the New Testament for English Students. 18mo. London.
- Stuart, Moses. Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon. 12mo, pp. 454. Andover, 1871.

Tregelles, S. P. An Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament; with Remarks on its Revision upon Critical Principles. 8vo, pp. 374. London, 1854.

Turpie, David M'C. The Old Testament in the New. A Contribution to Biblical Criticism and Interpretation. 8vo, pp. 279. London, 1868.

7. Concordances.

Brown, John. A Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. A new ed., carefully revised by Samuel Ives. Thick 24mo. London, 1867.

Companion to the Bible, and Supplement to the Comprehensive Commentary; being a Concordance to the Holy Scriptures. Royal 8vo. Philadelphia, 1854.

Cruden, Alexander. A Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures. Royal 8vo. New York, 1871.

— Condensed ed. 8vo. Boston.

Davidson, B. Hebrew Concordance of the Hebrew and Chaldee Scriptures. 2 vols., royal 8vo. London, 1882.

Eadie, John. An Analytical Concordance to the Holy Scriptures; or, the Bible Presented under Distinct and Classified Heads or Topics. Royal 8vo. Boston, 1862.

— A new and Complete Concordance on the Basis of Cruden. Crown 8vo. London, 1870.

Englishman's, The. Greek Concordance of the New Testament; being an Attempt at a Verbal Connection between the Greek and the English Texts. 4to, pp. 482. New York, 1879.

Englishmen's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance, The, of the Old Testament. 2 vols., royal 8vo. London, 1866.

Henderson, William. A Dictionary and Concordance of the Names of Persons and Places, and of Terms which occur in Scripture. 8vo, pp. 689. Edinburgh and New York.

Hudson, Charles F. A Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament. Revised and Completed by Ezra Abbot. 24mo, pp. 510. Boston, 1870.

Schmidt, Erastus. A Greek Concordance to the New Testament. A Concordance of the Words of the Greek New Testament, with their Context. 8vo, pp. 283. London, 1882.

Student's Concordance to the Revised Version of 1881. (Shows changes in all words referred to.) New York, 1883.

Thoms, John Alexander. A Complete Concordance to the Revised Version of the New Testament. Published under the Authorization of Oxford and Cambridge Universities. 8vo. New York, 1883.

Wigram, G. V. The Hebraist's Vade Mecum; a first attempt at a Complete Verbal Index to the Hebrew and Chaldee Scriptures. London, 1867.

Young, Robert. Analytical Concordance to the Bible. Every word in alphabetical order, with Hebrew or Greek Original. Edinburgh and New York, 1881.

8. Biblical Dictionaries and Cyclopædias.

Abbot, Lyman. A Dictionary of Religious Knowledge. New York, 1875.

Ayre, John. The Treasury of Bible Knowledge; being a Dictionary of the Books, Persons, Places, Events, etc., in the Holy Scriptures. 18mo. New York, 1866.

Barnum, Samuel W. A Comprehensive Dictionary of the Bible. Abridged from Smith, with Additions. 8vo, pp. 1219. New York and London, 1868.

- Blunt, John H. A Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology. By various Writers. Royal 8vo. Philadelphia, 1870.
- Dictionary of Sects, Heresies, Ecclesiastical Parties, and Schools of Religious Thought. Royal 8vo. Philadelphia, 1874.
- Brown, John. A Dictionary of the Bible, etc. 8vo. London, 1868.
- Cassell's Bible Dictionary. Illustrated with nearly six hundred Engravings. 2 vols. in one. 4to, pp. 1159. London, 1869.
- Darling, James. Cyclopædia Bibliographica: a Library Manual of Theological and General Literature, and Guide to Books, etc. 2 vols., royal 8vo. Vol. I, Authors; columns, 3,388. Vol. II, Subjects, Holy Scriptures; columns, 1,920. London, 1854-59.
- Davidson, D. Pocket Biblical Dictionary, Condensed from Calmet, Brown, Clarke, Jones, and the most Recent Sources of Information. New ed., 24mo. London, 1868.
- Eadie, John. A Biblical Cyclopædia; or, Dictionary of Eastern Antiquities, Geography, Natural History, Sacred Annals, etc. 13th ed., 8vo, pp. viii, 690. London, 1870.
- Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge; or, Dictionary of the Bible*. Theological, Religious, Biographical, etc. Royal 8vo. Philadelphia, 1870.
- Fairbairn, P. The Imperial Bible Dictionary. Historical, Biographical, Geographical, and Doctrinal, etc. Illustrated. 2 vols., royal 8vo, pp. x, 1007, 1151. London, 1866.
- Farrar, John. A Biblical and Theological Dictionary; Illustrative of the Old and New Testaments. 3d ed., 12mo, pp. 663. London, 1852.
- Fausset, A. R. The Englishman's Critical and Expository Bible Cyclopædia. Illustrated. 4to. London, 1878.
- Herzog's Protestant, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Encyclopædia; with Additions by J. H. A. Bomberger, assisted by distinguished Theologians of various Denominations. 2 vols., royal 8vo. Philadelphia, 1858-60. (This translation was never completed.)
- Inglis, James. The Bible-Text Cyclopædia: a Complete Classification of Scripture Texts in the form of an Alphabetical Index of Subjects. Post 8vo, pp. 528. London, 1861. New ed., 1885.
- Journal of Sacred Literature*. Edited by Drs. Kitto, Burgess, etc. The Five Series complete. 40 vols., 8vo. London, 1848-60.
- Kitto, John. A Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature. Edited by W. L. Alexander. 3 vols., 8vo, pp. 872, 876, 872. Edinburgh, 1862-66.
- Malcom, Howard. Theological Index. References to the Principal Works in every Department of Religious Literature. Royal 8vo, pp. 488. Philadelphia, 1870.
- M'Clintock and Strong. Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature. 8vo, 10 vols. New York, 1867-80.
- Schaff, Philip. A Religious Encyclopædia; or, Dictionary of Biblical, Doctrinal, and Practical Theology. 8vo, 3 vols. New York, 1882.
- Smith, William. Dictionary of the Bible. American ed. by Hackett and Abbot. 4 vols., 8vo. New York, 1867-70. The same Abridged. 1 vol., 8vo. Boston, 1865.
- Dictionary of Christian Antiquities. 8vo, 2 vols. Hartford, 1876-80.
- Dictionary of Christian Biography. 8vo, 3 vols. Boston, 1877-1883. (To be completed in 4 vols.)
- Staunton, Wm. An Ecclesiastical Dictionary, containing Definitions of Terms pertaining to the History, Ritual, Discipline, Worship, Ceremonies, and Usages of the Christian Church. 8vo. New York, 1861.

SECTION XVIII.

HERMENEUTICS.

G. Seyffarth, über Begriff, Anordnung und Umfang der Hermeneutik des N. T. (Lpz. 1894), womit jedoch zu vergleichen die Recens. in Winers und Engelhardt's Journal Bb. 4. S. 334 ff. A. Tholuck, über den Mangel an Uebereinstimmung unter den Auslegern des N. T. (theol. Studien und Kritiken Jahrg., 1832, S. 325). Planck's Sacred Philology and Interpretation, translated by Turner; Kitto's Cyclopaedia, vol. ii, p. 20. For a very full history and bibliography, see Tarry's Hermeneutics, Part III.

Biblical Hermeneutics treats of the principles on which Scripture is to be explained. These principles are, upon the whole, the same Definition of that apply to any work of human origin, and Hermeneutics. eutics, as a theological science, differs from the science in its general (philosophical and philological) character simply with regard to the object upon which it is employed. In this connexion the peculiarly religious character of the Bible certainly demands recognition.

Hermeneutics from ἐρμηνεύω (which is to be traced back to the Hermes of the ancients¹) is, in Schleiermacher's language, an art-doctrine; "for the complete understanding of a discourse or writing is a work of art, and requires a technical apparatus."² It Distinguished stands in an inverted relation to rhetoric, in so far as from rhetoric. the latter is dependent on logic; for while the logical part of rhetoric furnishes the laws by which our thoughts are to be connected, arranged, and presented, Hermeneutics teaches how to apprehend the given discourses or writings of another person, and how to follow and interpret them. In proportion as the logically ordered thinking in a discourse or book becomes clear, as it will when the matter to be imparted is developed before the mind of the hearer or reader in a well-arranged style, will the need of explanation and of an art of explanation be small; for which reason, e. g., purely mathematical lectures need no hermeneutics if definitions are first understood. But when the logic is hidden in the discussion, and when the words do not represent mere formulas and figures (the expression of magnitudes), but are, according to the nature of the subject under consideration, the not fully adequate signs of a profoundly apprehended original, when they are the bearers, borrowed from the world of sense, of ideas which are invisible, there arises the need of an interpreter who shall know how to trace back to the original idea the letter which was first correctly apprehended through the mechanical processes of grammar, and who shall thus restore the written or spoken word, so that it becomes for the reader or hearer what it was to the writer or speaker from whom in the freshness of its originality it emanated.

¹ See Creuzer, Symbolik, i, pp. 9-15: 365 sqq.; ii, p. 617.

² Schleiermacher, § 132.

For this reason the ancients already joined divination to hermeneutics; and this likewise indicates why an exposition according to rules of art is more necessary with poets, epigrammatists, and poetizing philosophers, than with simple prose-writers.¹ Works, moreover, that belong to a distant age, and are written in a language which has itself passed through many historical vicissitudes, are more likely to engage the attention of hermeneutics than writings and discourses belonging to our own times, whose meaning is more apparent to us by reason of their nearness. And, lastly, the allusions contained in a discourse or writing will need a key to their interpretation, in proportion as they bear upon individual matters, which is especially the case in epistolary compositions. If we apply these considerations to the Bible, it will appear that it needs the art of hermeneutics in each of these regards. Few books, in the first place, in the form of expression, fall so much behind their wealth of contents, and few, accordingly, belong so fully to the class of pregnant writings, as do these modest envelopments of supreme ideas. Luther strikingly likens them to the swaddling-clothes in which the Christ-child lay, and the great Reformer was led to use the expression that the words in Scripture are not merely "written words, but living words," whence it becomes a frequent necessity to read between the lines. But the Bible at the same time shares with all works of antiquity, including the less pregnant also, the fortune of having been written in times, and among a people, into whose circumstances we must enter and live, and in languages with whose spirit and expression we must become familiar, if we desire to accurately understand what is written.²

¹ "There is no lack of examples in our own experience of an author's mind being, e. g., exalted to such an intuitive penetration of its object as to be enabled to speak of it with an unusual pregnancy of word and meaning which his own reflection is unable to resolve into details; it even happens that when he descends from his intuitive center-point to his ordinary level of thought, his own work will appear like a strange object, respecting the development of whose meaning he finds as much difficulty as do others."—J. T. Beck, Enil. in das Syst. d. Chr. Lehre, p. 253. An example is found in Hamann.

² "He who would interpret, needs, by drawing as near as may be possible, to descend to the condition of the first readers and hearers."—Lutz (Hermeneutic). "Pour ne pas errer sur le sens que nous appelons extérieur, il faut avoir une idée précise de la langue des auteurs, je veux dire de la valeur des signes et des formes de cette langue, comparés aux formes et aux signes correspondants de notre propre langue."

How thoroughly individual, too, is the Bible, never dealing in abstract generalities, always singling out the concrete instance, the special condition and its needs, the disposition and mode of culture of persons and communities !¹ How natural, then, that we should seek to obtain a key ! This can be no magic key, however, which some angel must bring down from the third or the seventh heaven, or whose possession is restricted to a sacred caste ; but, generally speaking, the same art has its application here, which must be employed, according to the natural laws of a historico-logical method of estimating the past, upon every work that requires explanation. This art belongs to the higher department of the science of language, of philology, and hence of applied philosophy.

Biblical hermeneutics a branch of general hermeneutics.

It is a theological science merely in its special application to this object,² for every rule established by theological hermeneutics for the exposition of the Scriptures must be based upon the general principles of hermeneutics or deducible from them, and all that can be done in the interest of the Bible is that such principles be properly applied. Arbitrary departure from them, or making so-called "exceptions to such rules," is never beneficial. When the latter course is followed the proper inference is that the general law itself has not been apprehended, or that confusion or a misconception is involved. Should a one-sided, scanty legislation confine the interpretation of the Scriptures to the purely external meaning of the letter so exclusively as, while considering the notation of the letter (the grammar), to forget the notation of the spirit, should it designedly seek to blot out the individuality and originality of an author, in order to put in the place of the forms which reveal a richness of ideas, the vaguely outlined shadows of abstract commonplaces, it will of course be exposed to the danger of seeing those who are not content with such meagre fare forsake its school and submit themselves to the impression of an undefined feeling. This is a result the more likely to come to pass because of the failure of such teachers to instil the scientific principles sought at their hands.

En d'autres termes, il faut savoir à quel taux il faut prendre le mots principaux, qui reviennent le plus souvent et entrent dans le passages les plus importants."—Vinet (Homilétique), p. 124.

¹ Comp. Schleiermacher, § 135 : "The explanation of the New Testament Scriptures is especially difficult, both on account of the nature of their contents, and by reason of external conditions."

² Schleiermacher, § 137, sq. It is evident that within this specifically biblical hermeneutics, another and yet more special (Old and New Test., Pauline, Johannan, etc.) may be conceived of and wrought out. Comp. ib., § 136.

If hermeneutics has regard to the deeper psychological features of the writers to be explained, whether they occupy the field of poetry, philosophy, or religion, and if it establishes as the leading principle that he only is competent to correctly appreciate an author whose mind possesses elements related and analogous to that author's, or, at least, who has learned how to think himself into the mental state of his author,¹ it certainly has also the right to require an unconditional submission to its rules on the part of the expositor of the Bible. All the wanderings of the so-called allegorical interpretation find their excuse in narrow hermeneutics, whether of the orthodox or the rationalist letter, and may be corrected and finally laid aside by the application of the true science of spiritual exposition.²

The science of hermeneutics could not be formed before frequent experiments in interpretation had been made, and such practice had resulted in the more or less conscious application of the laws of interpretation which were developed in the way of practical exposition. Even then it remained "an aggregate of separate, often valuable and praiseworthy, observations,"³ rather than a systematic art, "whose precepts would constitute a system resting upon clear principles deduced from the nature of thought and of language." This experience belongs alike to general and biblical hermeneutics.
Gradual growth of hermeneutics.

¹ "Who will the poet understand must journey into poet-land." Luther already observed that the Eclogues of Virgil are thoroughly plain to him alone who has lived with shepherds, and that he alone can properly understand Cicero's epistles "who has served twenty years in a first-class regiment." Lutz observes similarly (in Hermeneutik), "The contents (of the Scripture) are understood only by him who apprehends and values them in the spirit of one who is saved by Christ and out of interest for the Christian Church." Comp. also Schenkel, Dogmatik, I, p. 327, and Krauss, Bedeutung des Glaubens für die Schriftauslegung.

² Diestel (infra), p. 778, justly observes, in opposition to one-sided tendencies in exegesis, that only an all-sided illumination can do justice to the object to be explained. He designates (1) the rational, (2) the historico-philosophical, and (3) the religious principles, as elements which must interpenetrate each other in any truly theological method of investigation. At the same time we are to remember that "an absolute knowledge of the religion of the people of God will continue to be a far-off goal that twinkles in the distance, so long as human development shall continue; and in the same measure, even as Christianity likewise can never be exhausted, and the knowledge of it, in its depth and fulness can only represent a constant approximation toward the highest ideal."

³ Schleiermacher, Outline of Theology, § 133. See also the succeeding paragraphs to § 140 inclusive.

1. *General Hermeneutics.*¹

- G. F. Meier, Versuch einer allgemeinen Auslegekunst. Halle, 1756.
 J. J. G. Scheller, Anleitung zur Erklärung der alten Schriftsteller, mit Vorrede von Ch. A. Klotz. Lpz., 1783.
 Ch. D. Beck, commentatt. academ. de interpret. vett. scriptorum. Lips., 1791.
 F. Ast, Grundlinien der Grammatik, Hermeneutik und Kritik. Landsh., 1806. S. 165. ff.
 F. A. Wolf, Darstellung der Alterthumswissenschaft. Published by S. F. W. Hoffmann. Lpz., 1833. S. 23 f. 27.

2. *Its application to the Bible.*²

- Mth. Flaccii clavis s. scripturæ. Bas., 1537. 2 voll. f. Neue Aufl. von J. Musæus. Jen., 1674. Lpz., 1695, etc.
 S. J. Baumgarten, Ausf. Vortrag der bibl. Hermeneutik; published by J. C. Bertram. Halle, 1769. 4.
 G. A. Bauer, Entw. einer Hermeneutik des A. und N. T. Lpz., 1709.
 G. W. Meyer, Versuch einer Hermeneutik des A. T. Lübb., 1799, 1800. N. T. Lpz., 1812. (Each in 2 vols.)
 J. H. Pareau, Instit. interpr. V. T. Ultraj., 1822. 8.
 Ernesti, Institutio interpr. N. T. ad usum lectionum. Ed. 1-3. Lips., 1761-75; ed. 4. observatt. auct. cur. C. F. Ammon, 1792; ed. 5, 1809. 8.
 S. F. Nth. Morus, Super hermeneutica N. T. acroases academ. Ed. et additamentis instr. H. C. A. Eichstaedt. Lips., 1797-1802. 2 voll.
 Ch. D. Beck, Monogrammata hermen. librr. N. T. Lips., 1808.
 K. G. Bretschneider, Die historisch-dogmatische Auslegung des N. T. nach ihren Principien, Quellen und Hilfsmitteln dargestellt. Lpz., 1806.
 A. G. Keil, Lehrb. der Hermeneutik des N. T. nach Grundsätzen der gramm.-histor. Interpretation. Lpz., 1810. (Lat. by Emmerling. Ibid., 1811.)
 J. J. Griesbach, Vorlesungen über die Hermeneutik des N. T., published by J. E. S. Steiner. Nürnberg, 1815.
 Fr. Lücke, Grundriss der neutestamentl. Hermeneutik und ihrer Geschichte, zum Gebrauche für akadem. Vorlesungen. Götting., 1817.
 G. Ph. Ch. Kaiser, Grundr. eines Systems der neutestamentl. Hermeneutik. Erlang., 1817.
 F. H. Germar, die panharmonische Interpretation der heiligen Schrift. Schlesw., 1821.
 ——— Beitrag zur Allgemeinen Hermeneutik und zu deren Anwendung auf die theologische. Altona, 1828.
 H. Olshausen, Ein Wort über tiefern Schriftsinn. Königsb., 1824.
 ——— Die biblische Schriftauslegung; noch ein Wort über tiefern Schriftsinn. Hamb., 1825.
 R. Stier, Andeutungen für gläubiges Schriftverständniß im Ganzen und Einzelnen. Königsb., 1824. (See Winer and Engelhardt's Journal, No. 4, p. 422 sqq.)

¹ Older works in Danz. p. 226; to which add, Rudorff, Diss. de arte interpretandi scriptores veteres profanos. Lips., 1747.

² Much that applies here may also be found in the above-mentioned works (under Grammar, Introduction, Criticism, etc.) by Glassius (Philologia sacra), Richard Simon, etc. Here, too, Semler opened the way in part: Apparatus ad libral. V. T. interpret. Hal., 1773. Ad N. T. 1787. Neuer Versuch, die gemeinnützige Auslegung und Anwendung des N. T. zu befördern, 1786. Individual forerunners: Rambach, Pfeiffer, Wolke, Carpvov, etc., see Danz. ubi supra.

- E. F. Höpfner, Grundlinien zu einer fruchtbaren Auslegung der heil. Schrift. Lpz., 1827.
- G. Chr. R. Matthäi, Neue Auslegung der Bibel, zur Erforschung und Darstellung ihres Glaubens, begründet mit Charakteristik der neuesten theologischen Grundsätze, Richtungen und Parteien. Gött., 1831. Comp. Lücke in Studien und Kritiken, 1833. 2.
- * Schleiermacher und † Löhnis. See above under Criticism.
- H. Nic. Clausen (auch Klausen), Hermeneutik des N. T. From the Danish, by Schmidt-Phiseldeck. Lpz., 1841.
- C. G. Wilke, Die Hermeneutik des N. T. systematisch dargestellt. Lpz., 1848-44. 2 Bde.
- Kuenen, Critices et hermeneutices librorum Novi Foederis lineamenta. Lugd. Bat., 1858.
- * J. L. Lutz, Bibl. Hermeneutik, published by A. Lutz. Pforzh., 1849. 2d ed., 1861.
- † J. Kohlgruber, Hermeneutica bibl. generalis. Oenip., 1850.
- † J. B. Guentner, Hermen. bibl. generalis; ed. alt. Vien., 1851.
- † Setwin, Hermeneuticae biblicae institutiones. Vindabonae, 1872.
- A. Immer, Hermeneutik des N. T. Wittenb., 1873.

Historical:

- J. G. Rosenmüller, hist. interpret. librr. sacrr. in eccl. christ. Hildb. et Lips., 1795-1814. 5 voll.
- G. W. Meyer, Geschichte der Schrifterklärung seit der Wiederherstellung der Wissenschaften. Gött., 1802-1808. 5 vols.

For the History of the Exposition of the Old Testament:

- * L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der chrith. Kirche. Jena, 1869.
- R. Siegfried, die Aufg. der Gesch. der Alttest. Auslegung in der Gegenwart. Jena, 1876.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. Hermeneutics.

- Alexander, Archibald. Principle of Design in the Interpretation of Scripture. Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review for July, 1845.
- Apthorp, East. Discourses on Prophecy. Warburtonian Lectures. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1786. (One of these Lectures is on the Canons of Interpretation.)
- Arnold, Thomas. Sermons chiefly on the Interpretation of Scripture. New ed. London, 1878.
- Barrows, E. P. A New Introduction to the Study of the Bible. Part IV, Biblical Interpretation. 8vo. London.
- Blunt, J. H. Key to the Knowledge and Use of the Holy Bible. 8vo. London, 1873. 16mo. Philadelphia, 1873.
- Bosanquet, S. R. Interpretation; being Rules and Principles assisting to the Reading and Understanding of the Holy Scriptures. 12mo. London, 1874.
- Campbell, George. The Four Gospels, with Preliminary Dissertations. 4 vols., 8vo. Boston, 1811. (Dissertation IV is on the right method of proceeding in the critical examination of the New Testament.)
- Cellérier, J. E. Biblical Hermeneutics, chiefly a Translation of the Manuel D'Herméneutique Biblique, par J. E. Cellérier. By Charles Elliott and William J. Harsha. 8vo. New York, 1881.
- Conybeare, J. J. An Attempt to Trace the History and to Ascertain the Limits of the Secondary and Spiritual Interpretation of Scripture. Bampton Lecture for 1824. 12mo, pp. xii, 331. Oxford, 1824.

- Conybeare, W. D. An Elementary Course of Lectures on the Criticism, Interpretation and Leading Doctrines of the Bible. 12mo. London, 1836.
- Davidson, Samuel. Sacred Hermeneutics Developed and Applied; including a History of Biblical Interpretation from the Earliest of the Fathers to the Reformation. 8vo, pp. 760. Edinburgh, 1848.
- Dixon, Joseph. A General Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures in a Series of Dissertations, Critical, Hermeneutical, and Historical. 2 vols., 8vo. Dublin, 1852. 2 vols. in one, 8vo. Baltimore, 1853. (A Roman Catholic work.)
- Dobie, David. A Key to the Bible, being an Exposition of the History, etc., of Sacred Interpretation. 12mo. New York, 1856.
- Doedes, J. J. Manual of Hermeneutics for the Writings of the New Testament. 12mo, pp. 141. Edinburgh, 1867.
- Ellicott, C. J. Scripture and its Interpretation. One of the Essays in Aids to Faith. Replies to Essays and Reviews. 8vo. London, 1868.
- Ernesti, J. J. Principles of Biblical Interpretation. Translated from the Institutio Interpretis, by Chas. H. Terrot. 2 vols., 12mo. Edinburgh, 1832.
- Fairbairn, Patrick. Hermeneutical Manual; or, Introduction to the Exegetical Study of the New Testament. 8vo, pp. 492. Edinburgh, 1858. Philadelphia, 1859.
- Prophecy Viewed in Respect to its Distinctive Nature, Special Function, and Proper Interpretation. 8vo. New York, 1866.
- The Typology of Scripture; Viewed in Connection with the Whole Series of Divine Dispensations. 5th ed., 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 504, 505. Edinburgh, 1870. New York, 1877.
- Horne, Thomas Hartwell. Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures. 2 vols., 8vo. Philadelphia, 1841. Thirteenth ed., 4 vols., 8vo. London, 1872. (Part II. vol. i, treats of interpretation.)
- Immer, A. Hermeneutics of the New Testament. Translated from the German by Albert H. Newman. 8vo, pp. xvii, 395. Andover, 1877.
- Irons, W. J. The Bible and its Interpreters. Miracles, and Prophecies. 2d ed. London, 1869.
- Jones, Wm. Course of Lectures on the Figurative Language of the Scriptures. 8vo. London, 1789. (Also in Vol. IV of Theological and Miscellaneous Works. 1810.)
- Jowett, Benjamin. On the Interpretation of Scripture. One of the Essays in Essays and Reviews by eminent English Churchmen. 8vo. London, 1861.
- Lamar, J. S. The Organon of Scripture; or, the Inductive Method of Biblical Interpretation. 12mo. Philadelphia, 1860.
- Lee, Samuel. The Study of the Holy Scriptures. 8vo. London, 1830. (Contains a dissertation on the interpretation of prophecy.)
- Macknight, James. Concerning the Right Interpretation of the Writings in which the Revelations of God are Contained. (Essay VIII, appended to his Translation and Commentary on the Apostolic Epistles. Many eds.)
- Maitland, Chas. The Apostles' School of Prophetic Interpretation, with its History to the Present Time. 8vo, pp. 472. London, 1849.
- Maitland, S. R. Eight Essays on the Mystical Interpretation of Scripture, etc. 8vo. London, 1852.
- Marsh, Bishop Herbert. Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible, with the History of Biblical Interpretation. 8vo. London, 1828, 1838, 1842.
- M'Clelland, Alexander. Manual of Sacred Interpretation, for the Special Benefit of Junior Theological Students. 12mo. New York, 1842.
- A Brief Treatise on the Canon and Interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. New York, 1850. (Above book enlarged.)

- Muenscher, Joseph. Manual of Biblical Interpretation. 16mo, pp. 318. Gambier, Ohio, 1865.
- Pareau, John Henry. Principles of Interpretation of the Old Testament. Translated by P. Forbes. 2 vols., 16mo, pp. 369, 319. Edinburgh, 1835.
- Pierce, B. K. The Word of God opened. Its Inspiration, Canon, and Interpretation Considered and Illustrated. New York, 1868.
- Planck, G. J. Introduction to Sacred Philology and Interpretation. Translated from the Original German by Samuel H. Turner. Edinburgh, 1884. 16mo, pp. 288. New York, 1884.
- Sawyer, Leicester A. The Elements of Biblical Interpretation; or, an Exposition of the Laws by which the Scriptures are capable of being correctly Interpreted. 12mo. New Haven, 1836.
- Scott, J. Principles of New Testament Quotation Established and Applied to Biblical Science. Edinburgh, 1875.
- Seiler, G. F. Biblical Hermeneutics; or, the Art of Scripture Interpretation. From the German. 8vo. London, 1835.
- Smith, John Pye. Principles of Interpretation as Applied to the Prophecies of Holy Scripture. London, 1829. 2d ed., 1831.
- Stuart, Moses. Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy. 12mo. Andover, 1842.
- Terry, M. S. Biblical Hermeneutics; a Treatise on the Interpretation of Scripture. 8vo, pp. 787. New York, 1833.
- Tholuck, Augustus. On the Use of the Old Testament in the New, and especially in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Translated by J. E. Ryland. Vol. XXXIX of Biblical Cabinet. 16mo. Edinburgh, 1842.
- Hermeneutics of the Apostle Paul, with Special Reference to Gal. iii, 16. Vol. XXXIX of Biblical Cabinet.
- Hints on the Interpretation of the Old Testament. Translated by R. B. Patton. Vol. II of Edinburgh Biblical Cabinet. 16mo. Edinburgh, 1833.
- Turner, S. H. Thoughts on the Origin, Character, and Interpretation of Scriptural Prophecy. 12mo. New York, 1860.
- Turpie, David M'O. The Old Testament in the New. A Contribution to Biblical Criticism and Interpretation, etc. Royal 8vo. London, 1868.
- Van Mildert, William. An Inquiry into the General Principles of Scripture Interpretation. Bampton Lectures for 1814. 8vo. Oxford, 1815. 8d ed. London, 1838.
- Wemyss, Thomas. A Key to the Symbolical Language of Scripture, etc. 16mo, pp. 520. Edinburgh, 1835.
- Winthrop, Edward. Premium Essays on the Characteristics and Laws of Prophetic Symbols. 12mo. New York, 1860.
- Whitaker, William. On the Interpretation of Scripture. Cambridge, 1849.
- Whittaker, John William. A Historical and Critical Enquiry into the Interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures. London, 1819.
- Whitby, Daniel. Dissertatio de SS. Scripturarum Interpretatione, secundum Patrum Commentarios. 8vo. London, 1714. (Elicited by the Arian Controversy.)
- Wordsworth, C. On the Interpretation of Scripture. An Essay in Reply to Essays and Reviews. 8vo. London, 1862.

2. Inspiration.

- Alexander, Archibald. Evidences of the Authenticity, Inspiration, and Canonical Authority of the Holy Scriptures. 12mo, pp. 308. Philadelphia.
- Atwell, W. E. Pauline Theory of the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. 8vo. London, 1878.

- Bagley, Benjamin. An Essay on Inspiration. 8vo. London, 1707. 2d ed., 1708.
- Bannerman, James. Inspiration: the Infallible Truth and Divine Authority of the Holy Scriptures. 8vo, pp. 595. Edinburgh, 1865.
- Barry, William. An Inquiry into the Nature and Extent of the Inspiration of the Apostles and other Writers of the New Testament. 8vo. London, 1797. 2d ed., 1822.
- Bayler, Joseph. Verbal Inspiration the True Characteristic of God's Holy Word. 12mo. London, 1870.
- Boyle, W. R. A. The Inspiration of the Book of Daniel, and other Portions of Scripture. 8vo. London, 1863.
- Burton, John W. Inspiration and Interpretation; Seven Sermons before the University of Oxford. 8vo. London, 1874.
- Calamy, E. The Inspiration of the Holy Writings of the Old and New Testament Considered and Improved. 8vo. London, 1710.
- Coleridge, Samuel Taylor. Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit. 16mo, pp. 129. Boston, 1841. (Also in his collected works.)
- Curtis, S. F. The Human Element in the Inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures. 12mo, pp. 386. New York, 1867.
- Dewar, Daniel. Divine Revelation: its Evidences, External, Internal, and Collateral. Together with its Canonical Authority and Plenary Inspiration. 2d ed., 8vo. London, 1859.
- Dick, John. An Essay on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. 4th ed., 8vo. Glasgow, 1840.
- Doddridge, Philip. A Dissertation on the Inspiration of the New Testament, etc. In works, vols. iv and viii.
- Elliott, Charles. A Treatise on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. Edinburgh and New York, 1877.
- Findlay, Robert. The Divine Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures asserted by St. Paul. 2 Tim. iii, 16. London, 1803.
- Fowle, F. W. The Reconciliation of Religion and Science, being Essays on Immortality, Inspiration, Miracles, and the Being of Christ. 8vo. London, 1832.
- Garbett, E. God's Word Written: the Doctrine of the Inspiration of Holy Scriptures Explained and Enforced. 12mo, pp. 365. Boston, 1867.
- Gaussen, S. R. L. Theopneusty; or, the Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. From the French, by E. N. Kirk. 12mo, pp. 343. New York, 1842.
- Given, John James. Truth of Scripture in Connection with Revelation. Inspiration and the Canon. Edinburgh, 1881.
- Gloag, Paton J. Introduction to the Pauline Epistles. 8vo, pp. xvi, 480. Edinburgh, 1874.
- Haldane, J. A. The Inspiration of the Scriptures. 12mo. Boston.
- Hannah, J. The Relation between the Divine and the Human Element in the Scripture. Bampton Lectures for 1863. Pp. xix, 364. London, 1863.
- Henderson, Ebenezer. Divine Inspiration; or, the Supernatural Influence exerted in the Communication of Divine Truth, etc. 8vo. London, 1836. 4th ed., 1852. (A work highly commended for impartiality.)
- Hinds, Samuel. An Inquiry into the Proofs, Nature, and Extent of Inspiration, and into the Authority of Scripture. 8vo. Oxford, 1831.
- Horne, Thomas Hartwell. Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures. 8vo, 2 vols. Philadelphia, 1841. (The opening chapters, iv to vi, both inclusive, treat of inspiration.)

- Jamieson, Robert. The Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. Baird Lectures for 1878. 12mo. Edinburgh, 1874.
- Lee, William. The Inspiration of the Scriptures. Its Nature and Proof. 8vo, pp. 478. New York, 1876.
- Lewis, Tayler. The Divine Human in the Scriptures. 12mo, pp. 400. New York, 1860. (Holds that the language of the Bible is, in a certain sense, inspired, and yet rejects verbal inspiration.)
- Liber Librorum: its Structure, Limitations, and Purpose. 16mo, pp. 282. New York, 1867. (Holds that reason enlightened by the Spirit is the verifier of revelation.)
- Lord, Eleazar. The Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. 12mo. New York, 1858. (Takes an extreme view.)
- Lowth, Wm. A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Writings of the Old and New Testaments. 8vo. Oxford, 1692. (An answer to Le Clerc.)
- Mahan, Milo. Palmoni; or, the Numerals of Scripture a Proof of Inspiration. A Free Inquiry. 12mo. New York, 1863.
- M'Caul, Alexander. Testimonies to the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, as Taught by the Church of England. 12mo. London, 1862.
- M'Leod, Alexander. View of Inspiration. 12mo. Glasgow, 1827.
- Moore, James Lovell. Inspiration of the New Testament. 8vo. London, 1798.
- Morell, J. D. The Philosophy of Religion. 12mo, pp. 359. New York, 1849. (Chapter vi treats of inspiration.)
- Noble, S. Plenary Inspiration of the Scriptures Asserted. 8vo. London, 1856.
- Owen, John. The Divine Original and Plenary Inspiration of Scripture. Works, vol. ix. Philadelphia, 1871.
- Rennell, Thomas. Proofs of Inspiration; or, Grounds of Distinction between the New Testament and the Apocryphal New Testament. 8vo. London, 1822.
- Rowe, C. A. The Nature and Extent of Divine Inspiration. 8vo, pp. 439. London, 1864.
- Ryle, John Charles. Bible Inspiration. Its Reality and Nature. 2d ed. London, 1883.
- Smith, J. A. The Spirit in the Word; or, Letters to a Bible Class on the Canon of Scripture and its Interpretation. 16mo. Chicago, 1885.
- Spring, G. The Bible not of Man; Divine Origin of Scripture drawn from the Scriptures themselves. 12mo. New York, 1847.
- Warington, George. The Inspiration of Scripture; its Limits and Effects. 16mo, pp. 284. London, 1867.
- Whytehead, Robert. The Warrant of Faith; or, a Hand-Book to the Canon and Inspiration of the Scriptures. 12mo. London, 1854.
- Woods, Leonard. Lectures on the Inspiration of the Scriptures. 12mo. Andover, 1829.
- Wordsworth, Christopher. On the Inspiration of Scripture; or, the Canon of the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha. 8vo, pp. 447. London, 1851.

SECTION XIX.

EXEGESIS.

Exegesis, as an art product, accomplishes that for which herme-Definition of neutics, the theory, lays down the rules, and toward exegesis. which the other auxiliary sciences direct their efforts, namely, the exposition of holy Scriptures, based on comprehension of the languages and antiquities involved.

Reference must be made for the sake of clearness to the terms in common use, though in this as in many other instances the usage is arbitrary. The words ἐρμηνεία and ἐξηγήσεις have at bottom the same meaning; but exegesis has come to denote the Distinguished action of the expositor himself, and hermeneutics the from herme- theory of the art of exposition.
 neutics.

In the broad sense of the term, exegesis includes both the inter-Includes both pretation and the explication of Scripture. The former interpretation and explication. of these confines its endeavors solely to the apprehending of facts narrated by an author, or of doctrines presented by him, in a purely objective light; while the latter brings them into relation with other facts or doctrines, or possibly with the judgment of the expositor himself with respect to the facts as stated, or the doctrines as presented. Mere interpretation will, accordingly, be less susceptible to influence from the individual views of the expositor than explication, which is more open to the infusion of elements derived from his subjectivity. The former corresponds to translation, and is its authentication; the latter finds its expression in paraphrases.

We follow the accepted usage, though it might well be reversed, since the expositor in fact does nothing more than simply explain the meaning and throw light upon what is dark, while the interpreter still further subdivides and spreads out the matter that has been explained.¹ Thus it is said of a preacher that he knows how to interpret a text when he not only clears up what is dark to the mind, but when he at the same time develops in every direction what has been made plain, for the purpose of a fuller understanding of it. In the terminology of the science, however, the words have come to bear the above signification. The work of the inter-

¹ Comp. Eberhard, Synon. Handwörterbuch, s. v. erklären, auslegen, deuten, p. 101;
 Ast, p. 184: "To explain is to develop and lay down the meaning; for explanation presumes understanding and rests upon it, since only what has been rightly conceived and comprehended, what is understood, can be imparted and explained as such to others."

pres is ended when the author's meaning has been simply stated,¹ e. g., when it has been shown that he records a miracle, or that he teaches a certain doctrine. The commentator, however, goes further, seeking to understand how the author came to narrate and teach as he does. He compares him with himself, with his contemporaries, with the spirit of the time in which he lived (historical, as contrasted with merely grammatical exposition), and he finally brings practically what he has ascertained into connexion with the sum total of the facts possessed. This will indicate the extent to which it is possible to speak of pure objectivity in connection with exegesis. Interpretation must certainly remain independent of every existing dogmatical system,² and it has become increasingly so in recent times. Rationalism especially has ceased to dispose of miracles, by perverting them, in the way of an exegesis framed to favor its system.

The functions of the interpreter and of the commentator distinguished.

Interpretation should be independent of dogmatical systems.

It would even appear that the negative tendency of the present day finds, in connection with its so-called avoidance of predisposition, a special pleasure in placing a greater burden in this respect on the biblical writers than is admitted to belong to them by an unprejudiced exegesis, in order, however, it must be admitted, to afterward throw overboard the whole, as being without substance and meaning. But this very absence of predisposition is governed by a prejudice, that of "modern culture," and this has its influence upon exposition, even though the interpretation may not be affected thereby. Instead of quietly, and with unbiassed spirit, entering upon the subject in hand, the exposition assumes a hostile attitude toward the writer at the beginning, and treats him with injustice. The school which occupies the purely grammatical and historical point of observation, and abstains from judging at all, avoids such impassioned courses, and its position is certainly more worthy of respect

The so-called avoidance of "predisposition" a prejudice.

¹ On the distinction between sense, signification, and understanding, see Schleiermacher, Hermeneutik, p. 41.

² "To ascertain the contents of Scripture in obedience to the accepted views of the Church remains, despite all exceptions and provisos, a dishonest procedure from the outset, by which we have before we seek, and find what we already have."—Meyer, preface to Krit.-exeget. Handb., 2 ed., p. 12, sq. "Seek to discover the real meaning of your author by the use of all proper means at your command; lend him nothing that is yours, but take nothing from what is his. Never insist upon what he should say, but never be alarmed at what he does say."—Rückert (see Rheinwald, Report, 1839, 5. p. 97). Comp. Kling in Stud. u. Krit., 1839. Bengel cries to the expositor of the Scriptures, in similar language, "Non timide, non temere," and adds the counsel, "Te totum applica ad textum et totum textum applica ad te."

in both a moral and a scientific light. But is it satisfactory?

A religious disposition essential to the right interpretation of the Bible.

Does not the ultimate and really scientific profit consist in transforming what learned industry has discovered into a possession of the mind? Why concern myself about an author who is nothing to me, and who confers nothing upon me, and with whom I am not inwardly conscious of being in any wise connected? As only a poetic intellect is capable of interpreting a poet, so is a religious disposition the only one that can apprehend and understand a religious writer, or, more particularly, only a Christian intellect can correctly render a Christian author. And as the letters of an absent member of the family are understood in their profoundest meaning at home, while the stranger finds in them a mere surface matter too tedious for consideration, so is it with these writings of the gift conferred by love divine.¹ The exegete will

The spirit of the true exegete.

accordingly reveal the bottom of his heart in the manner in which he explains his author, and his subjectivity will be a disturbing element so long only as it remains out of harmony with the key tone of the spirit of the Bible.² This does not imply that the exegete must, from the first, make an unconditional surrender of his own thoughts. He should retain sufficient mental independence and freedom from prejudice to properly estimate the personal peculiarities of his author, and whatever may belong to his individual culture, his relations to his age, etc. He may, in one respect, occupy a position above his author, while in another he must be subordinate to him. Here, too, a living interaction, a sympathetic yielding to the spirit of the work, and an incorporation of the results of the inquiry with what before existed, are needed to further the exposition.¹ It is apparent, as a general truth, that exegesis is not finished at one effort. He who reads an author for the tenth time, and the hundredth time, will explain him otherwise than he who reads but once.² Such multifarious intellectual activity in the work of exegesis, such harmonizing of the grammatico-historical with the higher, ideal, and sympathetically religious interpretation, has been termed panharmonic interpretation, (Germarus), and subsequently the name pneumatic has come into favor (Beck). The word is of no importance; but our age largely feels and acknowledges that while the human standpoint must be retained in the explaining of the human element in the Scriptures (which will ever be the necessary barrier against all the perversions of superstition), the Holy Spirit himself must in the final instance be the real interpreter of his words, the angelus interpres who opens for us the meaning of the Bible.³

¹ "Verily I say unto you that Lord Byron would, with a scanty knowledge of the Hebrew language, have given a rendering of the chief penitential psalm of David (the fifty-first) superior to that of many of the most celebrated grammarians." Umbreit (Review of Tholuck's Comment zu d. Psalmen, in Stud. u. Krit., 1845, 1, p. 177).

² "He who lacks a profound apprehension and a living conception must, with every degree of technical skill for interpreting Nature or the holy Scriptures of the New as well as the Old Testament that he may possess, remain a bungler who gnaws away at the shell and never penetrates to the intellectual heart in which the idea sparkles in its everlasting truth." Umbreit in Stud. u. Krit., 1832, No. 3, p. 656. Usteri (Comm. über d. Brief an d. Galater, p. vi) expresses a similar opinion: "It appears to me that the grammatico-historical principle is merely the conditio sine qua non, or the negative rule of interpretation; the positive task of the exegete seems to me to require, so to speak, that he should sink himself wholly into the spirit of the author, in order that the picture drawn in the Scripture, with its accessories of time and place, may afterward be held up before the reader's eye in the light of his researches in language and matters of fact." Comp. Billroth, Comm. zu d. Briefen an d. Corinthier, p. v.; Lücke in Stud. u. Krit., 1834, 4, pp. 769-71; Schleiermacher, Herm., p. 50; Bunsen, Gott u. d. Geschichte, p. 122, sqq.; Krauss, supra.

Complete exegesis dependent on spiritual growth.

SECTION XX.

THE APPLICATION OF EXEGESIS.

The application of the Scriptures finally should carefully be distinguished from both the interpretation and the exposition; for while it is based upon the former, it yet belongs, according to its nature, to a different department—the practical.

Scripture, when interpreted, to be practically applied.

The holy Scriptures were at first explained for devotional purposes—the Old Testament by the writers of the New, and both the New and the Old by the Church fathers, although some among the latter already began to distinguish between practical and scientific exposition. It is still the office of exegetical study to produce fruit for the benefit of the Church, of the exegesis of the schools to serve the exegesis of the pulpit, a principle often overlooked from a spirit of scientific superciliousness. But is scientific exegesis to govern itself from the Practical exegesis the result of the scientific.

¹ So Lücke also speaks of a mental disposition on the part of the exegete to immerse himself in, and to emerge from, the spirit of the work he seeks to explain Comp. Herm. Schultz, Über doppelt., Schriftsinn, (Stud. u. Krit., 1866, 1, p. 37).

² Thus Luther boasts that he had read the Bible through twice a year for several years, and that he had each time beaten off a few more fruits from its branches and twigs.

³ According to Luther (comp. Lücke's Supplement to Neander in his N. T. Hermeneutik), or, according to Flaccius, "In order that God himself should remain the supreme Lord and Judge in all controversies and debated questions." In Pelt, p. 175.

outset by the demands of the pulpit, so as to accept from the start the idea that the interpretation which will best promote the work of edification is the true one? Or is a special kind of interpretation (with Kant'), the churchly-practical (or, in his language, the moral), to be established beside the scientific in such a way that both shall remain independent of each other? Neither of these. Practical exegesis must result from scientific, and a conscientious preacher will present no interpretation to the people which cannot be scientifically justified. Such an interpretation could lay no claim to the title "moral," but would be thoroughly immoral, like every thing that is not of the truth. The preacher should, however, bring the truth of Scripture to bear in every direction upon the religious needs of the age and congregation. He should Process by which exegesis is made practical. eliminate, from the immediate surroundings in which it is found by the exegete, the passage of Scripture upon which his remarks are based, and without doing violence to its original meaning, should endeavor, now to generalize its teaching, and again to apply it to the most individual and special matters, so as to transform what is outwardly and historically given into a picture of inward states, and into an exponent of the present situation; for what was said to the Churches at Rome, Corinth, Philippi, etc., is still said by the Spirit to the Churches of to-day.

It would, however, be a serious confounding of different departments for scientific exegesis to apprehend the statements immediately in their subjective application to human conditions,' as the preacher is authorized to apprehend them, or for the preacher to timidly content himself with the most immediate and apparent meaning of the letter.¹ The scientific expositor may likewise explain the writer to the edifying of his hearers; but this is assuredly not done by entering upon edifying observations, or by constructing a patchwork of passages taken from ancient and modern ascetics. He must rather proceed by a quiet stating and unfolding of the sense of Scripture which confines itself within self-imposed limitations, and in this he resembles and excels the mathematician, who is able, by the cogency of his proofs, even to excite the feelings of persons who attentively follow his demonstration. Hints relating to the further practical development may be given in connection with scientific exegesis,² but the practical work, in the proper sense, and for homiletical purposes, belongs to practical theology. It follows, accordingly, that interpretation, exposition, and application, reach over into a further theological field, the interpretation into history, exposition into dogmatics, and application into practical theology.

¹ Religion innerhalb d. Grenzen d. blossen Vernunft, Königsb., 2 ed., 1794, p. 158, sqq.; per contra, Rosenmüller's Bemerkungen, Erl., 1794.

² This applies especially to the Old Test., where it is the task of exegesis to apprehend the writer from out of his own age, and to comprehend even the so-called Messianic sections in their immediate historical surroundings. While it furnishes the threads which lead over into the New Test., it must yet refer their connection to other branches, and never should "Old Test. exegesis in its known scientific and artistic limitations be confounded with the retrogressive Christian inquiries which have their starting-point in the New Testament," (Umbreit, supra, against v. Meyer and his school). A different view in Kurtz, Gesch. des Alten Bundes, p. 8: "The nature of prophecy is entirely misunderstood when its principal importance is found in the service it renders to Christianity—in which, of course, all prophecy comes to its fulfilment—by attesting its divine origin. Christianity would be in an unfortunate predicament, were it still unable to dispense with the attestation derived from the actual fulfilment of predictions, and it would be even worse for prophecy were it to remain without meaning and significance until hundreds or thousands of years should have passed away. Prophecy is designed—every other signification is secondary and subordinate to this—to open up the understanding of the present, its position and its duty, not only the immediate present in which it was first given, but also every subsequent present (f) to the extent to which the latter has substantially the same basis, the same needs, and the same task."

SECTION XXI.

THE METHOD OF APPLYING EXEGESIS.

In the carrying forward of exegesis it may be handled either cursorily or statedly. Both modes of instruction are to be united. The use of learned commentaries will be of real value to him only who has tried his own powers in the way of exposition; for too many aids rather confuse than guide aright, and the beginner needs to be on his guard against relying upon the authority of others as greatly as against a mistaken striving after originality. A moral and religious earnestness when approaching the holy Scriptures, and a mind decidedly devoted to the cause of the Bible and Christianity, will be the most efficient aids to preserve him from error and to secure that self-renunciation without which no work of real greatness can be accomplished.

¹ Rosenkranz, Encycl., 1 ed., p. 125: "The distinction between popular and scientific exposition lies in the reference to the original limitation of the sense. The former must be governed by the principle of treating the sense of Scripture in as fruitful and manifold a way as is admissible: it may freely make every addition to the text that it will bear, avoiding only what is strained and directly perverted. The latter, on the other hand, is to ascertain the sense of Scripture which it was originally designed to bear." Comp. Vinet, Homiletica, pp. 146, ff., who distinguishes between amplification and paraphrase, so that the former would be suitable for practical use, but not the latter. Comp., too, Hagenbach, Pref. to Festpredigten, Basle, 1830, ix-xi.

² De Wette, Prakt. Erklärung der Psalmen.

Before entering upon theology the student should have read his Bible through many times, and especially the New Testament, while the more important parts should have been perused in the original. Private reading should be also regularly continued while the course of theological study is pursued; for we are to live in the Scripture, as it were to arise and lie down in it. Thus only can we receive living impressions from it; while if it be regarded solely as the object of purely scientific inquiry it will remain external to our minds, and not be inwardly assimilated with our being. Let, furthermore, the thought be banished, that it is necessary from the beginning to intrench one's self behind a wall of commentaries. This has the appearance of greater thoroughness than is warranted by the truth, and it often becomes impossible to see the forest because of the mass of trees. It is better to practice the writing of translations of the section to be explained, and it may be well even for instructors to precede or follow their expositions with an English or Latin translation. The latter will be more suitable in proportion as the version partakes of the nature of a paraphrase, the former (i. e., the writing by the student,) as it is confined to a mere verbal rendering, which itself needs further explanation. It will be also useful to look up and compare the parallels adduced in connection with the lecture, and carefully to compare the quotations in the New Testament from the Old with the original and the LXX. before entering upon the use of commentaries. It is a grave error to suppose that the task of exegesis is confined to the selection of one from among the different versions which already exist, rather than to engaging in personal investigation and examining with an independent eye.¹

When, however, additional helps are employed it will still be advantageous to consult those chiefly which, after the manner of the scholiasts, afford grammatical and historical aid (Schoettgen, Lightfoot, Grotius, Wolf, Bengel), and only subordinately those which develop the writer's train of thought in his peculiar fashion.² The latter should form the crown of the industrious research. On the other hand, the false ambition to construct new and independent expositions will be less prevalent where the number already extant is not known (if known it could now excite nothing more than a desire to add another one to the many already in existence), and the confirmation given by an approved exegete, who is afterward consulted, to the results obtained by our own independent effort, will only serve to increase our satisfaction. This does not mean, however, that in every instance the support of some learned authority is necessary to warrant confidence in the explanation arrived at by independent effort; for we must, as Protestants, admit that new expositions, that is to say, such as are more thoroughly sustained by the language and historical data, are always possible, in proportion as philology and historical studies advance among us, although distrust of our own powers of observation, which cannot be too highly recommended, should lead us in such matters to apply the strictest and most searching tests. In this regard, too, a straightforward, simple disposition is often able to discover the best method.¹ Woe to him who converts the Bible into a medium for exhibiting his vanity! To him truth in its pureness will certainly not be disclosed, even though he should succeed in extracting some particulars which cover him with an ephemeral distinction. But blessed is the exegete by whose side, as by that of the picture of St. Matthew, the evangelist, the angel stands with a face of infantile innocence and unprejudiced acceptance of the truth!

¹ In harmony with this, Melancthon, Postille II, 626, already counsels, "Amate doctrinam et scripta Pauli et saepe legite; id magis proderit, quam si legatis magnos acervos commentariorum. Qui ordinem observat in Epistolis Pauli et saepe relegit, plus discit, quam qui multos evolvit commentarios." Gausseus, diss. 1, p. 26: "Atque illud est, quod soleo studiosis usque ad fastidium inculcare, ut ad commentarios non adeant, quin prius illis aqua haereat neque ultra possint in loci examine proprio remigio pergere."

² "Caeterum, cum commentarios dico, eos intelligo, qui scripturam brevibus ad sensum literalem accommodatis observationibus illustant; non qui occasione scrip-

SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION.

Comp. Diestel, supra.

The exposition of the Bible, as has already (sec. xx) been remarked, was at first intended to meet a practical want. It was First exposition of the Bible wholly practical. of primary importance to master the contents of the sacred books. To settle their original form, and distinguish turæ suas, quas locos communes vulgo vocant (ihre Dogmatik) in medium protrudunt, quibusque adeo libri sacri non tam sunt commentariorum argumentum, quam præjudiciorum loci quidam atque indices."—Gausseus 1, 1, p. 27.

¹ "Certe, quemadmodum vina, quæ sub primam calcationem molliter defluunt, sunt suaviora, quam quæ a torculari exprimuntur, quoniam hæc ex acino et cute uvæ aliquid sapiant, similiter salubres admodum et suaves sunt doctrinæ, quæ ex Scripturis leniter expressis emanant, nec ad controversias . . . trahuntur."—Baco Verul. de augmentis scientiar. IX, p. 488. Sam. Werenfels, in the Dissertation mentioned below, likewise warns against those who rather seek their argutielas, allegorielas, allusiunculas, etc., in the Scriptures than the direct and simple meaning. The simple lay-mind occasionally finds the true goal more readily than the vision of the learned exegete befogged with the vapors of the school.

the consciousness of the time of their origin from that of a later period was reserved to become the task of a subsequent reflective age. (Comp. Rothe, Zur Dogmatik, p. 186, sqq.) But after the Jews, particularly those of Alexandria, became acquainted with the wisdom of the Greeks, they were, above all, concerned to show that the divine, with which they believed themselves here also to be in contact, was grounded in the Scriptures, and to discover the germs of a profound gnosis beneath its humble guise; on the other hand, their Palestinian brethren held fast to the historical interpretation. The former tendency led to the allegorical method,¹ which must be regarded as a stage in the natural development of the history of Bible exposition, rather than as the arbitrary invention of certain persons.

Rise of the allegorical method of interpretation.

When Christianity had been introduced into the world, and the prophecies and expectations of former times had thus been realized, it was natural that an age, yet wholly under the influence of the mighty impression which the appearance of Christ had left behind, should find the Messiah everywhere in the Old Testament, and should discover traces of his being in the most incidental matters. "The brighter and more glorious the light which Jesus shed over the Old Testament at large and as a whole, for the Israelites who had learned to believe in him, the more confident were they that every particular in the sacred book, however dark, would receive light from the same source." (Rothe, p. 196.) Every red cord became a type of the blood that was shed, and every thing that even remotely resembled a cross was held to prefigure the cross on Calvary. (Comp. Barnabas, Justin Martyr, et al.) This was the case even before Origen († A. D. 254). He was not the discoverer of the allegorical interpretation, but the first among Christians² to raise it into a canon, and to assign to it a place approved by science, beside the grammatico-historical method. The contrast between the allegorical and the grammatico-historical methods now became apparent, and Origen sought to harmonize this contrast. He taught a threefold sense in

¹ The word ἀλληγορεῖν, from ἄλλο and ἀγορεύειν, is found in Gal. iv, 24 (part): "The most hurtful diversion in this direction is the cabalistic interpretation, which, in the effort to find every thing in every thing, turns to particular elements and their signs." Schleiermacher, Hermeneutik, p. 28. It likewise originated among the Jews after the captivity (the book Sohar), and passed over from them to the Christian world. Comp. Z. Frankel, Einfluss d. Palæst. Exegese auf d. Alexandr. Hermeneutik, Leips. 1861, and Hirschfeld, Die Halachische Exegese, Berl. 1840; Die Hagedische Exegese, Berl., 1847.

² Among the Jews, Philo had previously made a conscious distinction between the esoteric and the exoteric sense.

Scripture (answering to the body, soul, and spirit in man)—the literal, the moral, and the spiritual. Whatever cannot be justified by the letter, as derogatory to the honor of God and the Bible, is to be explained allegorically. The anagogical and the tropological are related to the allegorical (with reference to which further particulars are given in connection with the history of hermeneutics). This Origenistic-Alexandrian hermeneutics was opposed in the fifth century, however, by the more sober school of Antioch, whose representatives, as opposed to the fanatical Cyril, were Diodorus of Tarsus, Theodore of Mopsuestia, John Chrysostom, Ephraem Syrus, and Theodoret.

Origen's three-fold sense of Scripture.

The school of Antioch.

From this time the historico-theological method, which had been employed at an earlier date, however, was cultivated side by side with the allegorical. Among Latin teachers Jerome and Ambrose were distinguished in exegesis; while Augustine owed his fame less to exegetical learning and precision than to the originality and depth of intellect with which he dominated his age. He, too, was partial to allegorizing, and held to a fourfold sense in Scripture. Gregory the Great († 604), the Bishop of Rome, was allied to Augustine. Independent research now gradually began to give way before the authority of the Church, and in proportion as people became accustomed to believe the Gospel through the Church, the traditional and churchly method of interpretation became general, and must be considered another stage in the development. Nearly all the expositors during the Middle Ages held to this method. Collections of what good things and less good things had been said by the Church teachers about the Scriptures (σείραι, catenae patrum)¹ constituted the generally accepted authorities; and, besides these, the mystics especially practised a fanciful allegorizing.

The exegesis of the Latin Fathers.

Middle Age exegesis.

The neglect of the study of the Bible and ignorance of the original languages deprived scholastic theology of an assured Scriptural basis. Importance attaches, however, to the Jewish Old Testament expositors in the Middle Ages, especially after the eleventh century, e. g., the rabbins Jarchi, Aben Ezra, David and Moses Kimchi, Maimonides (R. Mose Ben Maimon, abbreviated Rambam), and others. Christian exegesis likewise began to appear after the study of Hebrew had been renewed among Christians through the influence of Nicholas Lyra († 1340), Laurentius Valla († 1457), and Reuchlin († 1522), and after the spread of Greek literature consequent upon the capture of Constantinople (1453). The stability of a traditional and Church interpretation, and the arbitrariness of a fanciful allegorical method, were again threatened by a sober, tasteful, and philologically grounded exegesis as developed by Erasmus, which was adopted by the more intelligent minds of the century;

¹ On these exegetical collections see Herzog, Encykl., iv, p. 282, sqq.

Effect of the Reformation
on exegesis.

but a still broader range was given to exegesis by the Reformation. Luther directed attention to the deeper elements of the Scriptures, and prepared the way for the spiritualizing (pneumatic) mode of interpretation. His position as a translator of the Bible for the people is unique (Comp. note 9, infra.—Drs. M. Lutheri exegetica opera latina, curaverunt J. M. Irmischer et Hy. Schmidt, vol. xxii, Francof., 1860); but it should be remembered that he was aided by the more exact linguistic learning of Melancthon and others. Zwingle, whose classical training was of great value to him, proceeded with a more measured pace; but Calvin (see Tholuck, Verm. Schriften, part 2) was distinguished above all others for exegetical keenness and precision. His pupil, Theodore Beza, proved a not unworthy associate in this work.

The study of the Holy Scriptures was prosecuted, upon the whole, more generally in the Reformed Church than in the Lutheran, the latter giving larger attention to systematic theology; and Lutheran exegesis, moreover, again became dependent on the confessional teaching of the Church, thereby contradicting the principles of Protestantism; "for it is a fundamental proposition in the writings of the reformers that the interpretation of the Scriptures is independent of the dictum of the Church and of all human authority whatsoever." (Clausen, Hermeneutik, p. 230.) The orthodoxy of the Reformed Churches likewise was exposed to the danger of establishing a settled exegesis; but the Remonstrants (Arminians) who had come out of the Reformed Church, and among them especially Grotius, advocated the grammatico-historical principle, though often with a regard for facts that was but one sided. In opposition to that principle Cocceius defended the doctrine that a pregnant meaning lies everywhere in the Scriptures, which was applied with special fulness in the search for Messianic features in the Old Testament. Sam. Werenfels, on the other hand, developed very sound hermeneutical principles in his work De scopo interpretis, printed in the Opuscula. Ernesti († 1781) is regarded in the German Lutheran Church as the restorer of a grammatical and historical method of interpretation, independent of dogmatics. The adher-ents of this method continually increased in numbers; it recommended itself to the spirit of the times, which yearned for emancipation from the yoke of orthodoxy. That spirit itself, however, succeeded only too speedily in enlisting the services of exegesis in its own behalf, and proceeded to vaunt its expositions as timely in proportion to their shallowness. Neology

The Remonstrants—Grotius.

Ernesti, the restorer of sound exegesis.

Rise of neological exegesis.

—whether because it retained a remnant of respect for the authority of Holy Scripture, or because of fraudulent intentions—had long accustomed itself to find its system taught in the Bible. Miracles and mysteries, a number of which had been unnecessarily explained into the Bible by a former age, were now explained out of it and interpreted away by every conceivable art, often in opposition to the most explicit language. The rationalists were not alone liable to this charge, however, for the supernaturalists, acting in the interests of apologetics, understood how to fit much of the Bible to their views, and in point of fact taught the rationalists this lesson (false and impracticable attempts at constructing harmonies).

Kant endeavoured to restrain such indecorous behaviour by severing scientific (theological) from practical (ethical) interpretation. The Church, however, could not long support this unnatural separation, which, as has already been observed, even depends upon an immoral principle. The age strove to effect a reconciliation between science and life. The rationalistic school was purged by the influence of thorough exegetical studies, and the loose methods of procedure in vogue were ended by a thorough philological discipline, such as De Wette and Gesenius introduced in the Old Testament field, and Winer in the New. The conflict of parties was relegated to the domain of dogmatics and the philosophy of religion, and the territory occupied by exegesis became neutral ground. The neutrality could not, however, be observed with entire strictness, for reasons developed above. The orthodox party again directed attention to the underlying sense of Scripture, which was not, however, to be ascertained by the setting aside of grammatical and historical facts, but by ascending to a loftier and more far reaching point of view. A glance over the exegetical literature of the most recent decades will, in fact, reveal a gratifying progress in this regard, even though there has been no lack of errors and deplorable lapses into the devious courses of former times.¹

Kant's separation of dogmatic from ethical exegesis.

Rise of the school of De Wette and Gesenius.

¹See articles on Interpretation in Kitto's Cyclopædia, and the Biblical and Theological Cyclopædia of M'Clintock and Strong; also title "Interpretation," in Index of the Bibliotheca Sacra, p. 116.

COMMENTARIES.

ON THE ENTIRE BIBLE.

- * Ch. K. Josias Bunsen, Vollständiges Bibelwerk für die Gemeinde (Part 1. The Bible, translation and exposition; Part 2. Bible records; Part 3. History of the Bible). 9 vols. Lpz., 1858-70. (Comp. Bähring, Bunsen's Bibelwerk nach seiner Bedeutung für die Gegenwart beleuchtet, Lpz., 1861). 2d ed. Lpz., 1870.

α. ON THE OLD TESTAMENT.

- * Kurzgefasstes exeget. Handb. zum A. T. Lpz., 1841 ff. (No. 1. the Minor Prophets, by Hitzig. 2d ed., 1852. 3d ed., 1863. 2. Job, by Hirzel. 2d ed., by Olshausen, 1852. 3d ed., by Dillmann, 1869. 3. Jeremiah, by Hitzig, 1841? 2d ed., 1866. 4. Samuel, by Thenius, 1842. 2d ed., 1864. 5. The Prophet Isaiah, by Knobel, 3d ed., 1861. 4th ed., by L. Diestel, 1872. 6. Judges and Ruth, by Bertheau, 1845. 7. Proverbs, by Bertheau, and Ecclesiastes, by Hitzig, 1847. 8. Ezechiel, by Hitzig, 1847. 9. Kings, by Thenius, 1849. 2d ed., 1873. 10. Daniel, by Hitzig, 1850. 11. Genesis, by Knobel, 2d ed., 1860. 3d ed., by Dillmann, 1875. 12. Exodus and Leviticus, by Knobel, 1857. 13. Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua, by Knobel, 1861. 14. Psalms, by Olshausen, 1853. 15. Chronicles, by Bertheau, 1854, 2 Aufl., 1873. 16. Solomon's Song, by Hitzig, and Lamentations, by Thenius, 1855. 17. Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, by Bertheau, 1862.)
- C. F. Keil and Fz. Delitzsch, Biblischer Commentar über das A. T. I, II, 3; III, 1, 4; IV, 1, 2. Lpz., 1863-1873.

β. ON THE NEW TESTAMENT.

- J. Ch. Wolf, Curae philologicae et criticae. Hamb., 1741. 5 voll. 4. (Hamb. 1725-41.) Basel, 1741. 5 vols.
- * J. A. Bengel, Gnomon N. T. Tub., 1742-49, 1773. 4. 3d ed., by Steudel. Tüb., 1855. Stuttg., 1860. 2 Bde.
- J. G. Rosenmueller, Scholia in N. T. Norimb., Ed. 1-4, 1777-94; ed. 5, 1801-7, 5 voll.; ed. 6, 1815-31.
- J. J. Stoltz, Erläuterungen zum N. T. für geübte und gebildete Leser. Hannov. Nos. 1-4. 1st and 2d eds., 1796-1800. 3d ed., 1806-9. Nos. 5, 6. (1799-1801.) 1802.
- J. B. Koppe, N. T. graece, perpetua annotatione illustratum. Gott., 1810-32, 1809-28. Various editions, 10 vols. The whole unfinished, confused in arrangement, and by different authors: Heinrichs, Ammon, Pott, Tychsen.
- H. Olshausen, biblischer Commentar über sämtliche Schriften des N. T. Fortgea., von Ebrard und Wiesinger. Königsb., 1830-62. I, II, 1-3; III, IV, V, 1, 2; VI, 1-4; and VII.
- * Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handb. zum N. T. von W. M. L. de Wette. Lpz., 1836-48. 3 Bde. in 11 parts.
- * H. A. W. Meyer, Das N. T. griechisch, nach den besten Hülfsmitteln krit. revidirt, mit einer neuen deutschen Uebersetzung u. einem krit. u. exeget. Commentar. Gött., 1832. ff.
- C. G. Theile, Commentarius in N. T. (vol. xviii: Epist. Jacobi; vol. xiii: [auct. Hölemann] Epist. ad Phillipp.) Lips., 1833, 1839.
- J. Ch. K. v. Hofmann, Die h. Schrift des N. T. zusammenhängend untersucht. Nördlingen, 1862 ff.

Y. COMMENTARIES ON PARTICULAR BOOKS (selected).

1. Old Testament.

1) Historical Books.

Pentateuch: Vater (1802-5. 3 Bde.). Ranke (1834-40. 2 Bde.). Herheimer (1853-54. 3d ed., 1865). Baumgarten (1843, 2 vols.). Stähelin (1843). Hengstenberg, die Authentie des Pent. (2 vols., 1836, 1839). Graf, die Geschichtl. Bücher des A. T. (1866). De Lagarde, Materialien zur Krit. u. Geschichte d. Pent. (1867). Nöldeke, Untersuchung zur Krit. des A. T. (1869). Kayser, das vorrexil. Buch der Urgeschichte Israels (1874). Wellhausen, die Composition des Hexateuchs, (Jahrbuch. für deutsche Theol., 1876). A. Kuenen, (in the holl. theol. Tijdschr., 1877). Ryssel (1878). König (1879).

Genesis: Schumann (1829). v. Bohlen (1835). Theile (1836). Critical: Hengstenberg, (die Echtheit des Pent., 1836-39). Bleek, v. Bohlen, (in the Commentary). Bertheau, (die 7 Gruppen mos. Gesetze, Gött., 1840). Stähelin (1830, 1843). Hupfeld (1853). Böhmer (1860-62). Schrader, Studien zur Krit. u. erkl. der bibl. Urgesch. (1863). Ewald (in the Einl. zur Gesch. des Volks Israel). Lengerke (in Kenaan). Calvin (ed. Hengstenberg, 1838). * Tuch (1838, 2d ed., by Arnold and Merx, 1871). Kurtz (1846). Sörensen (1851). * Knobel (1852; 2d ed., 1860). * Delitzsch (1851; 2d ed., 1853; 4th ed., 1872). Hupfeld (1853); in Lange's Bibelwerk (1864).

Deuteronomy: Schultz (1859). Kleinert (1872). Riehm, die Gesetzg. Mosis im Lande, Moab (1854). Joshua: Maurer (1834). Keil (1847). Critical: Hauff (1843). Judges: Studer (1835). Bertheau (1845). Bachmann (1866). Ruth: Maurer, Bertheau (1845). 1st and 2d Samuel: Maurer and * Thenius (1842). Kings: Thenius (1849).

Chronicles. Critical: Gramberg (1823). † Movers (1834). Bertheau (1854). De Wette, Beitr. zur Einl., 1., 1806; Keil, 1833; Movers, 1834.

On the remaining historical books comp. Winer, Handbuch der Lit., p. 202, und Pelt, p. 196.

Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther: Neteler (1877). Esther: Cassel (1878).

2) Poetical Books.

Luther's Psalmenauslegung. A Commentary on the poetical books of the O. T., by Eberle. Stuttg., 1874-79. 3 vols.

* Ewald, Die poetischen Bücher des A. T. 4 Bde. (Part 1: General matter; new ed., 1866. Part 2: Psalms; 3d ed., 1866. Part 3: Job; 2d ed., 1867. Part 4: Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and additions). Gött., 1839. (New ed. entitled "Die Dichter des alten Bundes." Gött., 1854. 2d ed., 1866-67).

Psalmen: Lutheri scholiae ineditae ed. Seidemann (1876). De Wette (4th ed., 1836, with translation; 5th ed., by G. Baur, 1856). Hitzig (1835; Psalmen übersetzt und ausgelegt; 2 Bde., Leipzig, 1863-65). Köster (1837). Tholuck (1843; 2d ed., 1873). Vaihinger (1845; 2. Aufl., 1856). Lengerke (1847). Aigner (1805). Hengstenberg (2. Aufl., 1850-52, 4 Bde.). Ewald (see above). Olshausen (1853). Hupfeld (4 Bde., 1855-62; 2d ed., 1867-71, von Riehm). De Mestral (Tom. I, French, 1856). † Reinke (1857; 1. Die messianischen Psalmen; 2. 1858). Delitzsch (1859-60, 2 Bde.; new ed., 1867). Böhl (12 messianische Psalmen, 1862).

Job: Schultens (1737, 1748). Umbreit (2d ed., 1832). Hitzig (1874). Zschokke (1875). Ewald (see above). Practical: Tholuck (1843). * Hirzel (1839; 2d ed., by Olshausen, 1852). Vaihinger (1842; 2d ed., 1856). Stickel (1842). Hosse (1859).

* Schlottmann (1851). Magnus (1852). Hahn (1851). Metrical version, by Spiess

- (1852). Hengstenberg (1856; a discourse). Elster (1858). Rohling (1879). Ebrard (1858). Berkholz (1859). * Merx (1871). Zachokke (1875). Hansen (1877). Kemmler (1877). Rogge, (1877). Critical: Budde (1876). Proverbs: Kleuker (Salom. Schriften, 1777-85; 3 Bde.). Umbreit (1826). Schultze (1748). Gramberg (1828). Löwenstein (1838). Stier (1849-50). Bertheau (1847). Delitzsch (1873). Ecclesiastes: Umbreit (1818). Kleinert (1864). Bloch (1872). Veith (Koh. u. Hohes Lied, 1877). Kaiser (1823). Knobel (1836). Ewald (see above). Hitzig (1847). Elster (1855). Wangemann (1857; practical). Hengstenberg (1859). Hahn (1860). Canticles: Hengstenberg (1853). Meyer (1854). Friedrich (1855). Hitzig (1855). Hölemann ("Die Krone des hohen Liedes," 1859). * Translation, by Th. Hirzel (1840-50). E. Renan (Par., 1860). Friedlander (1867). Altschul (1874). Sachse (1875). Schäfer (1876). Kämpf (1877).

3) Prophetical Books.

- Translations and introduction by Eichhorn (1816-19, 3. Bde.) by Fr. Rückert (1831, 1. Bd.). * Ewald, Die Propheten des A. T. (1840-41, 2. Bde. 2d ed., 3 vols., 1867). * Hitzig, Die Prophetischen Bücher des A. T. (Translation.) Lpz., 1854. * Praktischer Commentar über die Propheten d. A. T., by Umbreit. (1st vol., Iesaiah, 1842; 2d ed., 1846. 2d vol., Jeremiah, 1842. 3d vol., Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets (To Jes., Jer., Ez.), by Le Hir. (Par., 1877). Iesaiah: Gesenius (1821; trans. 2d ed. 1829). Hitzig (1833). Knobel (2d ed., 1854; 3d ed., 1861). Hendewerk (1838-43, 2 vol). Drechsler (3 parts, 1844-57; Vol. II, 2; and III, by Delitzsch and Hahn; vol. I in 2d ed., 1865). Critical: Möller (1825). Kleinert (1829, against Gesenius). Hengstenberg (Christologie des A. T. comp. lit. on § 62). Stähelin (Stud. und Krit., 1831, 3). Hävernick (in Introduction). Caspari (jesaianische Studien, in the Zeitschr. of Rudelbach and Guericke, 1848, 2.) † Schegg (1850, 2 Bde.). Meier (1st Part, 1850). Stier (Jes. 44-66, kein Pseudo-Jes., 1850-51). Eljakim (Visions d'Esaié, 1854; French metrical version, with exposition). † G. Mayer (1860). Delitsch (1866; 2d ed., 1869). Jeremiah: Hitzig (1841; 2d Aufl., 1866). * Umbreit (Prakt. Commentar, see above). Nägelsbach (1850). Neumann (2 Bde., 1856-58). Graf (1862 and 1863). Scholz (der masor. Text u. die LXX-Übersetzung des B. Jer., 1875). Lamentations: Hetzel (1854). Thenius (1855). Engelhardt (1867). Gerlach (1868). Ezekiel: Hävernick (1843). Hitzig (1847). Kliefoth (1864-65). Hengstenberg (1867). Daniel: Bertholdt (1806-8, 2 Bde.). Hävernick (1832). Lengerke (1835). Hitzig (1850). Auberlen (1854, having reference to the Apocalypse; 2d ed., 1856). Kranichfeld (1868). Füller (1868). Mayer (1866). Kliefoth (1868). Critical: Zündel (1861). Hilgenfeld (Ezra und Daniel, 1868). Caspari (1869). Rohling (1877). Doprez (Dan. and John, 1879). The Minor Prophets: * Theiner (1828). † Ackerman (1839). Hitzig (2d ed., 1852; 3d ed., 1863). † Schegg (1854). Schröder (Part I, 1829). Schlier (2d ed., 1876). Hosea: Böckel (1807). Stuck (1828). Krappe (1836). De Wette (Stud. und Krit., 1832, 4). Simson (1851). Kurtz (über Hos. I-III, 1859). Wünsche (1867-8). Joel: Credner (1831). Meier (1841). Wünsche (1872). Karle (1877). Merx (1879). Amos: Vater (1810). G. Baur (1847). Obadiah: Hendewerk (1836). Caspari (1842). Jonah: Krahmer (1839). Jäger (1840). Kaulen (1862). Micah: Caspari (1852). Reinke (1874). Nahum: Höleman (1842). Strauss (1853). Habakkuk: Baumlein (1840). Delitzsch (1854). † Gumpach (1860). Reinke (1870). Haggai: Scheibel (1822). Köhler (1860). Reinke (1868). Zechariah: Baumgarten ("Nachtgesichte," 1854-55; new ed., 1858). Neumann (1860). Kliefoth (1862). Bradenkamp (1879). Critical: Ortenberg (1859). Malachi: † Reinke (1856). Köhler (1865).

2. New Testament.

1) Historical Books (Gospels and Acts of the Apostles).

- Ewald, Die drei ersten Evangelien, übersetzt und erklärt. Gött., 1850. New ed. entitled: Die drei ersten Evangelien und die Apostelgeschichte, 2 vols., 1871-2.
- Baumgarten-Crusius, Exeget. Schriften zum N. T. Part I: Matth., Mark, Luc; published by Otto, Jena, (1844).
- * Fr. Bleek, Synoptische Erklärung der drei ersten Evangelien, publ. by Heinr. Holtzmann, Lpz., 1862, 2 vols.
- Scholten, Das älteste Evangelium. Kritische Untersuchung, etc., der Evangelien nach Matthäus und Marcus. Transl. from the Dutch. Elberfeld, 1869.
- K. Wieseler, Beitr. zur richt. Würdig der Evv. und der evang. Geschichte. Gotha (1869).
- Matthew (comp. above): † Mayer (1818). † Gratz (1821, 1823). * Baumgarten-Crusius (publ. by Otto, 1844). Critical: Sieffert (1832). Klenert (1832). Olshausen (1835; new ed. by Ebrard, 1858). Näbe (1837). Asmann (1874). B. Weiss (Matth. u. Lucasparal, 1876). Wiehelhaus (publ. by Zahn, 1876). Keil (1877). Zittel (Matth. u. Marc., 1880). Pract.: Dieffenbach (1876). Sommer (1877), and others. Comp. Baur, über die sämtlichen Evangelien. Tüb., 1847. Wilke, der Urevangelist. Lpz., 1838. G. Müller, die Entst. der 4 Evv. u. der Br. des Ap. Paulus. 2d ed., Berlin, 1877. G. Meyer, la question synoptique. Par., 1878. Pierre Victor, les evangiles et l'histoire. Paris, 1879.
- Mark: Keil (Mark u. Luc., 1879). Critical: Saunier (1825). Knobel (1831). Wilke (1837). Hilgenfeld (1850). Baur (1851). Klostermann (1867). † Schegg (2 Bde., 1869-70). Volkmar (1870). Weiss (1872).
- Luke: Bornemann (Scholia, 1830). Critical: Schleiermacher (1817, and in Sämtlichen Werken), and in opposition, H. Planck (1819), † Schegg (3 Bde., 1861-65). Godet (French, 1871; German, 1862). Critical: Scholten (Het Paulinisch evangelie. Leiden, 1870).
- John: * Lücke (Commentar über die Schriften des Johannes; the Gospels in vols. 1 and 2; Epistles, vol. 3; 3d ed., 1856; Apokalypse, Introd., vol. 4; 1, new ed., 1851-52). Tholuck (7th ed., 1857). Baumgarten-Crusius (Theol. Auslegung der Johann. Schriften, 1 Bd., Evang. Johann., 1843). † Klee (1829). Herwerden (Holland, 1851). Luthardt (1852 f., 2 parts; 2d ed., 1875). Hengstenberg (1861 f., 2 parts). Ewald (1861 ff., 3 vols.) Baumlein (1863). Godet (French, 1864 f., 2 vols.; 2d ed., 1876 f.; German, 1869; 2d ed., 1876-78). † Haneberg (publ. by Schegg, 1878).
- Acts of the Apostles: Heinrichs (N. T. Koppl., vol. III). Hildebrand (1824). Bornemann (1848). Beelen (3 Tom., Lovan, 1850 f.). Stern (1872). Andreä (1876 f., 2 parts). Schneckenburger (1841). Schwanbeck (1847). Baumgarten (1851-52, 2 Bde., 2d ed., 1859). Lekebusch (1854). Zeller (1854). Trip (1866). † König (1867). Oertel (1868).

2) Pauline Epistles, and Epistle to the Hebrews.

J. Calvin, Commentarii in omnes Pauli Ap. epp. atque in ep. ad Hebraeos, ad ed. R. Steph., accuratissime exscripti; ed. A. Tholuck. Hal., 1831. 2 voll.

- J. Calvin, Commentarii in epistolas N. T. catholicas, ad ed. R. Steph., accuratissime exscr.; ed. A. Tholuck. Hal., 1832.
- Baumgarten-Crusius, Exeget. Schriften zum N. T., vol. II (Rom., Gal., published by Kimmel, 1844 ff.). Vol. II, (Eph., Col., Philippians, Thess.; published by Kimmel and Schauer, 1845-48).
- Epistle to the Romans:¹¹ Tholuck (1824, 1828, 1831; 5th ed., 1856; with the resultant dispute with Fritzsche). Flatt (Tüb., 1825). † Klee (1830). Benecke (1831). Rückert (1831-39). Reiche (1833-34, 2 Bde.). Glöckler (1834). Köllner (1834). Nielsen (1841; German by Michelsen, 1834). † Stengel (publ. by Beck, 1836-46). Fritzsche (1836-43, 3 Bde.). Krehl (1845). Philippi (1848; 2d ed., 1856; 3d ed., 1866). Steinhofner (publ. by Bock, 1851). Bisping (1855). Van Hengel (1854, 1859). Umbreit (on the basis of the O. T., 1856). Th. Schott (1858). F. G. Jatho (2 Bde., 1858-59). Critical: Mangold (1866). Hebrew Version, by Delitzsch (1870). Diedrich (1873). Manoury (French; Paris, 1878). Godet (French, I, Paris, 1879). Rugge Holl., Römer und Cor., 1879).
- Epistle to the Corinthians: Neander (Ed. by Beyschlag, 1859). Burger (2d Epistle 1859-60). Comp. Bleek, in the Stud. u. Krit., 1830-33, and Goldhorn in Illgens Zeitschrift für hist. Theol. 1840-42. On the 1st and 2d Epistle: Oslander (Stuttg., 1847 u. 1858). Van Hengel (1 Cor. xv; 1851). A. Maier (1857-65). Klöppel (exeg. Krit. Untersuchung, on the 2d Epistle, 1869).
- Epistle to the Galatians: Schott (1834; with Thessalonians; see above). Fritzsche (on single passages; 1833-34). Hermann (do., 1834; comp. Schulthess, 1835). Möller (1830, Danish). † Windischmann (1844). Hilgenfeld (1851). Müller (1853, 1861). Jatho (1856). Wieseler (1859). Matthias (1865). Reithmayr (1865). Vömel (1866). Brandes (1869; New Titelausg., 1871).
- Ephesians: Harless (1834; 2d ed., 1858). Matthias (1834). Rückert (1834). Baumgarten-Crusius (1847). Stier (1848). Auszng. (1859). Schenkel (in Lange's Bibelwerk, 1862; 2d ed., 1867). Bleek (publ. by Nitzsch, 1865). Ewald (Sieben Sendschreiben des N. B., 1870). Ernst (pract., 1877). Hahn (1878). Holtzmann (critical, 1872). Koster (Holl., 1877). Luther's Exegesis, by Eberle (1878).
- Philippians: Rheinwald (1827). Flatt (Phil., Col., Thess., Philem., 1829). Matthias (1835). Van Hengel (1838). Rilliet (Genève, 1841). Hölemann (1839; comp. above). Baumgarten-Crusius (publ. by Schauer, 1848). Brückner (1848). Wiesinger (Olshausen, v, 1, 1850). Weiss (1859). Schenkel (ubi supra). Jatho (1857).
- Colossians: Junker (1828). Bähr (1833). Böhmer (Theol. Auslegung, 1835; Isagoge, 1829). Steiger (1835). Huther (1841). Dalmer (1858). Critical: Meyerhoff (1838). Schenkel, ubi supra. Bleek (publ. by F. Nitzsch, 1865). Thomasius (Practische Auslegung, 1869). Holtzmann (critical, 1872; see above to Ephesians).
- Thessalonians: Schott (comp. Galatians). Pelt (1830). Baumgarten-Crusius (see Philippians). Koch (1849). Lünemann (see above). Auberlen und Riggenbach (see above, Lange's Bibelwerk).
- Pastoral Epistles: Heydenreich (1826-28; 2 Bde.). Flatt (1837). Matthias (1840). † Mack (1836, 1841). Leo (on 1st and 2d Tim., 1837; 1850). Huther (1850). Wiesinger (1850). Ewald (Sieben Sendschreiben des N. B., 1870). Plitt (Practische Ausleg., 1872). Bahnsen (2 Tim., 1876). Beck (2 Tim.; publ. by Lindemeyer, 1879). Holtzmann (1880). Critical: Eichhorn (Einleit. ins N. T.). Schleiermacher (against the authenticity of 1 Tim., 1807; per contra: Planck, 1808, und Wegscheider, 1810). Ferd. Baur (1835; denying authenticity in general). Defenders: Baumgarten (1837), and Böttger (1838 u. 1840). Baur in reply in the Tüb. Zeitschrift. Comp. Lücke in the Stud. u. Krit., 1830; 2 S., 422.

- Philemon: Schmid (1786). Hagenbach (1829), ad fidem versionum oriental. ed. Petermann (1844). Demme (1844). Koch (1845). Wiesinger (1850). Kühne (1852 and 1856, 2 vols., Bibelstunden.) Bleek (by F. Nitzsch, 1865).
- Hebrews: Morus (1786). Storr (1789, 1809). Dav. Schulz (1818). Böhme (1825). * Bleek (1828-40, 3 Bde., by Windrath, 1868). Kuinöl (1831). Paulus (1833). Tholuck (3d ed., 1850). † Klee (1833). Stein (1833). Critical: † Stanglein (1835). Thiersch (1848). † Stengel (publ. by Beck, 1849). Ebrard (Olshausen, v, 2; 1850). Bisping (1854; 2d ed., 1864). Lünemann (1856; 2d ed., 1861; 3d ed., 1867). Delitzsch (1857). Riehm Lehrbegriff, 1858-59. Adalb. Maier (1861). Wieseler (Krit. Unters., 1861). Kluge (1863). Reuss (French, 1862). Andrea (practical, 1866). Kurtz (1869). Ewald (Hebräer und Jacobus, 1870). Stier (1842; 2 vols.). Werner (1876). Biesenthal (1878).

3) Catholic Epistles and Apocalypse.

- Augusti (Lemgo, 1801-8, 2 Bde.). † Nickel (1852). Grashof (1880). Jachmann (1838). Pott (N. T. Koppii, vol. IX).
- Ewald (Sieben Sendschreiben des Neuen Bundes. Gött., 1870. 1 and 2 Peter, Jude, Ephesians, Tim., Titus, Pastoral Epistles).
- † Bisping, Erklärung der sieben katholischen Briefe. 1871.
- Epistles of St. Peter: Steiger (1 Brief Petri, 1832). 1 and 2 Peter and Jude: Huther (1852; 2d ed., 1859; 3d ed., 1867). Critical: Mayerhoff (1835). In reply: † Windischmann (Vindiciae Petrinae, Ratisb., 1836). On 2d Ep. of Peter: Ullmann (1821). Dietlein (1856). Wiess (1856). Wiesinger (1862; in Olshausen). Schott (1 Petri, 1861; 2 Petri und Judä, 1863). Steinfass (2 Petri; 1863).
- Epistles of St. John: Lücke (3d ed., 1856, by Bertheau). Paulus (Die 3 Lehrbriefe, des Joh., 1829). Rickli (Predigten über 1 Joh.; Luz., 1828). Mayer (1851). Wolf (1851). Neander (1851). Sander (1851). Düsterdieck (1852-56). Huther (1856; 2d ed., 1861, in Meyer). Erdmann (Prima Joh. ep. argument. nex. et consil. 1855). Haupt (Der Erste Brief des Johannea, Colberg, 1869). Stockmeyer (1873). Rothe (publ. by Mühlhauser, 1878).
- Epistles of James to Jude: Herder (Briefe zweener Brüder Jesu, 1774). Scharling (1841).
- James and 1 Peter: Hottinger (1825).
- James: Schulthess (1825). Gebser (1828). Schneckenburger (1832). Theile (1833). Kern (1838). Jacobi (Predigten, Berl., 1835). Wiesinger (1854, in Olshausen). Huther (see above). Wold. Schmidt (Lehrgehalt, 1869). Blom (De Brief van Jacobus, critical, Dort., 1869). Ewald (Hebräer u. Jacobus, 1870). Weiffenbach (über Jac. ii, 14-26; Giessen, 1871).
- Jude: Stier (1850). Huther (see s. v. Epistles of Peter). Arnaud (1851). † Rampf (1854).
- Apokalypse: Tinius (1839). De Wette (1848; 2d ed., 1854; 3d ed., 1862). Hengstenberg (1849-51, 2 Bde.; 2d ed., 1861). Dressel (1850). Holzhauser (1850). Stern (1851). Ebrard (1858). Auberlen (see Daniel). Böhmer (on the date of composition, etc., 1855). Gräber (Hist. Erklärung, 1857). Stier (Reden des Herrn Jesu, etc., 1859). Düsterdieck (see above). Bleek (publ. by Hossbach, 1862). Volkmar (1862). Kienlen (Paris, 1870). Füller (1874). Kliefoth (1874). Harms (2d ed., 1874). Burger (1877). L'Hôte (French; Paris, 1877). London, 1879). Kratzstein (pract., 1879).

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. Commentaries on the Whole Bible.

Bible Commentary, The. Explanatory and Critical. With a Revision of the Translation, by Bishops and Clergy of the Anglican Church. Edited by F. C. Cook, M.A. 10 vols., 8vo. New York, 1872-80.

Calvin, John. Commentaries. 45 vols. Edinburgh: Calvin Trans. Society.

Clarke, Adam. The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments. The Text carefully printed from the most correct Copies of the present Authorized Translation, including the Marginal Readings and Parallel Texts, with a Commentary and Critical Notes. 6 vols., 8vo, pp. 884, 829, 902, 865, 920, 1070. New York, 1832.

Jenks, Wm. The Comprehensive Commentary on the Holy Bible, containing the Text of the Authorized Version; Scott's Marginal References; Matthew Henry's Commentary, condensed, etc. 6 vols., supplement with Cruden's Concordance. Philadelphia, 1848.

Lange, John Peter. A Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, Critical, Doctrinal, and Homiletical, with special reference to Ministers and Students. Translated from the German, and Edited with Additions, Original and Selected, by Philip Schaff, in Connection with American Divines of Various Evangelical Denominations. 25 vols., 8vo. New York, 1865-78.

Poole, Matthew. Annotations upon the Whole Bible. 8 vols., royal 8vo, pp. 1030, 1008. New York, 1880.

Whedon, D. D. A Commentary on the Old and New Testaments. Intended for Popular Use. 13 vols., 12mo. New York, 1866. (Old Testament not yet complete.)

2. Commentaries on the Old Testament.

Hengstenberg, E. W. Christology of the Old Testament, and a Commentary on the Messianic Predictions. 4 vols., 8vo, pp. 523, 474, 410, 410. Edinburgh, 1854-59.

Keil, C. F., and Delitzsch, F. Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament. 25 vols., 8vo. Edinburgh, 1864-78.

3. Commentaries on the New Testament.

Alford, Henry. New Testament for English Readers; containing the Authorized Version, with a Revised English Text; Marginal References, and a Critical and Explanatory Commentary. New ed., 4 parts, or 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1868.

Barnes, Albert. Notes, Explanatory and Practical, on the New Testament, Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible Classes. 25th ed., revised and corrected. 11 vols., 12mo. New York, 1859.

Bengel, John Albert. Gnomon of the New Testament. 3d ed., 5 vols., 8vo. Edinburgh, 1860. Also 2 vols., 8vo. Philadelphia, 1874.

Doddridge, Philip. The Family Expositor; or, a Paraphrase and Version of the New Testament. 8vo, pp. 1242. London, 1829. New ed., 1862.

Meyer, Heinrich August Wilhelm. Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament. From the German, with the sanction of the Author. 12 volumes, 8vo. Edinburgh. Also, in preparation, an American edition in 8vo. New York, 1883.

Olshausen, Hermann. Biblical Commentary on the New Testament. First American ed., by A. C. Kendrick, to which is prefixed Olshausen's Proof of the Genuineness of the Writings of the New Testament, translated by D. Fosdick, Jr. 6 vols., 8vo, pp. 621, 624, 615, 586, 624, 624. New York, 1858.

Schaff, Philip. A Popular Commentary on the New Testament, by English and American Scholars of Various Evangelical Denominations. In 4 vols., royal 8vo. Profusely Illustrated. New York, 1878.

4. Commentaries on Particular Books.

I. Old Testament.

(a) HISTORICAL BOOKS.

Alford, Henry. The Book of Genesis and part of the Book of Exodus; a Revised Version, with Marginal References, and an Explanatory Commentary. 8vo. London, 1872.

Birks, T. R. The Exodus of Israel. Its Difficulties Explained and its Truth Confirmed. 8vo. 1868.

Bush, George. Notes, Critical and Practical, on the Book of Genesis. Designed as a General Help to Biblical Reading and Instruction. 26th ed., 2 vols., 12mo, pp. xxxv, 388, 444. New York, 1863. Also on Exodus, Leviticus, Joshua, Judges, and Numbers, the whole with Genesis in 8 vols.

Jacobus, M. W. Notes on the Book of Genesis. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 304, 256. New York, 1865. Also on Exodus.

Murphy, J. G. A Critical Commentary on the Book of Genesis, with a Translation. With a Preface by J. P. Thompson, D.D. 8vo, pp. 535. Andover, 1866. Also on Exodus, pp. 385, and Leviticus, pp. 318, both 8vo.

(b) THE POETICAL BOOKS.

Alexander, Joseph Addison. The Psalms, Translated and Explained. 6th ed., 3 vols., pp. xvi, 436, 349, 316. New York, 1866.

Augustine. Exposition of the Psalms. Translated, with Notes. 6 vols., 8vo. Oxford, J. H. Parker, 1848.

Barnes, Albert. Notes, Critical, Illustrative, and Practical, on the Book of Job. With a New Translation and an Introductory Dissertation. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. cxxvi, 311, 384. New York, 1857. New ed., 1881. Also on Psalms, 2 vols., 12mo.

Ewald, Heinrich. Commentary on the Book of Job. Translated from the German by J. F. Smith. London, 1882.

Ginsburg, Christian. Cohemoth, or Ecclesiastes; translated with a Commentary. 8vo. London, 1857.

Hengstenberg, E. W. Commentary on the Psalms. 4th ed., 3 vols., 8vo, pp. 539, 479, 647. Edinburgh, 1860. Also on Ecclesiastes, with Appended Treatises; 8vo, pp. 448. Edinburgh, 1860.

Hibbard, F. G. The Psalms Chronologically Arranged, with Historical Introductions. 8vo. New York, 1856.

Noyes, G. R. A Translation of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, with Explanatory Notes. 12mo. Boston, 1846. Also a volume on the Psalms. Boston, 1876.

Perowne, J. J. Stewart. The Book of Psalms; a New Translation, with Introduction and Notes, Critical and Explanatory. New ed., 2 vols., 8vo. pp. 534, 477. Andover, 1876.

Spurgeon, Chas. H. The Treasury of David: Containing Original Expositions of the Book of Psalms. 8vo, 7 vols. New York, 1880.

Stuart, Moses. A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs. 12mo, pp. 432. New York, 1852. Also on Ecclesiastes. 12mo. Andover, 1864.

Tholuck, Augustus. A Translation and Commentary of the Book of Psalms, for the Use of the Ministry and Laity of the Christian Church. Translated from the German by J. Isidor Mombert. 12mo, pp. xv, 497. Philadelphia, 1858.

Umbreit, D. F. W. New Version of the Book of Job, with Expository Notes. 2 vols, 12mo. Edinburgh, 1836-37.

(c) PROPHETICAL BOOKS.

Alexander, Joseph Addison. The Prophecies of Isaiah. Translated and Explained. 2 vols., 8vo. New York, 1847. Revised ed., pp. 507, 482. 1869.

Auberlen, Carl A. The Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation of St. John. Viewed in their Mutual Relation. 8vo. Edinburgh, 1856.

Barnes, Albert. Notes on Isaiah. 3 vols., 12mo. New York, 1881. Also on Daniel. 1 vol., 12mo. New York.

Bwald, Heinrich. Commentary on the Prophets of the Old Testament. Translated from the German by J. F. Smith. 5 vols. London, 1875-81.

Fairbairn, Patrick. Ezekiel and the Books of his Prophecy. An Exposition. 2d ed., 8vo, pp. 512. Edinburgh, 1851.

— Jonah: Life, Character, and Mission. 12mo. Edinburgh, 1849.

Hengstenberg, E. W. The Prophecies of Ezekiel, Elucidated. Translated by A. C. and J. G. Murphy. 8vo, pp. 645. Edinburgh, 1869. Also on Daniel. 1 vol., 8vo. Edinburgh.

Moore, T. V. The Prophets of the Restoration; or, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. A new Translation, with Notes. 8vo, pp. vii, 408. 1856.

Pusey, E. B. Daniel the Prophet. Nine Lectures delivered in the Divinity School of the University of Oxford. With Copious Notes. 2d ed., 8vo, pp. 755. Oxford, 1868. Also on the Minor Prophets. 4to. Oxford, 1871.

Smith, R. Payne. The Authenticity and Messianic Interpretation of the Prophecies of Isaiah Vindicated, in Sermons before the University of Oxford. 8vo. London, 1862.

Wright, C. H. H. Zechariah and his Prophecies. 12mo, pp. lxxv, 614. Bampton Lectures for 1878. London, 1874.

II. The New Testament. —

(a) GOSPELS AND ACTS.

Alexander, Joseph Addison. The Gospel According to Matthew, Explained. 12mo, pp. 460. New York, 1867. Also Mark. 1 vol., 12mo. New York, 1874.

Baumgarten, M. The Acts of the Apostles; or, The History of the Church in the Apostolic Age. From the German. 8vo, 3 vols., pp. 457, 459, 383. Edinburgh, 1854.

Gloag, P. J. A Commentary, Exegetical and Critical, on the Acts of the Apostles. 8vo, 2 vols., pp. 439, 456. Edinburgh, 1870.

Godet, F. Commentary on the Gospel of St. John, with a Critical Introduction. From the French. 3 vols., pp. 462, 413, 366. Edinburgh, 1877.

Hackett, H. B. A Commentary on the Original Text of the Acts of the Apostles. New ed., revised and greatly enlarged. 8vo, pp. 480. Boston, 1866.

Hengstenberg, E. W. Commentary on the Gospel of St. John. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 480, 541. Edinburgh, 1865.

Lisco, F. G. Parables of Jesus Explained and Illustrated. 8vo, pp. 414. Edinburgh, 1874.

Maurice, Frederick Denison. The Gospel of St. John. A Series of Discourses. 8vo. London, 1867.

- Naet, William. A Commentary on the Gospels of Matthew and Mark; Critical, Doctrinal, and Homiletical, etc. 8vo, pp. 760. Cincinnati, 1864.
- Stier, Rudolph. The Words of the Lord Jesus. Translated from the Second Revised and Enlarged German Edition. 9 vols., 8vo, pp. 425, 429, 542, 484, 521, 522, 513, 480, 505. Edinburgh, 1855-58.
- Tholuck, August. Commentary on the Gospel of John. Translated from the German by Charles P. Krauth. 8vo, pp. viii, 440. Philadelphia, 1859.
- Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount. Translated from the 4th Revised and Enlarged German Edition by R. L. Brown. 8vo, pp. 451. Edinburgh, 1869.
- Tittman, K. C. Sacred Meditations; or, an Exegetical, Critical, and Doctrinal Commentary on the Gospel of St. John. 2 vols., crown 8vo, pp. 398, 474. Biblical Cabinet. Edinburgh, 1844.
- Trench, Richard Chenevix. The Sermon on the Mount. An Exposition Drawn from the Writings of St. Augustine. With an Essay on his Merits as an Interpreter of Holy Scripture. 3d ed., enlarged. 8vo. London, 1869.
- Notes on the Parables and Miracles of our Lord. 8vo. 2 vols. 1850, 1852.
- Studies in the Gospels. 8vo, pp. vii, 326. New York, 1872.
- Van Oosterzee, J. J. John's Gospel: Apologetical Lectures. Translated with Additions by J. F. Hurst. 12mo, pp. xiv, 256. Edinburgh, 1869.
- Vaughan, Charles J. Lectures on the Acts. 8vo, 3 vols. London, 1864.

(b) THE EPISTLES AND THE APOCALYPSE.

- Adam, John. An Exposition of the Epistle of James, with an Appendix of Dissertations. 8vo, pp. 448. Edinburgh, 1867, 1871.
- Adams, Thomas. Commentary on the 2d Epistle of Peter. New ed., revised. Imperial 8vo. London, 1862.
- Calvin, John. Commentaries on the Epistle of Paul to the Romans. Translated and Edited by John Owen. 8vo, pp. 592. Edinburgh, 1849.
- Candlish, Robert. The First Epistle of John Expounded. 2 vols., 12mo. Edinburgh, 1870. Also on Ephesians. Ed. 1875.
- Chalmers, Thomas. Lectures on Romans. 4 vols., 8vo. 1827. Edinburgh, 4 vols. 12mo. 1854.
- Eadie, John. A Commentary on the Greek Text of the Epistle of Paul to the Colossians. 8vo, pp. xlii, 803. London, 1856. Also on Thessalonians, Philippians, and Ephesians.
- Ellicott, C. J. Commentary, Critical and Grammatical, on St. Paul's Epistles to the Galatians. 8vo, pp. 183. Andover, 1867. Also on Ephesians, Thessalonians, Pastoral Epistles, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. 4 vols., 8vo. Andover.
- Elliot, E. B. Horæ Apocalyptice; or, a Commentary on the Apocalypse, Critical and Historical, etc. New ed., 4 vols., 8vo. London, 1869.
- Fairbairn, Patrick. The Pastoral Epistles. Greek Text and Expository Notes. 12mo, pp. ix, 451. 1876.
- Forbes, John. Analytical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, tracing the train of thought by Parallelism. 8vo. Edinburgh, 1868.
- Gebhardt, Hermann. The Doctrine of the Apocalypse, and its Relation to the Doctrine of the Gospel and Epistles of John. Translated from the German by J. S. Banks. 2 vols., 8vo. Edinburgh.
- Haldane, Robert. Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans, with Remarks on the Commentaries of Macknight, Stuart, and Tholuck. 8vo, pp. 762. New York, 1870.

- Hergstenberg, E. W. The Revelation of St. John, Expounded for those who Search the Scriptures. Translated from the Original by Patrick Fairbairn. 2 vols., 8vo pp. 487, 508. Edinburgh, 1851-52.
- Hodge, Charles. Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. New ed., revised and in great measure rewritten. 8vo, pp. 716. Philadelphia, 1856. Also on Ephesians, 1st and 2d Corinthians. 3 vols., 12mo.
- Leighton, Robert. A Practical Commentary on the First Epistle General of Peter. With a Brief Memoir of the Author. 2 vols. Philadelphia, 1864.
- Lightfoot, J. B. St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. A Revised Text, with Introduction, Notes, and Dissertations. 2d ed., 8vo, pp. 396. Andover, 1870. Also on Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. 2 vols., 8vo. New York.
- Lillie, John. Lectures on the Epistle of Paul to the Thessalonians. 8vo, pp. 535. New York, 1860. Also on 1st and 2d Peter. 8vo, pp. xi, 536. New York, 1869.
- Lücke, Fried. Commentary on the Epistle of St. John. 12mo. Edinburgh, 1837.
- Luther, Martin. A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. 8vo, pp. 575. New York, 1845.
- Neander, Augustus. The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians. Practically Explained. Translated from the German by Mrs. H. C. Conant. 12mo, pp. xvii, 123. New York, 1851. Also on James and 1st John. 2 vols., 12mo.
- Pond, Enoch. The Seals Opened; or, The Apocalypse Explained. 12mo, pp. xi, 211. Portland, 1871.
- Robertson, Frederick W. Expository Lectures on First and Second Corinthians. 12mo. London, 1870. Also New York, 1881.
- Shedd, William G. T. A Critical and Doctrinal Commentary on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans. 8vo, pp. 439. New York, 1879.
- Stanley, A. P. The Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians, with Critical Notes and Dissertations. New ed., 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 356, 434. London, 1862. 4th ed., 1876.
- Steiger, Wilhelm. Exposition of the 1st Epistle of Peter. Translated by Dr. Fairbairn. 2 vols., 18mo. Edinburgh, 1836.
- Steward, George. The Argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews. A Posthumous Work. 8vo. Edinburgh, 1872.
- Stuart, Moses. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. 3d ed. Edited and Revised by R. D. C. Robbins. 12mo, pp. 544. Andover, 1851. New ed., 1876.
- Tholuck, Augustus. Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews. Translated by James Hamilton. 2 vols., 8vo. Edinburgh, 1842. New ed., 1869.
- Expositions of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans; with Extracts from the Exegetical Works of the Fathers and Reformers. Translated from the Original German by Robert Menzies. 2 vols., 8vo. Edinburgh, 1848.
- Trench, R. C. Commentary on the Epistles to the Seven Churches in Asia. 12mo, pp. 312. New York, 1867.
- Vaughan, C. J. Lectures on the Revelation of St. John. 4th ed., 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1875.
- St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans. The Greek Text, with English Notes. 3 ed., enlarged. Also on Philipians. 1 vol., 16mo. London, 1880.
- Wardlaw, Ralph. Lectures on Romans. 3 vols., 8vo. London, 1861.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORICAL THEOLOGY.

J. G. Dowling, Introduction to the Study of Ecclesiastical History, London, 1838; H. J. Roysaards, Oratio de theologia historica cum sacri codicis exegeti rite conjuncta, Utrecht, 1837; A. P. Stanley, Lectures on the Study of Ecclesiastical History. London, 1857.

THE scriptural material for history and doctrine, which is brought to light and restored to its pure state by exegetical theology, becomes the very foundation of historical theology. The latter includes both the biblical elements (Sacred History) and their development in the Church (Church History and History of Doctrines). It, accordingly, reaches back into exegetical theology, and forms, at the same time, the bridge for passing over into systematic theology.

In contrast with modern encyclopædists, we prefer to separate exegetical from historical theology. But this is only relative. The work of the exegete is historical in the broad sense of searching for required sources; but this is certainly a merely preliminary historical task. The exegete may be likened to the miner ^{Relations of historical and exegetical theology.} who descends the shaft in order to bring into the light of day the gold of pure scriptural truth, while the historian resembles the artificer who melts the masses down, and gives them their form and impression. The process of separating the gold from the material in which it is held, e. g., the presentation of the body of doctrine apart from the ideas of the age in which it originated, is also the work of exegesis, although this constitutes the line at which exegetical theology transfers its material to historical. This, too, is the point at which the researches coincide which have generally been prosecuted in distinct and separate fields of inquiry. The exposition of the Gospels, for instance, is an exegetical, not a historical, task, while a critical representation of the life of Christ, upon the basis of the Gospel records, is a historical work, which the exegete will regard as the point at which his labours terminate. Here, as everywhere else, the one must aid the other. Historical theology extends likewise into the pre-Christian, or Old Testament, element.

Biblical archæology is an important aid to exegesis, and, at the same time, an historical science. The exegete needs it in order to understand the Bible, for which reason some acquaintance with this branch is to be required and presupposed when he enters on his work. But inasmuch as it is the task of history to represent the life and spirit of the Israelitish people, historical theology is also entitled to lay claim to the service of archæology as a product of exegesis. Disputes of this sort about boundaries may, however, be reconciled very peaceably, and serve merely to prove the elastic nature of the organism of science.¹ And while biblical archæology, separately considered, has been treated in a former section as an exegetical aid, it will, on the other hand, be proper for us to class the biblical history as a whole—which, of course, involves the archæology as well—with the general organism of historical theology.

SECTION I.

SACRED HISTORY.

Sacred history, like the Bible itself, is divided into Old and New Testament, and constitutes the point of transition from exegetical into historical theology. Hence, what has been said with regard to the Bible in general has its particular application to this subject.

This is the place for historical criticism, involving not merely the question whether the book which claims to be a source is derived from the author in whose name it appears, but also the further inquiry whether the author, known or unknown, has aimed to write actual history, and in what way he has executed his plan. The propriety of historical criticism, when applied to the books of the Bible, is, doubtless, open to graver doubts from the standpoint of supernaturalism than criticism of the text. But the necessity for it will be seen in the fact, that we must guard against its abuse by recognizing the spirit and object of the Bible history, its superhuman and divine plan, and its development under the conditions of time. He who derives his standard of measurement directly from the history of revelation itself, will naturally decide otherwise than will he who applies the foreign standard of ancient or modern wisdom.

¹ This, too, with reference to the reminders by Pelt (review of the 2d ed.) in Bruns and Häfner's Repertorium, xiv, 3, p. 268.

SECTION II

HISTORY OF THE ISRAELITISH NATION.

W. Hoffman, Die göttliche Stufenordnung im A. Test. Berl., 1854; † Gfrörer, Urgeschichte des menschl. Geschlechts, Schaffhausen, 1853; Pressel in Herzog Encykl., xvii, p. 245, sqq., Art. Volk Gottes; J. H. Kurtz, History of the Old Covenant, 3 vols., Philadelphia, 1859; S. Sharpe, History of the Hebrew Nation and its Literature, London, 1872; A. P. Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, 3 vols., New York, 1866-77; H. H. Milman, History of the Jews, 3 vols., New York, 1889.

The history of the nation from which the Founder of Christianity came forth to be the Saviour of the world, is of equal value for the Christian theologian with the general study of the Old Testament. The following are the periods of principal religious importance subsequently to the primitive period—from Adam to Abraham. Periods of Hebrew history.

1. The Patriarchal Age, being the period of the earliest revelation from God—from Abraham to Moses.
2. The period of founding the theocracy and subduing the land by the theocratic leaders—from Moses to Samuel.
3. The further development of this theocracy under the law, and the theocratical institutions of the priesthood, the sovereignty, and the prophetic order, considered both in their positive and their negative features—from Samuel to Solomon, and thence to the Captivity.
4. The periods of disintegration under the influence of foreign rulers and foreign customs, and of transition to a new period during and after the Captivity.

The history of Israel, in the strict sense, begins with the head of the race, and his emigration to Canaan. But the records of pre-Abrahamic times are included, as preliminary history, within the circle of Old Testament historical studies. The difficulties touched upon in exegetical theology, with reference to the age of the historical documents that have been preserved to our time, and their trustworthiness, are also felt in the historical treatment. The principal difficulties attach to the earliest periods. We have not hesitated to designate them as the time of the earliest revelations, because we share, with Hauff,¹ the conviction, that a belief in revelation does not only admit of, but absolutely requires, criticism of the historical books of the Bible. If the divine and the human, wonderfully interpenetrating each other, impress us anywhere, it is when we are meditating upon these oldest of all histories, for whose examination we need, Difficulty connected with early period.

¹ Comp. his work, cited above, and the Introd., by K. A. Menzel, to his Staats u. Religionsgesch. der Königreiche Israel u. Juda, Breslau, 1853, pp. 8f.

in harmony with this thought, minds open to childlike conceptions, and religiously and poetically inclined, and a judgment and understanding prepared for an unprejudiced investigation, and sometimes accessible, among other things, to historical discussion.¹ Where either of these exists alone, where we apply only the belief instilled by the lessons of childhood, and seek to retain this in its naïve directness at the cost of historic truth, or where, perverted at the outset by the so-called modern enlightenment, we Necessity of freedom from prejudice. approach the sacred narratives in order to exercise our pedantic skill upon them, the result will be that our judgment will be speedily formed, since we will either literally accept every thing without examination, or reject every thing without understanding it. In no age has there been so much talk of myths as in our own. Every people, like every individual, has its childhood history, and we can no more expect to find purely historical reminiscences without the golden thread of poesy, in the primitive history of nations in general, than we can suppose that the recollections of an individual can reach back with entire accuracy into the twilight in which poetry and fact are intermingled with each other.² The important thing in this connection, is, that the ideas of legend and myth be clearly fixed. There is no need of being frightened at a word. What does μῦθος signify? It is applied to narrative and legend as well as to fable and poem.

Meaning of myth.

But the ancients, already, distinguished between logographs and mythographs,³ and modern science has in like manner distinguished between historical and philosophical myths (myths proper), so as to make the former actually historical legends (λόγοι), even though conceived and developed in a poetic spirit, while the latter contain simply doctrines or views clothed in historic garb, or presented in the guise of history. It is a well-known fact that a controversy exists as to whether historic facts or philosophical doctrines in natural history underlie heathen mythology itself. But the same question has been raised with reference to the Bible, and we are not at liberty to set it aside without investigation. The distinction between legend and myth is important even for the Old Testament history. The former is more nearly related to actual history than the latter; for the legend, even when poetically colored, contains a historical kernel, while the kernel enclosed within the myth is always a dogma instead of history, a religious conception in historic garb. The task of the historian will, accordingly, differ as he deals with myths or with legends. In the case of the myth, it is needful, from the outset, to ignore the historical germ, in the usual acceptation of the word, and to seize upon the dogmatic germ, which, indeed, presumes a recognition of the historic state of things. In dealing with the legend, however, the attempt must be made to strip off the covering which was gradually formed about the historic germ, and to extract that germ, so far as possible, from the enveloping shell. Some critics have gone to the length of including all the older history of Israel among myths, so as to leave but little of the historical element beyond the theocratic idea that the Israelitish nation was the people of God, and was described as such in a series of symbolical images.¹ But even this extreme application of the myth idea is decidedly different from the ruthless transforming of the sacred histories into nature myths, which overlooks every religious feature, and by which we are asked, with Nork,² to find astronomical emblems; or, with Daumer and Ghilany,³ even the worship of fire and Moloch, in the purely human narratives of the Bible.

¹ Comp. Bunsen, Gott in der Gesch. (Part ii, Bibel, Leben, u. Weltgeschichte), p. 101: "I assert, that by its internal unity, and the truth of its monotheistic consciousness, this book (the Bible and its history) has controlled the consciousness of the world, including its noblest tribes, during many centuries; it has realized the noblest hopes of mankind and authenticated its holiest anticipations, such as in moments of serious consciousness you feel arising in yourself." Also Pressel, supra: "If the gods of heathen nations are simply the reflection of the national spirit, Israel, on the other hand, is, in its character as the covenant people, an organ for the erection of the kingdom of God, a product of the grace of God."

² "Go back," says Herder, "in connexion with historical writings, to the infancy of the world, to the poverty and needs of the writers. In this poor hovel God dwells; to this childhood the Father speaks." Theophron, Werke x, p. 317.

³ See Creuzer, Hist. Kunst d. Griechen, (Lpz., 1803), pp. 40 and 178, where the ancients are quoted.

Difference between myth and legend.

Such unnatural mythologizing of history into nature, however, rectifies itself. The healthy historic spirit rejects it. But so much the more meritorious is the effort, made in the way above indicated, to distinguish between myth and legend by means of a thorough examination.⁴ If the results of such inquiries are not always at

¹ Thus de Wette, in his Beiträge.

² Vergleichende Mythologie, etc., Lpz., 1836, and several other works by this writer.

³ Comp. Rheinwald, Repertorium, 1844. Daumer has since done penance, however, and has "returned" into the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church.

⁴ George, Mythus u. Sage; Vers. einer wiss. Entwicklung dieser Begriffe u. ihres Verhältnisses zum christl. Glauben, Berlin, 1837. "Legend and myth diverge in different directions; the former gives the appearance, and from this we argue back to the idea; in the latter, on the contrary, the idea is given, and the appearance is deduced therefrom." P. 11. On the distinction in certain cases, which is none the less relative only, and on the difficulty of always determining the character of a nar-

once apparent, they yet lead into the right way, and toward the ultimate goal. It is not necessary that we should at once think of fraud and deceit when poetry, especially of a religious sort, is mentioned. This is possible only to a worldly-wise, petrified understanding, which is incapable of suspecting the existence of any higher form of truth in poetry, while it is the special work of the latter to represent, if not bare and tangible realities, yet the highest form of truth.¹ However, the greatest prudence is necessary, on the other hand, and it is a question whether the word "myth," which always has a reference to the point of view occupied by heathenism, ought to have been transferred at all to the territory of the Bible.² The theological standpoint is that which regards the Bible narratives as sacred history, as compared with profane. Every thing contained therein, whether it be poetry, tradition, or actual history, relates to a single grand idea, which creatively controls the whole, but which does not remain merely an abstract theory, but moves through this history and biblical narrative, comes concrete in it, celebrating its consummation at the end in the Revelations of the New Covenant. The student who overlooks this feature misconceives the fundamental character of the history, whose peculiarity lies in the fact that this is not history, whose limitations are fixed by its own nature, but, as one writer beautifully observes,³ it is "the history of God from a human point rative, comp. ibid., pp. 13, 14. With reference to the New Test., see O. Bagge, Princip. des Mythos im Dienst d. christl. Position, Lpz., 1865; comp. also Immer, infra, p. 24: "Myth and legend, often passing over into each other, have this in common, that both have sprung from the unintentionally poetizing spirit of the people, and contain, in confused mixture, both idea and history. If the two are to be distinguished from each other, the myth will designate an idea that has become embodied history in the mouth of the people, and legend a history which has become involved with ideal elements in the fancy and traditions of the people."

¹ "The idea of the unconscious (naïve) must necessarily be retained, unless it is desired to wholly abandon the ground of myths and legends." It is by this feature that that field is distinguished from that of "intentional deception and fiction." George, supra, p. 15; comp. also Hauff in the work referred to above, passim. It is, however, apparent that the highest, i. e., the essentially religious, ideas, are represented precisely by myths (in case the designation be adopted), while the purely historical can claim to be religiously significant only in a secondary way. Comp. Genesis with the Books of Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. Which is the more distinctively religious?

² Comp. Schenkel, Dogm., i, p. 307, sq. (referring to Ewald). A similar idea holds true of the word oracle as applied to the prophets. The phrase "scriptural myth" has also been suggested, in order to avoid the analogy of the heathen myth.

³ J. G. Mueller, Theophil., p. 246. Augusti, too, was accustomed to describe Israelitish history as an ἡραξ λεγόμενον in the history of the world. Hegel entertained different views of Jewish history at different times, as may be seen in Rosenkranz, of view, and the history of man from the divine point of view." It accords, upon the whole, with the laws of human development, that the earlier history of a people should bear a partly legendary and partly mythical, or epical, character, to a greater extent than the later, which falls within the province of historical writings proper.

The old economical and pedagogical idea, according to which God condescended to the level of human ideas, and entered into the childish apprehensions of men, in order to attract them to himself, needs only to be rendered scientifically intelligible, from a genuinely theistic point of view, in order to approve itself as the only tenable one in the practical field. This by no means excludes a true pragmatism, which takes the human element into account, and treats it with due historical recognition of its importance, but simply provides for it a proper basis and the necessary higher aims.

LITERATURE.

I. EARLY HISTORY.

The sources for Israelitish history are the historical books of the Bible, including the historical Apocrypha. For the post-exilian period the First Book of Maccabees is especially important. In addition, we have Josephus (comp. Archæology), who is a valuable authority for the period extending from the close of that covered by biblical sources down to his own time. Philo's Life of Moses has little historical value, because of its allegorical tendency. Among non-Jewish writers, the Grecian authors Herodotus, Strabo, and Diodorus Siculus, and the Romans Justin and Tacitus,¹ deserve mention; also the Egyptian Manetho (B. C. 280?), whom Josephus cites and controverts, and upon whose existence and trustworthiness opinions are still divided. Eusebius, among the Christian fathers, treated Israelitish history, in the first books of his Ecclesiastical History and the Præp. Evangelica, and others followed in his footsteps. A critical treatment was inconceivable in connection with the theory of an exact and minute verbal inspiration, and was first introduced by Spinoza (Tractatus theologico-politicus), Richard Simon, Clericus, and others. There are other works, more or less critical and pragmatical, by Buddæus (1726), Humphrey Prideaux (1715, 1718), Shuckford (1728-38), Holberg (1747), and Lange (1775), being supplemented in later times by the following :

Leben Hegels, p. 49, where it will also appear how "it violently repelled him, and again engrossed him, and gave him life-long trouble as a dark riddle" (1).

¹ Comp. J. G. Mueller in Stud. u. Krit., 1843, and F. O. Meier, Judaica seu veterum scriptorum profanorum de rebus judaicis fragmenta, Jena, 1832.

- J. J. Hess, Gesch. der Israel. vor d. Zeiten Jesu. Zür., 1776–88. 12 vols.
- G. L. Bauer, Handb. der Gesch. der hebr. Nation, von ihrer Entstehung bis zur Zerstörung ihres Staates. Nürnberg, 1800–4. 2 vols.
- De Wette, Kritik der israel. Gesch. ("Beiträge zur Einl. in das A. T.") 2 parts.) Halle, 1807.
- J. M. Jost, Geschichte der Israeliten seit der Zeit der Maccabäer bis auf unsere Tage. Berl., 1820–47. 10 vols.
- Gesch. des Judenth. u. seiner Secten. Lpz., 1857–59. 3 vols.
- H. Leo, Vorlesungen über die Geschichte des jüd. Staates. Berl., 1828.
- *E. Bertheau, zur Gesch. der Israeliten. Zwei Abhandl. Gött., 1842.
- C. v. Lengerke, Kenáan. Volks- u. Religionsgesch. Israels. Part I. (bis zum Tode des Josua.) Königsb., 1844.
- Ch. Th. Engelstoft, hist. populi Judaici biblica usque ad occupat. Palaestinae ad relationes peregrinas examin. et digesta. Havn., 1832.
- *J. H. Kurtz, Gesch. des alten Bundes. 1 vol. Berl., 1848. 3d ed., 1864; vol. 2. 2d ed., 1858. Engl. ed.: History of the Old Covenant, 3 vols. Translated by Edersheim and Martin. Edinb., 1859.
- L. Herzfeld (Rabbiner), Gesch. des Volkes Israel von der Zerstörung des ersten Tempels bis zur Einsetzung des Makkab. Schimon. Braunschw., 1847–57. 3 vols. (Auszug daraus, Lpz., 1870).
- Sal. Friedländer, Geschichte des israelit. Volkes von der ältesten bis auf die neueste Zeit. Lpz., 1848.
- *K. A. Menzel, Staats- u. Religionsgeschichte der Königreiche Israel u. Juda. Breslau, 1853.
- Gust. Baur, 6 Tabellen über die Gesch. des israelit. Volkes. Giessen, 1848. Fol.
- Eisenlohr, das Volk Israel unter der Herrschaft der Könige. 1 part. Lpz., 1855 f.
- J. R. Tiele, Chronologie des A. T. Bremen, 1839.
- G. F. Jatho, die Grundzüge der alttest. Chronologie in Uebereinstimmung mit den Zeitbestimmungen der Classiker. Hildesheim, 1856.
- J. K. H. Schmeidler, der Untergang des Reiches Juda. Bresl., 1831.
- J. Salvador, Geschichte der Römerherrschaft in Judäa und der Zerstörung Jerusalems; German of Eichler. Bremen, 1847. 2 vols.
- H. Grätz, Gesch. der Juden von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart. Lpz., 1854–75. 11 vols.
- Ja. da Costa, Israel und die Völker. From the Dutch. Frankf. a. M., 1855.
- Bost, l'époque des Machabées. Strassb., 1862.
- Jastrow, (Rabbiner), vier Jahrhund. aus der Gesch. der Juden, von Zerstörung des ersten Tempels bis zur makkab. Tempelweihe. Heidelb., 1865.
- *Weber u. Holtzmann, Geschichte des Volkes Israel und die Entstehung des Christenthums. Lpz., 1867. 2 vols.
- D. Ehrmann, Gesch. der Israel. etc. bis auf die Gegenw. 2 parts. Brünn, 1869.
- *F. Hitzig, Gesch. des Volkes Israel. Lpz., 1869. 2 parts.
- Weiss, zur Gesch. der jüd. Tradition. Part I. Wien, 1871.
- E. W. Hengstenberg, Gesch. des Reiches Gottes unter dem A. B. Berl., 1870, f. 2 parts.
- A. Köhler, Lehrb. der bibl. Gesch. A. T.'s. Erl., 1875, ff.
- F. de Saulcy, Sept siècles de l'histoire judaïque (after 588). Paris, 1874
- *J. Wellhausen, Gesch. Israels. I. Berl., 1878.

Apologetical:

- *H. von der Goltz, Gottes Offenbarung durch heilige Geschichte, nach ihrem Wesen beleuchtet. Basel, 1868.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- Duncan Shaw, The History and Philosophy of Judaism; or, A Critical and Philosophical Analysis of the Jewish Religion. Edinburgh, 1787.
- Frederick Strauss, The Pilgrimage to Jerusalem: a Picture of Judaism in the Century which preceded the Advent of our Saviour. 2 vols. Boston, 1825.
- Isaac Disraeli, Genius of Judaism. Lond., 1833.
- Alexander McCaul, The Old Paths: a Comparison of the Principles and Doctrines of Modern Judaism with the Religion of Moses and the Prophets. Lond., 1837.
- M. Mendelssohn, Jerusalem; a Treatise on Ecclesiastical Authority and Judaism. Translated by M. Samuels. 2 vols. Lond., 1838.
- E. H. Lindo, The History of the Jews of Spain and Portugal, from the Earliest Times to their final Expulsion. Lond., 1848.
- George Smith, The Hebrew People; or, The History and Religion of the Israelites, from the Origin of the Nation to the Time of Christ. 2 vols. Lond., 1850.
- Abraham Mills, The Ancient Hebrews; with an Introductory Essay concerning the World before the Flood. New York, 1856.
- J. W. Etheridge, Jerusalem and Tiberias; Sora and Cordova; A Survey of the Religious and Scholastic Learning of the Jews; designed as an Introduction to the Study of Hebrew Literature. Lond., 1856.
- Baden Powell, Christianity without Judaism. Lond., 1857.
- Morris J. Raphall, Post-Biblical History of the Jews, from the Close of the Old Testament till the Destruction of the Second Temple. 2 Vols. New York, 1866.
- H. Ewald, History of Israel. 4 vols. Lond., 1868-71.
- J. Hannab, Hollowness, Narrowness, and Fear; Warnings from the Jewish Church. Oxford, 1869.
- W. H. Rule, History of the Kairite Jews. 8vo. Lond., 1870.
- I. Mayer, Source of Salvation, A Catechism of the Jewish Religion; with the Confirmation Service. New York, 1874.
- Frederic Huidekoper, Judaism at Rome. B.C. 76 to A.D. 140. New York, 1876.
- E. M. Meyers, The Jews: their Customs and Ceremonies. New York, 1878.
- Abraham Geiger, Judaism and its History. Translated from the German by Maurice Mayer; with an Appendix, "Renan and Strauss." Lond., n. d.

II. LATER HISTORY.

- Derenbourg, Essai sur l'histoire et la géographie de la Palestine, d'après les Thalmuds et les autres sources rabbiniques. P. I. Histoire de la Palestine depuis Cyrus jusqu'à Adrien. Paris, 1867.
- *M. Schneckenburger, Vorlesungen über neutestam. Zeitgeschichte, herausg. von Löhle mit Vorw. v. Hundeshagen. Frankf., 1862.
- *A. Hausrath, Neutestam. Zeitgeschichte. Heidelb., 1868, fg. 2d ed., 1873-77. 4 parts. (Part I. in 3d ed. Münch., 1879).
- *E. Schürer, Lehrb. der neutest. Zeitgesch. Lpz., 1874.
- F. Delitzsch, Handwerkesleben zur Zeit Jesu (Lpz. 1868 u. ö.); ein Tag in Capernaum. (Lpz. 1871). Amer. ed., translated by Morris. Phila., 1878.
- J. Wellhausen, die Pharisäer u. die Sadducäer. Greifsw. 1874.
- E. Ledrain, Histoire d'Israël. I. (until B. C. 887). Paris, 1879.

III. BIBLICAL CHARACTERS.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- William Cave, Antiquitates Apostolicæ; or, The Lives, Acts, and Martyrdoms of the Holy Apostles of our Saviour. 2 vols. Lond., 1836.
- Philip Stanhope Dodd, A View of the Evidence afforded by the Life and Ministry of St. Peter to the Truth of the Christian Revelation. Lond., 1837.
- Henry Blunt, Lectures upon the History of St. Paul, delivered during Lent, at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Upper Chelsea. Phila., 1839.
- Henry Hunter, Sacred Biography; or, The History of the Patriarchs. 8vo. New York, 1844.
- J. H. Counter, An Inquiry into the History and Character of Rahab. Lond., 1850.
- George Gilfillan, The Bards of the Bible. New York, 1851.
- S. Chandler, A Critical History of the Life of David. Oxford, 1853.
- William C. Duncan, The Life, Character, and Acts of John the Baptist; and the Relation of his Ministry to the Christian Dispensation. Based upon the Johannes der Täufer of L. von Rohden. New York, 1853.
- Alfred Lee, The Life of the Apostle John, in a Series of Practical Discourses. New York, 1857.
- Adolph Monod, Saint Paul: Five Discourses, translated from the French by Rev. J. H. Meyers. Andover, 1860.
- William G. Blackie, David, King of Israel: the Divine Plan and Lessons of his Life. Lond., 1860.
- C. M. Butler, St. Paul in Rome; Lectures delivered in the Legation of the United States of America in Rome. Phila., 1865.
- James Floy, Literary Remains. Old Testament Characters Delineated and Illustrated. New York, 1866.
- F. W. Krummacher, Elijah the Tishbite. Lond. and New York, 1852.
- Elisha, translated by Jackson. London, 1838.
- David, King of Israel, translated by Marston. London, 1867.
- Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul. 2 vols. New York, 1869.
- W. R. Fremantle, From Athens to Rome. Six Lectures on St. Paul's Visit to the Chief Cities of the Roman Empire. 8vo. Lond., 1869.
- A. P. Stanley, Scripture Portraits and Other Miscellanies. 12mo. Lond., 1870.
- Luke H. Wiseman, Men of Faith; or, Sketches from the Book of Judges. Lond., 1870.
- F. D. Maurice, The Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament. 3d ed. London, 1871.
- D. M'Causland, The Builders of Babel. Lond., 1871.
- A. Oxenden, Portraits from the Bible. Vol. 1—Old Testament Series; Vol 2—New Testament Series. Lond., 1871.
- S. B. Gould, Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, and other Old Testament Characters. Lond., 1872.
- J. R. Macduff, The Healing Waters; or, The Story of Naaman. An Old Testament Chapter on Providence and Grace. Lond., 1873.
- T. Lewin, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. 2 vols., 4to. Lond., 1875.
- William M. Taylor, David, King of Israel: his Life and its Lessons. New York, 1875.
- Elijah the Prophet. New York, 1876.
- Moses the Lawgiver. New York, 1879.

William M. Taylor, Paul the Missionary. New York, 1880.

James M. Macdonald, The Life and Writings of St. John. Edited, with an Introduction, by J. S. Howson. New York, 1877.

On the relations of the Israelites to Egypt, comp. Hengstenberg, Egypt and the Books of Moses. Translated by Robbins, (And., 1848). G. Ebers, Aeg. u. die Bb. Mose's. 1 Bd. (Lpz., 1868); H. Brugsch, l'Exode et les monuments égyptiens (Lpz., 1875). On the relations to Assyria and Babylon: E. Schrader, die Keilinschriften u. das A. T. (Giessen, 1872); and Keilinschriften u. Geschichtsforschung (Giessen, 1878); comp. die Darst. der israel. Gesch. in M. Duncker's Gesch. des Alterthums (4th ed., Lpz., 1874 ff.), and in Maspero's Gesch. der morgenl. Völker im Alterth. (French, Paris, 1875, German translation by Peitschmann, Lpz., 1877); also, George Smith, Chaldean Account of Genesis, 2d ed., New York, 1880, and Assyrian Discoveries, New York, 1875.

SECTION III.

THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

J. Ch. Doederlein, De hist. J. tenendæ tradensque necessitate ac modo, Progr. 1-iv, Jena, 1788-86; (also in the Opusc. theol., Jena, 1789). On the different tendencies, in harmony with which, and for which, the biographer of Jesus may labor, comp. Bertholdt's Krit. Journal, vol. v, (1816), No. 4, pp. 235-945. Comp. infra, the American Literature on the Life of Jesus.

The life of Christ, as the Son of God, is to be regarded as the central glory of Scripture history, in which all the rays of former historical manifestations of God are concentrated, and from which they again radiate, to extend over the whole history of the Church.

Christ's life the centre of history.

Should the life of Christ be regarded as a special branch in the course of theological science? Should it not, rather, shine forth from all the other branches? It results from the exegesis of the Gospels, stands at the head of Church History, and is the very soul of apologetics, dogmatics, ethics, and practical theology.¹ But for this very reason, it is essential that we gain as satisfactory a view of this life as possible. This involves grave difficulties, of course; for the Gospels do not furnish, as is conceded by the most evangel-

¹ "The life of Jesus is the central point of a newly rising light for the history of Christianity." Ammon, Fortbildung d. Christenthums zur Weltreligion, I, p. 183. "The life of Jesus reconciles all the interests of speculation, the religious feeling and history. It presents to our notice a personality, for the possession of which heaven and earth are in dispute, but which may not be exclusively assigned to either; which consists of fragments and elements which are transmitted to us by tradition and documentary records, and which, nevertheless, cannot be made to fit into our moulds; which is conceived as the type of every human being, and yet appears under circumstances and in situations such as ours are not now and never can be." Ibid., iv, p. 277 sq. "The life of Jesus is a biography which flows out, as does no other, into a large and extended history of nations and even of the world. It describes an individual life, but the life of a character who is, antecedently, in the exaltation of his self-consciousness and in his spiritual might, a symptom of the world's history, and truly a new stage in the development of the human spirit, and who, in the next place, be-ical scholars,¹ a minute and complete biography, but only memorabilia (ἀπομνημονεύματα), which, moreover, while partially coincident, yet diverge from each other in their relations and points of view. John, the most confidential friend of Jesus, said at last: "There are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." Hence it becomes necessary to subject the Gospel narratives to criticism, as a preliminary measure. Here, again, exegetical and philological criticism turns over its work to the investigations of historical criticism. The former deals only with the authenticity of the Gospel records, as belonging to the canon, and with their relation to each other, while the latter inquires into the credibility of the sacred writers themselves. There is no ground for alarm at such criticism, since, by the judgment of strictly orthodox theologians, both these writings and their contents fall within the range of the same historical criticism to which all historical monuments are subject.² It may even be admitted that discrepancies occur in the Gospels, but that does not necessitate the conclusion that the Gospel, as a whole, contradicts itself. It would therefore be, not piety, but frivolous opposition to God's order, to came, by the labors of a brief career, the creator of a new and higher cosmos, whose world days are to be reckoned by thousands of years, and are to be measured by the circumference of the earth." Keim, Gesch. Jesu v. Nazara, I, p. 1, and the passage from Origen, De princ., 4, 5, quoted there.

Negative criticism no ground for alarm.

¹ By Hess, for instance, in the Leben Jesu.

² Ebrard, Kritik d. evang. Geschichte, I, p. 2: "It follows, from the nature of the case, that a photographic picture of the Saviour could not be given at all; for a perfect representation of the Saviour in a single picture was impossible, in view of his universal character and the unavoidable narrowness with which he would be apprehended by the consciousness of a single observer, and, consequently, in the representation of a single writer. The entire Christ could only be presented to view by a number of descriptive pictures, the whole combined so as to oblige the observer to view them as a unit. God would not deprive us of this combined view. That is to say, he would not take from us the personal, scientific reconstruction of his image, upon the basis of a historical investigation of the several representations of Christ which are contained in the New Testament. The application of historical criticism to the Bible is certainly an infinitely complicated and wearisome task, and one that can ever be only approximately completed. But much has been gained when the task has been definitely devolved upon, and honestly recognized by, theology, in the spirit of renouncing all unbelieving fear." Rothe, Zur Dogmatik, p. 308 sq. Comp. also Immer, Die Geschichts-quellen des Lebens Jesu (Lecture at Berne) in the Prot. Vorträge, V, 7, Berlin, 1873, p. 28: "All research into the sources of the life of Christ can have no other end than to free the pure and concrete image of Jesus from the scattered traits in which it is enveloped, without which work the influence emanating from him, and the results originating with him, are inconceivable."

refuse to see this fact, and to seek to avoid such critical labor under the questionable plea that damage to the Christian faith must result from such an undertaking. The only essential consideration at this point is, that criticism should occupy the proper point of view. In recent times it has been urged that an entire absence of predisposition is necessary. This is impossible in any absolute sense, for even they who make this demand have prepossessions; for example, as to the possibility or impossibility of miracles. But a developed doctrine of Christ (Christology) is not to furnish the rule of procedure, any more than dogmatics may be allowed to govern exegesis.

The life of Jesus is matter for history only in so far as it is definitely human. The unprejudiced study of that life must, and will of itself, lead to the recognition of its divine element, but it must not be postulated a priori in dogmatic formulæ, or imposed upon the history.¹ The student who makes the life of Jesus an object of scientific investigation will, nevertheless, enter upon it with a certain amount of preconceptions. He knows what life it is which is to be studied. But the sacred awe² with which he enters on his task can in no way harm historical impartiality; on the contrary, a spiritual and vivid treatment of any life, as well as that of the Saviour, is impossible without it.³ It is as impossible to comprehend

¹ Comp. Hase, Leben Jesu, § 14.

² Comp. the confessions of Lavater and Anna Maria v. Schurmann, in the preface to Neander's Life of Jesus. "The life of the Christian," remarks the latter, "is the best biography of Jesus."

³ "The enumeration of outward fortunes in a career is unintelligible and dead without an apprehension or idea of the individual life itself, from which, as the innermost point in the life, all externalities may be explained." Hase, Life of Jesus (Bost. ed.), p. 21. "The self consciousness of Jesus of Nazareth must be clearly before the eyes of the Christian, as an actual historical fact which is to explain a true philosophy." Bunsen, Hippolytus, i, p. xliii. "The personality of Jesus stands before us as the connecting link between two worlds. It stands between the two developments of the old and the new worlds, not as an effect of the old world, but as its consummation; not as a mere harbinger of the new, but as its enduring type, and as a fountain of life to mankind through the Spirit." Ibid., Gott in der Gesch., p. 60; comp. p. 100. "He was man. He was neither Jew nor Greek, prince nor priest, rich nor mighty, but, in contrast with them all, a man. He lived and died for mankind. But for this very reason he is called, and is the image of, the Son of God, as none other before or after him. His mortal, finite being had truly become a likeness of God, a divine nature." "The real centre in the life of Jesus lies in his consciousness. It is, however, by no means merely the idea of the unity of the divine and human natures that constitutes the peculiarity of his consciousness, for such an idea was present in a hazy form in both Plato and Aristotle. It is rather the consciousness of a real union of the Divine and human natures in his person in absolute energy, so that in this consciousness are united not only the fulness of the Deity with the fulness of his own inner life, but also the

the life of the Saviour by refusing to measure it by its own rule, and to trace each one of its expressions back to our own need of salvation, as it is to understand the life of a mother who sacrifices herself for her children, where the only conception of greatness is that belonging to conquerors or artists. Something that is immeasurable will still remain in this unique personality. Besides, while the distinction between a historical and a real Christ is wholly inadmissible on the plan of absolutely separating between them, and connecting them only in outward form, as though by accident, it is yet certain that when we resolve the life of Jesus into its separate elements, and follow it step by step, or trace it feature by feature, we often find ourselves required to supplement, from the idea, matters for which no definite historical data can be found. However, this must not be an arbitrary idea, constructed and introduced into the subject by ourselves, but it is rather one to be gained as the sum of historical inquiry. As Scripture explains Scripture, so does the life of Jesus as a whole explain the separate features in that life. The life of Jesus contains its own measure—the absolute measure of the Deity glorifying itself in human nature. The attributes which constitute the peculiar character of Christ are not, therefore, to be at once excluded from the range of historical inquiry as transcending the bounds of human conditions, and impossible, but must be taken into account in the development of his humanity. Unless this be done, the picture will crumble in our hands, and we shall obtain only an inadequate and Ebionitic fragment, instead of a thoroughly human and really historical portrait. We cannot, and should not, remove the picture of Christ from the golden canvas upon which it has been painted, not by the fancy of men, but by the finger of God, even though we attempt to follow the lines of the drawing by historical methods, and seek to arrange them, so far as may be possible, by the application of critical processes. In this work the critical effort to combine must be aided by the insight which belongs to the congenial spirit of a religious disposition.

The life of Jesus its own explanation.

Spiritual sympathy necessary for correct criticism.

entire dealing of God with the entire history of his being, yea, the Deity with humanity." J. P. Lange, Gesch. d. Kirche, i, p. 349. Comp. Kliefoth, Einl. in d. Dogmengesch., p. 39. Karl Ritter has also expressed himself well in opposition to an unspiritual and atomistic treatment of the life of Jesus: "His entire life lies open and clear before us like a charming landscape, with no cloud to interrupt the rays of light, which, without the tedious explanations of an uninvited guide, we comprehend with sacred joy at every step, upon which we stroll in pleasure, and the heart bounds with exalted premonitions. This place soon becomes our home, and upon it we could desire to live in joy and sadness until we die." Lebensbild von Kramer, vol. i, p. 232 et seq.

The portrait of Christ as outlined in the New Testament writings was compared, even before a mythical interpretation was thought of, to a torso, upon which the imagination of successive centuries has wrought its improvements.¹ The comparison is unjust, inasmuch as the torso lacks the essential feature, the countenance; and it is precisely the countenance that shines forth in the Gospels, with genuinely human lineaments, from the surrounding glory of the Deity, while the complete outlining of the members of the body, as with paintings of the old German school, is either wanting, or at least leaves much to be desired in the drawing. But the case is here as it is with every other human and historical countenance, which differs greatly in accordance with the different points of view from which we regard it, or with the light in which different painters apprehend it. Christ seemed different to ^{Different views} the world of the Middle Ages from what he does to the ^{of Christ.} world of our time. Zinzendorf, Herder, Schleiermacher, and others, each, in his own way, arrived at a different conception of him. This, however, need by no means frighten us from attempting to solve the problem, nor force us to accept the alternative of "either investing the Jewish Messiah with all the attributes which the theology of the Jews ascribes to him, or of furnishing a natural history of the Prophet of Nazareth, such as Venturini wrote."² For both are caricatures, the original for which is yet, even approximately, to be discovered. Still less are we authorized to dispense with any historical Christ, and to search for the Redeemer of the ^{Absurdity of} world solely in the region of myths, on the ground that ^{the mythical} some things cannot be explained and fitted with cer- ^{theory.} tainty into the framework of history. This would be to render the inexplicable yet more inexplicable, since Christianity without a historical Christ would remain an incomprehensible riddle, and the Church of Christ a historical monstrosity. The proper course is, while making use of historical criticism, with other agencies, "to have confidence in God and in the truth, which is much nearer to us than we think, and cheerfully expect that assured and certain results will, in the end, be realized through such investigations."³

¹ Kähler, Supranaturalismus und Rationalismus, p. 117.

² See Röhr's Krit. Predigerbibl., vol. 18, No. 1, p. 13. Comp. Briefe über den Rationalismus, p. 26 seqq.

³ Ammon, supra, i, p. 125.

SECTION IV.

HISTORY OF THE BIOGRAPHIES OF JESUS.

Biographical effort began in the early centuries with an external collocation of sources,¹ and this method continued to be employed down to Bengel. The productions of the Middle Ages were "without criticism, fantastic, and legendary, and consisted chiefly in works for entertainment and devotion."² The old Saxon harmony of the Gospels, entitled "Heliand," is, however, of great importance for the history of civilization and literature,³ and with this should be compared that of the Weissenburg monk, Otfried, of the ninth century.⁴ In other regards, "the life of Christ was represented in the 'passion-plays' in the most literal sense, through the aid of sculpture, painting, and the dramatic art."⁵ The dogmatic element still predominated after the Reformation. It was not until after the Thirty Years' War that "the manifestation of Christ was intensely studied for its own sake." The theology of Herrnhut forms the leading agency in this "worship of Jesus," which now began to be manifested in hymns and prayers. People became accustomed to regard Jesus as the concrete God, sometimes irrespectively of his relation to the Trinity, and his history was a history of God, in which character it yielded Klopstock the material for epical treatment. Rational reflection, which felt itself called to consider the human element in a human point of view, asserted its claim in opposition to this undeniably monophysite tendency.

The attack by the Wolfenbüttel Fragmentist, in 1777 and the following years, forced apologetics into this human method of apprehending the psychology of Jesus and of estimating the moral bearings of his plan. The critical and pragmatistical treatment of the life of Christ dates, accordingly, from this time; that is, from the time modern ideas became established. This method has resulted in making of the life of Jesus a subordinate branch of theological study, so that what is now understood by that phrase is certainly a "modern idea."⁶ Foremost in this period were the apologetic and somewhat rational representa-

¹ Monotessaron, Harmonia, Synopsis. Comp. Hase, Life of Jesus, p. 20. ² Ibid.

³ Editions of Hayne (2d ed.), Paderborn, 1873, and Sievers, Halle, 1878. Translated by Simrock, 2d ed., Elberfeld, 1866; and by Grein, Cassel, 1869.

⁴ The "Christ," edited by Kelle, Ratisbon, 1856-59, 2 vols. Translated by the same, Prague, 1870.

⁵ Rosenkranz, Leben Hegels, p. 50.

⁶ Strauss, Leben Jesu fürs Volk, 1864, p. 1.

tions of Reinhard and Hess.¹ The divine was separated from the human, so far as was possible, and attention was called to the difference between the Johannean view and that of the synoptics. Herder, for instance, viewed the life of the "Son of God" and of the "Son of Man" in accordance with these two distinct points of view. There was no lack of coarse reactions, however, in connexion with the humanizing process, and rude hands tore away the tender screen which had preserved the picture of the Lord from being profaned. "Natural histories of the Prophet of Nazareth" were published by Bahrđt, Venturini, and, later, by Langsdorf, and it became a favorite employment to draw parallels between Socrates and Christ, often to the disadvantage of the latter. This, certainly, grew out of an utter misunderstanding of the personality of either. Others, like Paulus and Greiling, acting from good intentions, sought to eliminate the miraculous from the life of Jesus, in order to recommend him as a wise and humane teacher to a conceited age that was inclined to make a mock of him. The later theology, beginning with Schleiermacher, again took up the ideal element in Christ, and sought to prove it in his historical manifestation. Schleiermacher himself, in this spirit, but with independent criticism, in 1819, and again in 1832, delivered lectures on the life of Christ. These lectures were not published until their author had been dead thirty years, but they were nevertheless timely, though no longer adequate to complete the argument in all its details. Hase proceeded in a method similar to that of Schleiermacher, in prosecuting the task of showing "how by divine appointment, through the free act of his spirit and the interference of his age, Jesus of Nazareth became the Redeemer of the world."

These various attempts were at once neutralized by Strauss, who cut the knot with the sword, not, indeed, by denying that a Jesus had lived, but by reducing his historical existence almost to a historical nullity, since he recognized in the Gospel records only a mythical expression of ideas, unconsciously and innocently invented by the infant community of Christians, as influenced by the extant prophecies of the Old Covenant. This work was designed to preserve the poetically speculative truth of the ideal Christ, but its tendency was to dissolve him into air, like an unsubstantial image in the clouds. The hypothesis of Strauss was modified by Weisse, 'who sought to discover the mystery of the life of Jesus, in part, by introducing the higher biology of magnetism, and other factors, but rejected, on the mythical hypothesis, what could not be forced into this magic circle. Bruno Bauer, finally, passed beyond Strauss, claiming to find not harmless poetry, but designed inventions, in the descriptions of the evangelists. The Jew, Salvador, regarded the life of Jesus from the standpoint of modern Jewish enlightenment, but retained the historical personality of Jesus, reducing it, of course, to that of a simple Jewish reformer and demagogue.

¹ See the titles of the works below, and comp. Hase, supra, and Ammon, Fortbildung d. Christenthums zur Weltreligion, vol. iv, p. 156 sqq. It is remarkable that Hess received the impulse to treat the life of Jesus from Middleton's Biography of Cicero.

All of these negative efforts resulted simply in a more thorough investigation of the subject under discussion. Not only were numberless works issued in reply to Strauss, but the life of Jesus itself was studied with a universal breadth of inquiry that could only be productive of gain to science, even though inquirers occupied very diverse points of view, and were influenced by very various prepossessions.¹ We refer also to the Dutch works of Meijboom, Van Oosterzee, and others. Bunsen announced, prospectively, a new "Life of Jesus," but it never appeared.² Ewald's History of Israel, on the other hand, entered on the life of Jesus with the fifth volume, the author expressly designating it the "Life of Christ," and treating it as such, making use of independent criticism upon details, but preserving the sacred contents as a whole. This has influenced the character of his representations also, in which Strauss was unable to find more than a "deafening volume of words and phrases." Riggerbach's lectures present the portrait of the "Lord Jesus" in a simple manner, their tendency being apologetic and harmonizing, combined, however, with the steady aim to do justice to the questions raised by science by a thorough examination of details.

A period of cessation and quietude now seemed to open, which Renan. was suddenly disturbed by the publication of the Life of Jesus by Renan, in France, through which an agitation was produced that equaled the one caused by Strauss thirty years before. Numerous editions and translations have placed it upon the same level with the most recent productions of the lighter literature of France for the great world of readers, which it is designed to reach. The science of Germany could not rest satisfied with the work, though in it the learning of the Orientalist vied with the captivating rhetoric of the fine writer, to warp the judgment of sentimental amateurs. Schenkel, who had expressed the opinion that the great theme could only be adequately treated upon German soil, now came to the front with his Character of Jesus Portrayed, which had been in preparation during an extended period. Simultaneously with this work, Strauss published, not a new edition of his former work, but a new revision, adapted for the people. In this, as in the other work, the criticism of sources comes into play, combined with the appropriation of the negative results obtained by other laborers in this field. An enormous number of replies and treatises in opposition to the works of Strauss, Schenkel, and Renan were written by scholars in both the Roman Catholic and Protestant communions; so that we again stand in the midst of a crisis, which was introduced by those works. How far we are from having reached the end may be seen from the fact, that the opinions of the latest writers are entirely diverse upon the question of the early character of sources (the original Matthew and Mark); but it may be said, in the meantime, "In magnis voluisse sat est." Time must show to what extent the work by Keim, which is now concluded, will have contributed to the advancement of the inquiry. It has, at any rate, taken an important step toward the goal for which the efforts of science were directed from the vantage ground secured by its former progress. But when shall the time come that the Church, no longer being in conflict with the results obtained by science, but rather delivered from prejudice thereby, shall see the face of the Lord in its purity and its greatness, in the combined historical dignity and divine glory, which are not bestowed on him by us, but which are his from the beginning and are secured to him for all eternity?

¹ "The numerous lives of Jesus of the better class represent a new dedication of the theological temple, which, it is to be hoped, will not speedily be brought to a close. . . . But it will be necessary to remain patient if the variegated merchandise of ordered or fabricated works connects itself with the dedication." J. P. Lange, Pref. to Leben Jesu, pp. iii, iv.

² Preface to Hippolytus, p. xlix.

LITERATURE.

- * J. G. Herder, vom Erlöser der Menschen nach unsern drei ersten Evangelien. Riga, 1796.
- * — von Gottes Sohn, der Welt Heiland, nach Johannes Evang. Riga, 1797.
- * J. J. Hess, Lebensgeschichte Jesu. 8th ed. Zürich, 1822 f. 3 vols. (1st ed. and special title: Gesch. der drei letzten Lebensjahre Jesu. Lpz., 1768. 2 vols.)
- J. A. G. Meyer, Versuch e. Vertheid. u. Erläut. der Gesch. Jesu und der Apostel allein aus griech. und röm. Profanscribenten. Hann., 1805.
- F. B. Reinhard, Versuch über den Plan, welchen der Stifter der christl. Religion zum Besten der Menschheit entwarf. Wittenb., 1781; 5th ed., with additions by A. L. Heubner. Wittenb., 1830.
- J. B. R. Hacker, Jesus, der Weise von Nazareth, ein Ideal aller denkbaren Grösse. Lpz., 1800–3. 2 vols.
- J. C. Greiling, das Leben Jesu von Nazareth. Halle, 1818.

- † A. Bodent, die erste u. heiligste Gesch. der Menschh., Jesus von Naz.; historisch, mit stetem Rückblick auf griech., röm. u. jüd. Religionsgeschichte. Gemünd, 1818–22. 4 parts.
- H. E. G. Paulus, das Leben Jesu, als Grundlage einer reinen Geschichte des Christenthums. Heidelb., 1828. 2 vols.
- * K. Hase, das Leben Jesu. Ein Lehrb. zunächst für akad. Vorlesungen. Lpz., 1829. Amer. ed., transl. by J. F. Clarke. Bost., 1860.
- Gesch. Jesu. Nach akad. Vorles. Lpz., 1875.
- * Dav. Fr. Strauss, das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet. Tüb., 1835 f. 2 vols. 4th ed., 1840. Comp. Hase's Reviews and Replies, in Life of Jesus, (pp. 30–40.) Clarke's ed. Boston, 1860.¹
- Streitschriften zur Vertheid. meiner Schrift üb. das L. J. Tüb., 1837. 3 parts.
- * A. Neander, das Leben Jesu Christi in seinem geschichtl. Zusammenh. und seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung dargestellt. Hamb., 1837; 7th ed. Goth., 1873. Amer. ed., translated by M'Clintock and Blumenthal. N. Y., 1852.
- K. G. W. Theile, zur Biographie Jesu. Lpz., 1837.
- † J. Kuhn, das Leben Jesu, wissenschaftlich bearbeitet. Mainz, 1838.
- * C. H. Weisse, die evang. Gesch. kritisch u. philos. bearb. Lpz., 1838. 2 vols.
- O. Krabbe, Vorlesungen über das Leben Jesu. Hamb., 1839.
- J. Salvador, Jésus-Christ et sa doctrine. Histoire de la naissance de l'église, de son organisation et de ses progrès pendant le premier siècle. Paris, 1838. 2 vols. Translated by J. Jacobson. Dresden, 1841.
- Jul. Hartmann, das Leben Jesu nach den Ev. geschichtl. dargest. für gebildete Leser. Stuttg., 1837–39. 2 vols.
- C. F. v. Ammon, die Geschichte des Lebens Jesu mit steter Rücksicht auf die vorhandenen Quellen. Lpz., 1842–47. 3 vols.
- † A. Riegler, das Leben Jesu Chr., krit., histor. u. prakt. erklärt. Bamb., 1843 f. 5 vols.
- † J. N. Sepp, das Leben Christi (with Preface by Görres). Regensb., 1843 ff. 4 vols. 2d ed., 6 vols., 1853–62. Neue (Titel-) Ausg., 1862–65.
- J. P. Lange, das Leben Jesu nach den Evang. Heidelb., 1844–47. 3 vols. Eng. ed., translated by Dods. 4 vols. Edinb., 1872.
- J. A. H. Ebrard, wissenschaftl. Kritik der evang. Geschichte. Frankf., 1842. 2 vols. 3d ed., 1868.
- W. J. Lichtenstein, Lebensgesch. des Herrn Jesu Christi in chronologischer Uebersicht. Erl., 1856.
- H. Ewald, Geschichte Christus und seiner Zeit (vol. 5 der Geschichte des Volkes Israel). Gött., 1855. 3d ed., 1867.
- * Ch. J. Riggenbach, Vorlesungen über das Leben des Herrn Jesu. Basel, 1858.
- M. Baumgarten, die Geschichte Jesu für das Verständniss der Gegenwart in öffentl. Vorträgen dargestellt. Bransch., 1859.
- * E. Renan, vie de Jésus. Par. 1863. Eng. ed., passim.
- E. Weizsäcker, Untersuchungen über die evang. Geschichte, ihre Quellen und den Gang ihrer Entwicklung. Gotha, 1864.
- * D. Schenkel, das Charakterbild Jesu. Wiesb., 1864. 4th ed., 1873. Translated by Furness. Phila., 1866.

¹ Called forth: W. Hoffmann (Stuttgart, 1836). Hengstenberg (evang. Kirchenztg., 1836). Schweizer (Dignität des Religionsstifters, Stud. u. Kritik., 1837. Heft 2). Tholuck (Glaubwürdigkeit der evang. Gesch., Hamb., 1837 u. 5.). Ullmann (historisch od. mythisch? Hamb., 1838). — E. Luthardt, die modernen Darstellungen des Lebens Jesu, eine Besprechung der Schriften von Strauss, Renan, Schenkel, 1864. Riggenbach, Vortrag auf der evang. Alliance in Amsterdam, 1867.

- D. Schenkel, das Christusbild der Apostel u. der nachapost. Zeit. Lpz., 1879.
- * D. F. Strauss, das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk bearbeitet. Lpz., 1864. 3d ed., 1874.
- E. de Pressensé, Jesus-Christ. Son temps, sa vie, son oeuvre. Paris, 1865. Amer. ed., N. Y.
- * Fr. Schleiermacher, das Leben Jesu, Vorlesungen an der Univ. zu Berlin im Jahre 1832; pub. by K. A. Rutenik. Berlin, 1864. (Sämmtl. Werke VI. Literar. Nachlass, zur Theol. I.)
- D. F. Strauss, der Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte. (Criticism on Schleiermacher's "Leben Jesu.") Berlin, 1865.
- † J. Langen, die letzten Lebenstage Jesu. Freiburg, 1864.
- C. C. J. Bunsen, Bibelwerk. Vol. 9. Lpz., 1865.
- * Th. Keim, Geschichte Jesu von Nazara in ihrer Verkettung mit dem Gesamtleben seines Volkes frei untersucht und ausführlich erzählt. 3 vols. Zürich, 1867-72.
- * Th. Keim, Geschichte Jesu nach den Ergebnissen heutiger Wissenschaft für weitere Kreise übersichtlich erzählt. Zür., 1872. 2d ed. 1875.
- Gaspari, chronologisch-geograph. Einl. in das Leben Jesu Christi. Hamb., 1869.
- Znmpt, das Geburtsjahr Christi. Lpz., 1869.
- Krüger-Velthusen, das Leben Jesu. 1872.
- J. Häberlin, das Leben J. im Lichte uns. Zeit. Frauenf., 1874.
- F. Clemens, Jes. der Nazarener. 5th ed. Berl., 1874. 2 vols.
- L. D. Bröcker, Untersuchungen üb. d. Evv. u. das L. J. Hamb., 1874.
- † P. Schegg, 6 Bb. des Lebens Jesu. Freib., 1874 ff.
- † Panth. Naumann, das Leben uns. Herrn u. Heil. Jesu Christi, pub. by Th. Rovack. Prag., 1875. 3 vols.
- J. Lindenmeyer, Gesch. Jesu nach d. hl. Schr. Basel, 1875 f.
- Wittichen, das Leben Jesu in urkundl. Darst. Jena, 1876.
- L. Noack, die Gesch. Jesu auf Grund freier gesh. Untersuchungen. 2d ed. Mannh., 1876.
- E. G. Laino, das Leben Jesu auf Grundlage des vornehmsten Gebots. 2d ed. Stuttg. 1876 f. 3 parts.
- A. Wünsche, der lebensfreudige Christus der synopt. Evv. im Gegensatz zum leidenden Messias der Kirche. Lpz., 1876.
- J. Grimm, Gesch. der öffentl. Thätigk. Jesu. Regensb., 1878.
- E. Marius, die Persönlichk. Jesu Chr. mit bes. Rücksicht auf die Mythologien u. Mysterien der alten Völker. Lpz., 1879.
- L. Richou, le Messie dans les livres histor. de la Bible et Jésus Chr. dans le Evan-giles. 2 voll. Paris, 1879.

APOLOGETICAL.

- Wizenmann, die Geschichte Jesu nach Matthäus, pub. by Auberlen. 1864.
- H. Weiss, sechs Vorträge über die Person Jesu Christi. Ingolstadt, 1864.
- * F. L. Steinmeyer, Apologet. Beiträge. I. Die Wunderthaten des Herrn. Berl., 1866. II. Die Leidengesch. des Herrn. 1868. III. Die Auferstehungsgesch. 1871. IV. Die Gesch. der Geburt des Herrn und s. ersten Schritte im Leben. 1873.
- E. W. Kolthoff, vita Jesu Chr. a Paulo apostolo adumbrata. Havn., 1862.
- R. Hofmann, das Leben Jesu nach den Apokryphen; im Zusammenh. aus den Quellen erzählt und wissenschaftlich untersucht. Lpz., 1861.
- F. E. Schorch, das Leben Jesu in seiner Angemessenheit zu den religiösen Bedürfnissen des Menschengeschlechts. Lpz., 1841.
- Th. Keim, die menschliche Entwicklung Jesu Christi. Zur., 1860; der geschichtl. Christus. 8 Reden. Zur., 1865 u. 6.; die geschichtliche Würde Jesu. Zur., 1864.

HARMONIES OF THE GOSPELS.

- J. G. L. Kraft, Chronologie u. Harmonie der 4 Evangelien, pub. by Burger Eriangen, 1848.
 W. Strout, New Greek Harmony of the four Gospels. Lond., 1853.
 G. Volkmar, die kanon. Synoptiker in Uebersicht, etc. u. das geschichtliche vom Leben Jesu. Zur., 1876.
 F. Piper, de externa vitæ J. Chr. chronol. recte constituenda. Götting., 1835.
 H. Sevin, Chronologie des Lebens Jesu. 2d ed. Tüb., 1874.
 — S. die Synopsen § 52 a. E. und die Lit. zu den Evv. § 56, b. γ.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

LIFE OF CHRIST.

- Lyman Abbott, Jesus of Nazareth: His Life and Teachings. New York, 1869. New ed., 1892.
 Samuel J. Andrews, The Life of our Lord upon Earth. New York, 1871.
 H. W. Beecher, Life of Jesus the Christ. Vol. i. N. Y., 1868.
 R. W. Clark, Life Scenes of the Messiah. New York, 1855.
 Howard Crosby, Jesus: His Life and Work. New York, 1870.
 Charles F. Deems, Jesus. New York, 1872.
 C. J. Ellicott, Hist. Lectures on the Life of our Lord Jesus Christ. Lond., 1861.
 F. W. Farrar, The Life of Christ. New York, 1876.
 J. Fleetwood, Life of Christ, passim. (Antiquated.)
 C. Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ. New York, 1877.
 W. Hanna, Our Lord's Life upon Earth. 6 vols. New York, 1870.
 Mrs. A. M. Jameson, History of our Lord as Exemplified in Works of Art. 2 vols. Lond., 1865.
 J. Parker, Ecce Deus. London, 1855.
 J. R. Seeley, Ecce Homo: a Survey of the Life and Work of Jesus Christ. Boston, 1866.
 J. P. Thompson, Jesus of Nazareth. Boston, 1876.

HARMONIES.

- G. W. Clark, A New Harmony of the Four Gospels in English, according to the Common Version. With an Introduction by T. J. Conant. N. Y., 1870.
 Frederick Gardiner, A Harmony of the Four Gospels in Greek, according to the Text of Tischendorf; with a Collation of the Textus Receptus, and of the Texts of Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tregelles. Edinb., 1871.
 — Same, in English. Edinb., 1871.
 Edward Greswell, Dissertations upon the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels. 2d ed. 4 vols. Oxf., 1837.
 James Macknight, Harmony of the Gospels, with Paraphrase and Notes. 5th ed. 2 vols. Lond., 1819.
 Robert Mimpriss, The Gospel Treasury and Treasury Harmony of the Four Evangelists. N. Y., 1869.
 Edward Robinson, A Harmony of the Four Gospels, in Greek, according to the Text of Hahn. Revised ed. Boston, 1868.
 — Same, in English. 8th ed. Boston, 1859.
 George Smith, The Harmony of the Divine Inspirations. N. Y., 1858.
 James Strong, Harmony of the Gospels, in Greek, of the received Text, for the use of Students. N. Y., 1854.

James Strong, A New Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, consisting of a Parallel and Combined Arrangement, on a New Plan, of the Four Evangelists, according to the Authorized Translation. N. Y., 1852.

— Compendium of the Gospels, according to the Arrangement of the Author's Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels. N. Y., 1853.

William Stroud, A New Greek Harmony of the Four Gospels, comprising a Synopsis and a Diatessaron. Lond., 1853.

SECTION V.

THE APOSTLES.

Life of the Apostles and the Founding of the Church, Article "Apostolisches Zeitalter," in Felt, Herzog's Encyclopædie, vol. 1.

The life of the persons by whom the doctrine of the kingdom of God in the world was introduced, is connected with the life of Jesus. Here, there is less interest in the Twelve, several of whom are known to us only by name, than in the men and their coadjutors who were most successful in this work of founding the Christian community. Among these Paul is preëminent by reason of his character, teaching, and deeds.

Concerning the wider and more limited meanings of the word ἀπόστολος, see the New Testament. A comparison of the history of the apostles by Luke with the list of the apostles in the Gospels (Matt. x, 1-4) will reveal to most inquirers the fact, that the sacred narrative leaves us in the dark with regard to the history of a majority of the Twelve. Of these, Peter, James, and John are prominent, even in the Gospel records, and we have relatively more information respecting them than others, although the last days of both Peter and John lie beyond the limits of the canon, and fall within the realm of tradition. This applies still more fully to the work of other apostles. A new period of development evidently begins with Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, who, Paul. supported by Timothy, Silvanus, and Titus, not only extended Christianity to the furthest outward limits, but, together with John, also developed its profound internal character, and furnished the greatest and most important contribution toward the doctrinal canon of the New Testament. He became the founder of a body of doctrine, not theoretically, but out of his inmost experience, and through the revelation which, according to his own testimony, was imparted to him.¹ He was the firstfruits of those in whom the grace of God in Christ was glorified, and in whom the Gospel was demonstrated to be the power of God. The exposition of the book of Acts and the Pauline epistles is, of course, the work of exegetical theology. But this is merely a work preliminary to the history, while, to combine the work of the apostles into a single picture, belongs strictly to the department of historical science. At this point we stand on the boundary line between sacred and Church history. Though the latter cannot exclude the history of the apostolic age, yet it needs a broader foundation than it there finds. For this

¹ Comp. *H. Paret, Paulus u. Jesus, Observations on the Relation of Paul and his Teaching to the Person, the Life, and the Teaching of the Christ of History, in Jahrb. für Deutsche Theologie.

The apostolic age requiring separate treatment. reason the apostolic age, like the life of Jesus, has received a separate treatment in theological literature.

Peculiar difficulties attach to this treatment, however, because recent criticism has endeavored to shake many points in the primitive history of Christianity, as found in the apostolic history by Luke, and in the apostolic epistles, and has sought to explain, by later events, the history of the older heresies, and what has been regarded as belonging to primitive times. Much that the Church regarded as belonging to the "apostolic age" was in this way classed under the "post-apostolic." The destructive efforts upon the apostolic history emanating from the Tübingen school, like the Life of Jesus, by Strauss, gave rise to apologetic attempts at reconstruction, some of which ascribed an importance to the old ecclesiastical traditions that was scarcely to be looked for after all the preliminary critical work accomplished in former decades. The controversy still goes on, and much remains for more thorough investigation, in which research historical inquiry is to take a part equal to that of exegesis.

LITERATURE OF APOSTOLIC HISTORY.

- J. J. Hess, Geschichte und Schriften der Apostel Jesu. Zürich, 1788. 4th ed., 1820-22. 3 vols.
 Ch. F. Lücke, comm. de ecclesia christianor. apostolica. Gott., 1813.
 G. J. Planck, Geschichte des Christenthums in der Periode seiner ersten Einführung in die Welt. Gött., 1818. 2 vols.
 * A. Neander, Geschichte der Pflanzung und Zeitung der christl. Kirche durch die Apostel. Hamb., 1832. Lond. ed., transl. by Ryland, 1851.
 R. Rothe, die Anfänge der christl. Kirche u. ihrer Verfassung. Vol. 1. Wittenb., 1837.
 A. F. Gfrörer, Geschichte des Urchristenthums. Stuttg., 1838. 3 vols.
 F. C. A. Schwegler, das nachapostol. Zeitalter. Tüb., 1845, f. 2 vols. (Includes the apostolic age, but by this author considered, of course, in the post-apostolic.)
 J. B. Trautmann, die apostolische Kirche. Lpz., 1848; new ed., 1857.
 K. Wieseler, Chronologie des apost. Zeitalters bis zum Tode der App. Paulus und Petrus. Gött., 1848.
 M. Baumgarten, die Apostelgeschichte oder der Entwicklungsgang der Kirche von Jerusalem bis Rom. Braunsch., 1852. 2 vols. 2d ed., 1859.
 H. W. J. Thiersch, die Kirche im apostol. Zeitalter und die Entstehung der neutestam. Schriften. Frankf., 1852. 3d ed. Augsburg, 1879.

- * E. Reuss, Histoire de la théologie chrétienne au siècle apostolique. Paris, 1852. 2 vols. 2. ed. 1860. Lond. ed., transl. by Annie Harwood, 1872.
- H. Ewald, Geschichte des apostol. Zeitalters bis zur Zerstörung Jerusalems. (Vol. vi., Hist. of the People of Israel.) 8d ed. Gött., 1868.
- E. Renan, les apôtres. Par., 1866. The Same, les évangiles et la seconde génération chrétienne. Par., 1877.
- E. Ferrière, les apôtres, etc. Par., 1879.
- Comp. the works in Church History, cited below, of Lange, Lechler, Schaff, Ritschl, and the commentaries, in the Exegetical Literature, on the Acts of the Apostles.
- Popular: Isaak da Costa, die Apostel-Geschichte für Geistliche u. d. Gemeinde ausgelegt. Translated from the Dutch by A. Reifert. Brem., 1860. 2 vols.

LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

- * K. Schrader, der Apostel Paulus. Lpz., 1830-36. 5 parts.
- J. T. Hemsén, der Apostel Paulus; sein Leben, Wirken und seine Schriften. Pub. by F. Lücke. Gött., 1830.
- H. A. Schott, Erörterung einiger wichtigen chronologischen Punkte in der Lebensgeschichte des Apostels Paulus. Jena, 1832.
- * F. C. Baur, Paulus der Apostel Jesu Christi. Stuttg., 1845. 2d ed., by E. Zeller. Lpz., 1866 f.
- Comp. the Replies by Dietlein (Halle, 1845), and Thiersch (Frankf., 1852).
- A. Fleury, St. Paul et Senèque. Par., 1853. 2 vols.
- * A. Hausrath, der Apostel Paulus. Heidelb., 1865. 2d ed. 1872.
- F. Bungener, S. Paul. Sa vie, son oeuvre, ses épîtres. Par., 1867.
- * Ch. F. Trip, Paulus nach der Apostelgeschichte. Leyd., 1866.
- E. Renan, Paulus. (Par., 1869.) Eng. and Amer. eds., passim.
- M. Krenkel, Paulus, der Apostel der Heiden. Lpz., 1869.
- Popular: H. Lang, das Leben des Ap. Paulus. Winterth., 1866. Schwalb, der Ap. Paulus. 6 Vorträge. Zur., 1876. O. Funke, St. Paulus zu Wasser und zu Lande. Brem., 1877.
- Comp. the article Paulus, der Apostel, u. seine Schriften, by J. P. Lange, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop.
- On John: M. Krenkel (Berl., 1871). J. H. Scholten, der Ap. Joh. in Kleinasien. From the Dutch, by Spiegel. Berl., 1872. Also the exhaustive article on Paul, accompanied by maps of his tours, in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, vol. vii.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

On the Apostles in general, see Mant, Biography of the Apostles. Lond., 1840; Richard Whateley, Lectures on the Character of our Lord's Apostles, and especially their Conduct at the Time of his Apprehension and Trial. (Lond., Parkers, 1853); under each name in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia; and the special treatment in the Histories of the Ancient Period, cited on pp. 120-124 of this work.

PAUL AND JOHN.

- Henry Blunt, Lectures upon the History of St. Paul, delivered during Lent, at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Upper Chelsea. Phila., 1839.
- C. M. Butler, St. Paul in Rome; Lectures delivered in the Legation of the United States of America, in Rome. Phila., 1865.

- William Cave, Antiquitates Apostolicæ; or, the Lives, Acts, and Martyrdoms of the Holy Apostles of our Saviour. To which are added, Lives of the two Evangelists, St. Mark and St. Luke. With an Introductory Essay by Henry Stebbing. 2 vols. Lond., 1836.
- W. J. Conybeare and J. S. Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, comprising a complete Biography of the Apostle, and a Paraphrastic Translation of his Epistles. 2 vols. Lond., 1853, et passim.
- Philip Stanhope Dodd, A View of the Evidence Afforded by the Life and Ministry of St. Peter to the Truth of the Christian Revelation. Lond., 1837.
- F. W. Farrar (Canon), The Life and Work of St. Paul. N. Y., 1880.
- W. R. Freemantle, From Athens to Rome. Six Lectures on St. Paul's Visit to the Chief Cities of the Roman Empire. Lond., 1869.
- John S. Howson, The Character of St. Paul. (Hulsean Lectures.) N. Y., 1873.
- The Metaphors of St. Paul and Companions of St. Paul, with an Introduction by H. B. Hackett, D.D. N. Y., 1872.
- Scenes in the Life of St. Paul. Lond., 1866.
- Thomas Lewin, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. 2 vols. Lond., 1878.
- Alfred Lee, The Life of the Apostle John, in a Series of Practical Discourses. N. Y., 1852.
- James M. Macdonald, The Life and Writings of St. John. Edited with an Introduction, by J. S. Howson. N. Y., 1877.
- J. R. Macduff, St. Paul at Rome; or, the Teaching, Fellowship, and Dying Testimony of the Great Apostle in the City of the Cæsars. Lond., 1871.
- The Footsteps of St. Paul. N. Y., 1855.
- Footsteps of St. Peter. N. Y.
- F. A. Malleon, The Acts and Epistles of St. Paul. Lond., 1881.
- William Paley, Horæ Paulinæ; or, the Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul Evincèd. N. Y., 1851, et passim.
- Charles Shakespeare, St. Paul at Athens; Spiritual Christianity in Relation to some Aspects of Modern Thought. N. Y., 1879.
- James Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, with Dissertations on the Life and Writings of St. Luke, and the Ships and Navigation of the Ancients. 4th ed., Revised and Corrected by Walter E. Smith, with a Preface by the Bishop of Carlisle, and Memoir. Lond., 1880.
- James Tate, The Horæ Paulinæ of William Paley, Carried out and Illustrated in a Continuous History of the Apostolic Labors and Writings of St. Paul, on the Basis of the Acts. Lond., 1840.

SECTION VI.

THE HISTORICAL FORM AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE BIBLE.

BIBLICAL DOGMATICS AND THE HISTORY OF DOCTRINES.

J. P. Gabler, De justo discrimine theologiæ biblicæ et dogmaticæ regulisque recte utriusque finibus, Alt., 1787, reprinted in Kleine theol. Schriften, Ulm, 1831; A. G. F. Schürmer, Bibl. Dogmatik in ihrer Stellung u. ihrem Verhältnisse zum Ganzen d. Theologie, Breslau, 1860; K. W. Stein, Begriff u. Behandlungsart d. Bibl. Theologie, in Kell u. Tzschirner's Analecten, vol. III, No. 1; D. Schenkel, Aufgabe d. Bibl. Theol. i. d. gegenwärtigen Entwicklungsstadien d. theol. Wissenschaft, Stud. u. Krit., 1853, I, pp. 40-66; Ch. F. Schmid, Interesse u. Stand d. Bibl. Theologie des N. T. in unserer Zeit, in Tübing. Zeitschr. für Theol., 1868, 4; Nitzsch, in Herzog's Encykl. II, p. 319 sqq.; Al. v. Oettingen, Gesch. Charakter d. Bibl. Theologie Neuen Test., etc., in Dorpat, Zeitschr., 1870, pp. 1-54; T. D. Bernard, The Progress of Doctrine in the New Test.

ment (Bampton Lect. for 1864), Lond., 1864; James Donaldson, A Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine, from the death of the Apostles to the Nicene Council. 3 vols., Lond., 1864-66; Robert Rainy, Delivery and Development of Christian Doctrine (Cunningham Lectures), Edinb., 1874.

Bible doctrine, like sacred history, results from exegesis, and, like sacred history, furnishes the basis for its further historical development. Inasmuch, however, as the contents of this study are systematic and didactic in their nature, it is found that the boundaries of exegetical, historical, and systematic theology cross each other upon its soil, but in such a way as to make the historical element its chief foundation.¹

Biblical dogmatics² is the intellectual bond which unites exegetical, historical, and dogmatical studies, the focus where the various rays are collected. On this account it forms, in many respects, a luminous point in theological study. The point from which it is regarded is of importance. If, without reference to systematic development, it be considered simply as a collocation of proof texts in behalf of dogmatics, it becomes the immediate fruit of exegesis; and, in point of fact, only an accomplished exegete is fitted to work in the field of biblical dogmatics. But if it be regarded as combined into a system, as governed by any leading idea, it will approach the positive science of dogmatics itself. Between these two operations, however, is a third, namely, the task of comprehending the revelation of the Bible itself as a historical fact in connexion with the spiritual development of mankind in other directions. In this way we come to occupy the ground of history. Biblical dogmatics is thus simply the internal side of sacred history. The representation of the life of Jesus requires a representation of his doctrine, or, better, of his divine and human consciousness, and his relation to the world and the history of mankind as conditioned by that consciousness, just as a proper conception of the idea that moved and determined his entire life is the πρῶτον κινεῖν of Christian dogmatics in general.¹

Biblical dogmatics a theological centre.

¹ Schleiermacher, Danz, and Rosenkranz regard it as a historical science. Comp. Gabler, p. 183 seqq.

² The name "Biblical Theology" which is preferred by some (Baumgarten-Crusius, Hävernick, and, more recently, H. Schultz), is evidently either too broad, if the term theology be taken in the modern sense of a collection of the theological sciences, or too narrow, if it be taken to mean merely the doctrine concerning God. Comp. de Wette, Bibl. Dogm., and Danz, p. 301, note 1. The term Dogmatics may also be found to be too limited in its meaning; as Hävernick says, "the fundamental ideas of ethics must also be included." Beck's expression, "The biblical science of doctrine," would, accordingly, be the most appropriate. But so long as the ethical ideas alone are involved, and are not developed into a system of biblical ethics, the phrase Biblical Dogmatics may appropriately be retained. On the inadequacy of the term dogmatics in general, see later, on Systematic Theology.

Life and doctrine dissolve into each other with Jesus as with none of our mortal race. The life of an apostle, too, cannot be given in any other way than by placing before our eyes his inner life, as it was determined by intercourse with Jesus or by familiarity with his teaching.² The history of doctrines issues from Church History, and becomes a separate branch of it. In the same way the material for the history of doctrines which is contained in the Bible can be utilized for the purposes of historical examination. Thus we acquire a juxtaposition of biblical doctrine as a point of departure for the history of Christian doctrines; with the difference, however, that it is not yet wrought out in scientific form, and is not a complete body of dogmatic ideas. These doctrines are rather pliable substances, possessing the capacity for life, and include the germs of ethical as well as of dogmatical development, in accordance with which the systems of faith and morality in the Bible are chiefly given in combination.

A largely systematizing treatment, or a purely historical and genetic procedure, may prevail in this regard, however, according as the contents of biblical doctrine are apprehended as a whole, thus constituting the doctrine of the Old and New Testaments; or are divided, to correspond with different times and persons, in thus forming the doctrine of Hebraism, of the later Judaism, of Jesus and the apostles; or, with a still closer reference to persons, forming the teaching of Paul, of John, and others. Each of these is given, so far as possible, in its genetic development, which holds good especially of the Pauline system of doctrines.³ The more flexible the treatment of biblical dogmatics becomes in this regard, and the more the material which has crystallized into ideas is brought into its original flowing condition, the more closely will it approximate the history of doctrines, and the more decidedly will it fall within the historical field. But if the leading object be to represent, in its internal connexion, and as the foundation of ecclesiastical doctrine, the substance of ¹ On the peculiar difficulties of this task, see Schirmer, pp. 51-55. Should the first Gospels, or St. John, furnish the type?

² How St. Paul attained to his theology, and what is the relation of his teaching and that of the other apostles to the teaching of Jesus, are important inquiries in this connexion. See the treatise by Paret, referred to above.

³ An analogous arrangement is possible in connexion with the Old Testament also, e. g., the religion of Abraham, Mosaism, the religion of David, Solomon, Isaiah, etc. The individual element is less prominent in the Old Testament, however, being lost in the theocratic. Comp. Schirmer, p. 50.

Bible teaching as developed through exegetical¹ and historical inquiry, biblical dogmatics will partake more largely of the nature of systematic theology. It will be distinguished from dogmatics proper, however, by confining itself entirely to the beginning, i. e., to the primitive Bible times, without in any way intruding upon ecclesiastical development.

A certain view exists which designedly ignores such development, so that the history of doctrines becomes an article of luxury, and chooses to know no other than biblical dogmatics. This opinion will be examined hereafter, in connexion with the history of doctrines. We may observe here, however, that, in assigning this position to biblical dogmatics, the aim is not to degrade it to a mere historical science, which could only be said with propriety if history were understood to designate what is antiquated. It is, on the other hand, our intention to lift it out from the rigid trammels of the letter into the living organism which forms the subject of historical inquiry. We do not, however, accept the view which holds that what was original is inferior and imperfect, and needs to be purified and elevated into the character of a higher wisdom.² The biblical doctrine, on the contrary, although by no means finished and complete in itself, and certainly needing to be explained in harmony with its historical development, continues to retain its normal dignity. The task of biblical dogmatics will be to so present this doctrine in its original vitality and its universal bearings upon the well-being of mankind, that the eternal and ever applicable idea of the God-given truth shall clearly and powerfully shine through the temporal veil of conceptions.³

SECTION VII.

HISTORY OF BIBLICAL DOGMATICS.

This science really began with the Reformation,⁴ for it was the Reformation that delivered the whole of the science of dogmatics from its scholastic fetters, and established it on the Bible. But ¹ In exegesis the leading object is to recognize the tendency of the subjectivity and individuality in the original form; in dogmatics we seek to discover the identity and truth of the matter. The unity of both tendencies, accompanied with a steady consciousness of their diversity, must therefore be the governing idea in biblical dogmatics. Usteri, Entwickl. d. Paulin. Lehrbegr., 4th ed., Pref., p. vii.

² Comp. Strauss, Glaubenslehre, i, p. 177, and Schelling, Methode des akad. Studiums, p. 197 seqq.

³ Very much that is valuable on the idea and method of this science may be found in Hävernicks, Bibl. Dogmatik, p. 1 seqq.

⁴ This does not deny that biblical theology, in the wide sense, has its origin in common with that of theology in general; for "the fathers of Alexandrian Christianity biblical dogmatics was yet united with ecclesiastical by the Reformers Melancthon and Calvin; and when, in the seventeenth century, scholasticism again intruded itself into dogmatics, it was found necessary to remain contented with mere observations, as in Vitringa, or, so far as biblical dogmatics as distinguished from ecclesiastical was concerned, with expositions of Scripture texts, as in Seb. Schmidius, Collegium Biblicum, Argent., 1671-76; Hulaemann, Vindiciae S. S. per loca classica systematis theol., Lips., 1679; Majus, Theologia prophetica, Francof., 1710; and Baier, Analysis et Vindicatio illustrium S. S. dictorum, Altorf, 1719. Spener's pietism, at the close of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, again aroused a feeling for the restoration of the simple teaching of the Scriptures, but particularly with reference to its practical rather than its scientific aspects.

Theologia Biblica was understood to signify a popular presentation of the system of belief. It is remarkable that rationalism became the agency for turning back the current into the proper channel, its tendency in opposition to ecclesiastical orthodoxy causing it to labor for the separation of the Bible doctrine from that of the Church, and to endeavor to present it in its purity. In this effort it took away, however, the brightest of the peculiar ornaments of doctrine, so that the thinning out process of rationalizing abstraction left only the caput mortuum of a supposed rational doctrine. J. G. Semler published his historical and critical collections on the "so-called proof passages of dogmatics" (Halle, 1764-68) in this spirit, and Gabler wrote the work mentioned above with a like aim. The supernaturalists of that century saw themselves compelled, in the interests of a positive belief in the Bible teaching, to recognize the distinction between biblical and ecclesiastical doctrine. The elder Tübingen school (Storr, Flatt, Bengel, Steudel) took the lead in this direction. The Biblical Theology of G. T. Zachariae (five parts, the last by Vollborth, Gott., 1771-86), for instance, was written from the orthodox point of view; while Hufnagel's work (Erl., 1785-89) was composed in the interest of rationalism. Ammon, L. Bauer, and Bretschneider were likewise more or less in sympathy with the latter tendency. Concerning Kaiser, de Wette, Baumgarten-Crusius, von Colln, Vatke, and Bruno Bauer, and also with regard to the more recent development of this science in general, comp. Hävernick, Bibl. Dogm., 2d ed., p. 8 sqq., and Nitzsch, supra.

were essentially biblical theologians;" comp. Nitzsch, p. 220, where attention is also called to the services of Erasmus, in whose works "the most valuable outlines of a Theologia Biblica are contained."

LITERATURE OF BIBLICAL DOGMATICS.

I. IN GENERAL.

- C. F. Ammon, Biblische Theologie. Erl., 1792. 2d ed., 1801-2. 3 vols.
 G. L. Baucr, Theologie des A. T. Lpz., 1796. Des N. T., ebend., 1800-2. 4 vols.
Bibl. Moral des A. T., ebend., 1803-5. 2 vols. Des N. T., ebend., 1804-5. 2 vols.
 K. G. Bretschneider, System. Darstellung der Dogmatik und Moral der apokryphischen Schriften des A. T. Lpz., 1806.
 L. D. Cramer, Versuch einer system. Darstellung der Moral der Apok. des A. T. Lpz., 1815.
 H. H. Chedius, Uransichten des Christenthums. Altona, 1808.
 G. Ph. Ch. Kaiser, die bibl. Theologie, oder Judaismus und Christianismus. Erlang., 1813-21. 2 vols.
 * W. M. L. de Wette, bibl. Dogmatik A. und N. T. oder krit. Darstellung der Religionslehre des Hebraismus, des Judenthums und des Urchristenthums (1st part of the Lehrb. der christl. Dogmatik). Berlin, 1818. 3d ed., 1831.
 L. F. O. Baumgarten-Crusius, Grundzüge der bibl. Theol. Jena, 1828.
 D. von Cölln, bibl. Theologie: herausg. von D. Schulz. Lpz. 1836. 2 vols.
 W. Vatke, die Religion des A. T. Berl., 1835.
 B. Bauer, die Religion des A. T. 2 vols. Berl., 1838 f.
 J. G. Knapp, bibl. Glaubenslehre. Halle, 1840. Amer. ed., transl. by Woods. N. Y., 1848.
 * J. T. Beck, die christl. Lehrwissenschaft nach den biblischen Urkunden. Stuttgart, 1841. 2d ed., 1875.
 J. Ch. F. Steudel, Vorlesungen über die Theologie des A. T. Edited by Oehler Berl., 1840.
 * G. F. Oehler, Prolegomena zur Theologie des A. T. Stuttg., 1845.
 * H. A. C. Hävernick, Vorlesungen, über die Theol. des A. T.; edited by Hahn, pref. by Dorner. Erlang., 1848. 2d ed., with notes by Herm. Schultz. Frankf. a. M., 1863.
 * J. L. S. Lutz, bibl. Dogmatik, des N. T.; edited by R. Rüetschi, pref. by Schneckenburger. Pforzheim, 1847. 2d ed., 1861.
 * Chr. F. Schmid, bibl. Theologie des N. T.; herausg. von C. Weizsäcker. Stuttg., 1853. 2 vols. 3d ed., 1864.
 L. Roack, die bibl. Theol. Einleit. ins A. und N. T. Halle, 1853.
 G. L. Hahn, die Theologie des N. T. 1st vol. Lpz., 1854.
 Chr. F. Baur, Vorlesungen über neutestamentl. Theologie. Hamb., 1864.
 * Herm. Schultz, alttestamentliche Theologie. Die Offenbarungsreligion auf ihrer vorchristl. Entwicklungstufe. 2 vols. Frankf. a. M., 1869. 2d ed., 1878.¹
 J. J. van Oosterzee, die Theologie des Neuen Testaments. Barmen, 1869. Lond. ed. (transl.), 1870.
 * B. Weiss, Lehrbuch der bibl. Theol. des N. Test. Berl., 1868. 3d ed., 1880.
 H. Ewald, die Lehre der Bibel von Gott od. Theologie des alten und neuen Bundes. 4 parts. Lpz., 1871-76.
 G. F. Oehler, Theologie des A. Test. 2 vols. Tüb., 1873-74.
 A. Immer, neutest. Theologie. Bern, 1878.

¹ In the category of Biblical Dogmatics we may name J. Ch. K. v. Hofmann's Schriftthema's, Northinger, 1862-65, 2 parts. 2d ed., 1857-60. It is more systematic than historical. It contains the exegetical basis of dogmatics in general from the author's peculiar point of view.

II. SINGLE SECTIONS. DOCTRINES OF INDIVIDUAL BIBLICAL CHARACTERS AND WRITERS.

1. Old Testament.

- A. Knobel, der Prophetismus der Hebräer. 2 parts. Breslau, 1837.
 E. W. Hengstenberg, Christologie des A. T. und Commentar über die messianischen Weissagungen, der propheten. Berl., 1829-32. 2 vols. Eng. ed. 4 vols. Edinb., 1854-59.
 † J. Bade, Christologie des A. T. Müntz., 1852. 2d ed., 1858. 2 vols.
 J. Engelbert, das negative Verdienst des A. T. um die Unsterblichkeitslehre. Berl., 1857.
 F. W. C. Umbreit, die Sünde. Beitr. zur Theologie des A. T. Gotha, 1853.
 J. H. Kurtz, zur Theologie der Psalmen. Dorpat, 1865.
 A. Kahle, biblische Eschatologie. Eschatologie des Alten Testaments. Gotha, 1870.
 J. C. R. von Hofmann, Weissagung und Erfüllung. Nördl., 1841-44. 2 parts.
 G. Baur, Gesch. der alttest. Weissagung. Giessen, 1861.
 Küper, das Prophetenthum des A. Bundes. Lpz., 1869.
 A. Kuenen, de Godsdienst van Israel tot den ondergang van den Joodschen Staat. Haarlem, 1869.
 — de Profeten en de Profetie onder Israel. Leiden, 1875.
 B. Duhm, Theologie der Propheten als Grundlage für die innere Entwicklungsgesch. der Israel. Religion. Bonn, 1875. Compare on the other hand, R. Smend, Moses apud prophetas. Halle, 1876.
 † H. Zschocke, Theol. der Propheten des A. T. Freib., 1877.
 James Drummond, The Jewish Messiah. Lond., 1877.
 E. Stapfer, les idées religieuses en Palestine à l'époque de Jésus Christ. 2. éd. Paris, 1878.

2. New Testament.

a. Doctrine of Jesus (Biblical Christology):

- Ch. F. Böhme, die Religion Jesu Christi, aus ihren Urkunden dargestellt. Halle, 1825. 2d ed., 1827. The same: die Religion der Apostel Jesu Christi, etc. Halle, 1829.
 A. Schumann, Christus oder die Lehre des A. und N. T. von der Person des Erlösers, bibl. dogmatisch entwickelt. Hamb., 1852. 2 vols.
 G. Volkmar, die Religion Jesu und ihre erste Entwicklung nach dem gegenwärtigen Stande der Wissenschaft. Lpz., 1857.
 W. Beyschlag, die Christologie des N. T. Berl., 1866.
 C. Wittichen, die Idee Gottes als des Vaters. Ein Beitrag zur bibl. Theol. hauptsächlich der synoptischen Reden Jesu. Gött., 1865; die Idee des Menschen. 2. Beitrag zur bibl. Theol., etc. Gött., 1868; die Idee des Reiches Gottes. 3. Beitrag zur bibl. Theol., etc. Gött., 1872.
 W. Weiffenbach, der Wiederkunftsgedanke Jesu. Nach den Synoptikern kritisch untersucht und dargestellt. Lpz., 1873.

b. Doctrines of the Apostles.

- † J. A. B. Lutterbeck, die neutestam. Lehrbegriffe. Mainz, 1852. 2 vols.
 H. Messner, die Lehre der Apostel und neutestamentl. Schriftsteller. Lpz., 1856

c. Doctrinal Views of Individual Apostles and New Testament Writers.

- J. F. Kleuker, Johannes, Petrus, und Paulus als Christologen. Riga, 1875.
 C. Chr. E. Schmidt, de theologia Joannis Apost. II. progr. Jenae, 1801.

- K. R. Köstlin, der Lehrbegriff des Evang. u. der Briefe Johannis. Berl., 1848.
 G. C. L. Frommann, der Johanneische Lehrbegriff, etc. Lpz., 1839.
 A. Hilgenfeld, das Evangelium und die Briefe Johannis nach ihrem Lehrbegriff dargestellt. Halle, 1849.
 * L. Usteri, Entwicklung des Paulinischen Lehrbegriffs in seinem Verhältnisse zur bibl. Dogmatik des N. T. Zürich, 1824. 6th ed., 1851.
 A. F. Dähne, Entwicklung des paulinischen Lehrbegriffs. Halle, 1855.
 J. F. Raebiger, de christologia Paulina contra Baurium commentatio. Vratisl., 1852.
 R. A. Lipsius, die Paulinische Rechtfertigungslehre. Mit Vorwort von Liebner. Lpz., 1853.
 B. Weiss, die petrinische Lehrbegriff, etc. Berl., 1855.
 — der johanneische Lehrbegriff in seinen Grundzügen untersucht. Berl., 1862.
 K. Holsten, zum Evang. des Paulus u. Petrus. Altes u. Neues. Rostock, 1868.
 K. A. Riehm, der Lehrbegriff des Hebräerbriefes. Ludwigab., 1858. 2d ed., 1866.¹
 † Simar die Theologie des heiligen Paulus. Freiburg, 1864.
 A. Sabatier, l'apôtre Paul. Esquisse d'une histoire de sa pensée. Strassb., 1870.
 Ernesti, die Ethik des Apostels Paulus. Braunsch., 1868. 2d ed. Lpz., 1875.
 R. Schmidt, die Paulinische Christologie in ihrem Zusammenhang mit der Heilslehre des Apostels dargestellt. Gött., 1870.
 H. Lüdemann, die Anthropologie des Apostels Paulus und ihre Stellung innerhalb seiner Heilslehre. Kiel, 1872.
 O. Pfeiderer, der Paulinismus. Ein Beitr. zur Gesch. der Urchristl. Theol. Lpz., 1873.
 H. Opitz, das System des Paulus nach seinen Briefen. Gotha, 1873.
 Irons, Christianity as taught by St. Paul. London, 1876.
 Wold. Schmidt, der Lehrgehalt des Jacobus Briefes. Lpz., 1869.
 H. Gebhardt, der Lehrbegr. der Apocalypse. Gotha, 1873.

Biblical Psychology must be named as a branch of Biblical Dogmatics, and has recently met with its special representatives:

- J. T. Beck, Umriss der biblischen Seelenlehre. Stuttg., 1843. 2d ed. Tüb., 1862.
 Fz. Delitzsch, System der biblischen Psychologie. Lpz., 1856. 2d ed., Lpz., 1861.

¹ Earlier: G. W. Meyer, Entwicklung des paul. Lehrbegriffs. Altona, 1801. G. L. Bauer (?), seine Auffassung des Urchristenthums in den paul. Briefen. Lpz., 1806. Ch. F. Böhme, Ideen über das System des Ap. Paulus (in Henke's Museum für Religionswissenschaft III, 540 ff.).

† J. B. Gerhäuser, Charakter und Theologie des Ap. Paulus. Landsh., 1816.

SECTION VIII.

CHURCH HISTORY.

J. Jortin, The Use and Importance of Ecclesiastical History. Pp. 405-454 of vol. vii of Works, Lond., 1772; Herder's Adrastus, Werke zur Philosophie u. Gesch., x, p. 176; J. G. Mueller, Ideen üb. Stud. d. Kirchengeschichte, in his Reliquen alter Zeiten (Lpz., 1808-6, 4 vols.) ii, p. 1 sq.; A. H. Niemeyer, Die hohe Wichtigkeit u. d. zweckmässigste Methode eines fortgesetzten Studiums der Religions- und Kirchengeschichte für praktische Religionslehrer, in the preface to Fuhrman's Handwörterbuch der Kirchengeschichte, Halle, 1826; F. F. Rosegarten, Studium Plan u. Darstellung der Kirchengeschichte, Reval, 1834; K. Ullmann, Stellung des Kirchenhistorikers in uns. Zeit, in Stud. u. Krit., 1832, No. 3, p. 607; J. A. H. Tittmann, Behandlung d. Kirchengeschichte, etc., in Ilgen's Zeitschr. f. hist. Theologie, i, 2, (per contra Gieseler in Stud. u. Krit., 1833, No. 4, p. 1139); Schleiermacher, § 149-194; Danb, Zeitschr. f. spec. Theologie, 1833, vol. i. No. 1; C. W. Niedner, Zeichnung des Umfangs f. d. nothwendigen Inhalt allgem. Gesch. d. Christl. Religion, in Stud. u. Krit., 1833, No. 4, pp. 787-905; Hagenbach in Herzog's Encycl. u. v. Kirchengeschichte, vol. vii, p. 623 sqq.

Philip Schaff, What is Church History? A Vindication of the Idea of Historical Development, Phila., 1846; W. G. T. Shedd, Lectures upon the Philosophy of History, Andover, 1856; — Nature and Influence of the Historic Spirit in Theology, Essays, pp. 53-120, N. Y., 1877; E. C. Smyth, Value of the Study of Church History in Ministerial Education, Andover, 1874; A. P. Stanley (Dean), Three Introductory Lectures on the Study of Ecclesiastical History, Oxf., 1887.

The central point of historical theology is Church History. It is the history of the outwardly visible community within whose limits the kingdom of God, which Christ founded, is manifested, and attains to its ultimate development.

Church history is certainly dependent upon our conception of the real nature of the Church.¹ But a completed doctrine of the Church

¹ On the meaning of ἐκκλησία (ἐκκλ. ηἵε) comp. Gieseler, Ch. Hist., § 1; Bretschneider, Systemat. Entwicklung aller in d. Dogmatik vorkommenden Begriffe (4th ed., 1841), p. 749; Jacobson, Individualität des Wortes u. Begriffes Kirche (in ibid., Kirchenrechtl. Versuchen, I, 58-125). The word "church" (Germ. kirche) has been derived from τὸ κυριακὸν ἢ κυριακή, curia, from the Celtic cyrch or cyleh (central-point, place of assembly), and from the Teutonic kieren, kören, or kiesen (to choose), supposed to have been connected with the Latin circus or with keliku (a tower), etc. Comp. Wackernägel, Alt d. Wörterbuch, and Grävell, Die Kirche: Ursprung u. Bedeutung des deutschen Wortes (Görlitz, 1856); for the derivation of κύριος comp. Grimm, deutsches W. B., v, p. 790 ff.

"There can," says Trench, "be no reasonable doubt that 'church' is originally from the Greek, and signifies 'that which pertains to the Lord,' or 'the house which is the Lord's.' But here a difficulty meets us. How explain the presence of a Greek word in the vocabulary of our Anglo-Saxon forefathers? for that we derive the word mediately from them, and intermediately from the Greek, is certain. What contact, direct or indirect, was there between the languages to account for this? The explanation is curious. While the Anglo-Saxons and other tribes of the Teutonic stock were almost universally converted by their contact with the Latin Church in the western provinces of the Roman Empire, or by its missionaries, yet it came to pass that before this some of the Goths on the lower Danube had been brought to the knowledge of Christ by Greek missionaries from Constantinople; and this word κυριακή, or church, did, with certain others, pass over from the Greek to the Gothic tongue; and these Goths, the first converted to the Christian faith, the first, therefore, that had a Christian vocabulary, lent the word in their turn to the other German tribes, among others to is no more to precede Church history than a doctrine of the person of Christ should form the introduction to a life of Jesus. It is, indeed, impossible to ascertain the nature of the Church in any other way than through its history. No great progress can be made by the adoption of the abstract notion of a religious association, whose origin is, perhaps, conceived after the analogy of Rousseau's Social Contract.¹ It will, accordingly, be necessary to start out, with Gieseler, with the statement that "the Church is a particular and historically given conception," which must not be generalized into that of a religious society. To speak of the Church relations of the Jews, Mohammedans, and Hindus is inexact, and the expression, "the Christian Church," is, properly taken, a tautology, or derives its significance from the contrast to the more specific conceptions of Catholic and Protestant, or of Romish, Spanish, and German Churches.

History to precede doctrine.

The Church not merely a society.

Some writers, such as Stolberg, have extended the idea backward into the Old Testament. But it would be equally proper to include Old Testament Christology in the life of Jesus. Nor does the life of Jesus belong within the range of Church history, which has its beginnings at the point where the circle of the earliest disciples begins to extend beyond the limits of a private association, and where a congregational organization is introduced. Hence Church history commences, strictly, as early as the apostolic period, but not until after the departure of Jesus from the earth. For this reason a majority of scholars regard the day of Pentecost following ascension as the birthday of the Christian Church. The apostolic period, at the same time, can only be considered the substructure upon which the edifice of the visible Church is reared, or the root from which the mighty tree our Anglo-Saxon forefathers; thus it has come round by the Goths from Constantinople to us. The passage most illustrative of the parentage of the word is from Walafrid Strabo (about 840), who writes thus: 'Ab ipsis autem Græcis Kyrch à Kyrios—et alia multa accepimus. Sicut domus Dei Basilica, i. e. Regia à Rege, sic etiam Kyrica, i. e. Dominica à Domino nuncupatur. Si autem quæsitur, quâ occasione ad nos vestigiatis: græcitatis advenerint, dicendum præcipuè à Gothis, qui et Getæ, cum extempore, quo ad fidem Christi perducti sunt, in Græcorum provinciis commorante, nostrum, i. e. theoticum sermonem labuerint.' Study of Words, pp. 79–81, N. Y., 1854.

Pentecost the beginning of the Church.

¹ Comp. Locke: "A church I take to be a voluntary society of men, joining themselves together of their own accord, in order to the public worshipping of God, in such a manner as they judge acceptable to him and effectual to the saving of their souls." Works, vol. ii, p. 145, Lond., 1751. For the insufficient and unhistorical nature of this view, comp. C. H. Weiss, Reden über die Zukunft der evangelischen Kirche, Lpz., 1849, p. 29 sq.

grows, with branches interlacing like an involved network. If the Church be regarded as a complex organization of communities, and if for that very reason it be again distinguished from those communities, it will be apparent that Church history, in the strict sense, begins where the external union of such communities has already been consolidated.¹ But the idea of the Church must be defined with respect to its nature, as well as its range through time and space, and, at this point, care is needed to guard against both a false idealism and a superficial empiricism. The correct view, by which the external and internal, visible and invisible, are apprehended in their proper connexion and correlation, but are likewise distinguished from each other, and according to which Church history has to do with the actualization of the kingdom of God in time and under determinate relations of time and place, stands midway between the purely social and abstract notion and the strictly theocratic view. For, according to the social view, the Church is merely an association of accidental origin, analogous to an insurance company, while the theocratic conception represents the Church as absolutely Divine even in its outward manifestation. The social form, which takes its shape under the influence of apparently accidental occurrences, constitutes the body of the Church, while the idea which is developed in harmony with the laws of spiritual freedom, and therefore by an inward necessity, is its soul.² Church history is required to estimate both according to their true value, because they would otherwise represent a life that is neither a corpse nor a ghost.³

The Church is not alone social or theocratic.

SECTION IX.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE CHURCH.

The Church, like every other phenomenon endowed with life, has an external or bodily, and an internal or spiritual, side to its nature. These cannot be sundered from each other, though they may be separated to a certain extent, and severally treated with particular attention. In this way the different, but constantly interacting, departments of church life come into being, which determine the arrangement of the material of Church history, both with regard to the logical rubrics under

The Church both external and internal.

¹ Rothe fixes the beginning of Church history as late as the destruction of Jerusalem; see his Anfänge der christl. Kirche.

² Schleiermacher, § 51.

³ Concerning the relation of the ideal to the historical Church, see Schweizer, Glaubenslehre, p. 183 sq.

which it is to be placed and the more independent artistic combination and connexion of the matter itself.

Christianity entered the world, and was compelled to assume relations toward it. So, too, was the world required to enter into relations with Christianity. Christ himself had compared the kingdom of God to leaven which leavens the whole lump, and to a mustard seed which should develop into a wide-spreading tree. The expansive element is contained in the nature and the destination of Christianity—the Church must grow. In the first stages of the life of an individual the outward growth is more noticeable, and calculated to excite remark; and Church history has, similarly and most naturally, to deal, in its earliest periods, with the extension of Christianity. By the side of the expansion, Expansion and Limitation. however, we must trace the history of the limitation of Christianity—the persecutions—even as the shadow moves along with the person. For our Lord had even foretold that his Church would be obliged to suffer persecution.

The two elements cannot be torn asunder, since the extension of the Church often gave rise to persecution, while the latter, being overruled by God, aided in the extension. The blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church. Christianity struck its roots into the world, however, in proportion as its outward extent increased, and its growth involved, as well, the strengthening of the body of the Church. This must be regarded as the necessary condition of the life of the Church, although it seems to be connected with the danger of unduly emphasizing the body, and reducing the Church to the level of the world. To trace this incorporating process, and with it the course of partial secularization which it involves, is the task of the history of the constitution of the Church. But, Constitution of the Church. in connexion with this, we must give attention to the relations of the Church to the State, especially when, under Constantine, the latter became Christian; and to the internal social conditions of the Church itself, such as the separation of the clergy from the laity, gradations of rank among the clergy, the development of the hierarchy, morbid excrescences, divisions or schisms in the Church, and such special phenomena in connexion with its life as monasticism, the vita canonica. But within this body, composed as it is of numerous members, for whose study an acute eye is certainly necessary, the soul of the life of Christianity unfolded itself, being partly carried forward and partly hindered by the The soul-life of the Church. body. So, Church History, as a branch of theological study, is first of all to fix its attention upon the soul. The soul-life of the Church, moreover, as manifested in worship, doctrine, and customs, is not only bound organically to the bodily element by numerous ties—for the history of the constitution of the Church holds an unmistakable relation of interaction to the history of worship and of doctrine—but it surrounds itself with a separate body. Worship seeks expression in various forms of art, and doctrine assumes the form of dogma, more or less fully developed, while both are determined by the spirit of special times and peoples, and by the degree of culture which has been attained by any particular age. It is, of course, true that Christian teachings and customs have superseded the old and replaced it by the new; but they have also been determined and modified from that very direction. The history of worship, doctrine, and customs, is, therefore, connected with the general history of civilization, in like manner as the history of the constitution stands related to ordinary political history.

The old conditions superseded.

No one side of the life of the Church can be thoroughly comprehended apart from the other. It would, therefore, be improper to treat Church history in the form of rubrics constructed on a merely external and logical plan, like the drawers in a sideboard. On the contrary, the richer the manifestation of that life is at certain points where it pulsates, the more impossible is it to enforce such a division. This is illustrated by the Reformation, which forces its way through all such limitations, with their superscriptions, by including in its scope at once the constitution, worship, doctrine, and life.

Advantage of groupings.

An arrangement of the material in the form of extended groupings, by which means, at times, one feature of the life of the Church may be brought into prominence, and at other times another, admits of great diversity in the shadings of the representation, and is, for this reason, certainly preferable, in an artistic point of view, to the abstract mode of treatment by topics.¹

It should not be forgotten, however, in the interests of methodology, that the storing away of the material in the memory is facilitated by the arrangement in tabular rubrics, and that the artistic treatment can be profitably employed only where a knowledge of the facts of history already exists.² It will be sufficient if, in connexion with the rubrical arrangement, we continually observe the dependence of the several departments upon each other, and direct attention to the links of the organic chain. The rubrics, moreover, will be required to change their titles and relation to each other with the change of times. It would, for example, be highly improper to assign the leading place in connexion with later times to the extension of Christianity, whose place has, in the course of progress, been removed from the centre to the circumference, while the foreground is occupied by the Church itself, whose outward form was, in the Middle Ages, conditioned by the papacy with its hierarchy. At the time of the Reformation, teaching, or dogma, again comes into the foreground. Such changes of scenery are positively necessary in order to avoid that fatal monotony of style which prevents the presentation from producing the proper impression. However, material cannot be arranged under such categories alone. Sometimes individual churches, in which the Christian spirit has taken on a peculiar stamp, such as the Church of Africa, Alexandria, Antioch, Rome, Germany, or Slavonia, demand a separate treatment. Sometimes great and exciting events, that shake the entire Church, and the world itself, break through the framework of established rubrics, and claim a special treatment. This applies, for example, to the history of the Crusades and the Reformation. A mode of arrangement that regulates itself according to the nature of the material will, consequently, become necessary, and in such plan the division with regard to time, or into periods, demands special attention.

A necessary change of rubrics.

¹ Comp. the works of Henke, Spittler, Hase, Schleiermacher, etc.

² Warnings have, with propriety, been raised against too much cutting up of the material; comp. Fricke, Lehrb. der Kirchengesch., Part I, Pref., p. ix, and § 9.

SECTION X.

DIVISION INTO PERIODS.

The categories according to which the rich material of Church history is distributed, whatever may be their character, will be crossed by the lines of chronological division. The measure of these lines is found in those epochal events which have an important bearing upon the whole of the history, but not in the external symmetry of plan, or in occurrences of subordinate importance for the Church.

The division by centuries has, since Mosheim, been almost universally given up. The principle of outward symmetry, which certainly cannot be justified on scientific grounds, lay at its basis. But it cannot be denied, on the other hand, that the beginning of a new century, for example, the eighteenth, occasionally introduces an epoch.¹ The special point at which the epoch that introduces a new period is to be assumed can hardly be definitely fixed, an approximation being the most that can ordinarily be secured. While Schleiermacher remarks that "the epochal points of chief importance are always such as not only possess equal value for the functions of Christianity, but are also important to historical development outside the Church," and the principle is correct in the main, attention may yet be called to the idea that distinct stages of development may be apparent in one field sooner than in the other, and that, therefore, the epochs of Church history can scarcely be identical with those of the history of the world.

¹ To divide a historical representation by centuries is connected with inconvenient consequences. Events are not brought sharply to a close with any of them; the life and actions of mankind reach over from one to another. But all the reasons which govern any method of arrangement are based simply on some preponderating feature. Certain influences appear prominently in a certain century, without suggesting a desire to mistake the preparation for them, or to deny the future consequences they may have produced.—Goethe, Farbenl. ii, p. 169.

The dependence upon theology, to which the latter was subjected in former days, may account for the custom of regarding certain great phenomena in the religious sphere, particularly the introduction of Christianity and the Reformation, in the light of epochs in the history of the world as well. Indeed, they certainly are such to the profounder researches of history into the past, though not to the immediate historical perception.¹ The influence of Christianity

Influences of Christianity not immediate.

upon the history of the world did not become apparent until much later, at the time of the overthrow of the Roman Empire in the West. This event, therefore, is better suited to be made an epoch in secular history than the immediate appearance of Christianity in the world, although the latter constitutes the most natural beginning of Church history.

A similar idea will apply to the Reformation. The political transformation of Europe, which was doubtless directly promoted by the religious revolution, delayed its appearance in the world of phenomena until the Peace of Westphalia. The latter, accordingly, possesses greater significance for political history than does the Reformation, while, in importance to Church history, it is inferior to the Reformation. In like manner, other and even religious events, for example, the appearance of Mohammed, occur, and form epochs in the sphere of secular history, which yet have but a subordinate importance for Church history as such, however grave may have been the consequences that reacted upon the fortunes of the Church. An agreement of opinions will always be most readily secured with reference to epochs in connexion with which the factor that moulds a period² is most prominently displayed. These, therefore, are epochs in the full breadth of the word.

¹ § 165.

² Christianity is, no doubt, the hinge between the Old and the New World, but the hinge itself has a breadth—of centuries!

³ The distinction between epoch and period is assumed to be from secular history.

In this sense the adoption of Christianity by Constantine, and the connected introduction of that faith to be the state religion, unquestionably constitutes an epoch, although it may be difficult to decide what year should begin the new period—A. D. 306, 312, or 325. With equal certainty Gregory VII. forms a strikingly noticeable feature in the history of the development of the papacy, and hence of the institution with which the character of the Church of the Middle Ages is involved. Nor will it escape the eye of the observer that the period from Gregory VII. to the Reformation embraces three stages—the progress of the papacy to the time of Innocent III.; its hold upon the elevation attained, to Boniface VIII.; and its subsequent decline, which may also be dated from the removal of the papal chair to Avignon at a somewhat later day, down to the period of the Reformation.¹

Finally, none will deny that the division of the Church in the sixteenth century forms an epoch in the treatment of Church history from both a Roman Catholic and a Protestant point of view, although the Council of Trent, rather than the Reformation, will be the turning point in the former case.² It will prove more difficult to find, on the other hand, one or more resting places—excepting Gregory the Great and Charlemagne, who are commonly assumed—between Constantine and Gregory VII. that would be equally acceptable to all persons. It is likewise difficult to fix an epoch between the Reformation and our own time, though all are compelled to acknowledge that a crisis intervened after the Thirty Years' War, and again during the first decades of the eighteenth century. It is difficult, however, to connect these with some single event of marked prominence, inasmuch as a multitude of factors co-operated to bring about the revolution in the character of that time. It follows that the settling of definite epochs will remain subject to a certain amount of fluctuations, which, however, involves no loss to science when the points upon which the whole must turn are clearly apprehended.

¹ To overlook the wholly diverse nature of these two courses of development, and the epochal effect of the removal of the chair to Avignon, is to misunderstand the principal features in which the life of the Church pulsates.—Rettberg, Pref. to vol. vii. of Schmid's Kirchengesch., p. vii. It is not easy to say why Gregory VII. should not himself present a suitable beginning for a new period.—Fricke, i., p. 12.

² It is apparent how very different the periodizing of the history of the Reformation must be when regard is had to the Reformation in Germany alone from what it would become when that of other lands is also treated. It is usual to conclude the history of the Reformation with the religious Peace of Augsburg (1555), but this forms a real conclusion only for the German branch of ecclesiastical history.

SECTION XI.

PROPER TREATMENT OF CHURCH HISTORY.

The requirements for a thorough and profitable treatment of Church history, are:

1. An impartial recognition of the facts secured by the investigation of extant sources and documents. This is historical criticism.

2. Unbiased estimation of the historical material in harmony with the law of the lower and higher causality. This we may call historical pragmatism.

3. A living interest in Christianity, and a disposition to value its manifestations according to the Christian standard. This is religious fervour or enthusiasm.

1. It is evident that what has been indicated above can be required only of this study in its finished state. This holds good especially of the study of sources,¹ which can be required of the beginner only in limited measure, and in connexion with which the labours of others must in any case prepare his way. Every theologian should, nevertheless, engage in the study of sources in some directions, even though not intending to make a specialty of Church history, with a view to quicken the historical faculty, and become able to estimate the labours of others in this field.

The criticism to be employed on sources is twofold. In one respect it coincides in function with exegetical criticism, Twofold criticism of sources. as it deals with the authenticity and integrity of the historical monuments which it designs to use. It is governed by the same laws. To this philological criticism, however, is added that of real history. The question arises, whether the authority to whom we appeal could, in view of all his personal traits, his character, culture, and outward circumstances, have stated the truth, and whether he intended to state it? The examination must be impartially conducted, and the worth or worthlessness of the source as a whole, together with the truthworthiness of each statement in particular, be determined accordingly. Care must be taken, however, not to make the goal in this inquiry absolute truth, but relative, and not to apply the measure of our requirements to the earlier ages. A report based on the clear statements of a Difference in reports. trustworthy witness is termed reliable, while one that lacks such complete confirmation is doubtful, unsupported, and possibly even suspicious. A correct historical judgment will guard against both a hypercritical or skeptical tendency, and such an uncritical direction as amounts to a blind belief in authorities and legends.

¹ Comp. Schleiermacher, §§ 156, 157, 184, 190.

2. By the side of criticism stands pragmatism. To simply furnish approved narratives of facts, without any elaboration or adding of personal opinions, is the work of merely a good chronicler.¹ The mission of the historian is of a higher character, for history is a living, connected whole. The past is mirrored in the present, and contains within itself the germs of the most distant future. Every particular thing is the product of its age, which is itself determined by the co-operation of many individual elements. Nor can it be denied that national characteristics and constitutions, climate, and various other things, exert an influence over the subjective life, and that these, in turn, have a reflex influence upon the objective life.

It follows that an endless chain of causes and effects runs through the whole of history, that is, through the development of the moral world in time as through that of the physical world in space. To follow this chain, to ascertain and comprehend both the forces of attraction and of repulsion, according to the laws of social-polarity, is the task of historical philosophy, or historical pragmatism. We postulate a twofold law of causality, however, a lower and a higher, a mediate and an immediate. Every concrete fact appears to us, in part, as the product of outwardly traceable, mechanical causes. But it must be remembered that the causal element is itself the effect of other causes, and that the new product contains within itself that causative power which will produce still further effects. But underneath all the various causes, mutually sustaining and supporting as they are, must lie a primal force, in which they find their absolute and positively ultimate base. In a true study of history each of these features will receive due recognition. The tendency to an atomistic mode of treatment must be limited and complemented by the dynamic, in order that no feature be in any way exaggerated. To lead back every thing to known, accepted, and historical causes, and deduce the most exalted matters from inferior antecedents, or explain the original by what has been made or has come into being, what is spiritually necessary and free by what is accidental and arbitrary—in one word, to explain life by death, is belittling, and devoid at once of taste and spirit.

This would become apparent if the attempt were made to explain the spread of Christianity in the first three centuries simply on the ground of the political and financial condition of the Roman State, the pecuniary difficulties of certain emperors, the excellent character of the Roman roads throughout the realm, and other lesser factors, or the Reformation as resulting merely from an insignificant quarrel between Augustinian and Dominican monks, or Congregationalism from a personal grievance of Brown, or Methodism from John Wesley's individual disapprobation of Oxford formality. For it is true, in appearance only, that what is greatest not rarely springs from what is least, since what is mathematically small is yet dynamically great. The oak comes only from the true value of acorn. External and apparently accidental causes obscure causes. should not be overlooked and neglected, however, any more than they should be overrated. To endeavour to trace back every thing to a single, mysterious, primal cause, to the disregard of intermediate links, is to transform history into an exhausted garden, a magic lantern, out of which only disconnected, puzzling shapes arise, just to vanish again by a mere turn of the hand. "A shallow mind," says Herder, "finds and connects nothing in history but facts; a perverted mind seeks for miracles in it." The truth lies here, also, in the golden middle.¹

¹ On the distinction between chronicle and history, see Schleiermacher, §§ 152, 154. Upon the whole subject, compare Gervinus, Grundzüge der Historik, Leipzig, 1837.

The moral estimate to be formed of persons and their actions, is likewise dependent on a correct pragmatism in the mode of treatment. Here, again, two extremes must be avoided. An atomistic pragmatism is usually ready to apply the measure of extremes to be avoided. moral perception belonging to its own time to every historical phenomenon, and in this way to be dictatorial over history. It scents fraud and base and dishonourable intentions everywhere, or it rejects, as being silly and fanatical, everything that does not correspond with its ideal of good reason. On this method the mediæval manifestations of the papacy and monasticism, especially, receive rough treatment, and doctrinal controversies assume the character of simply hateful quarrels. This method has no apprehension of the existence of the profounder impulses of the human spirit which are displayed under these fanciful forms. It lacks the elevation of soul that is needed to lift it out of its personal prejudices, and to enlarge the individual consciousness until it becomes commensurate with that of the human species.¹

¹ There was a time—it can scarcely be termed fully past—when people found pleasure in explaining history, even in its most important points of change, out of mere blind, accidental occurrences. This was termed the philosophical method. In our days many have fallen upon a directly contrary method; and this, too, is denominated the philosophical method.—Reuchlin, Geschichte von Port Royal, p. 54. Comp. Gerwinus, supra, p. 69 sq. In more recent times Gfrörer has come to occupy this ground in part.

The contrast to this narrow habit of observation is formed by that sublime objectivity which, in entire abnegation of self, abstains from expressing any moral judgment, and looks down from its speculative watch-tower upon the evolutions of the world-spirit as upon a divine drama. History thus becomes a merely natural process, without the superadding of any moral element. Between these two extremes, the one of which is involved in the nature of deism and the other in that of pantheism, is the ground upon which proceeds the truly theistic method of historical research, ^{The theistic} whose principle is that history moves in the sphere of ^{method.} freedom, though guided by a Providence which binds and controls all the threads of progress. This real history, therefore, also lies in the sphere of a higher necessity—a necessity which cannot, of course, be established by us on a priori principles, but may yet be apprehended by that keen sensibility which improves under the process of quiet observation.

It is said that "history is the tribunal of the world." But we should probably find that the necessary documents for any real and practical application of the idea are wanting to us. God has reserved the judgment for himself; and for this reason our judgment should be exercised sparingly. The rule by which, in Church history, we are to estimate the different phenomena connected with the Church, can only be the word of God. This is the canon by which we are to judge of every further stage ^{God's word the} of development in the Christian life. In connexion ^{standard of} with every new appearance we are to inquire, "How is it related to the idea of Christianity, as laid down in the New Testament?" ^{judgment.}

This should not be construed to mean, however, that every special form of the Christian life which does not thoroughly resemble that of the apostolic Church is to be rejected. Such a view would be the death of all history, whose very nature requires development. The developed life is related to the original like the plant to the germ. The life of the germ, however, passes over into the plant; and the principle of Christianity must similarly be traceable in every manifestation, any phase of church life being morally justifiable only in so far as that principle can be made to appear. Wherever this principle is lacking, or has been perverted into its contrary, the existence of a morbid state cannot be mistaken, though there are many different degrees in the malady. An entire institution in the Church, for instance the papacy, may, with all its consequences, appear to deserve rejection from the standpoint of pure apostolical Christianity, as being itself morbid and the product of morbid conditions, without compelling the conclusion that the history of the popes is, for that reason alone, a history of antichrist. On the one hand, it will be necessary to consider the papacy itself in its historical relation to the Christian world under its Germanic form, as the counterpoise to barbaric wilfulness and boorishness; and, on the other, to estimate the different popes by the measure of the papal idea, which will at all events reveal a wide chasm between a Gregory VII and an Alexander VI.

¹ Hence, Neander, speaking with reference to the Crusades, says: "The lowest place is occupied by cold reason, which, more than other judges, denies the native nobility of human nature, and looks with aristocratic pity upon such times; not because it is governed by enthusiasm for the truly real, but because only that seems real to its judgment which is the lowest of all that appears, and because precisely what is most beautiful in this connexion is regarded by it as only fancy—namely, labour and daring expended for things whose only value lies in the bosom of mankind."—Der heil. Bernhard (1st ed.), p. 210. "It is usual to say," observes a Roman Catholic writer, "that the chest makes the orator. It may be said, in a higher sense, that the heart makes the historian; truth does not rest on criticism alone, but much more on the determination to love it, even when its language is not pleasant."—Hist. pol. Blätter für das kathol. Deutschland, 1854, No. 8, p. 654.

It is also possible "for a historian to defend the mediæval popes, and, at the same time, to be a determined opponent of the persons who desire the restoration of the papacy of the Middle Ages for our own times."¹ The same applies to monasticism, from which the Reformation itself came forth, while the historical Reformation differs from a mere abstract theory of doctrinal improvement by reason of the fact that Luther passed through this very vital experience of the mediæval Church, upon which he was subsequently called to exert a reformatory influence. A comforting feature in history lies in the fact that error, even where it is most obdurate, is yet manifested only as an excrescence upon the truth, and that even a corrupt age contains within itself, though unconsciously, the remedies upon which a later time will lay hold with a more untrammelled judgment.

History thus becomes the teacher of the present, but only in the entirety of its development, though it may be said, with greater accuracy, that the present thus results from history. Hence it must be regarded as a gross abuse to make history subservient to so-called interests of the times and to personal preferences, in such way as to compel it to yield either ideals with which to dazzle the uninformed, or caricatures with which to excite their fears.¹ History is thus reduced to the character of an armory to which every combatant resorts for the weapon needed in any special emergency; and what they term "the spirit of the times," which they thus call up, according to their belief is not rarely "the spirit of the gentlemen themselves."

¹ Möhler, Kleine Schriften, i, p. 76. A striking example is found in Voigt in his treatment of Gregory VII.; comp. his Antwort an den Bischof von La Rochelle, June 28, 1829, (in pref. to 2d ed.)

3. Our third requirement, the moral and religious disposition, is for this reason closely connected with the preceding remarks. It was during an extended period considered the highest wisdom of historical pragmatism to insist that the historian should belong to no religion, and that, therefore, the best Church History is that which displays the least affection for its object, and, at the same time, evinces no preference for any current tendency of thought—hence, which is distinguished by its lack of colour and animation. We recall attention, at this point, to our remarks on the objective tendency in exegesis. It is doubtless true that prejudice in any direction is damaging to free historical vision. The historian should be superior to the appeals of party interest. But this does not imply that he should neither have convictions nor express them. If such convictions do not amount merely to a clinging to blind prejudices, but are, instead, the fruit of intellectual effort, they may find expression, and naturally will, and ought to be, avowed, in proportion as they are living convictions. The person who possesses an enthusiasm for art, and has been initiated into the mysteries of its life, will surely be more competent to write its history than one who stands far aloof from it. Moreover, as a rule, the best history of a people will be furnished by him who has lived and felt with that people, and has been penetrated with a Moral and religious disposition.

Damage from prejudice.

Best historians in sympathy with the people.

¹ Schleiermacher, § 155, note: "An excited, egoistic interest, and, consequently, every partial tendency, is a most potent influence to pervert the historical vision in the scientific sphere, as in common life." Comp. Ullmann, p. 677: "In an age that is agitated by the spirit of partisanship, nothing is so likely to mislead as the temptation to make historical inquiry, among other things, subserve the demands of party and the interests of the day, because fame and advantage may be thus secured, for the moment at least, if not permanently. But where this is the case, the thorough and comprehensive study of sources will possess no great value." "The introduction of present interests into historical labours," says Ranke, "generally results in hindering the independent performance of such undertakings" (Pref. to Engl. Geschichte, p. xi). Ranke, no doubt, follows his objective tendency to an extreme, with reference to ecclesiastical contrasts as well as other matters. He writes history "in the placid frame of a painter of fancy pictures." See the review in the Augsburg Allgem. Zeitung, supplement, 345, 1860.

recognition of its most sacred interests—such as Tacitus, Möser, J. von Müller, Macaulay, Palacky. The objection might be raised, indeed, that, for example, on this principle, the history of Islam could be best treated by a Mohammedan, and that of Judaism by a Jew. We must acknowledge the force of this reply, in so far as the Christian inquirer into history who would know and describe those religions as they are in their inmost being, will be required to enter personally into the life of Mohammedanism or Judaism, so as to reproduce them from within himself. It only remains to inquire whether such reproduction be possible; and at this point frequent errors have, unquestionably, taken place. Often, too, has the narrow spirit of Christian ecclesiastical historians prevented them from forming a correct estimate of the conditions of heathendom. For Christianity not chargeable with narrow Church history.

this, however, Christianity must not be blamed. Where the latter has attained to its highest development, it can be said with propriety that the Christian “proves all things.” For the most independent and unprejudiced representation of a lower condition is always executed from a higher level. Indeed, the really moving principle of the lower state can be thoroughly apprehended and understood by him only who occupies the higher level.¹ The manner in which the Christian may apprehend and elaborate Judaism and Mohammedanism differs greatly from the treatment which the Jew or Mohammedan is able to accord to Christianity, or even to his own religion, to which he stands related as a dreamer. The “veil of Moses” is on their faces. The real character of such institutions is apparent only to the awakened and sober research of Christendom. The further elucidation of this question belongs to apologetics. We do not assert that certain branches of Church history are beyond the capacity of persons who have no sympathy with the vital principle of Christianity, or who are even in antagonism with it. But the efforts of such inquirers must be restricted either to the mere collecting of material or to narrow criticisms, while that which really gives movement and life to history remains concealed from their vision. This was emphatically the case with Gibbon.

The lower best understood by the higher.

Life, in its inmost relations, is disclosed only to him who loves,²

¹ Upon this point we coincide with Möhler (Kleine Schriften, ii, p. 284), the only difference being that he considers Roman Catholicism as constituting the highest stage, while we assign that character to Protestantism. Which of these latter is better qualified to understand the other, is, of course, a question of time, upon which, however, our own opinion is formed.

² Marcus Aurelius was a good and also an intelligent man, but he was no more able while it is doubtless true that the eye of a cold observer, or of a foe, will be keener to discover faults and frailties than that of love, which is often blind to such traits. Such blindness, however, is checked by the cultivation of the true Christian spirit, which is a spirit of truth. In this spirit, and in the measure in which it has been received into us, the im-

The Christian spirit both loving and just.
 age of the Church is most accurately reflected, not, indeed, without spot or wrinkle, but exactly as it is, and with all its lights and shadows. The cold spirit of worldly wisdom catches upon the concave mirror of its really hollow head and heart only the caricature of the original picture, while it remains itself unknown.¹

SECTION XII.

METHOD OF CHURCH HISTORY.

It is impossible, in view of the wide extent of Church History, to give equal attention to all the noteworthy factors within its domain. For this reason the relation of the general to the particular will be determined by the degree of theological interest, which attaches to a given matter. Every scholar who desires to work successfully upon details will need to possess a general and systematic acquaintance with the whole field in its
The whole field must be understood.
 synchronous relations, in order to which the study of tables, or, better, the construction of them, will become necessary.

to conceive of the spirit that brought the martyrs to the stake, and strengthened them there, than a person absolutely devoid of speculative ability is able to comprehend Spinoza's ethics.—Kliefoth, Einl. in d. Dogmengesch., p. 174.

¹ Gieseler says: "The ecclesiastical historian must renounce party interest, as well as prejudices arising from the peculiarities of his time. On the other hand, he cannot penetrate into the internal character of the phenomena in Church history without a Christian, religious spirit, because no spiritual manifestation that is foreign to our habits can be apprehended with historical correctness without being reproduced in the imagination of the inquirer. Only such inquiry can discover where the Christian spirit is entirely wanting, where it is only used as a mask, and what other spirit has taken its place. Nor will it fail to recognize its presence, even though finding expression under forms of manifestation that are strange to our eyes."—Church History, American edition, vol. i, pp. 23, 24. Comp. also Schleiermacher, § 193, and Fricke, Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch., i, § 7. Thiersch makes it the great task of Church history "to recognize what, in the course of events, was natural development, what was human guilt, and what, in consequence of man's sin, supernatural interference." He continues: "Church history rises to the character of a true and real theological science only when it connects the whole of the past with the present, and traces the progress of events from the beginning of the Church to our day, in order thus to reveal the work of the Church that now is, to lay a foundation for the understanding of our own times, and open a conjectural view into the future of the Church." (Vorlesungen über Protestantismus und Katholicismus, vol. i, p. 138 sq. Erlangen, 1846.) Comp. also Ullmann, in the Preface to the 8d ed. of Neander, Church History.

But, from this whole, the Protestant theologian will be able to select those particular sections in which the Church was either predominantly engaged in the course of healthful development, or was returning to such state, involving, of course, the leading features of the history of its decline and degeneration during the Middle Ages, and also, as a necessary connecting link, the grand outward form assumed by the Church of that period.

Every scholar should, moreover, be especially acquainted with the history of the Church, and the Reformation, and Protestantism, in his own country; and, since the universal derives animation and clearness only through its details, it follows that the study of special features is to be recommended as being particularly fitted to stimulate and shape the mind.

The field of Church history is infinite in its extent,¹ and there is, consequently, no limit to the labours of the Church historian., The student, however, who is preparing for ordinary service in the Church, the theologian in a general way, can only be required "to be familiar with so much of this infinite material as is necessary to his independent participation in the government of the Church." To this end the general history of the Church, which furnishes him ^{Necessity of} ^{general history.} or with the needed outline, is first of all necessary." Every scholar should be so familiar with this as to leave no gap in the progress of centuries of development which he cannot fill with the names about which its principal reminiscences cluster. The fixing of this synchronistic syllabus in the memory, by the use of tables, is indispensable, the entering upon particulars being nothing more than a planless digging and grubbing unless such a picture of the whole has been impressed on the mind.

Nor is the mere picture all that is necessary. The outline must be filled in, and made to live—a feature that should not be made to depend on accidental circumstances. No general decision can be rendered as to whether the history of the Church is more important in its ancient, its intermediate, or its modern periods. It is easy to see that the intermediate history will sustain a different relation to both the ancient and the modern, according to the Protestant or the Roman Catholic view. But it would be unhistorical, and ultra-Protestant as well, to argue that we might dispense with the history of the Middle Ages and the hierarchy as beyond the limits of the Church. If it be regarded simply as a history of the decline and corruption of the Church, it would be important to understand it for that very reason. But it is more than this. It connects the various threads in many ways, however much it severs and entangles them in other respects; and it is necessary that such points of connexion be recognized, and that the Roman Catholicism of the Middle Ages be apprehended in its principles, a work that is possible only when some acquaintance with the details of the material of history has been secured. It would, nevertheless, lead away from the goal at which the Protestant student of theology aims in the study of Church History, if special attention were directed, for instance, upon the details of the history of the popes and religious orders, or of the Romish ritual—as has been done in Hurter's *Innocenz III.*¹—while only a rapid survey is taken of the Reformation and the history of more recent times, or too great brevity is exercised while treating the ancient Church. The latter and the history of the Reformation, with the events resulting from it, constitute, therefore, the real soil of the Protestant Church, upon which the Protestant theologian should by all means be at home, even though he may not ignore the Middle Ages. The relation might almost be compared with that of the study of the Old Testament to that of the New, in the department of exegesis.

¹ Schleiermacher, § 184.

² Schleiermacher, §§ 91, 185, 187.

To the above we must add the Church history of the student's native land. Every one ought to possess a more intimate knowledge of the founding and extension of Christianity in his own country, and be more familiarly acquainted with the history of its ecclesiastical institutions, and especially of Protestantism within its bounds, than will be possible to him from general history alone. In this direction private studies will become necessary to supplement the instruction received in the theological seminary.

It is further necessary that just proportions be observed in the extent of treatment accorded to the different departments in the life of the Church. Protestants are inclined to discuss the history of teaching with greater thoroughness than the history of constitutions and worship. For a long time they neglected the history of art altogether, though it has now been properly restored by Hase, Piper, Hemans, and Northcote to a place in the organism of Church History. The history of heresies should be treated in such way as to give prominence to the principal tendencies represented by the several heresies, and avoid distracting the gaze by dwelling too greatly upon unimportant details. At the same time, the danger incident to the generalizing process, of becoming superficial, and obliterating what is peculiar in any particular instance, should not be overlooked. It will, accordingly, be useful to pursue, at times, a thoroughly specific and particular question down to its last threads, and this not only for him who devotes himself professionally to the study of Church History, but for every person who desires to arrive at a clear and living apprehension of the facts of ecclesiastical history in general.

¹ Comp. § 14, and Schleiermacher, §§ 154 and 191. We would direct attention to the fact that, in the study of Church history in general, the leading object is not a mere knowledge of details and the cramming of the memory—not merely conception, but perception. Comp. Roth (in Gelzer's Prot. Mon. Blätter, 1851, Dec., p. 364): "The objective history of the Church may be learned from lectures or books, and is an object of conception; but the subjective history requires perception, as does scarcely another study. If the latter be taken as the object of conception merely, it will afford no nourishment to the mind. Is there anything more discouraging than an examination at which the candidate expresses his opinion respecting Augustine, Bernard of Clairvaux, or Abelard, in the precise terms which he copied from the respective lectures?" It appears, then, that to stimulate—be the subject what it may—remains the principal object of the historical lecture.

This leads us to monography, and, more immediately, to biography. It is not only greatly instructive, but also truly refreshing and edifying, to enlarge one's own limited life by the process of entering thoroughly into the life of an age, or even of an individual and his inmost soul, until, so to speak, we breathe, think, and feel with him, look with his eyes upon the outer world, and travel, preach, and suffer with him. Let it be admitted that a momentary partiality is likely to result from this process. It will yet be most readily removed by a later absorption into a contemporaneous character of different type, by which means a new metempsychosis is passed through, and by a different road. An increased interest will also be obtained by studying, side by side, two antagonizing personalities, which appear to have been raised up in order to complement each other, like the two poles of the physical world; by explaining each by comparison with the other; and by constructing, in a psychological way, the history to which they give movement and life from such personal factors.

For illustration, let Bernard of Clairvaux be placed beside Arnold of Brescia, Anselm beside Abelard, Erasmus beside Hutten, Luther beside Zwingli, Calvin beside Castellio, Knox beside Cranmer, and Bossuet beside Fénelon. Such parallels, if drawn by the hand of some Christian Plutarch, would necessarily be highly suggestive. In connexion with this subject it is important, however, that the law of mutual interaction be not overlooked, by which each age is seen to be the product of the spiritual and personal forces that exert a controlling influence upon it, while they, in turn, are the product of their age, having been rooted in a long, extended past. It is equally improper to say that men make history, and to regard them as being merely the expression and human image of the prevalent spirit of their time. Every person is the child of his time; but it is not given to every one to become the father of a new generation.

While biography is undoubtedly a most valuable study for the developing theologian,¹ it yet does not exhaust the task of monography. The description of special forms of ecclesiastical life, for example, of Port Royal in the seventeenth century, and the pursuit of special tendencies of mind down to their ultimate details, such as monasticism, mysticism, and other vagaries, is, likewise, highly instructive and invigorating, provided the particular subject be not treated as a dry curiosity, but in its connexion with the entire development of the life of the Church.²

THE HISTORY OF CHURCH HISTORY.

* F. C. Baur, Epochen d. kirchl. Geschichtsschreibung, Tub., 1852; Ter Haar, Histiographie der Kerkgeschiedenis, part i, Eusebius to Laurentius Valla; part ii, Flaccius to Semler, Utrecht, 1870-71. John G. Dowling, New Introduction to the Critical Study of Ecclesiastical History, Attempted in an Account of the Progress, and a Short Notice of the Services, of the History of the Church, Lond., 1838. Philip Schaff, What is Church History? Phila., 1846.

The origin of the Church itself furnishes the necessary condition for the origin of its history, and every monument of the life and work of the Church is, directly or indirectly, a source for that history. The construction of a historical representation could not be undertaken before some time had elapsed, that is to say, before ground had been gained upon which to rear the structure of Church history. The first work of this kind was furnished by Eusebius, to A. D. 324, who availed himself, however, Eusebius. of the labours of an earlier writer, Hegesippus, about A. D. 150. Editions of Eusebius were published by Valesius, Paris, 1659 sqq., and Reading, Cant., 1720; manual edition by Heinichen, Leips., 1827-39, 4 vols.; and by Burton, including Vita Constantini, 1838. Later editions have been by Schweigler, 1852; Lämmer, 1859; and Dindorf, 1867. With regard to his trustworthiness, compare the works of Moeller, 1813, Danz, 1815, Kestner, 1817, Reuterdahl, 1826, Rienstra, 1833, and Baur, 1834.

¹ Fricke says: "Every person is an individual mirror of his time. But the great spirits of any age are those who are most pure, clear, and prophetic. It should never be forgotten, however, that both for the purposes of conception and representation, they are only important as being the especially prominent expression of the common mind of their respective times, which ought always to be apprehended," p. 6.

² Upon this point compare, especially, Ullmann in the Preface to Trechsel, History of Early Antitrinitarians.

Eusebius was succeeded by Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and the Arians, and by Philostorgius in the fifth century, and Theodorus and Evagrius in the sixth. Concerning the first three, compare Holzhausen, 1825. The Arians are found in the editions by Reading and Valesius.

The Latin Church was less prominently engaged than the Greek Latin historians. during the first period in writing Church history. Mention should, however, be made of Rufinus, the translator of Eusebius, Sulpicius Severus at the beginning of the fifth century, Cassiodorus and Epiphanius (Tripartita History) in the middle of the sixth, and Gregory of Tours at its close. In the Middle Ages the following chroniclers in the West are prominent, besides the Byzantines (collected by Niebuhr, 1828 sqq., 46 vols.)—Syncellus, Theophanes, and Nicephorus, in the fourteenth century; Jordanes (550), Gregory of Tours (died 595), the Venerable Bede (died 735), Paul Warnefried (died 795), Haymo of Halberstadt (died 853), Anastasius (died 886), Hermannus Contractus (died 1054), Lambert of Herzfeld (died 1077), Sigbert of Gemblours (Gamblacensis, died 1112), Adam of Bremen (died about 1076), and still others. Besides these are many martyrologists and legend writers, who are generally uncritical and deficient in the qualities belonging to the historian.

The influence of the Reformation was less immediately effective Reformation of less effect upon
Church history
than exegesis. upon Church history than upon exegesis. It was not until after the religious Peace of Augsburg, when the storms were in part over, that a number of Lutheran theologians at Magdeburg, headed by Matthias Flacius (Illyricus), undertook a diffuse history of the Church, arranged by centuries, and, at the same time, under rubrics. This is the Magdeburg Centuries, 1559–74. The work consisted of thirteen folio volumes, each of which covered a century. The German edition is by Count Münnich, Hamburg, 1855. Compare Twesten's Matthias Flacius, Berlin, 1844, pp. 16, 17. In opposition to the Centuries, Cæsar Baronius published Ecclesiastical Annals (12 vols., Rome, 1588–1607) extending to 1198; other editions, with continuations, have also been issued from a Romish point of view.

For a long time afterward Church history was cultivated simply in the interests of denominational parties. Of Lutherans, the more prominent writers were Kortholdt, Ittig, Cyprian, Buddæus, Weissmann, and Pfaff. Among the Reformed we may mention Hospinian, Turretin, J. Hottinger, Jablonsky, and others. Of Roman Catholics we enumerate Natalis (Noel), Alexander, Fleury, Bos-suet, and Tillemont. To these names might be added Denominational character of Church history. those of members of the order of St. Maur in France, who rendered useful service by publishing editions of the Church Fathers, and by the investigation of special portions of Church history. The mystic Gottfried Arnold endeavoured to give an impartial attitude to Church history by taking the part of the hitherto despised heretics and sectarians, in his History of the Church and of Heretics, published in 1699, and frequently since. But his impartiality became partiality in their behalf. The great Mosheim, who died in 1755, was the first to succeed in Mosheim the reformer of Church history. obtaining for Church history the character of an independent science, and from his time Göttingen became the seat of ecclesiastical historiography.¹ Special departments of Church history were industriously cultivated by Chr. Wilhelm Fr. Walch, who died in 1784, and by his father, Joh. Georg Walch, of Jena, who died in 1775.

Semler made use of criticism that was carried to the extent of scepticism, but "without any capacity to appreciate the peculiar conditions of earlier times,"² or a single trace of historical art. At this time the influence of modern views also began to make itself felt, giving rise to the pragmatistical method of writing history. We must regard G. J. Planck, of Göttingen, as the chief representative of this tendency. L. T. Spittler wrote a manual which is thoughtful, though evincing a rather worldly judgment, and devoted to the service of the enlightenment of the age. By its perspicuous arrangement, however, it affords a clear view of the field. Schröckh's work, in forty-five volumes, furnishes a rich wealth of material, and is written from the standpoint of moderate orthodoxy. The rationalistic idea of Church history, by which it becomes predominantly the history of human folly, finds expression in Henke. Schmidt, of Giessen, retraced the way to that purely objective position which requires indifference as the primary and cardinal virtue of history. Danz and Gieseler, in their text-books—the latter furnishing a more judicious and comprehensive selection—led the student back to the sources, by accompanying the text step by step with extended quotations from the original authorities. Gieseler, especially, has added the most thorough elucidations of difficult points.

This pre-eminently learned treatment was followed by the orthodox and emotional method of Neander, who made Neander. it his object to present the history of the Church upon the basis of learned inquiry, "as a speaking demonstration of the divine power of Christianity, as a school of Christian edification, doctrine, and warning, for all who are willing to hear."¹ While his glance was almost exclusively directed to the internal side of ecclesiastical events, in order to ascertain their religious importance, the rich mind of Hase reflected, in all its features, the image of the times which, by his artistic skill, he outlines in glowing colours for such persons as are already somewhat familiar with the subject. Guericke, occupying the position of a prejudiced denominational polemic, employed the rich material, which had to some extent been borrowed from other writers, for the purpose of a defence of Lutheranism, accompanied with unjust insinuations against the Reformed Church views. A similar, though more independent, disposition characterizes the work of Kurtz, which is distinguished, however, by the richness of its material. Schleiermacher has left a valuable work behind him in his Church History. It, however, lays no claim to completeness, and is rather a magnificent sketch in the spirit of the author than a work of history. Baur has given the results of his critical inquiries and combinations from the standpoint of a definite, philosophical theory, in a series of descriptions of the several periods, which have lately been combined into a whole.

¹ Compare F. Luecke, De Joanne Laurentio Moshemio, Gott., 1837.

² Hase.

In the Roman Catholic Church various tendencies likewise come into view. Jansenism found its organs, and also the Illuminati of the reign of Joseph II. of Austria (1765-90), both being in opposition to the method of writing history in support of ultramontanism. Stolberg's Church History came to an end with year 530, and was continued by Kerz to the year 1300, and by Brischar to the present time. Among later works, those by Katerkamp, Ritter, Locherer, Doellinger, Annegarn, Reichlin-Meldegg, and Alzog, are of principal importance.

LITERATURE.

I.

GENERAL CHURCH HISTORY.

1. LITERATURE.—MANUALS AND TEXT-BOOKS, LATIN, GERMAN, AND FRENCH.

L. Mosheim, institutionum historiae ecclesiasticae libri iv. Helmst., 1755. Ed. 2, 1764.
J. M. Schröckh, christl. Kircheng. Lpz., 1768-1803. 35 vols. (2d ed. of vols. 1-13. 1772-1803). — Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation. Lpz., 1804-12. 10 vols. (Vols. 9 and 10 by Tzschirner).

J. M. Schröckh, historia rel. et ecclesiae christianae, adumbrata in usum lectionum. Berol., 1777. Ed. 7, em. et auct. cur. Ph. Marheineke. Berol., 1828.

* L. T. Spittler, Grundriss der Gesch. der christl. Kirche. Gött., 1782. 5th ed. Continued to 1812 by G. S. Planck. Gött., 1812.

¹ Hagenbach, Neander's Verdienste und Kirchengeschichte, in Stud. u. Krit., 1851, No. 2; O. Krabbe, Aug. Neander, Hamb., 1852; Ullmann, Pref. to the 3d ed. of Neander's Church History.

- H. Ph. Conr. Henke, allgem. Gesch. der christlichen Kirche. Braunschw., 1788–1823. 9 vols. Continued from vol. vii by J. G. Vater. The most of the vols. in many editions.
- J. E. Ch. Schmidt, Lehrb. der christl. Kirchengesch. Giess., 1800. 3d ed. 1827. — Handbuch der christl. Kirchengesch. Giessen, 1801–20. 6 vols. 2d ed. from vol. 1–4. 1824–27 (to Innocent III.). Continued by F. M. Rettberg. Vol. 7 (to Boniface VIII.). Giessen, 1834.
- W. Münscher, Lehrbuch der christl. Kirchengesch. zum Gebr. bei Vorlesungen. Marb., 1804. 2d ed. by Machler, 1815. 3d ed. by Beckhaus, 1826.
- Ph. Marheineke, Universal-Kirchenshistorie des Christenthums. Grundzüge zu akad. Vorlesungen. Pt. I. Erl., 1806.
- † F. L. v. Stolberg, Gesch. der Rel. Jesu Christi, Hamb., 1806–18. 15 vols. (until 480). Continued by F. v. Kerz, 16–45. vols. (until 12th century) Mainz, 1824–48. New series by J. N. Brischar, 46–53. vols. (until 18th century) Mainz, 1851 ff.
- † Th. Katerkamp, Kirchengeschichte. Münster, 1824–34. 5 vols. (until 1153).
- K. F. Stäudlin, Universalgeschichte der christl. Kirche. Hann., 1807. 5th ed. Improved and enlarged by F. A. Holzhausen. Hann., 1833.
- † J. J. Ritter, Handb. der Kirchengeschichte. Bonn, 1826–35. 3 vols. 6th ed., published by Ennen, 1862. 2 vols.
- J. T. L. Danz, Lehrbuch der christl. Kirchengesch. zum Gebrauch akad. Vorlesungen. Jena, 1818–26. 2 vols. in 3 parts. — Kurzgef. Zusammenstellung der christl. Kirchengeschichte. Jena, 1824.
- * J. K. L. Gieseler, Lehrb. der Kirchengesch. 6 vols. Bonn, 1824–55. 4th Germ. ed., translated by S. Davidson. Amer. ed., revised and edited by H. B. Smith (5 vols.) N. Y., 1868–79.
- † J. N. Locherer, Gesch. d. christl. Rel. u. Kirche. Ravensberg, 1824–34. 9 vols.
- * A. Neander, allgem. Geschichte der christl. Religion und Kirche. Hamb., 1825–52. 6 vols. in 11 parts. Last number (to 1431) published from the author's MSS. by K. F. T. Schneider. Amer. and Eng. ed., translated by J. Torrey, New York and Edinb., 1851–55. K. F. Th. Schneider (to 1431). 4th ed. 9 vols. Gotha. 1864–65.
- M. J. Matter, histoire universelle de l'église chrétienne. Strasb., 1829. 2 vols. ed. 2, Par., 1838 ss. 4 vols.
- F. A. Ad. Naebe, compend. historiae eccles. ac sacrorum christianorum in usum studiosae juventutis compositum. Lips., 1832.
- * K. Hase, Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch. Lpz., 1834. 10th ed. 1877. Amer. ed., translated by Blumenthal and Wing. N. Y., 1855.
- H. E. F. Guericke, Handbuch der Kirchengesch. Halle, 1833. 2 vols. 9th ed. Lpz., 1866 f. 3 Bde. Amer. ed., translated by W. G. T. Shedd. 2 vols. And., 1857–70. — Abriss der Kirchengeschichte. Lpz., 1842.
- J. G. V. Engelhardt, Handb. der Kirchengesch. Erl., 1833 f. 4 vols.
- J. C. W. Augusti, histor. ecclesiasticae epitome. Lips., 1834.
- F. Schleiermacher, Geschichte der christl. Kirche, pub. by E. Bonnell. Berl., 1840.
- † J. Alzog, Universalgesch. der christl. Kirche. Mainz, 1840. 9th ed. 1872. 2 vols. Am. ed., translated by Pabisch and Byrne. 3 vols. Cin., 1874–78.
- H. J. Royaards, compend. histor. eccles. chr. Traj. ad Rhen. 1840–45. 2 fasc.
- A. F. Gfrörer, allgem. Kirchengesch. Stuttg., 1841–46. 4 vols. (to 1056).
- † J. A. Annegarn, Gesch. der christl. Kirche. Münster, 1842–44. 3 vols.
- * Ch. W. Niedner, Gesch. der christl. Kirche. Lpz., 1846. 2d ed. Berl., 1866.

- W. B. Lindner, Lehrb. der christl. Kirchengesch. mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der dogmat. Entwicklung. Lpz., 1848-54. 3 vols. in 4 parts.
- *J. H. Kurtz, Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte. Mitau, 1849. 7th ed. (2 vols.), 1874. (For students.) American ed., translated by J. H. A. Bomberger. 2 vols. Phila., 1860-62.
- Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch., zunächst für höhere Lehranstalten. Mitau, 1851. 6th ed., 1868.
- Handbuch der allgem. Kirchengesch. Vol. I, in 3 parts. Vol. II, 1 part. Same, 1853-56. 2d. ed., 1858 f.
- G. A. Fricke, Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch. 1st part (to 768). Lpz., 1850.
- J. L. Jacobi, Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch. Berl., 1850. 1st part (to 590).
- †J. G. B. Huber, Universalg. d. christl. Kirche, mnemonisch bearb. Sulzb., 1850.
- H. Schmid, Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte. Nörd., 1851. 2d ed., 1856.
- J. P. Lange, die Geschichte der Kirche. Braunsch., 1853, 1854. Vols. I, II, 1, 2.
- F. C. Th. Schneider, Compendium der älteren Kirchengesch. Zunächst für den akad. Gebr. entworfen. 1st part. Berl., 1859.
- *F. C. Baur, Gesch. d. christl. Kirche. 5 vols. Tüb., 1863 f. Also under the special titles:
- das Christenth. u. d. christl. Kirche der 3 ersten Jahrh. 1863. 3d ed., 1863.
- die christl. Kirche des 4-6 Jahrh. 1859. 2d ed., 1863.
- die christl. Kirche des Mittelalters. 1861. 2d ed., 1869.
- Kirchengesch. der neuern Zeit von der Reform. bis zu Ende des 18. Jahrh. 1863.
- Kirchengeschichte des 19. Jahrh. 1862. 2d ed., E. Zeller. Lpz., 1877.
- F. R. Halle, Kirchengeschichte. Pub. by A. Köhler. 3 vols. Lpz., 1864. 2d ed., 1872 (in 1 vol.).
- R. Rothe, Vorless. über Kirchengesch. u. Gesch. des christl.-kirchl. Lebens. Pub. by H. Weingarten. Heidelb., 1875. 2 parts.
- †F. X. Kraus, Lehrb. der Kirchengesch. für Studierende. Trier, 1872-75. 3 parts. (4 Th.: Synchronist. Tabellen, 1876).
- †J. Hergenröther, Hdb. der Allg. Kirchengesch. Freib., 1876-78. 2 vols. 2d ed., 1879.
- J. Herzog, Abriss der gesamten Kirchengesch. Erl., 1876-79. 2 parts.
- †Rohrbacher, histoire universelle de l'église catholique. Par., 1842 ff. 29 vols.; nouv. éd. par Fèvre, Par., 1875 ff.; German by Rump, Toppehorn, and Neteler. Münster, 1858 ff.
- For cultivated readers in general:
- J. G. Müller, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Gesch. des Christenthums. Lpz., 1806 ff. 8 vols. (Also under the title, "Reliquien alter Zeiten," etc., 2-4 parts.)
- A. Neander, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Gesch. des Christenth. und des christl. Lebens. Berl., 1822 f.; 2d ed., 1825-27. 3 vols. In part a reproduction of his larger history; and again reduced, and pub. in English translation under title of Light in the Dark Places. Lond. and N. Y., 1850.
- J. G. D. Ehrhart, die christl. Kirche in alter und neuer Zeit. Ulm, (1829) 1839.
- H. Thiele, kurze Geschichte der christl. Kirche für alle Stände. 2d. ed. Zürich, 1852.
- E. Zeller, Geschichte der christl. Kirche. Stuttg., 1848.
- W. Zimmermann, Lebensgeschichte der Kirche Jesu Christi (mit Vorwort von Hundeshagen). 4 vols. Stuttg., 1857-59.
- J. H. A. Ebrard, Handb. der christl. Kirchen- u. Dogmengeschichte für Prediger u. Studierende. 4 vols. Erl., 1865-67.
- J. A. Möhler, Kirchengesch., pub. by P. Gams. Regensb., 1867 f. 3 vols.

For popular use:

- J. B. Trautmann, Geschichte der christl. für Jedermann. Dresd., 1851; continued by K. A. E. Kluge. 3 Abth. 1852-57.
- C. Sudhoff, Gesch. d. christl. Kirche in Vorl. Frankf., 1855. 2d ed., 1861.
- Th. Sauer, Gesch. der christl. Kirche für Schule u. Haus. Dresd., 1859.
- K. R. Hagenbach, Kirchengesch. von der ältesten Zeit bis zum 19. Jahrh. 7 vols. Lpz., 1869-72. English translation of his Hist. of Reformation in Germany and Switzerland, by Evelina Moore. 2 vols. Edinb., 1878, 1879.
- H. Thiele, christl. Kirchengesch. für Schule u. Haus. 3d ed. Stuttg., 1875.
- P. V. Schmidt, Hdb. der Kirchengesch. Lpz., 1879.

In Biographical Form (also for the general reader):

- F. Böhringer, die Kirche Christi und ihre Zeugen, oder die Kirchengesch. in Biographien. Zürich, 1842-58. 12 vols. 2d ed., Stuttg., 1861 ff. (2d ed., 1873 ff.)
- A. G. Rudelbach, christl. Biographie. Lebensbeschreibungen der Zeugen der christl. Kirche als Bruchst. zur Gesch. derselben. Lpz., 1849 f.
- † J. Hepp, Gesch. der christl. Kirche in Lebensbeschreib. Mainz, 1850 f. 2 vols.
- Fd. Piper's evang. Kalender. Berl., (Lpz.), 1850-70. 21 years.
- † F. X. Kraus, Charakterbilder aus der christl. Kirchengesch. Trier, 1879.

2. TABLES.¹

- J. S. Vater, synchronistische Tafeln der Kircheng. Halle, 1808. 6th ed. (continued by Thilo), 1833, fol.
- K. G. H. Haupt, tabell. Abriss der vorzüglichsten Religionen der jetzigen Erdbewohner, insonderheit der christl. Welt. Quedlinb., 1821, fol.
- A. W. Möller, Hierographie oder topographisch-synchronist. Darstell. der Gesch. der christl. Kirche in Landkarten. Elberf., 1822 f. 2 parts, fol.
- C. Schoena, tabulae hist. eccles. sec. ordin. synchron. et periodos digestae. Berol., 1828, fol.
- P. T. Hald, historia ecclesiast. synoptice enarrata. Kopenh., 1830-32. 2 parts.
- F. Fiedler, tabula ecclesiastico-historica, seriem xix seculorum synchronistice exhibens. Lips., 1832.
- J. T. L. Danz, kirchenhistorische Tabellen. Jena, 1838, fol.
- Lobeg. Lange, Tab. der Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte. 2d ed. Jena, 1848, 4.
- C. D. A. Douai, pragmatisch-synchronistische Tabellen zur Gesch. der christl. Religion und Kirche. Lpz., 1841. 2d ed., Braunsch., 1849, fol.
- C. Wahl, Kirchen-Geschichte in Bildern, oder Hauptmomente der Kirchengesch. in sinnbezeichnenden bildern dargest. u. synchron. geordnet. Meissen, 1840, fol.
- De Bray, tableau général d'histoire ecclésiastique. 1855.
- F. Uhlemann, Zeittafeln der Kirchengesch. vom 1. christl. Jahrh. bis zum Angsh. Frieden. Berl., 1864. 2d ed., 1865.
- H. Weingarten, Zeittafeln zur Kirchengesch. 4th ed. Berl., 1874.

3. DICTIONARIES.²

- W. D. Fuhrmann, Handwörterb. der christl. Religions- und Kirchengesch. Mit Vorrede von A. H. Niemeyer. Halle, 1826-29. 3 vols.
- Ch. G. Neudecker, allgem. Lexikon der Religions- und christl. Kirchengesch. für alle Confessionen, enth. die Lehren, Sitten, Gebräuche u. Einrichtungen der heidn., jüd., christl. und mohamed. Religion, etc. Weim., 1834-37. 5 vols.

¹ Older works by Sachs (1760), Semler (1783-96), Seiler (9th ed., 1809).² Older works by Rechenberg (Hierolexicon reale, 1714), Herold (Kirchen- u. Ketserlexicon, 1756), Mehlis (1756), von Einem (1789), Roch (1784), Wittig (1801).

P. Köhler u. R. Klopsch, Revert. der Kirchengesch. Glog., 1845.

Compare also the Lexicons of Aschbach, Wetzler, and Welte (Freib., 1847-56. 12 vols.) and Herzog's Realencyclopädie.

4. SELECTIONS FROM THE ORIGINAL AUTHORITIES.

* Herm. Olshausen, historiae ecclesiasticae veteris monumenta praecipua. Praef. est Neander. Berol., 1820-22, vol. 1, pars 1, 2.

5. PERIODICALS IN CHURCH HISTORY.

Magazin für Religions-, Moral-, u. Kirchengesch.; published by K. F. Stäudlin. Hann., 1802-5. 4 vols.

Archiv für alte und neue Kirchengeschichte; pub. by K. F. Stäudlin u. H. G. Tzschirner. Lpz., 1813-22. 5 vols.

Kirchenhistorisches Archiv, pub. by Stäudlin, Tzschirner, und J. S. Vater. Halle, 1823-26. 4 vols.

Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie; pub. by Ch. F. Ilgen; (since 1846) by Ch. W. Niedner; (since 1867) by Kahnis. Lpz., 1832-74.

Archief voor kerkelijke geschiedenis, inzonderheid van Nederland, door N. Ch. Kist en Hm. J. Royaards. Leyden, 1829 ff. (Still continued.)

Zeitschr. für Kirchengesch., in Verbind. mit W. Gass, H. Reuter, u. A. Ritschl, pub. by Th. Brieger. Gotha, 1876 ff., in 4 Nos. (Still published, and furnishes important contributions in the newest literature of Church history.)

II.

SPECIAL CHURCH HISTORY.

a. THE EARLIER CHURCH HISTORY (First Six Centuries).

1. General.

J. L. Mosheim, Commentarii de rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum. M. Helmst. 1753. 4. Best English ed. of Mosheim is the translation by Murdock and Barnes, edited and brought down to the present time, by W. Stubbs, 3 vols. Lond., 1863.

J. A. Stark, Gesch. der christl. Kirche des 1. Jahrh. Berl., 1779 f. 3 vols.

A. F. Gfrörer, das Jahrhundert des Heils (1. u. 2. Abth. der "Gesch. des Urchristenth."). Stuttg., 1838.

— Gesch. der christl. Kirche in den 3 ersten Jahrh. Stuttg., 1841. (1 vol. of the Allgem. Kirchengesch.)

W. O. Dietlein, das Urchristenthum (against Baur). Halle, 1845.

Capefigue, les quatre premiers siècles de l'église chrét. Par., 1848-50. 3 vols.

F. C. Baur, das Christenthum und die christl. Kirche der drei ersten Jahrh. 3d ed. Tüb., 1868.

— die christl. Kirche vom Anfang des 4. bis zum ende des 6. Jahrh. in den Hauptmomenten ihrer Entwicklung. 2d ed., 1863.

G. V. Lechler, das apostol. und nachapostol. Zeitalter. (Haarlem, 1851.) 2d ed. Stuttg., 1857.

J. P. Lange, das apostolische Zeitalter. Braunsch., 1853, 1854. 2 vols.

K. Graul, die christliche Kirche an der schwelle des Irendäischen Zeitalters. Lpz., 1860.

J. J. Döllinger, Christenth. und Kirche in der Zeit ihrer Grundlegung. 2d ed. Regensb., 1868. English ed., translated by E. Cox. 4 vols. Lond., 1840-42.

F. Overbeck, Studien zur Gesch. der alten Kirche. 1. Heft. Schloss-Chemn. 1875.

Th. Keim, aus dem Urchristenthum. Zur., 1878.

- G. Uhlhorn, der Kampf des Christenth. mit dem Heidenth. 8d ed. Stuttg., 1879.
 American ed., translated by E. C. Smyth and C. J. H. Ropes. N. Y., 1879.
 F. Görres, krit. Untersuchungen über die Licinianische Christenverfolg. Jena, 1875.
 K. Wieseler, die Christenverfolg. der Cäsaren bis zum 3. Jahrh. Gütersl., 1878.
 B. Aubé, hist. des persécutions de l'église. La polémique païenne à la fin du 2. siècle.
 Par., 1878.

Popular Presentations:

- Ch. Hoffmann, das Christenthum im ersten Jahrhundert. Stuttg., 1853.
 K. R. Hagenbach, Kirchengesch. der ersten sechs Jahrh. 8d ed. Lpz., 1869.
 † A. Winiger, die drei ersten Jahrhunderte der Christen. Luzern, 1854. (Especially after Stolberg.)
 H. Kritzler, die Heldenzeiten des Christenthums. Vol. I.: der Kampf mit dem Heidenth.
 Lpz., 1856.
 Merle d'Aubigné, Bungener, de Gasparin et Viguet, le Christianisme des 3 premiers siècles. Genève et Paris, 1857.
 E. de Pressensé, histoire des trois premiers siècles de l'église. Par., 1858 ff. Eng. and Amer. ed., translated by Annie Harwood. Lond. and N. Y., 1878-78.
 C. Burk, die Jugendzeit der christl. Kirche. (7 Lectures.) Stutt., 1875.

2. *Spread of Christianity and Downfall of Paganism.*¹

- J. B. Lederwald, die Ausbreitg. der christl. Religion. Helmst., 1788.
 J. Andrä, Entwicklung der natürlichen Ursachen, welche die schnelle Ausbreitung des Christenthums in den ersten 4 Jahrh. beförderten. Helmst., 1792.
 G. E. Lessing, von der Art und Weise der Fortpflanzung und Ausbreitung der christl.
 Religion; in collected works. 7th vol., pp. 131-160.
 J. A. Oslander, Kritik der gangbaren Meinung, die angebliche grosse und schnelle Ausbreitung des Christenthums betr.; in Stäudlin und Tzschirner's Archiv für Kircheng. Vol. 4., No. 2.
 A. Neander, die verschied. Wege der Bekehrung vom Heidenth. zum Christenthume; in den Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Gesch. des Christenth. Vol. 2, pp. 1-66.
 C. H. Blumhardt, Versuch einer allgem. Missionsgeschichte der Kirche Christl. Basel, 1828-37. 8 vols. in 5 parts. (Incomplete.)
 C. D. A. Martini, über die Einführung der christl. Religion als Staatsreligion im röm.
 Reiche durch Kaiser Constantin. München, 1813.
 H. G. Tzschirner, der Fall das Heidenthums; pub. by C. W. Niedner. Lpz., 1829.
 1st vol. (Incomplete.)
 E. v. Lasaulx, der Untergang des Hellenismus und die Einziehung seiner Tempelgüter durch die christl. Kaiser. München, 1854.
 (Comp. the Monograph on Constantine and Julian, p. 258 ff.)

3. Constitutional History.

- * G. F. Planck, Geschichte der Entstehung und Ausbildung der christl.-kirchl. Gesell-schäftsverfassung. Hann., 1803-5. 5 vols.
 A. Ritschl, die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche. Bonn, 1850. 2d ed., 1857, (greatly improved.)
 S. Sugenheim, Geschichte der Entstehung und Ausbildung des Kirchenstaats. (See History of the Popes.)
 K. B. Hundeshagen, Beiträge z. Kirchenverfassungsgesch. Wiesb., 1864.

¹ Rich historical Material in J. A. Fabricius, Salutaris lux evangelii, etc. Hamb., 1781, vol. 4.
 And in R. Millar, Hist. of the Propagation of Christianity in Several Ages. 3d ed. Lond., 1735.
 3 Parts.

4. Heresies and Delusions (comp. History of Doctrines).

- W. F. Walch, Entwurf einer vollständ. Historie der Ketzereien, etc. Lpz., 1762-85. 11 vols. (To the close of the Image Controversy.)
- A. Neander, genetische Entwicklung der vornehmsten gnostischen Systeme. Berl., 1818.
- J. Matter, hist. critique du Gnosticisme et de son influence sur les autres sectes Relig. et philos. pendant les 6 premiers siècles de notre èra. Par., 1828. 2 vols. (2. éd. Strasb., 1848. 3 vols.) German, by Ch. H. Dörner. Heilb., 1833. 2 vols. (2d ed., 1844).
- † J. A. Möhler, Versuche über den Gnosticismus. Tüb., 1831. (Also in his collected Works, pub. by Döllinger, vol i.)
- F. C. Baur, die christl. Gnosis in ihrer geschtl. Tüb., 1835.¹
- das manichäische Religionssystem, nach den Quellen untersucht und entwickelung. Tüb., 1831. (Comp. also Schneckenburger, in Stud. u. Krit. 1833. 3.)
- A. Schwegler, der Montanismus u. die christl. Kirche des 2 Jahrh. Tüb., 1841.
- A. Lipsius, der Gnosticismus. Wesen, Ursprung, Entwicklung. Lpz., 1860. (Comp. A. Harnack, zur Quellenkritik der Gesch. des Gnosticismus. Lpz., 1873.)
- Ströhl, essai sur le Montanisme. Strasb., 1870.
- A. Lipsius, die Quellen der ältesten Ketzergesch. Lpz., 1875.
- A. Thierry, les grandes hérésies du V. siècle (Nestorius et Eutychès). Par., 1878.
- W. Hermann, die Kirche der Thomaschristen. Gütersl., 1877.

5. Church Councils.

- Ch. W. F. Walch, Entwurf einer vollständ. Historie der Kirchenversammlungen. Lpz., 1759.
- G. D. Fuchs, Bibliothek der Kirchenvers. des 4. und 5. Jahrh. in Uebers. und Auszügen aus ihren Acten, etc. sammt dem Original der Hauptstellen. Lpz., 1780-84. 4 vols.
- H. T. Bruns, bibliotheca ecclesiastica. Canones et concilia saec. 4-7. Berol., 1739. 2 tom.
- * † Hefele, Conciliengeschichte. 7 Bde. (to 16th Cent.) Freib., 1855-74. 2d ed. 1878 ff.² English ed., translated by H. N. Oxenham. Edinb., 1871-76.

6. Ecclesiastical Institutions.

- H. E. F. Guericke, de schola quae Alexandriae floruit catechetica. Hal., 1824, 1825. 2 vols.
- Hasselbach, de schola, quae Alexandriae floruit, catechetica. Stett., 1826.
- J. Matter, histoire de l'école d'Alexandrie. Par., 1820 (1840). 2 vols.

7. Worship and Life of the Christians, together with the Beginnings of Monasticism.

- E. Leopold, das Predigtamt im Urchristenthume. Lüneb., 1846.
- F. Piper, Geschichte des Osterfestes. Berl., 1845.
- K. L. Weitzel, die christl. Passafeyer der drei ersten Jahrh.; zugl. ein Beitrag zur Gesch. des Urchristenth. Pforzh., 1848. (On the contrary, Baur in the Tüb. Jahrb., 1848, 2. Reply by Weitzel in Stud. u. Krit., 1848, 4.)

¹ More especially on the Gnostic Systems, in Winer's Handb. der theol. Liter. 3d ed., i, p. 640 f.

² For a more thorough study, see the collection of proceedings by Ph. Labbeus and Gabr. Cossart. Par., 1671 ff. 18 vols., fol. Also a supplementary vol. by St. Baluzius. Par., 1683, fol. Further, by J. Harduin, conciliorum collectio regia maxima s. acta conc. et epist. decretales summorum pontific. Par., 1715. 12 vols. fol. The most complete collection by J. D. Mansi, sac. conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio; acced. et notae et dissertatt., etc. Flor. et Venet. 1759-68. 81 vols.

- A. Hilgenfeld, der Paschahstreit der alten Kirche, etc. Halle, 1860.
 C. Schmidt, essai hist. sur la société civile dans le monde romain et sur sa transformation par le christianisme. Strasb., 1853.
 E. Chastel, études hist. sur l'influence de la charité durant les premiers siècles chrétiens. Par., 1853. (German, with Preface, by Wichern. Hamb., 1854.)
 G. J. Mangold, de monachatus originibus et causis. Marb., 1852.
 † A. Möhler, Geschichte des Mönchthums in der Zeit seiner Entstehung; in his collected Works, vol. ii, p. 165 ff.
 * H. Weingarten, der Urspr. des Mönchthums im nachconstant. Zeitalter. Gotha, 1877.
 E. Friedberg, aus deutschen Bussbüchern. Ein Beitrag zur deutschen Culturgeschichte. Halle, 1868.
 † Fr. Frank, die Bussdisciplin der Kirche von den Apostelzeiten bis zum 7. Jahrhundert. Mainz, 1868.
 † F. Probst, Liturgie der drei ersten christl. Jahrh. Tüb., 1870.
 — Lehre und Gebet in den drei ersten christl. Jahrh. Tüb., 1871.
 — Sakramente u. Sakramentalien in d. drei ersten christl. Jahrh. Tüb., 1872.
 — kirchl. Disciplin in den drei ersten christl. Jahrh. Tüb., 1873.
 E. de Pressensé, la vie ecclésiastique religieuse et morale aux 2. et 3. siècles. Par., 1877.¹

8. *Biography.*²

- J. C. F. Manso, das Leben Constantins. Bresl., 1817.
 J. Burckhardt, die Zeit Constantins des Grossen. Basel, 1853.
 Th. Keim, der Uebertritt Constantins des gr. zum Christenthum. Zür., 1862.
 G. Wiggers, Julian der Abtrünnige. (Zeitschr. für hist. Theol. 1837. 1.)
 † J. Auer, Kaiser Julian der Abtrünnige im Kampfe mit d. Kirchenvätern f. Zeit. Wien., 1855.
 A. Neander, Kaiser Julian und sein Zeitalter. Lpz., 1812. 2d ed., Gotha, 1867.
 D. F. Strauss, der Romantiker auf dem Thron der Cäsaren, oder Julian der Abtrünnige. Mannh., 1847. (Political Tendency.)
 W. Mangold, Julian der Abtrünnige. Stuttg., 1862.
 C. Semisch, Julian der Abtrünnige. Bresl., 1862.
 A. Mücke, Fl. Claudius Julianus. Gotha, 1867–69.
 G. Torquati, Studien über Jul. Apostata (Italian). Rome, 1878.
 J. H. Stiffken, de Theodosii M. in rem christ. meritis. Lugd. Bat., 1828.
 J. W. Löbell, Gregor von Tours und seine Zeit. Lpz., 1839. 2d ed. (by Sybel), 1869.
 K. G. Kries, de Gregorii Turonensis vita et scriptis. Vratisl., 1839.
 J. H. Reinkens, Martin von Tours. Gera, 1866. 3d ed., 1876.

b. CHURCH HISTORY OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

1. General.

- J. K. Füssli, neue und unparth. Kirchen- u. Ketzehistorie der mittlern Zeiten (11–13. Jahrh.). Lpz., 1770–74. 3 vols.
 † J. F. Damberger, Synchronist. Geschichte der Kirche und der Welt im Mittelalter. Regensb., 1850–54. 6 vols.
 Capefigue, l'église au moyen-âge. Par., 1852.
 F. v. Raumer, Gesch. der Hohenstaufen u. ihrer Zeit. 4th ed. Lpz., 1871. 6 vols.
 Giesebrecht, Gesch. der deutschen Kaiserzeit. 4 vols. Braunschw., 1854–72.
 C. F. Baur, Kirchengesch. des Mittelalters. (See his General Church History.)

¹ See further, the literature on Archaeology.

² Exclusive of matter belonging to Patristics.

For the more cultivated :

Chastel, le christianisme de l'église au moyen-âge. Par., 1859.

Agénor de Gasparin, le christianisme au moyen-âge. (Innocent III.) Genève, 1859.

K. R. Hagenbach, Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalters. 2d ed. Lpz., 1869.

2. On the History of the Popes (from the Beginning to the Reformation).

a. In General.¹

Ch. W. F. Walch, Entwurf einer vollständ. Historie der röm Pápste. Gött., (1756) 1758.

G. J. Planck, Gesch. des Papstthums. Hann., 1805. 3 vols.

J. A. Llorente, die Pápste, etc. (From the French.) Lpz., 1823. 2 vols.

L. T. Spittler, Gesch. des Papstthums; with annotations, pub. by J. Gurlitt, Hamb., 1802; new ed. by H. E. G. Paulus. Heidelb., 1826.

† C. Höfler, die deutschen Pápste. Regensb., 1839.

F. A. Gfrörer, Geschichte der Karolinger. Freib., 1848. 2 vols.

Artaud de Montor, Geschichte der röm. Pápste; translated from the French, and continued by Boost. Augsb., 1848 ff. 8 vols.

J. A. Wylie, Geschichte, Lehren, Geist u. Aussichten des Papstthums. Elberf., 1853. 2d. ed., 1854.

S. Sugenheim, Gesch. d. Entsteh. u. Ausbildung d. Kirchenstaats. Lpz., 1854.

R. A. Lipsius, Chronologie der röm. Bischöfe bis zur Mitte des 4. Jahrh. Kiel, 1869. Gams, series episcoporum ecclesiae cathol. Regensb., 1873.

J. Friedrich, zur ältesten Gesch. des Primates in d. Kirche. Bonn, 1879.

E. Dumont, la papauté, les premiers empereurs chrétiens et les premiers conciles généraux. Par., 1877.

E. Castan, histoire de la papauté. Par., 1875 ff.

V. Gröne, die Papst-Geschichte. 2d ed. Regensb., 1875. 2 vols.

W. Wattenbach, Gesch. des röm. Papstthums. Vorträge. Berl., 1876.

Fèvre, histoire apologétique de la papauté. Par., 1878 f. (So far, 4 vols.)

† J. J. Döllinger, die Papstfabeln des Mittelalters. München, 1863.

R. Baxmann, die Politik der Pápste von Gregor I. bis Gregor VII. Elberf., 1868 f. 2 vols.

F. Gregorovius, Geschichte der Stadt Rom im Mittelalter. Vom 5. bis zum 16. Jahrh. Stuttg., 1859-73. 2d ed., 1869 ff. 8 vols.

A. v. Reumont, Geschichte der Stadt Rom. 3 vols. Berl., 1866-70.

R. Zöpffel, die Papstwahlen und die mit ihnen im nächsten Zusammenhange stehen den Ceremonien, etc., vom 11-14. Jahrh. Gött., 1872.

† C. Höfler, die Avignonesischen Pápste, etc. Wien., 1771.

β. Biographies of Individual Popes: on Gregory I, see Patristica.

D. Bartolini, di S. Zaccaria papa e degli anni del suo pontificato. Regensb., 1879.

† C. F. Hock, Gerbert od. Silvester II. und sein Jahrh. Wien., 1837.

Delarc, un pape Alsacien (Leo IX.). Par., 1876.

J. Voigt, Hildebrand als Papst Gregor VII. und sein Zeitalter. Weimar, 1815. 2d. ed. 1846.

J. M. Sötl, Gregor der Siebente. Lpz., 1847.

¹ Older Works, by B. Platina (de Sacchi), in different editions; F. Pagi, A. Sandin, Arch. Bower (History of Popes, Lond., 1749. 4.; translated and continued by J. J. Rambach, Magdeb. 1751-80. 10 vols.). Comp. Winer, pp. 680 ff. Also sources: Ph. Jaffé, regesta pontificum roman. a condita eccl. ad a. 1198. Berol., 1851 (continued to 1804, by A. Potthaus. Berol., 1874. 2 vols. 4.)

- F. A. Gfrörer, Papst Gregor VII. u. s. Zeitalter. Schaffh., 1859-64. 8 vols.
 M. Villemain, hist. de Gregoire VII. Par., 1873. 2 vols.
 O. Meltzer, Papst Gregor VII. und die Bischofswahlen. 2d ed. Dresd., 1876.
 H. Reuter, Gesch. Alexander III. u. der Kirche seiner Zeit. Bresl. (Lpz.), 1845-64.
 3 vols. (Vol. I, 2d ed., 1860.)
 † F. Hurter, Gesch. Innocenz III. und seiner Zeitgenossen. Hamb., 1834 ff. 4 vols.
 3d ed., 1845 ff.
 † Jorry, hist. du pape Innocent III. Par., 1853.
 W. Drumann, Gesch. Bonifacius des Achten. Königsb., 1852. 2 vols.
 M. Brosch, Papst Julius II. u. die Gründung des Kirchenstaats. Gotha, 1878.
 — Geschichte des Kirchenstaates. Gotha, 1880.
 A. J. Dumesnil, hist. de Jules II. sa vie et son pontificat. Par., 1873.

3. *On the History of Monks, Orders, and Saints.*¹

- L. T. Spittler, Geschichte der Bettelmönchsorden; pub. by J. Gurlitt. Hamb., 1823. 4.
 E. Münch, Gesch. des Mönchthums in allen seinen Verzweigungen, etc. Stuttg., 1828.
 2 vols.
 M. W. Döring, Gesch. der vornehmsten Mönchsorden, etc. Dresd., 1828.
 F. v. Biedenfeld, Ursprung, etc., sämtlicher Mönchs- u. Klosterfrauen-Orden. Weim., 1837. 2 vols. Supplementary vol., 1839.
 † Montalembert, les moines d'occident depuis St. Benoît jusqu'à St. Bernard. Par., 1840 ff. English ed., 5 vols. thus far, Edinb., 1861-67.
 C. E. Gilbert, les moines au moyen-âge. Moulins, 1875.
 Der hl. Benedikt u. seine Orden. Einsied., 1875.
 Fx. Winter, die Prämonstratenser des 12. Jahrh. Berl., 1865.
 — die Cistercienser des nordöstl. Deutschlands. Gotha, 1868-71. 3 vols.
 L. Janaschek, originum Cisterciensium. Vol. I. Wien., 1877.

4. *History of the Crusades and Propagation of Christianity.*²

- J. Michaud, bibliothèque des croisades. Par., 1829 f. 4 vols.
 F. Wilken, Geschichte der Kreuzzüge. Lpz., 1807-32. 7 vols.
 J. Michaud, hist. des croisades, Par., 1812, éd. 6., 1840 ff., 6 vols.; Germ. by Ungewitter und Förster. Quedlinb., 1828-31. 7 vols.
 H. Hagenmeyer, Peter der Eremita. Lpz., 1879.
 C. Klimke, die Quellen zur Gesch. des 4. Kreuzzuges. Bresl., 1875.
 † K. Maurer, Bekehrung des norweg. Stammes z. Christenth. 1st part. Münch., 1855.
 G. Weil, Gesch. der islam. Völker von Mohammed bis zur Zeit des Sultans Selim.
 Stutt., 1866.

5. Mysticism, Sects, Inquisition.

- H. Schmid, der Mysticismus des Mittelalters, etc. Jena, 1824.
 J. Görres, die christl. Mystik. Regensb., 1836-42. 4 vols.
 W. Prager, Gesch. der deutschen Mystik im Mittelalter. 1st part. Lpz., 1874.

¹ Older works by R. Hospinian (de manachis, etc. Tigur., 1566, 1609. Gen., 1669). H. Helvyot (hist. des ordres monastiques, etc. Par., 1714-19. 8 vols. 4.; German, Lpz., 1753-56. 8 vols.; new ed., 1829 ff.) Comp. Winer, pp. 698 ff., on the Acta Sanctorum, idem, pp. 670 ff. The most celebrated among these, the Acta Sanctorum, quotquot toto orbe coluntur, coll., etc. J. Bollandus, with accessions of many other editors, the so-called Bollandists (Antw., 1643-1794. 58 vols. fol. Ten further vols. appeared 1845 ff.) A new edition of this work appeared at Paris, 1863-76. L. Surin, historiae seu vitae sanctorum (Cöln, 1560 ff. u. 5.); new ed., Turin (Lpz.), 1875 ff. J. E. Stadler, Vollständ. Heiligenlexikon (Augsb., 1856 ff.), was continued by J. N. Ginal.

² J. Bongars, Gesta Dei per Francos. Hanau, 1611. 2 voll. fol. For the older and newer literature, see Winer, pp. 588 fol.

- C. A. Hahn, Gesch. der mittelalterl. Ketz. Stuttg., 1846-50. 3 vols.
 J. M. Manderbach, Gesch. des Priscillianismus. Trier, 1851.
 A. Lombard, Pauliciens, Bulgares et Bons-Hommes en Orient et en Occident. Genève, 1879.
 A. W. Dieckhoff, die Waldenser im Mittelalter. Gött., 1851.
 J. J. Herzog, die romanischen Waldenser, ihre vorreformatorischen Zustände u. Lehren, etc. Halle, 1853. (Comp. the Waldensian Histories of Monastier, Muston, and others.)
 K. Hase, neue Propheten. Lpz., 1851. 2d ed., 1861. (Maid of Orleans, Savonarola.)
 A. Sartori, die christlichen und mit der christlichen Kirche zusammenhängenden Secten. Lübeck, 1855. (In tabular form, 4to.)
 E. Schmidt, die Gottesfreunde im 14. Jahrh. Jena, 1854.
 † Jos. Schwab, Johannes Gerson, etc. Würzb., 1858.
 H. Reuter, Gesch. der relig. Aufklärung im Mittelalter vom Ende des 8. bis zum Anf. des 14. Jahrh. Berl., 1875-77. 2 vols.
 Frd. Hoffmann, Gesch. der Inquisition. Bonn, 1878. 2 vols.
 (For the History of Scholasticism, see the general history of the Church and Doctrines. On the more important Scholastics and Mystics, see the following biographies.)

6. *Monographs.*¹

- † A. Seiters, Bonifaz der Apostel der Deutschen nach seinem Leben und Wirken. Mainz, 1845 (to be used with allowance).
 J. P. Müller, Bonifacius. Eene kerkhistorische studie. Amsterd., 1869 f. 2 vols.
 A. Werner, Bonifac., der Ap. d. Deutschen, u. die Romanisirung von Mitteleuropa. Lpz., 1875.
 G. Pfahler, St. Bonifac. u. s. Zeit. Regensb., 1880.
 G. H. Klippel, Lebensbeschr. des Erzbisch. Ansgar. Bremen, 1845. (In addition, the biographies by † A. Tappehorn, 1863, G. Lentz, 1865, C. Mönckeberg, 1865.)
 A. Hüfing, der hl. Liudger. Münster, 1878.
 H. Gehle, de Bedae Venerab. vita et scriptis. Lugd., 1888.
 K. Werner, Beda der Ehrwürdige u. s. Zeit. Wien., 1875.
 F. Lorentz, Alcuins Leben. Halle, 1829.
 K. Werner, Alcuin u. sein Jahrh. Paderb., 1876.
 † F. Kunstmann, Hrabanus Maurus. Mainz, 1841.
 † F. A. Staudenmaier, Joh. Scotus Erigena und die Wissenschaft seiner Zeit. Frankf., 1834.
 Th. Christlieb, Leben und Lehre des Joh. Scot. Erigena. Gotha, 1860.
 C. B. Hundeshagen, de Agobardi . . . vita et scriptis. Giesa., 1831.
 A. Vogel, Ratherius von Verona und das 10. Jahrh. Jena, 1854. 2 vols.
 G. F. Franck, Anselm von Canterbury. Tüb., 1842.
 F. R. Hasse, Anselm von Canterbury. Lpz., 1843-52. 2 vols.
 Ch. de Rémusat, St. Anselme de Cant. Par., 1853; German, by C. Wurstach, Regensb., 1854.
 — Abailard. Par., 1845. 2 vols.
 Ragey, vie intime de St. Anselm au Bec. Par., 1877.
 J. de Crozals, Lanfranc, etc. Par., 1877.
 H. Franke, Arnold von Brescia und seine Zeit. Zürich, 1825.
 Clavel, Arnauld de Breschia et les Romans, du 12 siècle. Par., 1863.
 Guibal, Arnauld de Brescia, et les Hohenstauffen. Par., 1863.
 Giesebrecht, Arn. von Brescia. München, 1873.

¹ Comp. also the History of Doctrines and Patristics.

- G. de Castro, Arnaldo da Brescia, etc. Livorno, 1875.
 A. Neander, der h. Bernhard u. sein Zeitalter, Berl., 1813. 3d. ed., Gotha, 1865.
 J. Ellendorf, der h. Bernh. v. Clairvaux u. d. Hierarchie s. Zeit. Essen, 1837.
 C. A. Wilkens, Petrus der Ehrw. Abt von Clugny. Lpz., 1857.
 *A. Liebner, Hugo v. St. Victor u. die theol. Richtungen s. Zeit. Lpz., 1832.
 J. G. B. Engelhardt, Rich. von St. Victor u. Joh. Ruysbroek. Erl., 1838.
 H. Reuter, Jon. von Salisbury. Bresl., 1842.
 E. Voigt, der heil. Franciscus von Assisi. Tüb., 1840.
 K. Hase, Franz. von Assisi, ein Heiligenbild. Lpz., 1856.
 — Caterina von Siena, ein Heiligenbild. Lpz., 1864.
 L. de Cherancé, St. François d'Assise. Par., 1879.
 At, hist. de St. Antoine de Padoue. Par., 1879.
 †K. Werner, der h. Thomas von Aquino. Regensb., 1858 ff. 3 vols.
 Ch. W. Stromberger, Bertold v. Regensburg. Gütersl., 1877.
 A. Kaufman, Cäsarius, von Heisterbach. Köln, 1850.
 †J. Bach, Meister Eckhardt, der Vater der deutschen Speculation. Wien., 1864.
 A. Lason, Meister Eckhardt der Mystiker. Berl., 1868.
 C. Schmidt, Joh. Tauler von Strassburg. Hamb., 1841. (Comp. Böhlinger, in the Biographies, where also the Lives of Suso and Ruysbroek can be found.)
 †J. B. Diepenbrock, Suso's Leben und Schriften, mit Einleit. von Görres. Regensb., 1829. 3d ed., 1854.
 F. W. v. Ammon, Geiler v. Kaisersberg. Erl., 1826.
 A. Stoeber, essai historique et littéraire sur la vie et les sermons du de Geiler Strasb., 1834. 4.
 J. Dacheux, J. Geiler de Kaysersberg. Par., 1876.
 H. Vast, le cardinal Bessarion. Par., 1879.
 Bolland, hist. de St. François de Paule. 2. ed. Par., 1876.

7. Forerunners of the Reformation.

- L. Fläthe, Gesch. der Vorläufer der Reformation. Lpz., 1835 f. 2 vols.
 *C. Ullmann, Reformatoren vor der Reformation, vornehmli. in Deutschl. und in den Niederlanden. Hamb., 1841 f. 2 Bde. 2d ed., Gotha, 1865 f. (Vol. I: Joh. von Goch, Joh. von Wesel, and others. Vol. II: Joh. von Wesel and others, especially the German Mystics. English ed., translated by R. Menzies. 2 vols. Edinb., 1855.
 C. de Bonnechose, réformateurs avant la réforme du XVI. siècle. Par., 1853. 2 vols. (Gerson, Hus, the Council of Constantinople.)
 F. Scharpff, der Cardinal u. Bischof Nicolaus von Cusa als Reformator in Kirche, Reich u. Philosophie des 15. Jahrhunderts. Tüb., 1871.
 A. G. Rudelbach, Hieron. Savonarola und seine Zeit. Hamb., 1835.
 F. K. Meier, Girol. Savonarola. Berl., 1836.
 F. Perrens, Jér. Savonarola, etc. Par., 1853-57. 2 vols.
 Pasquale Pieroli, Geschichte Girolamo Savonarola u. seiner Zeit. Deutsch von M. Berduschek. Lpz., 1868. 2 vols.
 E. C. Bayonne, étude sur Jér. Savonarole. Par., 1879.
 O. Jäger, John Wycliffe. Halle, 1854.
 F. Böhlinger, J. Wycliffe (Biographien II, 4, 1; s. p. 248).
 *G. Lechler, Joh. v. Wiclif u. die Vorgesch. der Reformation. Lpz., 1873. 2 vols.
 J. A. Helfert, Hus und Hieronymus. Prag., 1853.
 L. Krummel, Gesch. der böhm. Reformation im 15. Jahrh. Gotha, 1866.
 — Utraquisten u. Taboriten. Gotha, 1871.

F. Palacky, Documenta Mag. Joa. Hus vitam, doctrinam, causam in Constantiensi concilio actam et controversias de religione in Bohemia annis 1403-1418 motas illustrantia, etc. Prag., 1869.

— urkundl. Beiträge zur Gesch. des Husitenkriegs. Prag., 1873 f. 2 vols.

W. Berger, Johannis Hus und König Sigismund. Augs., 1872.

F. Reiser, Reformation des König Sigmund. Pub. by W. Böhm. Lpz., 1876.

F. v. Bezold, zur Gesch. des Husitentums. München, 1874.

— König Sigmund und die Reichskriege gegen die Husiten. Münster, 1872-73. 2 parts.

E. Denis, Huss et la guerre des Hussites. Par., 1878.

E. Th. Mayerhoff, Joh. Reuchlin und seine Zeit. Berl., 1830.

L. Geiger, Johann Reuchlin, sein Leben und seine Werke. Lpz., 1871.

A. Müller, Leben des Erasmus von Rotterdam. Hamb., 1828.

O. Stichert, Erasmus von Rotterdam. Seine Stellung zu der Kirche und zu den kirchl. Bewegungen seiner Zeit. Lpz., 1870.

Martin, Erasmus en zijn tijd. Amsterd., 1870.

Durand de Laur, Erasmus précurseur et initiateur de l'esprit moderne. 2 vols. Par., 1872.

D. F. Strauss, Ulrich von Hutten. Lpz., 1858-60. 3 vols. (New ed., in 1 vol., 1871.) Böcking published the works of Hutten (Lpz., 1859-62) in 5 vols.

E. Ullmann, Franz von Sickingen. Lpz., 1872.

H. A. Pröhle, Andreas Proles, ein Zeuge der Wahrheit kurz vor Luther. Gotha, 1867.

O. G. Schmidt, Petrus Mosellanus, ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des humanismus in Sachsen. Lpz., 1867.

On the Reformatory Councils:

Monumenta conciliorum gener. asec. XV. Wien, 1857-74 (tom. I, II: Concil. Basil. scriptores).

† J. H. K. v. Wessenberg, die grossen Kirchenversammlungen des 15. und 16. Jahrhunderts. Const., 1840. 4 vols.

P. Tschackert, Peter von Ailli. Gotha, 1877.

C. HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION.

1. *General (and German) History of the Reformation.*¹

K. L. Woltmann, Gesch. der Reformation in Deutschland. Altona, 1801-5. 2d ed., 1817. 3 vols.

* Ph. Marheineke, Geschichte der teutschen Reformation. Berl., 1817. 2 vols. 2d ed., 1831-34. 4 vols.

K. A. Menzel, neuere Geschichte der Deutschen, von der Reformation bis zur Bundesacte. Vols. 1-8. Breslau, 1826 ff.

¹ Sources: the Writings of the Reformers (Corpus Reformatorum, pub. by Breitschneider, and after his death by Bindseil. Halle, 1834 ff. (Melanthonis opera, 28 tom!), continued by Baum. Cunitz, Reuss. (Calvini opera. Brunsv., 1833 ff., thus far 20 tom!). Luther's Briefe und Sendschreiben by de Wette. Berl., 1835-28. 5 vols. Vol. 6 by J. Seidemann, 1856. [In addition: C. Burckhardt, Luther's Briefwechsel. Lpz., 1866.] Luther's sämmtl. Werke by Plochmann and Irmischer. Frankf., 1836-37. 67 vols. 2d ed., 1864 ff. Zwingli's Werke by Schuler and Schulthess. Zür., 1828 ff. Calvin's Briefe, French, pub. by Jules Bonnet. Par., 1864. 2 vols. Older histories of the Reformation by Sleidanus (1555; edition by E. Hoche, Lpz., 1846), Seckendorf (1686; German abridgement by Junius 1755, by Roos 1788), Scultetus (1618), Gerdes (1744 ff.), etc. For Switzerland: H. Bullinger (pub. by Hottinger and Vögeli, Frauenfeld, 1838 ff. 3 vols.); J. Strickler, Actensammlung zur Schweizer. Reformationsgesch. (1521-32.) Zür., 1877 ff. Comp. also the collections of the acts and original documents by Lächer, Kopp, Strobel, Wagenseil, Förstemann, Neudecker, Friedländer, K. and W. Kraft (Briefe u. Documente aus der Zeit der Reform., Elberf., 1876), etc.

- K. R. Hagenbach, Geschichte der Reformation, vorzüglich in Deutschland und der Schweiz. In vorlesungen. 4th ed. Lpz., 1870.
- W. Wachsmuth, Darstellungen aus der Gesch. des Reformationszeitalters. 1st part. Lpz., 1884 (Peasant War).
- H. Clausen, populäre Vorträge über die Reformation. Translated from the Danish by Janssen. Lpz., 1837.
- Merle d'Aubigné, hist. de la réformation du 16. siècle. Par., 1835-53. 5 vols. 4. ed., 1861 ff. English ed. passim.
- hist. de la réf. en Europe au temps de Calvin. Par., 1868-78. 8 vols. (German, Elberf., 1863 ff.) American ed., 8 vols. N. Y., 1873.
- *L. Ranke, deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation. Berl., 1839 ff. 5th ed., Lpz., 1874. 6 vols.
- K. Hagen, Deutschlands liter. und relig. Verhältnisse im Reformationszeitalter. Erl., 1841-44. 3 vols.
- C. G. Neudecker, Gesch. der deutschen Reform. von 1517-32. Lpz., 1842.
- Gesch. des evang. Protestant. in Deutschland. Lpz., 1844 f. 2 vols.
- F. A. Holzhausen, der Protestantismus in seiner geschichtl. Entstehung, Begründung und Fortbildung. Lpz., 1846-59. 3 vols.
- C. H. Bresler, die Gesch. der deutschen Reform. (1846). 2d ed., Berl., 1850 f. 2 vols.
- †J. J. Döllinger, die Reformation, ihre innere Entwicklung und ihre Wirkungen. (1846 ff.) 2d ed., Regensb., 1851 ff. 3 vols.
- H. E. F. Guericke, Geschichte der Reformation. Berl., 1855.
- B. ter-Haar, Reformationsgeschichte in Schilderungen. From the Dutch by C. Gross. Gotha, 1856. 2 vols.
- *D. Schenkel, die Reformatoren u. die Reformation. Wiesb., 1856.
- *G. Freytag, Bilder aus dem Jahrh. der Reformation. 11th ed. Lpz., 1879.
- K. Braune, die Reform. u. die drei Reformatoren. 2d ed. Altenb., 1873.
- *L. Häusser, Geschichte des Zeitalters der Reformation, pub. by Oncken. Berl., 1867 f.
- E. F. Souchay, Deutschland während der Reformation. Frkf. a. M., 1868.¹
- G. Plitt, Einleit. in die Augustana. Vol. 1: Gesch. der evang. Kirche bis zum Augsburger Reichstage. Erl., 1867.
- W. Maurenbrecher, Karl V. und die deutschen Protestanten, 1545-1555. Düsseld., 1865.
- A. Baur, Deutschland in den J. 1517-25. Betrachtet im Lichte gleichzeitiger anonym u. pseudonymer deutscher Volks- u. Flugschriften. Ulm, 1872.
- K. Grün, Culturgeschichte des 16. Jahrhunderts. Lpz., 1872.
- Jahrbücher des deutschen Reichs und der deutschen Kirche im Zeitalter der Reformation, pub. by J. K. F. Knaake. 1 vol. Lpz., 1872.
- E. L. Th. Henke, neuere Kirchengesch. (Lectures) Pub. by W. Gass. Vol. 1: Gesch. der Reform. Halle, 1874. Vol. 2: Gesch. der getrennten Kirchen (to about 1750). 1878.

On Persecutions:

- Th. Fliedner, Buch der Märtyrer und anderer Glaubenszeugen der evang. Kirche von den Aposteln bis auf unsere Zeit. Kaiserswerth, 1852-60. 4 vols.

2. Lives of Individual Reformers.

- Vitae quatuor Reformatorum—Lutheri a Melanchth., Melanchthonis a Camerario, Zwinglii a Myconio, Calvini a Th. Beza—conscriptae, nunc junctim editae. Praefat. est A. F. Neander. Berol., 1841.

¹ Attractive special features of the history of the Reformation, in the 3d and 4th vols. of J. G. Müller's Denkwürdigkeiten, etc. Also the Reformationsalmanach, published by F. Keyser (three years, 1817-20), presents much interesting history.

a. German Reformers of the Lutheran Church.

* Leben und ausgewählte Schriften der Väter und Begründer der luther. Kirche, pub. by J. Hartmann and others, introduction by K. J. Nitzsch. Elberf., 1861 ff. (Parts 1 and 2: *M. Luther by J. Köstlin. 1875. Part 3: Melanchthon by C. Schmidt, 1861. Part 4: Joh. Bugenhagen Pomeranus by K. A. T. Vogt. 1867. Part 5: Andreas Oslander by W. Möller. 1869. Part 6: Joh. Brenz by Jul. Hartmann. 1862. Part 7: Urbanus Rhegius by G. Uhlhorn. 1861. Part 8: J. Jonas, C. Cruciger, P. Speratus, L. Spengler, N. v. Amsdorf, P. Eber, M. Chemnitz, D. Chyträus, by Th. Pressel. 1863.)

Lives of Luther:

- G. H. A. Ukert, Luthers Leben, nebst einer kurzen Gesch. der Reform. Deutschlands. Gotha, 1817. 2 vols. (with abundant literature).
 Ch. W. Spieker, Gesch. M. Luthers und der durch ihn bewirkten Kirchenverbesserung in Deutschland. 1 vol. Berl., 1818.
 C. F. G. Stang, Mart. Luther. Sein Leben und Wirken. Stuttg., 1835-7.
 G. Pfeizer, Mart. Luthers Leben. Stuttg., 1836.
 K. F. Ledderhose, M. Luther, nach seinem äussern und innern Leben dargestellt. Speier, 1836.
 M. Meurer, Luthers Leben, aus den Quellen erzählt. Dresd., 1843-46. 3 vols.; selection from the same, 1850. 3d ed., 1870. Jugend- u. Volksausg. 3d ed., Lpz., 1878.
 K. Jürgens, Luthers Leben. Lpz., 1846, 1847. 3 vols.
 Luther, der deutsche Reformator, in bildlichen Darstellungen von G. König und in geschichtl. Umrissen, by H. Gelzer. Hamb., (Gotha) 1851. 4to, with 48 steel plates. (Excellent.)
 G. A. Hoff, vie de Luther. Par., 1860.
 H. W. J. Thiersch, Luther, Gustav Adolph und Maximilian I. Nördl., 1869.¹
 D. Schenkel, Luther in Worms und in Wittenberg und die Erneuerung der Kirche in der Gegenwart. Elberf., 1870.
 H. Lang, Martin Luther, ein religiöses Charakterbild. Berl., 1870.
 K. F. Köhler, Luthers Leben dargest. in s. Reisen. Eisen., 1875.
 H. Späth, Luther u. sein Werk. Oldenb., 1876.
 Aubin, histoire de la vie, etc., de Luther. 4. ed. Par., 1876.
 A. Baur, M. Luther. Tüb., 1878.
 Comp. also: Luthardt, die Ethik Luthers in ihren Grundzügen, 2d ed., Lpz., 1875; S. Lommatzsch, Luthers Lehre vom ethisch-relig. Standp. aus, Berl., 1879; H. Her- ing, die Mystik Luthers, etc., Lpz., 1879; K. Hase, 275 Lutherbriefe in Auswahl u. Uebers., new ed., Lpz., 1878.

Melanchthon (by Camerarius. See foot note below).²

- M. Facius, Melanchthons Leben und Charakteristik. Lpz., 1832.
 L. F. Heyd, Melanchthon und Tübingen 1512-18. Tüb., 1839.
 F. Galle, Versuch einer Charakteristik Melanchthons als Theologen. Halle, 1840.

¹ Older biographies of Luther by Melanchthon, Matthæsius (frequently published, by Rust, with pref. by A. Neander (Berl., 1841), Walch, Kell, (1763 ff. 4 vols.), by Ch. Nlemeyer, and many others.

² The older biography by Joach. Camerarius, de Ph. Mel. ortu, totius vitæ curriculo et morte. implicata rerum memorabilium temporis illius hominumque mentione, etc. (first, Lpz., 1565), has been frequently published. The most useful, with many annotations, is by Strobel (Halle, 1777). Later (at same time with Melanchthon's Life of Luther), by Augusti (Bresl., 1817); Ger- man, by Zimmermann, with notes by Villers, and Preface by Planck, Gött. (1812), 1816.

Wohlfahrt (1860) and many other works which appeared on anniversary of Melancthon's death, 19th April, 1860. (Comp. die Göttinger Biblioth. theol. XIII. 1. pp. 13-15).

Herlinger, die Theol. Melancthons in ihrer gesch. Entwicklung. Gotha, 1879.

Brenz': J. H. Vaihinger (Stuttg., 1841), J. Hartmann und K. Jäger (Hamb., 1840-42. 2 vols.).

Justus Jonas': Knapp (1817).

Bugenhagen's: Zietz (Lpz., 1829; 2d ed., 1834), Bellermann (Berl., 1859), and Vogt (1867).

Fr. Myconius': C. F. Ledderhose (Gotha, 1854).

Karlstadt's: K. F. Jäger (Stuttg., 1856).

M. Chemnitz': H. Hachfeld (Lpz., 1867).

β. The Reformers of the Reformed Church.

*Leben und ausgewählte Schriften der Väter und Begründer der reformirten Kirche, published by J. W. Baum, R. Christoffel, K. R. Hagenbach, and others, introduced by K. R. Hagenbach, Elberf., 1857-63. (I. Zwingli, by Christoffel. II. Oecolampad u. Myconius, by Hagenbach. III. Capito u. Butzer, by Baum. IV. Joh. Calvin, by E. Stähelin. V. Heinr. Bullinger, by C. Pestalozzi. VI. Th. Beza, by H. Hepp. VII. Peter Martyr Vermigli, by C. Schmidt. VIII. Olevianus u. Ursinus, by K. Sudhoff. IX. 1. Joh. a Lasco, by P. Bartels; Leo Judä, by Pestalozzi; Franz. Lambert, by F. W. Hassencamp; Wilh. Farel u. Peter Viret, by C. Schmidt. IX. 2. J. Vadian, by Th. Pressel; B. Haller, by Pestalozzi; A. Blaurer, by Th. Pressel. X. John Knox, by Brandes.)

Leben Zwingli's: Nüscheler (1776), Rotermund (1818); J. C. Hess, vie d'Ulr. Zwingli (Par. et Gen., 1818; German, by Usteri, Zür., 1811); J. M. Schuler (Zür., 1819); J. Hottinger (Zür., 1842); G. Röder (St. Gallen und Bern, 1855); R. Christoffel (see above). H. Spörri, Zwinglistudien. Lpz., 1866. *J. C. Mörikofer, Ulrich Zwingli. Lpz., 1867-69. 2 vols.

Oekolampadius: J. Herzog (Bas., 1843. 2 vols.), Hagenbach (see above).

Oswald Myconius': M. Kirchhofer (Zür., 1830), Hagenbach (see above).

Berthold Haller's: M. Kirchhofer (Zür., 1828).

Heinr. Bullinger's (and his wife): H. Christoffel (Zür., 1875).

γ. Calvin and his Disciples.

Lives of Calvin: H. Bolsec (Lyon, 1577; new ed., by P. L. Chastel, Lyon, 1875); P. Henry (Hamb., 1835-44. 3 vols.; Selections by same, 1846); F. P. W. Guizot (Joh. Calvin, ein Lebensbild, from the French, by M. Runkel, Lpz., 1847); *Stähelen (see above); F. Bungener (1862, French; German, Lpz., 1863); Pressel (1864); Viguet et Tissot (1864); *†Kampschulte (Joh. Calvin, seine Kirche und sein Staat in Genf. 1st vol., Lpz., 1869); Guizot (in Vies de quatre grands chrétiens français. Par., 1873, tom i); C. Goguel (2d ed., Toulouse, 1878); P. Lobstein (die Ethik Calvins in ihren Grundzügen entw., Strassb., 1877); and many smaller writings on the centennial occasion of his death, 1864.¹

Farel's: Kirchhofer (Zür., 1832, 1833); Schmidt (Strassb., 1834); Junod (Par., 1865).

Beza's: J. W. Baum (Theodor Beza, Lpz., 1843-51, 2 vols.; appendix to 2d vol., Lpz., 1852); Schmidt (Farel and Viret, see above).

δ. Further Biographical Histories of the Reformation.

†G. Th. Rudhardt, Thomas Morus. Nürnberg, 1829.) Augsburg, 1852.

R. Baumstark, Thom. Morus. Freib., 1879.

¹ Of special value is the Briefsammlung der französischen Reformatoren, published by Herminjard. Genf., 1866.

Jules Bonnet, vie d'Olympia Morata. Par., 1850.

*Ch. H. Sixt, Petrus Paulus Vergerius, päpstl. Nuntius, kathol. Bischof und Vor-kämpfer des evangeliums. Braunsch., 1855.

Th. Keim, Ambr. Blurer, der schwäb. Reformator. Stuttg., 1860.

Th. Pressel, A. Blaurers, des schwäb. Reformators, Leben und Schriften. Stuttg., 1861.

C. J. Cosack, Paulus Speratus' Leben und Lieder. Braunsch., 1861.

K. Benrath, Bernardino Ochino von Siena. Lpz., 1875.

3. The Sects of the Period of the Reformation.

H. W. Erbkam, Gesch. der prot. Secten im Zeitalter d. Reform. Hamb., 1858.

C. Hase, das Reich der Wiedertäufer (neue Proph.), 2d ed. Lpz., 1860.

C. A. Cornelius, Gesch. des Münsterischen Aufruhra. Lpz., 1855-60. 2 vols.

F. Trechsel, die protestant. Antitrinitarier vor Faustus Socin. Heidelb., 1839-44. 2 vols.

H. Tollin, das Lehrsystem Mich. Servets. Gütersl., 1876-78. 3 vols.

4. Single Epochs and Important Points in the History of the Reformation.

Reichstag zu Worms: Friedrich (in den Abhandl. der Münch. Akad., 1871).

Deutscher Bauernkrieg: Sartorius (1795), Wachsmuth (1834), Zimmermann (1841 ff. new ed., 1856, 3 vols.), Cornelius (1861).

Marburger Religionsgespräch: Schmitt (Marb., 1840), Schirrmacher (Briefe u. Acten. Gotha, 1876).

Reichstag zu Speier (1529): J. Ney (Hamb., 1880).

Augsburger Reichstag (1530): Rotermund (1829), Pfaff, Fikenscher, Facius, and others (1830), Schirrmacher (Briefe u. Acten. Gotha, 1876).

Religionsgespräch zu Regensburg (1541): Hergang (Cassel, 1858).

Augsburger Interim: Hergang (Lpz., 1855), Frege (1855).

Augsburger Religionsfrieden: Spieker (Schleiz, 1854).

d. HISTORY OF THE SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES.

1. Roman Catholic Church.

F. Bungener, histoire du concile de Trente. Par., 1847; 2d ed., 1850. 2 vols. English ed. Edinb., 1854.

J. T. L. Danz, Geschichte des Tridentin. Concils. Jena, 1846.

Th. Sickel, zur Geschichte des Concils von Trient (1559-68). Actenstücke aus österreichischen Archiven. 3 parts. Wien, 1870-72.

L. Maynier, étude histor. sur le concile de Trente. 1st part. Par., 1874.

J. J. Döllinger, Berichte u. Tagebb. zur Gesch. des Conc. von Tr. Nördl., 1876.

A. Theiner published the Authentic Transactions of the Council of Trent of Angelo Massarelli (Agram u. Leipz., 1874. 2 tom. fol.).

*L. Ranke, die röm. Päpste ihre Kirche u. ihr Staat im 16. u. 17. Jahrh. Berl., 1834-36. 3 vols. 6th ed. Lpz., 1874. Translated by Sarah Austin. 4th ed. 3 vols. Lond., 1866.

E. Zirngiebl, Studien über das Institut der Gesellschaft Jesu. Lpz., 1870.

†J. Huber, der Jesuitenorden, etc. Berl., 1873.

Spuller, Ignace de Loyola et la compagnie de Jésus. Par., 1876.

J. Lorenz, Sixtus V. u. seine Zeit. Mainz, 1852.

C. Ignazio, Innocenzo X. e la sua corte. Rom., 1878.

A. v. Hübner, Sixtus V. (Par., 1870. 3 vols.) Germ. Lpz., 1871. 2 vols.

C. E. Scharling, Michael Molinos. (From the Danish.) Gotha, 1855.

- *H. Reuchlin, Geschichte von Port-Royal. Hamb., 1839–44. 2 vols.
 — Pascals Leben und der Geist seiner Schriften. Stuttg., 1840.
 G. Dreydorff, Pascal, sein Leben und seine Kämpfe. Lpz., 1870.
 Th. W. Ecklin, Blaise Pascal, ein Zeuge der Wahrheit. Basel, 1870.
 H. Heppel, Gesch. der quietistischen Mystik in der kath. Kirche. Berl., 1875.
 Fuzet, les Jansénistes du 17. siècle, leur histoire et leur dernier historien, M. Sta.
 Beuve. Par., 1877.
 Wunderlich, Fénelon, Erzbisch. v. Cambrai. Hamb., 1873.

2. Protestant Church.

- A. Tholuck, der Geist der luther. Theologen Wittenbergs im Verlauf des 17. Jahrh.
 Hamb. u. Gotha, 1852.
 — Vorgeschichte des Rationalismus. Halle, 1858 f. 2 vols. (Vol. 1: Das akadem.
 Leben des 17. Jahrh. mit besond. Beziehung auf die protest-theolog. Facultäten Deutschlands. Vol. 2: Die akadem. Geschichte der deutschen, skandinav., niederländ., und schweiz. hohen Schulen.)
 — Lebenszeugen der luther. Kirche aus allen Ständen vor und während der Zeit des dreissigjährigen Krieges. Berl., 1859.
 — Gesch. des Rationalismus. 1st part (Gesch. des Pietismus). Berl., 1865.
 K. R. Hagenbach, der ev. Protestantism. in s. Verhältn. zum Katholicism. im 16. u.
 17. Jahrh. Part 1: Die Zeiten vor dem 30 jähr. Krieg. Part 2: Der 30 jähr.
 Krieg. u. die Folgezeit bis zu Ende des 17. Jahrh. 3d ed. Lpz., 1870 f.
 J. C. Mörikofer, J. J. Breitingen u. Zürich. Lpz., 1873.
 O. Krabbe, David Chyträus. Rostock, 1870.
 C. A. Wilkena, Tilem. Heshusius, e. Streittheolog der Lutherskirche. Lpz., 1860.
 A. Peip, Jakob Böhme, der deutsche Philosoph. Hamb., 1862.
 Ch. Scharling, Jac. Böhme's Theosophie (Danish). Kopenh., 1879.
 E. L. Th. Henke, Georg Calixtus und seine Zeit. Part 1 (Die Univers. Helmstädt im 16. Jahrh.), Halle, 1833. Parts 2–4, 1853–60.
 — Kasper Peucer u. Nicolaus Crell. Marb., 1865.
 F. Brandes, der Kanzler Crell, ein Opfer des Orthodoxismus. Lpz., 1873.
 W. Hossbach, Joh. Valentin Andreä und sein Zeitalter. Berl., 1819.
 J. Vial, Balthasar Schuppius, ein Vorläufer Spencers. Mainz, 1857.—E. Oelze, B.
 Schuppius. Hamb., 1868.
 W. Hossbach, Phil. Jac. Spener und seine Zeit. Berl., 1828. 2 vols. 3d ed., by G.
 Schweder, 1861.
 H. G. F. Guericke, A. H. Francke. Halle, 1827.
 G. Kramer, neue Beitr. zur Gesch. A. H. Francke's. Halle, 1875 f.
 G. Droysen, Gustav Adolph. 2 vols. Lpz., 1868–70.

3. HISTORY OF THE EIGHTEENTH AND NINETEENTH CENTURIES.

1. General.

- K. R. Hagenbach, die Kirche des 18. und 19. Jahrh. (Vorlesungen vols. 6, 7.) 4th ed.
 Lpz., 1871, 1872. English and American ed., translated by John F. Hurst. 2 vols.
 Lond. and N. Y., 1869.
 K. F. A. Kahn, der innere Gang des deutschen Protestantismus seit Mitte des vorigen Jahrh. Lpz., 1854. 8d ed. (2 vols.) 1874. English ed., Lond., 1855.
 C. Schwarz, zur Geschichte der neuesten Theologie. Lpz., 1856. 4th ed., 1869.
 T. Wangemann, sieben Bücher Preussischer Kirchengeschichte; eine aktenmässige Darstellung des Kampfes um die lutherische Kirche im 19. Jahrh. Berl., 1859–61.
 3 vols.

- *F. Nippold, Handb. der neuesten Kirchengesch. seit der Restauration von 1814. 2d ed. Elberf., 1867.
- H. Schmid, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche Deutschlands von der Mitte des 18. Jahrh. bis in die Gegenwart. München, 1872.
- J. Bertrand, le pontificat de Pie VI. Par., 1876. 2 vols.
- On the newest papal history, comp. the Biographies of Pius IX., by Villefranche (Lyon, 1876); J. G. Shea (English, N. Y., 1877); Gillet (French, Münster, 1877); de Bussy (Par., 1878); L. Wappmannsperger (Regensb., 1878); und die Leo's XIII., by A. Chaulieu (Par., 1878).
- O. Mejer, zur Geschichte der römisch-deutschen Frage. Part 1: Deutscher Staat und römisch-kathol. Kirche von der letzten Reichszeit bis zum Wiener Congresse. Rostock, 1871. Part 2: Die bayer. Concordatsverhandlung. Rostock, 1872.
- F. Brandes, Gesch. der kirchlichen Politik des Hauses Brandenburg. (Vol. 1: Gesch. der evangel. Union in Preussen.) Gotha, 1872 ff. 2 vols.
- †H. Rolfus, Kirchengeschichtliches in chronolog. Reihenfolge (since 1869). Mainz, 1877-79.
- Allgem. kirchl. Chronik, founded by K. Matthes, continued by H. Schultze, now by O. Stichart. Hamb., 1855 ff.
- Evang. Kirchen-Chronik. Lpz., 1868 ff.

2. Biographies.

- M. v. Engelhardt, Valent. Ernst Löcher. Dorp, 1858. 2d ed. Stuttg., 1856.
- J. Ch. F. Burk, Joh. Alb. Bengels Leben und Werken. 2d ed. Stuttg., 1832.
- O. Wächter, Joh. Alb. Bengels Lebensabriss. Stuttg., 1855.
- C. A. Auberlen, die Theosophie F. C. Oetingers. Tüb., 1847. 2d ed., 1859.
- Cramp, Gesch. des Baptismus bis zum Schluss des 18. Jahrh. German, by J. Balmer. Hamb., 1878.
- K. A. Varnhagen v. Ense, Leben des Grafen v. Zinzendorf. Berl., 1830.
- L. C. v. Schrautenbach, der Graf von Zinzendorf und die Brüdergemeinde seiner Zeit Gnadau, 1851. 2d ed., 1872.
- J. F. Schröder, der Graf Zinzendorf und Herrnhut, oder Geschichte der Brüderunität bis auf die neueste Zeit. Nordh., 1857. 2d ed., Lpz., 1868.
- G. Burekhardt, Zinzendorf und die Brüdergemeinde. Gotha, 1866.
- H. Plitt, Zinzendorfs Theologie. Gotha, 1869 ff. 3 vols.
- E. W. Gröger, Gesch. der erneuerten Brüderkirche. Gnadau, 1852-54. 3 vols.
- K. C. G. Schmidt, des Johannes Wesley Leben und Werken. Halle, 1849.
- L. S. Jacoby, Handbuch des Methodismus, enth. die Geschichte, Lehre, etc., desselben. Bremen, 1853. 3d ed., 1871.
- J. Jüngst, der Method. in Deutschland. 2d ed. Gotha, 1877.
- V. Verlaque, histoire du card. du Fleury. Par., 1879.
- G. V. Lechler, Geschichte des engl. Deismus. Stuttg., 1841.
- L. Noack, die Freidenker in der Religion. Bern, 1853-55. 3 vols. (Vol. 1: die engl.; Vol. 2: die französ. Deisten; Vol. 3: die deutsche Aufklärung.)
- A. Pichler, die Theologie des Leibnitz. 2 vols. München, 1869, 1870.
- C. Schwarz, G. Ephr. Lessing als Theolog. Halle, 1854.
- G. Röpe, Joh. Melchior Goetze. Eine Rettung. Hamb., 1860.
- O. Thelemann, Fr. Ad. Lampe. Sein Leben u. s. Theologie. Bielef., 1868.
- *F. W. Bodemann, Joh. Caspar Lavater. Gotha, 1856. (Comp. the biographies under Practical Theology.)
- A. Werner, Herder als Theologe. Berl., 1871.

- C. H. Gildemeister, Joh. Georg Hamanns, des Magus in Norden, Leben und Schriften. 6 vols. Gotha, 1857-78. 2d ed., 1875 ff. Idem: Hamann-Studien. Gotha, 1874.
- A. Disselhoff, Wegweiser zu Joh. Georg Hamann. Elberf., 1870.
- M. Petri, Hamanns Schriften im Zusammenh. seines Lebens erl. Hann., 1872-74. 4 vols.
- G. Poel, Joh. G. Hamann, etc. Hamb., 1874-76. 2 vols. (Vol. 1: Das Leben; Vol. 2: Die Schriften.)
- C. Mönckeberg, Matthias Claudius (Galerie Hamburgischer Theologen, vol. 6). Hamb., 1869.
- R. A. v. Reichlin-Meldegg, H. E. G. Paulus und seine Zeit; nach dessen literar. Nachlasse, etc. Stuttg., 1853. 2 vols.
- D. Schenkel, F. Schleiermacher. Ein Lebens- u. Charakterbild. Elberf., 1868.
- W. Dillthey, Leben Schleiermachers. Vol. 1. Berl., 1870.
- W. Bender, Schleiermachers Theologie. 2 vols. Nördl., 1876-78.
- C. Palmer, die Gemeinschaften und Sekten Württembergs, pub. by Jetter. Tüb., 1877.

3. History of Christian Life and Later Mysticism.

- *Max Göbel, Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westphälischen evangelischen Kirche. Coblenz, 1849-60. 3 vols. 2d ed., 1862 f.
- H. Heppel, Gesch. Pietismus u. der Mystik in der reform. Kirche, nam. der Niederlande. Leiden, 1879.
- Jul. Hamberger, Stimmen aus dem Heiligthum der christlichen Mystik und Theosophie. Stuttg., 1857. 2 vols.

4. History of Later Councils, and the Vatican Council.

- Acta et decreta sacrorum conciliorum recentiorum. Collectio Lacensis (by the Jesuits at Maria Laach). Frib., 1871-79. V tomi (I: The Councils of the Catholic Bishops of the Latin ritus, and II: Of the Oriental Bishops, 1682-1789; III: The American and English; IV: The French; V: The German, Hungarian, and Dutch Councils of 1789-1869).
- Acta et decreta concilii Vaticani. Frib., 1871.
- Decreta et canones s. et oecum. concilii Vatici. Regensb., 1875 (likewise Latin and German).
- E. Friedberg, Sammlung der Aktenstücke zum ersten vatikan. Concil mit einem Grundriss der Gesch. desselben. Tüb., 1871 f.
- J. Friedrich, Tagebuch. Während des vatic. Concils geführt. Nördl., 1871. 2d ed., 1873.
- Gesch. des vatic. Concils. Bonn, 1877.
- T. Frommann, Geschichte und Kritik des vatikanischen Concils. Gotha, 1873.
- E. de Pressensé, le Concile du Vatican, son histoire et ses conséquences politiques et religieuses. Par., 1872. (American ed., translated by Rev. George Prentice. N. Y., 1870.)
- † E. Ceconi, Geschichte der allgem. Kirchenversammlungen im Vatican. German by Molitor. Regensb., 1873.
- † Manning, die wahre Gesch. des vatic. Concils. German by W. Bender. Berl., 1877.

SPECIAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH AND REFORMATION IN INDIVIDUAL COUNTRIES.

Germany:

- F. W. Rettberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschlands. Gött., 1846-48. 2 vols. (Incomplete.)
- W. Krafft, Kirchengesch. der german. Völker. Berl., 1854.
- H. Heppel, Entstehung, Kämpfe und Untergang evangel. Gemeinden in Deutschland. Wiesb., 1862.

J. Friedrich, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands. Vol. 1: Die Römerzeit. Vol. 2: Merovingezeit. Bamberg, 1867-69.

Switzerland:

J. J. Hottinger, helvetische Kirchengesch. (Zür., 1708 ff.) edit. by L. Wirz and M. Kirchhofer. Zür., 1808-19. 5 vols.

A. Ruchat, histoire de la réformation de la Suisse. Gen., 1727 f. Nyon, 1835-38. 7 vols.

E. F. Gelpke, Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz unter der Römer-, Burgunder und Alemannenherrschaft. Bern, 1856-61. 2 vols.

— die christliche Sagensgeschichte der Schweiz. Bern, 1862.

H. Bullingers Reformationsgeschichte nach dem Autographon, published by J. Hottinger and J. Vögeli. Frauenf., 1838-40. 8 vols.

*J. C. Mörikofer, Bilder aus dem kirchl. Leben der Schweiz. Lpz., 1864.

France:

G. Weber, geschichtl. Darstellung des Calvinismus in Genf. u. Frankreich bis zur Aufhebung des Edicts von Nantes. Heidelb., 1836.

Die protestantische Kirche Frankreich von 1787-1846. Pub. by J. C. L. Gieseler. Lpz., 1848. 2 vols.

L. Ranke, französ. Gesch. vornehmlich im 16. u. 17. Jahrh. Stuttg., 1852-61. 5 vols.

G. de Félice, histoire des Protestants de France, depuis l'origine de la réformation jusqu'au temps présent. 6th ed. Toulouse, 1867. English ed., Lond. and N. Y., 1863.

A. Coquerel, histoire des églises du désert. Par., 1841 f. 2 vols. (German, ed. by G. Schilling. Stuttg., 1846.)

Nap. Payrat, histoire des pasteurs du désert, depuis la révocation de l'édit de Nantes jusqu'à la révolution française. Par., 1842.

*Eug. et Em. Haag, la France protestante ou vies des protestants français. Par., 1853-1860. 10 vols.

Ch. Weiss, hist. des réfugiés protestants de France depuis la révocation de l'édit de Nantes jusqu'à nos jours. Par., 1852. 2 vols. English ed., Lond., 1854.

W. G. Soldan, Gesch. des Protestant. in Frankr. (to 1574.) Lpz., 1855. 2 vols.

C. Drion, hist. chronolog. de l'église protestante de France (to 1685). Strasb., 1855. 2 vols.

G. Stähelin, der Uebertritt König Heinrichs IV. v. Frankreich zur römisch-kathol. Kirche. Basel, 1856. 2d ed., 1862.

G. v. Polenz, Gesch. des franz. Calvinismus bis 1789 (from 1629). Gotha, 1857-69. 5 vols.

T. W. Rohrich, Mittheilungen aus der Geschichte der evangel. Kirche des Elsasses. Strasb., 1855. 3 vols.

L. Buch, 20 vorles. über d. Gesch. der Ref. in Frankreich. Brem., 1860.

E. de Pressensé, l'église et la révolution française. Par., 1864.

W. Mangold, Bilder aus Frankreich. Vier kirchengesch. Vorles. Marb., 1869.

Correspondance des réformateurs dans les pays de langue française recueillie, etc., par A. L. Herminjard. Gen., 1867-72. 4 vols.

J. P. Hugues, histoire de la restauration du protestantisme en France au 18. siècle. Par., 1872. 2 vols.

Great Britain:

K. F. Stäudlin, allgem. Kirchengesch. von Grossbritannien. Gött., 1819. 2 vols.

G. Weber, Gesch. der akathol. Kirchen u. Secten von Grossbrit. Lpz., 1845-53. 2 vols.

- M. C. Walcott, Scoti Monasticon: the ancient Church of Scotland. Lond., 1874.
Merle d'Aubigné, trois siècles de lutte en Ecosse. Genève, 1850. (German: Die schott. Kirche in ihrem 800 jähr. Kampfe, by O. Fiebig. Lpz., 1851.)
K. G. v. Rudloff, Geschichte der Reformation in Schottland. Berl., 1847-49. 2 vols. New ed., 1854.
 H. Weingarten, die Revolutionskirchen Englands. Lpz., 1868.
J. Köstlin, die schott. Kirche, ihr inneres Leben u. ihr Verhältniss zum Staat von d. Reform. bis auf d. Gegenw. Hamb., 1852.
† C. J. Greith, Geschichte der altirischen Kirche und ihrer Verbindung mit Rom, Gallien, und Allemannien. Freib., 1867.

Netherlands:

- H. J. Royaards, geschiedenis van het Christendom in Nederland. Utr., 1849-53. 2 vols.
Moll, Kerkgeschiedenis van Nederland vor de Hervorming. Arnhem, 1867.
F. Nippold, die altkatholische Kirche des Erzbisthums Utrecht. Heidelb., 1872.
 — die röm- kathol. Kirche im Königr. der Niederl. Lpz., 1877.

Scandinavia:

- Maurer (see above, History of Propagation of the Church).
F. Münter, Kirchengesch. von Dänemark u. Norwegen. Lpz., 1823-33. 8 parts.
H. Reuterdaahl, Gesch. der schwedischen Kirche; translated from the Swed. by Th. Mayerhoff. 1st part. Berl., 1837 (Introduction, and Life of Ansgar).
E. Tegnér, die Kirche Schwedens in den beiden letzten Jahrzehnten. From the Swedish by G. Mohnike. Strals., 1837.

Russia:

- Ph. Strahl, Geschichte der russischen Kirche. Halle, 1830.
 — Beiträge zur russischen Kirchengeschichte. Halle, 1827.
A. Murawieff, Gesch. der russ. Kirche. Karlsr., 1857.
H. Dalton, Geschichte der reformirten Kirche in Russland. Gotha, 1865.
Philaret, Geschichte der Kirche Russlands, translated by Blumenthal. Frankf., 1872. 2 parts.
Basarow, die russ. orthod. Kirche. Stuttg., 1873.
F. Hunnius, die evang.-luther. Kirche Russlands. Lpz., 1877.
Lescœur, l'église cathol. en Pologne (1772-1875). 2d ed. Par., 1876. 2 vols.

Italy:

- D. Erdmann, die Reform. u. ihre Märtyrer in Italien. Berl., 1855. 2d ed., 1876.

Spain:

- P. Gams, die Kirchengesch. von Spanien. Regensb., 1862-69. 3 vols. in 6 parts.
Adolf de Castro, Gesch. der spanischen Protestanten u. ihrer Verfolgung durch Philipp II. (Cadiz, 1851.) German by Hertz. Frankf., 1866. 2d ed., 1874.

Bohemia, Hungary, and Transylvania:

- A. Frind, die Kirchengesch. Böhmens. Prag., 1862-78. 4 vols.
Annales evangelicorum in Hungaria, etc. Presb., 1861.
J. Borbis, die evang.-luther. Kirche Ungarns, nebst einem Anhang über die Gesch. der prot. Kirchen in den deutsch-slavischen Ländern. Nördl., 1861.
 — die Märtyrer der evangelisch-lutherischen Slovaken. Erl., 1863.
v. Hornyansky, Beiträge zur Gesch. der evang. Gemeinden in Ungarn. Pest, 1863.
A. Fabo, Skizzen aus der Gesch. des Ungar. Protestantismus. Pest, 1869.¹

¹ More elaborate in K. F. Ständlins Gesch. u. Liter. der Kirchengesch., published by J. T. Hensen (Hann., 1837), p. 310 ff.; and in Winer's Handb. der theol. Lit. 3d ed. (Lpz., 1838 ff.) I., p. 778 ff.; in Ergänzungsheft (Lpz., 1849), p. 198 ff.

Individual German countries have been described. We recall the labours of Vierordt, über die badische Kirche; Keim, über die schwädische Reform.-gesch. Comp. for the later period, H. N. A. Jensen, Schleswig-Holsteinische Kirchengesch. published by Michelsen (Kiel, 1873-79. 4 vols.); H. Heppe, K.-gesch. beider Hessen Marb., 1876. 2 vols.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

I.

GENERAL CHURCH HISTORY.

- J. Bennett, The History and Prospects of the Church. Elgin, 1852.
 W. M. Blackburn, History of the Christian Church, from its Origin to the Present Time. Cincinnati, 1879.
 C. M. Butler, An Ecclesiastical History, from the 1st to the 19th Century. 2 vols. Phila., 1868-72.
 J. G. Dowling, An Introduction to the Critical Study of Ecclesiastical History. Lond., 1848.
 Jonathan Edwards, A History of the Work of Redemption, Comprising an Outline of Church History. N. Y., 1838.
 F. W. Farrar, The Witness of History to Christ. Lond., 1875.
 E. S. Ffoulkes, A Manual of Ecclesiastical History, from the 1st to the 12th Century inclusive. Oxford, 1851.
 R. Flint, Philosophy of History in France and Germany. Vol. i. N. Y., 1875.
 C. Girdlestone, Christendom, Sketched from History in the Light of Holy Scripture. Lond., 1870.
 S. F. Jarvis, A Chronological Introduction to the History of the Church. Lond., 1844. N. Y., 1845.
 W. Jones, The History of the Christian Church, from the Birth of Christ to the 18th Century; including the very interesting Account of the Waldenses and Albigenses. 2 vols. Lond., 1826.
 E. Lawrence, Historical Studies. N. Y., 1876. Contents: The Bishops of Rome; Leo and Luther; Loyola and the Jesuits; Ecumenical Councils; The Vaudois; The Huguenots; The Church of Jerusalem; Dominic and the Inquisition; The Conquest of Ireland; The Greek Church.
 H. C. Lea, Studies in Church History: the Rise of the Temporal Power; Benefit of Clergy; Excommunication. Phila., 1869.
 J. J. M'Elhinney, The Doctrine of the Church: an Historical Monograph, with a full Bibliography of the Subject. Phila., 1871.
 S. R. Maitland, A Collection of Pamphlets on Church History. Lond., 1853.
 G. Matheson, Growth of the Spirit of Christianity from the First Century to the Dawn of the Lutheran Era. 2 vols. Edinb., 1877.
 F. D. Maurice, Lectures on Ecclesiastical History. Lond., 1854.
 Joseph Milner, The History of the Church of Christ, continued by Rev. I. Milner. New ed., revised by Thomas Grantham. 4 vols. Lond., 1860.
 William Palmer, A Compendious Ecclesiastical History, from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. N. Y., 1841.
 J. Craigie Robertson, History of the Christian Church, from the Apostolic Age to the Reformation, 1517. 4 vols. Lond., 1858-73.
 Philip Schaff, History of the Apostolic Church; with a General Introduction to Church History. N. Y., 1853.

- Philip Schaff, History of the Christian Church, from the Birth of our Lord to Gregory the Great. 2 vols. N. Y., 1858-67.
- Henry B. Smith, History of the Church of Christ in Chronological Tables. N. Y., 1859.
- Philip Smith, The Student's Ecclesiastical History. N. Y., 1879.
- Henry Stebbing, History of the Church of Christ, from the Diet of Augsburg, 1530, to the Eighteenth Century. 3 vols. Edinb., 1842.
- James White, The Eighteen Christian Centuries with a copious Index. N. Y., 1860.

II.

ANCIENT PERIOD.

- Eusebius, Pamphilus, Ecclesiastical History. Translated from the original by C. F. Crusé, and an Historical View of the Council of Nice, by Isaac Boyle. N. Y., 1856.
- G. P. Fisher, The Beginnings of Christianity, with a View of the State of the Roman World at the Birth of Christ. N. Y., 1877.
- Greek Ecclesiastical Historians (The) of the First Six Centuries of the Christian Era: Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Evagrius. 6 vols. Lond., 1843-47.
- S. Hinds and J. H. Newman, History of the Christian Church in the First Century. Lond., 1862.
- G. A. Jackson, The Apostolic Fathers, and the Apologists of the Second Century. In Early Christian Literature Periods. Edited by Prof. George P. Fisher, D.D. N. Y., 1879.
- J. A. Jeremie, History of the Christian Church in the Second and Third Centuries. Lond., 1852.
- C. Kingsley, Hypatia; or, New Foes with an Old Face. Historical Romance. 6th ed. Lond., 1863.
- M. Mahan, Church History of the First Seven Centuries, to the Close of the Sixth General Council. (Vol I. of Mahan's Works.) N. Y., 1873.
- R. Mant, Primitive Christianity. Exemplified and Illustrated by the Acts of the Primitive Christians. Lond., 1842.
- F. D. Maurice, Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First and Second Centuries. Lond., 1854.
- J. A. Merivale, Christian Records. A Short History of the Apostolic Age. Lond., 1857.
- C. Merivale, Four Lectures on Some Epochs of Early Church History. N. Y., 1879.
- H. H. Milman, History of Latin Christianity; including that of the Popes to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. 8 vols. N. Y., 1881.
- The History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire. 3 vols. N. Y., 1881.
- J. H. Newman, Callista; a Sketch of the Third Century. Historical Romance. Lond., 1873.
- Historical Sketches. 3 vols. Lond., 1872, 1873.
- The Arians of the Fourth Century. 3d ed. Lond., 1872.
- W. H. Pinnock, An Analysis of Ecclesiastical History; from the Birth of Christ to the Council of Nice, A.D. 325. 5th ed. Cambridge, 1859.
- H. J. Pye, A Short Ecclesiastical History; from the Conclusion of the Acts of the Apostles to the Council of Nice, A.D. 325. Lond., 1854.
- J. Russell, Essays on the Rise and Progress of the Christian Religion in the West of Europe; from the Reign of Tiberius to the Council of Trent. Lond., 1873.
- E. M. Sewell, History of the Early Church. N. Y., 1860.
- Socrates, Ecclesiastical History; from the Accession of Constantine, A.D. 305, to the Thirty-eighth Year of Theodosius II., including a Period of 140 Years. With the Notes of Valesius. Lond., 1853.

- A. P. Stanley, Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age. Oxford, 1852.
 J. Stoughton, Ages of Christendom before the Reformation. Lond., 1857.
 I. Taylor, Ancient Christianity, and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times. Lond., 1842.
 W. C. Taylor, History of Christianity; from its Promulgation to its Legal Establishment in the Roman Empire. Oxford, 1844.
 G. Townsend, Ecclesiastical and Civil History; from the Ascension of our Lord to the Death of Wycliffe, Philosophically Considered. 2 vols. Lond., 1847.
 R. St. John Tyrwitt, The Art Teaching of the Primitive Church; with an Index of Subjects, Historical and Emblematic. Lond.
 G. Waddington, A History of the Church; from the Earliest Ages to the Reformation. 3 vols. Lond., 1835. N. Y., 1878.
 F. Watson, The Ante-Nicene Apologies. Their Character and Value. Camb., 1870.
 C. Wordsworth, A Church History to the Council of Niceæ, A.D. 323. Lond., 1881.

III.

MEDIÆVAL PERIOD.

- J. Bryce, The Holy Roman Empire. N. Y., 1877.
 E. A. Freeman, Historical Essays. 2 vols. Lond., 1872, 1873.
 H. Hallam, View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages. 3 vols. N. Y., 1880.
 C. Hardwick, A History of the Christian Church during the Middle Ages. From Gregory the Great to the Excommunication of Luther (A.D. 575-1517). Lond., 1872.
 A. L. Koeppen, The World in the Middle Ages. 2 vols. N. Y., 1856.
 P. Lacroix, Military and Religious Life in the Middle Ages. Lond., 1874.
 H. C. Lea, Superstition and Force. Phila., 1871.
 S. R. Maitland, The Dark Ages. Lond., 1853.
 R. C. Trench, Lectures on Mediæval Church History. N. Y., 1878.
 J. Wyse, A Thousand Years; or, the Missionary Centres of the Middle Ages. Lond., 1872.

IV.

THE REFORMATION.

1. Forerunners.

- E. H. Gillett, The Life and Times of John Huss; or, the Bohemian Reformation of the Fifteenth Century. 2 vols. Boston, 1863.
 G. Rossetti, Disquisitions on the Antipapal Spirit which Produced the Reformation. 2 vols. Lond., 1834.

2. General History of the Reformation.

- W. Cunningham, The Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation. Edinb., 1862.
 G. P. Fisher, The Reformation. N. Y., 1878.
 C. Hardwick, A History of the Christian Church during the Reformation. Lond., 1873.
 C. P. Krauth, The Conservative Reformation and its Theology. Phila., 1871.
 J. Morison, The Protestant Reformation in all Countries. Lond., 1843.
 Seebohm, The Era of the Protestant Revolution. With Notes on Books in English relating to the Reformation, by George P. Fisher. N. Y., 1875.
 J. Tulloch, Leaders of the Reformation: Luther, Calvin, Latimer, and Knox. Edinb., 1860.

8. Reformation according to Countries.

Bohemia:

- V. Krasinski, Sketch of the Religious History of the Slavonic Nations. Bohemia: pp. 24-118. Edinb., 1851.
 C. A. Pescheck, Reformation and Anti-Reformation in Bohemia. 2 vols. Lond., 1825.

England:

- J. J. Blunt, Sketch of the Reformation in England. Lond., 1848.
 J. H. Blunt, The Reformation of the Church of England; its History, Principles, and Results (A.D. 1514-47). Lond., 1878.
 S. H. Burke, Men and Women of the English Reformation, from the Days of Wolsey to the Death of Cranmer. 2 vols. Lond., 1871.
 G. Burnet, The History of the Reformation of the Church of England. Revised and Corrected by Rev. E. Nares. 4 vols. New ed., 7 vols. Lond., 1865.
 C. Geikie, The English Reformation. How it came about, and why we should uphold it. N. Y., 1879.
 P. Heylyn, Ecclesia Restaurata; or, the History of the Reformation of the Church of England, with the Life of the Author by John Barnard. 2 vols. Lond., 1849.
 F. C. Massingberd, History of the English Reformation. Lond., 1857.
 W. H. Pinnock, An Analysis of English Church History. Comprising the Reformation Period, and Subsequent Events. Camb., 1870.
 H. Soames, History of the Reformation of the Church of England. 4 vols. Lond., 1826, 1827.
 J. Williams, Studies on the English Reformation. N. Y., 1881.

France:

- D. C. A. Agnew, Protestant Exiles from France in the Reign of Louis XIV.; or, The Huguenot Refugees and their Descendants in Great Britain and Ireland. 2 vols. Lond., 1871.
 H. M. Baird, History of the Rise of the Huguenots of France. 2 vols. N. Y., 1879.
 W. M. Blackburn, Admiral Coligny and the Rise of the Huguenots. 2 vols. Phila., 1869.
 W. S. Browning, A History of the Huguenots. Phila., 1845.
 W. Hanna, Wycliffe and the Huguenots. Edinb., 1860.
 — Wars of the Huguenots. Edinb., 1871.
 Mrs. H. F. Lee, The Huguenots in France and America. 2 vols. Boston, 1852.
 Mrs. Marsh, The Protestant Reformation in France; or, History of the Huguenots. 2 vols. Phila., 1851.
 W. C. Martyn, A History of the Huguenots. N. Y., 1866.
 F. T. Parkman, Pioneers of France in the New World. Boston, 1879.
 R. L. Poole, A History of the Huguenots of the Dispersion at the Recall of the Edict of Nantes. Lond., 1880.
 W. G. Simms, The Huguenots in Florida; or, the Lily and the Totum. N. Y., 1854.
 S. Smiles, The Huguenots in France after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. N. Y., 1874.
 — The Huguenots; their Settlements, Churches, and Institutes in England and Ireland; with an Appendix Relative to the Huguenots in America. N. Y., 1868.
 C. Weiss, History of the French Protestant Refugees, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes to our own Days. 2 vols. N. Y., 1854.
 H. White, The Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. N. Y., 1868.

Germany:

- A. R. Pennington, God in the History of the Reformation in Germany and England, and in the Preparations for it. Lond., 1869.
 J. Scott, Luther and the Lutheran Reformation. 2 vols. N. Y., 1833.

Holland:

- W. C. Martyn, The Dutch Reformation: a History of the Struggle in the Netherlands for Civil and Religious Liberty in the Sixteenth Century. N. Y., 1868.
 J. L. Motley, The Rise of the Dutch Republic. N. Y., 1879.
 — History of the United Netherlands; from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce, 1609. 4 vols. N. Y., 1879.
 — The Life and Death of John of Barneveld, Advocate of Holland. With a View of the Primary Causes and Movements of the Thirty-Years' War. 2 vols. N. Y., 1879.

Italy:

- W. R. Clark, Savonarola: his Life and Times. Lond., 1878.
 W. Dinwiddie, Times before the Reformation, with an Account of Fra Girolamo Savonarola, the Friar of Florence. N. Y., 1880.
 T. M'Crie, Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy in the Sixteenth Century; with a Sketch of the Reformation in the Grisons. Phila., 1856.
 W. H. Rule, Savonarola; with Events of the Reign of Pope Alexander VI. Lond., 1858.
 Jerome Savonarola, The Triumph of the Cross. Translated from the Latin, with Notes and a Biographical Sketch, by O. T. Hill. Lond., 1868.
 C. Strack, Renata of Este, a Chapter from the History of the Reformation in France and Italy. Translated by Catherine E. Hurst. Cincinnati, 1873.
 P. Vilari, The History of Girolamo Savonarola, and of his Times. Translated from the Italian, by Leonard Horner. Lond., 1868.
 M. Young, The Life and Times of Aonio Paleario; or, A History of the Italian Reformation in the Sixteenth Century. 2 vols. Lond., 1860.

Scotland:

- G. Cook, History of the Reformation in Scotland. 2d ed., 3 vols. Lond., 1819.
 W. M. Hetherington, History of the Church of Scotland, from the Introduction of Christianity to the Period of the Disruption, 1843. 7th ed., 2 vols. Edinb., 1852.
 R. Keith, History of Affairs in Church and State in Scotland, from 1527 to 1568. 3 vols. Lond., 1844-50.
 A. P. Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Church of Scotland. N. Y., 1872.
 The Tercentenary Book, Commemorative of the Completion of the Life and Work of John Knox, of the Huguenot Martyrs of France, and the Establishment of Presbyterianism in England. Phila., 1873.

Spain

- G. Borrow, The Bible in Spain. 3 vols. Lond., 1843.
 E. Charles, The Martyrs of Spain and the Liberators of Holland. Lond., 1861.
 T. M'Crie, History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Spain in the Sixteenth Century. Edinb., 1829.
 W. H. Prescott, History of the Reign of Philip II. 3 vols. Boston, 1855.

Switzerland:

- Christoffel, R. Zwingli; or, the Rise of the Reformation in Switzerland. A Life of the Reformer, with Notices of his Times and Contemporaries. Edinb., 1860.

V.

MODERN PERIOD.

- John H. Blunt, A Key to the Knowledge of Church History (Modern). Lond., 1872.
 Etienne Chastel, Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. A Religious and Philosophic Survey of the Immediate Past, according to the Spirit of Jesus. Translated by J. R. Beard. Lond., 1874.
 Henry Stebbing, History of the Christian Church. 2 vols. Lond., 1850.

SECTION XIII.

AUXILIARY SCIENCES.

The auxiliaries to Church History are:

I. Material.

1. A knowledge of the general history of the world, more particularly as connected with the general history of religion; of philosophy and the sciences; and of art, especially Christian art.
2. The Geography of the Church.
3. The Chronology of the Church.

II. Instrumental.

1. Acquaintance with the languages necessary for the study of sources. This is Ecclesiastical Philology.
2. The antiquarian skill needed for judging of the value of sources, monuments, and documents. This we call Church Diplomatics.

GENERAL HISTORY.

The importance of familiarity with the general history of the world will be apparent without discussion. Not only does church history, as an integral part of the history of the world and the human race, assume the latter, but the two often pass over into each other to some extent, as, for instance, in the Middle Ages. Hence, in this special field, non-theological and theological writers find a common ground.¹ Nor may we forget that the history of Christianity, which certainly should not be lost sight of in the history of the Church, covers a larger surface than church history itself. To oppose the history of the world to the latter, as being merely profane history, would be to commit serious error. "This is a mode of judging," says Rothe, "in connexion with which the Christian element in history will inevitably appear to become more and more exhausted as time goes on, and the history of the Christian world becomes the history of the self-effected dissolution of Christianity, according to a view that has now become popular."¹

¹ We cite, in illustration, Raumer's Gesch. d. Hohenstaufen, and similar works. An acquaintance with the literature of general history is taken for granted. Comp. Gieseler, Church History, vol. i, p. 19, notes.

Nor may the ecclesiastical historian disregard the history of other religions, among which the history of the Israelites is most nearly related to Christianity, so that Old Testament history becomes at this point an auxiliary to church history. Not only did the arrangements of the early Church grow out of the later organization of the Jewish synagogues, but the whole of the Middle Ages presents to view, in certain aspects, a repetition of Israelitish history, such as the hierarchy, the temple service, the Levitical institution, the unifying of Church and State, intolerance, and the parallel between David and Charlemagne. The history of Mohammedanism is important for a proper conception of the Spanish, and also of the Greek and later Oriental, churches, as well as for the Crusades. But Hellenism and Paganism should also arrest the attention of the church historian. For the peculiarities of Christianity, whose historical development he is to describe, can only be recognized by contrast with non-Christian institutions. The significance of Christianity in universal history cannot be scientifically understood without acquaintance with the ancient world and its religions. Nor does the fact that the delineation of church history in general will connect itself with descriptions of the religious state of the ancient world, constitute the only important feature. For the missionary history of every country will always embrace the two leading elements of a description of what previously existed, and a statement of what subsequently took its place. The material for religious history will, consequently, increase in quantity in proportion as the continued expansion of Christianity provides a constant supply of new material for church history.

GERMAN AND FRENCH LITERATURE.

1. GENERAL HISTORY OF THE ETHNIC FAITHS.

C. Meiners, allgem. kritische Gesch. der Religionen. Hannov., 1806 f. 2 vols.

J. K. F. Schlegel, über den Geist der Religiosität aller Zeiten und Völker. Hannov., 1819. 2 vols.

*F. Creuzer, Symbolik u. Mythologie der alten Völker, besonders der Griechen. Lpz., u. Darmst., 1810-12. 2d ed., 1819-21. 4 vols. (3d ed. in Creuze's Werken.)

¹ Rothe, Debatte über d. Prot. Verein, in Schenkel's Zeitschr., vol. v, p. 302. Whether church history is to pass over into the history of the world, "since the stream (of Christianity) has formed a new bed, namely the civil and moral, into which it now courses from its temporary channel, the ecclesiastical," is a different question, which we leave untouched for the present.

- Darmst., 1837 ff.) Continued by F. G. Mone u. d. T.: Gesch. des Heidenth. im nördl. Europa. Darmst., 1822 f. 2 vols. Oreuzer's Werk, reduced by G. H. Moser. Darmst., 1822. Comp. J. H. Voss, Antisymbolik. Stuttg., 1824. 2 vols.
- F. O. Baur, Symbolik und Mythologie oder die Naturreligion des Alterthums. Stuttg., 1824 f. 2 vols.
- K. O. Müller, Prolegomena zu e. wissensch. Mythologie. Gött., 1825.
- *P. F. Stühr, allgem. Gesch. der Religionsformen der heidn. Völker. Berl., 1836 ff. 2 vols. (Vol. 1: die heidn. Völker des Orients; Vol. 2: Religionssysteme der Hellenen.)
- K. Eckermann, Lehrbuch der Religionsgesch. und Mythologie der vorzüglichsten Völker des Alterthums. Halle, 1854 f. 2 vols.
- A. Wuttke, Geschichte des Heidenthums in Beziehung auf Religion, Wissen, Kunst, etc. Breslau, 1852 f. 2 vols.
- (L. Noack), das Buch der Religion, oder der religiöse Geist der Menschheit in seiner geschichtl. Entwicklung. Lpz., 1850. 2 vols.
- A. v. Cölln, Lehrbuch der vorchristl. Religionsgesch. Lemgo, 1853.
- † J. A. B. Lutterbeck, die neuestam. Lehrbegriffe. Vol. 1: die vorchristliche Entwicklung. Mainz, 1852.
- † J. J. Döllinger, Heidenthum und Judenthum; Vorhalle zur Geschichte des Christenthums. Regensb., 1857.¹ Eng. ed., under title of Jew and Gentile, translated by N. Darnell. 2 vols. Lond., 1862.
- E. Renan, études d'histoire relig. Par., 1857. 7th ed., 1864.
- J. C. Bluntschli, altasiatische Gottes- u. Weltideen. Nördl., 1866.
- O. Pfeleiderer, die Religion. Die Geschichte der Religion. Lpz., 1869.
- K. Werner, die Religionen u. Culte des vorchristl. Heidenthums. Ein Beitrag zur Gesch. der Philosophie der Religionen. Schaffh., 1871.
- Girard de Rialle, la mythologie comparée. Vol. 1: théorie du fétichisme. Par., 1878.
- G. Roskoff, das Religionswesen der rohesten Naturvölker. Lpz., 1880.

2. ON GERMAN MYTHOLOGY.

- J. Grimm, deutsche Mythologie. Gött., 1835. 4th ed., Berl., 1876.
- G. Klemm, german. Alterthumskunde. Dresd., 1836.
- W. Müller, Gesch. und System der altdeutschen Religion. Gött., 1844.
- J. Kehrein, Ueberblick der deutschen Mythologie. Gött., 1848.
- K. Simrock, Handbuch der deutschen Mythologie. Bonn, 1853; 4th ed., 1874.
- Mannhardt, die Götter d. deutschen u. nörd. Völker. Berl., 1860.
- Bratuschek, german. Göttersage. 2d ed. Berl., 1873.
- Ad. Holtzmann, deutsche Mythologie, pub. by Holder. Lpz., 1874.
- A. Wuttke, der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart. Hamb., 1860. 2d ed., Berl., 1869.

3. ON THE GREEK AND ROMAN MYTHOLOGY.

- M. Heffter, Mythologie der Griechen u. Römer. 2d ed. Brandenb., 1848. New ed., 1854.
- W. F. Rinck, die Religion der Hellenen, aus den Mythen, den Lehren der Philosophie und dem Cultus entwickelt. Zürich, 1853 f. 2 vols.
- *L. Preller, griech. Mythologie. Lpz., 1854. 2 vols. 3d ed., Berl., 1872-75.
- römische Mythologie. Lpz., 1857. 2d ed., Berl., 1865.
- Th. Mundt, die Götterwelt der alten Völker. 2d ed. Berl., 1854.
- E. Gerhardt, griech. Mythologie. Berl., 1845 f. 2 parts.

¹ On the Religious History of the Israelites, see above.

- F. Welcker, griech. Götterlehre. Gött., 1857–63. 3 parts.
 K. F. Nägelsbach, die homerische Theologie. Nürnberg, 1850. 2d ed., 1861.
 — die nachhomerische Theologie des griech. Volksglaubens. Nürnberg, 1857.
 F. Jacobs, die Erziehung der Hellenen zur Sittlichk. Lpz., 1829 (verm. Schriften, 3d part).
 Helbig, die sittlichen Zustände des griech. Heldenalters. Lpz., 1839.
 R. Grüneisen, das Sittliche der bildenden Kunst bei d. Griechen. Lpz., 1838.

4. ON THE ORIENTAL RELIGIONS.

- J. F. Kleuker, Zend-Avesta, Zoroasters lebendiges Wort. Riga, 1776 f. 3 vols. Appendix. Lpz. u. Riga, 1781–83. 2 vols.
 J. G. Rhode, die heilige Sage und das gesammte Religionsystem der alten Baktrier, Meder u. Perser oder des Zendvolks. Frankfurt a. M., 1820.
 *F. Spiegel, Avesta, die heiligen Schriften der Parsen. Transl. from original text. Lpz., 1852–63. 3 vols.
 J. C. Kröger, Abriss einer vergleichenden Darstellung der Indisch-Persischen und Chinesischen Religionsysteme. Eisl., 1842.
 *C. Lassen, indische Alterthumskunde. Bonn, 1844–62. 4 vols. 2d ed., vol. 1, 1867.
 Th. Benfey, Art. "Indien" in Ersch und Grubers Encyclop. 2d sect., vol. 17.
 Wollheim da Fonseca, Mythologie des alten Indiens. Berl., 1857–60.
 *C. F. Köppen, die Religion des Buddha. 2 vols. Berl., 1857–59.
 W. Wassiljew, der Buddhismus, seine Dogmen, Geschichte, und Literatur. Transl. from the Russian. Lpz., 1860.
 Barthélemy St. Hilaire, Bouddha et sa Religion. 2d ed. Par., 1862.
 *R. Lechler, acht Vorlesungen über China. Basel, 1861.
 Plath, die Religion und der Cultus der alten Chinesen (Abhandlungen der Münchener Akademie. Vol. ix, 1863).
 — Confucius und seiner Schüler Leben und Lehren (Abhandlungen der Münchener Akademie. Vol. ix ff., 1867 ff.).
 *P. Wurm, Geschichte der indischen Religion. Basel, 1874.
 L. Carre, l'ancien orient, études histor., religieuses et philosophiques. Vol. 1, Palestine. Par., 1875.
 *E. L. Fischer, Heidenth. und Offenbarung, Studien über die Verührungspunkte der ältesten hl. Schriften der Inder, Perser, etc., mit der Bibel. Mainz, 1878.
 *W. Baudissin, Studien zur semit. Rel.-geschichte. Lpz., 1876–78. 2 parts.
 [The following works are an attempt to attribute the Old Testament religion to imaginative and mythological sources: J. Grill (die Erzväter der Menschheit. Lpz., 1875), M. Schultze (Hdb. der ebr. Mythol. Nordh., 1876), J. Goldziher (der Mythos bei den Hebräern. Lpz., 1876), J. Popper (der Urspr. des Monotheismus. Berl., 1879).]

5. ON MOHAMMEDANISM.

- A. Geiger, was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthum aufgenommen? Bonn, 1833.
 G. Well, Mohammed der Prophet; sein Leben und seine Lehre. Stuttgart, 1843.
 — historisch-krit. Einleitg. in den Koran. Bielef., 1844. 2d ed., 1878.
 J. J. Döllinger, Muhammeds Religion nach ihrer innern Entwicklung und ihrem Einflusse auf das Leben der Völker. Regensburg, 1838.
 C. F. Geroch, Versuch einer Christologie des Koran. Hamb., 1839.
 *A. Sprenger, das Leben und die Lehre des Mohammed. Berl., 1861–65. 3 vols.
 *Th. Nöldeke, das Leben Muhammeds popul. dargest. Hann., 1863.
 — Gesch. des Qorans. Gött., 1860.

- Das Leben Muhammeds, nach Muhammed Ibn Ishák, prepared by Abd el-Malik Ibn Hishâm, translated from the Arabic by G. Weil. 2 vols. Stuttg., 1864. (The Arabic original was pub. by F. Wüstenfeld. Gött., 1858-60. 2 vols.)
- *A. v. Kremer, Geschichte der herrschenden Ideen des Islams. Der Gottesbegriff, die Prophetie und Staatsidee. Lpz., 1868.
- M. Wolff, Muhammedan. Eschatologie. Lpz., 1872.
- G. H. Delaporte, vie de Mahomet, etc. Par., 1874.
- H. Vambéry, der Islam im 19. Jahrh. Lpz., 1875.
- M. Lüttke, der Islam u. seine Völker. Gütersl., 1878.
- Germ. translations of the Koran by Boysen (1778), Wahl (1828), L. Ullmann (1840; 5th ed., 1865); French translation by M. Kasimirski (Par., 1852 u. ö.); Eng. translation by G. Sale (Lond.), and by J. M. Rodwell (2d ed., Lond., 1876); J. la Beame, le Koran analysé, etc., Par., 1878.

6. ON AMERICA.

- *J. G. Müller, Gesch. der amerikan. Urreligionen. Basel, 1855. 2d ed., 1867.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

I. GENERAL.

- S. Baring-Gould, Origin and Development of Religious Belief. 2 vols. N. Y., 1878.
- J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions: an Essay in Comparative Theology. Boston, 1871.
- F. P. Cobbe, Prehistoric Religion. Religions of the World, etc. (In Darwinism, in Morals, and other Essays.) Lond., 1872.
- B. F. Cocker, Christianity and Greek Philosophy. N. Y., 1875.
- M. D. Conway, Sacred Anthology: Book of Ethnical Scriptures. N. Y., 1875.
- S. F. Dunlap, Vestiges of the Spirit History of Man. N. Y., 1858.
- G. W. Faber, Origin of Pagan Idolatry. 3 vols. Lond., 1816.
- E. S. F. Ffoulkes, Christendom's Divisions. 2 vols. Lond., 1865-67.
- J. Gardner, The Faiths of the World. 2 vols. Edinb., 1858-60.
- J. T. Goodair, Seven Homilies on Ethnic Inspiration. Lond., 1871.
- C. Hardwick, Christ and other Masters. 4th ed. Lond., 1875.
- S. Johnson, Oriental Religions and their Relation to Universal Religion. Boston, 1872.
- R. W. Mackay, Progress of the Intellect, as exemplified in the Religious Development of the Greeks and Hebrews. 2 vols. Lond., 1850.
- F. D. Maurice, The Religions of the World and their Relations to Christianity. Lond., 1876.
- J. C. Moffat, A Comparative History of Religions. 2 vols. N. Y., 1874.
- F. Max Müller, Lectures on the Science of Religion, with a Paper on Buddhist Nihilism, and a Translation of the Dhammapada; or "Path of Virtue." N. Y., 1877.
- Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religions of India (Hibbert Lectures). N. Y., 1879.
- G. Rawlinson, The Contrasts of Christianity with Heathen and Jewish Systems. Lond. — The Origin of Nations. N. Y., 1881.
- D. T. W. Rhys, Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion. Lond., 1882.
- E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture: Researches into the Development of Mythology, Philosophy, Religion, Language, Art, and Custom. 2 vols. N. Y., 1877.
- A. Vinet, Vital Christianity: Essays and Discourses on the Religions of Man and the Religion of God. Edinb., 1851.
- W. D. Whitney, Oriental and Linguistic Stories. The Veda; The Avesta; The Science of Language. N. Y., 1873.

II. MOHAMMEDANISM.

- J. M. Arnold, The Koran and the Bible; or, Islam and Christianity. Lond., 1866.
 E. Deutsch, Islam. (Literary Remains, pp. 59-134.) Lond., 1874.
 E. F. Fiske, The Respective Peculiarities in Creeds of the Mohammedan and the Hindoo. Camb., 1850.
 J. B. Macbride, Mohammedan Religion Explained. Lond., 1857.
 F. A. Neale, Islamism: its Rise and Progress; or, the Present and Past Condition of the Turks. 2 vols. Lond., 1854.
 W. G. Palgrave, Essays on Eastern Questions. Lond., 1872.
 S. Sekles, The Poetry of the Talmud. N. Y., 1880.
 R. B. Smith, Mohammed and Mohammedanism. Lond., 1874.
 W. C. Taylor, History of Mohammedanism and its Sects. Lond., 1851.

PHILOSOPHY.

Christianity came into relation with the ancient systems of philosophy as with the ancient religions. It brought with it no new philosophy, indeed, though many philosophically cultured Christians, such as Justin Martyr, believed it did; but its contents presented themselves at once to philosophic thought as an object of speculation. Hence arose the influence of Platonism and Aristotelianism. As, during the Middle Ages, the external history of the Church coincides with that of the world and of nations, so the theology of the Church and the philosophy of individual thinkers interpenetrate each other in scholasticism. The most recent phenomena in the territory of the theological world, moreover, are utterly incomprehensible without a familiar acquaintance with the immense revolution in philosophical ideas that has taken place since the beginning of the last century. No person will, accordingly, be likely to question the importance of a knowledge of the history of philosophy in this connexion.

HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.

- J. Brucker, Historia critica philosophiae. Lips., 1741-44. 5 vols. 2d ed., 1766, 1767. 6 vols.
 D. Tiedemann, Geist der speculativen Philosophie. Marb., 1791-97. 7 vols.
 J. G. Buhle, Lehrb. der Gesch. der Philosophie. Gött., 1796-1804. 8 vols.
 ——— Gesch. der neueren Philosophie seit der Epoche der Wiederherstellung der Wissenschaften. Gött., 1800-5. 6 vols.
 W. G. Tennemann, Geschichte der Philosophie. Lpz., 1798-1819. 11 vols. Eng. abridg. by Johnson. Lond., 1852.
 * H. Ritter, Gesch. der Philosophie. Hamb., 1829-53. 12 vols. 2d ed. of vols. 1-3. 1836 ff.
 E. Reinhold, Handb. der allg. Gesch. der Philosophie. Gotha, 1828 ff. 3 vols.
 V. Cousin, cours d'histoire de la philosophie. Par., 1840 ff. 8 vols.
 J. G. Musmann, Grundriss der allgem. Geschichte der christl. Philosophie mit besonderer Rücksicht auf die christliche Theologie. Halle, 1830.

- *L. Preller (und H. Ritter), Historia philosophiae graecae et romanae ex fontium locis contexta. Hamb., 1838. 6th ed., Gotha, 1878.
- H. M. Chalybäus, histor. Entwicklung der speculativen Philosophie von Kant bis Hegel. Dresd., 1839. Eng. transl. by A. Tulk. Andover, 1854.
- H. C. W. Sigwart, Gesch. der Philosophie vom allgemein wissenschaftl. und geschichtl. Standpunkte. Stuttg., 1844. 8 vols.
- C. L. Michelet, Gesch. der Philos. von Kant bis Hegel. Berl., 1837 f. 2 vols.
- J. E. Erdmann, Versuch einer wissenschaftl. Darstellung der Gesch. der neueren Philosophie. 3 vols. in 6 parts. Lpz., 1834-53.
- C. A. Brandis, Handb. der Gesch. der griech-rom. Philosophie. Berl., 1835-66. 3 vols.
- *A. Schwegler, Gesch. der Philos. im Umriss. Stuttg., 1848. Eng. transl. by J. H. Seelye. N. Y., 1856.
- K. Fortlage, genetische Geschichte der Philosophie seit Kant. Lpz., 1852.
- K. Fischer, Geschichte der neueren Philosophie. Mannh. (Heidelb.), 1854-77. 6 vols. (I, 1 in 3d ed., Münch., 1878; I-IV, in 2d ed., Heidelb., 1865.)
- E. Zeller, die Philosophie der Griechen. Tüb., 1844-52. 3 vols. (Vol. I, in 4th ed. Lpz., 1877; II, in 3d ed., 1875-79; III, in 2d ed., 1865.)
- Gesch. der deutschen Philos. seit Leibnitz. (1873.) 2d ed., Münch., 1875.
- L. Noack, Gesch. der Philosophie in gedrängter Uebersicht. Weim., 1853.
- L. Strümpell, Gesch. der Philosophie der Griechen. Lpz., 1854-61. 2 vols.
- *F. Ueberweg, Grundriss der Gesch. der Philos. von Thales bis auf die Gegenwart. 3 vols. Berl., 1862-66. Vols. I, II, 5th ed. by M. Heinze, 1876 f.; III, 4th ed. by Roicke, 1875. American ed. by H. B. Smith and President Porter (of Yale).
- J. G. Erdmann, Grundriss d. Gesch. der Philos. 2 vols. Berl., 1876. 3d ed., 1878.
- F. Schmidt, Grundr. d. Gesch. d. Phil. von Thales bis Schopenhauer. Erl., 1867.
- E. Hermann, Geschichte der Phil. in pragmatischer Behandlung. Lpz., 1867.
- *J. H. Scholten, Gesch. der Religion u. Phil. From the Dutch by Redepenning. Elberf., 1868.
- Du Bois-Reymond, über die Grenzen des Naturerkennens. Lpz., 1872. 4th ed., 1876.
- †Stöckl, Lehrb. der Gesch. der Philos. 4th ed. Mainz, 1876.
- F. Harms, die Philosophie seit Kant. Berl., 1876.
- R. Eucken, Gesch. u. Kritik der Grundbegriffe der Gegenwart. Lpz., 1878.
- *F. A. Lange, Gesch. des Materialismus. Iserl., 1866. 3d ed., 1876 f. 2 vols.
- L. Noack, philosophie-geschichtl. Lexikon. Lpz., 1878 ff.
- Later treatises on Logic: Drobisch (4th ed., Lpz., 1875), Sigwart (Tüb., 1878-78. 2 vols.), Ueberweg (4th ed., Bonn, 1874), J. Stuart Mill (7th ed., Lond., 1868. 2 parts). On Psychology: J. H. Lichte, (Lpz., 1872 f., 2 parts), Erdmann, (Grundriss, 5th ed., Lpz., 1878; psycholog. Briefe, 5th ed., Lpz., 1875), Hartsen, Berl., 1874), Fr. Brentano (1st vol., Lpz., 1874), Beneke (4th ed., Berl., 1877).

The history of other sciences, with the whole of the history of literature and culture, also belongs within the Church historian's circle of knowledge, and should not be disregarded by him. Church history often derives assistance from the history of jurisprudence, of commerce, of war, and of medicine. A specially important aid, however, is found in the history of Christian art as connected with the history of the progress of culture. Compare Archæology and Liturgies.

GERMAN AND FRENCH.

1. HISTORY OF CULTURE AND LITERATURE.

- G. F. Kolb, Gesch. der Menschheit und der Cultur. Pforzh., 1843. 2d ed., 1872.
 G. Klemm, allgemeine Culturgesch. der Menschheit. Lpz., 1843-52. 10 vols.
 W. Wachsmuth, allgem. Culturgeschichte. Lpz., 1850-52. 3 vols.
 II. Rückert, Culturgeschichte des deutschen Volkes in der Zeit des Uebergangs aus dem Heidenthum in das Christenthum. Lpz., 1853 f. 2 vols.
 G. Freytag, Bilder aus der deutschen Vergangenheit. Lpz., 1859. 4 vols.
 *J. Burckhardt, die Cultur der Renaissance in Italien. Basel, 1860. (Comp. especially the 6th section.) 2d ed. by L. Geiger. Berl., 1877.
 *M. Carrière, die Kunst im Zusammenhang der Culturenwickelung und die Ideale der Menschheit. Lpz., 1863-73. 5 vols. 3d ed. of vols. 1 and 2, 1877.
 J. J. Honneger, Grundsteine einer allgemeinen Culturgeschichte der neuesten Zeit. Lpz., 1868-74. 5 vols. Idem: Liter. u. Cultur des 19. Jahrh. 2d ed., Lpz., 1879.
 O. Henne am Rhyn, Kulturgesch. der neueren Zeit. Lpz., 1870-72. 3 vols.
 F. v. Hellwald, Culturgesch. in ihrer natürl. Entw. Augsb., 1874. 2d ed., 1876.
 H. Rau, kulturgeschichtl. Vorlesungen. Wiesb., 1875.
 F. Lenormant, die Anfänge der Cultur. (From the French.) Jena, 1875. 2 vols.
 A. v. Cremer, die Culturgesch. des Orients unter den Chalifen. 1st vol. Wien, 1875.
 J. Scherr, deutsche Kultur- und Sittengesch. Lpz., 1853. 7th ed., 1879.
 — Germania. 2 Jahrtausende deutschen Lebens. Stuttg., 1876 ff.
 R. Calinich, aus d. 16. Jahrh. Culturgeschichtl. Skizzen. Hamb., 1876.
 C. Grün, Culturgesch. des 17. Jahrh. 1st vol. Lpz., 1880.
 A. von Eye, Atlas der Culturgesch. Lpz., 1875.
 J. G. T. Grässe, Lehrb. einer allgem. Literärgesch. Lpz., 1837-59. 4 vols.
 W. Wackernagel, Gesch. der deutschen Literatur. Basel, 1848-56. 2d ed., by E. Martin, 1877 ff.
 G. Gervinus, Gesch. der deutschen Dichtung. 5th ed. Lpz., 1871 ff. 5 vols.
 H. Gelzer, die neuere deutsche National-Liter. nach ihren ethischen u. religiösen Gesichtspunkten. Lpz., 1847-49. 2 vols. 1st vol., 3d ed., 1858.
 A. F. C. Vilmar, Gesch. der deutschen National-Literatur. 19th ed. Marb., 1879.
 A. Koberstein, Grundriss der Gesch. der deutschen National-Literatur. 5th ed. Lpz., 1872 ff. 5 vols.
 H. Kurz, Gesch. der deutschen Literatur mit Proben aus den Werken der vorzüglichsten Schriftsteller. Lpz., 1851 ff. 3 vols. 7th ed., 1876 f. 4 vols.
 K. Goedeke, Grundriss zur Gesch. der deutschen Dichtung. Dresd., 1859 ff. 3 vols.
 H. J. T. Hettner, Literaturgesch. des 18. Jahrh. Braunsch., 1856-70. 6 vols. (Deutsche Liter. 3d ed., 1879. 4 vols.)
 †G. Brugier, Gesch. der deutschen Nationallit. 4th ed. Freib., 1874.
 W. Hahn, Gesch. der poet. Liter. der Deutschen. 8th ed. Berl., 1877.
 J. Scherr, allgem. Gesch. der Liter. 5th ed. Stuttg., 1875. 2 vols.
 R. Gottschall, die deutsche Nationallit. des 19. Jahrh. 4th ed. Lpz., 1875. 4 vols.
 J. Hillebrand, die Deutsche Nationallit. im 18. u. 19. Jahrh. 3d ed. Gotha, 1875. 8 vols.
 G. Brandes, die Hauptströmungen der Liter. des 19. Jahrh. From the Danish by A. Strodtmann. Berl., 1872-76. 4 vols.
 R. König, deutsche Literaturgesch. Bielef., u. Lpz., 1879.¹

¹ Other writings, by Barthel, Büchner, Weber, Wolff, etc.

2. HISTORY OF ART.

- J. C.W. Augusti, Beiträge zur christl. Kunstgeschichte u. Liturgik. Lpz., 1841-46. 2 vols.
 † J. H. K. v. Wessenberg, die christl. Bilder. Constanz, 1827. 2 vols. New ed. St. Gallen, 1845.
 C. J. v. Bunsen, die Basiliken des christl. Roms. München, 1843. (Text for the copper plates by Gutensohn and Knapp.)
 F. Kugler, Handbuch der Gesch. der Malerei von Constant. d. Gr. bis auf die neuere Zeit. Berl., 1837. 3d ed., Lpz., 1867. 3 vols. English ed., by Eastlake, Head, and Waagen. 3 vols. Lond., 1854-60.
 — Handbuch der Kunstgeschichte. Stuttg., 1841 f. 5th ed., by Lübke, 1872. Dazu: Atlas, Denkmäler der Kunst, etc., by E. Guhl and J. Casper. Stuttg., 1845 ff. 2 vols. 3d ed., by Lübke u. v. Lützow, 1874 ff.
 C. Schnaase, Gesch. der bildenden Künste. Düsseldorf, 1843-61. 7 vols. 2d ed., 1866-79. 8 vols.
 G. Kinkel, Gesch. der bildenden Künste bei den christl. Völkern. Bonn, 1845.
 * H. Otte, Handbuch der kirchlichen Kunstarchäologie des deutschen Mittelalters. Nordh., 1842. 4th ed., Lpz., 1863-68.
 F. Piper, Mythologie u. Symbolik der christl. Kunst. Weim., 1847-51. 2 parts.
 W. Lübke, Vorschule zum Studium der kirchl. Kunst des deutschen Mittelalters. Dortm., 1852. 6th ed., Lpz., 1874. The same, Gesch. der Architektur. Lpz., 1855. 4th ed., 1870; Grundr. der Kunstgesch. Stuttg., 1860. 8th ed., 1879. 2 vols. English ed., by Wheatley. Lond., 1870.
 † G. M. Dursch, Aesthetik der christl. bildenden Kunst des Mittelalters in Deutschland. Tüb., 1854.
 * † J. Kreuser, Kölner Dombriefe oder Beiträge zur altchristl. Kirchenbaukunst. Berl., 1844.
 — der christliche Kirchenbau; seine Geschichte, Symbolik, etc. Bonn, 1851. 3 vols. Vol 1 in 2d ed. Regensb., 1860.
 A. H. Springer, die Baukunst des christl. Mittelalters. Bonn, 1854.
 A. Reichensperger, Fingerzeige auf dem Gebiete der kirchlichen Kunst. Lpz., 1854.
 E. Förster, Geschichte der deutschen Kunst. Lpz., 1851-60. 5 vols.
 — Denkmale deutscher Baukunst, Bildnerei u. Malerei. Lpz., 1853-69. 12 vols.
 H. G. Hotho, Geschichte der christl. Malerei. Berl., 1867.
 M. Carrière, Aesthetik. 2d ed. Lpz., 1873. 2 vols.
 Bethmann-Hollweg, Christenth. u. bild. Kunst. Bonn, 1875.
 R. Garrucci, storia dell' arte cristiana nei primi 8 secoli della chiesa. Prato, 1875-79. 5 vols.
 C. B. Stark, Handbuch der Archäologie der Kunst. Lpz., 1878.
 G. Portig, Relig. u. Kunst in ihrem gegenseit. Verhältniss. Iserl., 1879 f. 2 parts.
 Th. Seemann, Gesch. der bild. Kunst. Jena, 1879. 2 parts.

Periodicals for Christian Art:

- Christliches Kunstblatt, founded by C. Grüneisen and others, now pub. by Merz u. Pfannschmidt. Stuttg., 1858 ff. (Yearly, 12 Nos.) Organ for Christian Art, pub. by J. van Enderst. Köln, 1851 f.

Biographical:

- Quatremère de Quincy, histoire de la vie et des ouvrages des plus célèbres architectes. Par., 1830. 3 vols. * Deutsch, Darmst., 1831. 2 vols.¹
 J. Meyer, allgem. Künstlerlexicon. (2d ed. of Naglers K. lex.) Lpz., 1870 ss.

¹ The special literature is elaborately and accurately given in Otte's work. Compare also Liturgies.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. CULTURE AND LITERATURE.

- H. T. Buckle, History of Civilization in England. 3 vols. New ed., Lond., 1878.
 J. W. Draper, A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. Revised ed. 2 vols. N. Y., 1876.
 F. Guizot, The History of Civilization from the Fall of the Roman Empire to the French Revolution. Translated by William Hazlitt. 4 vols. N. Y., 1859.
 W. A. Mackinnon, History of Civilization. 2 vols. Lond., 1846.

2. ARCHITECTURE AND ART.

- C. L. Eastlake, History of the Gothic Revival. Lond., 1872.
 C. E. Norton, Historical Studies of Church Building in the Middle Ages. Venice, Siena, Florence. N. Y., 1880.
 G. A. Poole, History of Ecclesiastical Architecture in England. Lond., 1848.
 G. G. Scott, An Essay on the History of English Church Architecture Prior to the Separation of England from the Roman Obedience. Lond., 1881.
 Sir G. Scott, Lectures on the Rise and Development of Mediæval Architecture. Illustrated. 2 vols. Lond., 1879.
 E. Sharpe, Seven Periods of English Architecture. Lond., 1871.
 C. E. Clement, A Handbook of Legendary and Mythological Art. N. Y., 1872.
 ——— Painters, Sculptors, Architects, Engravers, and their Works. 6th ed. N. Y., 1881.
 Mrs. A. Jameson, The History of our Lord as Exemplified in Works of Art; with that of his Types: St. John the Baptist, and other Persons of the Old and New Testaments. 2 vols. New ed. Lond., 1872.
 ——— Legends of the Madonna. New ed. Lond., 1879.
 ——— Sacred and Legendary Art. New ed. 2 vols. Lond., 1879.

Ecclesiastical geography differs from political in the fact that countries are divided up according to their ecclesiastical relations. The Christian countries are separated from the non-Christian; and, within the limits of the former, the denominational are distinguished from the unconfessional by boundaries, while the territory embraced within the limits of a single ecclesiastical organization is further subdivided into the politico-ecclesiastical sections covered by patriarchates, dioceses, parishes, and other subdivisions. The places are topographically distinguished—with all of which the remarkable facts in Church history stand connected. In studies we must connect geographical charts with historical tables. It is also proper to adduce ecclesiastical statistics in connexion with the geography. But the former, considered as the science of ecclesiastical conditions, is rather a product of Church history than an auxiliary science.¹ The aggregate resulting from the past is represented in the present. We may name the following as important works:

¹ Older works by Clericus, Spanheim, Bingham, and others; see Gieseler (Amer. ed.), vol. i, pp. 16, 17. The works of Stäudlin, Wiggers, and Wiltach; see under Statistics.

Atlas antiquus sacer, ecclesiasticus et profanus, collectus ex tabulis geographicis Nic. Samsonis. Tabulas emendavit J. Clericus. Amst., 1705 sq.

A. W. Moeller, Hierographie, vide supra under Tables.

J. E. T. Wiltsch, Atlas sacer s. ecclesiasticus. Gotha, 1843 sq. English ed., translated by John Leitch. 2 vols. Lond., 1859.

3. Ecclesiastical chronology is identified with chronology in general. The different eras are of special importance. The following are the best works in this department:

J. Ch. Gatterer, Abriss d. chronologie. Gött., 1777.

J. Ideler, Handbuch der chronologie. 2 vols. Berl., 1825, 1826. Lehrbuch do., 1831.

F. Piper, Kirchenrechnung. Berl., 1841-44.

* Brinkmann, Prakt. Handb. d. histor. Chronologie. Lpz., 1843.

F. v. Schmöger, Grundriss d. christl. Zeit- u. Festrechnung. Halle, 1854.

J. E. Riddle, Ecclesiastical Chronology. Lond., 1848.

II. 1. Ecclesiastical philology. This is generally understood to designate the knowledge of ecclesiastical Greek and Latin, and it is upon this soil that the language of the Church has actually secured its chief development in the accumulation of ecclesiastical ideas. But, in reality, the language of every people to whom the Gospel has forced its way—and it is destined to be proclaimed in all the tongues of the earth—is within the range of ecclesiastical philology. This applies to the different Oriental languages, the speech of the Occident during the Middle Ages, and the modern tongues of Europe and other lands. To trace the ecclesiastical language of Germany through its development by the mystics, Luther, the pietists, and the influence of modern philosophy, would prove a serious task. Much remains to be done with reference to the etymology of German ecclesiastical terms. The best authorities are:

J. Cp. Suicer, Thesaurus ecclesiasticus e Patribus graecis (1682). 2d ed. Amstel., 1728. 2 vols. f.

C. du Frêne (du Cange), Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae Graecitatis. Lugd., 1688. 2 vols. f.

— Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae Latinitatis (1678); ed. nova opera et stud. Monachor. ord. S. Benedicti. Par., 1733-36. 6 vols. f. New ed., by G. Henschel. Par., 1840 ff. 7 vols. 4.

P. Carpentier, Glossarium novum ad scriptores medii aevi cum latinis tum gallicos. Par., 1766. 4 vols. 4.

(J. C. Adelung) Glossarium manuale ad scriptores mediae et infimae Latinitatis. Halle, 1772-84. 6 vols.

* G. Hoffmann, Gesch. des Kirchenlateins. 1st vol., 1st part. Bresl., 1879.

Compare also C. L. Bauer, Glossarium Theodoretum to Schultz's edition of Theodoret (Halle, 1775); Index Latinitatis Tertullianae (by Schütz and Windorff) to Semler's edition of Tertullian (Halle, 1776), and the important Indices to the larger and smaller editions of the same church Father by Ohler (Lpz., 1853 f.).

- H. Rönisch, Itala und Vulgata. Das Sprachidiom der urchristlichen Itala und der katholischen Vulgata unter Berücksichtigung der römischen Volkssprache durch Beispiele erläutert. Marb. (Lpz.), 1869. 2d ed., 1875.
- J. G. Scherz, Glossarium germanicum medii aevi ed. Oberlin. Argent., 1781-84. 2 vols. f.
- E. G. Graff, althochdeutscher Sprachschatz. Berl., 1894-46. 6 vols.
- J. A. Schmeller, bayerisches Wörterbuch. Stuttg., 1827-37. 4 vols. 2d ed., edit. by Frommann. Münch., 1872 ff. 2 vols.
- W. Wackernagel, altdeutsches Handwörterb. Basel, 1861.
- *J. and W. Grimm, deutsches Wörterbuch. Lpz., 1854 ff. Continued by Heyne, Hildebrand, and Weigand; completed to the letters A-F. H-K.
- *F. C. Diez, etymolog. Wörterb. der roman. Sprachen. Bonn, 1855. 3d ed. 1874.
- A. von Raumer, die Einwirkung des Christenthums auf die althochdeutsche Sprache. Stuttg., 1845.

2. Diplomats is the science of diplomas, i. e., of original documents (bulls, briefs, letters of institution or foundation, patents, etc.), with which numismatics, heraldry, and sphragistics are to be combined. We may cite as the best late work:

- W. Wattenbach, Das Schriftwesen im Mittelalter (Lpz., 1871. 2d ed., 1877). On the general works of Mabillon (2d ed., Par., 1704), Gathrer, Schoenemann, see Gieseler, vol. i, p. 20.

SECTION XIV.

SEPARATE BRANCHES OF HISTORICAL THEOLOGY.

It is possible to separate special divisions of the life of the Church from the whole field included within the range of Church history, and consider them in their separate development. In this regard the history of the system of Christian teaching comes most prominently into notice under the name of the History of Doctrines, and as endowed with a measure of independence. The next place is held by Patristics and Ecclesiastical Symbolics, and upon these follows the history of worship and of the constitution of the Church, under the name of Archæology. The latter constitutes the historical basis of practical theology, the others of dogmatic.

The possibility of according a special treatment to precisely these branches is not the result of accident. Dogma, constitution, and worship are the principal elements in the life of the Church. The territorial expansion of Christianity and its persecutions constitutes the trunk from which these branches rise. It is, of course, possible to consider the trunk itself alone. But it would result in furnishing but a barren picture so long as we look only to territorial extension and limitations. The History of Missions has, likewise, received separate treatment. But this will, whenever it is treated forcibly, itself expand into Church history in its earliest periods, inasmuch as the object must be to show how Christianity was extended, what doctrines it taught, what customs and manners it introduced, and what fruits it has produced.¹ Or, it may be compressed into a monograph on the life of some distinguished herald of the faith.² It is only to recent Histories of Missions that the name can be applied with propriety, and here, if regard be had chiefly to the impulse of missionary effort, it coincides with the history of Christian life and work, such as the founding of missionary societies, or, where the attention is directed principally to results, it leads immediately into Statistics.

The History of Missions has the same bearing upon the work of the future missionary that is exercised by the study of the history of the home Church upon him who designs to labour within its limits. Its special treatment should be appropriate for his needs. In proportion as the Church itself enlarges its share in missionary effort will every theologian be obliged to pursue this branch of Church history, to the extent necessary for acquaintance with the whole history of the Church, and for imparting animation to the picture in which that whole is described. It is otherwise, however, with respect to the branches mentioned above, which, bending outward from the trunk of the history, became immediately interwoven with the growth of other fields, such as the dogmatic and the practical. In this instance we obtain, on the one hand, the History of Doctrines, and, on the other, Archæology, with this solitary distinction—that the history of doctrines has assumed more of the form of a distinct science than is the case with archæology. This we shall show hereafter.

In addition to dogma, constitution, and worship, Christian ethics might receive attention; and, in point of fact, both the History of Christian Morality itself and that of Christian Ethics, as a science, have received separate treatment. Properly considered, the latter should constitute the parallel to the History of Doctrines, or, rather, should grow out of a living treatment of this branch. The former appears to the best advantage as the blossom of Church history itself, and it is still a serious question whether it be advisable to separate it from the parent stem. The most vital view of Christian morality is obtained from the study of monographs and of archæology, especially when the latter is made to embrace a somewhat extended field. On the relation of Patristics and Symbolics to the History of Doctrines, see below.

¹ This is the case in Blumhardt's Missionsgeschichte and Tzschirner's Fall des Helden.

² The "Lives" of Columba, Gallus, Boniface, Ansgar, Otto v. Bamberg. Comp. the literature in text-books of Church history.

Still other branches might be separated, but they would possess value only for the professional historian. This is true, especially, of the careful tracing of such features "as must be included in the historical presentation for the sake of continuity alone, and which are not to be regarded as properly historical elements."¹ A complete history of the popes, for instance, carried through from beginning to end, or a similar history of Church councils—in short, every thing in connexion with which completeness requires that, in addition to matters exerting an influence upon the history, special attention be given to names and figures, and the like, can only claim the attention of such persons as are called to cultivate historical science for its own sake. For "nothing is more unfruitful than the heaping up of historical knowledge which neither serves any practical ends nor imparts itself to others through the representation."²

LITERATURE OF MISSIONS.

GERMAN AND FRENCH WORKS.

- The Lettres édifiantes. Par., 1717–76 (in the spirit of Romanism).
 Die Hallischen Sammlungen von 1705–69 (dän. Mission) und 1770–1834 (ostind Mission).
 Die Elberfelder Nachrichten von der Ausbreitung des reiches Jesu Christi seit 1815.
 Das Basler Magazin, by Blumhardt (1817–39) und Hoffmann, (new series since 1857 by Ostertag, now Hesse).
 Der evang. Heidenbote (Basel, 1827 ff.).
 Der Missionsfreund (Berl., 1846 ff.).
 Das Elberfelder Missionsblatt by Ball (1836 ff.).
 Das Calwer M. Blatt by Barth, now Gundert; das Hermansburger, by Pastor Harms; das der Brüdergemeinde by Römer; das evang. luther. by Graul, now Harde-land; die Biene auf dem Missionfelde, by Gossner, and others, now by Plath.
 Die Missionsharfe (Gütersloh, 1866). G. Warneck, in der "Allgem. Missionszeit-schrift." Gütersl., 1874 ff.
 H. Zschokke, Darstellung der gegenw. Ausbreitung des Christenth. auf dem Erdball. Aarau, 1819.
 C. Blumhardt, Versuch einer allg. Missionsgesch. Basel, 1828–37. 3 vols.
 J. H. Brauer, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Heidenbekehrung. Altona, 1835 ff. The same: das Missionswesen der evang. Kirche. Hamb., 1851.
 B. St. Steger, die prot. Missionen. Hof, 1838–50. 3 small vols. New ed., Halle, 1857.
 F. Lücke, Missionsstudien. Gött., 1841.
 *Handbüchl. der Missionsgesch. und Missionsgeographie. 3d ed. Calw, 1863.
 W. Hoffmann, Missionsstunden. 2d ed. Stuttg., 1848. Neue Samml., 1851. Elf Jahre in der Mission. Stuttg., 1853.
 J. Wiggers, Gesch. der evang. Mission. Hamb., 1845 f. 2 vols.
 K. C. G. Schmidt, kurzgef. Lebensbeschreibungen der merkwürdigsten evang. Mis-sionare. Lpz., 1836 ff. 8 vols.

¹ Schleiermacher, § 154.

² Ibid. 191 Anm.

- R. Vormbaum, evang. Missionsgeschichte in Biographien. Elberf., 1849-60. 4 vols. (Vol. 1 in 2d ed., 1859-61.)
- Alb. Ostertag, übersichtliche Gesch. der protest. Missionen von der Reform. bis zur Gegenwart. Gotha, 1858.
- F. Fabri, die Entstehung des Heidenthums und die Aufgabe der Heidenmission. Bar-men, 1859.
- Fr. Hoffmann, Missionsgeschichten, with Preface by W. Hoffmann. 6 vols. Potsd., 1857-61.
- G. E. Burkhardt, kleine Missionsbibliothek. Bielef., 1858-62. 4 vols. and Register.
- Ch. H. Kalkar, Gesch. der christl. Mission unter d. Heiden. German by A. Michelsen, 1st part. Gütersl., 1860.
- Henrion, allg. Geschichte der Missionen. From the French by Wittmann. Schaffh., 1847 ff. 3 vols. (Compare also the single missionary accounts of Buchanan, Heber, Weitbrecht, Leupolt on India; Gutzlaff on China; Gobat on Abyssinia; Gerlach und Wangemann (Gesch. der Berl. M.-gesellsch. Berl., 1872-77. 4 vols.) on South America; Ellis and Krohn on the South Sea Islands; Wegener on the Friendly Islands, and the biographies of special missionaries.
- Wallmann, Leiden und Freuden rheinischer Missionare. 2d ed. Halle, 1862.
- Von Besser, John Williams, der Apostel der Südsee. 8d ed. 1868.
- Roman Catholic:
- † Wittmann, die Herrlichkeit der Kirche in ihren Missionen. Augsb., 1841.
- On the Catholic Missions in China:
- Huc, le Christianisme en Chine, en Tartarie, et en Thibet. Par., 1857. 2 vols.
- On Missions in India:
- Franz Xavier, ein weltgeschichtliches Missionsbild. Wiesb., 1869.
- On Protestant Missions in India:
- Lechler. See above.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

Missions in General.

- American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Memorial volume of First Fifty Years. Boston, 1861.
- R. Anderson, Foreign Missions: their Relations and Claims. N. Y., 1869.
- History of the Missions of the American Board. 4 vols. Boston, 1870-74.
- A. R. Bonar, Incidents of Missionary Enterprise. Edinb., 1842.
- W. B. Boyce, Statistics of Protestant Missionary Societies. 1871-73. Lond., 1874.
- Miss C. L. Brightwell, Romance of Modern Missions. Lond., 1870.
- H. K. Carroll, The World of Missions: the Societies, Fields, Agencies, and Successes of Protestant Missions. N. Y., 1881.
- J. O. Choules, The Origin and History of Missions. 2 vols. Boston, 1842.
- T. Christlieb, Protestant Foreign Missions. Translated by David Allen Read. N. Y., 1880.
- Mrs. L. H. Daggett, Historical Sketches of Woman's Missionary Societies. Boston, 1879.
- F. S. Dobbins, A Foreign Missionary Manual: Geographical, Synoptical, Statistical and Biographical. Phila., 1881.
- D. Dorchester, The Problem of Religious Progress. N. Y., 1881.
- H. M. Field, From Egypt to Japan. N. Y., 1881.
- W. Gammell, A History of American Baptist Missions in Asia, Africa, Europe, and North America. 6th ed. Boston, 1850.

- General Conference, Proceedings of, on Foreign Missions, held in Mildmay Park, London, 1878. Lond., 1879.
- Mrs. J. T. Gracey, Woman's Medical Work in Foreign Lands. Dansville, N. Y., 1881.
- J. Holmes, Historical Sketches of the Missions of the United Brethren to 1817. Lond., 1827.
- E. Hoole, The Year Book of Missions. Lond., 1847.
- R. C. Houghton, The Women of the Orient. Cin., 1877.
- Jubilee, The Missionary: an Account of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the American Baptist Missionary Union, at Philadelphia, 1864. N. Y., 1865.
- Bishop C. Kingsley, Round the World. 2 vols. Cin., 1868.
- J. Kingsmill, Missions and Missionaries. Historically Viewed from their Commencement. Lond., 1858.
- J. C. Lowrie, Missionary Papers. N. Y., 1881.
- A Manual of the Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. N. Y., 1868.
- G. F. Maclear, A History of Christian Missions during the Middle Ages. Camb., 1868.
- Bishop Marvin, To the East by the Way of the West. Nashville, 1879.
- C. Merivale, Conversion of the West. 5 vols. N. Y., 1879.
- The Conversion of the Roman Empire. N. Y., 1865.
- The Conversion of the Northern Nations. N. Y., 1866.
- Missions, Conference on, held in 1860 at Liverpool. Lond., 1860.
- F. Max Müller, On Missions, a Lecture delivered in Westminster Abbey. N. Y., 1874.
- H. Newcomb, A Cyclopædia of Missions: containing a Comprehensive View of Missionary Operations throughout the World. N. Y., 1854.
- J. M. Reid, Missions and Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. 2 vols. N. Y., 1879.
- J. H. Seelye, Christian Missions. N. Y., 1876.
- F. Smith, The Origin and History of Missions, Compiled and Arranged from Authentic Documents. 2 vols. Boston, 1842.
- S. F. Smith, Missionary Sketches: a Concise History of the Work of the American Baptist Union. Boston, 1879.
- Bishop E. Thomson, Our Oriental Missions. 2 vols. Cin., 1871.
- W. Warren, These for Those: Our Indebtedness to Missions. Portland, 1876.
- Mrs. M. S. Wheeler, The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. N. Y., 1881.
- For full Literature on the special mission fields, see Hurst's Bibliotheca Theologica, pp. 179-188.

SECTION XV.

THE HISTORY OF DOCTRINES.

J. A. Ernesti, Prolegomena de theologia historica et dogmatica conjungenda necessitate, Lips., 1857, and in the Opusc. theol., Lips., 1792; L. Wachler, De theologia ex historia dogmatum emendanda, Rintel, 1795; De Wette, Religion u. Theologie, section 2, pp. 167-193; Ch. Fr. Ilgen, Werth d. Christl. Dogmengeschichte, Leipz., 1817; Augusti, Werth der Dogmengesch. in Theolog. Blätter II, p. 11 sqq.; W. K. L. Ziegler, Ideen über d. Begriff u. d. Behandl. d. Dogmengesch. in Gabler's Neuest. theol. Journal, 1798, II, p. 325 sqq.; Thomasius, Aufgabe u. Behandlung der Dogmengesch. in Harless' Zeitschr. für Protestantismus 3, 2; * Th. Kliefoth, Einleit. in d. Dogmengesch. Ludwigslust, 1839; F. Dörtenbach, Methode d. Dogmengesch. in Stud. u. Krit., 1853, No. 4, pp. 757-823; Kling, in Herzog's Encykl., III, p. 450 sqq.; Ritschl, Methode der alttest. Dogmengeschichte (Jahrb. für Deutsche Theologie, 1871, 2).

The History of Doctrines is a scientific representation of the gradual unfolding, establishing, and settling of the Christian faith into a definite body of doctrines, the distribution of the same into its particular elements, and the transformations and changes through which it passed under the influence of different and progressive forms of culture. It forms the bridge between Historical and Systematic Theology, and employs Church history in the character of an auxiliary.

Christianity presented itself at the beginning with a doctrine, but not with a system of dogmatics. Its dogmas were compressed in the glad tidings of a salvation which had appeared to men, and its religious conceptions connected themselves with the figurative and popular phraseology of the time. The need of dogmatic development was only gradually felt. The tendency toward such development, which inheres in Christianity, was already apparent in its earliest adherents. The reflection and dialectics of Paul unfolded themselves side by side with the contemplation of John, both being strictly within the bounds of the religious sphere. But the necessity of defending Christianity against other modes of thought, and of guarding against the influence of the foreign principles of Judaism and Ethnicism, led by degrees to those definitions of doctrine which the Church accepted as its common symbol.

History of Doctrines defined.

Individual tendencies.

Individual tendencies come into view, however, beside the inclination toward a common form of doctrine. Different states of mind within the Church affected the mode in which its teaching was understood, and thus began the formation of a body of dogmas, conditioned by the circumstances of the time, and struggling into definite shape by the force of its own inherent nature. It is the task of the history of doctrines to follow out the process by which such formation of doctrine took place,

The task of doctrinal history.

to ascertain its internal laws, to compare what has come into being with the original from which it sprang, and trace it back to the idea, as well as to ascertain the measure of truth it may contain in the midst of the erroneous elements in which it is involved. This is a task that can certainly be fully performed by him only who has apprehended the significance of the doctrine in its profoundest meaning, so that it would seem that the history of doctrines could only be successfully treated where it follows upon dogmatics. It should again be remembered, however, that no branch of any science can be completely developed without involving the others in the process. Moreover, while it is certain that the history of doctrines, in its scientific perfection, presumes acquaintance with dogmatics, it is equally certain that he alone is able to apprehend a doctrine in its vital relations who has cast a preliminary glance over its historical progress.

Relation of one science to others.

Without this it would be to him only a rigid hieroglyph, a dead statute.¹

The principal thing, in connexion with the problem which the history of doctrines is expected to solve, is to furnish an account of the relation between what has come historically into being and what was originally revealed. This must neither be regarded as, from the standpoint of a false biblical positivism, a mere degeneration, or a running off into ordinances of simply human origin; or, from the standpoint of speculative narrowness, as an unconditional advance from the mere conception to the pure idea. Attention must be equally bestowed upon the divinely intended and natural development of the truth contained in the Scriptural germ, and the divinely permitted, and likewise natural, aberrations from the truth, which are conditioned by the very fact of such development.

The history of doctrines has to do neither with evolution simply nor with corruption alone, but with both; and its work is, substantially, to determine the relation sustained by the one to the other. It deals with the positive acceptance of doctrine by the Church and with the petrifying influence of traditional beliefs, with agreements upon dogmas reached by the scientific process and with the insipid character they assumed in the course of rationalistic manipulations, with the transfiguration received at the hands of a true speculation and the volatilizing effects of idealistic processes, and, finally, with the pregnant interpretations of presaging minds and the obscurities entailed by a pseudo-mysti-

¹ The primary meaning of δόγμα is statute, decree, in the outward and positive sense. Comp. the "decree that went out from Cæsar Augustus," Luke ii, 1, and also Dan. ii, 13; vi, 8; Esther iii, 9; in the LXX, and 2 Macc. x, 8, in the Apocrypha. The term δόγματα is also applied in the New Testament (Eph. ii, 15; Col. ii, 14) to the Jewish ordinances from which Christ has delivered us; for it is to be presumed that the better class of exegetes are agreed that the teachings of Christianity are not so designated in those passages. Christian doctrine is never designated by the term δόγμα in the New Testament (εὐαγγέλιον, κήρυγμα, λόγος or ὁδὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ being used instead); in Acts xv, 22 and 26, where it occurs, the reference is to conclusions reached with regard to a practical question. By the Stoics, however, the word is used in the sense of doctrine (or principle), e. g., by Marc. Aurel. in Libro ad se ipsum, ii. 13; and similarly the Latins employ the words decretum, placitum (Cicero, Acad. Quæst. iv, 9; Senec. Epp., 94, 95). This usage was afterward followed by the Church fathers. Comp. the citations in Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v. δόγμα, and Hagenbach, Hist. Doct., § 1, note 1. But they too employ it in the sense of a firm, established principle (το θεῖον δόγμα), and at others to designate a temporary subjective opinion. The History of Doctrines may not, however, be made simply a record of passing opinions, although it must take cognizance of them as elements of temporary importance. Comp. J. P. Lange, Christl. Dogmatik, p. 2; Herzog, Encykl. iii, 433.

cal mode of treatment. The work of the history of doctrines is properly performed only when all such elements are rightly apprehended and appreciated.¹ This task should not be rendered more difficult by the carrying of unnecessary ballast of any kind. For this reason much that requires notice in the treatment of Church history may here be presumed as falling within that department.²

SECTION XVI.

GENERAL AND SPECIAL HISTORY.

The unfolding and demonstrating of the dogmatic spirit that runs through the whole will be continually apparent in the defining of particular dogmas, which again, in turn, determine the doctrinal spirit of an age. For this reason the general and the special history of doctrines is found to be interwoven in such a way as not to admit of their being totally separated, but to require that, in their treatment, regard be had to the relations they sustain to each other.

Christian doctrine is, in its root, a unit (τὸ θεῖον δόγμα), and the various formulations of particular doctrines are merely Christian doctrine a unit. members into which the organism may be divided. A living recognition of this fact leads to the ignoring of the distinction between general and particular; and many late writers have, accordingly, rejected the division into general and special history of doctrines. It is certain that the method which presents the general history in one series, or volume, and the special in another, without establishing any living relations between the two sections, must be set aside.³ For the former thus becomes merely an expanded chapter from ecclesiastical history—a history of the Church teaching, and also, in part, a history of dogmatics—while the latter is reduced to the character of a historical supplement to dogmatics, ¹ It would not be proper, for instance, to formulate in advance a general idea of rationalism, mysticism, etc., and then seek to adapt the different features as observed to such preconceived scheme. Every such tendency must be explained in conformity with its historical aspects and relations; comp. Klieforth, p. 319.

² Hase says: "The distinction between the History of Doctrines as a special science, and as a part of Church history, is merely formal in its character. For if the difference of extent, which is determined by external considerations, be left out of the question, the two deal simply with different poles of the same axis. The former treats the dogma as it develops itself in the form of definite conceptions, while Church history discusses the dogma in its relation to outward events." Church History (Blumenthal and Wing's ed.), p. 12. Similarly Klieforth, p. 324: "The whole of Church history is to be regarded as introductory to the History of Doctrines." Concerning its relation to other historical departments (e. g., the history of heresies), comp. Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines (Smith's ed.), § 6.

³ This is the chief fault of arrangement in Augusti and Baumgarten-Crusius.

a historia dogmatis. This difficulty can be avoided only by an elastic treatment of the general history, so as to allow it to extend partially into the Special, or by arranging the matter according to periods, and giving the precedence in each period to the general history. Thus the dogmatic principle governs the period, and the special history is made to follow. In this case the general history of doctrines takes on the character of an introduction.¹ We consider the latter to be the more suitable plan in a methodological point of view, though, for purposes of artistic treatment, the former is even still more favourable. The arrangement of the particular doctrines, moreover, should not be unconditionally governed by a firm and previously constructed dogmatical system, but solely by the dogmatic character that predominates in the periods to which they respectively belong.² For every period has a keytone, derived from some doctrine of preponderating influence, which underlies and runs through the whole of its development, and gives to the period its dogmatic character.³ This principle leads to a division into periods of corresponding character.

Elastic treatment of General History necessary.

Arrangement controlled by dogmatic character.

¹ At this point we coincide with Kliefoth, p. 334 sq.: "When the entire mass of dogmatic phenomena has been classified by periods, it becomes requisite to describe the internal progress of the periods, and to determine the historical point within the period that each particular dogmatic phenomenon has occupied. Not until this has been done can the historical relations of every such phenomenon be thoroughly understood." It is, of course, evident that external events, e. g., the progress of a controversy, the holding of councils, the publication of decrees, etc., cannot be entirely disregarded, since they afford the necessary points of connexion. But "the writer on the History of Doctrines will need to include only so much as may be necessary to constitute the thread between the different knots in the course of dogmatic development, or as may be otherwise needed for illustrating the history of the dogma upon which he is engaged." Kliefoth, p. 346; also p. 367 sq.

² The inadmissible character of the "local" method was already noticed by de Wette (Rel. u. Theol., p. 179). Comp. also Kliefoth, p. 370, and Meier's method of treating the History of Doctrines. Baur correctly observes (Dogmengesch., p. 14): "The general element which must be prefixed to the history of each period as an introductory feature can consist only in the determining of the general point of view under which each period must be regarded, and in the assigning of its rightful place to the period as a definite element in the process of historical development in general."

³ Hase says, "That certain particular doctrines form epochal points in one century, while certain others fix the attention in another, is not the result of accidental causes merely, but is an interest grounded in necessity; and any dogma can attain to epochal importance but once in the course of its history."—Rosenkranz, p. 248. "History embraces only what has truly lived at some time, and has thereby become immortal, as constituting a point at which the rays of the Christian mind were refracted; for it is a history of the living, and not of the dead, even as God is the God of the living only."—Church History, p. xii.

SECTION XVII

DIVISION OF DOCTRINAL HISTORY.

Comp. Hagenbach, article in Stud. u. Krit., 1828, No. 4, and Kliefoth, l. c., p. 56.

The division of the history of doctrines into periods is governed by a different principle from that which applies in connexion with Church history in general. The epochs which appear important to the Church, considered as a whole, are here secondary to those which give a different direction to doctrine. It follows, therefore, that the division is to be conformed to the dogmatic spirit which prevails in, and animates, any given time.

Division of doctrinal history into periods.

It has been remarked, that the periods in ecclesiastical do not always coincide with those of secular history, because elements that exert a decisive influence in the one department are not equally important in the other. A similar observation will apply to the relation sustained by the history of doctrines to that of the Church. For, while the history of doctrine is involved in that of the Church and its constitution, it is yet possible that "great changes may come to pass in the field of the one, while all continues unchanged in the other; and that a particular time may be important as the point of an unfolding in the one while it is altogether unimportant in the other."¹ It is, of course, difficult to discover the true turning points at which the circles of doctrine separate, and the knots at which they run into each other. The determining of such points is itself dependent on the fixing of the nature of the dogma. The inquirer who regards the speculative side of the dogma as the regulative feature will mark out a different division from him who, before all else, goes back to the religious disposition of which the dogma is simply the intelligible, but inadequate, expression, and who seeks to ascertain what practical influence was exerted by the dogma upon an ecclesiastical period. In a similar way the material aspect, which is the preponderance of certain doctrines—or the formal element—which is the practical conditions under which the formation of a doctrine was brought to pass—may become the determining influence with different minds.

Difficulty of discovery of beginnings of change.

The division we advocate, for instance, into Apologetical, Polemical, Scholastico-Systematic, Symbolical and Confessional, Philosophically Critical, and Speculative Periods, is predominantly formal, while Kliefoth has proposed a Material and formal methods.

¹ Schleiermacher, § 166.

division according to material conditions, based, at the same time, in the formal way, on national characteristics, and has ingeniously subdivided the several periods into stages of growth, of settling in symbolic form, and of decline. His first period is the Grecian, in the course of which both the objective doctrines of God and of Christ (Theology and Christology) were developed (Origen, Athanasius, and the Cappadocians). The second is the Roman Catholic (Augustine and the Scholastics), to which the development of Anthropology belongs. The third is the Germanico-Protestant (after the Reformation), which moves within the field of Soteriology (Justification, Repentance, Sanctification). The fourth (the present), finally, has for its task to attain to a correct recognition of the Church, and thereby to a sound eschatology, based on the development of the Church considered as the kingdom of God.

Baur divides the whole of the history of doctrines, in strict accordance with his settled Hegelian philosophy, into three principal periods: "The period of the ancient Church is the period of self-producing dogma and of the Christian religious consciousness—the substantiality of the dogma, which attains to objectivity in the dogma, and knows itself to be identical with it. The period of the Middle Ages and of Scholasticism is that in which that consciousness returns from the objectivity of the dogma to its own subjectivity, and contrasts itself with the dogma under the influence of rational reflection" (as though this influence had not been operative at any former time!). "The period since the Reformation is that of absolute self-consciousness, which is no longer bound to the dogma, (?) and has assumed a place above it" (?). This is not the proper place for exploding this division in its details, nor yet for extensively noticing other attempts.¹ What has been remarked may suffice to indicate the necessity for adopting a principle of division which is drawn from the movements of the life of the science itself.

¹ Münscher, for example, has adopted seven periods, and Lentz eight. Klee regards the division into periods as being wholly superfluous. J. P. Lange agrees, upon the whole, with the arrangement we have adopted (Christl. Dogmatik, p. 65). Gieseler and Neander have retained the periods of Church history in the History of Doctrines as well.

SECTION XVIII.

MODE OF TREATMENT.

The only proper mode of treating the history of doctrines is that which, emanating from the true nature of the dogma, brings to distinct consciousness both what is changeable in the statements of doctrine and what is permanent in the midst of the changes, and gives rise to such mutability itself. Only such a treatment, moreover, will warrant the expectation of realizing the practical advantage of preserving the history of doctrines from yielding to the authority of a rigid narrowness of the traditional type, and from being dominated by a mania for novelty and condemning what is old. For the historical sense is the necessary base of a theological character.

Best method of doctrinal history.

The remarks, in a preceding section, relating to a true pragmatism in the treatment of Church history, are applicable at this point as well. The form assumed by particular doctrines may, indeed, not unfrequently be explained by a reference to different and external causes, such as political conditions and events, the scientific culture of a period, or even conditions of climate, and other surroundings. But, while seeking such explanations, the dynamical principle, which works from within outwardly upon the material, should not be forgotten, since the triumph of any chief tendency over others, which cannot be altogether accidental, must, in the end, be judged by that principle.¹ This twofold and self-complementary mode of viewing the history will guard against two errors which lie near at hand. On the one hand, the recognition of what is changeable in received conceptions of doctrine, and the connected observation that much which once was held to be indispensable to a correct faith is no longer so regarded by even very orthodox scholars, while other things which are now stubbornly maintained in many quarters were formerly regarded more mildly, or with indifference, will preserve the mind from being bound by the unworthy fetters of any system whose influence tends to confine inquiry from the outset within narrowing limits, and will infuse a noble confidence in truth, which is not alarmed for the safety of the Church with the springing up of every breeze.

The dynamic principle important.

Necessity of recognizing changes.

But, on the other hand, even greater attention will be fixed upon the one thing needful, which, whatever may have been the form of doctrine, has always asserted itself, and has always demonstrated, however frequent may have been its temporary obscurations, that it is the permanent element which is destined to abide. It will appear, moreover, especially when the periods have been properly arranged, and with evidential force, that every period was specially determined and guided by some particular truth; that, A central truth for every age. so to speak, it had its own polar star, by which it shaped its course, and which shone for it with a brightness such as, with a change of constellation, it could not possess for any other age. But God continually brings up new stars, with the object that all should guide to the One who is the salvation of the world. It is, therefore, a sign of crudeness, and of a want of genuine enlightenment, when the mind finds it impossible to so far enter into former modes of thought as to discover that the productions of the human mind, when engaged upon the very noblest work that could command its attention, are more than mere abortions of unreason and superstition.¹ The "absurdities of Scholasticism," which have so often been made matter for sport, are certainly as nothing when compared with the absurdity with which the schoolmen have been judged by the people, "whom they could not have used as copyists" (Semler).²

¹ Comp. Rosenkranz, p. 248, and Hagenbach in Coburger Theol. Annalen, article Ueber den Sieg der Orthodoxie über die Heterodoxia, 1832, vol. 4, No. 1.

HISTORY.

Comp. Baur, Dogmengeschichte, § 6.

The history of doctrines, in its clearly defined outlines, is a new science. Materials for it have, however, been furnished from the beginning. A rich mine for discoveries exists already in ecclesiastico-historical and polemico-dogmatical works of the Church fathers, especially Irenæus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius. Down to our own time, also, works on Church history contain material for the history of doctrines. While connected in this way with Church history on the one hand, the history of doctrines stands similarly related to dogmatics on the other. We have only to bear in mind the great dogmatical works of Chemnitz, Hutter, Quenstedt, J. Gerhard, and others. Works preliminary to the history of doctrines proper were furnished by the Roman Catholic theologians: Petavius (1644–50, 1700), Thomassin (1684–89), Dumesnil (1730), and by the Protestant Forbesius a Corse (1645 sqq.). It is only since the days of Semler and Ernesti that a separate treatment was thought of (Ernesti, ubi supra, and Semler's Introduction to Baumgarten's System of Doctrine, Halle, 1759 sq.). At first, the attention was merely directed to the accumulation of material, and this was followed with the critical treatment of doctrines, for the expressed purpose of "enlarging the range of vision for incipient theologians or theological students in general" (Semler). The positive method of treatment was soon added, and the history of doctrines was made to serve in defence of dogma in the interests of Apologetics (Augusti). The higher view, which has regard equally to the critical and the dogmatical elements, and which dialectically mediates the contrasts between the positive and the speculative, is a fruitage of the recent science.

¹ Rosenkranz, ubi supra: "While it cannot be denied that arbitrariness and accident form an element in the History of Doctrines, as in every thing that is human, it is also true that the play of subjectivity, its dabbling in opinions, forms a feature that destroys and subordinates itself, as being unimportant, to the real movement. The estimate of the History of Doctrines which finds in it merely a lumber-room of human follies and silly opinions, is itself a silly opinion, which has no perception of the yearning of the mind to know its own inner nature, and no conception of the secret alliance which binds all the actions of the mind into a general whole." Comp. Kliefoth, p. 208 sq.; Baur, Dogmengesch. § 3, and (with reference to the unhistorical disposition of Rationalism) pp. 42, 43.

² Comp. Möhler, Kleine Schriften i, p. 131 sqq.

LITERATURE OF DOCTRINAL HISTORY.

I. TEXTBOOKS AND MANUALS OF HISTORY OF DOCTRINES.¹

- W. Münscher, Handbuch der christl. Dogmengeschichte. Marb., vols. 1–3, 1797–1802. (3d ed., 1817 f.) Vol. 4, 1809. Amer. ed., translated by Murdock. New Haven, 1830.
- * — Lehrbuch der christl. Dogmengeschichte (Marb., 1811). 3d ed., with Appendices from original sources, by Dan. v. Cölln. Cassel, 1832–34.
- J. Ch. W. Augusti, Lehrbuch der christl. Dogmengesch. Lpz., 1805. 4th ed., 1835.
- L. Bertholdt, Handbuch der Dogmengesch., pub. by J. G. V. Engelhardt. Erl., 1822 f. 2 vols.
- F. A. Ruperti, Geschichte der Dogmen, etc. Berl., 1831.
- L. F. O. Baumgarten-Crusius, Lehrbuch der christlichen Dogmengeschichte. Jena, 1832.
- * — Compendium der christl. Dogmengesch. Lpz., 1840–46. 5 vols.
- C. G. H. Lentz, Geschichte der christlichen Dogmen in pragmatischer Entwicklung. Helmst., 1834 f. 2 vols.
- † H. Klee, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. Mainz, 1837 f. 2 vols.
- J. G. V. Engelhardt, Dogmengeschichte. Neust., 1839. 2 vols.
- * F. K. Meier, Lehrb. der Dogmengesch. Giess., 1840. 2d ed. by G. Baur, 1854.
- K. R. Hagenbach, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. Lpz., 1840 f. 2 vols. 4th ed., 1857, in 1 vol. 5th ed., 1867. Eng. and Amer. ed. by H. B. Smith. N. Y., 1861, 1862.
- F. C. Baur, Lehrbuch der christlichen Dogmengeschichte. Stuttg., 1847. 2d ed., Tüb., 1858. 3d ed., Lpz., 1867.
- * — Vorlesungen über christl. Dogmengesch. Lpz., 1865–67. 3 vols.
- K. Beck, christl. Dogmengesch. in gedr. Uebersicht. Weim., 1848. 2d ed., 1864.
- Ph. Marheineke, christl. Dogmengesch., published by Matthies und Vatke. Berl., 1849. (Vol. 4 der theolog. Vorlesungen.)

¹ Older works by Gaab, Lange, Wundemann, Münter. Comp. also the Literature on History and Doctrines.

- L. Noack, die christliche Dogmengeschichte nach ihrem organischen Entwicklungsgange. Erl., 1853. 2d ed., 1856.
- * J. C. L. Gieseler, Dogmengeschichte. Pub. from remains by E. R. Redepenning. Bonn, 1855. (The supplementary 6th vol. of Church History.)
- * A. Neander, christl. Dogmengesch. Pub. by J. L. Jacobi. Berl., 1857. 2 vols. Eng. ed., translated by J. E. Ryland. Lond., 1858.
- H. Schmid, Lehrb. der Dogmengesch. 1859. 3d ed., 1877.
- K. A. Kahnis, der Kirchenglaube, historisch-genetisch dargestellt (Vol. 2 der Dogmatik). Lpz., 1864. 2d ed., 1875.
- Fr. Nitzsch, Grundriss der christlichen Dogmengeschichte. 1st part. Berl., 1870.
- J. Bach, die Dogmengesch. des Mittelalters vom christolog. Standpunkt. Wien, 1873-75. 2 parts.
- G. Frank, Gesch. der protest. Theol. Lpz., 1862-75. 3 parts (to 1817).
- G. Thomasius, die christl. Dogmengesch. Erl., 1874-76. 2 vols.
- F. Lichtenberger, hist. der idées religieuses en Allemagne depuis le milieu du 18. siècle. Vol. 1. Par., 1874.
- J. F. Astié, la théologie allemande contemporaine. Basel, 1874.

2. TABLES.

- K. R. Hagenbach, tabellarische Uebersicht der Dogmengeschichte bis auf die Reformation. Basel, 1828. 4.
- K. Vorländer, tabellarisch-übersichtliche Darstellung der Dogmengesch. nach Neanders dogmengeschichtl. Vorlesungen. 1. (oder apologetische) und 2. (oder polemische) Periode. Hamb., 1835-37. 3. (Uebergangs-) u. 4. (scholastische) Periode. 1855. Fol.
- Lange (a. Tabellen der Kirchengeschichte)

3. MONOGRAPHS ON HISTORY OF DOCTRINES.

a. *On the Apostolic Fathers and the Clementines.*¹

- A. Hilgenfeld, die apostolischen Väter. Untersuchungen über Inhalt u. Ursprung der unter ihren Namen erhaltenen Schriften. Halle, 1853.²
- J. H. B. Lückert, die Theologie der apostol. Väter in übersichtl. Darstellung, in (Hilgen-) Niedners Zeitschrift für die histor. Theologie. Jahrg., 1854. Heft 4.
- A. Schliemann, die Clementin. Recognitionen, eine Uebersetzung der Clementinen. Kiel, 1843.
- die Clementinen nebst den verwandten Schriften u. der Ebionitismus. Hamb., 1844.
- A. Hilgenfeld, die clementin. Recognitionen und Homilien nach ihrem Ursprung und Inhalt dargestellt. Jena, 1848.
- G. Uhlhorn, die Homilien und Recognitionen des Clemens Romanus nach ihrem Ursprung u. Inhalt dargestellt. Gött., 1854.
- J. Lehmann, die Clementinischen Schriften mit besonderer Rücksicht auf ihr literarisches Verhältniss. Gotha, 1869.
- (Here belong also: D. v. Cölln, Art. "Clementinen" in Ersch und Grubers Encycl. 1st sec., vol. 18, p. 36 ff. and D. Schenkel, de Clementinis, in dess. de eccl. Corinthia primaeva. Basel, 1838.)

¹ Here belongs also the literature of Church histories by Baur, Matter, Möhler, Neander, Schwegler, where we find much doctrinal history interwoven.

² Comp. the Rec. von Lipsius in Gersdorf Report. 1854. Vol. III, p. 65 ff.

b. *On Special History of Doctrines.*¹

- F. Delitzsch, die Gotteslehre des Thom. v. Aquino, krit. dargest. Lpz., 1870.
 F. C. Baur, die christl. Lehre von der Versöhnung. Tüb., 1838.
 — die christl. Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit und Menschwerdung Gottes in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung. Tüb., 1841–42. 3 vols.
 G. A. Meier, die Lehre von der Trinität in ihrer histor. Entwicklung. Hamb., 1844. 2 vols.
 K. A. Kahnis, die Lehre vom heil. Geist. Part 1. Halle, 1847.
 E. W. Möller, Geschichte der Kosmologie in der griechischen Kirche bis auf Origenes. Halle, 1860.
 *J. A. Dorner, Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die neueste. Stuttg., 1839. 2d ed., Berl., 1846–56. Eng. ed., translated by Alexander and Simon. Edinb., 1862–64.
 K. Bähr, die Lehre der Kirche von dem Tode Jesu. Sulzb., 1832.
 A. Ritschl, die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung. 1st vol., Geschichte der Lehre. Bonn, 1870. Eng. ed., translated by J. S. Black. Edinb., 1872.
 Chr. E. Luthardt, die Lehre vom freien Willen und seinem Verhältniss zur Gnade, in ihrer geschichtl. Entwicklung dargestellt. Lpz., 1863.
 A. F. O. Münchmeyer, Das Dogma von der sichtbaren und unsichtbaren Kirche. Gött., 1854.
 J. W. F. Höfling, das Sacrament der Taufe, etc., dogmatisch, historisch, liturgisch dargestellt. Erl., 1846–48. 2 vols. 2d ed., 1859.
 A. Ebrard, das Dogma vom heil. Abendmahl und seine Geschichte. Frankf., 1845 f. 2 vols.
 K. A. Kahnis, die Lehre vom Abendmahl. Lpz., 1851.
 J. W. F. Höfling, die Lehre der ältesten Kirche vom Opfer im Leben und Cultus der Christen. Erl., 1851.
 A. W. Dieckhoff, die evang. Abendmahlslehre im Reformationszeitalter 1st vol. Gött., 1854.
 L. J. Rückert, das Abendmahl, sein Wesen und seine Geschichte in der alten Kirche. Lpz., 1856.
 H. Schmid, der Kampf der luther. Kirche um Luthers Lehre vom Abendmahl im Reformationszeitalter. Lpz., 1867.
 (Corodi) kritische Gesch. des Chiliasmus. Lpz., 1781 ff. 2d ed., Zür., 1794. 4 vols.
 F. H. Hesse, der terministische Streit. Giess., 1877.
 H. J. Holtzmann, Kanon und Tradition, ein Beitrag zur neuern Dogmengeschichte und Symbolik. Ludwigsb., 1859.
 G. Teichmüller, Gesch. des Begriffs der Parusie. Halle, 1873.

-
- W. R. Alger, Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. New ed. New York, 1878.
 C. F. Cornwallis, Christian Doctrine in the Twelfth Century. Lond., 1850.
 J. Donaldson, A Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine. 3 vols. Lond., 1864–66.
 W. G. T. Shedd, A History of Christian Doctrines. 2 vols. N. Y., 1869.

¹ See below the monographs on Patristics and Dogmatics.

SECTION XIX.

PATRISTICS AND SYMBOLICS.

An exact acquaintance with the lives and works of individuals who rose to eminence above their contemporaries as teachers of the Church (Patristics), and whose efforts prompted the development of dogma, is included, though not wholly absorbed, in the circle of studies belonging to the history of doctrines. But inasmuch as the dogma is not the concern of individuals merely, having become the possession of the Church, nor an ecclesiastical branch, because it is the expression of the common faith, the teachings of ecclesiastical confessions (Symbolics) likewise form an integral part of the history of doctrines.

SECTION XX.

PATRISTICS.

1. Herzog, Real-Encyklopædie. 2. M'Climock and Strong, Cyclopaedia.

The material usually comprehended under the name of patristics (patrology) is difficult to unite into an independent science with scientific limitations, because,

1. The term Church father itself designates a vacillating idea, whose only stability rests on empirical foundations.

2. The material of patristics is partly resolved in that of literary history and partly in that of ecclesiastico-historical monographs, while only the remainder is reserved for the use of the history of doctrines.

*Patres ecclesiae*¹ is the name given to men who by their intellectual energy promoted the life of the Church, especially in the earlier stages of its development. The additional name Church fathers. of patres apostolici is applied to such of them as stood nearest the apostles, the fathers of the first century, such as Barnabas, Hermas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Papias. The usage is, however, very variable. The Roman Catholic Church distinguishes between Church fathers, Church teachers, and Church writers. The latter class includes those who are not honoured as fathers, or whose orthodoxy is suspected—e. g., Origen—while Church teachers are those whose orthodoxy is acknowledged, and who have, in addition, exercised a determining and shaping influence upon the dogma. These are Athanasius, Basil the Great,

¹ Corresponding to the Heb. דָּבָר. The pupils of the rabbins were termed their sons. Comp. Schoettgen, Horae Hebr. et Talm., i, p. 745, on Gal. iv, 19; Clem. Alex. Strom., i, 317; αὐτίκα πατέρας τοὺς κατηχήσαντας φημέν; Basil the Great in Constitut. Monast., c. 20; Chrysost. Hom., 11 and 48, vol. v; Suiceri, Thesaur., E, p. 637 b.

Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom in the East; and Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, and Gregory the Great in the West. Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura are also included with them. The boundaries of patristics are indefinite also as respects time. Limits of Patristics in time. Protestants close the series of Church fathers with the 6th century (Gregory the Great), Roman Catholics with the 13th. The scholastic divines, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and others, however, are preferably termed doctores ecclesiae, their activity being, in point of fact, chiefly limited to teaching; while, in the case of the fathers of the early centuries, the government of the Church, and also the characteristics of their personality, claim attention as well. This may be seen in the life of Cyprian, and in the much later illustration in Bernard of Clairvaux.

The Church fathers are not only ecclesiastical lights, luminaria, but also, in many instances, ecclesiastical princes, pri- Other terms for Church fathers. mates, and saints, sancti patres. This constitutes the reason why patristics is interwoven with different branches of the history of the Church. If it be chiefly regarded with reference to its biographical element—the lives of the fathers, to which some apply the distinctive name of Patrology¹—it will coincide with ecclesiastico-historical monography. If attention be directed only toward the writings left by the fathers, it will become a branch of the history of literature.² Thus patristics will constitute an element in the history of doctrines only in so far as the object is to comprehend the teachings of an ecclesiastical personage in connexion with the modes of thought which prevailed in his time, and to assign to it a suitable place in the dogmatical development as a whole. The difference prevails, however, that in the former case the person himself becomes, monographically, the central object of the inquiry, while the history of doctrines is more especially concerned with the opinion of the individual as related to the development of doctrine at large. The history of doctrines is, for instance, less concerned to know how Augustine attained to his convictions than how the Church came to adopt his views as its own.³

¹ Danz, p. 322.

² This may likewise be treated as a distinct branch which, however, will be simply a collateral branch of the history of Christian culture in general. We assigned to it a separate place in our first edition (and also in the History of Missions), and Pelt also accords it separate treatment "only because of its special importance for theologians, and because it is the customary method," and without assigning to it a place in the organism of theological sciences (§ 57). It is probably better for the purposes of encyclopædia to narrow down the framework, for which reason we give it no separate paragraph.

³ Comp. Hagenbach, History of Doctrines (Smith's ed.), § 5.

In all such cases it is difficult to understand why patristics should be erected into an independent study. In a scientific aspect it is immaterial whether the life of Augustine or that of Spener be under discussion—both of them are comprehended under the idea of monography. Bibliographical investigations, in relation to the various editions of Lactantius, have the same scientific character as though they were concerned with the letters of Luther or Calixtus. It follows, that the contribution to the history of doctrines rendered by patristics is not different in substance from that furnished by every monograph in which doctrinal history is involved. For, while we must be concerned to know the doctrinal system of an Athanasius or Augustine, it is equally important that Anselm, Luther, Quenstedt, Bengel, Schleiermacher, and Rothe be made to contribute toward the common work. The only qualification to which weight attaches is, that the possibility of pre-eminent service decreases with the progress of time.¹ Real productiveness is greater in proportion as the development is near the point of origin. But it would, nevertheless, be arbitrary, and an evidence of mechanical views, if the attempt were made to confine such productiveness "altogether to the age of the so-called Church fathers."

Remarks of a somewhat similar character will apply to the appellation "classic." In neither case is it possible to draw a clearly defined line, although certain eminences will be presented to every eye as decidedly and energetically prominent; and, as in that instance, the attention of students is to be turned toward the classical, so patristical studies are to be recommended here, in order that familiarity with ecclesiastical modes of thought and language may be acquired at an early stage. To attempt the reading of all the Church fathers would be far too great a task for the student, to offset which the treatment of Church history should include an outline of patristics. Certain of the fathers may, in addition, be described in monographs, and the more important of their works be read, in part or as a whole, as patristic selections, under the direction of the teacher. For this purpose we may particularly recommend, in addition to the Apostolical Fathers, the Epistle to Diognetus, the Apologists (Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, Minucius Felix, and some portion of Tertullian), the Alexandrians (Clement and Origen, at least in extracts or summaries), Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa (in a similar way), some of Chrysostom's Homilies and the work De Sacerdotio, and

¹ Schleiermacher, § 251.

Augustine's Confessions, De Doctrina Christiana, Enchiridion ad Laurentium, and De civitate Dei.¹

THE HISTORY OF PATRISTICS.

The necessity of collecting the material of patristics could not arise before an ecclesiastical literature had been formed. Jerome (died 420) composed Illustrious Men, or Ecclesiastical Writers, and was followed by Gennadius (490), Isidore of Seville (in the 7th century), Ildefonsus of Toledo (in the 8th), and by Honorius Augustodunensis, Sigebertus Gemblacensis, Henr. Gaudavensis, Joh. Trithemius, and Aubertus Miræus (between the 12th and 16th centuries). All are found in J. A. Fabricii, Bibliotheca eccles., Hamb., 1718. The Benedictine monks, more accurately the Congregatio St. Mauri, have distinguished themselves by their editions of the Church fathers; and a number of theologians in the Anglican Church have likewise performed meritorious work in this direction. In later times patristical studies were promoted in the Roman Catholic Church by Robert Bellarmine (in the 17th century), Caspar Oudin, Ellies du Pin, le Nourry, Tillemont, Ceillier, Lumper, Sprenger, Möhler, and others; and, in the Protestant, by Scultetus, Nolten, Oelrichs, Cave, Schoenemann, and J. G. Walch. The earlier works were more particularly confined to the bibliographical department, while in modern times the method of monographical discussion has been elevated into an art.

¹ R. Rothe, writing while yet a student, says, "I am convinced that no person can become a thorough and skilful theologian who has not made a serious and life-long task of the study of the Church fathers, and who has not derived adequate and spiritual strength from their sanctified spirit and their genuinely religious application of a solid learning. But for this the longest life will ever be too brief, so that there can be no thought of completing the work while at the university" (C. Nippold i, p. 98). Certain mediæval writers—Scholastics and Mystics—have equal claim to be made the object of careful study, especially Anselm, Our Deus homo, and pre-eminently the Reformers. The history of the Reformation, for instance, may be most attractively followed along the thread of the letters of Luther (published by de Wette), Zwingle (by Schuler and Schulthess), and Calvin (Strasburg ed., by Strauss, Baum, and Cunitz). Every student should have also read, in addition to the more important of Luther's writings (the Address to Christian Nobles of the German Nation, and that on the Babylonian Captivity), the Loci Communes of Melancthon and Calvin's Institutes. In a word, the entire history of Christian literature should be made to pass in living forms before the eye of the theologian. This, however, is nothing more than the practical realization of the idea of thorough study of the field of Church history in general.

PATRISTIC LITERATURE.

GERMAN AND FRENCH.

1. Best Editions of Collected Works of the Fathers.

- Magna bibliotheca vett. patrum et antiqu. scriptorum ecclesiast., ed. Margarin de la Bigne. Par., 1575. Most complete, Par., 1654. 17 vols. fol.
- Maxima bibliotheca vett. patrum, etc. Lugd., 1677. 27 vols. fol. (The Greek fathers only in Latin translations. Especially important because of introduction of medieval theologians.)
- A. Gallandii, bibliotheca vett. patrum antiquorumque scriptt. ecclesiast. Venet., 1765-88. 14 vols. fol. (Gives the smaller writings of the Church fathers in the most complete collection. However, it remains unfinished.)
- † M. Permaneder, Biblioth. patristica. Landsh., 1841-44. 2 vols. New ed., 1850. (Vol. I, entitled: Patrologia generalis s. encyclopaedia patristica.)
- † A. B. Cailleau et M. N. S. Guillon, collectio selecta ss. eccl. patrum. Par., 1829 ss. 148 vols.
- † J. P. Migne, patrologiae cursus completus s. bibl. universalis ss. patr. scriptorumque eccl. Par., 1844 ss. (Latin fathers to 13th century; Greek, to 9th, and still continued.)¹
- theologiae cursus completus. Vol. I, Par., 1879. (Expected to be in 28 vols.)
- † A. Reifferscheid, Biblioth. patrum latin. italica. (Catalogue of MSS. of Latin Church fathers in the Italian libraries.) Vienna, 1865 ff.
- † Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum ed. consilio et impensis Academiae litterarum Caesariae Vindobonensis. 1866 sqq. (Vol. I, Salpic. Severus. II, Minucius Felix. III, Cyprian. IV, [1876] Arnobius.)
- Horoy, medii aevi biblioth. patristica. Vol. I. (Honor. III.) Par., 1879. (Expected to be in 100 vols.)

2. Extracts and Chrestomathies.

- C. F. Rösler, Bibliothek der Kirchenväter in Ueberss. und Auszügen aus ihren fürnehmsten, besonders dogm. Schriften, sammt dem Original der Hauptstellen und nöthigen Anmerkungen. Lpz., 1776-86. 10 vols.
- J. Ch. W. Augusti, chrestomathia patristica. Lips., 1812. 2 vols.
- H. J. Royaards, chrestomathia patristica. Part I. Traj. 1831.²
- * L. de Sinner, novus ss. patrum graec. sec. iv. delectus. Par., 1842.
- Homiliarium patristicum, edd. L. Pelt, H. Rheinwald, C. Vogt. Berol., 1829-32. Vol. I, fasc. 1-4.³
- J. C. Orelli, selecta patrum eccl. capita ad exegesis sacr. pertinentia. Tur., 1820-24. 4 specc.
- Fragmenta selecta ex scriptis patrum eccl. latinae, edd. J. Hagen et A. Listov. Hafn., 1850.

¹ The collections of Oberthür (1780 ff.), Geradorf (for Latin fathers, 1836 ff.), and Richter (for Greek fathers, 1836 ff.), remain unfinished.

² The collection of Olshausen, see Literature of Church History.

³ At the same time also German; Homiliensammlung aus den ersten 6 Jahrh. Berl., 1839 ff. Comp. the Predigten auf alle Sonn- und Festtage aus den Schriften der K. Väter (Lpz., 1838 f. 2 vols.), published in German translation by J. C. W. Augusti, and also his Auswahl von Camalreden der berühmtesten Homilisten der griech. und lat. Kirche aus dem 4. und 5. Jahrh. Lpz., 1840.

- Bibliotheca patrum graecorum dogmatica*, cur. J. C. Thilo. Lips., 1853 f. 2 vols. Vol. I, S. Athanasii; Vol. II, (cur. J. D. H. Goldhorn,) Basilii et Gregorii Nazianzeni opp. dogmatica selecta. Acc. appendix Eunomii apologeticum et confessionem et Amphilogii epist. synodalem continens.
- F. Oehler, Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, eine Auswahl aus deren Werken. Urschrift mit deutscher Uebersetzung. Lpz., 1858 ff.
- † H. Hurter, patrum ss. opuscula selecta. Innsbr., 1868 ff. (thus far 39 vols.).
- V. Thalhofer, Biblioth. der Kirchenväter. Auswahl der vorzügl. patr. Werke in deutscher Uebers. Kempten, 1869 ff. (thus far 322 vols.).¹

3. *Editions of Patristic Writings for the Use of Students.*²

- Patrum apostolicorum opera recogn.* * † C. J. Hefele (Tüb., 1839; 5th ed., by F. X. Funk, 1878); other editions, by Reithmayr (Münch., 1844), on Barn. and Clemens, by E. von Muralt (Zür., 1847), on Clemens, Ign., and Polyk., by Jacobson (Oxford, 4th ed., 1863).³
- Patrum apostolicorum opera*, ed. A. R. Dressel; accedit Hermæ Pastor ex fragm. graecis Lipsiensibus auctore C. Tischendorf. Lips., 1857. * Gebhardt, Harnack, and Zahn undertook a new ed. of Dressel's ed. Lpz., 1875-77. 3 fasc. (Briefe des Clemens in 2d ed., 1876, Br. des Barnabas, 1878; minor edition of the whole work. Lpz., 1877).
- Bibliotheca patrum ecclesiasticorum selectissima*, cur. B. Lindner. Fasc. I-IV. Lips., 1857-61.
- Novum testam. extra canonem receptum* ed. A. Hilgenfeld. Lips., 1866.
- Clementis Romani epistolae* ed., Lightfoot (Lond., 1869), Laurent (Lips., 1870), Tischendorf (Lips., 1873), Hilgenfeld (Lips., 1876). The complete MS. of the Clementine Epistles found by Bryennius in Constantinople, in 1873, was published by the discoverer (Constantinople, 1875). The hitherto wanting portions of it were published by Lightfoot (Lond., 1877) as appendix to his edition of 1869, and by Gebhardt and Harnack (Lpz., 1876).
- J. G. Müller, Erklär. des Barnabasbriefes. Lpz., 1869.
- Barnabæ epistula* ed. A. Hilgenfeld. 2d ed., Lips., 1877.
- Clementis Rom. quae feruntur homiliae*, pub. by A. Schwegler. Stuttg., 1847. More complete by A. R. Dressel, Gött., 1853; P. de Lagarde, Lpz., 1865.⁴
- Constitutiones apostolicae*, pub. by W. Ueltzen. Schwerin, 1858; P. de Lagarde. Lpz., 1862.⁵
- Ignatius*, by W. Cureton: Corpus Ignatianum. Lond. (Berl.), 1849.
- Ignatii, quae feruntur epistolae*, ed. H. Petermann. Lips., 1849.⁶

¹ Also the rich collections of early Christian hymns by Ald. Manutius, G. Fabricius, Björn. Gebeer, and others. For more minute details see Winer, I, p. 679 f.

² Of the larger, and, for the most part, magnificent editions, we may mention chiefly those of Cotelierius, of the Apostolic fathers, Maran's ed. of Justin, Massuet's ed. of Irenæus, Rigoetius' ed. of Tertullian and Cyprian, Potter's ed. of Clemens Alexandrinus, de la Rue's ed. of Origen, Montfaucon's ed. of Athanasius and Chrysostom, Petavius' ed. of Epiphany, Vallarsi's ed. of Hieronymus, and the Benedictine ed. of Augustine.

³ After the large edition of J. B. Cotelierius (Par. 1672) and J. Clericus (Amst., 1698. 2d ed., 1794, 2 vols. fol.). Also editions by Ittig (Lpz., 1699), Frey (Bas., 1742), Busel (Lond., 1746), Hornemann (Hafn., 1898). On the Apostolic fathers see literature on History of Doctrines. See also: F. A. Karfer, die Schriften der apostolischen Väter. Breslau, 1847.

⁴ See also C. E. Francke, die Lehren des Clemens von Rom. in Guericke's und Rudelb. Zeitschrift 1841. III.

⁵ Likewise O. Krabbe, über Ursprung u. Inhalt der apostol. Constitutionen. Hamb., 1880.

⁶ J. S. v. Drey, neue Untersuchungen über die Constitutt. u. Kanones der Apostel. Tüb., 1832.

⁷ Also the works of Arndt, Düsterdieck, Bunsen, Baur, Denzinger, Hefele, Uhlhorn, Lipadus, Merx, Hilgenfeld, and others.

- Justini Martyris Opp. ed. J. C. Th. Otto. Jena, 1842 ff. 3 vols. 3d ed., 1875 ff. (Vols. 1-5 des Corpus apologetarum christian. saec. secundi; vol. 6 contains Tatiani oratio ad Graecos; vol. 7, Athenagorae opera; vol. 8, Theophili ad Autolycum II. III.; vol. 9, [1872], Hermias, Melito.)
- Justini apologiae ed. † J. G. Braunius. 2d ed., Bonn, 1860.
- Epistola ad Diognetum, by J. C. Th. Otto. 2d ed., 1852.¹
- Irenaeus, by A. Stieren. Lpz., 1848-53. 2 vols. in 4 parts; by Harvey. Camb., 1857. 2 vols.
- Minucius Felix, by Lübker. Lpz., 1836; by E. de Muralt. Zür., 1836; by H. Holden.
Camb., 1853.
- Arnobius, by Orelli (Lpz., 1816 f.), Hildebrand (1844), Oehler 1846 (in Gersdorf's bibl. patr. latin. Vol. 12), Reifferschied (1875).
- Eusebius, hist. eccles., by Heinichen (Lips., 1827 f. 3 vols. 2d ed., 1868 f.), Schweg-ler, (Tüb., 1852), Dindorf (Lpz., 1871).
- Cyprian, by Goldhorn in Gersdorf's Bibliothek, vols. ii, iii (Lpz., 1838 f.), by Krabinger (Tüb., 1853), and G. Hartel (Vindob., 1869 f. 2 vols.).
- Tertullian, collected works by F. Oehler, in larger (Lips., 1853 f. 3 vols.) and smaller editions (Lips., 1854).
- Lactantius, by Bünnemann (Lips., 1739; O. F. Fritzsche (Lips., 1842 ff. Vols. 9, 10 of Gersdorf's biblioth. patr.)
- Clemens Alexandrinus, by R. Klotz (Lpz., 1831 ff. 4 vols.), W. Dindorf (Oxford, 1868 f. 4 vols.).
- Origenes περὶ ἀρχῶν, by E. R. Redepenning (Lpz., 1836); works by Lommatsch (Berl., 1831-48. 25 vols.), from the edition of de la Rue.
- Augustinus, Confessiones (with Preface by Neander, Berl., 1823; by Bruder, Lpz., 1837), by Pusey (Oxon., 1838; from this edition also pub. and elucidated by K. v.
Raumer. Stuttg., 1856. 2d ed., Gütersl., 1876); de civitate Dei: Lpz., 1825, and by J. Strange, Köln, 1850. 2 vols.; de doctrina christ. u. enchiridion, by Bruder (Lpz., 1838).
- Chrysostomus de sacerdotio, by Bengel (Stuttg., 1725, and Lpz., 1825), by Leo (Lpz., 1834); single Homilies by Bauermeister (Gött., 1816), Becher (Lpz., 1839), and others.
- Basil the Great, Address to Christian Young Men on the Right Use of Heathen Authors. Greek Text with German Annotations, by G. Lothholtz. Jena, 1857.

4. Introductory Writings.

- J. C. Walch, bibliotheca patristica literariis adnotatt. instr. Jen., 1770. New ed.
emendatior et mult. auctior adorn. a J. T. L. Danz, 1834.
- C. T. G. Schoenemann, bibliotheca histor.-liter. patr. latinorum a Tertulliano usque ad Gregor. M., et Isidor. Hispal. Lips., 1792-94. 2 vols.
- H. J. Pestalozzi, Grundlinien der Geschichte der kirchl. Literatur der ersten 6. Jahrh.
Gött., 1811.
- † V. A. Winter, krit. Gesch. der ältesten Zeugen od. Patrologie. Münch., 1814.
- J. G. V. Engelhardt, Literar. Leitfaden zu Vorles. ü. d. Patristik. Erl., 1823.
- † F. W. Goldwitzer, Bibliographie der Kirchenväter u. Kirchenlehrer vom 1. bis zum
13. Jahrh. Landsh., 1828. The same, Patrologie verbunden mit Patristik. Nürnberg, 1834. 2 parts.
- J. T. L. Danz, initia doctrinae patristicae. Jena, 1839.

¹ Comp. the work of Otto, Jena, 1845, and W. A. Hollenberg, Berl., 1853; also the review of Otto in Gersdorf's Repert. for 1854. 1st vol., p. 263 ff. J. F. Overbeck, über den pseudojustinischen Brief an Diognet. Basel, 1873, 4., and the replies of Hilgenfeld and Kelm.

- *† J. A. Möhler, Patrologie od. christl. Literärgesch. 1st vol. (1-3 Jahrh.); pub. by F. X. Reithmayr. Regensb., 1889.
- J. Fessler, institutiones patrologicae. Vol. 1 in 2 parts. Oenip., 1850.
- J. O. F. Bähr, Gesch. der röm. Literatur. (Suppl. I.: Die christl. Dichter u. Geschichtsschreiber. II.: Die christlich-römische Theologie. III.: Die römische Liter. im karol. Zeitalter.) Karlar., 1886-40.
- † J. W. Eberl, Leitfaden zum Stud. der Patrologie. Augsb., 1854.
- F. C. Magon, Hdb. der Patrol. u. kirchl. Lit.-gesch. Regensb., 1864.
- † J. Alzog, Grundriss der Patrologie. Freib., 1866. 3d ed., 1876.
- † Jos. Schwane, Dogmengeschichte der patristischen Zeit. Münster, 1866.

5. Patristic Monographs.¹

- O. Skworzow, patrolog. Untersuchungen. Ueber Urspr. der problemat. Schriften der apostol. Väter. Lpz., 1876
- Ueber das Papias-Fragment bei Euseb. hist. eccl. 3, 39: W. Weiffenbach (Giesz., 1874); reply by L. Leimbach (Gotha, 1875), and to this again by Weiffenbach (Berl., 1878).
- V. v. Strauss, Polykarpus. Heidl., 1860. 2d ed., 1875.
- E. Gaab, der Hirte des Hermas. Basel, 1867.
- Th. Zahn, der Hirte des Hermas untersucht. Gotha, 1868. The same, Ignatius v. Antiochien. Gotha, 1873.
- F. G. Goltz, Clemens von Rom. Eine Gesch. aus dem apost. Zeitalter. Berl., 1851.
- C. J. Bunsen, Ignatius von Antiochien und seine Zeit. Hamb., 1847.
- J. Riggenbach, der sogenannte Brief des Barnabas. (Program.) Basel, 1874.²
- O. Braunsberg, der Ap. Barnabas. Mainz, 1876.
- J. C. T. Otto, de Justini Mart., scriptis et doctrina. Jena, 1841.
- K. Semisch, Justin der Märtyrer. Bresl., 1840-42. 2 vols.
- die apostol. Denkwürdigkeiten des M. Justinus. Hamb., 1848.
- F. Overbeck, über den pseudojustin. Brief an Diognet. Basel, 1872.
- H. Meier, de Minucio Felice. Tigur., 1824.
- A. Ebert, Tertullians Verhältniss zu Minucius Felix. Lpz., 1868.
- H. A. Daniel, Tatianus der Apologet. Halle, 1837.
- Th. A. Clarisse, de Athenagorae vita et scriptis, etc. Lugd., 1819.
- L. Duncker, des hl. Irenäus Christologie. Gött., 1848.
- H. Ziegler, Irenäus, der Bischof von Lyon. Berl., 1871.
- C. J. Bunsen, Hippolytus und seine Zeit. Lpz., 1852 f. 2 vols.³ Lond., 4 vols., 1852.
- G. Volkmar, Hippolytus und die römischen Zeitgenossen. Zür., 1855.
- A. Neander, Antignostikus, Geist des Tertullian. Berl., 1825. 2d ed., 1849.
- K. Hesselberg, Tertullians Lehre, etc. 1st part: Leben u. Schriften. Dorp., 1848.
- A. Hauck, Tertullians Leben u. Schriften. Erl., 1877.
- F. R. Eylert, Clemens von Alex. als Philosoph u. Dichter. Lpz., 1832.
- H. Reinkens, de Clemente Alexandr. Vratisl., 1851.
- G. Thomasius, Origines. Nürnberg., 1837.
- E. R. Redepenning, Origenes. Eine Darstellung seines Lebens und seiner Lehre. Bonn, 1841-46. 2 parts.⁴

¹ Comp. the monographs on Church History.

² See above, the writings of Hilgenfeld on the Apostolic fathers in general.

³ Comp. also L. F. W. Seizecke, über Leben und Schriften des Bischofs Hippolytus, in Nilgens Zeitschr. für histor. Theol., 1843, 1843, p. 43 ff., and + J. J. Dollinger, Hippolytus und Kallistus. Regensb., 1868.

⁴ Also the monographs of Matter and Guericke on the Alexandrian School.

- F. W. Rettberg, Cyprianus dargest. nach seinem Leben und Wirken. Gött., 1831.
 B. Fechtrop, der hl. Cyprian. Sein Leben u. s. Lehre. Vol. I. Münt., 1878.
 V. Hély, Eusèbe de Césarée. Par., 1877.
 F. A. Scheutz, Zenonis episc. Veron. doctrina christ. Lips., 1854.
 † J. A. Möhler, Athanasius d. Gr. u. die Kirche s. Zeit. Mainz, 1827. 2d ed., 1844.
 † L. Atzberger, die Logoslehre des hl. Athanasius. Münch., 1880.
 * K. Ullmann, Gregor von Nazianz. Darmst., 1825.
 Benoit, St. Grégoire de Nazianze. Par., 1876.
 J. Rupp, Gregors von Nyssa Leben und Meinungen. Lpz., 1884.
 K. R. W. Klose, Basilus der Gr., nach s. Leben u. s. Lehre dargestellt. Stralsund, 1835. On the same, A. Bayle. Avign., 1878.
 H. Weiss, die grossen Cappadozier, Basilus, Gregor von Nazianz und Gregor v. Nyssa. Braunsberg, 1872.
 * A. Neander, der heil. Joh. Chrysostomus u. die Kirche bes. des Orients in dessen Zeitalter. Berl., 1821 f. 2 vols. 4th ed., 1858.
 Th. Förster, Chrysostomus in sein. Verhältniss zur antiochen. Schule. Gotha, 1869.
 † H. Reinkens, Hilarius von Poitiers. Schaffh., 1864.
 H. A. Niemeyer, de Isidori Pelus. vita, scriptis et doctrina. Hal., 1825.
 † F. Lauchert and A. Knoll, Hieronymus, sein Leben und seine Zeit, etc.; from the French of Collombet. Rottw., 1846. 2 vols.
 O. Zöckler, Hieronymus, sein Leben und Wirken. Gotha, 1865.
 Thierry, St. Jérôme. 3d ed. Par., 1876.
 † F. A. G. Kloth, d. hl. Kirchenlehrer Aur. Augustinus. Aachen, 1840. 2 vols.
 C. Bindemann, der heil. Augustinus. Berl. u. Lpz. (Greifsw.), 1844-69. 3 vols.
 Poujoulat, hist. de St. Augustin. 3 vols. Par., 1843. 3d ed., 1852. German, by F. Hurter. Schaffh., 1845 ff. 2 vols.
 G. F. Wiggers, pragm. Darstellung des Augustinismus, Pelagianismus und Semipelagianismus. Berl. u. Hamb., 1821. 38. 2 vols.
 A. Dorner, Augustinus. Sein theol. System u. seine religionsphilos. Anschauung. Berl., 1878.
 G. Waitz, über das Leben und die Lehre des Ulfilas. Hannov., 1840.
 W. A. Arendt, Leo der Grosse und seine Zeit. Mainz, 1835.
 E. Perthel, Leo's I. Leben und Lehren. Jena, 1843.
 G. F. Wiggers, de Gregorio Magno. Rost., 1839.
 G. J. Th. Lau, Gregor I. nach s. Leben und s. Lehre. Lpz., 1845.
 G. Pfahler, Gregor der Grosse und seine Zeit. Frankf., 1852.
 G. Maggio, prolegom. alla storia di Gregorio il Grande e de suoi tempi. Prato, 1879.
 F. H. G. Grundlehner, Joh. Damascenus. Utr., 1877.
 J. Langen, Joh. von Damascus. Gotha, 1879.
 † J. Hergenröther, Photius, Patriarch v. Constant. Regensb., 1867-69. 3 vols.

6. History of the Literature of the Church and Theology (including the Later Period).

- Ch. W. Flügge, Versuch einer Gesch. der theolog. Wissenschaften. Halle, 1796-98. 3 vols. Einleit. dazu, Halle, 1799.
 C. F. Stäudlin, Geschichte der theolog. Wissenschaften seit der Verbreitung der alten Literatur. Gött., 1810 f. 2 vols.¹

¹ On the knowledge of theological books: J. G. Walch, bibliotheca theol. selecta. Jena, 1737-65. 4 vols. J. A. Nössel, Anweisung zur Kenntniss der besten allgem. Bücher in allen Theilen der Theologie. Lpz., 1779. 4th ed., 1780. Continued by Simon. Lpz., 1813. D. G. Niemeyer, Bibliothek für Prediger und Freunde der Theolog. Liter. Halle, 1793-94. 3 vols. Newly revised and continued by A. H. Niemeyer and H. B. Wagnitz. Halle, 1796-1813. 4 vols. W. D.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- Ante-Nicene Christian Library, edited by Roberts and Donaldson. 24 vols. Edinb., 1864-72.
- Augustine, The Confessions of, edited by W. G. T. Shedd. And., 1860.
- J. Bennett, The Theology of the Early Christian Church, exhibited in Quotations from the Writers of the First Three Centuries. Lond., 1852.
- R. Blakey, Lives of the Primitive Fathers. Lond., 1842.
- J. J. Blunt, Lectures on the Right Use of the Early Fathers. 3d ed. Lond., 1869.
- W. J. Bolton, The Evidences of Christianity, as exhibited in the Writings of its Apologists down to Augustine. N. Y., 1854.
- E. Burton, Testimonials of the Ante-Nicene Fathers to the Divinity of Christ. Lond., 1829.
- Testimonies of the Ante-Nicene Fathers to the Doctrine of the Trinity, and of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. Lond., 1831.
- H. Cary, Testimonies of the Fathers of the First Four Centuries to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England. Lond., 1835.
- J. Daillé, A Treatise on the Right Use of the Fathers in the Decision of Controversies existing at this Day in Religion. 2d ed. Lond., 1843.
- J. Donaldson, A Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine from the Death of the Apostles to the Nicene Council. 8 vols. Lond., 1864.
- Douglass, Series of Christian Greek and Latin Writers. Edited by F. A. March. 5 vols. N. Y., 1874-80.
- Eusebius, History of the Martyrs in Palestine. Edited and translated by W. Cureton. Lond., 1861.
- J. Harrison, Whose are the Fathers? Lond., 1867.
- Ignatii, Romani S. Polycarpi, Patrum Apostolicorum, quæ supersunt. Accedunt S. Ignatii et S. Polycarpi Martyria. 2 vols. Lond., 1863.
- G. A. Jackson, The Apostolic Fathers and the Apologists of the Second Century. N. Y., 1879.

Fuhrmann, Handbuch der theol. Liter. Lpz., 1818-21. 2 vols. Fortsetz. Vol. I. Isrl., 1836.

* G. B. Winer, Handb. der theol. Liter. hauptsächlich der protest. Lpz., 1890 ff. 3d ed., 1897-40, und Ergänzungsheft, 1843. Deegen, Jahrbüchern der deutschen theol. Literatur (since 1811), Essen, 1819-29. 7 small vols. Continued by * E. Zimmermann and others, 1832-35. 3 small vols.

W. Hauck, theol. Jahresbericht. Wiesb., 1866-77. E. A. Zuchold, Bibliotheca theologica (1890-98). Gött., 1864. 3 vols. + Reusch, theolog. Literaturblatt (Bonn, 1865-77); Ruprecht, (now W. Müldener), Bibliotheca theolog. oder System. geordnete Uebersicht aller auf d. Geb. der evangel. Theol. in Deutschl. neu erschien. Bücher. Gött., 1848 ff. (annually 2 Nos.). Every No. of Schürer's theol. Literatg. (Lpz., 1876 ff.), and more recently Luthardt's allgem. ev.-luth. Kirchenzeitung, furnish a very complete account of the latest literature. Comp. also the Universal Book Lexica of Kayser (begins with 1750 and is continued now in quadrennial periods), and others; the Hinrichs' Bücherverzeichnisse (2 Nos. yearly); Engelmann's Fachkataloge, the Uebersichten of Baldamus and Haupt (Prot. and Cath. separately, 1865-69; 1870-74), and many others.

SECTION XXI.

SYMBOLICS.

Symbolics, in a broad sense, designates the science of the origin, Definition of nature, and contents of all the public confessions in symbolics. which the Church has laid down a summary of its teaching, and which it has erected at certain times and under certain forms as the standard of its faith. In a more limited sense, the term is used to denote a knowledge of the distinctive teachings which, especially since the Reformation, separate the different divisions of the Church from each other in doctrinal matters, the contrast between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, and the minor differences therewith connected. Symbolics forms an integral part of the history of doctrines, or coincides with comparative dogmatics, or polemics, in proportion as the purely historical or the dogmatico-polemical interest predominates in the stating and discussing of such opposing standards. It is probably best to regard it as a historical science connected with the history of doctrines, but as also, under this form, a necessary aid and point of transition to dogmatics.

Σύμβολον (a token, mark¹) denotes, in ecclesiastical usage, a formula preserved by tradition or in writing, by which all who belong to the same ecclesiastical party may recognize each other. The symbol is the common shibboleth, the ecclesiastical standard, about which the community is gathered. The use of such symbols, of which the so-called Apostles' Creed was the earliest, is derived from the ritual of baptism. Its first office, therefore, First and later office of symbol. was to distinguish the Christian, as belonging to a different religious society, from the Jew and the heathen; and it was afterward employed to distinguish orthodox Catholic ¹ Comp. Suicer, Thesaur. Eccles., s. v., and Creuzer, Symbolik Mone's ed., § 16, p. 18). Σύμβολον signifies what is formed by the joining together of two parts; e. g., the term σύμβολα was applied to the two halves of the tablets which served as pledges of a contracted hospitality (tessera hospitalitatis). It was afterward employed to designate all unions; and, subsequently, everything that in the progress of time came to take the place of the coarse tokens of earlier times, a pledge in general. Thus we find it applied to the ring, which was given instead of ordinary contributions toward a common feast, and later to the pledge for subsequent redemption, which was in use in matters of exchange; also to the tessera militaris, the parole; in brief, to any token, any sign, by which those belonging together, the initiated, might recognize each other. Its derivation from συμβάλλειν, for the purpose of proving that each of the apostles contributed one article to the Apostles' Creed, is absurd. Nor is art symbolism to be taken into account in this connexion. This has its place, but in a different theological department (Liturgy), although but little has been done as yet toward its thorough scientific development. Comp. the section on Archaeology.

Christians from heretics. The ὁμοούσιος of the Nicene symbol served in this way to discriminate the adherents of the Athanasian (orthodox) faith from the Arians.

The Nicene, the so-called Athanasian—the Symb. Quicumque of later date—and the so-called Apostolic Creed, form the three principal symbols of the Church. But when the adherents of the purified doctrines separated from the Roman Catholic Church, in the time of the Reformation, they laid down the doctrines held by them in common, first apologetically, and then polemically, in separate symbolical writings, the Lutherans and the Reformed party each constructing their own, because of deviations from the truth that had taken place—each, however, holding fast to the three leading symbols of the early Church. The differences existing within the above-mentioned parties, together with the controversies that agitated the Protestant Church as a whole, gave rise to still further symbolical divergencies. It was also desired to erect barriers against all intermixture with non-Catholic bodies (Anabaptists, Anti-Trinitarians, Anti-Scripturarians, etc.), with whom the Reformers wished to have nothing in common.

The following are the Lutheran symbols, brought together in 1580 in the Book of Concord: The Conf. Augustana, ^{Lutheran symbols.} 1530, the Apology, 1531, the Articles of Smalcald, 1537, and the Formula Concordiæ, 1579, to which must be added the two Catechisms of Luther, 1528 and 1529. The Reformed Confessions are less sharply distinguished from other theological productions, and less generally received. The more prominent are the Swiss (Conf. Bas. i; Helv. i or Bas. ii, and Helv. ii), Gallic, Belgic, Anglican (xxxix Articles), Scottish, and American, and the Anhalt, Brandenburgian, and Heidelberg Catechisms. To these must be added the Arminian Confession, by the Remonstrants of Holland. It consisted of 26 chapters, and appeared first in 1622.¹

The Roman Catholics, on their part, now saw themselves compelled to present more clearly what was distinctive in their teaching. This was done in the Professio fidei Tridentina and the Catechismus Romanus. The smaller sects and ecclesiastical parties likewise reduced to writing the points at which they diverged from the general belief; e. g., the Anabaptists (Mennonites), Socinians, Quakers, and others, although such writings have, in some instances, simply the authority of private productions. The Socinian Catechismus Racoviensis might deserve to be considered a symbolical book more than any of the others. The idea of confessional writings cannot be entertained in connexion with the Quakers, who make their religious life altogether independent of the letter, even that of the Bible.¹

¹ Comp. Winer (Pope's ed.), Creeds of Christendom, p. 28.

The task of Historical Theology embraces even the origin and fortunes of these books. To whatever extent symbolics is primarily engaged upon this external history, it will coincide with the history of ecclesiastical literature. Or, it might, if not in too detailed a form, be incorporated with Church history, which is necessarily obliged to take notice of the origin of movements of great importance. But the task of symbolics is more extensive. What has been thus far noted partakes more of the nature of introduction, analogous to the introduction to the books of the Bible. To this must be added exegetical investigation, inasmuch as the meaning of these confessional writings is to be ascertained, construed, and explained. But as exegesis leads immediately into Biblical dogmatics as its resultant, so symbolics does not rest satisfied with having explained each particular confession, but passes on to construct, in harmony with the definitions of the several symbolical writings, a system of Roman Catholicism, of Protestantism, of Anabaptism, Socinianism, Quakerism, and the rest. Finally, it proceeds to compare these ecclesiastical systems with the general principles upon which they are based, or with each other, by an examination of particular doctrines which they receive. In the latter function it becomes Comparative dogmatics.² When it goes to the length of taking part directly in favour of some mode of belief, and of defending it, in opposition to other beliefs—a g., the views of Protestantism against those of Roman Catholicism—it becomes Polemics.

Symbolics thus provides the weapons for polemics, and is its historical base. It is related to the history of doctrines as is the knot to the trunk of the tree, or the eddy to the stream. The history of doctrines is obliged to pass through the field of symbolics, and even becomes symbolics to some extent. In the history of doctrines we have made a distinction between the general and the special. Symbolics may similarly be treated in a general way by discussing principles, noting opposite ideas at large; for example, those of Roman Catholicism and of Protestantism, or it may trace the particular differences in separate doctrines. The two methods must be combined. It has been justly observed, however, with reference to the conflict of principles, that the task of symbolics has not been fully accomplished when it has brought into view the existing dogmatic contrasts, since the differences between the several confessions extend also into the domains of ethics, politics, and social life.

¹ The term symbolics is not, therefore, thoroughly appropriate, and can only denote, in instances where no symbols exist, that "the statements are conformed to the most classical and generally acknowledged mode of presenting any particular faith."—Schleiermacher, § 249, note.

² Schleiermacher, § 98, distinguishes between Comparative Dogmatics and Symbolics, but is not wholly decided to recognize either as a science which could well exist independently.

The symbolics of to-day will, accordingly, need to be expanded into a science that shall not only embrace the dogmatic vital tendencies of Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, and, further, those of Lutheranism and Calvinism, of Episcopacy and Puritanism, of the Orthodox and the Schismatic in Protestantism, but also the moral, political, artistic, and scientific factors, bringing the whole together for purposes of comparison, and pointing out how every such confessional feature stands connected with the fundamental dogmatic principle upon which the confession rests.¹ The material for such a science, which would be highly interesting as bearing upon the history of culture as well, but for which the term "symbolics" would no longer be an adequate designation, must be sought in the history of the Reformation, and of later times, down to the present.

HISTORY.

Symbolics, in the broad sense, was already cultivated, in part, in the antiquity of the Church, inasmuch as certain teachers in the Church—like Augustine, On Faith and Symbol, A.D. 393—explained the ecclesiastical symbols. But a "definite recognition of ecclesiastical contrasts was begotten by the Reformation" (Pelt, p. 444). Symbols, strictly speaking, first originated in the Lutheran Church, though the term confessio, which was preferred by the Reformed, was also in use (Confessio Augustana). Upon the basis of this symbolism polemics unfolded itself, Chemnitz, Examen concilii Trid, being on the one side, and Belarmino, De controversiis fidei, on the other; and, likewise, between Lutherans and the Reformed party, Hospinian, Concordia discors, 1607, and Hutter, Concordia concors, 1614. The need of Historical Introductions to the symbolical books was not felt, however, prior to the middle of the 17th century.

This method of discussing simply the history of the books was supplemented in the 18th century by the pragmatic method, the foundation for which was laid by Planck, and which was developed by Marheineke and Winer, the former giving more attention to the general discussion, the latter to the treatment of particular questions (locis). Koellner followed in the footsteps of both these writers with his large work, while Guericke again departed from the position of impartial investigation, and pressed symbolism into the service of his Lutheran proclivities. A presentation of symbolics, from the Roman Catholic point of view, by Möhler (1832), naturally aroused a lively interest for this subject, and called forth a number of works in opposition (by Nitzsch and others), particularly the Symbolics by Baur (1834), and a continued interchange of further writings. This science, which had for a time occupied the position of quiet objectivity, was thus transferred again to the ground of polemics, and called for a renewed treatment in harmony with its principles.

¹ Pelt applies to this the name "Science of Confessional Principles, or Science of the Principles of the Separate Churches," pp. 375 and 444.

The opposition between the Lutheran and the Reformed views, which had at one time sunk into indifference, and had subsequently been compromised by the establishment of the "Union," or, at least, had been reduced to its merely relative importance, has also come into the foreground of late, and been carried to excess. Science has gained thereby, inasmuch as the differences connected with the principles of the Reformers, which had formerly been overlooked, were now more sharply apprehended and more definitely stated. It is to be regretted, however, that the passions and the narrow spirit of the disputants have often perverted the actual points of view, and caused a confusion from which we can hope to be delivered, through God's mercy, only by a cautious theology enlisted in the service of truth and not of a party.

SYMBOLICAL LITERATURE.

LATIN, GERMAN, AND FRENCH.

1. Later Editions of Collections of Symbolical Books.

- H. A. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole und Glaubensregeln der apostolisch-katholischen Kirche. Breslau, 1842. 2d ed., by G. L. Hahn, 1877.
 C. P. Caspari, ungedruckte, unbeachtete u. wenig beachtete Quellen zur Gesch. der Taufsymbols u. der Glaubensregl. Christiania (Lpz.), 1866-79. 4 parts.
 H. Heppe, die Bekenntnisschriften der altprotest. Kirche Deutschlands. Cassel, 1855. (Comp. by the same: der Text der Bergischen Concordienformel verglichen mit dem Text der Schwäb. Concordie, etc. Marb., 1858. 2d ed., 1860.)

a. *Of the Lutheran Church.*¹

- Libri symbolici eccl. evang. rec.*, J. A. H. Tittmann. Misn., 1817-27.
 * Libri symbolici eccl. evang. a. Concordia, rec., C. A. Hase. Lips., 1827. 3d ed., 1845.
Libri symbol. eccl. Luther. ad edit. princ., etc., ed. H. A. G. Meyer. Götting., 1890.

¹ For single editions of the Augsburg Confession, and monographs on the same, especially since the centennial year, 1890, see Winer, Hdb. der Theol. Lit. I, 323 ff.

Libri symbolici eccl. Lutheranae, ed. F. Francke. Ed. ster. Lips., 1846 f.
Die symbol. Bücher der evangel.-luther. Kirche. German and Latin by J. T. Müller.
 Stuttg., 1848. 4th ed., Gütersl., 1876.

Concordia. Ll. symbol. eccl. evang. ad ed. Lips. (a. 1584), Berol., 1857.

b. Of the Reformed Church.¹

Corpus libr. symbol., qui in eccl. reformationum auctoritatem publ. obtinuerunt, ed.
 J. C. W. Augusti. Elberf., 1828. 2d ed., Lips., 1846.

J. J. Mess, Samml. symbol. Bücher der reform. K. Neuwied, 1828-46. 3 vols.

H. A. Niemeyer, collectio confessionum in ecclesiis reformatis publicatorum. Lips.,
 1840. Appendix: Puritanorum ll. symb. (ib. eod.)

Die Bekenntnisschriften der evangel.-reform. Kirche mit Einleit. und Anmerkungen, by E. G. A. Böckel. Lpz., 1847.

* Die Bekenntnisschriften der reform. Kirchen Deutschlands, pub. by H. Heppé, Elberf., 1860. (Schriften zur reform. Theol., vol. i.)

F. W. Bodemann, Sammlung der wichtigsten Bekenntnisschr. der evang. reform.
Kirche mit geschl. Einl. u. Anmerkungen. 2d ed. Gött., 1867.

Single editions of the Helvetic Confession (II) by Kindler (1825), O. F. Fritzsche (1839), Böhl (1866).

c. Of the Roman Catholic Church.

Libri symb. eccl. rom. catholicae, ed. J. T. L. Danz. Weim., 1836.

Libri symbolici eccl. catholicae conjunx. et notis, etc., instruit F. W. Streitwolf et R. E. Klener. Gott., 1836-38. 2 vols.

Sacrosancti et oecumenici Conc. Trid. canones et decreta, ed. W. Smets (Latin and German). Bielef. 5th ed., 1859. Other editions by Bisping (Münst., 1846), Wesselack (German and Latin, from the Roman ed. of 1845. 3d ed., Regensb., 1860).

Canones et decreta Conc. Trid. (from the German ed. of 1834); acced. declarationes, etc., ex bullario Romano, etc. Edd. A. L. Richter et Fr. Schulte. Lips., 1853.

d. Of the Greek Church.

E. J. Kimmel, libri symbolici ecclesiae orientalis. Jena, 1843. Comp. J. G. Pitzipios, l'église orientale. Rome (Lpz.), 1855.

e. Of the Smaller Religious Bodies.

Unitarian Conference: Bibliotheca fratrum Polonorum. Irenop., 1656, 6 vols. f. Confessio fidei christ. (by J. Schlichting), 1642. The larger and smaller Catechismus Racoviensis. Rac., 1605. Also an ed. of the larger by Oeder. Lpz., 1739.

Quakers: R. Barclay, Theologiae vere christianae apologia. Amst., 1676. The same, Catechismus et fidei conf. Roterod., 1676 u. ö.

Mennoniten: H. de Rys u. L. Gerritst, korte belydenisse des geloofs, etc., about 1580.
 H. Schyn, historiae Mennonitarum. Amst., 1729.

Swedenborgians: Swedenborgs göttl. Offenbarungen, translated by J. Tafel (Tüb., 1823 ff. 7 vols.). Also numerous writings by Tafel himself.

2. Introductory Writings.

J. G. Walch, Introductio in libr. symbolice eccl. Lutheranae. Jena, 1732.

¹ Earlier Editions: Harmonia confess. Gen., 1581. 4. and Corpus et Syntagma conf. fidel. Gen., 1612, 1654. For further details on all the symbols of the Swiss Reformed Church, see Hagenbach's krit. Gesch. der ersten Basler Confession (Bas., 1827), and particularly in Escher, the Encycl. of Ersch and Gruber, sec. II, vol. v, p. 223 ff. On the terms "Lutheran" and "Reformed," comp. H. Heppé, Ursprung u. Gesch. der Bezeichnungen "reformirte" und "lutherische" Kirche. Gotha, 1859.

J. S. Semler, Apparatus ad libr. symbolicos eccl. Lutheranae. Halle, 1775.

J. A. Ernesti, praelect. in libr. symbol. eccl. Luther. a. 1752 et 77. Vol. 1, pub. by J. M. Redling. Berl., 1878.

Writings on the apostolic Symbolum: Rudelbach (Lpz., 1844), J. Stockmeyer (Zür., 1845), Vigué (Nîmes, 1864), Nicolas (Par., 1867), Coquerel (Par., 1869), Krawutzky (Bresl., 1872), Semisch (Berl., 1872), Zöckler (Gütersl., 1872), Mücke (1873), Werther (Rathenow, 1875), Swainson (Lond., 1875); above all Caspari (No. 1) and Zeischwitz' Katechetik (Lpz., 1868 ff.).

3. Comparative and Critical Representations of Ecclesiastical Systems.

(Comp. also the Literature on Polemics and Irenics.)

* J. G. Plank, Gesch. der Entstehung, der Veränderungen und der Bildung unsers protestant. Lehrbegriffs, von Anfang der Reform. bis zu der Einführ. der Concordienformel. Lpz., 1781–1800. 6 vols. Vols. 1–3. 2d ed. 1791–98.

— Abriß einer histor. u. vergleich. Darstell. der dogmat. Systeme unserer verschied. christl. Hauptparthien, etc. Gött., 1796. 3d ed., 1822.

* G. B. Winer, comparative Darstell. des Lehrbegriffs der verschied. christl. Kirchenparteien, nebst vollständ. Belegen aus den symbol. Schriften derselben. Lpz., 1824. 4. 3d ed. by E. Preuss. Berl., 1866. English ed. by Pope. Edinb., 1873.

† J. A. Möhler, Symbolik oder Darstell. der dogm. Gegensätze der Katholiken u. Protestanten, nach ihren öffentl. Bekenntnisschriften. Mainz, 1832. 7th ed., 1864.¹ English translation. N. Y., 1844.

H. E. F. Guericke, allgemeine christliche Symbolik, von luth.-kirchl. Standpunkte. Lpz., 1839. 3d ed., 1860 f.

Max Göbel, die relig. Eigenthümlichk. der luth. und d. reform. K. Bonn, 1837.

A. G. Rudelbach, Reformation, Lutherthum u. Union, eine histor.-dogm. Apologie der luther. K. u. ihres Lehrbegriffs. Lpz., 1839.

† B. J. Hilgers, symbolische Theologie oder die Lehrgegensätze des Katholicismus und Protestantismus dargest. und gewürdigt. Bonn., 1841.

† J. Buchmann, Populärsymbolik od. vergleich. Darstell. der Glaubensgegensätze, zwischen Katholiken u. Protestanten. 3d ed. Mainz, 1850. 2 vols.

H. W. J. Thiersch, Vorlesungen über Katholicismus und Protestantismus. Erl., 1845. 2 parts. 2d ed., 1848.

* Dan. Schenkel, das Wesen des Protestantismus, aus den Quellen des Reformationszeitalters dargest. Schaffh., 1846–52. 3 vols. 2d ed., 1862. 2 parts.

Ch. H. Weisse, die Christologie Luthers, etc. 2d ed. Lpz., 1855.

K. B. Hundeshagen, die Konflikte des Zwinglianismus, Lutherthums und Calvinismus in der Bernischen Landeskirche von 1552–58. Bern, 1842.

Merle d'Aubigné, Luther u. Calvin, oder die luth. u. reform. K. in ihrer Verschiedenh. und wesentl. Einheit. German translation by Gottheil Bayr., 1849.

† L. Schmid, der Geist des Katholicismus oder Grundlegung der christlichen Irenik. Giessen, 1848 f. 2 vols.

F. G. Lisco, das christlich-apostol. Glaubebekenntniss; mit Anh. über die Scheidolehren der evangel. und röm.-kathol. Kirche. 4th ed. Berl., 1851.

K. G. W. Theile, das allgem.-christl. und das evangel.-luther. Bekenntniss in urkundl. Darlegung . . . mit Erläuterungen u. Belegen aus der Bibel und den Symbolen. Lpz., 1852.

¹ Comp. K. J. Nitsch, protest. Beantwortung der Symbolik Möhlers in den theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1834 f., auch besonders Hamb., 1835; und F. C. Baur, Gegensatz des Katholic. u. Protestant. (Tüb., 1834), Möhler, in reply, neue Untersuchungen, etc. (Mainz., 1834), answered by Baur in the "Erwiderung," etc. (Tüb., 1834). See also Evang. Kirchenztg. 1834 Nr. 82, 84. 1835 Nr. 1, 37–40, 102–104. 1836 Nr. 8, 9, 20, 21.

- A. Hahn, das Bekenntniß der evangel. Kirche in seinem Verhältniß zu dem der Röm. und Griechischen. Lpz., 1853.
- E. Zeller, das theolog. System Zwingli's. (Theol. Jahrb., 1853.) Tüb., 1853.
- A. H. Baier, Symbolik der christl. Confessionen u. Religionspartheien. 1st vol.: Symbolik der röm.-kath. Kirche. 2 parts. Greifsw., 1853 f.
- F. K. Matthes, comparative Symbolik aller christl. Confessionen vom Standpunkt der evangel.-luth. Confession. Lpz., 1854.
- * A. Schweizer, die protestant. Centraldogmen in ihrer Entwicklung innerhalb der reform. Kirche. Zür., 1854-56. 2 vols.
- * M. Schneckenburger, vergleich. Darstell. des luther. u. reform. Lehrbegriffs, aus dessen handschriftl. Nachlass von E. Güder. Stuttg., 1855. 2 parts.
- H. Heppe, Dogmatik d. deutsch. Protestantismus im 16. Jahrh. Gotha, 1857. 3 vols.
- Rud. Hofmann, Symbolik oder systemat. Darstell. des symbol. Lehrbegriffs der verschied. christl. Kirchen u. namhaften Secten. Lpz., 1857.
- F. H. R. Frank, die Theologie der Concordienformel. Erl., 1862-65. 4 vols.
- * M. Schneckenburger, Vorlesungen über die Lehrbegriffe der kleinern protest. Kirchenparteien, aus dessen handschriftl. Nachlass v. K. B. Hundeshagen. Frankf., 1863.
- * A. Neander, Catholicismus u. Protestantismus, pub. by H. Messner. Berl., 1863.
- K. F. A. Kahnis, über die Principien des Protestantismus. Lpz., 1865.
- G. Plitt, Entstehungsgesch. des evangel. Lehrbegriffs bis zum Augsb. Bekenntniß. Erl., 1868.
- F. W. Bodemann, vergleich. Darstell. der Unterscheidungslehren der vier christl. Haupte confessionen. Gött., 1842. 2d ed., 1869.
- W. Gass, Symbolik der griechischen Kirche. Berl., 1872.
- J. Delitzsch, das Lehrsystem der röm. Kirche dargest. u. beleuchtet. 1st part. Gotha, 1875.
- F. Reiff, der Glaube der Kirchen und Kirchenparteien nach s. Geist u. innern Zusammenhang. Basel, 1875.
- G. Plitt, Grundriss der Symbolik für Vorlesungen. Erl., 1875.
- G. F. Oehler, Lehrb. der Symbolik, pub. by J. Delitzsch. Tüb., 1876.
- K. H. G. Schéele, Theologisch Symbolik. Ups., 1877.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- G. W. Bethune, Expository Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism. 2 vols. N. Y., 1864.
- T. P. Boulton, An Introduction to the Theology of the Church of England, in an Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles. Lond., 1871.
- E. H. Browne, An Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, Historical and Doctrinal. N. Y., 1870.
- G. Burnet, An Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. Oxf., 1805.
- Doctrine (The) of the Church of England, as stated in Ecclesiastical Documents set forth by Authority of Church and State. Lond., 1868.
- E. S. Ffoulkes, The Athanasian Creed. Lond., 1871.
- Bishop A. P. Forbes, A Short Exposition of the Nicene Creed. Lond., 1866.
- An Explanation of the Thirty-nine Articles. Oxf., 1867.
- P. Hall, The Harmony of Protestant Confessions. Lond., 1841.
- C. Hardwick, A History of the Articles of Religion, with Documents, A. D. 1536-1615. Lond., 1859.
- W. W. Harvey, The History and Theology of the Three Creeds. 2 vols. Lond., 1854.
- C. A. Hase, Libri Symbolici Ecclesiæ Evangelicæ, sive Concordia. Lips., 1827.

- C. A. Heurtley, Harmonia Symbolica; a Collection of Creeds belonging to the Ancient Western Church, and to the Mediæval English Church. Oxf., 1858.
- A. A. Hodge, A Commentary on the Confession of Faith. Phila., 1869.
- R. W. Jelf, The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. Lond., 1873.
- C. P. Krauth, The Augsburg Confession. Phila., 1869.
- The Conservative Reformation and its Theology, as represented in the Augsburg Confession, and in the History and Literature of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Phil., 1871.
- J. R. Lumby, The History of the Creeds. Lond., 1873.
- J. Macpherson, The Westminster Confession of Faith; with Introduction and Notes. N. Y., 1881.
- J. H. Newman, Tract Number Ninety. Remarks on certain Passages in the Thirty-nine Articles. N. Y., 1865.
- J. Pearson, An Exposition of the Creed; with an Appendix containing the Principal Greek and Latin Creeds. Lond., 1870.
- T. Rogers, Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles. Lond., 1853.
- P. Schaff, Bibliotheca Symbolica Ecclesiæ Universalis. The Creeds of Christendom, with a History and Critical Notes. N. Y., 1879.
- The Harmony of the Reformed Confessions, as related to the Present State of Evangelical Theology*. N. Y., 1877.
- S. S. Schmucker, Lutheran Manual on Scriptural Principles; or, the Augsburg Confession, Illustrated and Sustained Chiefly by Scriptural Proofs. Phila., 1855.
- J. H. W. Stuckenberg, The History of the Augsburg Confession, from its Origin till the Adoption of the Formula of Concord. Phila., 1869.

SECTION XXII

ARCHÆOLOGY.

While the history of doctrines, in connexion with patristics and symbolics, presents the history of the development of doctrine apart from Church history in general, making of it an object for special consideration, ecclesiastical archæology deals pre-eminently with the history of worship. But the boundaries of this science are as indefinite and changeable as its name is inappropriate.

Gieseler says: "In strictness of language everything that once existed in the Church, and has now become antiquated, would belong to ecclesiastical archæology. But if this principle be admitted, it will not be easy to justify the separate treatment of archæology, as if it were an independent historical science. What scientific reason could be assigned for attempting the historical representation of everything that is ancient in the Church down to the boundary where it touches upon what now exists, but really excluding the latter from such representation? For it is held to be a leading principle in historical science, that it should show how the now existing has been developed out of what once was."¹

¹ Uebersicht d. kirchenhistor. Literatur, in Stud. u. Krit. 1831, No. 3, p. 627 sq.

The case resembles that of patristics. Arbitrary boundaries have been assumed, some extending archæology down to Gregory the Great only, while others continue it to the time of the Reformation. But as patristics must be brought down to the latest times in the form of a history of the literature and a history of theology, so must archæology be carried onward as a history of worship. For the ancient is not entitled to separate treatment simply because it is old, though it will not be denied that, as in patristics, the first six centuries are of special importance as the constructive period, and especially so in liturgical features.¹ By taking archæology out of its connexion with the living development of the Church, and making it an incense-breathing reliquary, we degrade it as a science into a mere hunt for bric-a-brac, and give it an un-Protestant varnish of idle curiosity and favouritism. It becomes instructive and quickening only through its relations to the present, which is obliged, in the interests of both dogmatics and liturgics, to continually draw from the ancient sources, and renew its life at the original beginnings of the Church itself. Archæology, as the history of worship, enters into a relation with the history of Christian art as close as that sustained by the history of doctrines to historical philosophy; and, as the latter prepares the way for dogmatics, so does the former for liturgics.

Certain writers, especially older ones, and Boehmer among them, include the history of constitution in archæology. But it is questionable whether a separate treatment of that branch is needed, or be allowed to quietly retain its place upon the tree of Church history, with which it is intimately united.² It would, at all events, be impracticable to regard the two as forming a single science. The history of worship also sustains an intimate relation with Christian morals, or Christian life itself, in the more independent forms of its manifestation. Each is largely involved with the other; for example, the history of asceticism, of fasting, and of feasts, the Church feasts being likewise popular festivals. It is difficult to indicate the boundaries at this point, and the historian will be obliged to depend upon a certain tact to preserve him from wandering away into foreign matters.¹

¹ Comp. Schleiermacher, §§ 168-70; Danz, § 70; Rosenkranz, p. 221, and Guericke in Herzog, Encykl. s. v.

² Rheinwald's definition, according to which Christian archæology is "the representation of the entire life of the Church, in the course of its development and according to its results," is evidently too broad, since it would include the history of doctrines also in archæology. Compare, for a contrary view, Boehmer, who, however, holds to the boundary of the first six centuries.

HISTORY.

The history of archæology depends upon the history of worship itself. In the same measure as the latter rose from its original simplicity to an artistic representation under various forms, has it offered material for antiquarian research. The simple collecting of the material from the appropriate sources, as ancient liturgies, Acts of Councils, and Papal decretals, was all that was undertaken at first; for example, in the Roman Catholic Church, by J. Bapt. Casalius (Christianorum ritus veteres, 1645), who was joined by Cardinal Bona (died 1694), Claude Fleury (1682), Martène (died 1739), Th. Maria Mamachi (1749–55), and Selvaggio (1787–90). In the Protestant Church the initiative was taken, certainly not as the result of accident, by the Anglicans, and first of all by Joseph Bingham (died 1723), in the Origines Ecclesiasticæ (Antiquities of the Christian Church, 1708–26), whose work was translated into Latin by J. H. Grischow, Halle ed., 1724–38, and again in 1751–61 (10 vols. 4to). The best English edition is by Pitman, London, 1840, 9 vols. 8vo. He was followed, among Germans, by J. A. Quenstedt (Antiqu. Bibl. et Eccles., Vit., 1699) and Hildebrand at Helmstedt (died 1691), who published a series of dissertations. G. A. Spangenberg's Comp. Ant. Eccles. was published by G. Walch, Lips., 1733, and upon this followed S. J. Baumgarten, Simonis, and others.

SECTION XXIII.

STATISTICS.

Comp. Schleiermacher, §§ 95, 223 sq.; Hagenbach's article on Statistics, in Herzog's Encyclopædia; Schem, American Ecclesiastical Year-Book, New York, 1860. Dorchester, Problem of Religious Progress, New York, 1861.

All history, on arriving at the present time, expands into statistics, which has to do with conditions instead of events. Ecclesiastical statistics, accordingly, deals only with ecclesiastical conditions. It is possible, however, to secure resting-places in the past, also, from which to conduct a statistical review. On the other hand, the germs of a further historical development lie in the conditions of the present. The contrast between history and statistics must, for this reason, be considered a flexible distinction,

¹ The History of Morals must be distinguished from the History of Ethics, in the same way as the History of Dogmatics is distinguished from the History of Doctrines, the History of Liturgics from the History of Worship, and that of Ecclesiastical Jurisprudence from that of Constitution. All of these are simply departments of the History of the Theological Sciences.

"Statistics," says Schlözer, "is history at a standstill;" but this is not a real pause, and what has been at this moment treated as statistics will in a few years belong to history. The historical presentation itself is obliged to furnish statistical information respecting the age of which it treats, thus interrupting the progress of the narrative, and changing the past into the present. It is not possible, however, to furnish such reviews with equal facility at all times, the periods of general confusion being especially unfavourable to such inquiry, while the times immediately before and afterward are eminently suitable. This may be seen, for example, in the state of the world immediately before the introduction of Christianity, or the condition of the Church before the Reformation, or in the time of Charlemagne, Gregory VII., or Innocent III. The most favourable point for a statistical review is always where an old period ends and a new one begins. The statistics of the present, or statistics in the proper sense, includes, like the history, the whole of the kingdom of God in its earthly manifestation—the outward state of Christianity in its spread; its geographical extension, or the statistics of missions; and the constitution, worship, customs, and teaching of the Church.

Statistics of doctrine may either content itself with simply stating the prevalent confessions and tendencies of belief, as is usual with works of this character—numerical strength of the Roman Catholic population of a country, of the Lutheran, and others—or it may draft a somewhat detailed description of the existing state of doctrine. For it really is what Schleiermacher calls it, though it is but outwardly so, "a description of the teaching accepted in modern times." Statistics generally deals most largely with ecclesiastical constitutions—because this element is more easily grasped and understood than others—and also with the worship. The most difficult feature to include in a description is the life itself, with all its shadings and gradations; and for this work, as for the narrating of historical events, the skill of the artist will be required. The groupings may be arranged to correspond with different points of view; for example, by countries, confessions, forms of doctrine, constitution, worship, and their factors. Each method has its advantages and disadvantages,¹ and it will be advisable to combine different systems in the execution of this work. The best source for statistics is, beyond question, personal study and observation, which here

History must furnish statistics.

Statistical and ecclesiastical constitutions.

Best source for Statistics.

¹ See Pelt, p. 363 sq., and the combination proposed in that place: "Much remains to be accomplished by special effort in this department, with reference to both the material and the form.—Schleiermacher, § 245.

possibly may assure us to some extent, but is absolutely denied to us in history. Exact observation, however, is possible only when based on the facts of history down to the present time; and the testimonies of contemporaneous authorities are largely needed with regard to existing facts. Suitable helps, in addition to works of a properly statistical character, may be found in official reports, descriptions of travels, especially when written by persons who travel in the interests of ecclesiastical affairs, and ecclesiastical periodicals and newspapers.

The student of theology will, of course, need to become acquainted with such matters. He is required to comprehend the time in which he lives, and to enter with all his abilities and sympathies into its progress. But the nequid nimis has its application to his case. In the absence of a thorough historical preparation, and of the historic sense, the only attainment likely to be reached will be a limited knowledge instead of thoroughness. For nothing is more dissipating and destructive of thoroughness than an exclusive reading of newspapers and journals; and the temptation to employ the shallow books reading of travels simply as a pastime is likewise an imminent danger. A shallow literature, of the tourist and journalistic type, has, unfortunately, deluged all lands, and it affords nothing but superficial reasonings. Beware of it! Fortunate is the youth who has a paternal friend at hand, to impart counsel and aid in interpreting the signs of the times!

1. Statistical Textbooks.

- C. F. Stäudlin, kirchliche Geographie und Statistik. Tüb., 1804. 2 vols.
 J. Ch. W. Augusti, Beiträge zur Geschichte und Statistik der evangel. Kirche. Lpz., 1837-38.
 J. Wiggers, kirchl. Statistik oder Darstellung der gesammten christl. kirche nach ihrem gegenwärt. äussern und inneren Zustande. Hamb., 1842 f. 2 vols.
 J. E. Th. Wiltsh, Handb. der kirchl. Geographie und Statistik von den Zeiten der Apostel bis zu dem Anfang des 16. Jahrh. Berl., 1846. 2 vols.
 St. J. Neher, kirchl. Geogr. u. Stat. Regensb., 1864.
 A. de Mestral, tableau de l'église chrét. au 18. siècle. Laus., 1870.
 C. J. Böttcher, Germania sacra. Ein topograph. Führer durch die Kirchen- u. Schulgesch. deutscher Lande. Lpz., 1874 f.

Statistics of the Catholic Church:

- † Statistisches Jahrb. der Kirche, oder gegenwärt. Bestand des gesammten kathol. Erdkreises, by P. Karl. Regensb., 1860.
 † J. Silbernagl, Verfassung u. gegenwärt. Bestand sämmtl. Kirchen des Orients. Landsh., 1865.

Protestant Church of the Present Time:

- D. Schenkel, die gegenwärtige Lage der protestant. Kirche in Preussen u. Deutschland. Mannh., 1867.
 H. Kritzler, die deutsche evangelische Kirche in der Gegenwart. Gotha, 1869.

2. Ecclesiastical Travels.

- A. H. Niemeyer, Beobachtungen auf Reisen in und ausser Deutschland. Halle, 1820-26. 5 vols.
- F. F. Fleck, wissenschaftliche Reise durch das südliche Deutschland, Italien, Sicilien, u. Frankreich. Lpz., 1835-38. 2 vols. in 5 parts.
- Th. Fliedner, Collektenreise nach Holland und England, nebst einer ausführl. Darstellung des Kirchen-, Schul-, Armen- und Gefängniswesens beider Länder. Essen, 1831. 2 vols. (Only embraces Holland.)
- Th. F. Kniewel, Reiseskizzen, vornehmlich aus dem Heerlager der Kirche; gesammelt auf einer Reise in England, Frankreich, Belgien, Schweiz, Oberitalien, Deutschland im Jahr 1842. Lpz., 1844. 2 vols.

CHAPTER III.

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

SECTION I.

Comp. Schleiermacher, § 199; von der Goltz, Der Weg zum Systeme der dogmatischen Theologie, in Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie iv, p. 679 sqq.

Henry B. Smith, Analysis and Proof Texts of Julius Müller's System of Theology (translation of) in Amer. Presb. and Theol. Review. New York, 1865. The same author's Introduction to Christian Theology, (edited by W. S. Karr), New York, 1863.

Systematic Theology is the scientific and connected presentation of Christian doctrine in its relation to both faith and morals. Formerly it was regarded and treated as a single science of Christian teaching. But latterly, since the time of Danæus and Calixtus, it has been divided into two distinct branches. These, however, should be regarded as simply different sides of that same life which manifests itself in faith and morals, and whose various qualities are in constant relation with each other.

We have observed, in a former connexion, that Christianity was not, at the outset, an organized and self-inclusive body of doctrines. But this does not necessitate the conclusion that Christianity was not destined to unfold into a system of doctrine at some future time. The pre-requisites for such a consummation existed from the first, and a sound development of its teaching could only lead to the analysis of its contents, and to their comprehension under a single idea. A relative distinction may be established between the several doctrinal conceptions of John, Paul, and other apostles. But the respective systems are simply members of the great organism of the developed Christian teaching as a whole. There is no cessation in the development of doctrine. Where an apparent pause is observed, there is danger of stagnation and petrification. But there are single stages in the history, at which the dogmatic consciousness of the Church appears in a more assured light, and where the unfolding arrives at a relative conclusion. These are the times of symbols and of the greatest dogmatical writings, in which the belief of an entire age, or at least of an ecclesiastical party, or a school, is reflected.

It thus becomes proper to speak of Lutheran, Reformed, or Roman Catholic dogmatics, whose results may be brought into the light of objective history. Such objective description has also been denominated Ecclesiastical Dogmatics, in distinction from Biblical Dogmatics. But neither the latter nor the former is dogmatics in the strictest sense.¹ Both are merely introductory in their character; and ecclesiastical dogmatics results from symbolism, and is a further historical basis for dogmatics proper, just as biblical dogmatics results from biblical exegesis, and is the basis for the history of doctrines. The object of dogmatics proper is not simply to record historical matter, but also to express the conviction entertained by the writer who presents the system to our notice in word and print.²

It is, therefore, for adequate reasons that systematic theology is taken from the soil of history, into which it has struck its roots, and is made a separate branch of study,³ the very centre of the theological sanctuary and the heart of theological life. It takes the exegetical and historical material, and out of it constructs for the

¹ Dogmatics should always be ecclesiastical; that is, be linked to the Church to which it owes its birth. But we understand by ecclesiastical what has been ecclesiastically fixed and authorized, the symbolically statutory, or, as it has been termed, the socially established. See J. P. Lange, Christl. Dogm., i. The attempt has been made, of late, to limit the term dogmatics to this statutory, symbolical, and traditional branch, while the German phrase "Glaubenslehre"—System of the Faith—has been applied, as alone appropriate, to what we would characterize as dogmatics proper. This is done, for example, by Alex. Schweizer, who, in his Christliche Glaubenslehre, follows in the track of Rothe. But it is impossible to understand, in view of the elastic meaning of the word δόγμα, why the term dogmas may not be used with reference to the theology of the present day. This usage is further recommended by the ease with which the adjective "dogmatic," and the verb "to dogmatize," may be formed from the noun. Comp. Krauss on 1 Cor. xv, pp. v and vi. Von der Goltz (ubi supra, p. 688) likewise declares that he is unable to attach the importance to the difference between dogmatics and the term advanced by Schweizer which that writer urges, and continues: "The mere stating of the doctrines held by the fathers is no dogmatics, but a cross section taken from the history of doctrines."

² Qualified, of course, by the feature that such personal conviction claims to have discovered the true expression of ideas that now live in the Church, and have earned the right to make themselves heard. Only upon this ground does the work deserve the name of dogmatics. The mere statement of subjective views, sometimes having no reference to the Church, and even designed to antagonize the Church, and break down its teaching, reducing it to a mere zero, deserves to pass by any other name rather than that of dogmatics, or a system of the faith.

³ Lücke, Stud. u. Krit., 1834, No. 4, p. 775: "I am of the opinion that the scientific interest which gives birth to systematic theology is predominantly unlike the historical, even though it include the critical element. It is simply the systematic, and not merely the subordinate, interest, in an orderly arrangement of a given historical material, but at the same time a desire to state scientifically the doctrines of Christian present time that doctrine which, in its turn, yields the governing principles for practical theology. In this work it may also appropriate to itself the name of theology, κατ' ἐξόχην.

Christian doctrine is not, however, simply a doctrine of the faith, in the sense that the faith is merely turned in the direction of religious perception and apprehension. But it is, to an equal extent, ethical doctrine, or, more precisely, a doctrine of the life. Disposition and the life are embraced as one under Christianity. It preaches both faith and repentance, —a change of disposition—and its thoroughly practical character even causes the regeneration of the soul to be of primary importance, while thought upon it, or reflection, has but a derived value. Christianity is, first of all, a religion, and not a theology. While it has been observed that religion, in its essence, is neither a form of knowledge nor of action, though it necessarily leads to both, it follows that the doctrinal system of a religion will need to develop in the two directions of knowing and doing. This is generally conceded with reference to the practical department. It would not be desired that either the doctrinal or the moral element should be wanting in a catechism of Christian teaching. The same is true of those sermons in which the two factors of doctrine and ethics are presented in combination. These, as in the case of Wesley and Dwight, are justly regarded as superior to homiletical literature in general.

The question is, however, whether the same rule shall apply in the scientific field as well. At the first, while the science itself was being developed out of the practical elements at hand, the two features were interwoven with each other. We see an illustration of this in Augustine's Christian Doctrine. The dogmatic interest, however, has, upon the whole, always overbalanced the ethical in religious controversies. The Reformation seemed to spring primarily from moral, not directly doctrinal, causes. But a change of relations soon took place, which resulted in the attaching of greater weight to the definition of doctrinal points. It might be said that attention was, with entire propriety, directed chiefly to the settling of the truths belonging to the faith, since works spring from faith. But the faulty faith and action with absolute truthfulness, in such a way that all doubt and opposition, and all want of congruity in Christian thought, may be removed. This is wholly unlike the historical object." Lange, p. 49: "The importance of dogmatics is materially obscured when it is treated, as it was by Schleiermacher, simply as a branch of historical theology. The immediate object of historical theology is to make dogmatics possible, but not to absorb it."

principle consisted in this fact, that the faith was too little apprehended from the dynamical, and too greatly from the merely theoretical, side, the apprehending of the faith being confounded with tendencies of belief, and the understanding of the faith with its power. In this way, Christian ethics long failed to receive just treatment. It was a mere tenant on the premises of dogmatics, sparingly introduced in connexion with the teaching of the divine law; and a practical application (usus practicus) was appended to the several dogmas as occasion might require. It is not strange, therefore, that Calixtus should fall upon the idea of emancipating ethics from dogmatics, and assigning to it a separate field.¹

But the idea of emancipation should never have been entertained. Christian ethics must ever be grounded, and at home, in Christian dogmatics, if it is not to renounce the Christian character, and degenerate into a general or philosophical morality. The latter event actually came to pass; and there was even a time when morality spread itself over the practical field so broadly that dogmatics was shrivelled into a narrow extract. The separation of the two became an error as soon as it extended to principles, and assumed an internal independence of ethics from dogmatics. In this regard the recalling to mind of their original unity and connexion has been of advantage. It is a different question, however, whether their fusion into a single science must be the result. Science must often separate elements which are combined in life, and theology may distinguish between dogmatics and ethics with the same propriety as philosophy discriminates between the philosophy of religion and ethics. The one has to do with things to be believed, the other with things to be done. The one moves upon the ground of conception and recognition, the other upon that of modes of disposition and conduct based upon such recognition. In other words, "Dogmatics represents life in its transcendent relations to God, the eternal basis of its being; ethics according to its immanent relation to the world of man. Dogmatics regards it in its specifically ecclesiastical character, ethics in its general human character. Dogmatics describes the organ, ethics indicates the tasks that await its energy. Dogmatics teaches how man derives his Christian life from God, ethics how he is to give proof of it in the world of men, by human methods and in that exercise of incarnated power which we call virtue."² The reference of the one to the other should, therefore, never be forgotten, and a really Christian dogmatics will always guide into morality, while Christian ethics will point back to dogmatics.

¹ The Reformed theologian Danæus attempted this even earlier than Calixtus. Comp. Nitzsch, ubi supra.

² Lange, ubi supra, pp. 46, 47.

It may be noted, moreover, that Schleiermacher already deemed it "desirable that the undivided treatment should be employed from time to time,"¹ and this desire has been responded to in recent times by two theologians, Nitzsch and Beck, although in diverse ways.² The method has also been tried, finally, by Rothe, of including the substance of the doctrines of belief in ethics as being, in effect, the determining influence of the latter, and of regarding only the historical residuum as dogmatics.³ But it is not to be supposed that the usage has been thereby settled for all time.

¹ Schleiermacher, § 231. J. C. v. Hofmann allows no other excuse for the separation of dogmatics from ethics than that of convenience. "Both branches have been at times considered historical, and at other times systematic, or dogmatics has been assigned to historical theology, while a special treatment has been demanded for ethics. The writer who distinguishes between the science of the kingdom of God in itself and the science of its actualization in man, or who designates dogmatics a history of the dealings of the redeeming God in their development, and ethics a history of development in the men redeemed by him, will be compelled to treat the same material twice, wholly or in part, and this without any appreciable profit, but simply from different points of view. For it is impossible to describe God's dealings with man without discussing at the same time man's action toward God, or to describe the attitude of the Christian without preceding the description with a direct or implied reference to the attitude of God, to which the former corresponds. If the relation sustained by God be presumed, it is admitted that ethics is simply the part of a greater whole. If it be stated, ethics is thereby made such a part, nothing remains but the admission that Christian ethics, as the science relating to Christian conduct—not that of men in general—toward God, is indeed a separable, but not for that reason an independent, part of the one body of teachings which has its origin in the publication of that relation existing between God and man which has been established through the mediation of Christ."—Schriftbeweis i, pp. 14, 15.

² Nitzsch, System der Lehre für akadem. Vorlesungen. Bonn, 1829, 6th ed., 1851. Tob. Beck, Einl. in d. System der christl. Lehre, oder propädeutische Entwicklung der christl. Lehrwissenschaft, Stuttgart, 1838. Die christl. Lehrwissenschaft nach den bibl. Urkunden, Stuttgart, 1840.

³ Theol. Ethik i, p. 38. In opposition see Lange, supra, p. 49, and Julius Müller in Herzog's Encykl. iii, p. 439, and also Dörner in ibid. iv, p. 187: "Dogmatics and ethics are as certainly separate departments as God and man are really different from each other. . . . Dogmatics is engaged upon the being, thoughts, and actions of God, which . . . have for their object an ethical world; Christian ethics has to do with the good that comes into actual being in the form of man's free-will, and under the actualized purpose of the love of God." Comp. also Schenkel's Dogmatik i, p. 13.

SECTION II

DOGMATICS.

Baumgarten-Crusius, Einleitung in das Studium der Dogmatik, Lps., 1820; F. Fischer, zur Einleitung in die Dogmatik der evangelisch-protestantischen Kirche, Tüb., 1898; Mynster, über den Begriff der christlichen Dogmatik (theol. Stud. u. Krit., Jahrg., 1831, No. 8); Rust, Rede über christliche Dogmatik, Frankf., 1830; Kling, über die Gestalt der evangel. Dogmatik (Tüb., theol. Zeitschrift, 1834, 4); F. H. Th. Alhn, Einl. in das Studium der Dogmatik nach den Ergebnissen der neuesten wissenschaftl. Forschungen, Lps., 1837; Beck a. a. O. J. P. Lange, christl. Dogmatik, 1st part, Heidelb., 1849; Th. A. Liebner, introductio in dogmaticam christianam, Lips., 1854; J. Müller, in Herzog's Realencykl. III, p. 438 f.; Rothe, Begriff der evangelischen Dogmatik (Zur Dogmatik I.); Wiedermann, christl. Dogmatik. Einl., pt 1-20; Von der Goltz, ubi supra, and his Dogmatik, mentioned below.

The best English and American treatment of Introductory Systematic Theology is found at the beginnings of the works, and not in separate volumes. For the older works, see Lowndes, The British Librarian, pp. 682-814. Hodge and Van Oosterzee, of later writers, furnish the best introductory discussion.

Christian Dogmatics forms the central point of all theology. The reason is, that the results obtained by exegetical and historical inquiry, in so far as they touch upon the Christian faith, are wrought over, and impressed upon, the consciousness of the present time, and are combined into that scientific whole from which the principles underlying ethics and practical theology are to be deduced. Dogmatics is neither a mere philosophy of religion nor a mere history of doctrines, but a science including both historical and philosophical elements. It is the science which Dogmatics defined.

presents to our notice the material obtained by exegesis and history in an organized and systematic form, representing the sum of the truths of the Christian faith in organic connexion with the facts of the religious consciousness. It, therefore, demands preparatory training in exegesis and history, as well as in philosophy.

What has been said of systematic theology in general applies more especially to dogmatics, as constituting the centre of gravity in this matter. For ethics, which is connected with it, depends upon it in the last analysis. Hence Augusti is justified in the remark, that the old and generally adopted usage, which conceives dogmatics and theology as being synonymes, is evidence of the high importance which has always been attached to this first of all the departments of theology.¹ It is, to use Lange's expression, "in a specific sense the theology of the Church." But there is, nevertheless, no universal agreement respecting the extent and importance of this science, some regarding it as being simply historical in its nature, and others making it merely philosophical or speculative. Again, they who admit that it combines within itself both historical and philosophical elements, yet differ greatly with regard to the relations sustained by the one to the other.

¹ System der christl. Dogmatik, § 1.

The reducing of dogmatics to a mere historical science may grow out of various fundamental views. Those make a great mistake who regard the system of doctrines as completed once for all, for they confine dogmatics within the boundaries of the past. This is precisely the view of the sceptic, who seeks to degrade it into a mere old history, whose highest usefulness consists in its walking behind, and bearing the train, very easily dispensed with, of the wisdom of our own time. There was no lack of opinions of the latter sort during the last century, and a number of dogmatical works dating from the present century, such as those of Bretschneider and Wegscheider, are filled with unmodified historical matter. Tzschirner took the ground of simple statement, without entering upon any direct discussion.

There is, however, still another historical view of dogmatics, which at least grows out of a living apprehension of history, and therefore demands intellectual mediation between the past and the present. This view is represented by Herder,¹ and especially by Schleiermacher, who, in point of fact, steps out from the past altogether, and makes of dogmatics, as he would of statistics, a science of the present as historically conditioned, since he conceives it to be "the science of the combination of doctrine which prevails in a Christian ecclesiastical community at a given time."²

¹ Von Religion, Lehrmeinungen und Gebräuchen, § 37: "Dogmatics, even on the conception which underlies its name, is simply a history of doctrines. How beneficial is it to carry forward every dogma to its limits, philologically, historically, philosophically!" Though Röhr, in his Briefe üb. Rationalismus, announced the expectation that the time will come when our dogmatics shall appear only in the character of a history of doctrines, and appealed for justification to the progress made by the spirit of inquiry among theologians since Socinus and Herbert of Cherbury, there seemed to be but little hope that the prophecy would be fulfilled. A certificate of death has, however, been issued in behalf of dogmatics from a different quarter, and in a different connexion, it being characterized as the "science of Church doctrines," in distinction from doctrines of the faith. (Page 39.) Schweizer says: "The dogmatics of former times has been superseded by the doctrinal system of the evangelical Protestant faith, which, having been contained in the former in a very subordinate and restricted character, has thrown off its dogmatic fetters, and become the system of faith in each separate state of development in the Evangelical Church." But this language is connected with the usus linguae referred to above. The wild cry, "No more dogmatics!" which has been uttered in certain writings of a partisan character, can only impose upon persons who have no sympathy with anything that has been historically developed. We are able, on the other hand, to agree with Biedermann, who asserts (p. 17) that "the science of mere ecclesiastical doctrines must be overcome by a true science of the Protestant faith." Upon this point he remarks, however, that this cannot be accomplished by simply declaring that dogmatics is such a science of traditional doctrine

² Darstellung, §§ 97, 196 sqq.; Der christliche Glaube, vol. I, p. 1.

With reference to this definition, the question has been properly asked, what is to be understood by "prevalent"? Schleiermacher responds, "That form of doctrine is prevalent which is employed in public transactions as representing the common piety,"¹ or that "which is officially asserted and made known, without calling forth official contradiction."² Upon this point he is obliged to concede, however, that "the boundaries must be extended or narrowed as time and circumstances may require." Since this definition requires that not what was formerly accepted should be pre-Objections to Schleiermacher's definition.
 sented, but what now prevails, it removes dogmatics to some extent from the strictly historical field. But Schleiermacher proceeds further still. He demands that dogmatics should not state the views of others simply, but also the personal views of the writer, and even ascribes to it a kind of sagacity that will detect the truth, since he defines its task to be the "purifying and perfecting of the doctrine."³ Further, he insists upon the application of critical processes, which, of course, applies also to history. He thereby elevates dogmatics into a science which is directed toward the future, and which teaches, to an equal degree, what must be accepted in the future, and what is authoritative now, or has been so in the past. By this method dogmatics is evidently lifted out from the framework of historical theology, and it is for this very reason that adherents of the school of Schleiermacher, and some other writers as well, have raised objections that are not wholly unfounded against its incorporation with that branch.⁴

¹ Der christl. Glaube, vol. i, p. 1.

² Darstellung, § 16, note.

³ Christl. Glaube, vol. i, p. 130. Schleiermacher speaks with especial clearness in opposition to a mere empirically historical view respecting dogmatics and ethics, p. 9: "We may, at all events, insist that every representation of Christian doctrine is historical, but it may not on that account cease to be systematic; and, on the other hand, while every one is systematic, it must be not only systematic, but in every instance also historical and systematic."

⁴ Comp. the extract from Lücke, p. 721 of MS. Von der Goltz says, in a similar spirit: "If the designation of dogmatics as a historical department is designed to specify simply that it is not merely a speculative construction of Christianity, but that it is the positive truth of the Christian faith as the common possession of the Church, with its internal combinations wrought into intelligible form, there can be no objection to the idea. But the designation 'historical' is nevertheless misleading. Its originator, Schleiermacher, adds to it the feature that systematic theology is only to present the historically given matter, without laying claim to the right of presenting authoritative truth. This is an error. Dogmatics has always striven to report not only what the Church teaches, or has taught, but what it should teach. Dogmatics aims to furnish authoritatively what constitutes the normal statement of the truth in

It does not follow that the historical character of dogmatics is thereby denied. This is in any case to be retained, unless dogmatics is to become equivalent to the philosophy of religion. The material of dogmatics is certainly historical, but it is required to pass through the philosophical process of reflection. Dogmatics has to do not simply with the abstract religious consciousness, but with the consciousness of the Church, and with revelations addressed by God to man which have been historically transmitted. It is only necessary that the divine, in so far as it may be apprehended by the human mind, be cognized with human certainty, and be received into the scientific consciousness of the present. In this way scientific knowledge and systematic philosophical thought will interpenetrate each other in the treatment of the system of belief. "A reference of religion in itself to religion, as it appears in Christianity and in the manifestation of the latter through the evangelical Church, is established," as Hase correctly shows.¹ In his later editions he presents the idea with greater definiteness, "of the relation of the Christian religion in itself to the religious spirit."² Schenkel likewise holds that, the domain of Christian belief. This is in harmony with the proper meaning of the word dogma; for dogma is an established term, attested by the Church, to designate a truth belonging to the Christian faith."

Dogmatics to pass through reflection.

¹ Evangel. Dogmatik, I, § 2. The definition of De Wette (Dogm., I, § 60) may be made to agree with that of Hase: "The representing of Christianity as related to the culture of an age is dogmatics." Other definitions are very obscure, e. g., those of Reinhard, Wegscheider, and Tzschirner, that of the latter being: "Dogmatics is the science of the Christian belief, or the scientific presentation of the doctrine of God and divine things contained in Christianity." Biedermann teaches, that dogmatics is both a positive and a speculative science (but observe not a "mixture of both"!); while Rothe terms speculative dogmatics a "wooden iron." It is evident that much confusion respecting the scientific nomenclature still prevails upon this point.

² The 5th ed., for instance, says, "Dogmatics is the systematic presentation of the Christian religion in so far as it has taken definite shape in the form of dogmas, and as it stands related to the religious spirit." Comp. § 11 (in the older editions): "As philosophical dogmatics, when not connected with historical references, is a mere abstraction, so the historical presentation of biblical, ecclesiastical, and comparative-symbolical dogmatics can only become actual science by its union with philosophical dogmatics—a science which embraces the consciousness of Christianity in its primitive form, the self-consciousness of the Church, and a comprehension of the different forms in which the Christian spirit, affected by human errors, has found expression. While each of these is, in its own way, important, it is yet but an isolated view of Christianity, for whose complete recognition dogmatics is required, which apprehends the Christian faith in the whole of its development, and teaches how to become acquainted with the nature of the religious spirit." The recent Protestantism of France, contrasting with the former abstract view of dogmatics, likewise recognizes the co-operation of various factors in it—the religious, the historical, and the scientific. Comp. the pamphlet, M. Scherer, ses disciples et ses adversaires, Par., 1854, p. 3.

"Christian dogmatics is the scientifically connected presentation of the saving truths of Christianity, as founded upon personal convictions, and as historically conditioned in the form of the common consciousness of Christians."¹ It follows that a genuine dogmatist must receive into himself all the stages of theological culture, and not only control the entire field of theological knowledge intellectually, but also demonstrate with his personal character that he represents the Church in his teaching, and that the consciousness of Christians generally finds a living and concrete illustration in his own—the highest duty assigned to the theologian! He must be firmly grounded on the basis of the word of God in the Scriptures, but have at the same time taken into himself the entire progress of the history of doctrines, have wrought out all contrasts, have reduced every thing to clearness and certainty in his own consciousness, and be able to render to himself an account of the internal and external character of every doctrine. The human spirit, with its capacities for religion, and its needs and strivings, must, as well as the Scriptures, with their profound teachings, be open to his eyes. He must be acquainted with the present and with the past, and he must make use of both to carry forward the development for future times and the preparation for new developments;² "following the age, but not subservient to it."³

Necessity of a pure and well endowed personal character.

SECTION III.

APOLOGETICS AND ITS RELATION TO DOGMATICS.

Schleiermacher, § 39-42. Comp. the article by Heubner, in Ersch und Gruber's Encyklop., vol. 4; Schmid, über christl. Apologetik, in the antagonistic serial on Theol. und Philos., 1829; *Lechler, über den Begriff der Apologetik, ein histor. Beitrag zur Bestimmung der Ausgabe, Methode und Stellung dieser Wissenschaft, in the Stud. u. Krit., 1839; Hänel, die Apologetik als die Wissenschaft von dem der Kirche und der Theologie gemeinsamen Grunde, in the Stud. u. Krit., 1843; J. Hirzel, über die christl. Apologetik, (Vortrag an die Züricher Synode.) Zürich, 1843; Kienlen, die Stellung der Apologetik und der Polemik in der theologischen Encyklop. (Stud. u. Krit., 1846.) See Hagenbach's article in Herzog's Realencykl., I.

Hetherington, Apologetics of the Christian Faith, N. Y., 1837.

The presentation of the Christian faith presumes the truth of that faith as a whole, or regards the fact of Christianity as a divine fact. It is the office of science, however, to justify that presumption to the religious sense. Hence, apologetical investigation must precede the purely dogmatical. In its formal aspect, apologetics, like dogmatics, is a philosophical and historical science, for its proofs are drawn both from within and without—from reason and conscience, and from history. With regard to its contents, the relation it sustains toward dogmatics is that of elemental and constitutive to the systematically developed, or of the keynote to its scale. It is, accordingly, possible to separate the two branches from each other, yet not absolutely, but only relatively.

¹ Christliche Dogmatik, p. 1.

² Hase distinguishes five functions of the dogmatist: first, the philosophical unfolding of the religious belief; second, historico-critical apprehension; third, systematic arrangement; fourth, ascertaining and estimating its religious value; fifth, organic further development of the Christian system.

³ Kling, ubi supra, p. 11.

Schleiermacher, who assigns dogmatics to the department of historical theology, has, nevertheless, erected a separate department of philosophical theology, and given it the first place. It is subdivided into apologetics and polemics. Hence these branches thus come to occupy the position of outposts, though in a somewhat lost and isolated state, being far removed from the main body of theological forces, and separated by the interposition of other departments, such as exegesis and Church history; we, therefore, consider it advisable to call in these outposts and incorporate them with the main body. They are certainly included in dogmatics, and constitute the organs through whose exercise it makes itself understood by outside observers. The life of dogmatics beats in them; they constitute the two poles at which the electric flash that passes through dogmatics is discharged both positively and negatively. At every step taken by the system of Christian belief it is obliged to defend its just claim to be so regarded against the attacks of unbelief, and it is also obliged to assert its determinate character as a particular form of belief, as the Protestant, in distinction from other similar beliefs, such as the Roman Catholic.¹ Dogmatics itself thus adopts the apologetical mode of procedure at one time, and the polemical at another, in its teaching, provided the latter has a living aim. It becomes apologetic when it purposes to bring into prominence, in connexion with the statement of every doctrine, the underlying principle of Christianity as radically different from every other religion, and thus to fasten the conviction that Christianity, as a whole, is true and divine by opening up to view each separate element. It is polemical in so far as it rejects all that is improper or that obscures, defaces, or works injury to the dogma, and as it protects the view held by the Church against the non-ecclesiastical and pseudo-churchly ideas which may exist.

¹ The apologetic or the polemical interest will predominate at different times. The latter was uppermost in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; while dogmatics, without a persistently apologetic character, is inconceivable at the present day, though the newly awakened strife of confessions has considerably repressed quiet and unprejudiced apologetic expositions. Ullmann, in his Preface to the 6th German edition of his Sinlessness of Jesus, p. v, justly complains that "many contemporaries, even of the younger class, are so involved in the formulas of ready finished doctrines, whether framed in the interests of belief or unbelief, as to reject every attempt to establish the faith at the outset; in the one case because they will not think of an authentication that must be constantly renewed, in the other because they refuse to know the faith itself."

This does not forbid the separate treatment of apologetics and polemics.¹ The former, especially, has established its right to such treatment. But it must not be allowed to remove to a distance from dogmatics. On the contrary, "while defending the ground" of the latter,² it must go before it and prepare the way, as the Baptist before Christ, either by way of introduction to dogmatics, or independently. It will in either case act in the service of dogmatics, and with reference to its needs.

Apologetics an introduction to dogmatics.

The leading place at the head of dogmatics must, accordingly, be given to apologetics, though not the first place in the entire course of theological study, as Schleiermacher decides. It may be said, indeed, that exegesis and ecclesiastical history also cannot be regarded as sciences belonging to Christian theology in their inmost nature, unless a previous understanding of the nature of Christianity in general be secured. But such an understanding is attainable only upon the ground of history—unless it is to be based on the air—so that we again are forced to the conclusion that no department has an absolute beginning. Certain

Remote beginning of all departments in theology.

apologetical assumptions must be necessarily taken for granted in the study of exegesis and Church history, though with the understanding that they are to receive thorough investigation in the proper place. This procedure approves itself as correct on the grounds of methodology also. An apologetical course at the very beginning of theological study would, assuredly, be of little service to the student whose interest for apologetics needs to be awakened, and who for that end requires exegetical and historical studies, particularly the life of Jesus and the history of the kingdom of God. But after the theologian has arrived at dogmatics he can no longer dispense with apologetics as a science which deals with the principles of the former.

¹ Sack, in his Polemik, has conceived the distinction on this wise: "Dogmatics is Christian doctrine as adapted to Christian thinkers, implying friendliness on their part; apologetics is Christian doctrine in a form adapted to heathen thinkers, and presumes hostility on their part; and polemics adapts the doctrine to the state of heretical Christian thinkers, proceeding on the supposition of dissatisfaction on their part." These different functions frequently run into each other, however. What dogmatics, for instance, does not afford evidence of such dissatisfaction in this age, which is dissatisfied in so many regards?

² Zyro, in Stud. u. Krit., 1887, 2.

No absolute reply can be given to the question whether a separate chair should be devoted to its service, or whether apologetics in the schools. it should be taught in connexion with dogmatics. Departments should not be multiplied unnecessarily, and experience has probably demonstrated that, while, in the field of authorship, special apologetical works are much to be desired, since they call forth a thorough discussion of the vital question upon whose solution the whole of dogmatics depends, the Apologetica in schools come to occupy a somewhat isolated position when not connected with some other department.¹ In former days apologetics was connected with introduction to the books of the Bible, because the demonstration of the genuineness of such writings, and the discussion of revelation and inspiration, were held to constitute the substance of its task. But it has been correctly shown, in more recent times, that it is not the particular features, but rather the Christian religion, in the whole of its manifestations, that must constitute the object upon which the line of apologetical proof is directed.² The latter will proceed upon a twofold basis and become a "demonstration of the Spirit and of power" (1 Cor. ii, 4). This was formerly restricted to the ground of merely prophecy and miracles. But we would prefer to say that the demonstration of the Spirit lies in the inward justifying of Christianity to the Spirit, in that it demonstrates itself as religion, while the demonstration of the power consists in its being apprehended as a definite historical fact, as an effective actualization of religion, as that religion which is endorsed by the world's historical experience.

The task of apologetics may, accordingly, be, with Lechler,³ considered as a twofold one, viz.: (1) To show that Christianity is a religion, and (2) That it is the true religion, or unmodified religion.⁴ It thus connects itself on the one hand

¹ Noesselt already decided against the separate treatment of apologetics, and also Tholuck, Verm. Schriften, part i, p. 376, and Literar. Anzeiger, 1831. But compare Nitzsch Protest. Beantwortung von Strauss' Philo. Dogmatik, in Stud. u. Krit., 1842, No. 3. Are not lectures on apologetics generally delivered as an introduction to dogmatics at the present time?

² Lechler, ubi supra.

³ Ibid., p. 605.

⁴ "The Christian religion forms the subject, and absolute religion the predicate; while apologetics itself forms the copula; for it is simply the scientific process through which Christianity is shown to be the absolute religion."—Ibid., p. 608.

with the philosophy of religion, and on the other with the results obtained by exegesis and Church history. It forms this connexion with the former because its office is to determine the nature of religion in general, while apologetics applies this general notion of religion to Christianity, and shows its concrete realization in this form; with the latter, because the entire development of the divine wisdom in revelation, and, first of all, the manifestation of Christ and the existence of the Church, form the basis upon which their evidences rest. In other words, the demonstration of the absolute purpose of Christianity to become the religion for all peoples and times, the religion for the individual and the race, is in scientific form precisely what the popular definition seeks to express when it declares it to be the task of apologetics to prove the truth and divine character of Christianity.

This has too often been understood to mean that the divine element is merely another predicate superadded to the truth, and its existence has, from the standpoint of the older supernaturalism, been looked for exclusively in the extraordinary features of revelation, its inspiration, prophecies, and miracles;¹ whereas the divinity is already involved in the truth, and the truth in the divinity. This is not intended to signify that the divine element in Christianity consists simply in its generally acknowledged moral truths and its abstract correspondence with the laws of reason, though even this is something, and affords a field of apologetic effort even to the rationalist; but that the truth of Christianity is of a peculiar kind, having been born with Christianity, and therefore revealed; for what "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, and what hath not entered into the heart of man . . . God hath prepared for them that love him, and hath revealed it unto us by his Spirit" (1. Cor. ii, 9, 10). But this specifically peculiar divine truth is certainly required to establish and approve itself to the inner consciousness as involving the human element also, that is, as a truth for man.² For this reason it must first render the negative proof that it contains nothing which conflicts with the ¹ The erection of such entrenchments, without any direct connexion with the contents of the Gospel, caused that "hateful ditch" concerning which Lessing declared that he could not pass over it. Comp. Hirzel, p. 22 sqq. The divine nature of Christianity does not appear in the absence of natural factors in the development of human affairs. If this were so Christ and Christianity would, of course, be fables, and not the subject of history. It manifests itself through the renewing might of the Spirit in the living consciousness of believers."—Bunsen, Hippolytus i (Pref.).

² "Were the eye unlike the sun
How could it bear His light?"—Goethe.

nature and the mission of man, and hence that contradicts the absolute reason, but that its definiteness constitutes at the same time a reasonable character.¹

SECTION IV.

THE HISTORY OF APOLOGETICS.

The necessity of defending Christianity in general—the faith and morals of Christendom—against attack, was apparent at an early day. The earliest form of apologetics was the juridical, in the character of a defence against unjust charges before the tribunals of heathen authority. This form of necessary resistance was soon joined with theological apologetics in the stricter sense, so that the defensive element soon became the offensive, and apologetics took on a polemical character. The earliest Christian apolo-
The field of earliest apologetics. gists represented heathenism in its emptiness, Judaism in its insufficiency, and Christianity in its greatness and unique character. The first apologies, by Aristides and Quadratus, and also those by Melito of Sardis, Miltiades, and Claudius Apollinaris, are either lost or exist only in the fragments we find in Eusebius. The oldest in our possession are the two apologies by Justin Martyr, about the middle of the second century, and those of Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, and Hermas. The Alexandrian divines, Clement and Origen, defended Christianity—the former against the Greeks generally in his Admonitory Treatise, and the latter against the attacks of Celsus, in which undertaking they, like their predecessors, made ample use of Grecian philosophy. In the African Church, Tertullian became the attorney of Christianity through the publication of his writings—The Apologist, Against the Gentiles, and Against the Jews. He was subsequently joined by Minucius Felix, Cyprian, Arnobius (about A. D. 303), and Lactantius (died about 325).

¹ The term "apologetical" may, however, "be applied in instances where it is being demonstrated that the decisive feature cannot be properly introduced into the demonstration at this point. It follows that an apologetical significance is to be ascribed to the little work by Lavater entitled "Nathanael, or the Certain but Unprovable Divinity of Christianity." Hirzel says: "Apologetics can only remove hinderances from the way of the thinking reason, in part, and in part bring an already existent belief into harmony or into a clearly apprehended relation with the entire sum of knowledge and of life." "No syllogistic method of proving the truth of Christianity is incontrovertible. But no human ingenuity has as yet succeeded in putting to shame the demonstration of the Spirit and of power."—Schenkel, Der ethische Charakter des Christenthums, in Prot. Monatsbl., 1857, p. 115. Melancthon, too, remarks concerning the truths of Christianity: "Geometrica pingi et oculis subijci possunt; haec vero, de quibus hic dicimus, non ita pingi et oculis subijci possunt, sed attenta consideratione paulatim magis intelligentur."—Loci Communes (in Bretschneider, Corpus Reform. xxi, p. 646).

The fathers of the second period, though directing their efforts more especially upon internal affairs, likewise continued the work of apologetics; for example, Athanasius, in his Treatise against the Greeks, Cyril of Alexandria (died 444), who wrote the books against Julian, and still other writers.

After ancient heathenism had been overcome it was necessary to defend Christianity against the continued attacks of the Jews, and, after the appearance of Mohammed, against the followers of Islam. A number of apologetical works of this character originated during the Middle Ages. We may mention those by Agobard, of Lyons, in his Insolence of the Jews, 822; by Abelard, in his Dialogue between the Philosopher, the Jew, and the Christian; and by Thomas Aquinas, in his Truth of the Catholic Faith against the Gentiles.

A kind of uncertainty respecting the foundations of Christianity began, moreover, to manifest itself within the pale of the Church itself. Philosophy and Christianity came into conflict, and in this way the apologetic writers came to regard internal conditions, especially after the restoration of the sciences in the fifteenth century. The truths of Christianity were protected against philosophical scepticism by Marsilius Ficinus in his Christian Religion and Piety of Faith (Opp. Par., 1641, tom. i, pp. 1-73), and against the intellectual scepticism by Savonarola in his Triumph of the Cross.

The period of the Reformation was more particularly engaged in prosecuting the conflicts that arose within the Church; but the claims of apologetics soon afterward came again into notice. In 1627 Grotius composed the work, Truth of the Christian Religion,¹ primarily for mariners who came into contact with non-Christian peoples, in order to furnish them with a cable that should save them from Mohammedanism and heathenism. But the work was suited to the learned class rather than the unlearned, and has long maintained its reputation among them. The Arminian Limborch subsequently walked in the path of Grotius, in his Truth of the Christian Religion. He had for his object the defeat of the Spanish Jew, Orobio, and the Portuguese deistical Jew, Acosta. The rise of freethinkers of England furnished the impulse for apologetical authorship in that country, where it was even promoted by the institution of prizes. Mention must be made of Locke (1695-1733), Samuel Clarke (1704), Lardner, in his Credibility of the Gospel History (1764-67, iv), Addison, in his Evidences of the Christian

¹ Frequently edited. A good edition is Le Clerc and Madan's, Lond., 1814.

Religion, Stackhouse, in his Worth of the Christian Religion, and Butler, in his Analogy of Natural and Revealed Religion.

In the Roman Catholic Church of France, Pascal, in his Thoughts (1668), and Astie (1857), and Havet, have defended Christianity against the objections raised by sceptical thinkers. The same work was performed in the Reformed Church by Abbadie (died in Ireland, 1727), Jacquelot (died 1725), and G. A. Turretin (died 1687), in his Treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion.

The German apologists of the last century largely followed the German apolo- English at the first; but the Wolfenbüttel Fragments, gies. since 1777, were chiefly influential in calling forth apologetical works. A measure of uncertainty was soon apparent, however, in the fact that people were not agreed with reference to the condition of the defence itself. What should have been maintained was often given up, and other matters were insisted on which might have been conceded, or which, at least, in the form in which they had been held, were untenable.¹ The apologists were divided into two camps—that of the strictly orthodox, and that of the latitudinarians. The prominent names at this point are Lilienthal, The Good Cause of Revelation (Königsb., 1750–78, in 16 vols.), Euler,² Haller, A. F. W. Sack, Jerusalem, Noesselt, Less, Spalding, and Klenker. Chateaubriand defended the genius of Christianity and proved its greatness by the history of its martyrs (The Genius of Christianity; or, the Beauty of the Christian Religion, Par., 1802), from the position occupied by modern culture in France, and from that of æsthetical Roman Catholicism as well. The progress of development in theology in Germany gave rise to the conflict between Rationalism and Supernaturalism, by which means apologetics was transformed into polemics. The question concerning principles generally was at stake. Most of the works mentioned above were called into being by practical and temporary conditions rather than by scientific considerations. This is true in recent times also of Stirin; but the attempt to establish apologetics upon a strictly scientific basis was now made by Karl Sack, at Bonn, who was inspired thereto by Schleiermacher. The same effort was made in the Roman Catholic Church by Drey (comp. Pelt, p. 398 sq.). Apologetics thus came to be clearly distinguished from apology; but it has not yet succeeded in attaining to an assured position as a separate science. Nothing has been gained by assigning to it a place under Practical Theology, as has been done in recent times, for it can only be practically applied after its foundations have been theoretically established.

¹ Lessing says, with reference to the apologetical literature of his day, "It often appeared to me as if the gentlemen had exchanged their weapons, like those which are presented in the fable of Death and Love. The more forcibly one attempted to prove Christianity to me the more did I become inclined to doubt. The more recklessly and triumphantly another sought to tread it under foot the more assuredly was I conscious of maintaining it, at least in my heart." See C. Schwarz, Lessing als Theolog, Halle, 1854, p. 35.

² Comp. Hagenbach, Leonhard Euler, als Apologet des Christenthums, Basle, 1851, 4.

THE LITERATURE OF APOLOGETICS.

I. SCIENTIFIC APOLOGETICS.

- J. F. Kleuker, Neue Prüfung und Erklärung der vorzüglichsten Beweise für die Wahrheit und den göttlichen Ursprung des Christenthums. Riga, 1787-94. 4 vols.
 G. S. Franke, Entwurf einer Apologetik der christl. Religion. Altona, 1817.
 G. J. Planck, Ueber Behandlung, Haltbarkeit und Werth des histor. Beweises für die Göttlichkeit des Christenthums. Gött., 1821.
 K. W. Stein, Die Apologetik der Offenbarung als Wissenschaft dargestellt. Lpz., 1824.
 K. H. Sack, Christl. Apologetik. Hamb., 1829. 2d ed., 1841.
 J. Ch. F. Steudel, Grundzüge einer Apologetik für das Christenth. Tüb., 1830.
 †S. v. Drey, Apologetik als wissenschaftliche Nachweisung der Göttlichkeit des Christenthums in seiner Erscheinung. 1st, Philosophie der Offenbarung. Mainz, 1838-48.
 Fz. Delitzsch, System der christlichen Apologetik. Lpz., 1869.
 Fr. G. R. Frank, System der christlichen Gewissheit. 2 vols. Erl., 1870-73.

II. PRACTICAL APOLOGETICS

- J. A. Nösselt, Vertheidigung der Wahrheit und Göttlichkeit der christlichen Religion. Halle, 1769. 5th ed., 1784.
 G. Less, Beweis der Wahrheit der christlichen Religion. Bremen, 1768. 5th ed., Gött., 1785.
 J. F. W. Jerusalem, Betrachtungen über die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der Religion. Braunsch., 1773-76. 2 vols. Fortgesetzte Betrachtungen. Ibid., 1792, 1798. 2 vols.
 A. v. Haller, Briefe über die wichtigsten Wahrheiten der Offenbarung. Bern, 1772. New ed. by Auberlen. Basel, 1858.¹
 — Briefe über einige Einwürfe noch lebender Freigeister wider die Offenbarung. Bern, 1774-77. 2d ed., 1778. 3 vols.
 *Sturm, Apologie des Christenthums in Briefen, für gebildete Leser. A prize Essay. Stuttgart, 1836. 2 vols. New ed., 1856.
 F. F. Fleck, Vertheidigung des Christenthums. Lpz., 1842.
 *K. Ullmann, Die Sündlosigkeit Jesu; eine apologetische Betrachtung. 7th ed. Hamb., 1863. English transl. Edinb., 1858.
 — Das Wesen des Christenthums (designed also for cultured laymen). Hamb., 1845. 4th ed., 1854. English transl. by Bleasdel. Lond., 1860.
 *A. Tholuck, Gespräche über die vornehmsten Glaubensfragen der Zeit. Halle, 1846. New unchanged ed., Gotha, 1864.
 J. W. Hanne, Vorhöfe zum Glauben, oder das Wunder des Christenthums im Einklange mit Vernunft und Natur. Jena, 1850, 1851. 2 vols.
 D. Frayssinous, Défense du Christianisme. Par., 1851-53. 2 vols.

¹ Comp. Hundeshagen in Gelzer's Monatsbl. June, 1858.

- K. B. Hundeshagen, Der Weg zu Christo, Vorträge im Dienste der innern Mission. Frankf., 1853.
- J. Scheinert, Die christliche Religion. Königsb., 1853, 1854. 2 vols.
- Fréd. de Rougemont, Christ et ses témoins, ou lettres d'un laïque sur la révélation et l'inspiration. Par., 1856. 2 vols.
- Zur Verantwortung des christl. Glaubens. Ten lectures by K. A. Auberlen, W. G. Gess, S. Preiswerk, C. J. Riggenbach, E. Stähelin, Imm. Stockmeyer. Basel, 1861. English transl. London, 1863.
- K. A. Auberlen, Die göttliche Offenbarung, ein apologetischer Versuch. Basel, 1861 and 1864. 2 parts.
- W. F. Gess and C. J. Riggenbach, Apologetische Beiträge. Basel, 1863.
- M. Guizot, Meditations sur l'essence de la religion chrétienne. Par., 1864. German by Oscar Wendel. English transl. 3 vols. Edinb., 1868-79.
- Ch. E. Luthardt, Apologetische Vorträge. Lpz., 1864. 8 parts. Eng. transl. Edinb.
- A. Düsterdieck, Apologetische Beiträge. Gött., 1865.
- C. C. G. v. Zeszschwitz, Zur Apologie des Christenthums. Lpz., 1865.
- C. F. W. Held, Jesus der Christ. Sechzehn apologetische Vorträge über die Grundlehren des Christenthums. Zür., 1865.
- † Hettinger, Der Beweis des Christenthums. 3d ed. Freib., 1867. 2 parts.
- R. Grau, Semiten und Indogermanen, eine Apologie des Christenthums vom Standpunkte der Völkerpsychologie. Stuttg., 1867.
- Theodor Christlieb, Moderne Zweifel am christl. Glauben, in Vorträgen an Gebildete. Basel, 1868. English transl. N. Y., 1874.
- E. Krauss, Lehre von der Offenbarung. Gotha, 1868.
- Von der Goltz, Gottes Offenbarung, etc., see Lit., under § 59.¹
- J. F. W. Jerusalem, Betrachtungen über die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der Religion. Braunsch., 1773-76. 2 vols. Fortgesetzte Betrachtungen. Ibid., 1791-93. 2 vols.

Apologetical Journal:

- Der Beweis des Glaubens*, by O. Zöckler, R. Grau, O. Andreä, C. Brachmann. Gütersl., 1864 ff.

The labours of the different societies organized for the defence of Christianity also come under this head, e. g., those of the Haagen Gesellschaft, the Teylersche Stiftung, etc. The Calwer Publication Society furnishes a popular work on Apologetics in Christliche Glaubenslehre: Ein Zeugnis für und wider. Stuttg., 1854, 1856, 1858.

The field of apologetics embraces also the discussions relating to the true idea of the miracle; on which compare Rothe, Zur Dogmatik, ubi supra. J. Hirzel, Ueber das Wunder und was damit zusammenhängt. Zür., 1863. † Frohschammer, Die Philosophie und das Wunder (Athenäum. Vol. II, No. 1). W. Benschlag, Die Bedeutung des Wunders im Christenthum. Berl., 1863. Jul. Köstlin, Die Frage über das Wunder nach dem Stande der neuern Wissenschaft (Jahrbücher für deutsche Theol. IX. 2. p. 205 ff.). Nitsch, Augustin's Lehre vom Wunder. 1865. Flügel, Das Wunder und die Erkennbarkeit Gottes. Lpz., 1869. Bender, Der Wunderbegriff des Neuen Testaments. Frankf. a. M., 1871. Lommatsch, Schleiermacher's Lehre vom Wunder und vom Uebernatürlichen im Zusammenhange seiner Theologie und mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Reden über die Religion und der Predigten dargestellt. Berl., 1872. Also the manuals of dogmatics and apologetics by Auberlen, Schenkel, Schweizer, Weiss, etc. Concerning the miracles of Jesus in particular, see Godet, Les miracles de Jésus Christ. Neuch., 1867.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- Joseph Addison, Of the Christian Religion. Lond., et passim.
- Aids to Faith. A Series of Theological Essays, by Several Writers*. Lond., 1861.

¹ H. G. Tzschirner, Geschichte der Apologetik, oder historische Darstellung der Art, wie das Christenthum in jedem Zeitalter bewiesen, angegriffen und vertheidigt ward; with preface by F. V. Reinhard. Lpz., 1805. Vol. 1. (Unfinished.)

- Bampton Lectures. 102 vols. Lond., 1780-1882.
- Bremen Lectures (The); on Fundamental, Living, Religious Questions, by various Eminent European Divines. Translated by Rev. D. Heagle. Boston, 1871.
- T. W. Chambers, The Psalter; a Witness to the Divine Origin of the Bible. (Vedder Lectures for 1876.) N. Y., 1876.
- B. F. Cocker, Lectures on the Truth of the Christian Religion. Detroit, 1873.
- Joseph Cook, Boston Monday Lectures. With Preludes on Current Events. 9 vols. Boston, 1877-81.
- George P. Fisher, Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity. N. Y., 1866.
- James Grant, The Religious Tendencies of the Times. 2 vols. Lond., 1869.
- W. M. Hetherington, The Apologetics of the Christian Faith. N. Y., 1867.
- John Leland, The Divine Authority of the Old and New Testaments Asserted. Lond., 1837.
- Henry P. Liddon, Some Elements of Religion. Lond., 1873.
- J. McCosh, An Examination of Mr. John Stuart Mill's Philosophy. Being a Defence of Fundamental Truth. N. Y., 1866.
- Pitts' Street Chapel Lectures (The). Delivered in Boston in 1858, by Clergymen of Six Different Denominations. Boston, 1858.
- Replies to "Essays and Reviews," by Goulborn, Rose, Heurtley, Irons, Rorison, Hadan, Wordsworth. N. Y., 1862.
- Henry Rogers, Reason and Faith, and other Miscellanies. Boston, 1853.
- The Eclipse of Faith; or, a Visit to a Religious Sceptic. Lond.
- The Superhuman Origin of the Bible inferred from itself. N. Y., 1874.
- Sanderson Robbins, A Defence of the Faith. Lond., 1862.
- Philip Schaff and Napoleon Roussel, Romance of M. Renan and the Christ of the Gospels. N. Y., 1868.
- W. A. Scott, The Christ of the Apostles' Creed. N. Y., 1867.
- A. C. Tait (Abp.), Dangers and Safeguards of Modern Theology. Lond., 1861.
- L. T. Townsend, Credo. Boston, 1869.
- Fred. Watson, The Ante-Nicene Apologies; their Character and Value. Camb., 1870.
- R. Watson, An Apology for the Bible. Passim, et N. Y., 1837.
- R. B. Welch, Faith and Modern Thought. N. Y., 1876.

SECTION V.

POLEMICS AND IRENICS.

Comp. Schleiermacher, §§ 59-62; Felt in Herzog's Encyklopædia, vii, p. 60, and xi, p. 791. M'Climock and Strong's Cyclopædia, articles Irenics and Polemical Theology, vols. iv and viii.

While dogmatics is governed by apologetical motives on the one hand, its entire substance is pervaded by polemical considerations on the other. That is to say, it has continually to recognise confessional contrasts, as historically revealed by symbolics, and to bring into view what is peculiar in the confession which it professes to support. It thus receives the confessional stamp, without which it would cease to be the dogmatics of a particular Church. It has, moreover, to reprove what is erroneous and morbid in the Church itself, and to present the unimpaired rule of doctrine in opposition to dogmatical perversions. This polemical feature does not, however, exclude the irenical, whose aim it is to discover the measure of truth in the keeping of opposing parties, and to point out the conditions upon which a gradual understanding, and ultimately a true and lasting reconciliation, of existing contrasts, may be brought about. Neither polemics or irenics is therefore to be regarded as a separate branch of theological study, but simply as a special side of the department of dogmatics.

The older divines already distinguished between the acroamatic and elenchical theology. But symbolics had not yet received its present scientific form. If we assume that the distinctive doctrines have already been discussed in symbolics in so far as they are available as historical material, there will be nothing more for the dogmatic theologian to do than simply to move about on this historical ground with freedom and security, and to know how to strike chivalrous blows for his Church. But if it is not possible that he should be allowed to escape such service, it is not easy to understand why polemics should become a distinct branch.¹ Each depends for its life upon the other; polemics becoming empty disputation when it has no dogmatic basis, and simple dogmatics without polemical salt being an insipid hash. Dogmatics derives its confessional character, as Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Reformed, and other types, from the polemical tendency it manifests, just as it is shown to be Christian dogmatics by the apologetic exposition with which it is introduced. A dogmatics that is Christian without any qualifying feature, to be satisfactory to both Roman Catholics and Protestants in a scientific point of view, is, in the present condition of affairs, wholly inconceivable.² If the attention were even confined altogether to biblical dogmatics, the latter would assume a very different form under Roman Catholic from that under Protestant treatment. But, as has been shown in a former section, dogmatics is not simply a statement of Bible doctrine, but it assumes both that and ecclesiastical doctrines.

The features added by the dogmatic theologian can only amount to a closer specification of the relation sustained by himself, or rather by his age—in so far as he has apprehended the latter and received it into himself—to the Bible and the Church, and thus open the way in which the doctrine is to move in the progress of its further development. But how can this be accomplished in the absence of confessional determinateness? Since, however, the ultimate goal of our efforts cannot be division, but unification, the dogmatic theologian will not be authorized to cling to the letter of the doctrines of his Church, as hitherto received, with a tenacity that makes all approximation toward other confessional views impossible. To defend to the death what is untenable and merely peculiar to the stage of development attained by any particular age, influenced simply by obstinacy and party interest, is bad polemics.

¹ "Peaceable minds are also, against their will, swept into the stream of polemics, and faithful adherence to denominational belief excites the feeling of resistance to the uninterrupted assaults upon his views in proportion to its strength."—Schenkel, Gespräche, etc., I, Vonede iv.

² Comp. Schleiermacher, § 197, note. The task of dogmatics is, nevertheless, not cut short thereby, as Biedermann asserts (Dogmatik, p. 9)—the task, namely, passing beyond the acknowledged existence of diverse views, "of following the confessional branchwork down to its root, the real principle of Christianity, and of basing its judgments of confessional differences upon that foundation."

Every judicious dogmatist must be intent upon eventually compromising and harmonizing such contrasts as may exist.¹

But such harmonizing is not to be accomplished by an overhasty obliteration of differences, or by forcibly

The judicious dogmatist a harmonizer.

breaking off their points and grinding their edges, so as to reduce every thing to indefiniteness and imbecility. This is false irenics. It is necessary, on the contrary, that the contrasts be sharply apprehended and followed down to their last details. This honest mode of procedure is less liable than any other to the danger of misrepresenting the views of opponents. For the more earnest the effort to understand the peculiarities of even an antagonistic doctrine, the more will such doctrine display characteristics which afford a ground upon which reconciliation is possible. The understanding of a disease is the only guide to a right selection of remedies for its cure, while palliatives can only harm. This has been shown by the history of the latest times in the case of two of the leading confessions of Protestantism—the Evangelical Union of the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions of Prussia, introduced by King Frederick William III., in 1817. An external union has certainly been established, but it could not be made effective in all quarters, because the internal differences had not yet been wholly overcome; the result being that they were only made more prominent. The conflict, however, if it only be conducted in the interests of truth, and without the intervention of blind passion, may, and will, result in demonstrating that the several evangelical modes under which Protestantism comes into notice are equally justified in the forum of science and before the pious consciousness, and that each serves to complement the other, though neither may be absorbed into the other.¹

Evangelical Union of Prussia.

¹ It is most of all necessary that a false consequential spirit be avoided, as it constitutes a mortal principle to the sciences. A French writer has some capital remarks upon this point: Man is not a system which is divisible like a thread. He is not a mechanical force which prolongs itself infinitely. Fanaticism in all things is the reduction of intelligence by passion under the yoke of an exclusive idea.—Remusat, De la Reform et du Protestantism, p. 52 f.

The reconciliation of Roman Catholicism and Protestantism appears in a more difficult light up to this time, and the work of the dogmatic theologian will, for the present, be obliged to retain a polemical character in this field rather than assume an irenical nature. The agreement has been carried so far, however, as to admit of the recognition that the differences between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, which have, upon the whole, remained unchanged, are to be very differently defined by science from what was the case at the beginning of the struggle. The relation between Scripture and tradition, for instance, is presented by the later theology of Protestantism in a form materially modified from that of former days. The same is true of justification and sanctification. The doctrine of the Church, also, is now, for the first time, approaching its thorough development and elaboration. In the Roman Catholic Church, on the other hand, the contrast between the Romish and the more independent principle is steadily becoming more prominent. In proportion as the purely evangelical element shall attain to clearness, and be distinguished from vague liberalism through the efforts of the nobler spirits in that Church, will agreement, if not unification, upon the common ground of Christianity become possible.²

The idea of polemics is not exhausted, however, when justice has been done to confessional interest. For, while every thing that savours of conflict is termed polemics, it is also true that every science has its polemical side. Apologetics is polemical in one point of view,³ and polemics, in the strict sense, involves an apologetical element. We see illustrations of this in Melancthon's Apology and similar writings.⁴ Schleiermacher distinguishes between apologetics and polemics, so as to conceive the former as facing outwardly and the latter as turning its attention within, and then

¹ "Many Lutherans have long since become Calvinists, and many Calvinists Lutherans; it only remains necessary that the right methods of promoting and expressing this already existing unity be discovered."—Henry at the "Kirchentag" at Berlin (Verhandlungen, p. 84).

² An attempt of this kind, as is well known, was recently made by Doellinger, the best representative of Old Catholicism.

³ "It is self-evident that no defence that should be simply defensive and not also offensive, and that should not especially lay positive foundations, is possible on scientific grounds."—Lechler, ubi supra, p. 597. Comp. Hirzel, ubi supra, p. 13.

⁴ Schleiermacher, § 52. Each one of the parties is obliged to defend itself against the charge of anarchy or corruption.

proceeds to regard polemics more generally as having to do with the repressing of morbid appearances in the Church at large, as we call indifferentism and separation.¹ But it is hardly necessary to establish a separate department for either this work or the restraining or partial and perverted tendencies in the science generally. Such morbid tendencies² are either to be dealt with theoretically, by dogmatics and ethics, or combated in a practical way, in the field of clerical work and that of general Church activities. But, in the latter case, the canon by which the contest must be regulated, the ἀλληθεύειν ἐν δόγματι (Eph. iv, 15), is likewise ethical. Both polemics and irenics have, for this reason, a place under practical theology. In connexion with dogmatics it is better to regard them in the light of "applied dogmatics."³

Schleiermacher's definition of relations of apologetics and polemics.

SECTION VI.

THE HISTORY OF POLEMICS AND IRENICS.

Christianity was born for conflict. Christ said that he came not to bring peace, but a sword. Christian polemics, accordingly, began with the beginning. Paul and John opposed false teachers. The fathers trod in their footsteps—Irenæus, with his work against a false Gnosis, and Tertullian, with his work on Prescription against Heretics, being especially prominent as fighters of heresy. The entire body of Church doctrine passed through the Patristic polemics. Irenics sometimes went hand in hand with polemics; but such ill-timed attempts to promote unity served only to increase the intensity and confusion of the struggle.

The separation of the Western Church from that of the East, professedly on account of the filioque controversy, introduced a long polemical contest between the two bodies, and also, since the beginning of the eleventh century, many attempts to bring about a reunion. Strict polemics begins with the division between the

¹ Sack has carried these categories still further; Indifferentism (divided into Naturalism and Mythologism); Literalism (into Ergism and Orthodoxy); Spiritualism (into Rationalism and Gnosticism); Separatism (into Mysticism and Pietism); and Theocratism (into Hierarchism and Cesaro-Papism). H. Steffensen (in Theol. Mittheilungen, Kiel, 1841, pp. 3-32) leads back these morbid forms to two fundamental states, according as they obscure "the piety of the Church (the substantial life of the Church) or pious ecclesiasticism (the formal life of the Church)".

² The attention is, of course, not to be fixed simply upon the appearances, but, as Sack says, they are to be "traced back to the inward dispositions from which doctrinal differences are developed, as from their root."

³ This is done by J. P. Lange in connexion with Dogmatic Statistics and General Therapeutics.

Churches in the Reformation, and the number of the controversial works called forth by circumstances during that period is legion.

But similar works continued to issue from both camps in the Church in later times. In the Romish Church the Spanish Franciscan Alphonso de Castro (died 1558 at Brussels) wrote, in the reign of Philip II., Against all Heresies (libri xiv, Paris, 1534); the Jesuit Francis Coster issued a Controversial Manual (1585); and Gregory de Valentia wrote on Controversial Matters of Faith in this Time (1591). Special prominence attaches to Bellarmine (died 1621) and his work, Disputations on the Controversies of Christian Faith and also to Martin Becanus (died 1624, having been the confessor of the Emperor Ferdinand II.), the author of a Manual of Controversies of this Period. This Church found a skilful and somewhat peaceably disposed defender in Bossuet, the Bishop of Meaux, who wrote an Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church on Controverted Matters (Paris, 1671). Among Lutherans the following deserve mention: Chemnitz, Examination of the Council of Trent (1565); Nic. Hunnius (died 1643), Examination of the Fundamental Dissent of Lutheran and Calvinistic Doctrine (Vit., 1616); Conrad Schlüsselburg, superintendent at Stralsund, Catalogue of Heretics (1597-99); and Abr. Calov, Synopsis of Controversies. Other dogmatical writers also mingled a large measure of polemics with the dogmatical material in their works.

Among Reformed theologians we may mention Hospinian, Concordia Discordant (Zürich, 1607), replied to by Hutter in his Concord Concordant (Vit., 1614); Daniel Chamier (at Montauban), The Whole Catholic Army (1626); Joh. Hoornbeek, Sum of Controversies (1653); Fr. Turretin, Institutes of Theological Summary (1681-85); and Fr. Spanheim, the elder (died 1649), and the younger (died 1701), in a number of works.

The irenical tendency occasionally progressed side by side with the polemical, or took its place when polemical zeal had spent its force. Thus, Nicolas de Cusa wrote, in the fifteenth century, his Dialogue on the Peace or Concord of Faith (ed. by Semler, 1787). The irenical tendency was represented in the Protestant Church by G. Calixtus, whose efforts led to the Syncretistic controversies. An Introduction to Polemical Divinity was written, in 1752, by J. G. Walch, of Jena.

The zeal for polemics diminished after the middle of the eighteenth century, and particularly toward its close, and writings and maunderings were composed about unity, generally emanating from the position of indifferentism. The newly awakened confessional zeal of Protestantism in the nineteenth century, however, called forth a large number of controversial writings in the conflict against Ultramontaniam and Jesuitism; but the purely scientific interest was often subordinated by the fervour of the combatants to the practical questions of the hour. The scientific treatment of polemics was even relegated to the more peaceable field of symbolics; and it is quite recently that Hase has restored polemics to honour as a science in the strict sense, and has again incorporated it with the circle of theological studies.¹ The scientific status of irenics, on the other hand, is altogether of recent date, ^{scientific status} and its system is not yet developed to any considerable ^{of irenics.} extent. It secured a foothold as a factor in the domain of practical life, but often served only to provide new material for polemics. Thus the union which was consummated in Prussia and elsewhere in the course of the second decade of the century, called forth a multitude of works and counter-works. We may mention J. Schuderoff, on the General Union of the Christian Confessions (Neust., 1829); H. Steffens, What Lutheranism is to Me (Breslau, 1831); Rudelbach, Reformation, Lutheranism, and the Union (Leipz., 1839); K. F. Gaupp, Union of the German Church (Breslau, 1843); J. A. G. Woltersdorff, The Ecclesiastical Union (Stendal, 1851); and *Jul. Mueller, The Evangelical Union (Berlin, 1854). Of historical work are the following: Nitzsch, Archives of the Evangelical Union (Berlin, 1853); R. Stier, Unlutheran Theses (Brunsw., 1854); and Carl Schulz, The Union: An Inquiry into its History and Doctrine (Gotha, 1868).

LITERATURE OF POLEMICS AND IRENICS.

- J. G. Planck, Ueber die Trennung und Wiedervereinigung der getrennten christl. Hauptparteien. Tüb., 1803.
 — Worte des Friedens an die katholische Kirche gegen ihre Vereinigung mit der protestantischen. Gött., 1809.
 Ph. Marheineke, Ueber das wahre Verhältniss des Katholicismus und Protestantismus und die projectirte Kirchenvereinigung. Heidelb., 1810.
 K. H. Sack, Christl. Polemik. Hamb., 1838.
 J. P. Lange, Die gesetzlich-kathol. Kirche als Sinnbild der freien evangelisch-katholischen Kirche. Heidelb., 1850.
 D. Schenkel, Unionsberuf des evangelischen Protestantismus. Heidelb., 1855.
 Fr. Jul. Stahl, Die Lutherische Kirche und die Union, eine wissenschaftliche Erörterung, etc. Berl., 1859. 2d ed., 1860.

For wider circles of readers:

- D. Schenkel, Gespräche über Protestantismus und Katholicismus. Heidelb., 1852, 1853. 2 vols.

¹ It is true, indeed, that Schleiermacher already assigned to it an honorary place among such studies, and that Sack wrote, in A. D. 1838, a textbook of this science; but the example produced no lasting consequences.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- William E. Gladstone, Rome and the Newest Fashions in Literature: an Answer to Reproofs and Replies. 8vo. N. Y., 1875.
- W. Archer Butler, Letters on Romanism. Lond., 1858.
- Samuel Edgar, The Variations of Popery. Revised. N. Y., 1849.
- Charles Elliott, Delineation of Romanism. 2 vols., 8vo. N. Y., 1851.
- Julius Charles Hare, The Contest with Rome. Cambridge, 1856.
- W. Howitt, History of Priestcraft. New ed. Lond., 1846.
- F. D. Maurice, The Religion of Rome, and its Influence on Modern Civilization. Lond. 1855.
- J. Michelet, Priests, Women, and Families. Lond., 1846.
- N. Murray (Kirwan), Letters to Bishop Hughes. Revised and Enlarged ed. N. Y., 1855.
- Napoleon Roussell, Catholic and Protestant Nations Compared in their Threefold Relations to Wealth, Knowledge, and Morality. Boston, 1855.
- R. W. Thompson, The Papacy and the Civil Power. N. Y., 1876.
- Richard Whately, Errors of Romanism Traced to their Origin in Human Nature. New ed. Lond., 1856.
- J. Blanco White, Practical and Internal Evidence Against Catholicism. Lond., 1835.

SECTION VII.

THE METHOD OF DOGMATICS.

The method of arranging and dividing the material of dogmatics is, beyond all question, dependent on the underlying dogmatical view, since it is no small question which doctrine shall control the others, or what relations the various articles of the creed are to sustain to each other, or what is their bearing upon the entire body of Christian truth. The traditional method, by Theological Heads, or Theological Topics, or Heads, has, on that account, not only been variously modified, but has also been superseded to some extent by other modes of division, and in part combined with them.

The question concerning the particular doctrine which is to be placed at the base, so to speak, the πρῶτον κινούν of dogmatics, reaches back into apologetics. What is the essential feature of Christianity? what is the principal subject of its teaching? what are fundamental articles? Upon these questions will depend the entire structure of the dogmatics. If it be held that the doctrine about Christ is less important than what he taught, and that the essential thing in connexion with Christianity is that it has thrown light upon the doctrines relating to God and his attributes, and also those which concern human destiny, the entire system will assume a character different from what it would be if it be assumed that the central point of Christianity lies in the personality of the God-man, or in the fact of redemption, or in the justification of the sinner before God by faith, or, finally, in the mystery of the Trinity. Each of these views will necessitate a plan on which to dispose of the separate doctrines within the general structure.

¹ Excellent hints for the cultivation of freies Denken are furnished in the work by Lücke: Ueber das Alter, den Verfasser, die ursprüngliche Form und den wahren Sinn des kirchl. Friedensspruches: In necessariis unitas, in non necessariis libertas, in utrisque caritas. Gött., 1850.

The traditional method began with God and his attributes, progressed through the creation until it arrived at man and his sin, passed through these to the Redeemer and his work, and then discussed the Church and the sacraments, until it closed with an outlook into the future, or the last things. This has been The Local or Topical Method. denominated the Local or Topical method, from locus or τόπος, which corresponds to the terms caput or pars fidei, or articles of faith (ἀρθρον τῆς πίστεως).¹ It is already found with John of Damascus and the scholastics, and it has been the usual method with Lutherans since Melancthon, though the latter himself had followed a different method in the first edition of his Loci Communes, which begins with man and his need of salvation. Different principles of arrangement were attempted from time to time in the Reformed Church. Thus we may mention the Federal method (methodus foederalis) of Cocceius and Witsius in the 17th century,² which was adopted among moderns by Augusti;³ and the division according to the Persons of the Trinity, by Melchior Leydecker, in the same century,⁴ which is followed by Marheinecke in his Dogmatik, Schirmer in his Biblical Dogmatics, and Rosenkranz in his Encyclopædia.

Schleiermacher's method is peculiarly founded on the contrast between sin and grace as constituting the turning point Schleiermacher's method. in the Christian conception of the world. His Dogmatics falls into two principal parts: 1. "The pious feeling of dependence, without reference to the contrast between personal inability and imparted ability;" 2. With a substantial recognition of such contrast. Hase divides dogmatics into ontology and Christology. Anthropology and theology are classed under the former head, and eschatology is discussed under anthropology, while the doctrines of the Holy Spirit, the Church, and the sacraments con-

¹ See Bretschneider, Entwicklung der dogmatischen Begriffe, p. 191. The proof texts in Scripture were also termed loci classici, loci probantia, dicta classica, sedes doctrinae, and the science which treated proof passages was termed topica.

² Foedus naturae et operum and foedus gratiae with economies ante legem, sub lege, and post legem. Comp. Al. Schweizer, Ref. Dogm., p. 108 sqq.

³ 1. Of the state of sin; 2. Of the state of grace; 3. The facts of Christianity (which hobble along at quite a distance).

⁴ Comp. Schweizer, ubi supra, p. 115 sqq.

stitute a part of his Christology.¹ Like Schleiermacher, he places the Trinity, "as the sum and consummation of Christology," at the end. Kling argues that Christology is entitled to the first place.² He agrees with Hahn in considering the doctrine of Christ as the Son of God and of man, the Saviour of the world, the fundamental doctrine of the Christian religion, but, diverging from that scholar, prefers to begin with the doctrine of the person of Christ.³

It is more correct, however, to regard the person of Christ as forming the centre of Christian dogmatics, to which all our knowledge respecting God and man refers in a prophetic way, and from which it again proceeds, as having been satisfied by Christ. While the character of Christianity is the "divinely human,"⁴ it yet appears to be a more natural method to consider, first, God in his relations to man apart from the mediation of Christ, as the Creator, Lawgiver, and Judge; next, man in his relations to God while unredeemed; (a) as the creature and image of God, (b) as a sinner, and (c) Christ as the God-man and Redeemer, the latter constituting the centre from which mankind as redeemed by him, as glorified in him, but also as progressing toward its consummation in him, is discussed. In this way the separate doctrines of salvation, or soteriology, and of the Church, the sacraments, and eschatology will form the completion of anthropology, on the one hand, while, on the other, the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, which finds its proper place at this point, in connexion with the exaltation of Christ and his kingly office, brings the doctrine of God in the Trinity to a full completion.

There is no propriety in discussing Christ before attention has been directed toward God and man, but it is not, on the other hand, possible to finish either the doctrine of God or of man without including Christ. The whole of the doctrine of the Trinity is left in the condition of an uncomprehended speculative problem, if it be not prefaced by Christology, and eschatology comes under notice too far in advance when treated, as it is by Hase, before the doctrine of Christ. The topical method, as a whole, may, therefore, be retained, but so that each topic shall find its completion

¹ Evangel. Dogmatik, 2d ed., p. 46 seqq.

² Gestalt der evang. Dogmatik in Tüb. Zeitschrift for 1884, No. 4.

³ Hahn's division is as follows: 1. Theology, consummated in the Son of God; 2. Anthropology, in the Son of man; 3. Soteriology, in the Redeemer; 4. The doctrine of the Church, as founded, governed, and consummated by Christ, the promised and glorified King of truth.

⁴ Comp. Ebrard's Inaugural Address, Die Gottmenschlichkeit des Christenthums, Zür., 1845.

in the others, and that, for that reason, it shall not be brought to a conclusion without bringing the others into account. Retention of topical method. This is the meaning which underlies the federative method, and, also, the arrangement of Schleiermacher. Both these methods seek to destroy the invariable and mechanical arrangement by which the articles succeed each other under regular rubrics, and to establish living relations among the various doctrines. We would not, therefore, argue in favour of the traditional method without modifications, as does Pelt,¹ though we see no reason for rejecting the customary terminology, such as theology, anthropology, and the rest.

The outlines of a system of dogmatics, such as we Outline of dog-matical system. should prefer, would be as follows:

1. God, and his relation to the world and to man as his creature. Natural, legal, and prophetic theology.

2. Man, as related to God and the world, so long as they have not been brought together through the mediation of Christ. The doctrine of man's primeval state; the destination of man, and sin.

3. The doctrine of the personality of the God-man and his work for the redemption of mankind. Christology and objective soteriology—the heart of Christian dogmatics.

4. Man as related to Christ, and through Christ to God. The doctrine of salvation, subjective soteriology, the ordo salutis. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit.

5. Man as related to Christ, and through Christ to the world. Communion of believers, the Church, and sacraments. Hence, also, man's changed relation to nature—death, the resurrection, and the whole of eschatology.

6. God, manifested in Christ, in his relation toward himself. The Christian doctrine of the Trinity in its immanent meaning.

7. God in his relation to the world, viewed in connexion with the fact of redemption.

The kernel of the whole, Christology, is thus inclosed within theology, and the interior connecting links will constitute the anthropology.

The attributes of God need not, in this arrangement, be separated from each other, as Schleiermacher's method requires. They may be placed under the first head, but would, of course, attain their full significance only at the end.

A method that corresponds, in the main, to the above, and that commends itself to favour by its clearness, is that of AL. Schweizer.¹ It possesses the additional advantage of having taken the so-called prolegomena, generally constituting a separate part, ^{schweizer's method.} in which the fundamental elements are laid down, from its isolation, and bringing it into organic connexion with the remainder of the system of belief. In this way he obtains the following division into three parts: 1. The laying of foundations, or the consciously realized faith of Christianity in the Evangelical Church as a whole; the apologetic, or better, the grounding part. 2. The elements contained in the pious Christian consciousness which do not involve the specifically peculiar character of Christianity—the elemental part. 3. The specifically Christian side or part. It is evident, of course, that the two former divisions will be more abbreviated than the latter.

¹ Encyklopaedie, p. 502.

SECTION VIII.

THEOLOGY.

Comp. Nitzsch, in Herzog, Encyklopædie, s. v. Gott.

Article Theology, in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, vol. x.

Theology is, in Christian dogmatics, used to designate the doctrine relating to God, and more especially God as he has appeared to man. Such theology has nothing in common with ^{Meaning of} ~~theology.~~ scepticism, which everywhere professes to know nothing about God, nor with that false dogmatism which claims to know more about God than he has permitted man to know. In treating his nature and attributes it, accordingly, has respect not to metaphysically ontological questions as it does to religious considerations, and is conscious of the figurative character of the language and modes of reference it must employ, as well as of the real and substantial basis upon which such language and modes rest.

We may appropriate to ourselves the assertion of Feuerbach, that theology is, at bottom, merely anthropology, without accepting it in the sense of Feuerbach. In fact, his definition may even be employed against him. We concede that, in a certain sense, theology is anthropology, and that it must be anthropological through and through, if it be acknowledged, on the other hand, that anthropology is also modified by theology, or that the two are simply diverging members of a single body, which body is religion. The Bible everywhere teaches a human God, that is, a God ^{God, human} ~~and superhu-~~ for man. This is the true anthropopathy. He is a God ^{man.} who is likewise superhuman, but whatever of the superhuman is revealed always has reference to the human element.

¹ Christliche Glaubenslehre nach Protestant. Grundsätzen, p. 86. Comp. the entire section, Methode der Glaubenslehre, p. 70 sqq.

The entire Old Testament speaks of God as dwelling in the midst of his people; the entire New Testament describes him as manifested in Christ, and through Christ become the father of humanity. Even the creation of heaven and earth is narrated in a human method, that is, from a human point of view, and is adapted to the needs of man, whose home is in the earth.

This constitutes religion, which dogmatics is to apprehend, in all wisdom and humility, as the religion that emanates from God, and is willed and ordered by him. It does not seek to comprehend God as he exists from eternity to eternity; it is satisfied to know that he is. But it desires to know every thing respecting his nature that he has revealed to man, and also the relation into which he has entered with man, who is modelled after the image of God. Hence, all sound dogmatic theologians have, from the beginning, asserted the incomprehensibility of God as strongly as they have ^{Incomprehensibility of God.} taught that, with reference to our salvation, he is comprehensible by us,¹ and they have demonstrated, in the works of creation and redemption, the glories of his character which have been made known to us. Their position is at once that occupied by reason and the Scriptures.

Dogmatics is not obliged to prove the existence of God. But it, nevertheless, takes that slender thread which runs through the history of the human race which inquires after God, and points out how the consciousness that he exists is manifested in connexion with the different forms of argument—the physico-theological, cosmological, ontological, historical, moral, and the rest—and that the very fact that search for such proof is made, is, in this case, of itself a sufficient proof.² It treats the attributes of God, not as coming upon him from without, and attaching themselves to him in an external way, but as being the unfolding of his nature in behalf of our natural and moral consciousness.

Here, then, is the place in which to discuss the relation of God to the world and the human spirit, but in an ethical and religious light,

¹ Comp. the citations from the Fathers in Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 27 (Smith's ed.).

² "More than one hundred demonstrations in geometry have been made of the Pythagorean theorem, all of which accomplish the same object. Innumerable proofs of the existence of God have likewise been constructed, but they failed to accomplish what they promised to achieve. . . . God is not a right-angled triangle, and it is not possible to invent either numerous or striking evidences respecting him. There is but one proof for God, and this he wields himself."—Rosenkranz, Encyklopaedie, p. 6. Hamann, already, remarks that "if he is a fool who denies God, he is a much greater fool who attempts to prove his existence." Comp., however, G. A. Fricke, Argumenta pro Dei existentia exponuntur et judicantur. Lips., 1846.

rather than in that of pure speculation: The idea of the divine personality is here to be investigated in its religious bearings, and anthropomorphism and anthropopathy here find their psychological basis and theological corrective, the language of the Bible and the needs of the human heart being duly recognized.¹

The doctrines of the creation and preservation of the world, of Providence and the government of the world, as well as of sin (theodicy), all depend on theology. Here, again, dogmatics is required to fix a clear boundary between matters which belong to the religious conception of the world and those which are properly cosmical in their character. The older dogmatic theologians, even John of Damascus, included physics, natural history, and astronomy. But the more recent science has properly thrown over all such ballast. Still, there is constant temptation to wander off into foreign fields, such as geological researches with reference to the narrative of the creation. Theology must content itself with the idea of creation as such.

The doctrines of angels and of demons are usually connected with that of creation, though the second one stands more particularly related to the doctrine of the fall, and hence with that of sin. It is to be remembered, however, that the idea of angels was in existence when Christianity appeared, and that the latter adopted the existing views without formulating them into a distinct doctrine, or founding on them any material feature of revealed religion. Here, again, we meet the temptation of straying off into false metaphysics, of identifying, without qualification, the poetic with the didactic, and popular figurative notions with definite scientific statements, all of which are not easy to keep asunder in the given case. Or, we are exposed to the danger of a gross realism, by which the one element is mistaken for the other. It is, therefore, necessary to commend at this point that judicious dogmatical procedure which aims, first of all, to bring the religious element of a doctrine into prominence, and thereby naturally preserve the true medium between coarse literalism and superficial negation.²

¹ Comp. § 29. "Human forms of speech, anthropomorphisms, are most frequently applied to God when piety is vital and communion with him is habitual; and the Bible leads in this direction; so that, in this very matter, and even in expressions that are at first offensive to reason and exposed to ridicule, there is reason for admiring the high degree of pedagogical wisdom in religious things, however great the naïveté, and for observing that even the pious naïveté alone has the best of the argument."—Hirzel, in the Kirchenfreund, 1878, No. 10, p. 154, article Zum Streit und Freiden.

² Comp. the article Engel, in Herzog's Encyklopædie, iv, by Boehmer. It is not

SECTION IX.

ANTHROPOLOGY.

Theological differs from physiological anthropology in that, although it proceeds upon the basis of man's natural condition, it does not regard him in his relation to nature, but as he stands related to God. It is divided into the two leading sections of a doctrine of man's original state prior to the fall, and a doctrine of the fall and of sin, which was thereby introduced into human nature, and has since perpetuated itself and been actualized in the experience of every individual.

Theological anthropology of a scientific character is, of course, impossible apart from physiological anthropology; that is, apart from all acquaintance with man as naturally constituted. But the latter serves merely as a natural foundation. The most perfect familiarity with human nature in its anatomical and physiological, and even in its psychological, aspects, in so far as psychology restricts itself to psychological limits, will not be competent to disclose to our view the religious nature of man.¹ It is allowable, of course, to find mere accommodation in the discourses of our Lord which relate to the world of angels and demons, which are not only based on a religious idea, but also on an earnest reality. The doctrine concerning Satan, for instance, rests on the fact of the power of evil, which reaches down into the deepest abysses of darkness (Daub's Ischarioth). It has been wittily said by Rougemont, with reference to this point: Men have pretended that all the demonology of Jesus was only an accommodation to the prejudices of his people and his age. This is as much as to say that the battles of Alma and Inkerman are only an accommodation of Napoleon III. to the prejudices of the French against the Russians. What struggle has ever been more real, more terrible, more gigantic, than that of the Son of God and of Satan in the wilderness?—Christ et ses Temoins, vol. i, p. 152. But this yields no stronger proof for the personality of Satan than for that of death, sin, or hell, which, likewise, are powers that were overcome by Christ in a real sense, and not figuratively only. The figurative designation of the thing is here interchanged with the thing itself, whose reality continues unchanged. Schenkel, following in the footsteps of Schleiermacher, has subjected the doctrine of the devil to the light of a rigorous criticism (Dogmatik, i, p. 247 sqq.). On the other hand, persons are not wanting who hold that effects are still produced, and persons possessed, by demons at the present time.

¹ The remark of Rosenkranz (Encykl., p. 38), that "theological anthropology has nothing to do with the physical and intellectual nature of man," is too strong. But it is true that "it must turn over the consideration of that nature to philosophical anthropology, and fix its attention on the relation in which man stands to God." Comp. Harless, in preface to his Ethik (4th ed.): "I believe that our divines would do well by not restraining their interest in the field of physical research too far; for it is only in the light of unjustifiable abstraction that the latter can seem to have nothing in common with the mind." Darwin's theory of the descent of man, tracing him back true that this religious nature of man may be apprehended to some extent by psychological inquiry, but, by this method, man appears only as an isolated specimen of his race; and a penetrating observation of his nature is afforded only by the history of mankind in connexion with the revelations made by God. We, therefore, urge that, as in dogmatics, theology is required to be anthropological, so, in like manner, must anthropology be theological.¹ The questions which relate to body and soul, or body, soul, and spirit, and to the origin of the latter (pre-existence, traducianism, creationism), are in place here only in so far as one theory or another becomes necessary for the understanding of man's religious nature.

The proper course of dogmatical procedure will be to apprehend in their real spirit the few grand indications of the Scriptures upon such matters as the image of God, and to so present them to our spirit through the medium of exegesis, history, and philosophy, as The high idea of humanity. to enable us to grasp the more exalted idea of humanity. ity beneath the figurative language by which it is expressed. Upon the correct apprehension of that idea depends the correct view of sin, whether it is to be considered a mere negation, or natural deficiency, or a privation, depravation, and perversion of human nature. These are the terms that distinguish between the Protestant and the Roman Catholic views.

The history of man's fall into sin is likewise involved in great difficulties when regarded as simple history. But the genesis of sin, as repeated daily, may, nevertheless, be demonstrated from the masterly and matchless narrative. It is impossible to deny that the consciousness of a common guilt, of which every individual partakes, is profoundly religious in its nature, and attested by both Scripture and experience. Nowhere do psychological inquiry and The doctrine of sin. the study of God's word, considered as the judge of human thoughts, more fully complement, or rather explain, each other than in the doctrine of sin. Does not Paul speak on this point (Rom. vii) with reference to his own experience, and from out of the depths of human nature as a whole? The same holds true of Augustine and Luther. Abstract reason will, of course, always incline toward Pelagianism upon such doctrines, since it affords a necessary corrective in many particular respects.

to an ape, which has been so much discussed of late, will not at all disturb the scholar who knows how to distinguish between the domain of religion and that kind of natural science which must often take a backward step; but it will afford food for reflection and for profounder thought with respect to the limitations of our knowledge.

¹ Comp. Bunsen, Hippolytus i, p. 289 seqq.

But the mind derives no satisfaction from that course, inasmuch as it is continually reminded of a rupture that is more profound than reflection is able to perceive.¹

SECTION X.

CHRISTOLOGY.

Comp. Kling, in Herzog's Encyclopædie, s. v. II, and article Christology, in McClinton and Strong's Cyclopedia, vol. II.

Inasmuch as the religious relation subsisting between God and man finds its historical exemplification only, and in a peculiar manner, in the person of Jesus Christ, the God-man, Christology must constitute, not merely an essential part, but the very centre of a system of dogmatics. Its task will be to conceive Jesus as sinless man, as free from error, in so far as this stands connected with sin, and, for that reason, as being the only-begotten Son of God, and God manifest in the flesh. It will be required to harmonize the qualities which Jesus possesses in common with the race, or human nature, with those which stamp him as unique, and exalt him above the race, and, therefore, of the divine nature, without, on that account, being authorized to set aside his real and complete humanity, or to obscure the greatness of his specific deity.

The life of Jesus forms the historic basis of Christology. But the latter has to cultivate thoroughly a ground which the former, in its character as a purely historical science, could not include within its territory.² There has been no lack, however, of theologians who assert that Christology is superfluous, and who thereby stab Christian dogmatics, considered as specifically Christian, to the heart.³ Their dogmatics is confined altogether to theology and anthropology, and in the progress of their works Christ appears simply as one theologian and anthropologist among others, to whom an occasional appeal is made, but not as the θεάνθρωπος, who is himself the central feature of dogmatics.

¹ Comp. Hundeshagen, Der Weg zu Christo, i, p. 136.

² Rothe, among others, points out the necessity of apprehending the divine nature of Christ from the study of the picture of his human life: "To speak of recognizing and acknowledging the divine element in Christ without having observed it shine forth from what is human in him, or having caught its reflection in the mirror of his humanity, is merely to bandy idle words. . . . Apart from the underlying oasis of humanity, the whole of the sacred life and work of Jesus by which redemption was effected becomes a magnificent phantasmagoria, an empty pageant, upon which no one may depend for comfort and for hope either in life or death. The unavoidable consequence, in short, is unmitigated Docetism."—In Schenkel's Zeitschrift, pp. 380, 383.

³ Thus by Henke, in the preface to his Linamenta, p. 12: "Ut omnis haec in Christum religio ad religionem Christi magis revocetur, omni opera contendendum est." Comp. Röhr, Briefe über Rationalismus, p. 36: "What supernaturalists term Christology in their dogmatics does not appear in my system as an integral part at all; for, while it constitutes a religion which Jesus taught, it is not one whose object he

But objection against this very θεάνθρωπος idea has been raised from many quarters. The term, it is true, is not biblical, and cannot be found in the Bible Dictionary. But can all the terms with which the attributes of God are designated, and others with which dogmatics has been enriched, be found in the Bible? The term "God-man" may, no doubt, be so understood as to involve a contradiction. If the idea proceeds on the assumption of an un-human God and an un-divine man, who are to be joined together in an outward form, the one will necessarily exclude the other; in other words, the ancient "finite is not capable of the infinite." But it has been correctly shown that the divinely human character of Christianity and the divine humanity of the Saviour condition each other.¹ It is only necessary to remember, in this matter, that language of this character is developed on the soil of religion, and not on that of abstract speculation. The entire doctrine of the person of Christ may be apprehended in a very irrational way, either as describing the mechanical contact of two dissimilar things, the two members of the Form of Concord, or as a mixture of divine and human elements, as we see in Apollinarism.² In this way the one is disturbed and obscured by the other rather than modified and complemented by it.

The doctrine of the Church itself has not always been free from abstruse and confusing definitions, though it has, with correct judgment, continued to insist on the ἀσυγχύτως, ἀτρέπτως, ἀδιαρέτως, and ἀχωρίστως. The truth upon this subject cannot be intuitively understood, but may be apprehended in its character as a truth to be accepted by faith; and while the truly wise may arrive at an understanding with regard to it, a satisfactory agreement and a logical settlement upon its merits are utterly impossible to persons who are merely puffed up with their knowledge.

The history of doctrines affords the most striking evidences of might be himself." The most recent rationalizing theology seems inclined to return to this Ebionitic view. Vide the "Schlussbetrachtung" in Strauss' Life of Jesus for the German People.

¹ Ebrard, ubi supra.

² Comp. the History of Doctrines. Guizot, however, still speaks of a "continual mixture of the divine and the human."

this fact. Whenever the attempt is made to bring Christology to a logical conclusion, and formulate it, the difficulty of avoiding Ebionitism or Docetism, Nestorianism or Monophysitism, which stand on either side like Scylla and Charybdis, will present itself, and the history of doctrines will require to defend itself against the attacks of various forms of heresy in the manner best suited to repel the antagonizing error. The reason for this fact does not, however, lie in the doctrine itself, with its infinite significance, but in the human limitations which affect the dogmatics of each particular age.¹

SECTION XL

SOTERIOLOGY.

Most intimately connected with the doctrine of the Redeemer's person is the doctrine of the salvation which depends on him, and of the appropriation of this salvation on our part by faith. This is soteriology. Its objective side is found in the work of Christ, in the redemption and atonement wrought by him. Its subjective side is found in the work of the Holy Spirit upon the human heart,

¹ The merely complementary relation sustained by the two leading confessions of Protestantism to each other is pointed out by Schneckenburger, Vom doppelten Stande Christi, Pforzheim, 1848. Jul. Müller beautifully observes that "at this point evangelical theology needs a new development out of the Holy Scriptures as the original source of doctrinal life, and accompanied with a rejection of the entire ballast of formulas, which, in the dogmatics of former times, was connected with the idea of the communis naturarum. In such development the leading object must be held to the preservation in doctrinal form of the evangelical picture of the life of Jesus Christ in its human truthfulness and comprehensibility, undeterred by monophysite, docetic, or Nestorian opinions, but accompanied by the declaration that this man Jesus Christ is the logos, in the flesh, God of God, born in eternity of the Father. . . . The thought that he who, as the eternal logos, is with the Father, is at the same time a true Son of man, contains such an inexhaustible fulness of knowledge respecting the common salvation, that every division based on the effort to definitely formulate the relation between the divine and human natures in Christ becomes a sin committed against the God-man himself, to whom all profess a common allegiance.—Die evangel. Union, ihr Wesen und ihr Göttliches Recht, 1st ed., Berl., 1854, p. 816 sqq. Comp. also Rothe, ubi supra, p. 384: "When this shall have become clear, that moral unity with God is to be conceived as not ideal only, but as real, as the result of a more thorough acquaintance with the interior nature of moral being, then shall we also, for the first time, have grasped the key to Christology, and behold a living Christ, in sharp and vivid outlines, before the eye of the mind—a Christ who is bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, and at the same time the only begotten of the Father, in whose presence we are constrained to bow and exclaim with Thomas, 'My Lord and my God!' Then will the breathings of our faith be deep and joyous, when it has seen the dawning of this bright light in the midst of darkness—it is faith in Christ, instead of unbelief, which has penetrated through the dogma."

the different gradations of which are denominated the order of salvation. The principal points to settle are, the relation of justification to sanctification, of divine grace to human freedom, and of faith to works. The confessional opposition between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism is more sharply defined in this field than in any other.

The doctrine of Christ's person would, indeed, belong to the realm of idle speculation if its only purpose were to conceive of Jesus as an isolated marvel upon the page of history, or as a God-man who appears and vanishes away like some meteor. But this is not its object. Christ, as being the Son of God and Son of man, becomes the Mediator between God and man. He atones and redeems. His death is made to appear as the crowning point of his redeeming work, and Christ himself is the basis of reconciliation, the ἱλασμός. In him the old dies, and the new attains to life. Death and resurrection are the pivots upon which his character turns for the history of his world. The dogma concerning the death of Jesus belongs, in one respect, to Christology, as having proceeded out from the person of Christ. But, in its results, that death forms the condition of salvation, and the doctrine, therefore, belongs to soteriology. To apprehend this death in its religious significance, not from the idea of mere abstract right, as a satisfaction, nor yet from the idea of mere moral influence, as an example, but rather as a free thought of love, executed under a divine necessity in harmony with God's eternal decree, and as therefore fraught with infinite consequences for the entire human race, constitutes one of the highest problems of Christian dogmatics. In the solution of it the religious spirit is required to participate, as well as the reason, with its combining and analytical processes.¹

But it is as improper to isolate the work of Christ as to isolate his person. The death of Jesus is most intimately and organically connected with his life previous to his death, and with the development of the kingdom of God subsequent to his resurrection, and also with the regeneration of each individual. This is subjective soteriology, the order of salvation. The process which was regarded as dynamical by the Christianity of apostolic times, that is to say, the change wrought in man by the Spirit of God—repentance, regeneration, renewing of the spirit, and sanctification—was, in later days, classified under the heads of illumination, conversion, sanctification, and perseverance, and the whole made to tend toward the goal of a most intimate communion with God, a unio mystica cum Deo. The two ideas which are chiefly important here, however, and which the Protestant doctrine, as distinct from the Roman Catholic, clearly distinguishes from each other, are justification and sanctification. The former term is made ^{Justification and} to denote the acquittal of the sinner on the part of ^{sanctification.} God, considered simply as a declaratory act, while the latter designates the gracious process by which the personal life of an individual is developed into the divine. Although it is difficult to separate one from the other, their separation in the idea is required by the principle of evangelical Protestantism, that man is justified solely by the grace of God to the exclusion even of every consideration arising out of the good which God has wrought in man. This latter is simply a consequence resulting from the new relationship.

¹ Comp. Hagenbach's articles on this subject in the Kirchenbl. für die Ref. Schweiz, 1854, Nos. 7 and 9.

But the determining of the exact relation of the grace which makes man free to the will of man which thus attains to freedom—which must always enter into the account as a will, and, therefore, as relatively free—is among the most difficult of doctrinal problems, which so easily admit of a turning aside to either the right or left. Both the Scriptures and experience assert that, on the one hand, man is unable to perform any thing without the aid of God, and that, on the other, he possesses the power of choosing to obey the call of grace or to refuse its authority. The whole history of doctrines shows that, in some periods of the Church, the greater emphasis was laid on the freedom of the will, while in others its fettered state was made more prominent. This is the point at which it becomes necessary to develop the idea of freedom into clearness, and here, especially, the philosophy of religion and that of dogmatics flow into each other.¹ A profound study of the problem will always result in the inclination to set aside the contrast, and to distinguish between freedom and license, between necessity and compulsion, and between what is done by God in man and man in God, and what is done by man without God and by God without man.² The letter of the symbolical definitions in the doctrine of the Protestant Church is often too harsh and unmanageable, and cannot be fully maintained

¹ In our arrangement the doctrine of freedom will come under notice twice in the system: first in connexion with the doctrine of sin, and next in connexion with that of grace. Anthropology, in general, will also fall into these two halves.

² "The solution of the great problem is found by turning the attention away from an abstract consideration of man and his separation from God, and fixing it upon the constant divine influence by which man becomes a higher personality; thus the possibility of a free self-determination even toward the good is always preserved. The idea of a separation between divine causality and the free activity of man must be given up; both are with and in each other," etc.—Kling, ubi supra, p. 32.

in every feature of such definition. But the evangelical principle, which finds expression in that form, will eventually be recognized as the true and the only principle that can abide every test.

SECTION XII.

THE CHURCH AND THE SACRAMENTS.

The salvation which proceeds from Christ reaches the individual through the medium of the religious community. The individual, however, enters into a living relation with that community only through faith in Christ. Thus the doctrine of Christ and the doctrine of the Church condition each other. Dogmatics has to deal with the idea of the Church only on its interior or religious side, the external relation of the Church to the State and its political organization falling within the province of ecclesiastical law. Dogmatics, however, is obliged to furnish the governing ideas for the guidance of the latter. Its office with relation to the means of grace to be administered by the Church—the word of God and the sacraments—is, in like manner, to apprehend them in their religious significance, while the careful determination of the most appropriate mode of conducting the administration belongs to liturgics.

"The importance of the doctrine of the Church," says Köstlin, "for the science of Christian teaching, while it has been remarkably misapprehended during an extended period, has more recently been recognized the more clearly and emphatically."¹ But many an error has been committed in the process, and what is outward has been made prominent to a degree that suggests danger, and in a manner that can hardly be reconciled with the spirit of the reformers, or even with that of Luther, the authority of whose example is invoked.² Whether, as Schleiermacher states the contrast, the Roman Catholic view, that the individual must come to Christ through the Church, be maintained, or the Protestant, that he can come to the Church only through faith in Christ—the former is empirically true, the latter ideally so—it is yet undeniable, from any point of view, that the religious character of the doctrine of the Church can only be understood through the doctrine of Christ. The doctrine of the Church is, in the next place, connected with the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, in conformity with the expression of Irenæus, “Ubi ecclesia, ibi et Spiritus Sanctus; et ubi Spiritus Sanctus, ibi et ecclesia.” Schleiermacher, therefore, brought the doctrines of the Holy Spirit and of the Church into the closest connexion, as the Apostles’ Creed had also done at a much earlier period.

¹ Luther's Lehre von der Kirche (Stuttg., 1853), p. 1. There is much conflict of opinion upon this doctrine at the present time; "but so much is settled that Protestantism is divided among itself not so much with reference to the idea of the Church as concerning the relation of the phenomenon to the idea."—Schenkel, ubi supra, p. 589. The point at issue is whether the Church should be regarded in the light of a remedial institution in which persons are to be trained for citizenship in the kingdom of God, or in the light of an organized community, in which the kingdom of God is, however imperfectly, already apparent and actually present.

² "It is undeniable that, despite its blessings, a disagreeable element of darkness has, in most periods, attached to the Church through which the most exclusive churchmen have, as a class, obtained the greatest prominence, namely, a passionate insisting on the correctness of received views, a mania for fastening the charge of heresy upon opponents, an exaggerated love for the form they represented. If this old ecclesiastical Adam should ever be restored, a certain distinguished theologian (R. Rothe, in

Doctrine of Christ necessary to understand doctrine of Church.

The Protestant distinction between the visible and the invisible Church would assign the latter only to the province of dogmatics, as essential to the faith, while the former would belong to the domain of politics; and questions relating to the constitution of the Church do, in point of fact, seem to be sadly out of place in a doctrinal work, particularly a Protestant one. But inasmuch as the invisible cannot be absolutely separated from the visible, and inasmuch as it does not manifest itself by the side of the visible, and as exterior to it, but rather in the visible, it will always be necessary for dogmatics to recognize the vessel in which the spirit of the religious community manifests itself. The task of settling the fundamental forms of ecclesiastical life, by which alone that life can maintain its ecclesiastical character, is thus devolved upon dogmatics. While pointing out the spiritual nature of the Church, dogmatics is required to guard the Church, as being holy, against degenerating into worldliness; against divisions and dismemberment by insisting upon her unity; and against separatistic schisms by asserting her universal character. The purely external administration of the Church, as variously modified by conditions of time and place, is turned over to another department, that of ecclesiastical politics and ecclesiastical law.

The same reasoning which applies to the constitution of the Church applies also to Church worship. The ordering of the latter devolves upon liturgics. But liturgics is based on dogmatics, and derives from it the instructions upon which it is to proceed. The fundamental, unchangeable, and his Theol. Ethik.) would be obliged to gain new adherents to the opinion that Christianity can attain to itself and its real nature only by the process of completely stripping off its ecclesiastical envelopments.”—A. Schweitzer, Die Prot. Central Dogmen, vol. i, p. 19.

Liturgics based on dogmatics.

divinely ordered types of Christian worship, the word and the sacraments, are most intimately connected with the life of believers, and thus constitute an essential part of dogmatics. Considered as means of grace, an adminicula gratiæ, they will stand connected with the doctrines of salvation and grace in general, while in their character as institutions of the Church they will need to be placed under the doctrine of the Church.

The idea of a sacrament is not of scriptural origin,¹ but was gradually developed in the consciousness of the Church. The institution of the so-called sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper, however, is of biblical origin.² The signification of these ordinances is still the ground of much controversy between denominations and schools. Much depends upon a profound penetration into the nature of a religious symbol, so as to prevent it from degenerating into a merely arbitrary ceremony, and from becoming involved in the magical notion of a purely objective efficiency, an opus operatum.³ The connecting medium is faith. But in the proportion in which misapprehension prevails on the part of the principal confessions of Protestantism themselves, should dogmatics be intent upon discovering a term which will be satisfying to the religious feeling, without doing offence to a simple apprehension of the pure word of Scripture and its sound interpretation.

SECTION XIII.

ESCHATOLOGY.

Inasmuch as the kingdom of God, which manifests itself on earth under the form of a church community, is progressing toward an ultimate consummation, dogmatics groups the aggregate of the hopes dependent on Christianity into the prophetic doctrines of death, the resurrection, the judgment of the world, and eternal life. These are denominated the last things, and the teaching in which they are presented is termed eschatology.

¹ Calixtus saw and insisted upon this; Epit., p. 128 (Henke, Calixt. i, p. 299). Even Melancthon objected to the term "sacramentum" at first, as being un-biblical (Loci Comm. of 1521, in Bretschneider, Corp., p. 210). Comp. Hagenbach, Hist. Doctr., § 258, note 2 (Smith's ed.).

² The institution of baptism has, of course, been questioned by the sort of criticism which remands everything to the realm of vision which the Gospels record concerning the risen Jesus. Such house-cleaning labours by the radical method will not cause any considerable damage, however, while a community of believers exists to whom the form of the risen Lord is more than a phantom.

³ Schenkel has emphasized the objective theological side of a sacrament on the Protestant view in opposition to the merely subjective anthropological conception. Comp. his Wesen des Protestantismus i, p. 395, and the preface, p. xi; but comp. also his Dogmatik, and other writings of later date, in which a different view is advocated.

The question whether the soul be immortal may be raised in connexion with the doctrine of the creation of man, or ^{immortality not to be confounded with eschatology.} anthropology. But the question concerning immortality, in the most general acceptation, must not be ^{confounded with the inquiry respecting the last things, which has less to do with the natural constitution of the soul and the destiny of individuals after death than with the world's development as a whole and the ultimate consummation of the kingdom of God.} ogy.

For this reason the position, in connexion with the doctrines of man and before the Church has come under notice, to which Hase assigned eschatology, is inappropriate. The most proper place for the doctrine respecting death is not, indeed, among the four last things; it may, more appropriately, be connected with the doctrine of sin. Its only claim to a place under eschatology lies in the teaching that death also shall be swallowed up in victory (1 Cor. xv, 54). The doctrines of the resurrection and the last judgment are characterized wholly by the scriptural mode of representation; the figurative form is unmistakable; but the vision is required to look beyond the figure to the eternal truth reflected in its imagery,¹ even though it will not be possible to comprehend these several doctrines within a fully rounded circle of adequate conceptions.²

¹ See de Wette, Kirchliche Dogmatik, p. 218: "The difficulties can be obviated only by distinguishing the purely doctrinal elements from those which are symbolically historical. . . . But the two must be re-combined into a living hope which is not ruled merely by an obstinate concern for the destiny of individuals, but which, likewise, has regard to the fate of the whole. The eternal and the temporal, which are always involved in and connected with each other, are thus conjoined."

² Comp. the prophetic doctrines in Schleiermacher's Glaubenslehre. The extra-scriptural chiliastic vagaries and fancies, together with the hypotheses of soul-sleeping, hades, etc., have, without exception, been able to maintain themselves only within the sphere of the most narrow formulations of doctrine. Such doctrines have, however, been discussed with greater confidence in recent than in the older theology. Rothe, in his Ethik, ii, pp. 154-169, 480 seq., has sought, in a very peculiar manner, to open the way toward a more elevated solution of the problems of eschatology. Comp. also the labours of Auberlen and others. We cannot refrain, however, from directing attention to a statement by Palmer, which deserves consideration at this particular juncture: "The Jewish scribes, before the manifestation of Christ, were unable to construct, from the prophecies of the Old Testament alone, a picture of the Messiah whose truthfulness might still be recognized after he had appeared, although every person who would use his eyes was, after his appearing, compelled to see that the Old Testament predictions were fulfilled in the person and work of Christ. So is it improbable that we should ever succeed in obtaining from the scriptural indications

If this might be accomplished, hope would cease to be hope and would become realization, and faith would be transformed into sight. In opposition to a sentimental, and often selfish, doctrine of immortality, it becomes necessary to insist upon the truth that Christianity knows no other hopes than such as shall be realized in and through Christ; and that, consequently, it can return to the numerous questions which arise no other answer than that which is already contained in its christological creed—namely, that Christ himself is the resurrection and the life, and that in him all his children shall live.¹

Christian hope only to be realized in Christ.

SECTION XIV.

THE TRINITY AND PREDESTINATION.

The doctrine of God in his tri-unity comprehends all theology. But this aggregation can only be brought to pass after the practical and religious signification of Father, Son, and Spirit has been ascertained in its connexion with the historical development of the kingdom of God. The whole is comprehended by this one doctrine, as constituting the sacred mystery of Christianity, and the doctrine of election is most intimately connected with it. Both the eternal nature of God as related to himself, and his eternal decree, lie outside of the relation of God to finite being, and consequently outside of the sphere of practical religion. They are, therefore, in the strictest sense, of a speculative nature, and move wholly within the realm of the absolute.

Election connected with the Trinity.

The terms triad and trinity, together with the idea upon which they rest, are extra-biblical. But it does not follow that the idea is, on that account, unscriptural. The very contrary is true; for the whole of New Testament theology is erected upon a monorespecting the future and the consummation of the kingdom of God a harmonious and completely rounded whole which might deserve the name of a system, while we are equally certain and assured that the ultimate fulfilment will authenticate the prophecy as being entirely true and consistent with itself. In such matters, even a thirst for theological knowledge will do better to restrain itself to moderate bounds than to assume the air of knowing what, nevertheless, is not known, and to look contemptuously down from the height of such γνώσις upon the ψιλλὴ πίστις with which the Church has contented itself for well-digested reasons." It may also be well to recommend special care with regard to a phrase of Oetinger's that has recently been much used and much abused, namely, "that corporeity is the end of the ways of God," as it may lead into a religious materialism which may become as dangerous as the irreligious sort, because unconsciously promoting its designs.

¹ Comp. Hermann Schultz, Die Voraussetzungen der christlichen Lehre von der Unsterblichkeit, Göttingen, 1861.

theistic, but trinitarian, foundation, since God the Father chooses mankind in Christ. Christ, as the Son, has redeemed it, and the Spirit imparts the assurance of salvation to believers, and completes the work of sanctification. Neither work is conceivable apart from the others; and it is for this reason that believers are baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that the substance of the Christian doctrine of redemption is concentrated into a trinitarian formula in the apostolic benediction in 2 Cor. xiii, 14, and elsewhere.

But it is equally certain that the Bible does not emphasize the relation subsisting between the Persons¹ of the Trinity so much as the relation sustained by God to man. Trinity less emphasized than God's relation to man. When John opens his prologue with "In the beginning was the Word," he yet turns at once to his principal theme, the theme upon which he makes all else to depend, καὶ ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο. He regards the manifestation of God in Christ as the most essential feature, and therefore emphasizes it again in his first epistle, where he asserts that the Son of God came into the flesh. The scriptural Triad is, consequently, predominantly a triad for purposes of revelation, while the relations immanent to it are, at most, simply alluded to. Nor should it be forgotten, that the Logos idea itself is not a new or strictly Christian thought, but was already present, as we see in Philo, in the speculative culture of the time. But inasmuch as God has manifested nothing except his nature, it will not be improper to retain the names of Father, Son, and Spirit, not, with Sabellius, as mere names, but as "distinguishing hypostatical terms."²

The salvation taught by dogmatics should not, however, be made to depend on such subtleties. We have every respect for the speculative doctrine of the Trinity; but it is a Salvation not dependent on subtleties. theological sanctuary which only anointed and approved minds, with pure intentions, may seek to penetrate. The doctrine, has, moreover, been loaded with many absurdities from time to time, and even pantheistic infidelity has concealed itself behind such intricacies in order to attack historical Christianity from behind such cover. The same is true of the mystery of predestination. Who has ascertained God's decree? A religious faith, as contrasted with the superficial creed of Pelagianism, is compelled to acknowledge that salvation is not the result of accident, and not wrought out primarily by ourselves, but that it is a salvation that is willed and decreed by God, based on a foreknowledge of character and works. The problem of God's foreknowledge, and rewards and punishments based on it, we may not solve. It is wiser and more edifying for us to recall continually to mind the narrow limits of the human understanding, and to stand reverently still, with the apostle, before the riches both of the knowledge and the grace of God.

¹ The word "Person" is likewise extra-biblical, and in many respects inappropriate. "The very terms 'Father' and 'Son' indicate that they have reference to the manifestation of God, and not to his immanent and extra-mundane being" (p. 296).

² Kling considers this expression to observe the correct medium between the Sabellian and the Athanasian theories (ubi supra, p. 38).

SECTION XV.

ORTHODOXY AND HETERODOXY.

Schleiermacher, § 206 sqq., and the discussions on orthodoxy and orthodox views by Ricker, Krause, and Hase, in the Protest. Kirchenzeitung für das Evangl. Deutschland for 1854; Feit, in Herzog's Encyclopædie, x, s. v.

James F. Clarke, Orthodoxy: Its Truths and Errors. Boston, 1875. John W. Donaldson, Christian Orthodoxy Reconciled with the Conclusions of Modern Biblical Learning. Lond., 1867. Daniel Dorchester, Concessions of Liberalists to Orthodoxy. Boston, 1878.

A dogmatical system is said to be orthodox in so far as it is in harmony with the doctrine of the Church, as contained in its symbols, and with the conclusions deduced from such doctrine. It is heterodox in so far as it departs from the accepted belief of the Church. This distinction should not be identified with that made between supernaturalism and rationalism, which has already been discussed, although it has many points of contact with the latter.

The term orthodox is to be taken in its historical rather than its etymological meaning in this connexion, for it is to be presumed that every instructor will aim to teach the truth, and to be orthodox in this sense of the word. The conservative in ecclesiastical matters may, accordingly, be regarded as constituting the orthodox feature, while the mobile will characterize the heterodox. Orthodoxy, moreover, is not to be identified with supernaturalism. The two ideas, to say the least, are not coextensive. A great number of heterodox notions had their origin in a period when supernaturalism was generally accepted. Socinianism, for example, is, to the half at least, supernaturalistic, and yet heterodox; and even ultra-supernaturalist opinions may turn over into heterodoxy, as we see in patripassianism. The Church and its creed, rather than the Bible, though Bible-orthodoxy is sometimes spoken of, constitute the measure of orthodoxy, in the strictly technical meaning of the word. It follows, that even the strictest supernaturalist will be heterodox, in so far as his relation to his own Church is concerned, whenever he diverges from her doctrine—for instance, a Lutheran who should incline toward Orthodoxy not to be confounded with supernaturalism.

Roman Catholicism, or a member of a Calvinistic Church who should incline toward Lutheranism. Rationalism is, no doubt, a heterodox phenomenon, in all its tendencies. But as contrasted with the supernaturalist, the rationalist himself might have the support of orthodoxy upon a given question. He might, for instance, take ground with the Reformed Church upon the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, or with the Lutheran Church upon the question of predestination. Nor is it difficult to show that pietism, with all its biblical supernaturalism, includes many heterodox elements. Where, indeed, can a thoroughly orthodox person be found in our day, whose views shall be so correct as that the defenders of the old-time Lutheran or Reformed orthodoxy will find no feature that is open to objections?

The genuine dogmatic theologian should pursue no other purpose than to present the truths of the Christian faith in purity, and in harmony with the Bible and the results of historical development, recognizing the goal toward which such development tends, and the requirements of the present age. He will obey the apostolic canon, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." He will, accordingly, be both conservative and reformatory in his methods; for "the endeavour to retain, in the dogmatical development, matters which have become wholly antiquated in the public promulgations of the Church, and which exercise no definite influence upon other questions in the process of scientific discussion, is a false orthodoxy. To antagonize such formulas as have a well-established support in the formularies of the Church, and whose scientific expression is not confused by the relation sustained by them to other doctrines, is false heterodoxy."¹

¹ Schenkel says: "No greater error and no more hurtful notion can be found than exist in the fancy that the work of the Reformation was accomplished, and even completed, three hundred years ago, and that every step beyond the original position of the reformers is apostasy from the Reformation itself; that to go back to the finished theological system of Protestantism, as contained in confessional writings, and to settle down in them for all time to come, constitutes the chief duty of a believing theology and of a Church which has attained to greater freedom and independence."—Wesen des Protestantismus, iii, 1, Pref., p. iv. Similar language is employed by a French writer: "The Reformation is not the last word of Christianity, and the God who has revealed himself to us in his Gospel has yet many revelations to make to us on the thoughts, the concealed riches, and the infinite applications of the word of life. . . . Ignorance believes voluntarily in the absolute truth; but education and experience teach us to see shadows where we find contrasts, and simple differences where all seemed apparition."—Lettres à mon Curé, p. 47. Geneva, 1854. Hase remarks (Dogmatik, 5th ed., p. 9), with entire correctness: "Orthodoxy, as designating unanimity with regard to the teaching of the Church as sustained by the written law, is authorized in the evangelical Church. But so, likewise, are individual divergences

SECTION XVI.

THE HISTORY OF DOGMATICS.

Comp. Ch. G. Heinrich, Versuch einer Geschichte der verschiedenen Lehrarten der christlichen Wahrheiten, etc., Lpz., 1790; J. H. Schickedanz, Vers. einer Gesch. d. christl. Glaubenslehre, Braunsch., 1827; W. Herrmann, Geschichte der prot. Dogmatik, von Melanchthon bis Schleiermacher, Lpz., 1842; J. F. Lange, Christl. Dogmatik, 1, p. 56 sqq.; W. Gass, Gesch. der prot. Dogmatik, etc. (vol. i, Construction of Basis and Dogmatism; vol. ii, Syncretism, the Formation of the Reformed School of Theology, Pietism; vol. iii, the Transition Period; vol. iv, Enlightenment and Rationalism. The Dogmatics of the Philosophical Schools. Schleiermacher and his Times), Berl., 1854-57; Hoppe, Dogmatik des deutschen Protestantismus im 16. Jahrhundert (§ 76); *Dorner, Gesch. d. prot. Theologie, Munich, 1867 (Engl. translation by Robson and Taylor, 2 vols., Edinb., 1871); Mücke, Die Dogmatik des 19. Jahrhunderts, etc., Gotha, 1867. Hodge: Systematic Theology (3 vols.), N. Y. 1872. Introduction (in Vol. I), pp. 1-183.

The earliest systematic collections of the doctrines of belief are found in the symbols and the confessions of faith. Origen, among the Church teachers of the first period, furnished a sketch of what we denominate a system of dogmatics, in his work on Principles. Of Augustine's works the following belong to this class: Manual to Laurentius (on Faith, Hope, and Charity), on Christian Doctrine and the Kingdom of God (each of the latter but partially), on Faith and Symbol, and on the Doctrines of the Church. He was followed by Fulgentius of Ruspe, Gennadius, and Junilius. In the Greek Church were produced the Catecheses of Gregory of Nyssa (Larger Catechetical Treatise), and of Cyril of Jerusalem (Catechism for the Baptized and to be Baptized), though they were more particularly designed for practical uses. The first to construct a dogmatics, in the strict sense, that is, a system of doctrine, was John of Damascus (730), in the work, Precise Statement of the Orthodox Faith, though the compiler, Isidore of Seville (died 636) had led the way with his Statement (3 books).

The dogmatics of the Middle Ages found its chief expression in scholasticism, which latter obtained a necessary complement in mysticism. John Scotus Erigena (died about 880) was eminent as a philosophical thinker of the 9th century. But his principal work, on the Division of Nature, is not a dogmatics in the strict meaning of the term. From the close of the 11th and the beginning of the 12th centuries downward, Anselm of Canterbury, Roscellin, and Abelard aroused the dogmatic spirit from and variations, provided only that they maintain a Christian and Protestant character. They both are placed under the law of a higher orthodoxy, namely, the perfect truth of Christianity, and it is incumbent upon Christian charity that it preserve the feeling of unity in the midst of such differences, and even of dispute. Whatever antagonizes Christianity, however, must be excluded as heretical, even though it lay claim to the Christian character." On the distinction between heterodoxy and heresy comp. Schenkel, Dogmatik, i, p. 186, and Martensen.

various directions, and sought to bring about a reconciliation between knowledge and faith. But a properly systematic treatment in obedience to established rules dates back only to Peter Lombard, who died in 1164. The authors of such works, Robert Pulleyn, Peter of Poitiers, and others, were designated Sententarii. The Victorines, on the other hand, sought to combine mysticism, which rises to the surface from out of the depths of religious feeling, with dialectics.

An increased knowledge of Aristotle, after the Crusades, led to a still further development of scholasticism. Alexander Hales (Doctor irrefragabilis, died 1245), Albert Magnus (died 1280), and Thomas Aquinas (died 1274), the head of an entire school which was represented by the order of Dominicans, Summaries.

composed so-called Summæ. These were loosely constructed works, in which every proposition was subdivided into a number of questions, distinctions, and the like—a gigantic labour of the mind. The scholastic spirit, however, soon degenerated into the invention of hollow subtleties, a tendency which was especially facilitated by the prevalence of nominalism. The school of Thomists soon came to be opposed by the mystical school of Bonaventura (Doctor seraphicus, died 1274), and also by the dialectic school of Duns Scotus (Doctor subtilis, died 1308), both of which originated with the order of Franciscan monks. The dispute between the schools became at the same time a quarrel of the orders. The Summæ were now superseded by so-called Quodlibets; the number of the various questions approached infinity, and dogmatics was ultimately left without substance and worth. The free-thinking but sceptical William Occam (died 1347) was succeeded by the last of the scholastics, Gabriel Biel (died 1495), while mysticism, which had made progress in the practical field in the persons of Master Eckart, Tauler, Ruysbroek, and Suso, received scientific form at the hands of Gerson (Doctor christianissimus, died 1429).

Degeneration of dogmatics.

The cultivation of humanistic studies gave to dogmatics a many-sided spirit, but left it, at the first, without fixed principles for its control. The regeneration of dogmatics does not begin earlier than the Reformation. Luther was a preacher rather than a dogmatic theologian. The foundation for evangelical dogmatics as a science was laid by Melancthon, the Præceptor Germaniæ, in his Commonplaces (Loci Communes, Viteb., 1521; afterward Loci Praecipui Theologici). He was followed, in the Lutheran Church, by Martin Chemnitz (Theological Syllabus), Aegidius (died 1603), Nic. Hunnius (died 1643), and the rigidly zealous Leonh. Hutter (Lutherus Redivivus; died 1616).

Melancthon founder of Protestant dogmatics.

whose work (Loci, 1619) was directed especially against the milder school of Melancthon. Twisten published Hutter's Compendium in a second edition in 1863. A work of leading importance, Theological Commonplaces (Loci Theol., Jen., 1610-25, ix vols. 4to, edited by Cotta, Tub., 1772-81, xx vols. 4to, supplemented by Lutheran dogmatic writers. G. H. Müller, vols. xxi and xxii, 1788-89; latest edition E. Preuss, 1863-70, vols. i-viii, unfinished), was published by J. Gerhard (died 1637); and the works by Quenstedt (died 1688), König, Calov, Hollaz, Baier, and others are also deserving of mention. A new scholasticism unfolded itself in these works, which was counterbalanced by a new mystical tendency in J. Boehme, Weigel, Arndt, and others.

In the Reformed Church exegetical studies were prosecuted with more energy than dogmatical, and the latter were more dependent on the former than in the Lutheran Church, because the letter of the symbol was less authoritative in its influence over them. Zwingli's dogmatical labours (Brief and Pious Introduction to Protestant Doctrine, 1523; Commentary on the True and False Religion, 1525; Brief and Clear Exposition of the Christian Faith, 1536, et al.) are deserving of attention.

But Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion (Basle, 1535) is a work of the first importance, and comparable with the Loci of Melancthon. His successors were Bullinger, Musculus, Peter Martyr, Hyperius; and, in the seventeenth century, Keckermann, Polanus of Polansdorf, Alsted, Alting, Wolleb, Burmann, Heidanus, F. Heidegger, and others. The synthetical method having been usefully followed in the Lutheran Church after Melancthon, Cocceius (died 1669) and Leydecker now began to attempt different methods; for example, the Federal Theology and the OEconomical, in the order of the three persons of the Trinity. But a new method, the analytical, was introduced into the Lutheran Church by Calixtus. It begins with the end or final cause, the "final method," toward which the entire system of belief must tend. Many, including some of the writers already mentioned, followed in his track, the strictest of all being Dannhauer (died 1668) in his Christian Introduction, 1649.

A milder tendency, diverging from rigid orthodoxy, began to assert itself in Germany at the opening of the eighteenth century, toward whose introduction various phenomena in the spheres of both religion and philosophy contributed. This we see in Spener and Pietism, and in the Cartesian, Leibnitzian, and Wolfian philosophies. In the Reformed Church the Arminian tendency, represented by Limborch (died 1712; Christian Theology, 1686), gained a continually increasing number of adherents to its milder views, as did also the related tendency which went out from the school of Saumur. In the Lutheran Church a method increasingly controlled by the influence of the new period was introduced by Pfaff, in his Institutes (1720); Buddæus, in his Institutes of Doctrinal Theology (1723, 1741); Reinbeck (1731-41, 4 vols.), continued by J. G. Conz, (1743-47, 5-9 vols.); Carpov, (1737-65); Rambach (1744), and, under the determinate influence of the Wolfian philosophy, by Jac. Siegm. Baumgarten, in his System of Doctrine, published by Semler (1759 and 1760, 3 vols.). This tendency was also commended, with more or less fulness, by Semler, in his Institutes (1774), and Attempt at a Free Theological Method of Teaching (1777); and by Michaelis (1760, 1784), Teller (1764, 1782), Toellner (1775), Doederlein, Morus, and others, who thereby brought about ^{Transition to} the transition into rationalistic modes of thought, though they ^{rationalism.} guarded themselves with many qualifications.

After Gruner and Eckermann had prepared the way, Hencke compressed dogmatics, which had once extended over forests of folios, into a few "lineaments," in which process he threw overboard "Christolatry and Bibliolatry, as being mere remnants of an old-time superstition." Kant introduced a new era, and was joined, more or less fully, by ^{Reactionary} Tieftrunk, Stäudlin, and Ammon. ^{tendency of} Storr and Reinhard held fast the orthodox system, but rather with respect to its formal supernaturalism than as a rigid conformity to ecclesiastical tradition. ^{dogmatics.} Augusti, on the other hand, sought to restore the ancient system of doctrine, whose consistency even Lessing had conceded, to its place of honour, but without laying a deep foundation for it in philosophy, or bringing logical discrimination to bear on the question. The latter was much more efficiently done by De Wette, the former by Daub and Marheineke.

In opposition to this reactionary movement of dogmatics, as understood by rationalism, the latter, with entire consistency, took separate ground, finding its most adequate expression in Wegscheider's work, which must be regarded as the Corpus Doctrinæ of the tendency. Bretschneider pursued an intermediate course, though starting out with the fundamental ideas of rationalism. He also furnished a serviceable historical apparatus. Dogmatics thus seemed likely to be resolved into speculation in the one direction, or to sink beneath the mass of historical matter with which it was loaded down, or, finally, to be evaporated in the crucible of rationalistic hypercriticism. At this point ^{Schleiermacher's} Schleiermacher appeared with his System of Doctrines, in which he ^{dogmatics.}

did not base dogmatics upon either historical authority or philosophical speculation, but regarded it as representing the consciousness by which the Church is animated. From him dates a new period in the treatment of this science generally, though many continued even afterward to move in the ancient ruts. Knapp, Hahn, and Steudel, for instance, simply attached themselves to the older biblical and ecclesiastical system, while Hase, proceeding upon the basis of the doctrine of the Church as historically developed, strove to bring about its reconciliation with the advanced culture of the day, accomplishing the task with spirit and taste under the influence of modern philosophy, beginning with that of Schelling.

The spirit of Schleiermacher made itself positively felt, however, Twisten and Nitzsch. and pre-eminently through Twisten and Nitzsch, each of whom contributed, in his own way, to the securing of friends for the revealed faith of Christianity, which rationalism had given up as lost, even among the younger generation of theologians.¹ Other writers have sought to open newer paths, e. g., Tob. Beck, who sought to comprehend the substance of Bible teaching in a corresponding system with a specially prepared terminology, while avoiding the road which had been trodden hard by the schools. In opposition to serious efforts of this character arose the system of Strauss, which assumed the form of a dialectical process for the annihilation of dogma, but which, after it had reached its culmination in Feuerbach, could only lead to a new and thorough investigation of the dogma, based on a recognition of the indestructible basis upon which the life of the Christian faith is established.

The more important works which have since been issued afford the happiest evidence of this fact, and prove that Christian dogmatics has not yet reached its final form, but that it is Progress of most recent dogmatics. rather passing through a metamorphosis, from which it shall come forth with its youth renewed, and with a renewed disposition to clothe doctrine with fresh and appropriate forms, that shall prove to be more perfectly adapted to the deepest needs of our age. The dogmatics of the Reformed Church has found a well-informed and capable interpreter in Schweizer, who has been joined in the free exercise of thought by Schenkel. In the Reformed Church, Ebrard represents the confessional point of view, while Vilmar, Thomasius, Philippi, and Kahnis represent the Lutheran. The masterly work of A. Ritzsch aims at a positive remodelling of the orthodox system on a biblical basis. The dogmatic works of Biedermann and Lipsius represent the so-called liberal theology. One of the most important of the recent doctrinal systems is the System of Christian Doctrine (Glaubenslehre) of Sulzberger, published in Bremen in 1877. He is Professor of Theology in the Theological Seminary of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Frankfort-on-Main, and his work is a terse and skilful presentation of the doctrinal system of his communion. The Roman Catholic Church, whose older dogmatic theologians, Bellarmine, Canisius, Maldonat, Becanus, and others, had, to a great extent, conformed to the scholastic method, was likewise unable to avoid being influenced by the intellectual revolution of the times. A more simple and independent doctrinal method, from which the mass of scholastic and Jesuitical rubbish was eliminated, was introduced as early as the time of Noel (Natalis Alexander, died 1724).

¹ On Nitzsch comp. the Biography by Beyschlag, p. 179. Nitzsch's "crowded, Heraclean style, which never presents more than the half-opened bud of the thought," does seem not only to present difficulties which "all feeble or ease-loving minds" will dread to surmount, but also to place frequent obstacles in the way of those who do not seek to avoid the labour needed to penetrate into such a depth of thought. The forceful elements in the works of Nitzsch are an exalted earnestness and a cool criticism, which enable him to be just toward a more independent mode of thought, while standing firmly upon the positive foundations of Christianity.

Among German dogmatists the older method was followed by Klüpfel (died 1811), Stattler, Gmeiner, Schnappinger, Zimmer, Dobmaier, Buchner, Liebermann, and others. A new movement was begun by Georg Hermes (died 1831), in his Introduction to the Christian Catholic Theology (Munster, 1834). He, while fully regarding doubt as the necessary condition for the determining of truth, sought to press through it into orthodox Catholicism, as constituting the ultimate goal of a really profound speculation. But by that very effort he came into formal conflict with Roman Catholicism and its cardinal principle of ecclesiastical authority. A similar process was passed through by the system of Günther. Franz Baader, influenced by Schelling's Natural Philosophy, was more speculative than any of his compeers. But a similar tendency had been previously apparent in Schwarz (died 1794), and Cajetan Weiler (died 1826). Among later Roman Catholic theologians, Brenner, Thanner, Klee, Staudenmaier, and others, appear also to be similarly inclined.

In England, some of the leading doctrinal systems have been translations from the Continental writers. Among the Scotch, whose theological type has been Reformed, Calvin's Institutes has always been recognized as the standard. The Independents and Presbyterians of England have exhibited a similar attachment. In the Church of England, Pearson on the Creed and Burnet on the Thirty-nine Articles, old as they are, have largely supplied the dogmatic treatment. Among the Wesleyans, Wesley's Sermons, which are mostly of doctrinal character, have held the foremost place. The first Methodist writer of a full doctrinal system was Richard Watson, whose Institutes (Lond., 1823) have been the standard for the last half century. Pope, in his Compendium of Christian Theology (3 vols., New York, 1880), is the first British Wesleyan writer of a dogmatic system at all comparable with Watson.

In the United States, there has been large dependence on the German sources, the works of the German dogmatists being translated and freely read. Knapp's Theology has had a wide acceptance. This has been succeeded by Storr and Flatt's Elementary Course of Biblical Theology (1836), Nitzsch's System of Christian Doctrine (1849), the Christian Dogmatics of the Danish Martensen, the Christian Dogmatics of the Dutch Van Oosterzee, and Schmid's Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. But American theology has not been without its original writers in the dogmatic department. Even during the colonial period there were vigorous doctrinal authors, whose works have had an important bearing on the whole later course of theological belief. Each Church has had its own dogmatic system. Dwight's Theology, originally delivered as sermons, has had large endorsement among Congregationalists and still wider circles. Hodge, in his Systematic Theology, represents the doctrinal system of the Presbyterian Church. This work is the product of a lifetime of reverent study, of broad scholarship, terse and exact style, and of just recognition of the native and foreign literature of the department. Raymond's Systematic Theology embodies the Methodist theology, and is marked by careful thought, a rich and warm diction, and a most attractive perspicuity and vigour of style. Both these works, as well as A. A. Hodge's Outlines of Theology, and Ralston's Elements of Divinity, indicate a disposition of the American theological mind to lean no longer on Continental authorities for doctrinal statement.

LITERATURE OF DOGMATICS.¹

- J. C. Doederlein, Institutio theologi christ. in capp. relig. theor. nostris temp. accom. Norimb. et Alt., 1780. Ed. 6., emend. et acta a Ch. Gf. Junge. Ib., 1797. 2 vols.
 — Christl. Religionsunterricht nach den Bedürfnissen unserer Zeit. From the Latin, and continued from vol. 6 by C. G. Junge. Nürnberg. and Alt. 12 vols, 1775-1803.

¹ More fully described in Winer's Handb., pp. 395-398, Ergänzungsheft, pp. 48-50.

- S F. N. Morus, Epitome theolog. christ. Lips., 1789.
- J. H. Tieftrunk, Censur des christl.-protest. Lehrbegriffs nach den Principien der Religionskritik. Berl., 1791-95. 3 vols.
- J. Cp. R. Eckermann, Compend. theol. christ. theor. bibl.-histor. Alt., 1791.
- Handb. für das system. Stud. der christl. Glaubenslehre. Alt., 1801-3. 4 vols.
- H. Ph. C. Henke, Lineamenta instit. fidei christ. hist.-critt. Helmst., 1793-95.
- G. Chr. Storr, Lehrbuch der christl. Dogmatik. Edited by K. Ch. Flatt. Stuttg., 1803; 4th ed., 1813.¹
- J. E. Ch. Schmidt, Lehrbuch der christl. Dogmatik. Giessen, 1800.
- K. F. Stäudlin, Religionslehre oder Dogmatik und Dogmengeschichte. Gött., 1800.
- F. V. Reinhard, Vorlesungen über die Dogmatik, publ., with additions to the literature, by J. Berger, 1801. 4th ed., with new additions to the literature, by H. A. Schott. 1818.
- Cp. A. Ammon, Summa theol. christianae. Gött., 1803.
- Inbegriff der evangelischen Glaubenslehre, etc. Gött., 1805.
- Ausführlicher Unterricht in der christl. Glaubenslehre. Nürnberg and Altd., 1807-1808.
- C. Daub, Theologumena. Heidelb., 1806.
- J. Ch. W. Augusti, System der christl. Dogmatik nach dem Lehrbegriffe der luther. Kirche im Grundriss dargestellt. Lpz., 1809.
- H. A. Schott, Epitome theol. christ. dogmat. Lips., 1811.
- * J. A. L. Wegscheider, Institutiones theol. christ. dogmaticae. Hal., 1815. 7th ed., 1833.
- * K. G. Bretschneider, Handbuch der Dogmatik der evangel.-luther. Kirche. Lpz., 1814. 3d ed. Also Systeme in den dogm. Lehrbüchern von Schleiermacher, Marheineke, und Hase. Lpz., 1828. 2 vols. 5th ed., 1860.
- * — Systemat. Entwicklung aller in der Dogmatik vorkommenden Begriffe. 4th ed. Lpz., 1841.
- * W. M. L. de Wette, Dogmatik der evang.-luther. Kirche nach den symb. Büchern und den ältern Dogmatikern. Berl., 1816. 1.
- † F. Brenner, Freie Darstellung der Theologie in der Idee des Himmelreichs, oder neueste kathol. Dogmatik. Hamb., 1815-18. 3 vols.
- Katholische Dogmatik. Frankf., 1827-30. 3 vols.
- † J. Thanner, Wissenschaftl. Aphorismen der kathol. Dogmatik für akad. Vorlesungen. Salzb., 1816.
- F. A. Klein, Darstellung des dogm. Systems der evang.-protest. Kirche. Jena, 1822. 3d ed., 1840.
- Ph. Marheineke, Die Grundlehren der christl. Dogmatik. Berl., 1819.
- System der christl. Dogmatik. Berl., 1847.
- * F. Schleiermacher, Der christliche Glaube nach den Grundsätzen der evangel. Kirche im Zusammenhange dargestellt. Berl., 1821, 1822.² 2 vols.
- * A. D. Ch. Twisten, Vorlesungen über die Dogmatik der evangel.-luther. Kirche nach de Wette's Compendium. Hamb., 1826-29.
- * K. Hase, Lehrbuch der evang. Dogmatik. Stuttg., 5th ed., 1860.
- Gnosis, od. evang. Glaubenslehre für die Gebildeten. Lpz., 1827-29. 3 vols.

¹ The title of the older original is: Doctrinae christ. pars theol. e libris sacris repetita. Stuttg., 1793, 1807.

² Comp. with reference to this work, the criticisms of Rätze (1823), Braniss (1825), Deibrück (1827), Schmidt (1835), Rosenkranz (1836), die Uebersicht des Systems by Goss (1837), Weissenborn, Darstellung und Kritik der Schleiermacher'schen Dogmatik. Lpz., 1849. Martin, Etude sur les fondements de la dogmatique de Schleiermacher. Genève, 1860.

- * (K. Hase) Hutterus redivivus, oder Dogmatik der evang.-luther. Kirche. Lpz., 1829. 11th ed., 1868.
- * G. Ch. Knapp, Vorlesungen über die christl. Glaubenslehre nach dem Lehrbegriffe der evang. Kirche, publ. by K. Thilo. Halle, 1827. 2 vols. 2d ed., 1835. Amer. ed. Andover, 1836.
- A. Hahn, Lehrbuch des christl. Glaubens. Lpz., 1828. 2d ed., 1857, 1858. 2 vols.
- H. G. Tzschirner, Vorlesungen über die christl. Glaubenslehre nach dem Lehrbegriff der evang.-protest. Kirche, publ. by K. Hase. Lpz., 1829.
- L. F. O. Baumgarten-Crusius, Grundriss der evang.-kirchlichen Dogmatik. Für Vorlesungen. Jena, 1830.
- E. F. Gelpke, Evangel. Dogmatik. Bonn, 1834.
- J. Ch. F. Steudel, Die Glaubenslehre der evang.-protest. Kirche nach ihrer guten Begründung. Tüb., 1834.
- J. P. Mynster, Betrachtungen über die christl. Glaubenslehre; from the Danish by Th. Schorn. Hamb., 1835.
- † H. Klee, System der kathol. Dogmatik. Bonn, 1831.
- † ——— Kathol. Dogmatik. Mainz, 1835. 4th ed., 1861.
- † J. G. Hermes, Christ-katholische Dogmatik. Münster, 1831–34. 3 vols.
- J. D. F. Strauss, Die christliche Glaubenslehre in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampfe mit der modernen Wissenschaft. Tüb., 1840, 1841. 2 vols.¹
- J. J. Chenevière, Dogmatique chrétienne. Genève, 1840.
- W. Böhmer, Die christl. Dogmatik oder Glaubenswissenschaft. Bresl., 1843. Vol. 1.
- H. Schmid, Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche, dargestellt und aus den Quellen belegt. Erlang., 1843. 5th ed., 1863. Amer. ed., transl. by Hay and Jacobs. Phila., 1876.
- † F. A. Staudenmaier, Christl. Dogmatik. Freib., 1844–52. 4 vols.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

1. General.

- Arminius, James, The Works of. From the Latin, in 3 vols. Auburn and Buffalo, 1853.
- Binney, Amos, and Steele, Daniel. Theological Compend Improved. New York, 1875.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Edinburgh.
- Dwight, Timothy. Theology: Explained and Defended in a Series of Sermons. 5 vols. New York, 1846.
- Hodge, A. A. Outlines of Theology. 8vo, pp. 678. New York, 1878.
- Hodge, Charles. Systematic Theology. 4 vols. (vol. iv being an Index.) New York, 1873.
- Hovey, Alvah. Outlines of Christian Theology. Providence, 1870.
- Knapp, George C. Lectures on Christian Theology. Translated by Leonard Woods, Jun. London, 1831.
- Martensen, H. Christian Dogmatics. Edinburgh, 1866.
- Pond, Enoch. Lectures on Christian Theology. Boston, 1867.

¹ Comp. the Critique of Strauss' Glaubenslehre in its principles, by Fischer (1841). Köster (1841), and Rosenkranz (1845). The destructive tendency inaugurated by that work has been carried to an extreme in Feuerbach, Wesen des Christenthums (Lpz., 1841 and 1848), and in other works issued by that school.

- Pope, William B. A Compendium of Christian Theology. 3 vols. New York, 1880.
- Raymond, Miner. Systematic Theology. 3 vols. Cincinnati, 1877-79.
- Schmid, Heinrich. The Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Philadelphia, 1846.
- Van Oosterzee, J. J. Christian Dogmatics. From the Dutch. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 388, 430. New York, 1874.
- Watson, Richard. Theological Institutes. 2 vols. New York, 1836.

2. Theology: The Divine Nature.

- Charnock, Stephen. Discourses upon the Existence and Attributes of God. 2 vols., 8vo. New York, 1874.
- M'Cabe, L. D. The Foreknowledge of God, and Cognate Themes. Cincinnati, 1878.
- Divine Nescience of Future Contingencies. New York, 1882.

3. Christology.

- Bickersteth, Edward H. The Rock of Ages; or, Scripture Testimony to the One Eternal Godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. New York, 1861.
- Coulin, Frank. The Son of Man: Discourses on the Humanity of Jesus Christ. Philadelphia, 1869.
- Dorner, J. A. History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ. 5 vols. Edinburgh, 1878.
- Ecce Deus. Essays on the Life and Doctrine of Jesus Christ. Boston, 1869.
- Gess, W. F. The Scripture Doctrine of the Person of Christ. Andover, 1870.
- Liddon, Henry Parry. The Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. London, 1867.
- Sartorius, Ernest. The Person and Work of Christ. Boston, 1848.
- Smith, John Pye. The Scripture Testimony to the Messiah. 5th ed., 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1868.
- Turnbull, Robert. Theophany; or, the Manifestation of God in the Life, Character, and Mission of Jesus Christ. 12mo, pp. 239. Hartford, 1849.
- Ullmann, Carl. The Sinlessness of Jesus; an Evidence for Christianity. Edinburgh, 1858. New ed., 1870.
- Van Oosterzee, J. J. The Image of Christ as Presented in Scripture. London, 1874.
- Wilberforce, Robert J. The Doctrine of the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. Philadelphia, 1849.

4. The Holy Spirit.

- Buchanan, James. On the Office and Work of the Holy Spirit. Edinburgh, 1856.
- Hare, Julius Charles. The Mission of the Comforter. 3d ed. London, 1876.
- Paraclete, The. An Essay on the Personality and Ministry of the Holy Ghost. New York, 1875.
- Walker, James B. The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit; or, Philosophy of the Divine Operation in the Redemption of Man. New ed. Cincinnati, 1880.

5. Atonement.

- Atonement, The. Discourses and Treatises by Edwards, Smalley, Maxey, Emmons, Griffin, Burge, and Weeks. With an Introductory Essay by Edwards A. Park. 3d ed. Boston, 1863.

- Barnes, Albert. The Atonement in its Relations to Law and Moral Government. Philadelphia, 1859.
- Beecher, Charles. Redeemer and Redeemed. Boston, 1864.
- Browne, Edward H. Sermons on the Atonement, and Other Subjects. London, 1859.
- Bushnell, Horace. Forgiveness and Law, Grounded in Principles Interpreted by Human Analogies. New York, 1874.
- The Vicarious Sacrifice. New York, 1866.
- Campbell, John M. The Nature of the Atonement. 4th ed. London, 1873.
- Candlish, Robert S. The Atonement: Its Reality, Completeness, and Extent. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1867.
- Crawford, Thomas J. The Doctrine of Holy Scripture Respecting the Atonement. Edinburgh, 1875.
- Dale, R. W. The Atonement: being the Congregational Union Lecture for 1875. 3d ed. New York, 1876.
- Magee, Wm. Discourses and Dissertations on the Scripture Doctrine of Atonement and Sacrifice. From the 5th London ed. 2 vols. New York, 1839.
- Malcom, Howard. The Extent and Efficacy of the Atonement. Philadelphia, 1870.
- Maurice, Frederick Denison. The Doctrine of Sacrifice Deduced from the Scriptures. Cambridge, 1854.
- Miley, John. The Atonement in Christ. New York, 1879.
- Oxenham, H. N. The Catholic Doctrine of the Atonement. London, 1869.
- Smeaton, G. The Doctrine of the Atonement, as Taught by Christ Himself. 2d ed. Edinburgh, 1868.
- Symington, William. On the Atonement and Intercession of Jesus Christ. 3d ed. New York, 1849.
- The Doctrine of the Atonement, as Taught by the Apostles. Edinburgh, 1870.
- Wardlaw, Ralph. Discourses on the Nature and Extent of the Atonement. New ed. Glasgow, 1844.

6. Justification.

- Buchanan, James. The Doctrine of Justification. Edinburgh, 1867.
- Davies, R. N. A Treatise on Justification. Cincinnati, 1878.
- Heurtley, Charles A. Justification. Bampton Lecture for 1845. London, 1846.
- Newman, John H. Lectures on the Doctrine of Justification. London, 1874.

7. Evil, Origin of.

- Lovett, H. Thoughts on the Causes of Evil, Physical and Moral. London, 1810.
- Naville, Ernest. The Problem of Evil. New York, 1872.
- Young, John. Evil not from God. New York, 1858.

8. The Church.

- Arnold, Thomas. Miscellaneous Works: The Church. Pp. 9-72. New York, 1845.
- Augustine, St. The City of God. Edited by Marcus Doda. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1881.
- Bannerman, James. The Church of Christ. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1868.
- Coleman, Lyman. The Apostolic and Primitive Church, Popular in its Government and Simple in its Worship. Philadelphia, 1869.
- Litton, Ed. Arthur. The Church of Christ in its Idea, Attributes, and Ministry. 8vo, pp. 468. Philadelphia and New York, 1856.
- Maurice, Frederick D. The Kingdom of Christ. New York, 1843.
- M'Ellhinney, John J. Doctrine of the Church, with a Bibliography of the Subject. Philadelphia, 1871.

Palmer, William. A Treatise on the Church of Christ. 2 vols. New York, 1841.

Whately, Richard. The Kingdom of Christ. New York, 1843.

9. Resurrection.

Bush, George. Anastasis; or, The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body. New York, 1845.

Hanna, William. The Resurrection of the Dead. Edinburgh, 1872.

Westcott, Brooke Foss. The Gospel of the Resurrection. London, 1869.

SECTION XVII.

CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

The theological ethics of Christianity, called by the elder writers Theologia Moralis and Ethica Christiana, describes the theory of the moral life as it should find expression in a Christian feeling, which is produced by a living faith, and approves itself in a Christian life. It occupies, in common with dogmatics, the ground of positive Christianity, and, therefore, derives its fundamental principles from Christianity. In another direction, however, it stands connected with the general or philosophical ethics of human origin; and while it differs from the latter with regard to its scientific form, and its starting points and motives, their substance can never be contradictory to each other.

This science has been erroneously called practical theology by some writers, who contrasted it with dogmatics, and regarded the latter as a theoretical department, dogmatics being held to deal with things to be believed, and practical theology with things to be done. For, although ethics has to do more particularly with man's powers of action and volition, while dogmatics is concerned with his powers of perception and cognition, it would yet be highly unscientific to regard ethics as a mere collection of practical rules. It is even true that, in certain respects, ethics may be called a theory with more propriety than dogmatics, since every theory requires a corresponding practice.¹ Ethics is certainly employed upon the practical side of the dogmatical system, but it is requisite that the practical side itself be theoretically, and, therefore, scientifically, apprehended, and it was for this reason that the necessity for a separate treatment of ethics, apart from dogmatics, was acknowledged in a former connexion.¹ Such a separation does not by any means involve a division by which ethics becomes independent of dogmatics. For even as faith and works are most intimately connected in the practical sphere of Christianity, so that works become the fruitage of faith, so is Christian ethics everywhere based upon dogmatics. The absence from a system of Christian morals of indications which everywhere give evidence of the doctrinal views of its author, is always a bad sign.² As dogmatics, moreover, reaches back with its most general ideas into the philosophy of religion, so must Christian ethics join hands, in its scientific expression, with philosophical ethics;³ and it will even resemble it more closely in outward appearance than dogmatics can resemble the philosophy of religion. This results from the fact that the features which are peculiar to a positive religion are more clearly apparent in its doctrinal statements than in its moral precepts.

¹ This holds true of practical theology properly so called. A word here with regard to the designation of this science. Dörner, ubi supra, decides in favour of ethics, as compared with "morals." "Mores, mores (whence comes moral-discipline), refers more especially to the outward appearance than to the interior source, and does not, by far, approach the meaning of the Greek ἠθικός. Mores describes character, indeed, but not its unifying source. ἠθικός, originally the Ionic form of ἠθός, involves, on the other hand, what is customary, the moral as generally accepted; not only empirical manners (mores), which may be bad, but also what has been sanctioned, and is according to method and rule." Comp. Ersch and Gruber, Encykl. s. v. Ethos. Nor will it escape the notice of any who may study the usage of our time, that, while the word morality was formerly of universal application, it is now held to be more refined to lay stress upon "the ethical."

Christian Ethics based on dogmatics.

Every historical religion, nevertheless, possesses definite moral convictions, through which it governs peoples and times—a fact which may be traced down through all the subdivisions of Protestantism and Roman Catholicism.⁴ It will, therefore, be necessary for philosophical ethics to descend to the level occupied by the historical phenomena of the moral life which come under the influence of positive religions, in order that it may derive life for the general from particulars—unless it should prefer to move about in the midst of dead abstractions. But its work will consist in utilizing whatever is gained in this way in the determining of the character of universal morality, while Christian ethics is concerned to discover the concrete and historically defined, and especially the characteristically Christian features, for their own sake. Its task is, therefore, as de Wette has shown,⁵ analytical in its nature, while that of philosophical ethics is synthetical.

The differences which exist between the two may, accordingly, be stated as follows:

¹ Section 1, Part 1.

² Schleiermacher, § 229. Comp. also ibid., Christliche Sitte, p. 3 seq.

³ It will, doubtless, be apparent that one philosophical system cannot possess authority in Philosophical and a different one in Christian ethics.—Schleiermacher, § 227.

⁴ Comp. Schleiermacher, § 228, note; Marheineke, System des Katholicismus, ii, pp. 20–29.

⁵ Lehrbuch der Sittenlehre, § 3.

1. Philosophical ethics has to do with the determining of man toward morality as a whole,¹ while Christian ethics represents the manifestation of the divinely human life in the person of Christ as constituting the ideal of morality, and, consequently, requires of each individual that he should become like Christ. This forms the Christian doctrine of the highest good.²

2. The startingpoint of philosophical ethics lies, necessarily, in the moral self-determination of man, which involves the evidence of its own truth, in opposition to any determination on the part of nature, while Christian ethics regards the Spirit of God as the determining power through the effectual working of his grace in the believer's heart. This is the Christian doctrine of virtue which results, without the slightest modification, from the teachings of Christian dogmatics.

3. Philosophical ethics regards man in the relations which he sustains toward the world, and determines his duties by that rule; Christian ethics has regard primarily to the relations sustained by him toward the kingdom of God. This is the Christian system of duties.

The above distinctions should not give rise to the misapprehension that a philosophical and a Christian morality, which could conflict with each other, may exist, or that a thing may be moral according to the principles of the one and not so according to the principles of the other. The truth is, that the one serves merely to confirm the other. Morality, which presents to view the human element, can no more be contradictory to that which involves the Christian element than the ideas man and Christ can contradict each other. Even Christian morality is

Harmony of philosophical and Christian ethics.

¹ The obligations of Christian ethics are binding only upon Christians; philosophical ethics puts forth a universal claim, for its object is to secure the control of every person who is able to comprehend the philosophical principles from which it is deduced." Schleiermacher, Christliche Sitte, p. 2; comp. p. 7 seq.; de Wette, ubi supra. Rothe likewise agrees with this view at bottom (Theol. Ethik., p. 35), although he does not distinguish Christian so much as theological ethics from philosophical. "The latter begins with the moral consciousness considered simply in that character, while the theological proceeds from that consciousness as it exists in the individual, under the determinate religious form assumed through the influence of the particular Christian Church to which he may belong, and also from the historical ideal of morality as found in the Redeemer's person, of which the former is but a reflection." But Christian and philosophical ethics do not come into contrast with each other on his view, because philosophical ethics and philosophy in general are essentially Christian within the bounds of Christendom. Rothe concedes a relative contrast, however, in so far as mankind have not been altogether penetrated by the influence of Christianity.

² See Schleiermacher, ubi supra, p. 86.

required to adapt itself to the conditions of mankind generally,¹ and the philosophical must tend toward the Christian as its goal. The foremost principle of the one, in each instance, is the ultimate aim of the other. Religion, when regarded from the standpoint of philosophical ethics, constitutes the crown and beauty of the moral life, while from that of Christian ethics it forms its root. In the view of philosophical morality, the Christian community is but one society beside others, in the State, in behalf of which certain duties are doubtless to be performed; but the human society of the State, as being the most general form of a moral organism, is the underlying idea.

Christian ethics, on the other hand, starts out from the idea of the Christian community as a distinctively religious organism, and, spreading outward in constantly expanding circles, it comes to include at last the duties which men owe to the State. Brotherly love (φιλαδελφία), which has its origin in love to Christ, is by it extended into universal love. The supreme law in philosophical ethics, on the contrary, is respect for the dignity of human nature in other people, from which most general conception it afterward descends to the level of the several conditions of actual life, in which righteousness becomes spiritualized, and transformed into the principle of love. The latter result would, of course, be beyond its powers of attainment, did not Christianity itself afford it a clearly defined embodiment of the idea; for "it is able," in its character as philosophical ethics, "to do no more than set up pattern specimens of the moral life in general outline, while Christian ethics sets forth in detailed examples and precepts the problems which have actually been solved in the pages of Revelation."² Christian ethics,

¹ De Wette, § 9: "Christian ethics is required to be human, to adapt itself to human capabilities and needs, since it could not, on the contrary principle, bring an effective influence to bear on man." Bruch, p. 19: "The more thoroughly the ethics of Christianity is apprehended, and the spirit by which it is animated is understood in its purity, the more will the conviction grow that it is nothing else than the truest reflection of the legislation which is woven into the nature of the human mind, and which, asserting itself in living power in the mind, is designed to lead man toward the goal of his destination." Pelt, Encyklopaedie, p. 520: "True reason is always one, and finds its highest and purest mode of expression in Christianity; the task remains the same."

² De Wette, § 4; or, in other words, Pelt, Encykl., p. 520: "The process of the unification of nature and reason is only indicated in the philosophical realm, while it is accomplished in the Christian." But comp. Dorner, ubi supra, p. 190: "The separation of the two branches of philosophical and theological ethics, which must continue at least as long as philosophical ethics may desire, causes conflict. This, however, is beneficial, not only to the end that reason, outside the pale of Christianity, may recognise with increasing clearness that its truth and purity are attainable only therefore, passes beyond the philosophical. To the former belong the recognition of moral conditions and an abundance of moral forces which are in thorough harmony with human nature, though imparted to it rather than originating in it. It may be said, accordingly, that to this extent philosophical ethics has to do simply with the moral nature of man, while Christian ethics is engaged upon the positive and Divine qualities which have been introduced into that nature, with grace and its salutary effects. It is, of course, necessary that a correct idea be obtained of this positive element, and of its relation to the natural man. It is the task of dogmatics to secure this idea.

Christian ethics transcend philosophical.

SECTION XVIII.

CHRIST'S WORK THE BASIS OF ETHICS.

The positive element of Christian ethics does not consist in any authoritative letter of either the Old or the New Testament, but in a course of life which was introduced into human conditions, and typically actualized, by Christ, and which, through the influence of his Spirit, is to be continued in the community of believers, and to approve itself as a moral force upon the outside world.

The positive element of Christian ethics.

It was long customary to so conceive the positive feature of Christian ethics, and the characteristics by which it is distinguished from philosophical ethics, as to warrant the statement that the latter acknowledges the authority of reason only, the former that of the Bible. Two entirely different authorities were thus opposed to each other in a form altogether outward, it being assumed that the Bible contains a collection of Divine commands, which were even characterized as "arbitrary," as contrasting with the autonomous requirements of reason.¹ The idea bears only against a false and merely formal supernaturalism, which assumes that the Bible is simply a code of faith and morals, and grounds the positively revealed ethics in the good pleasure of God. The Old Testament may through the religion of the incarnated λόγος, but also on account of the non-Christian elements in Christian theology itself, which afford a partial endorsement of the ethics of the general human reason as against theological ethics, until the ethical self-consciousness of the Church, which coincides with the ideal process by which the first and the second nature interpenetrate each other, is complete." Comp. also Gelzer's Monatsbl., ubi supra.

¹ Ernesti, Vindiciae arbitrii divini in religione constituenda (Opusc. theol. i, p. 171 sq.). Per contra, Toellner, Disquisitio, utrum Deus ex mero arbitrio potestatem suam legislatariam exerceat, etc., Lugd. Bat., 1770; de Wette, ubi supra, p. 4. Comp. Dorner, ubi supra, p. 188, against this false positivism.

possibly correspond to such an idea, and the Decalogue, although it might with but little difficulty be traced back to the general foundations of morality, has, in point of fact, been long compelled to serve as a framework for Christian ethics.

But it is also true that they who have correctly regarded the teaching of Jesus as the regulative feature, have too constantly considered it as merely statutory, without sufficiently remembering Jesus not a mere moral and statutory teacher.

that the profound significance of that teaching can only be comprehended in connexion with the life of Jesus and with the entire work of salvation. Jesus did not aim to enunciate disconnected moral maxims, like Epictetus, nor is his example, to which appeal is made, mere superadded example; and it cannot, in many circumstances, be example even for us.¹ For a Christian disposition does not consist in the imitation of his example in special matters, but in the imitating or appropriating of his spirit (Phil. ii, 5). As dogmatics builds upon the foundation laid by apologetics, whose work is to prove that Christianity is a religion, and indeed the absolute religion, so is ethics required to begin with taking its stand upon the apologetical result that Christ is the sinless One, the actualized moral ideal for humanity, and that, therefore, Christianity is not simply a general sort of moral phenomenon, but the universal moral power which rules Christianity the universal moral power.

over the whole of modern history. Hence its positive feature is not a letter, but an act—the revelation of God through Christ incarnated in human nature. Its question, therefore, will not be merely, “What is written?” but rather, “What is in harmony with the spirit of Christ?” Likewise, as dogmatics already entertains ideas which are not expressly contained in the Bible—for example, the Trinity—so is Christian ethics, in the course of its development, imperatively required to pass beyond the letter of the Bible, and is, therefore, required to engage in the exact definition of moral ideas. The most blessed fruits of Christianity are fruits of which but the germ exists in the Bible—for example, the idea of a Christian State, of Christian marriage and all that it involves, of the abolition of slavery, of respect for individual life, and of religious services on the Christian Sabbath. These have been freely developed in the course of human life, without any direct command or statute in the Scriptures imposing the duty. Hence, as dogmatics presupposes the history of doctrines, so does Christian ethics have regard to the entire development of the Christian life, in which connexion such malformations as Montanism, Pantheism, Gnosticism, Asceticism, Jesuitism, Quietism, also come under notice, as marks of warning, similar to the study of heresies in dogmatics.

¹ The situation that one comes to occupy when he demands for every particular act a warrant from the moral deportment of Christ, may be learned from the example of Thomas à Kempis, who deduced the duty of writing books from John viii, 6. Vide Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, ii, p. 161. Schleiermacher's words relating to the individual bearings of Christian ethics (Die christliche Sitte, p. 48 seq.) are very significant in this connexion. The setting up of a pattern in the field of morals is always a questionable procedure. An ideal, such as that to which we seek to attain, is more than a pattern which we strive to copy.

SECTION XIX.

DIVISION OF ETHICS.

Christian, like philosophical, ethics falls into general principles and particular or applied ethics. The former is concerned with the settling of the moral principle, or, better, of the objects and motives of moral action, and hence, with the investigation of man's moral nature and capacities, the correct bounding of the ideas of good and evil, of sin and imputation, and of grace and freedom. It also has to do with the work of setting forth the goal of all moral effort, with the doctrine of the highest good, all of which leads back again into the profoundest depths of the doctrines of the faith. Christian ethics general and special. Special ethics, on the other hand, has to do with the particular manifestations and expressions of the moral life in given circumstances, and is subdivided into the particular doctrines of virtue and of duty.

The division into general and special ethics is, of course, only relative. Rothe's observation, in opposition to this view, that it is "merely external and formal, in a thoroughly abstract way,"¹ is correct if the division be taken as an absolute one, and if it be carried out in an abstract and lifeless manner. But an examination of Rothe's work itself will show at once that the first two volumes contain general ethics, together with matter that is usually included under dogmatics, and that the third is devoted to special morals, although the author, at this point, in connexion with the doctrine of duties, again distinguishes between the general and the particular. He justly declares, that, with reference to general ethics, the discussion relating to a "supreme moral principle" is confusing and without result. He demands, instead, Views of Rothe, Harless, and others. a threefold object, which he disposes into the doctrines of good, of virtue, and of duties. Other writers have preferred a different division. Harless sets forth the following three parts:

¹ Theol. Ethik, i, p. 199.

the good, the possession, and the preservation, of salvation. The last named of these has to do with "the concrete manifestation of Christian virtue in the fundamental relations of human life," and hence coincides, in this regard, with special ethics. Pelt likewise divides ethics into three parts:¹ (1) The actualizing of the highest good upon earth in the form of the kingdom of God; (2) Of the will of the individual, to be developed in conformity with the doctrine of duties; and (3) The realizing of the highest good in the habitual character of individual Christians, or the doctrine of virtue. Rosenkranz, following the antithetical method of the Hegelian school, divides the whole of ethics into the two diverging ideas of good and evil, and of human freedom.² By this method the first and second form the general, and the third the special, part.³

Schleiermacher's division is in harmony with his fundamental views of Christianity.⁴ The end of Christianity is held to be blessedness in God, which, however, has been disturbed by the consciousness of sin. This fact gives rise to a feeling of disinclination, out of which comes an impulse to act in the direction of restoring the idea, now violated, of the relation between the higher and the lower potencies of life, or, in other words, of restoring human nature to its normal condition. This is restorative action. Over against such disinclination, moreover, is an inclination, or voluntary desire, to yield to the authority of the higher requirement, and this gives rise to expansive or extensive action. But, in addition, there are elements of satisfaction, intermediate between the inclination and the disinclination, which do not, indeed, correspond to absolute blessedness, but yet are a relative blessedness; and these originate action, designed, not to introduce changes, but, while remaining without any proper efficiency, to serve as an expression of the individual's inward state. This is descriptive action, whose only object is to recommend the personal experience of the individual to the favour of others. Its general expression comprehends everything which we are accustomed to include under the name of Christian worship.

Whatever may be the method, however, by which it is intended to formally connect theological ethics with dogmatics, on the one hand, and, on the other, to combine or isolate philosophical ethics from dogmatics, and whatever may be the mode by which we seek to distribute the proper tasks of philosophical ethics over different departments, and to trace the various radii from the centre to the

¹ Encyklopaedie, p. 519.

² Ibid., p. 57.

³ Other methods of dividing are given in Pelt, p. 523.

⁴ Christliche Sitte, p. 44 seqq.

circumference of life, everything will depend upon the discovery of the centre itself, in order to trace, in the spirit of the Gospel, "the main outlines toward a thorough regeneration of the moral life in both State and Church."¹

Asceticism and pedagogics are sometimes regarded as special subdivisions of ethics, the former as teaching man how Asceticism and to train himself for morality, the latter as showing how pedagogics. he may train others. But since every exercise of moral power reacts upon the moral disposition, while the good cannot be secured without conflict, it follows that asceticism is already conditioned in morality. Many forms of exercise occur in the practice of godliness (γυμνασία, 1 Tim. iv, 7, 8), being at times largely negative, and aiming to avert the evil by reacting against the power of sensual allurements, as we see in the mediæval asceticism, fasting, mortifications, voluntary abstinence, and in other abnormal forms. Then, again, they are largely positive, stimulating the good by meditating upon the supreme good itself, and by absorbing the emotions in the divine ideals. All of this, however, finds a place in morality itself. According to Schleiermacher's division, the former would belong to the class of restorative actions, and the latter to that of descriptive actions.

The moral principles involved in education must likewise be discussed in ethics, and more especially under the head of expansive actions.² The art of training, however, the technics of education, forms a distinct science, which is properly termed pedagogics, but which is not a theological, but a philosophical, science, in so far as it deals with man as a whole. It belongs to practical theology in so far as it is concerned with a training for ecclesiastical life.

Casuistry, too, has been treated as a distinct branch. It has to do with cases in which duties come into conflict with each other (de casibus conscientiae). Kant designated Casuistry. it as the "dialectics of conscience." It is, however, merely the outgrowth from a scholastic and Jesuitical morality, and, as such, is to be banished from a sound system of ethics, inasmuch as it does not present actual cases of conflict to view, and merely resolves apparent cases by a higher law.

¹ Gelzer, Protest. Monatsbl. für innere Zeitgeschichte, 1854, Preface to vol. iv. The author includes among the most indispensable prerequisites for such a work, a profound understanding of modern history from the Reformation to our times, and incessant energetic investigation of original sources, and inquiry into the original meaning of Christianity, and also into the laws of its transformations in the field of secular and ecclesiastical history.

² See Schleiermacher, ubi supra, p. 58; Rothe, lil, p. 679 sqq.

SECTION XX.

THE HISTORY OF ETHICS.

E. Feuerlein, Die Sittenlehre des Christenthums in ihren geschichtlichen Hauptformen, Tüb., 1855; A. Neander, Vorlesungen über die Geschichte der christlichen Ethik, pub. by Erdmann, Berl., 1864; C. S. Wake, Evolution of Morality; being a History of the Development of Moral Culture, 2 vols., Lond., 1878; A. Thoma, Geschichte des christlichen Sittenlehre in der Zeit des N. Test., Haarlem (Lpz.), 1879; Wuttke, Christian Ethics, 2 vols., N. Y., 1873, treats the History in vol. I.

The Bible presents to our notice neither a system of morality nor one of doctrines; but it has a wealth of moral precepts, all of which are animated by, and borne upon, the spirit of the theocracy, and which are interwoven with the history of God's kingdom, like pearls in a diadem. Nor did the apostolic fathers refrain from moral admonitions. In the progress of the conflict with the heathen, or antique, conception of the world, the more rigid view of Montanism soon came to occupy a place beside the milder tendency. In another direction, mistaken views of Christian liberty, on the part of the Gnostics, led into the dangerous errors of the Carpocratians, and the later pantheistic sects of the Middle Ages. It thus became the task of Christian theology to more exactly determine and regulate Christian morality. Certain preliminary labours had already been performed by the apostolic fathers and the apologists. We see this especially in Clement of Rome and the Shepherd of Hermas. Clement of Alexandria followed, giving many moral precepts, carried down to particulars in the pedagogics, and treating in his Miscellaneous works the moral law and virtue as the chief good.

A considerable number of treatises of a moral nature are found in the works of Tertullian, which must be divided into classes, according as they were written before or after his conversion to Montanism, e. g., On Theatricals, Idolatry, The Soldier's Crown, The Pallium, Patience, Veiled Virgins, Exhortation to Chastity, Monogamy, Modesty, and other works. In a similar spirit Cyprian wrote an Exhortation on Martyrdom, on Good, on Patience, and on Works and Alms. The preachers Macarius, Basil the Great, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, Ephraim Syrus, and Cyril of Jerusalem made extended use of moral references, and many of their sermons are purely moral. Ambrose, too, in his works on Virgins, and on the Duties of Ministers of the Church, and Augustine, in his works on the Morals of the Catholic Church and on Continence, furnished moral and ascetic treatises. Jerome rendered profitable service, especially to monastic asceticism, in his polemical conflict with Jovinian and Vigilantius, and his Morals of Gregory the Great (died 604), in his work on Job, indicate the nature of their contents by their title. In this department, as in dogmatics, the work of compilation preceded that of systematic arrangement, as we see in several of the works of John of Damascus.

The dogmatical works of scholasticism include ethics also, it being largely controlled by the "four cardinal and three theological virtues" of Aristotle. Casuistry, also, was developed under its influence, Raymond de Pennaforte (died 1275) obtaining special celebrity by his Summary on Penitence. The Victorines and the later Mystics penetrated more deeply into the foundations of the religiously moral life, but committed the error of not basing asceticism upon the spirit of Christian liberty. This applies also to the valuable Imitation of Christ of Thomas à Kempis. The ^{ethical reaction} continually increasing corruption in the Church after ^{in the Church.} the removal of the papal chair to Avignon, and the separation of the churches, produced a mighty reaction.

The forerunners of the Reformation, such as Wycliffe, Huss, and others, pointed out, among other things, moral infirmities, and the reawakened interest in classical studies, likewise, introduced a new feature into ethical teaching. ^{Humanism and} Morality ^{ethics.} was exalted into a guide to the wisdom of Christianity for the practical government of life by Petrarch (died 1374), Marsilius Ficinus (died 1499), Louis Vives (died 1540), Erasmus (died 1563; Manual of the Christian Soldier) and others. Savonarola (died 1498) wrote his Simplicity of Christian Life in a spirit of larger sympathy with Christian faith. While the Reformation must be regarded as a moral renovation, not as a reform of abstract doctrine, it was yet, first of all, necessary that the new principle should be apprehended in the way of conquering the faith of men. The reformers, therefore, appear as moral heroes and ^{The reformers} inaugurators of a new period, but not as moralists in ^{and ethics.} the strict sense. Zwingli, however, presents with special force in his sermons the morals of practical life. He performs that same office, also, in his writings, The Shepherd, Freedom of Foods, and other works. Luther, in his Letters, Meditations, Sermons, Appeal to the German Nobility, and similar writings, gives living witness of the moral spirit by which he was animated. Melancthon, in his Elements, however, accorded a scientific treatment to ethics, though from an ancient standpoint. Calvin, who, as a reformer, was a Christian, Cato-like censor, included ethics in the doctrine of regeneration, as expounded in his Institutes, under the Life of the Christian Man, The Bearing of the Cross, and other chapters.¹ In the Reformed Church generally it was common, in view of the position occupied by the Old Testament, to attach great prominence to the legal element, and to combine it into a system, chiefly in connexion with the Decalogue.

¹ Institutes, ii, 8; comp. lib. iii, c. 6-8.

The first to treat Christian ethics as a separate theological department belonged to this Church—namely, Lambert Danaeus (Danaen, died 1536), in his Christian Ethics (Geneva, 1577, 1601–40). The school of Saumur produced in the seventeenth century the Christian Morals (1652–69, 6 vols.), by Moses Amyraud (died 1664), in which the attempt was made to harmonize natural with revealed ethics. A new interest was imparted to the study of ethics by the Cartesian philosophy, particularly within the Reformed Church;¹ and Arminianism gave special prominence to the ethical side of Christianity as constituting an essential feature.

After Calixtus² had, in the Lutheran Church, separated ethics from dogmatics, which he does in his Epitome of Moral Theology (1634–62), other affiliated works were published, such as those of Conr. Dürer, of Altorf (died 1677; Compendium of Moral Theology, 1698); G. Th. Meier, of Helmstedt (died 1693); J. Ch. Schomer, of Rostock (died 1693; Moral Theology Consistent with Itself, 1707), and similar works. The two movements of Pietism and Methodism reacted upon the ethical life with stimulating and purifying effect. The close of the old and the transition into the new period was marked, both in dogmatics and ethics, by Buddaeus in his Institutes of Moral Theology (1711, 1724), and J. L. Mosheim in his Ethics of the Holy Scriptures (Helmst. and Leips., 1735–53, 9 vols.). These were succeeded by Rambach (1738, 4to), S. J. Baumgarten (Halle, 1764), Crusius (Leips., 1772, 1773, 2 vols.), G. Less (1777, 4th ed., 1787), Endemann (1780, 2 vols.), Döderlein (Jena, 1789; 3d ed., 1794), Michaelis (Gott., 1792, 2 vols.), Morus (1794–99, 3 vols., published by Voight), and others.

In the Roman Catholic Church the Jesuits especially devoted themselves to ethics, dragging it further and further into the labyrinths of casuistry, and shaking it to its lowest foundations by their miserable theory of probabilism. The most notorious are Gabriel Vasquez (died 1604), Thomas Sanchez (died 1610), Francis Suarez (died 1617), Paul Laymann (died 1635),

¹ Comp. Pelt, p. 479.

² The Lutheran Church had not been without ethical writers even prior to Calixtus; the latter merely gave to ethics a more systematic form, and brought it into connexion with the body of Church teaching. Comp. Henke, ubi supra, p. 514.

Vinc. Filliucius (died 1622), Escobar (died 1669), and Busenbaum (died 1669), in his Marrow of Cases of Conscience. This work, which first appeared in 1645, has passed through 52 editions. It has been rewritten and enlarged by Lacroix (Cologne, 1757) and others. Jesuitism was confronted by the stricter and more Augustinian spirit of Jansenism and the school of Port Royal, to which Ant. Arnauld, Pierre Nicole (Essay on Morals, Par., 1671-1714, 6 vols.), and Pasquier Quesnel (Abridgment of the Morals of the Gospel, Par., 1693) belonged. They combined with a thoroughly sincere moral disposition a strict asceticism, amounting almost to enthusiasm, and not unfrequently an obscure mysticism.¹ Quietism was a distinct outgrowth from this tendency.

A new period for ethics began with Kant and his doctrine of the Categorical Imperative, by which ethics was happily delivered from the fetters of an erroneous theory of blessedness, or Eudæmonism, but was at the same time robbed of its profound religious motives, and transformed into a species of moral arithmetic. Even Christian ethical writers, such as Ammon, followed this system for a time, while others, as Reinhard, proceeded by the eclectic and empirical route. Men of strong supernaturalistic faith, like Schwarz and Flatt, contented themselves with adhering only to what is scriptural, without starting out with any definite scientific principle. De Wette has pointed out the necessity for such a principle.² As Schleiermacher created an epoch in philosophical ethics by his Critique of Morals, so his treatment of Christian ethics is thoroughly peculiar, and everywhere based on the specifically Christian element. From this time a striving to attain to a more thoroughly scientific character is apparent in most of the Protestant works belonging to the department of ethics, however strongly their authors may be controlled by dissimilar fundamental views.

Richard Rothe has, according to Bunsen's judgment, penetrated more deeply than his predecessors "into the innermost marrow of ethical speculation, and has demonstrated that Christianity is the realization of the highest thoughts of God." In the Roman Catholic Church, Liguori (died 1787) and Bened. Stattler, (Ethics, 1782) endeavoured to restore probabilism. Others adopted the older scholastic method, for example, Liebermann in his Institutes (Mayence, 1840, 5 vols.). Among the Roman Catholic moralists who have shown themselves accessible to the scientific impulses of the century, to a greater or smaller extent, we may mention Schwarzhüber (1785), Lauber (1784-88), Wanker (1794), Mutschelle (1802, 1803), Geisshüttner (1803), Schenkl (1802, 1803), Reykberger (1794), Reigler (2d ed., 1828), and Vogelsang (Bonn, 1834-39, 2 vols.). The latter is a disciple of George Hermes. The manuals and textbooks of J. M. Sailer (Bishop of Ratisbon), Heinrich Schreiber, and Joh. Bapt. von Hirscher are especially noteworthy because of their practical aim.

¹ On this point compare especially Reuchlin's Gesch. von Port Royal.

² In Berlin wissenschaftl. Zeitschrift, 1819, Nos. 1 and 2.

LITERATURE OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

- F. V. Reinhard, System der christl. Moral. Wittenb., 1788-1815. 5 vols.
 J. W. Schmid, Theologische Moral. Jena, 1793.
 — Christliche Moral, wissenschaftlich bearbeitet. Jena, 1797-1804. 3 vols.
 C. F. Ammon, Die christliche Sittenlehre nach einem wissenschaftl. Grundrisse, zunächst für seine Vorless. Erl., 1795.
 — Neues Lehrb. der relig. Moral u. der christl. insbesondere. Gött., 1800.
 — Handbuch der christl. Sittenlehre. Lpz., 1823-29.
 C. F. Stäudlin, Neues Lehrb. der Moral für Theologen, nebst Anleit. zur Gesch. der Moral u. der Moral Dogmen. Gött., 1815.
 † J. M. Sailer, Handb. der christl. Moral, zunächst für Seelsorger. Münch., 1818. New ed. Sulzb., 1834. 3 vols.
 * W. M. L. de Wette, Christl. Sittenlehre. Berl., 1819-28. 3 vols.
 — Lehrb. der christl. Sittenlehre und der Gesch. derselben. Berl., 1833.
 F. H. Ch. Schwarz, Evang. christl. Ethik. Lehr- u. Handb. für Theologen und andere gebildete Christen. Heidelb., 1821.
 J. F. v. Flatt, Vorles. u. christl. Moral. Tüb., 1823.
 * L. F. O. Baumgarten-Crusius, Lehrb. der christl. Sittenlehre. Lpz., 1826.
 J. F. Bruch, Lehrbuch der christl. Sittenlehre. Strassb., 1829-32.
 L. A. Kähler, Christliche Sittenlehre. 1st division. Königsb., 1838.
 — Wissenschaftlicher Abriss der christl. Sittenlehre nach Johanneisch-apostol. Principien. Königsb., 1835 ff.
 † H. Schreiber, Lehrbuch der Moralthologie. Freib., 1834. 2 vols.
 † J. B. von Hirscher, Die christl. Moral, als Lehre von der Verwirklichung des göttlichen Reichs in der Menschheit. Tüb., 1835. 3 vols. (Comp. Tholuck's lit. Anzeiger, 1839. Nos. 76-79).
 C. Sartorius, Die Lehre von der heil. Liebe, od. Grundzüge der evang.-kirchl. Moralthologie. Stuttg., 1840-56. 4 vols.
 H. Merz, Das System der christl. Sittenlehre, nach den Grundsätzen des Protestantismus im Gegens. zum Katholic. Tüb., 1841.
 * G. C. A. von Harless, Christl. Ethik. Stuttg., 1842. 7th ed., Gütersl., 1875. Eng. transl. by Morrison and Findlay. Edinb., 1868.
 * F. Schleiermacher, Die christl. Sitte nach den Grundsätzen der evang. Kirche im Zusammenhange dargestellt. Berl., 1842. (Vol 12 of Sämmtliche Werke, and vol. 7 of the Literar. Nachlass zur Theologie).
 * R. Rothe, Theol. Ethik. Wittenb., 1845-48. 3 vols. New ed., 1871, in 5 vols. Ibid.
 Ph. Marheineke, System der theol. Moral. Berl., 1847.
 † Caj. v. Weiller, Grundlegung zur Ethik als Dogmatik. München, 1848.
 † F. Probst, Kathol. Moralthologie. Tüb., 1849, 1850. 2d ed., 1853. 2 vols.
 † K. Werner, System der christl. Ethik. Regensb., 1850-53. 3 vols.
 † B. Fuchs, System der christl. Sittenlehre. Augsb., 1850, 1851. 3 vols.

- † F. Elger, Lehrbuch der kathol. Moraltheologie. Regensb., 1851-53. 2 vols.
 † K. Martin, Lehrbuch der kathol. Moral. 2d ed. Mainz, 1851.
 W. Böhmer, System der christl. Lebens. Breslau, 1853.
 † M. Jocham, Moraltheologie oder die Lehre vom christl. Leben nach den Grundsätzen der kathol. Kirche. Sulzb., 1854. 3 vols.
 † L. Bautain, Moral des Evangeliums. From the French, by Gaisser. Tüb., 1856.
 C. F. Jäger, Die Grundbegriffe der christl. Sittenlehre. Stuttg., 1856.
 A. Wuttke, Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre. Berl., 1861, 1862. 2 vols. 2d ed., ibid. Amer. ed., transl. by Lacroix. N. Y., 1873.
 Ch. Palmer, Die Moral des Christenthums. Stuttg., 1863.
 Ph. Th. Culmann, Die christliche Ethik. Stuttg., 1864-66. 2 parts. An extremely theosophical work. Comp. the review by Palmer, in Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie, xix, 2.
 † Stapf, Epitome theologiae moralis. Edidd. Hoffmann et Aichner. Oenipont. 1865. 3d ed.
 Wendt, Kirchliche Ethik. Vols. 1, 2. Lpz., 1864, 1865.
 Chr. E. Luthardt, Die Ethik Luthers in ihren Grundzügen dargestellt. Lpz., 1867.
 — Vorträge über die Moral des Christenthums. Lpz., 1872.
 A. F. C. Vilmar, Theologische Moral. Gütersl., 1871.
 A. v. Oettingen, Die Moralstatistik und die christliche Sittenlehre. Erl., 1868, 1869.

POPULAR WORKS.

- W. M. L. de Wette, Vorlesungen über die Sittenlehre. Berl., 1823, 1824. 4 vols.
 H. Gelzer, Die Religion im Leben. Reden an Gebildete. Zür., 1839.

ETHICAL MONOGRAPHS.

We mention merely as examples of this kind of literature:

- On Marriage: Jörg and Tzschirner (1819), † Klee (1833), Oischinger (1855).
 Divorce: Harless (1860), Huschke, Schröder.
 Falsehood: Kierkegard (1829), Heinroth (1833).
 Falsehood when the result of Pressure: Boehme (1818).
 Oaths: Goeschel (1837), Riegler (1837, 1847).
 Suicide: Zyro (1837), Blumröder (1847).
 Life in the Christian Family: H. Thiersch (6th ed., 1872).
 Asceticism and its History: Zöckler (see under Church History), etc.

A large number of works on the observance of the Sabbath day have been issued in recent times, e. g., by Streuber, Oschwald, Liebetrut, Hengstenberg, Kraussold, Beck, and others.

The relation of the Christian to politics has also become a question of considerable importance in Ethics in our day. To this place we must also assign the prize essays of the Harzergesellschaft: On War, by Wickemann; and on Capital Punishment, by A. Bizius.

Valuable service in the department of Christian Pedagogics was rendered by Schwarz (of Heidelberg), who wrote while Rationalism was yet prevalent. Comp. also J. C. A. Heinroth, Von den Grundfehlern der Erziehung, Lpz., 1828; Th. Schwarz, Ueber Religiöse Erziehung, Hamb., 1834; K. Raumer, Die Erziehung der Mädchen, Stuttg., 1854. Last ed., 1866.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- Joseph Alden, Christian Ethics; or, the Science of Duty. N. Y., 1867.
 Archibald Alexander, Outlines of Moral Science. N. Y., 1870.
 J. Bascom, Ethics; or, Science of Duty. N. Y., 1879.

- Edward Beecher, The Conflict of Ages; or, the Great Debate on the Moral Relations of God and Man. Boston, 1853.
- T. R. Birks, Supernatural Revelation; or, First Principles of Moral Theology. Lond., 1879.
- John Blackie, Four Phases of Morals: Socrates, Aristotle, Christianity, Utilitarianism. N. Y., 1872.
- Henry Calderwood, Handbook of Moral Philosophy. 7th ed. Lond., 1881.
- James Challen, Christian Morals. Phila., 1859.
- Frances Power Cobbe, Religious Duty. Lond., 1864.
- J. Leadley Dagg, The Elements of Moral Science. N. Y., 1860.
- J. Llewelyn Davies, Theology and Morality, Belief and Practice. Lond., 1873.
- D. Dewar, Elements of Moral Philosophy and of Christian Ethics. 2 vols. Lond., 1826.
- Jona. Dymond, Essays on the Principles of Morality, and on the Private and Political Rights and Obligations of Mankind. N. Y., 1834.
- W. Fleming, A Manual of Moral Philosophy, with Quotations and References for the use of Students. New ed. Lond., 1871.
- E. H. Gillet, The Moral System; with an Historical and Critical Introduction, with Special Reference to Butler's Analogy. N. Y., 1874.
- Joseph Haven, Moral Philosophy; Including Theoretical and Practical Ethics. Boston, 1860.
- Laurens P. Hickok, A System of Moral Science. Revised with the Co-operation of Julius H. Seelye, LL.D. Boston, 1880.
- Mark Hopkins, The Law of Love, and Love as a Law; or, Moral Science, Theoretical and Practical; with Strictures by Dr. M'Cosh, with Replies. N. Y., 1869. New ed., 1875.
- Lectures on Moral Science; Delivered before the Lowell Institute, Boston. N. Y., 1862.
- H. Martensen, Christian Ethics. Translated from the Danish by C. Spence. Edinb., 1873.
- A. P. Peabody, A Manual of Moral Philosophy. N. Y., 1873.
- Alexander Smith, The Philosophy of Morals. 2 vols. Lond., 1835.
- Sydney Smith, An Elementary Treatise on Moral Philosophy. N. Y., 1850.
- Samuel Spalding, The Philosophy of Christian Morals. Lond., 1848.
- Herbert Spencer, The Data of Ethics. N. Y., 1879.
- Ralph Wardlaw, Christian Ethics; or, Moral Philosophy on the Principles of Divine Revelation. Lond., 1833.
- Francis Wayland, The Elements of Moral Science. 77th ed. Boston, 1865.
- Hubbard Winslow, Moral Philosophy; Analytical, Synthetical, and Practical. 6th ed. N. Y., 1866.
- William Whewell, The Elements of Morality, including Polity. 2 vols. N. Y., 1845.
- Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy in England. New ed. Lond., 1852.

SECTION XXI.

THE METHODOLOGY OF SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

The study of systematic theology can be pursued with profit only after the preparatory studies in exegetical and historical theology have been completed. Yet it is possible to so awaken an interest for dogmatics and ethics, while pursuing such preparatory studies, that a proper and methodical study of the former science will only require for its complete treatment such elements from the mental and outward experiences of life as have developed into personal convictions. It is by no means possible to master dogmatics by study alone. It requires to become a possession of the mind as the result of earnest conflict. The same is true of ethics. It is first of all necessary that Christianity shall have been justified as a divine fact to the personal consciousness, and consequently that apologetics shall have subjectively performed its work in the mind of the dogmatic theologian. Otherwise it will be impossible to determine and practically complete the objective development of dogmatics into a science.

The study of encyclopædia is designed to awaken an interest in dogmatics. The theologian is invited to direct his attention, with the first step he takes into the science, upon that point at which all theology culminates in a scientific aspect. He is not to lose sight of the goal while examining into the great variety of matters which intervene, although this is likely to occur where a soulless and micrological exegesis is employed, or the ordinary road of trodden ecclesiastical history is followed. The dogmatic heights cannot be stormed, but must be gained. The intervals that lie between cannot be overleaped. The fruit must ripen under the vivifying influence, from within, of the religious disposition as it ascends into greater clearness, and, from without, of the streaming light of science. In its nature the study of dogmatics is partly historical and partly philosophical, and neither side should be cultivated to the neglect of the other. A mere dogmatic Dogmatics both historical and philosophical. historian who is thoroughly "posted," as students say, in his department, but who has not been inwardly impressed by his subject, and brought into relations of sympathy with it, resembles, according to Hegel, a counting-house clerk, who keeps an account of the wealth which belongs to other people, without ever acquiring property of his own. But it is also true that the mere speculator who has failed to lay an historical foundation is not unlike the mercantile speculator, or swindler, without substantial capital, who is, consequently, doomed to inevitable bankruptcy. It is, therefore, needful that the historical and the philosophical elements be combined in this study, and upon a scriptural basis. But if the conversational and disputational method, in addition to that of direct address, is in keeping anywhere, it is here.

Disputation, however, will not accomplish every thing. The inward health, which holds together the marrow of the religious life, and to which dogmatics must bear testimony, is of greater value than the gymnastics of the intellect. Mere science is inferior to wisdom, which, to use the expression of Gerson, requires a cognition of the affections. The practical task of ethics is, at least, as important within the dogmatico-ethical department as the scientific.

Religious experience necessary to understand dogmat-
ics and ethics. He only who has experienced the sanctifying, purifying, and elevating power of the Gospel in his own being, who is earnestly striving to attain to that Christian disposition in which the Christian virtues find a realization—he only will be able to speak of a fruitful and blessed experience derived from the study of dogmatics and ethics. He only who internally participates in the weal or woe of the Church is entitled to an opinion upon these matters. Without this, however great may be his outward learning and logical ability, he can only speak of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven as the blind may speak of colour.¹

This practical way is pointed out by our Lord himself (John vii, 17) with reference to apologetics. The reading of writings for and against a principle, instructive as it is for the riper judgment,² serves, as a general thing, to confuse rather than to set forth the truth. Only he who has learned from his own experience to know upon what point the weight of Christian truth is really directed, will be able to comprehend the exact salient point of apologetics, ¹ "So long as moral and religious regeneration is regarded simply as a formula, to be recited from the catechism—and multitudes of nominal Christians have even now no other conception of its character—there will arise no loudly expressed opposition against it. Or, if it should arise, it will amount to noise only, and pass away in the antiquated squabbles of schools of theology. Far otherwise will be the case when the dead formula is transformed into a mighty law of life, and an effective regeneration is suggested such as will endeavour to permeate the State with moral influence, and lead the Church back to its eternal origin, that it may renew its youth; at this point the ways of the living and the dead, of hirelings and the children of the house, will diverge. At this point of separation stands the present time."—Gelzer, ubi supra. "All that occurs in the profounder life of the soul is intelligible to them only who have passed through analogous experiences; and in the same way the deepest experience of the human soul, its union with Christ by faith, must ever remain unintelligible to those who have not partaken of it."—Gess, Über die biblische Versöhnungslehre, p. 33.

² Oberlin, for instance, prepared himself for his conflict with the freethinkers by reading the works of Voltaire. Comp. Oberlin's Leben, by Schubert, p. 29. In like manner the theologians of our day cannot be excused from learning to know the literature of nihilism, whose highest perfection of form has been attained in Strauss's Old and New Faith, and which has entered on a new stage of development, as idealistic pessimism, with Schopenhauer's philosophy. But to begin with such studies, in the expectation of thus being enabled to discover the truth, is like plunging into a whirlpool for the purpose of learning to swim.

and will be able, when encountering even unskilful argumentation, to separate the kernel from the shell. So, too, the true tactics for the polemic, with which he may resist the assaults of error, can only be acquired through the experience gained in conflict with the foe within his own being. Besides, it is only in connexion with such conflict that the courageous disposition is developed which forms the necessary correlative to genuine Christian endurance.

It is evident, finally, that the study of ethics also will be attended with profit only when personal moral growth keeps pace with the progress of the study. Where conscience is lacking the mind will, despite all the definitions formulated by science, never learn what constitutes the power of conscience, and in the absence of love it can never know wherein consists the might of love. It is indefatigable labour expended on himself that opens the moral nature of man to the vision of even the scientific inquirer. Only where the chief good is recognised as such, as the result of personal experience, can the doctrine of what is good be scientifically developed with success—the doctrine of duties only where obligation is personally felt, the doctrine of virtues only where Christian virtues are practically cultivated. In the absence of moral effort any amount of ethical studies will fail to become more than dry theory or lifeless, abstract doctrine. A majority of the errors committed even in the field of scientific ethics—for example, in casuistry—were coincident with a neglect of practical morality. The times of decadence in morality have ever reacted unfavourably upon the treatment of ethical science. Similar facts may be shown in the field of art. But incongruities between theory and practice are nowhere so strikingly apparent as when they exist in the sphere of morals, as in Pharisaism or hypocrisy.

CHAPTER IV.

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY.

SECTION I.

PROVINCE OF PRACTICAL THEOLOGY.

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY embraces the theory of Church activities or functions, whether they be exercised by the Church as a whole or by individual members and representative persons acting for the Church. Its task is regulated by the nature of religion in general, and by that of the Christian Church in its determinate historical individuality. It, therefore, builds upon all such studies as give to religion and Christianity a scientific character and an outward form. Its immediate sphere of action, however, is that of art—that is, of action emanating from known laws.

In designating practical theology as a theory, we evidently depart from the usage by which the preceding departments are characterized as theoretical in contrast with the practical.¹ But usage may also prove our justification. It does not, at any rate, hold to the etymology of the word so far as to have us think, in connexion with it, simply of theorizing (θεωρεῖν)—the properly contemplative as distinguished from the practical. On the contrary, whenever theory is spoken of a reference to practical ends is always understood, so that it denotes a guide to practice.² This usage, less

¹ Marheineke likewise observes that “the theology which is not practical is theoretical. The latter is knowledge for its own sake, the former for the sake of practice.” —Prakt. Theologie, § 6. But knowledge having reference to subsequent action is the very thing that is denominated theory!

² The definition by Pelt, by which practical theology is made “a scientific knowledge respecting the self-development of the Church,” is likewise inadequate. The knowledge is not alone sufficient in this case, but needs to be transformed into action, as Pelt himself remarks, in the progress of his statement (p. 561), when he says that practical theology aims to show how “the further development of the Church may be assured by the action of the Church in the present moment.” It is true of every science, and, therefore, of this, that a theory of this nature must not be a rhapsodical something, but is required to become an organic whole, “bearing the idea upon scientific than customary, it is true, would, accordingly, convert practical theology most emphatically into a theoretical science. It transmutes into action what the inquiring mind has brought before us from the fields of the philosophy of religion, exegesis, Church history, dogmatics, and ethics, and transforms the ἐπιστήμη into τέχνη. It is not the application of an art, but the theory which qualifies for the practice of an art. It thus possesses a claim to scientific character. For, while all theology aims, in its character as a positive science, to affect the life of human beings, it is yet incomplete without that department which is most directly engaged in carrying that positive aim into effect. It is, accordingly, with entire justice that practical theology has been termed, by Schleiermacher, "the crown of the tree."

Scientific character of practical theology.

But, in like manner, as there is an internal unity of life in the crown of the tree which is outwardly repeated under a different form, so are all the different theological sciences repeated in practical theology, but with reference to the life of the Church and its needs, and hence in the form of application.¹ In its most general aspects practical theology reaches back into the philosophy of religion, for it is designed to reduce religion to practice in the life. Unless the nature of the Practical theology related to philosophy of religion.

which it rests within itself as a recognised germ of life" (p. 562). Vinet, speaking of practical theology, observes well and to the point: "It is art which supposes science, or science resolving itself in art. It is the art of applying usefully, in the ministry, the knowledge acquired in the three other departments of theology, which are purely scientific."—Pastoral Theology (Skinner's ed.), p. 21. Also Ebrard: "Practical theology, when examined in the light, is not a knowledge, but an ability; not a science, but an art, in which the theological knowledge that has been acquired becomes practical, in which it undergoes a practical application." The contrary view is advocated by Palmer, ubi supra, p. 323: "Not the application to certain concrete conditions of office and life of a previously indwelling knowledge, but a knowledge itself which the other departments of theology have not furnished, forms the contents of practical theology." We concede this, provided this knowledge be a knowledge relating to what is to be done. On any other view practical theology becomes the most hollow and unfruitful of all studies, while it is undeniably the most fruitful of them all when its eye is fixed upon actual life.

¹ It is not easy to understand why Graf (Prakt. Theologie, pp. 185 and 176) should object to this expression, unless the view introduced by Schleiermacher with reference to theology in general be regarded as antiquated (p. 136). Our idea does not, however, involve a "popularized theology," but simply a scientific combination and elaboration of the practical elements. Comp. what Vinet says: "The speculative side should have its place. Action is the last end of speculation; but whatever may be the nature of the action, it is not sufficiently provided for if attention be confined to it in the practical point of view. It should be studied abstractly. . . . He who regards the things of his profession only in the midst of action will act neither with freedom, nor with intelligence, nor with depth."—Pastoral Theology, p. 22.

religion be understood, all worship, sermons, religious training, and care of souls will be impossible. The conception entertained with regard to the nature of religion will determine what the worship, sermon, catechesis, and the care of souls are to accomplish.

But practical theology cannot be allowed to rest content with mere general definitions in religious matters. It has to do with well-defined Christian and ecclesiastical functions. It, therefore, presupposes, in its scientific work, the whole of the positive contents of Christianity—its facts and teachings, and, more than all else, a knowledge of the Bible. The sermon must be rooted in the Bible. The homilist needs to be also an exegete. It also requires familiarity with Church history. The entire constitution and government of the Church, and the organization of its worship, The historical are grounded in historical conditions, and cannot be basis. spun out from abstract theories. Liturgics, for instance, is based upon archæology, and Church government on the history of the constitution of the Church. The function of teaching, moreover, in all its departments, necessarily presupposes Christian doctrine, considered both in its establishment by apologetics and in its development by dogmatics and ethics. Finally, since Church functions are always exercised by a particular Church, having a determinate denominational character, and being exposed to the possibility of conflict with other confessions, practical theology is required to include also this symbolical and polemical side of theological science. It thus comes to pass that the symbol is reflected especially in catechisms and liturgies, and that the constitution of any particular Church corresponds to its peculiarities of confession. These considerations justify the placing of practical theology at the close of the theological course. Only that theologian who has passed through a preliminary scientific training, and has received into himself and assimilated the substance of theological knowledge, is qualified to dispose of and utilize the possession he has acquired. The latter, however, will not accomplish itself. Hence, it is the task of practical theology to present to view the combined practical features of all theology, and then to indicate the objects toward which the activities of the Church are to be directed, and also the laws under which its functions are to be exercised.

Practical theology completes the theological course. The office of practical theology is to show, not merely what may be admitted to the ecclesiastical field in the character of an established element of worship or Church constitution, but also how everything is to be administered. Only a crude empiricism would consent to leave this to the play of chance or considerations of convenience. The scientific dignity of practical theology appears in the very fact that it will not rest satisfied with mere routine, but demands, and makes possible, a regulated action in behalf of the Church and in harmony with its spirit. Such action, in unison with law, we designate as being according to art, and therefore assign practical theology to the department of art as its legitimate field. It is important, however, that the word art be not understood in a perverted sense, so as to denote paltry arts and tricks, or the unnatural, since true art is altogether ^{True art the highest nature.} nature, taken out from its crude and accidental surroundings, intellectually illumined, and transmuted into consciousness.

It is sometimes said by persons who are prejudiced against science, that the apostles were not learned men; that they did not treat preaching as an art, and that this work does not afford a field for the exhibition of art, because only what comes from the heart can effect an entrance into other hearts. Such objections, however, serve merely to show to what extent the real nature of art is yet misunderstood. The word is employed in this connexion both in a wider and a more limited sense. Practical theology is entitled to the name of a theory of art, even in the broader meaning, since every rational function which aims at a definite result must be guided and upheld by an authoritative principle. In this sense it is actually customary to speak of medical art, the corresponding feature to which in the theological field may, perhaps, be found in the art which has to do with the training and the care of souls. But a place in practical theology must be conceded to art also in the narrow or æsthetical meaning of the word, in which sense it comes under the category of "descriptive functions."¹ This will appear more particularly in connexion with the theory of worship, in the department of Liturgics.

SECTION II.

PRACTICAL SIDE OF CLERICAL LIFE.

The aggregate of ecclesiastical functions, which constitutes the object of practical theology, may be comprehended under the two categories of Church Government and Church Ministrations. The clergyman is required by the practical relation which he sustains toward the Church to devote himself, predominantly, if not exclusively, to service in each of these departments. For this reason, practical theology has hitherto ^{Former restriction of practical theology.} been largely restricted to the task of furnishing a guide to clerical duties, or to the character of a science of the clerical calling, with particular reference to the ministrations of the Church.

¹ Comp. Schleiermacher's division of Ethics, supra.

"The practical in theology," says Schweizer, "has in no wise been created by the spiritual order, but rather has itself produced this order, which is in a peculiar sense the servant of the Church. The theology, at times predominantly learned, and at other times more largely practical, has been developed by the Church itself, regarded as a community holding to a common faith."¹ His view requires that practical theology should begin with the institution of a spiritual order, a measure which belongs, according to Schleiermacher's arrangement, to the theory of Church government. Since, however, this branch has not as yet been largely developed, it would seem to be by no means advisable, in a methodological point of view, to place its scanty proportions in the foreground. It is, likewise, very difficult to divide the whole of practical theology between the two categories of Church government and Church ministration.² It is impossible to separate them wholly from each other. The liturgical elements, for instance, belong to Church government in so far as the organization of the worship is concerned,³ and to Church ministrations when the administration of the worship is in question.

It seems to be hazardous, upon the whole, to depart too greatly in this matter from the concrete facts with which we have to deal. We do not misapprehend the faulty character of an empirical process which yields as its result the simple fact "that preaching is carried on, and then constructs a theory—homiletics—to correspond with that fact."⁴ But it is also necessary that, on the other hand, the a priori construction of a science whose very name indicates that it is designed to meet practical wants, be avoided. These practical needs, moreover, have not arisen as the result of mere accident, but grow out of the historical development of the Church during her progress to this time. Hence they are consequently to be regarded as necessary rather than accidental facts, and as rooted in the history of the Church.

To these considerations we must add the practical nature of the calling of the theologian himself. The primary object in which he is concerned, when, having been qualified for the service of the Church, he leaves the school behind, is certainly that he be introduced into the spiritual office. To acquaint him with the duties of that office is the work of practical theology. Should he confine his efforts in that position also to speculative labours merely, when may

¹ Ubi supra, p. 20.

² See Marheineke, Prakt. Theologie, § 35.

³ Comp. Schleiermacher, §§ 269 and 286.

⁴ Schweizer, ubi supra, p. 24.

we suppose that he will develop a sense for the practical? It is just this theory that constitutes a most distressing feature, that, after having in many instances spent numerous years in study, our young ministers often fail to know how to conduct a mere Bible class, or to construct a sermon that shall be more than a compilation from the notes of seminary lectures. If it happen that, in addition, their heads become filled with notions upon Church government through the study of practical theology, instead of their being brought in person to the place where safe action is necessary, what is to be looked for in such a case? A morbid and total devotion to science, without due emphasis on its practical departments, would result in rendering the young preacher unpractical who is placed in the very heart of the activities of practical theology. It appears, then, that, in connexion with the study of practical theology, the young preacher should be first directed into the fields which have already been cultivated by other hands—homiletics, catechetics, and liturgics—and led to put forth his effort there. It is, nevertheless, requisite that the nature of such studies, their internal necessity, and their connexion with the organism of the Church, as a whole, be made scientifically clear to his mind.¹ After this he may extend the range of his vision beyond the cultivated fields of Church ministrations, and embrace the uncultivated lands of ecclesiastical polity and ecclesiastical law.²

It is certainly an observation of real value, that the functions of the Church are not identical with those of the clergy, and, therefore, may not be confounded with them. But the theologian must comprehend these functions, and the clergyman must execute them theoretically or in practice. A sudden attempt to establish a lay theology, in which the clergyman should take occasional part, but only with reference to his own person, would be wrong, and could just as well be applied to other departments. It may be said that the Bible is the common property of all Christians, and that therefore exegesis belongs to all; that the faith is the common property of the Church, and that dogmatics is consequently a science in which all may engage, and by no means theologians only. Since, however, theology as a science does not come within the reach of all men, but is empirically restricted to those who are occupied in a special calling and profession, we may say that exegesis, historical theology, and systematic theology have to do with what it is necessary that the minister should know. Practical theology, on the other hand, treats what he has to do, in the exercise of a clear consciousness and as a pastoral function; acting, as he must, in the name of the Church, maintaining a constant connexion and reciprocal relation of active influence with the Church. This practical point of view will govern our arrangement, which does not rest on a priori considerations, but upon a simple recognition and observation of the state of facts in the case.

¹ Comp. Marheineke, Prakt. Theologie, § 32.

² Schleiermacher consequently evinced sound judgment in placing Church ministrations before Church government. Rosenkranz, too, concludes his Encyklopaedie with this department. Felt, on the other hand, begins with the theory of Church organization.

Difference between the relation of the preacher to practical theology and the other departments.

SECTION III.

METHOD OF TREATMENT.

The duties for which practical theology is to qualify, admit of being divided according to various methods, which correspond to the different points of view that may be occupied. We class them under the three following categories:

1. The gathering of individuals, and their introduction into the fellowship of the Church. This we call Halientics and Catechetics.

2. The guiding and promoting of the Christian life within the Church society: a. As expressed publicly in connexion with the worship, either in a prescribed or a more independent form; this is Liturgics and Homiletics. b. As manifested in the wider circles embraced within the Church, in the form of the care of souls; this is Pastoral Theology.

Categories of Practical Theology.

3. These functions are enclosed within the Organization of the Church, by which each clergyman is required to labour in his own place, and to whose proper management he must contribute; this is Ecclesiastical Polity and Law.

Every mode of division involves deficiencies, which are owing to the fact that the actual state of the Church, with the needs which have been made manifest by experience, does not in all respects correspond to the ideal of what the Church ought to be. A purely scientific arrangement, based on the idea of the Church, will not unfrequently come into conflict with things as they exist. On the other hand, one which starts out with a recognition of the actual condition of the Church is open to the charge of being controlled by accidental features, and, therefore, of being unscientific. This objection was brought to bear against most of the earlier methods of arrangement, which, however, in many instances, scarcely deserved this name, since they joined together homiletics, liturgics, and catechetics, at haphazard, without going back to the conditions lying deep in the organism of the Church, upon which their life depends.

All modes of division imperfect.

The disposition to organize this department has been manifested in different directions since the time of Schleiermacher, and divisions of the most various kinds have been attempted. Those by Nitzsch, Schweizer, Marheineke, and Moll principally deserve attention. Nitzsch conceives practical theology as being a theory of Church functions, and divides the latter into fundamental and conservative. Among fundamentals he reckons homiletics, catechetics, and liturgics, the first two of which are included under the idea of the didactic. He divides the conservatives into education and sacred politics. This method is followed in the dissertation cited above. A somewhat different view prevails in the larger work,¹ which divides the functions, first, into those designed to edify, such as preaching, celebrations, the care of souls; and, second, into the regulative, such as internal and external Church law, objectively as legislation, subjectively as the formation of government and constitution. Schweizer has raised important objections against the arrangement of Nitzsch. Of these we notice especially that which censures the destroying of the natural connexion of homiletics with liturgics through the association of the former with catechetics, thus giving to it a character too exclusively didactic. Schweizer proceeds upon the distinction between Church government and Church ministrations, and endeavours to carry further into details, and to modify, the plans marked out by Schleiermacher, with whom he agrees in the main. He deals, first of all, with the instituting of the spiritual order, the developing of a positive clergy from the natural clergy.² He then lays down an ingeniously contrived division of Church ministrations, based upon Schleiermacher's distinction between the free and those restricted to set forms. Such restriction applies, most of all, to the services of the public worship, though less rigidly to the sermon than to the liturgy. It is less operative in the care of souls, where it appears more largely in the department of pastoral supervision than in that of unofficial service. It appears least of all in the work of winning souls to the Church,¹ though more prominently when that function is exercised in connexion with the regular work of a church than in connexion with missionary work.

¹ Praktische Theologie, vol. i, p. 128, sqq.

² He obtains three forms: 1. The Roman Catholic, on which the sacerdotal character of the individual (character indelebilis) makes a clergyman of the clergyman. 2. The Illuministic and Quaker, where the distinction between those who impart and those who receive is but temporary, and determined by the particular service in hand. 3. The Protestant, which is intermediate between the preceding two.

³ The clergyman is restricted in services which he performs in the name of the Church, and as directed by her, being, so to speak, merely the organ of the Church, while in free activity his individuality may assert itself. Coincident with the above is the distinction between the fixed and movable.

Schweizer's division will, accordingly, result in the following scheme: I. The theory of Church government. II. The-Schweizer's di- vision. ory of Church functions; 1. Theory of worship; a. Li-turgies, b. Homiletics; 2. Pastoral Theology, the Care of Souls;
a. ministerial, b. free; 3. Halieutics, theory of the art of adding to the membership of the Church; a. Catechetics, b. Theory of missionary operations.

Much may be said, however, in opposition to this division also.
Defects of Schweizer's arrangement. Not only is the entire distinction between free and restricted merely relative, as Pelt has shown,² but the arrangement itself, his plus out of the minus, is not always properly graduated. Should catechetics—which, in its character as the service for immature minds, reaches back into worship, and therefore into the department which, more than others, is controlled by established forms—be less restricted to forms than the care of souls? The missionary function, halieutics, moreover, is erroneously placed by the side of catechetics, while it ought to precede, and prepare the way for, the latter function, as well as for all the remaining ones. It is, certainly, a function of acquisition, while catechetics is a preparatory function. Halieutics seeks its field, and finds it, beyond the limits of the organized ecclesiastical community; catechetics stands within those boundaries, though on the line. The two departments should, accordingly, lead and follow, instead of being placed side by side. The contrast between freedom and limitation cannot be the determining idea in this matter.

Marheineke distributes practical theology over the three concen-Marheineke's method. tric circles within which practical effort must be employed. He distinguishes: 1. The Christian Church;
 2. The Protestant Church; 3. The particular, or local, Church. The ministrations of the Church have reference to the latter, and are divided into: a. The formation of the congregation, the instruction

¹ From ἀλιεύω ἀλιεύς, Matt. iv, 19. The term was first employed by Sickel in his Grundriss der christl. Halieutik, Lpz., 1829. We employ it in its broad meaning, not excluding Halieutics from Homiletics, with which it was identified by Sickel, but still regarding it primarily as the science of missions, and, therefore, placing it before Liturgical Homiletics proper, and also before Catechetics.

² Encykl., p. 567. Comp. also the review in Rheinwald's Repert., 1837, vol. xix, p. 125, sqq.

of youth; catechetics. b. The assembling of the congregation; homiletics and liturgics. c. The influencing of individuals; care of souls. This method is also open to the objection of destroying the unity of the different functions. Liturgics concerns the life of the general, as well as that of the local, Church. Catechetics has to do both with future members of the Church, and, in part, with the congregation. Preaching is conducted in the name of the Church, and for the good of the congregation. Moll deduces the functions of practical theology from the nature of the Church, devoting Part I to the physiology of the Church, and reserving the theory of ecclesiastical functions for Part II. These are divided into regulative, training, and edifying functions. The first class includes the constitution, the legislation, and the administration of the Church. To the second belongs training by means of supervision, instruction, and discipline. The third has to do with liturgical performances. Harms constructed a witty scheme, without claiming for it any scientific character. It is according to the three P's—the preacher, the priest, and the pastor—the catechist losing his place, and being stowed away in the pastor's province. A fourth P ought to have been available for the pedagogue. The Roman Catholics, Drey, Staudenmaier, and Graf, have adopted still other divisions.¹

We might attempt additional methods to those which we have enumerated.² For example, we might arrange an order according to the following plan: 1. The official and extra-official; or, based on the nature of religion, the directly religious and liturgical, designed to affect the feelings; 2. The homiletical, which operates more especially upon the understanding, and addresses its appeal to reason; 3. The practical, or pastoral, function, which directs its aim upon action—the practical life. In connexion with this scheme it would be necessary to regard catechetics, the common basis of the whole, as a preparation for the religious life in every direction, such as the public worship, the instruction, and the religious training of children. The entire discussion of this subject indicates that it would be prejudice to insist that any particular arrangement is the only correct one, and that every division which may be scientifically justified deserves notice in its place.¹

¹ See Pelt, ubi supra.

² This, as we observe, is substantially the same as that of Ebrard, in Liturgik, § 10, namely: a. Ministerium externum (catechetics and missions); b. Ministerium internum (worship and care of souls); c. The common bond of outward order (gubernatio). A different method is given by Ehrenfeuchter, Theorie des Cultus, p. 81, who gives the precedence to catechetics (the power of religion to produce doctrine and dogmas); the next place to the care of souls and ecclesiastical law (the power to penetrate through the individuality of nations in the course of historical development); and the last and highest place to liturgics, because the most diversified powers of the life of the Church flow together in the worship; but, being deprived of movement, present themselves as settled states.

SECTION IV.

HISTORY OF PRACTICAL THEOLOGY.

Directions for the conduct of the spiritual office are already found in the Pastoral Epistles of the New Testament; in the Apostolic Fathers; in Tertullian, Cyprian, and Chrysostom, in his work on the Priesthood; Ambrose, in his treatise on the Duties of Ministers; in Augustine, in his work on Christian Doctrine; and in ^{Works of the} Ephraem Syrus, in his work on the Priesthood. To ^{Fathers.} these must be added The Pastoral Care, which is ascribed to Leo the Great (died 461), the Book of Pastoral Care, to John, Bishop of Ravenna, by Gregory the Great (died 604), and the Epistle to Ludifredus on the Duties of Priests in the Church, by Isidore of Seville (died 636). During the Middle Ages the work on the Institution of the clergy, by Rhabanus Maurus, was a leading book for the training of the clergy, and many directions are found elsewhere for priests, bishops, monks, and Church officers in general, according to the different gradations of the hierarchy and the requirements of different places.²

The forerunners of the Reformation turned their attention ^{Work of the} ^{Reformers.} erably upon practical theology. Wycliffe, among others, for example, wrote a tractate on The Pastoral Office. But a special change was wrought in the character of practical theology by the Reformation itself, by which it became the theory of culture for preachers and pastors, instead of remaining a theory of training for priests. The isolated directions of Luther were collected by Conrad Porta, of Eisleben (died 1585), in his Pastoral of Luther, which has been often reprinted since 1582, the last edition being that issued in Nördlingen in 1842.³ The term

¹ An absolute division is impracticable, because the several branches of practical theology are so interlaced as to admit of being represented separately only in a modified sense. See Vinet, Past. Theol., pp. 22, 23.

² Comp. Ratherius of Verona, Synodica ad Presbyteros et Ordines ceteros forinsecus, i. e., per universam diocesin constitutos, in d'Achery, Spicileg. T. L., p. 376 seq.; the Tractatus de moribus et officiis episcoporum, by Bernard of Clairvaux (died 1153), addressed to the Archbishop Henry of Sens, and Neander, Der heil. Bernhard, p. 17, seq.

³ Comp. F. Gessert, Evangelisches Pfarramt nach Luther's Ansichten, Bremen, 1826.

pastoral theology, which had already been employed by Erasmus Sarcerius (1562), was now, with minor variations, transferred to other works also; for example, those of Quenstedt, in his Pastoral Ethics (1678, 1708), of J. L. Hartmann (died 1684), of Kortholt, in his Faithful Pastor (1698), of Mayer, in his Museum of the Minister of the Church (1690),¹ and of other writers who did not always work in harmony with the spirit of Luther.

The universities provided chairs of practical theology only in exceptional instances; for example, in Helmstedt and Tübingen. Such features as were deemed important Practical theology in the universities. were generally treated in connexion with dogmatics under the head of The Ministry, or in the chapter On Cases of Conscience. Spener, in his Pious Desires, and A. H. Francke, in his Pastoral Admonitions (1712), his Observations on Hartmann's Pastorate (1739), and in his Pastoral College (1743), infused new life into this study. But, down to the close of the eighteenth century, the works most esteemed were those of Mieg (died 1708), Sacred Duties of the Protestant Pastor (1747), Deylingius (died 1755), Institutes of Pastoral Prudence (Lips., 1768), Pet. Roques (died 1748), The Protestant Pastor (1723, Germ., Halle, 1768), Mosheim (1754), and Töllner (1769), Outline, upon which followed Rosenmüller (1778), G. F. Seiler (1786), J. J. Pfeiffer (1789), and others. All of these, however, were superseded by Niemeyer.

The rationalistic spirit of the age, which first found expression in Spalding's Utility of the Preacher's Office (1st ed., 1772), asserted itself during the final decades of the century in the secular mode of apprehending the task of Rationalistic teaching of practical theology. practical theology. Those profounder relations of the spiritual office, as they had been described by Herder, in his Provincial Sheets, were crowded into the background more and more. Gräffe, with his dry formalism, allied himself with Kant, while Schlegel, on the other hand, emphasized the "promotion of Christian godliness," and F. H. Ch. Schwarz (died 1837) defined the Christian idea still more clearly. To this was now added the impulse for scientific arrangement which emanated from Schleiermacher, although works of even later date—for example, the very serviceable treatise by Hüffell—were but slightly influenced by it.² Harms is original throughout, everywhere proceeding upon practical considerations, in this respect contrasting with Marheineke, who is purely speculative. The two complement each other; but the bridge which leads over from the one to the other might be difficult to find by the student. In view of what has been done down to the present time, it may be asserted that, so far as Germany is concerned, Nitzsch has brought the science of practical theology to a conclusion for some time to come. Within the pale of the Roman Catholic Church Maria Theresa was the first to erect a chair of practical theology, its seat being in the national university of her realm, Austria. Sailer was efficient here, also, in a preparatory way, and was followed by Schenkel, Pawondra, Schwarzl, Gollowitz, Reichenberger, Hinterberger, Herzog, and others.¹ Among Roman Catholic works, that by Graf is preeminent.

¹ Comp. Tholuck, Geist der Luther. Theologen Wittenbergs, p. 261.

² According to the judgment of some critics the work of Hüffell has even lost in value by reason of its strict regard for scientific principles.

Little has been done in England or America for the scientific organization of practical theology. The usage has obtained of treating the functions of the minister under the two heads of preaching and the pastoral care, leaving Haliotics, Catechetics, Liturgics, and Ecclesiastical Law to be treated, without any attempt to assign them fixed places, or to be omitted altogether. Shedd speaks of the minister as both an orator and a pastor: as an orator he addresses masses of men; as a pastor he deals with individual souls. All of practical theology, therefore, which this writer considers is the formation of clerical character and the discharge of strictly parish duties. Hoppin, following the same general method, divides the minister's activities into those of the study and pulpit, and those which find their place outside of the study and pulpit. Vinet, who is regarded as an authority in America, makes the same twofold division: "The preacher instructs, the pastor trains up: the one receives and nourishes those who come; the other seeks also those who do not come." Kidder, however, takes in the whole scope of practical theology, though without attempting to show the logical connexion of its parts. It is made by him to include "a knowledge of the various theories of Church polity; the theory and administration of discipline; the history and use of liturgies; the agencies and details of Church enterprises; catechetics, or the elements of Christian instruction; homiletics, the science and art of Christian address; and the duties and relations of the pastoral office."² Practical theology, in England and America, still waits for a broader treatment which shall unite all the parts into one consistent whole.

¹ See Pelt, p. 557.

² Christian Pastorate, p. 196.

LITERATURE OF PRACTICAL THEOLOGY IN GENERAL.

- Ch. F. Baur, Ueber das Verhältniss der prakt. zur wissenschaftl. Theologie. Tüb., 1811.
- A. H. Niemeyer, Handbuch für christliche Religionslehrer. Halle, 1790. 6th ed., 1823 and 1827. 2 vols.
- † J. M. Sailer, Vorlesungen aus der Pastoraltheologie. 5th ed. Sulzb., 1858. 3 vols.
- J. F. C. Gräffe, Die Pastoraltheologie nach ihrem ganzen Umfange. Gött., 1808. 2 vols.
- G. Schlegel, Handbuch der praktischen Pastoralwissenschaft. Greifsw., 1811.
- F. H. Ch. Schwarz, Der christl. Religionslehrer und seine moralische Bestimmung. Giessen, 1798–1800. 2 vols.
- G. Ph. Ch. Kaiser, Entwurf eines Systems der Pastoraltheologie für Vorlesungen. Erl., 1816.
- * L. Hüffel, Ueber das Wesen und den Beruf des evangel.-luther. Geistlichen. Geissen, 4th ed., 1848. 2 vols.
- J. T. L. Danz, Die Wissenschaften des geistl. Berufs, im Grundrisse. Jena, 1824.
- F. B. Köster, Lehrbuch der Pastoralwissenschaft mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Pastoralweisheit. Kiel, 1827.
- * Kl. Harms, Pastoraltheologie. In Reden an Theologie-Studierende. 3d ed. Kiel, 1878. 3 vols.
- R. Haas, Der geistl. Beruf nach den neuesten Zeitbedürfnissen. Giessen, 1834. 2d ed., 1845. 2 vols.
- Ph. Marheineke, Entwurf der prakt. Theologie. Berl., 1837.
- J. J. Kromm, Der evangel.-protest. Geistliche innerhalb der Grenzen seines heiligen Berufs. Mannh., 1839.
- † J. Widmer, Vorträge über Pastoraltheologie. Augsburg, 1840.
- † A. Graf, Kritische Darstellung des gegenwärtigen Zustandes der praktischen Theologie. Tüb., 1841.
- * C. I. Nitzsch, Praktische Theologie. Bonn, 1847, 1848. 3 vols. New ed., 1848–67. Index by Schmidt, 1872.
- K. F. Gaupp, Praktische Theologie. Berl., 1848, 1852. 2 vols.
- F. Schleiermacher, Die praktische Theologie nach den Grundsätzen der evangel. Kirche im Zusammenhange dargestellt. Berl., 1850.
- † F. Vogl, Pastoraltheologie. 7th ed., by Gollowitz, 1855.
- † J. Amberger, Pastoraltheologie. Regensb., 1851, 1852. 2 vols.
- C. B. Moll, Das System der prakt. Theologie, im Grundrisse dargestellt. Halle, 1858.
- J. H. A. Ebrard, Vorlesungen über praktische Theologie. Königsb., 1854.
- F. Ehrenfeuchter, Die praktische Theologie. 1st part. Gött., 1859.
- K. Kuzmany, Praktische Theologie der evangel. Kirche Augsburg. und Helv. Conf. Zunächst für akademische Vorlesungen. Wien, 1860.
- W. Otto, Grundzüge der evangelischen praktischen Theologie. Dillenb., 1866.
- Evangelische prakt. Theologie. Gotha, 1869. 2 vols.
- R. Kübel, Umriss der Pastoraltheol. 2d ed. Stuttg., 1874.
- J. Paludain-Müller, Der evang. Pfarrer und sein Amt. From the Danish, by A. Struve. Kiel, 1874.
- E. Doyé, Der evang. Geistliche als Pred., Priester und Pastor. Berl., 1874.
- A. Schweizer, Pastoraltheologie. Lpz., 1875.
- F. L. Steinmeyer, Beiträge zur prakt. Theol. Berl., 1874–79. 5 parts.
- G. v. Zetzschwitz, System der prakt. Theol. Lpz., 1876–78. 3 parts.
- Th. Harnack, Praktische Theologie. Erl., 1877.

SECTION V.

CATECHETICS.

Catechetics has to do with the introduction of persons into the Christian community, and therefore with the imparting of instruction and the religious nurture connected therewith. Catechetical instruction in the Christian countries of our day is largely confined to children, who have been admitted into the Church by the rite of baptism and by the regeneration of the heart. But its range should also embrace the instruction of such adults as have not come under early religious training, or have neglected it.

The function of receiving new members into the Church is preceded by that of gaining new members for the Church, or rather Haliēutics and Keryktics. for the kingdom of God in general. This function of acquisition has been termed Haliēutics. It coincides with the missionary function, or Keryktics,¹ and by its nature takes the precedence of catechetics. In view of the continually increasing demands of science, it was impossible that the missionary function should, in its steadily progressing development, retain an empirical character alone. It was compelled to gradually construct a science of missionary operations, and a good beginning has already been made in this direction.²

It is not proper, indeed, to embrace the methodology of missions within the circle of studies which are necessary to the future servant of the Church as such, because mission work, as historically developed down to the present time, is, with few exceptions, rather a matter for independent Christian effort than an enterprise of the Church in its official character. Another reason is, that the training of the missionary varies from the ordinary course of theological training in many respects, both as to form and matter. The methodology of missions will, nevertheless, possess interest Methodology of missions. for every theologian who is interested in the general work of missions; and even within the bounds of Christendom the ultimate object always is to win souls for Christ. Homiletics, too, must aim to win souls. The same must be said of catechetics and pastoral theology, although such effort differs considerably in character from that which is expended upon persons who have no acquaintance whatever with Christianity. Within the Church the theory for such effort may, at least with reference to cultured persons, be largely regarded as applied apologetics. But, beyond the borders of the Church, there is no element upon which it may lay hold aside from the religious spirit in human nature generally.¹

¹ Comp. Schleiermacher, § 298; Danz, p. 362, and the works by Stier and Lindner, cited there.

² Such beginnings exist in the various instructions given to missionaries by the societies in whose service they are engaged, e. g., the Unterricht für die Brüder und Schwestern, welche unter den Heiden am Evangelio dienen, Barby, 1784; the instructions in Annual Proceedings of the Church Missionary Society, Lond., 1804-44; Melville Home, Letters on Missions, Lond., 1824; James Hough, The Missionary Vademecum, etc., Lond., 1832; William Swan, Letters on Missions, Lond., 1830. Also the special instructions relating to India, of Duff, Buyers, etc. Comp. also the Calwer Beleuchtungen der Missionsache, since 1842; and especially W. Hoffmann, Missionsfragen, i, 1, Heidelb., 1847.

Returning to catechetics, we observe that the name did not originate accidentally;² for κατηχεῖν (from ἦχος, a sound), whence κατηχητής, κατηχούμενος are derived, signifies, in both the New Testament and the earlier Church fathers, to announce or instruct in a general sense (comp. Luke i, 4; Acts xviii, 25; xxi, 21-24; Rom. ii, 18; 1 Cor. xiv, 19; Gal. vi, 6). On this basis catechetics would be synonymous with keryktics. But by the more definite usage, which was subsequently developed, the name of catechists was applied to persons who prepared the novitiates for Christianity, for which reason they were also called nautologists, since they, according to a figure prevalent at the time, brought on board new reinforcements for the crew. It will be necessary to hold fast this idea when attempting to determine the scope of catechetics. Every person whose Christianity is not yet sufficiently advanced to enable him to participate personally in the benefits of redemption, is yet a catechumen, a minor, whose susceptibility to the influence of both the edifying and the regulative function needs to be aroused.³ Every person who aids to qualify him for that end is a catechist.

Scope of catechetics.

It is, of course, true that Christian youth—that is, that portion of the Church which has become incorporated with it through baptism and instruction in the Sunday-school, but which has not yet, by renewal of the baptismal covenant, been individually received into the fellowship of the Church—are with us the leading objects

¹ In dealing with Jews the Old Testament Scriptures furnish a point of contact; but the nature of the work becomes, for that very reason, different from that which must be employed with the heathen. It, as a rule, presupposes a knowledge of Christianity, though not a Christian understanding, and is therefore more particularly polemical and apologetic than halieutic.

² Schliermacher, § 291, thinks that the term is too limited for the ground to be occupied; but it is in some sense also too broad, inasmuch as in the ancient meaning of the word κατηχεῖν the homiletical function was also involved. A further discussion of the word κατηχεῖν may be found in Zezschwitz, p. 17, sqq.

³ Schliermacher, §§ 293, 294; Zezschwitz, System der Katechetik, Einl.

of the catechetical function.¹ But circumstances may exist in which adults likewise need catechetical instruction, as in the case of Jews, Mohammedans, or heathen who become Christians, or of Roman Catholics who become Protestants. It is, as can be readily seen, the task of ethics and pastoral skill to determine the general method of estimating such changes of relation from the religious and moral point of view, while catechetics has to do with persons only who have already resolved to effect that change.²

Difference between ethics and catechetics. But adult persons are found, even in Christian countries, whose immaturity in a Christian aspect calls for catechetical instruction, either because they were not baptized in infancy or because their religious training has been wholly neglected. Nor is it by any means a settled question, with reference to a large portion of the Christian Church, especially in the rural districts, whether a form of instruction midway between the hermeneutical and the catechetical could not be introduced, which should carry forward and establish the instructions previously received by persons who have been admitted to fellowship among mature Christians.³

SECTION VI.

CATECHETICAL METHODS.

The Christian religion rests upon the facts of consciousness as well as upon those of a positive revelation and of actual history. It follows, therefore, that the task of the catechist will involve the developing of religious feeling and of the understanding of the catechumen with regard to the inward truths of religion, as well as the impressing on his soul of the great value of external truths. This reflection will indicate to what extent the interrogative method is adapted to catechetical instruction.

¹ The instruction of candidates for Church membership is exclusively a clerical function, while the earlier religious training belongs, in part, to the school and the family. It follows that different classes of catechumens may be assumed, each of which will require a mode of treatment peculiar to itself.

² Palmer's exclusion of the instruction of proselytes from the scope of catechetics (Katechet., p. 5), and its being assigned to the field of missionary work, arise from the confounding of the function of winning and converting souls, by which the resolution to embrace the new faith is called forth, with the teaching function, which assumes the change of religious belief as an already existing fact, and is employed upon a more thorough exposition of particulars. The catechumen is no longer beyond the pale of Christianity, though he yet remains outside the Church. Comp. also what he has said in Section iii with reference to the relation of haliutics to catechetics.

³ With reference to the catechization of adults, which Spener already introduced at Frankfurt, and which others also successfully engaged in, see Burk, Pastoraltheologie in Beispielen, p. 536, seqq.

This instruction should be, not mere instruction, but the training and nurture of the soul.

Two methods are to be avoided at this point—the one going to the extreme of endeavouring to lead the young and inexperienced mind to discover every thing through the questions he is made to answer, while the other goes to the contrary extreme of seeking to furnish him with the needed information wholly from without. Catechetics goes back to the nature of religion and Christianity, and is required to gauge its task by that rule. Religion ^{function of} cannot be imparted from without like a material sub- ^{catechetics.} stance. The spark which God has placed in every human soul must be kindled into life. But this, in turn, must be accomplished through incitements and communications from without. Among these may be enumerated the presenting of religious examples, and of great religious occurrences and facts, the opening to view of the connexion running through the Bible history,¹ and especially by directing attention to the splendour of the life of Jesus. All this must constitute the introduction to a subsequent strictly systematic method of instruction in the form of catechism. The method should also be accommodated to the necessary gradations of the course of instruction, being at one time more interrogative, and at another more in the form of direct statement. This will serve to show how far the definition of Bertholdt² and others may be approved, which asserts that “catechetics is the particular science which lays down the rules which are to govern in religious instruction, imparted by the method of question and answer, in order that it may become appropriated and profitable.”

Many absurdities have been evolved, especially by Gräffe, in connexion with this play of question and answer. There has been talk of spiritual Socratism, in which the fact was overlooked that Socrates had to do with very different persons from ^{The Socratic} those who, as a rule, come under the influence of the ^{method.} catechist.³ Their questions, moreover, have a very different aim.

¹ “Catechetical instruction should begin with creating a clear conception of all these personages (Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Samuel, David, Paul, John), each of whom is representative of some particular feature of the religious life, but all of whom unite among themselves into a common whole.”—Rosenkranz, p. 332. All that is merely mechanical, as well as all that is merely learned and critical, should be avoided.

² Theol. Wissenschaftskunde, ii, p. 297. Mosheim regarded catechization as being “a reasonable and orderly conversation between teacher and pupil.”—Sittenlehre (3d ed.), i, p. 488.

³ Hüffell, i, p. 447, sqq. (2d ed.). “The Socratic method begets the conceit in the mind of catechumens that they, in some way, produce religion, and almost compels them to indulge in arrogant criticisms upon the faith whose wisdom has, after all, not

The natural process is that he should put the question who desires to learn about some matter, and it would follow that the catechumen and not the catechist, should ask.

This is the arrangement in the catechism of Leo Judæus. But it is the catechist who inquires in order to ascertain how much the catechumen knows—a task which may consist simply in the mechanical conduct of a recitation, which certainly does not deserve the name of a Socratic method; or it may involve a process of interrogation which serves either to merely excite attention, to arouse independent thought, or, as being grounded in the conversational form, to logically advance the progress of the discussion. This last form is only available, however, when dealing with persons of somewhat mature years and an advanced stage of knowledge. In such a case the various forms of questioning, such as the problematical, assertory, demonstrative, categorical, hypothetical, and disjunctive, may all be employed; not, however, so as to admit of their being previously memorized, but in such a way as to develop them naturally through the active interchange of ideas. The exciting of such
The real art of the catechist. interchange in proper measure, together with the an-the catechist. mating of its progress, constitutes the principal art of the catechist. This, however, cannot be accomplished by the mere eliciting of answers. The catechist will need to assert his right to speak at the proper point, to impart after having for a time demanded. It is, therefore, as important to observe the proper key while narrating, expounding, and exhorting, as to impart the proper turn to questioning.

The task of catechetics, however, is by no means fully exhausted when directions relating to form have been supplied. It is, first of all, essential that the religious nature of youth be studied in so far as it is the object of catechetics, and this not merely with reference to its powers of apprehension, but in every direction in which it is displayed. At this point catechetics has general pedagogics for its basis, and this, accordingly, would be the proper point for discussing the relation of religious instruction as imparted by the school to that dispensed by the Church. Much has been said upon this point from the pedagogical point of view. But it is further essential that the subject-matter of the instruction, which is distinctively Christian in its yet dawned in any wise upon their understandings.”—Rosenkranz, p. 335. Marheineke, Prakt. Theologie, § 815. Zetzschwitz shows, however, that the abuse of the method of developing a subject by question and answer does not set it aside, but that its further development is a task of the art of catechetics, vol. i, p. 4; comp. p. 11 sqq., vol. iii, p. 23, sqq., and vol. iv entire.

character, be handled in accordance with clearly defined theological views, and also that the grading of the instruction, the object to be attained thereby, and the means to be employed, be clearly determined. The grading might be about as follows: 1. For the period of childhood, the exciting of religious feeling and reflection by means of repeating Scripture narratives and teaching simple texts, verses from hymns, and the like; 2. At the riper stage of youth for boys and girls the connected teaching of Bible history, accompanied with the teaching of the catechism. At this stage the didactic element will predominate; 3. At the stage of incipient manhood the instruction proper for all candidates for Church membership, their preparation for the sacrament, and their initiation into the deeper unity of the Bible, in both history and doctrine, as well as into the teaching of the Church. With the latter process may be connected a survey of Church history, introduction into the life of the Church as a community, and into the life of devotion generally. To what extent a stage of instruction beyond that for candidates for Church membership should be assumed is a question of practical importance, but upon the answer to which the catechetical function is no longer dependent, since, in the nature of the case, its task was ended at joining the Church. All that is subsequent to that act belongs to ecclesiastical didactics and to pedagogics in its broad acceptance; for instance, the religious instruction imparted in Bible classes, in Sunday-schools, Church lyceums, lectures, and similar ways. Here we see the value of catechisms, of sacred histories, of volumes of selected passages from the Bible, and many similar works. Every pastor should always have in mind the instruction, and use of proper methods thereto, apart from his pulpit ministrations.

But the true catechist has not fulfilled his task when, in his official capacity, he has conducted a session for the instruction of the children. He will bear in his heart the youth entrusted to his care (John xxi, 15: βόσκε τὰ ἀρνία μου). ^{Catechetics a part of pastoral work.} With this feature catechetics reaches over into the field of pastoral care. It is also customary, in many places on the Continent, to connect the instruction of children with the public worship, and in this respect catechetics comes into contact with the homiletical and liturgical functions—the arranging of an appropriate worship for children. But where no such custom prevails the hour given to religion must not become one of instruction simply,¹ but must at the same time be made an hour of edification, of training in the practice of godliness, and hence a branch of worship. The summit of the catechetical function, finally, consists in the reception into Church fellowship, the recognition of whose significance and relation to the whole belongs to liturgics.

¹“The catechetical function must not be confined to instruction, but must consist pre-eminently in developing a children's worship, the soul of which is prayer, and it

SECTION VII.

MENTAL AND SPIRITUAL ENDOWMENT.

The study of catechetics must not be confined to oral instruction merely, but must also involve appropriate practice, an opportunity for which should be afforded the student. Occupation with the general instruction of children will furnish a useful introduction to such practice; and the student who has enjoyed the benefit of thorough instruction in religion and of a thorough preparation for joining the Church, and who has preserved the blessed influence of such a course in his own heart, will, in a special sense, possess a great advantage over others. Diligent attention given to sound catechetical methods, and a general interest in the religious and intellectual life of the young, are also of advantage.

The opinion is strongly entertained by many that catechetical knowledge will spontaneously develop itself. But precisely that which seems easy, even to children, is the most difficult of all. Let Luther be remembered, who owned that he was obliged to give his entire life to the study of the catechism, and yet never could exhaust the study. By way of contrast let a young minister, dried up with speculative and critical knowledge, be imagined as the centre of a circle of animated and joyous children. Does conceit lead one to despise these little ones, and is there in him nothing of the feeling which attracted Christ toward those of whom he said, "of such is the kingdom of heaven"? In that case it were better to acknowledge one's bankruptcy than to sin against the sanctuary of childhood. But if the love exists, and only practice be lacking, the needed remedy may yet be found. It is the task of the Church to provide that remedy. The end in view is not to be attained by hiring a few children through offering rewards, or forcing them into the auditorium as horses are driven in a riding-school, for the purpose of experimenting with them.

must involve a disciplinary element."—Pelt, Encykl., p. 676. "The children's worship must go hand in hand with catechetical instruction and with the several departments of catechetics. It must preserve, nourish, make, and keep alive what these have planted."—Hirscher, p. 568; Vinet, Past. Theol., pp. 229-235; Palmer, p. 536, sqq.; Kraussold, p. 179, sq.; Zezschwitz iii, p. 615. In the language of the early Protestants of Germany, recitations from the catechism were explicitly termed "praying," a usage still in vogue in some sections of Switzerland.

The pastor should seek out the children in their sphere as he would look for plants in their natural soil. All young pastors, even those who are not constrained thereto by motives of economy, should endeavour to secure opportunity for the teaching of children. Even the scientific instruction of the young forms a valuable preparation for religious teaching, and the teaching of language and history especially will afford those gymnastic advantages which were elsewhere looked for from the Socratic method. The ability to tell a story or relate an incident well is a special art to be acquired only by practice. But the religious disposition and continued participation in the religious life are, here as elsewhere, a prime necessity. Every opportunity afforded the theological candidate to teach a Bible class, or conduct a Sunday-school, should be thankfully embraced all through his theological studies. To observe a thorough catechist while surrounded by the children, and with him to enter into the thought and feeling of the children, will quicken the mind and impart courage. Hirscher beautifully says: "Fortunate art thou if nature has provided thee with rich endowments; but, however this may be, let there be no lack of effort to secure what may depend upon thyself. A real enthusiasm will richly supply what nature might have bestowed in but inferior measure."¹

SECTION VIII.

HISTORY OF CATECHETICS.

Comp. Langemack (died 1740), Historia Catechetica (Stralsund, parts 1-3, 1739-40); Köcher, Katechetische Geschichte der päpstlichen Kirche, Jena, 1738; Schuler, Gesch. d. katechet. Rel.-unterrichts unter d. Protestanten von der Reformation bis 1762 (1766), Halle, 1802; Gilbert, Christ. Catechet. hist., P. I., tres priores setates complectens, Lips., 1835; Dithmar, Beitr. zur Gesch. d. katechet. Unterrichts, Marburg, 1848; Ehrenfeuchter, Gesch. d. Katechismus mit bes. Berücksichtigung d. Hannover. Landeskirche, Gött., 1857; Mayer, Gesch. des Katechumenats u. d. Katechese in d. ersten sechs Jahrhunderten, prize essay, Kempten, 1868; Weiss, Altkirchl. Pädagogik dargestellt in Katechumenat u. Katechese der ersten sechs Jahrhunderte, prize essay, Freiburg, 1869; Vinet, Pastoral Theology (Skinner's Translation, 2d. ed.), New York, 1861; Kidder, The Christian Pastorate, Cincinnati, 1871; Elliott, Hermeneutical and Pastoral Lectures, New York, 1880; Phelps, Men and Books, New York, 1882.

The catechumens of the ancient Church were not children; but childhood is already designated in the New Testament (Mark x, 13-19; Eph. vi, 4; 2 Tim. iii, 15) as called to participate in the kingdom of God. With regard to the relation held by catechumens, and the different classes to which they belonged (ἀκροώμενοι, γονυκλίνοντες, κατηχούμενοι, φωτιζόμενοι), consult the best works on ecclesiastical history. Zezschwitz says:² "Ecclesiastical antiquity has no knowledge of a τέχνη κατηχητική, or catechetical art. The latter appears in that character at a time when the governing idea is no longer the catechumenate, but the function of teaching." The Apostles' Creed furnished the subject matter of instruction at an early period. But distinctively catechetical discourses were also in vogue, together with addresses delivered on the occasion of reception into membership. This we see in Cyril of Jerusalem, and in the Catechetical Discourse of Gregory of Nyssa. A guide for the instruction of adult catechumens was given by Augustine in the treatise on Catechetical Questions, addressed to the deacon Deogratias, at Carthage.

¹ Page 724.

² Page 15.

The situation was changed when the baptism of children had become more general, and Christianity had been made the religion of the state. Then catechetics became, in consequence, more largely what it is in our day—a teaching of the young. Charlemagne rendered valuable service by providing for such teaching. The Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer were taught in addition to the Creed. These were termed Leading Articles, which extended also to the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. The monks Otfrid, of the Weissenburg monastery in Alsace, and Kero of Notker Labeo, of St. Gall, wrote the first catechisms. A clear view of the position of catechetics in the fifteenth century is given in the Picture Catechism, published by Geffcken, in Leipzig, in 1855. The Waldensian Catechism represented an evangelical tendency. The Wicliffites and Hussites (Bohemian Brethren) were also interested in the religious education of the young, which had been so terribly neglected by the Church in the lifeless and mechanical state in which it had become immersed.¹ Among Roman Catholics, upon the Reformation, the Chancellor Charlier Gerson constituted a notable exception, assuming the position of catechist in his own person, and also furnishing the priests with a guide for catechization, though in very general outlines merely, in his treatise on Drawing the Poor to Christ.

The first agency to perform thorough work, however, was the Luther's two Reformation. Luther, while engaged in the visitation catechisms. of the churches, in 1528, became convinced of the need for providing the people with a "good, simple, unvarnished catechism," a "lay Bible which should embrace the entire contents of Christian doctrine." This called forth his two catechisms, the smaller being intended for children and the larger for teachers.²

¹ Comp. Herzog's Waldenser, 4, supplement, p. 458; and Zetzschwits, Katechismen d. Waldenser u. Böhmischen Brüder, Erlangen, 1863.

² Different editions by Stier, Parisius, Purgold, etc. See Winer, Handbuch d. Literatur, complementary vol., p. 199.

They constituted the basis of religious instruction during a long period, and engaged the attention of numerous commentators. Luther is still a model as respects the true catechetical style in point of hearty and naïve mode of expression.¹ The Reformed Church, too, did not remain behindhand. Œcolampadius, in his Report on Children,² and Leo Judæus,³ and Calvin,⁴ led the way. The Heidelberg Catechism, composed by Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus, became as famous as the Heidelberg Catechism. catechisms of Luther, having been translated into nearly every language, and been made a symbolical book of the Reformed Church.⁵

The older catechists did but little theorizing, the amount contributed in this direction being limited, upon the whole, to noteworthy hints in individual works. But a special emphasis was placed upon the matter in the state churches by the ordering of sermons on the catechism by the authorities of the Church.⁶ But there was no absolute lack of theoretical instruction. The catechism of David Chyträus, at Rostock (1554–1604), assumed the form of popular dogmatics, but secured a wide acceptance by reason of its clear arrangement and precision.⁷ We may mention the following additional works: Hyperius, on Catechetics (1570, republished by A. Schmidt, Helmstedt, 1704); Alsted, Catechetical Theology (Hanov., 1622); Dietrich (died 1669), Catechetical Institution (1613); Maukisch, the commentator of Dietrich (1653); Kortholt, Encouragement for Catechetical Instruction (1669), and Trotzendorf. These authors are the most widely known theorists between the time of Luther and that of Spener. Leading authors between Luther and Spener.

¹ "The catechism of Luther," says Herder, "must be fervently committed to memory and retained forever." Comp. Harnack, Der kleine Katechismus Luthers in seiner Urgestalt, Stuttg., 1856. Comp. Vilmar (Pastoraltheol., p. 104) with reference to its advantages over the Heidelberg from a pedagogical point of view. Zeitzschwitz (Katechetik, ii, p. 265, sqq.) furnishes a "historico-critical estimate" of the material of catechetics.

² Reprinted in the Leben u. ausgewählte Schriften d. reform. Kirche, vol. ii, pp. 296 ff.

³ Newly published by Grob, Winterthür, 1836.

⁴ Henry, ii, pp. 160, sqq.

⁵ Originally issued in 1563. An edition in the form of the original edition, published by Wolters, 1864. Bethune, Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism, N. Y., 1868. See a judicious estimate of this work, as contrasted with the depreciatory treatment accorded to it in the days of rationalism, in G. Müller, Theophil., Zurich, 1801, p. 318. Comp. also the more recent works of Zyro, Sudhoff, Güder, Bender, Krummacher, and others.

⁶ Comp. Rudelbach, Ämtliches Gutachten üb. d. Wiedereinführung der Katechismus-examina, etc., Dresden, 1841.

⁷ Krabbe, Chyträus, pp. 45, 46.

The last-named theologian, Trotzendorf, gave a new impulse in this field by the publication of his Catechetical Tables (1683), and also by his Thoughts on Catechetical Information, published by a friend in Halle, in 1815.¹ The principal query with Spener was, "How shall we connect the head with the heart?" Seidel, of Berlin (1717), and others, followed in his track. Oetinger, too, is important in this connexion because of his Historical and Moral Storehouse of Catechetical Directions, which appeared in 1762.²

In the orthodox school, Fecht, of Rostock (died 1716), delivered lectures on catechetics, and combined catechetical practice therewith. Additional guides to catechization were furnished by Rambach in his Well-Instructed Catechist, which appeared in 1722; by Buddæus (died 1729), in his Catechetical Theology, which appeared in two volumes in Jena, in 1752, and by others. In the Reformed Church, Osterwald (died 1747) endeavoured to bring into vogue, through the medium of his widely circulated Catechism (Amsterdam, 1707), a more independent treatment, which should accord with the needs of the time. But his effort resulted in his substituting the subjectively abstract element of natural religion and morality for the earlier concrete and objective modes of expression sanctioned by the usage of the Church. The rationalistic revulsion in education, caused in the latter half of the eighteenth century by Basedow, Salzmann, and other philanthropical schoolmen, reacted also upon catechetical instruction.³ The aim was to counteract, by the process of a free development of the faculties of the soul, a merely mechanical method and a dead orthodoxy.

But the result was a lapse into the opposite extreme. The positive subject matter was frequently lost in the process of shallow argumentation, and in this way a false Socratism came into being, which could be confined within appropriate limits only after long-continued struggles. The so-called "philanthropic" method found "Philanthropic" adherents, though with modifications, in Miller, in his method.

Directions in the Art of Catechising (1778, 1782, 1788); in Rosenmüller, Directions in Catechising (1763, 1793), and others. Schmid treated catechetics in an entirely formal way, as we see in his Catechetical Handbook (Jena, 1791, 1792-99, 1801, 3 vols.). Graeffe, finally, carried the rationalistic formalism of questions to its highest point. He may, therefore, be considered the representative of the older rationalistic catechetics, based on Kantian principles in religion and morals, while Dinter, on the other hand, succeeded in overcoming formalistic narrowness and dryness by a more vivid and original apprehension of the matter of religious teaching. Still, in his dogmatic opinions, he did not forsake the rationalistic point of view.

¹ Comp. Thilo, Spener als Katechet., Berlin, 1840.

² Comp. the Süd-deutscher Schulbote, 1855, 1-4.

³ Comp. Salzmann, Die wirksamste Mittel Kindern Religion beizubringen, 3d ed., Leips., 1809. In his Konrad Kiefer he raves against the catechism, and allows little Konrad "to pluck pigeons" instead of handing him the book!

The religious element, and, more particularly, the peculiarly Christian features of that element, was regarded by Daub and Schwarz as being the essential thing, a view that was in the strongest contrast with the former method. A more profound apprehension of the whole subject, however, has been attained through the influence of the Schleiermacher school—as we see in Services of Rutenik and Schweizer—though the process was not Schleiermacher. unaccompanied by the danger of making the dialectical element prominent at the expense of the emotional.

The Jesuits and related orders acquired entire control of the education of youth in the Roman Catholic Church, the Larger (1554) and Smaller (1566) Catechisms of the Jesuit, Peter Canisius (died 1595), being highly esteemed, in addition to the Roman Catechism, which received the sanction of the Council of Trent, in 1566. The theory of catechetics, likewise, was not neglected by the Jesuits.¹ But even Roman Catholic catechetics did not escape the influence of the age in later times.² Here, too, an animated and Christian mode of treatment obtained the victory over every sort of lifeless formalism.

LITERATURE OF CATECHETICS.

- Rutenik, Uebersicht der catechetischen Literatur, in Theol. Stud. u. krit., 1831, p. 188 ff. Tholuck, Literarischer Anzeiger, 1830, No. 18.
 J. F. C. Gräffe, Vollst. Lehrbuch der allgem. Katechetik. Gött., 1795–98. 3 vols.
 — Grundriss der allgem. Katechetik, nach kantischen Grundsätzen. Gött., 1796.
 G. F. Dinter, Regeln der Katechetik. Neustadt a. d. O., 1801.
 C. Daub, Lehrbuch der Katechetik. Frankf. a. M., 1801.
 F. H. Ch. Schwarz, Katechetik oder Anleitung zu Unterredungen mit der Jugend an Christenthume. Gies., 1818.
 G. Thierbach, Handbuch der Katechetik. Frankenhausen, 1822, 1823. 2 vols.
 — Die Katechisir Kunst. Nordhausen, 1826–31. 5 vols.
 — Lehrbuch der Katechetik. Hannov., 1830.
 W. Stern, Erfahrungen, Grundsätze und Grundzüge für bibl.-christl. Religionsunterricht. Karlsru., 1838.
 † J. B. Hirscher, Katechetik oder der Beruf des Seelsorgers. Tüb., 1841.
 Lor. Kraussold, Katechetik. Erl., 1848.

¹ Comp. Possévin's (died 1611) Letter on the Necessity, Utility, and Reason for Teaching the Catholic Catechism (ed. W. Eder, Ingolstadt, 1585).

² See M. Vierthaler, Geist der Socratik, Salzburg, 1796.

- * Ch. Palmer, Evang. Katechetik. Stuttg., 1844.
 A. Keller, Anleitung zum katechet. Unterrichte. Aarau, 1851. 2 vols.
 C. N. Kühler, Katechetische Baukunst. Kiel, 1851.
 J. G. Hanschmann, Christl. Katechetik. Lpz., 1852.
 G. G. K. L. Plato, Lehrbuch der Katechetik. Lpz., 1853.
 H. Puchta, Handbuch der praktischen Katechese. Stuttg., 1854.
 * C. A. G. v. Zezschwitz, System der christlich-kirchlichen Katechetik. Lpz., 1863.
 G. A. F. Edelin, Leitfaden zur Ertheilung des Confirmandenunterrichts und zur Wiederholung dieses Unterrichts mit Erwachsenen. Basel, 1872.
 K. A. Rütenik, Der christl. Glaube, nach dem luther. Katechismus in katechet. Vorträgen zusammenhängend dargestellt. Berl., 1829.
 Al. Schweizer, Leitfaden zum Unterricht in der christl. Glaubenslehre für reifere Katechumenen. Zürich, 1840.
 See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Literatur, vol. ii, p. 213, sqq.; McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, articles Catechetics, Catechism, and Catechumena, vol. ii, pp. 148-154.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN CATECHETICS. •

There have been many English works on the Catechism of the Church of England. Among these we may mention:

- Barry, Notes on the Catechism. 2d ed. Lond., 1868.
 Williams, A Brief Exposition of the Church Catechism, with Proofs from Scripture. A new ed. Lond., 1841.

The individual Churches have each produced their catechism, which, in many cases, have undergone important modifications. For the names of these, and works written on them, we refer to the denominational literature of each of the great communions. See Hurst, Bibliotheca Theologica, pp. 284, 267, 328. New York, 1883.

SECTION IX.

THE THEORY OF WORSHIP—LITURGICS.

To comprehend the nature of Christian worship as a whole, and the field of the various elements by which it is modified in particular, is the scientific task of liturgics. Upon the manner in which it is performed will depend, in great measure, both the general organization of the public Christian worship and the administration of its several details. The former is included in the department of Church government, the latter in that of Church ministrations.

It is the task of the philosophy of religion and of ethics to point out the necessity of public worship. It is, first of all, important to arrive at the understanding of such worship as being a necessity of the common life of Christianity instead of a mere court-ceremonial; or, at most, a moral stimulus for the masses. The nature of worship, which Hegel terms "the highest deed of the human spirit,"¹ must be deduced from the nature of religion and of Christianity. It is, therefore, the first duty of liturgics to apprehend the idea of public worship as an ethically justified and obligatory act on the part of the congregation. The constituent elements of the worship are afterward to be recognised in harmony with their liturgical importance and their relation to each other, as they stand upon the basis of that fundamental principle. This is also the point at which the relation of worship to art, in the strict sense, is to be determined. The Church is not simply an educational institution, as those seem to suppose who centre the entire worship in the sermon, and regard everything else, such as singing, prayer, the sacraments, and the benediction, as mere additions.

¹ In harmony with that view, and carrying the idea further into its details, Rothe calls worship an action, and more particularly an action to be performed in common—an internal, ethical, spiritual action, the highest which the Christian may perform.

Bähr says: "In no other religion does the religious community appear to be so necessary and essential as in Christianity. The idea of a church, whether local or embracing the whole of the Church, is eminently peculiar to Christianity, and attains to the full dignity of truth in it alone. Christianity assumed the form of an independent religion for the first time when it appeared in and with the form of a community, and it lives and continues on from age to age only in that form. . . . The Church, united by the ties of a common Lord and a common faith, not only sustains a doctrinal relation to Christ, but also a vital connexion like that of the body to the head. But it appears as such, as a whole, only in the public worship."¹ Also Palmer, in his treatise on Practical Theology, says: "In the celebration the Church presents herself in bridal array; at such times we should, before all else, be filled with joy and exultation, excited by the reflection that it is a glorious privilege to belong to the Church, to be identified with and live in it."² Schenkel's idea, shared, however, by many others, that public worship is merely a means for the exciting of piety, and that it has no end in itself, grows out of his warped view of religion generally.

Worship must be conceived as the common act of the congregation in which the religious life of its members finds expression under the form of devotion. Such expression takes shape partly in the word and partly in the symbol.³

¹ Page 351.

² Comp. supra, § 12. We concede fully that a mere participating in the worship is not necessarily religious, and that facility in the use of forms of worship cannot be a substitute for universal piety (p. 171); but this is pronouncing judgment upon mock-worship merely, which stands related to the true and sacred worship of God as artificiality does to art, or hypocrisy to religion. Here, too, the rule applies: abusus non tollit usum.—Dogmatik, p. 172.

³ Ehrenfeuchter's conception (§ 33) of Christianity, as the end of all symbols, can hold good only in so far as the symbol is regarded as being veiled and obscure;

The nature of the religious, or, more exactly, the Christian, symbol, as distinguished from the legal types of Judaism and heathen nature-symbols, and the relation of the symbol to the Word, can only be understood from the peculiar nature of the religious or Christian life. Ehrenfeuchter says: "It would be as silly to apologize for religion because it has a system of worship as to excuse the soul for having a body. Some desire to attribute the worship to the sensuousness of man alone. . . . But on this method no one would suspect the eternal law of life, by which everything that is real is also possessed of the power to express itself in figurative form, and to manifest itself in the fulness of life and energy."¹ The place of the sermon in the worship is likewise determined by liturgics, so that homiletics itself is, in a broad sense, a part of liturgics.² In a different point of view the sermon, nevertheless, extends beyond purely liturgical limits, and unfolds in its independent movement a conformity to law which is no longer included in the domain of liturgics. All worship is based upon action and reaction, upon mutual incitement according to settled laws, which modify its organism, and upon which its earnestness, dignity, solemnity, practical fruitfulness, and power to edify, depend.

This, accordingly, is the place for discussing the contrast between the formally restricted and the free, the established and the movable, the devotional and the festal, what has been historically transmitted, and what is demanded by the present time.

A sound theory of worship will maintain a true medium between that settled uniformity of a lifeless mechanism which moves in the world of empty ceremonies, and a frivolity which is possessed of a mania for novelty and adherence to the fashion of the times, and which elevates its unsettled and superficial notions to the place of what has been tested and shown to be of worth.³ It also distinguishes between a superabundance mystification has an end. But Christianity has, on the contrary, developed a noble, free, consciously-spiritual symbolism, upon which the worship is necessarily based, and which Ehrenfeuchter himself has profoundly and fervently apprehended under the idea of an "ideal art." Pp. 253, 275, and elsewhere.

Province of a sound theory of worship.

¹ Page 51.

² This is also the view of Palmer, p. 352. Comp. Hagenbach, Liturgik u. Homiletik.

³ Even a better and really religious subjectivity has its limits. Ehrenfeuchter, ubi supra, p. 76, observes with justice that "when the attempt is made to enforce the universal acceptance of an individual poetic view, which may possibly be profoundly true for the individual, and afford him wondrous comfort, the only result will be a hardening of the poetic element and a petrification of the religious. For the poetic feeling of an individual is transitory, and even has its highest charm in the fact of its

of what may be perceived by the senses, and that rationalistic soberness which dreads all that is imaginative.¹ It will know how to discover those elements of art which are most nearly related to the religious life, and be obliged to carefully distinguish between the sacred and the profane, the necessary and the accidental, that which has been made from that which has developed. Fluctuating and unsettled states, in this regard, will increase in proportion as our stay upon the soil of practice without principles, on the one hand, and of impractical theories on the other, is protracted.

A general interest in the liturgical regulation of our Church affairs has, however, been aroused, and the theory of worship has been reconstructed from its foundations. It is only to be regretted that bridges leading over from the region of speculation to that of practice are so few, the result being that the learner, whose immediate object is to qualify himself for the service of the Church, is, with all the abundance of theory at command, left in ignorance with respect to the course he should adopt. The simple restoration of what is old, toward which the tendencies of the present age are directed from certain quarters, will by no means furnish a solution of the problem. What is needed is a living worship, which shall address both the intellect and the feelings. Upon ^{Need of a living worship.} this consummation science needs to fix its eye, pursuing its course evanescent character, in the isolation of each separate moment which blooms forth with enlivening influence from the prosaic conditions of the actual world. . . . Such play of the imagination and the feelings gives rise to the arbitrary character of particular services (ἰδιωτικαὶ λειτουργικαὶ).” “A misunderstanding of the significant difference which exists between public and family worship works serious injury at this point.”—Ibid., p. 79.

¹“This is the pietistic view, which attaches no importance whatever to the outward features of the worship, and perhaps regards it as being in contradiction with itself, or with the idea upon which it rests. With this coincides the rationalistic view, in that it separates the interests of freedom from those of necessity, and maintains that the Christian religion is only designed for the needs of individuals, and requires that each one should be pious for himself; that no value is to be attached to outward union for the purposes of a common worship, because this will constitute a limitation of individual liberty.”—Marheineke, Prakt. Theologie, § 75. Comp. Ehrenfeuchter, Liturgie, § 38. On the relation of Protestantism to art, comp. Meyer, Das Verhältniss der Kunst zum Cultus, Zurich, 1837; Grueneisen, De Protestantismo artibus haud infesto, Stuttg., 1839, 4to; Protestantismus u. Kunst, in Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift, 1839, 4, No. 8, pp. 287–322; Der Protestant. Gottesdienst u. d. Kunst in ihrem gegenzeitigen Verhältnisse, St. Gall, 1840; Lange, In welchem Verhältnisse steht die Reformirte Kirche nach ihrer Lehre u. nach ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung zur Kunst? An essay in the Verhandlungen d. Schweiz. Prediger-gesellschaft, St. Gall, 1844; Schnaase, Verhältnisse d. Kunst zum Christenthum u. besonders der evangel. Kirche, Berl., 1852; Koopmann, Der evangel. Cultus u. d. Kunst, Darmst., 1854, and Kottmeier, Darstellung des Heiligen durch d. Kunst, etc., Bremen, 1857.

until the time shall arrive when the understanding, having been matured by thorough study, shall yield its fruitage as well in the practical life as in other domains.

SECTION X.

CONTRAST BETWEEN PROTESTANT AND ROMAN CATHOLIC LITURGICS.

In the Protestant minister's circle of studies that part of liturgics which relates to ministrations in the Church, or to direct administration, will require less space proportionately than that which has to do with the government of the Church, and consequently with the devising of methods. The contrary to this is the rule in the Roman Catholic Church.

The word liturgics points primarily to the already existing service for the Church, the Liturgy.¹ The more complicated such service is, the more time will be needed for acquiring the mechanical readiness which is necessary to its performance. It is apparent that theology will be in a very low state where the whole of the theological course is expended upon a mechanical training of this sort for the clerical office. Regions still exist within the Roman Catholic Church where nothing more than such a mechanism is required. But Roman Catholic theology is not at its best in such localities. Wherever it bears the character of a science, it seeks, rather, to penetrate by the way of speculation into the inner sanctuary of worship, and to justify its meaning and importance to the thinking mind.² But there is no

Mechanical liturgy in Roman Catholicism.

¹ Comp. the lexicons on λειτουργός, λειτουργεῖν, λειτουργία (Luke i, 23; Heb. viii, 2; ix, 21; x, 11), formed out of λῆτρος (λήτρος, from λαός, λαός), the equivalent of δημόσιος, and ἔργον (munus publicum); hence ἔργον τοῦ λαοῦ = τοῦ λαοῦ is equivalent to λεῖπον ἔργον. See also the Apol. Conf. Aug., p. 270 (ed. Hase), where the ancient use of the word is well expounded. On the ecclesiastical and Levitical meaning of the word in the New Testament, comp. Bleek on the respective passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The derivation from λῆτή (λῆταί, process, whence is derived the word litany) is erroneous. The Latin word cultus (Gr. λατρεία) answers to the German words "Gottesdienst" (divine service) and "Gottesverehrung" (worship of God), which have been frequently objected to, especially the former, though unjustly. See Pelt, p. 100. Marheineke, Prakt. Theologie, § 63, says, that "he only who has been made free by God, and been born again into the liberty of the children of God, can resolve to enter upon the service of God, in which alone man can be truly free."

² "In our days," observes a Roman Catholic writer, "praise will be given by all rational persons to him who has sufficiently sharpened his intellectual vision to enable him to find again in the worship of the Church the royal robe with which the incarnated Son of God was enveloped, and to interpret all its forms in the spirit to which its origin is due."—Most, Die liberalen Principien auf dem Gebiete des Cultus, in Tüb. theol. Quartalschrift, 1847, No. 1.

breaking through the bounds of what has been traditionally received and what already exists, and Roman Catholic liturgics is, therefore, compelled to struggle always with the same task in reference to worship, which oppresses the scholastic theology of Roman Catholicism with reference to dogma, namely, to secure an after understanding of matters which already exist. "The theory has more the character of a statute than of an internal and necessary law."¹

This is not the case with Protestant liturgics. This is continually employed upon the task of constructing a system of worship which shall perfectly correspond to the Protestant principle, and to the needs of each particular time. It does not become contemplation merely with reference to the already finished edifice of the temple, but is essentially constructive, and we always find it engaged with line and compass in the study of the plan. It does not aim to secure a definite conclusion of its labours for all subsequent time, but to carry forward the development, within certain limits to be by itself appointed, of what is capable of being developed. There can, accordingly, be no idea of a mechanism in the performance of liturgical services, and the specifically technical features connected therewith can only consist in the personal appropriation of things that are prescribed, and in a personal entering into the spirit of the worship. The liturgical capability of the Protestant clergyman will, therefore, be manifested by a spiritual reproduction of what is prescribed by the Church, and is to be attained less in the way of practice than in that of inward consummation. For, it is certain that even the simplest of liturgical services, such as the offering of prayer in the presence of the congregation, the administering the sacraments, and the pronouncing the benediction, are more appropriately and fervently performed by him who has penetrated the mystery of religious feelings and their public representation, than by him who, having no sympathetic feeling, simply performs a duty which is officially assigned to him. Every opus operatum is a negation of the Protestant principle, the death of liberty, and a turning away from the internal to the external.

This leads to a further distinction between Roman Catholic and Protestant liturgists, namely, that the Protestant clergyman, in his liturgical functions, sustains a different relation toward the congregation from that sustained by the Roman Catholic. While the latter ministers in sacred things by virtue of his priestly character, even where no

¹ Ehrenfeuchter, ubi supra, p. 68; compare § 16, and Marheineke, Prakt. Theologie, § 198.

Protestant liturgics.

Necessity of religious feeling.

Difference between Roman Catholic and Protestant liturgists.

congregation is present, or, when it is present, still only before it, and never in and with the congregation,¹ the Protestant liturgist represents in person the priesthood of the whole congregation. He expresses in Church prayers only what all mentally repeat, and, if he sing, his voice is lost in the volume of praise by the whole congregation. The sacraments, even, are administered by him as the officer designated by the congregation, and set apart by the Church. He shares with the Roman Catholic liturgist, indeed, in being bound by the rule established by the Church, but not in the same degree, nor in the same manner. Many consider it, no doubt, a prerogative of Protestantism to afford absolute license, and such license has occasionally been carried to a high pitch, certainly not to the advantage of real Protestantism.²

To assume that the preacher offers prayer simply as a preacher, since "the prayer must be his own work as much as the sermon," is erroneous. A clear distinction must be made, at this point, between the homiletical and the liturgical elements.³ No restraint is imposed upon him with respect to the former by homiletical rules, and he is certainly expected to come before the congregation with prayer as well as speech. The more the congregation recognises in the preacher's personal piety the acme of the religious life of the community,⁴ the less will he refuse to perform a service which he must consider, in this precise form of service (λειτουργία), as being the necessary complement to the more independent sermon. The sermon is an inadequate and incomplete feature when not sustained by the whole economy of the worship.

Liturgics in relation to ethics and ecclesiastical law.

Liturgics touches upon the fields of ethics and ecclesiastical law. Here, too, arise the ethical questions concerning the extent to which the liturgist is required to represent the ritual in his own person, and whether he is simply to

¹ Ehrenfeuchter, p. 223.

² "The further development with which such a formal Protestantism violently breaks in upon, and interrupts, the course of liturgical tradition, is a progress into vacancy, and the setting to rights and clearing up are a transferring into the hands of the individual of what is designed for the Church as a whole."—Marheineke, Prakt. Theologie, § 227. Remarks on the license assumed by Protestant clergymen to the injury of the liturgical rights of the congregation occur in Bähr, ubi supra.

³ Comp. Al. Schweizer, Wiefern liturgische Gebete bindend sein sollen? Zurich, 1836, p. 22, sq., and the discussions of this subject by H. Lang, Bitzian, and Rüfli in the Swiss Reform, 1878, Nos. 10, 12, and 15.

⁴ "The bond of union which embraces the entire body must also appear in the single individual, and the organism of the whole show forth in the particular member"—Ehrenfeuchter, ubi supra, p. 65; comp. p. 346.

make use of its forms of expression.¹ Upon this follows, in immediate sequence, the legal question respecting the authority in which the right to prescribe a ritual is vested, and the extent to which it is allowable for the individual administrator to depart from the established form. Pedantry in Church government may work as injuriously at this point as self-will and arbitrary measures may in connexion with the ministrations of the public worship. Such differences can only exist, however, where the life of the church is hampered in some direction, either because the liturgy has been imposed without the consent of the congregation, or the liturgist has intruded himself into his place. When the minister ceases to be the organ of his congregation and of the Church he is no longer in his proper place. But where he possesses the confidence of the congregation it will not be difficult for him to decide how far he may go in any given case. The being governed by forms, laid down by the legislative authority of his Church, will not be regarded as a burdensome constraint, but as a duty imposed on him by his own convictions as a servant of the spirit rather than the letter. He will thus be enabled to move with freedom and dignity even when guided by such authority.

After all that has been said, however, the question may yet be raised whether Protestantism can recognise a science of liturgics at all? and whether we are not to be guided Protestant recognition of liturgics. in such matters, also, simply by the Holy Scriptures?

The latter must certainly be the authoritative standard here as everywhere. Principles such as are contained in John iv, 24, and Matt. vi, 7, will ever continue to be governing principles, and the Lord's Prayer will remain a model for all other prayers. But this does not imply that the liturgical forms of the apostolic age, which are not even well understood by our age, should be retained as an inalienable heirloom for all subsequent time. A literal retention of this kind would even destroy the higher conception of worship. The idea of the Lord's Supper would be entirely lost if, for example, it were maintained that exactly twelve should be seated at one table whenever it is administered. What could be more erroneous than the assumption that, since the early Christians did not yet possess the New Testament Scriptures, it is requisite that only Old Testament Scriptures be made the subject of preaching and Old Testament psalms be sung? On this view it would be wrong to celebrate Christian festivals, and we should be obliged to observe the ancient Sabbath with the Jews and the Sabbatarian sects. It is, therefore, with entire propriety that Ehrenfeuchter observes,¹ that it certainly is the aim of Protestantism to restore primitive Christianity, not, however, in the sense of actualizing its beginnings, but rather its principles. Hence "the sphere of worship includes more than that of the Holy Scriptures."² Hence, also, Protestant liturgics is presented with the great and far-reaching task of "ascertaining and representing the eternal forms of worship."³

¹ The above follows a distinction made by Schleiermacher, and has been opposed by v. Cölln and Schulz (Leips., 1881). Comp. Schleiermacher in Stud. u. Krit., 1821, No. 1, and the replies of the above, Leips., 1881.

SECTION XI

FORMS OF WORSHIP AND THEIR RELATION TO ART.

The essential elements of Protestant worship are the sermon, ^{Elements of} which is based upon the word of God, the united prayer ^{worship.} and singing of the congregation, and the benediction, which concludes the service. The highest point of Protestant worship is attained in the periodical celebration of the Lord's Supper, whose leading characteristic is that of a feast. The distribution of the various liturgical observances, the relation they are to sustain toward each other, and the more or less festal character they are to bear, will be determined by the ecclesiastical year, the periodically recurring festal seasons which it includes, and the wisdom and care of the pastor. All forms of art which have no immediate relation to the living Word are referred to the background at this point, and are designed at most to promote an auxiliary object, not directly aiming at an increase of devotion.

It must be conceded that not all Protestant liturgists are agreed upon the above statements. Many have maintained ^{The eucharistic element.} that the eucharistical feature especially should not be wanting in any form of divine service, and that all else should, as in the Roman Catholic Church, tend to give prominence to it as the principal end in view, even the sermon being made to occupy a secondary position in this regard.¹ It cannot be denied that the Lord's Supper constitutes the summit and crown of the common worship. But it is to be questioned whether its too frequent repetition would not lead to a loss of real solemnity and fervour of disposition, and to its being degraded into an opus operatum. This assertion of the eucharistical feature with which the demand for a purely liturgical service, without the sermon, is connected, has its excuse in the one-sided view which led Protestantism, particularly of the Reformed type, to lay stress for a time upon the sermon as being the only element of worship which is absolutely essential. That the sermon should constitute the central feature of the service, even though but in a formal way, is entirely proper, and in harmony with the position everywhere assigned to the word of God in the organism of Protestant worship. But it should be remembered that the word of God does not secure a proper recognition through the sermon only, and that the latter is not in any sense its only exponent.² The original representative of the word of God is the Bible itself. For this reason the reading of a section from the Scriptures is included among the elements of public worship.³ But it is necessary that the congregation be afforded opportunity for self-edification, upon the basis of God's word, for giving expression to the Plan of the sermon in worship.

¹ Page 72.

² Ibid., p. 166: "The sphere of worship is always extended over an existence of actual joy in God, over a present filled with the consciousness of God, while the sacred writings always, by their form, refer back to what is past."

³ Ibid., p. 75: The ancient Church in general deserves, next to the apostolic age, to be consulted, together with its forms of worship, whenever a reconstruction of the worship is in question, but it is not necessary that their example be anxiously imitated. It should be discriminately used with reference to the needs and conditions of the present time. Comp. Simon, Die apostol. Gemeinde-u. Kirchenverfassung, Poted., 1851; Abeken, Der Gottesdienst der alten Kirche, Berl., 1853; Harnack, Der christl. Gemeindegottesdienst im apostol. Zeitalter, Dorpat, 1853.

¹ E. g., by Kliefoth, Die ursprüngliche Gottesdienstordnung, Rostock, 1847, 2d ed., 2 parts, 1858-59, and since then by many others.

² Bähr, ubi supra, has directed attention upon this point with emphasis, and often with keen irony; but he goes too far in the direction of undervaluing the sermon. Ehrenfeuchter (§ 87) assigns to the latter its true position among the different elements of the worship by conceiving of it as their formal centre. Comp. also Vinet: It is being recognised with increasing clearness in the Reformed Church that the attention is not to be fixed alone upon the hearing of a sermon in connexion with the public worship, but that the direct participation of the congregation is absolutely requisite. Comp. Coquerel (file): What is adoration and worship but an art by which he who adores puts himself in true and actual relation with Him whom he adores? . . . Nothing which is passive alone constitutes the highest worship. The being present and listening is not an act, and consequently not worship. Le Culte tel que Dieu le demande (Paris, 1853). This is a rationalistic view, and should be qualified.

³ These lessons are not simply needed for the purpose of acquainting the people with the Scriptures, although this was formerly the case, when the Bible was not so generally circulated as at the present. But the united listening in the Church is very different from the private reading at home. Comp. Palmer, Homiletik, p. 370. R. Rothe wrote from Rome, "The mere listening to the reading of the Scriptures in the Christian congregation has always been a rich blessing and enjoyment, to me at least, although I have not unfrequently been deprived of them by their discussion pro and con." In Nippold, p. 860: In the Reformed Church it is usual, in some localities, to read the Decalogue, but it is better to make independent selections suited to each separate occasion. The ancient Church had its lectors.

impressions received, and to elevate itself into immediate communion with God.

Prayer and singing are exponents of the word of God equally with the sermon, in so far as they are based upon, and originate in, that word. Even the sermon can only be a word of God to the congregation when it is not only based upon the Bible, but is supported by the common devotion, and, so to speak, grows from it as its appropriate soil. It is necessary, therefore, that prayer and singing on the part of the congregation should both precede the sermon, for the purpose of exciting devotion and collecting the minds of the people, and follow it, to reproduce and fix the impressions received.¹ They form a species of antiphony to the sermon, while the benediction which follows constitutes the symbolical conclusion of the whole.*

It is for liturgics to decide what is the relation sustained by prayer and singing to each other and to the sermon, and in what order the several parts are to succeed and support each other. Probably a hymn of general character, not directly related to the sermon, will furnish the most appropriate introduction for divine service, to be followed by the prayer. The prayer should conclude with the Lord's Prayer. Its character involves that it should be introductory, and calculated to excite devotion, but at the same time adapted to call forth that contrite disposition whence springs a real desire for salvation. Then follow Scripture selections, and then singing, with special reference to the sermon, and afterward the sermon. The closing prayer may have direct bearing on the sermon, and be shaped by its thought. It is designed to fix the impression wrought by the sermon, but must lead over into the general worship again. At this point intercession is in place. The closing hymn and benediction form the end.

It is of advantage to the nature of devotion that the different services of the Church be not equal in the extent and fulness of their liturgical elements. The average medium is found in the Sunday services, which are more extended than the week-evening services. The more joyous a divine service is designed to be, the more largely may forms of art be drawn upon in its arrangement, though under the presumption that such forms will possess a strictly religious character. If we examine the available forms of art we shall find them to consist in discourse, music, and action.

¹ "The singing falls chiefly to the lot of the congregation, and the preaching is the service of the clergyman; while the functions of both are combined in the prayer, as in a common centre."—Marheineke, ubi supra, § 250.

* Rosenkranz, Encykl., p. 340.

A large field is open to music. Should it be employed only when connected with words, under the form of singing? Should it be congregational only? Ought it to be interspersed with solo and choir singing, or accompanied with instrumental music, and to what extent?¹ How far may instrumental music be allowed without the accompaniment of song? The limit lies here. As action may, as a rule, be regarded only as an auxiliary to speech, so instrumental music may be regarded only as an aid to the singing.

Religious architecture² also deserves a prominent place among the arts connected with Protestant worship, and beside that of discourse and that of song, not only for reasons of propriety, but also because of the religious and symbolical idea which the edifice is to embody and express.³ But a church edifice, even when the embodiment of an idea, together with the symbolical features introduced into the structure, is not to be regarded as involving any essential element, but merely as an aid to the exciting of devotion, and as exercising an influence to stimulate and support, rather than to direct and govern, the worship. The architectural symbol, therefore, stands upon the border line, upon the same footing as the music of the organ and the ringing of church bells. For it is possible to conceive of a truly elevating Protestant worship from which all of these are wanting, while such worship could find no expression at all in the absence of the sermon, singing, and prayer, and the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The essential feature, in which Protestant worship differs from Roman Catholicism, is simply its inward nature, freedom, and life—qualities which must not be allowed to give way before any degree of æsthetical refinement. However, it would be equally improper to renounce all natural connexion between worship and art, in so far as the latter enters modestly into the service of the Church.¹

¹ "It may be said of the Christian Church, that in the organ it has invented an instrument which combines within itself all the tones which existed singly in separate instruments before its discovery."—Rosenkranz, p. 337. Comp. Herder's poem, Die Orgel. Harms pronounced against the organ, as did also the ancient usage of the Reformed Church, which had no better name for it than the "pope's lyre" (!). Comp. Bähr, ubi supra, p. 112, sq.

² Vetter, ubi supra. "There is no grander cathedral than St. Peter's Church in Rome; but more beautiful than this, says the cherished Neander, is that Church which consists of two or three Christian souls assembled in the name of Christ."—Merle d'Aubigné in the Verhandlungen des sechsten evangel. Kirchentags zu Berlin (Berl., 1858), p. 48.

³ Comp. Ehrenfeuchter, p. 290, sqq. This field embraces also the external surroundings of the church edifice, particularly burial grounds and their monuments.

Lange says: "Worship is the festal representation of the ideal in the real; while art is the festal representation of the real life in the ideal;" or, "art represents the manifestation of the new world in symbolic form, while longing that it shall come into being; and worship represents the hidden character and the growth of the new world with a yearning that it may appear." Ehrenfeuchter shows ingeniously how man becomes in worship both the material and the manager of it: "The art of comprehending himself in the innermost relations of his life, and of entering into relations with God, is what we demand of every human being. This constitutes the profoundest and truest element of life." F. W. Krummacher beautifully remarks, in one of his sermons, that "art is entitled to a place in the Church. This admits of no doubt; but it is the product, and not the creator, of the new life. The promise is restricted altogether to the word, and the word is accompanied by the generating, while art has only the preserving and refreshing, spirit. Art, moreover, belongs rather to a Solomonic period of the Church than to a Davidic. In the latter it is necessary that the sword of the word should first perform its work. Not until the victory was achieved did the harp and psaltery ring out their notes."²

It follows from this, that worship through the Word still constitutes the heart of Protestant liturgics. To deal with the Word in preaching is the office of homiletics; and liturgics, accordingly, is Limitations of restricted: 1. To the word as connected with the singliturgica. ing (Church hymnology); 2. As emanating from the common feeling in the form of prayer (Church prayer); and 3. As it introduces and accompanies the performance of sacred actions, as in the benediction and the sacraments. The two latter form the ritual. Hence hymn books and the ritual constitute the liturgical apparatus which each Church government is required to provide for the use of the ministrations of the Church, and liturgics is required to furnish the fundamental principles by which the work of providing such apparatus is to be governed. With reference to hymn books, or the text of hymns, it is by no means a question how to provide the Church with hymns which should be modelled upon any particular liturgical theory. On the contrary, liturgics boldly and gladly makes use of the existing treasures of hymnology in the Church.¹ Hengstenberg says: "The poetry of Protestantism evidently finds its culmination in the Church hymn. In Hengstenberg on religious poetry. opposition to 'the widespread notion which still controls many weak natures, that the worship of Romanism is more poetic than that of Protestantism,' it is asserted, and with truth, that this would be a correct opinion 'if poetry consisted in all manner of mechanical forms and outward ornaments.' But poetry is spirit which speaks to spirit, and the unadorned singing of one of Luther's or Paul Gerhard's hymns with the heart of a living congregation is more poetical than all the allurements which attract the eye and ear in the splendid worship of Roman Catholicism."

¹ "Art," remarks a Swiss pastor (Ritter of Schwanden), "is that St. Christopher who seeks out a lord, serves him faithfully, and does not admit into his mind the thought of being lord himself; and yet so feels his own worth as to be resolved to remain with him only who is the strongest."

² Die Sabbathglocke, Berl., 1853, pp. 178, 179.

To sift our hymns, and discover the gold contained in them, is one of the highest arts of theology. Here, again, it is easy Old hymns not necessarily good. for a view that is based upon the taste of individuals to assert itself, whether it be the fanciful pedantry of affecting what has the flavour of antiquity or the rationalistic soberness which eliminates everything that breathes the aroma of poesy. Not everything that is old is also good. Even among the old there is much that is antiquated, either because it is involved in a dogmatical or ethical conception of the world which has passed away, or because it can no longer be comprehended and enjoyed.² The thing demanded is, accordingly, that hymns of a truly sterling character be sought out with accurate judgment, and that the heart of this class be discovered. But the claims of the new are also to receive due recognition beside the old, though the purity of tone and colour in the latter should be preserved. The Church hymns of the former days often become mongrel forms through an "improvement" which results to their damage, and through their being dressed up a la mode, by which means they assume a character which cannot be approved either by good taste or historical judgment. Changes are required in occasional instances, no doubt, but they should be executed with the utmost caution, and it is one of the principal problems

¹ The Reformed Church has long been content to use psalms only. Here, too, it would be a misapprehension of the idea of scriptural worship were the text of spiritual songs to be confined to psalms only. Many of the most beautiful Church hymns are usually revised psalms.

² Evangel. Kirchenzeitung, vol. lxxiv, No. 4, p. 374.

³ See Marheineke, ubi supra, p. 256, and Stier, Erneuerte Rechenschaft über das evangelische Gesangbuch, Brunswick, 1852.

in liturgics to determine the principles on which they are to be introduced.¹

If the Church hymn belongs to the department of poetry, the prayer involves a form of language which expresses the Public prayer. "unity of poetry and prose"—that is to say, of free and yet elevated speech. Every infusion of merely reflective, dogmatizing, moralizing, and logically connecting elements, is to be avoided. The older written forms of Church prayers, while containing much that is strong and robust, were yet often pervaded with a dogmatizing and polemical spirit which could not be edifying; and modern forms often include much sentimental verbiage, or are couched in the tone of merely moralizing preaching. It will be necessary that the appropriate manner and tone of the Church prayer, by which it secures an aspect of due veneration, be retained, and that all effeminacy and insipidity be excluded, while at the same time the structure of sentences is kept sufficiently flexible to avoid the impression of stiffness.²

With reference to the administration of the Sacraments, we may say that they constitute the most fixed and immovable element of worship, especially with regard to the words of institution and consecration, which liturgics is not at liberty to change. The additions, such as preliminary and supplementary prayers, exhortations, and the like, are not so immovably fixed. Such other formulas as relate to specific occasions may receive a more independent and flexible treatment, though the true spirit of the Church may always be retained even in the framing of such formulas.

¹ The preface to Knapp's Liederschatz contains valuable directions for this work. Comp. also Herder's preface to the Weimar Gesangbuch. Numerous discussions of this question have been had in recent days at Church conferences and synods, and in periodicals, but without arriving at any agreement respecting the principles on which a hymn book for the common use of the evangelical Churches should be composed.

² Ehrenfeuchter, § 81.

³ Kapp (in the work mentioned below) has set forth some excellent principles. Comp. also Hebel, Ideen zur Gebetstheorie (in Werke, vol. vii); we are not to pray "as the awkward members of a guild, and the foremen address each other in a sworn form of greeting, but as dear children approach their beloved father." There is danger, however, that the Church prayer express too great familiarity, as if addressing a mere "friend of the family."

SECTION XII.

THE METHODOLOGY.

The nature of liturgics forbids that facility in its use should be acquired by practice, as may be done with catechetics and homiletics. But the liturgical sense may be variously cultivated, and especially by making of the divine service a vital element for the pastor, in which he feels himself at home. The understanding of liturgical matters is likewise aided in a special degree by familiarity with the older and more recent liturgics, though we may not use them, and particularly by familiarity with the treasures of hymnology which belong to the Church. To this may be added personal practice in singing,—if we have the gift,—an acquaintance with the theory of Church singing, and also an insight into the nature of Christian architecture.

Practice in the leading of the prayers of the congregation may be connected with practice in preaching, but the true ^{The necessity} anointing of the liturgist must be derived from a Higher ^{of divine help.} Power. Fessler says: "The school and extensive reading, industry, and practice, may, when joined to distinguished ability, produce excellent orators, but the forming of a divinely inspired liturgist, who holds full communion with God, is exclusively a work of grace—i. e., of the illuminating, inspiring, and anointing influence of the Holy Spirit."¹ Frölich observes, with striking truth, that "to strike the proper tone with a certainty which shall excite the congregation to join heartily in prayer, and to fill it with devotional feeling, and to hold it fast, and harmonize it with the different turns of the prayer, demands not only all the fervour of which the leader is capable, but also all his skill." . . . In the biography of Spleiss, superintendent at Schaffhausen, he is credited with having prepared himself for the conduct of his liturgical services with the same industry and care which he bestowed upon a sermon; and thus, while his sermons frequently burst forth with excessive vivacity, his liturgical delivery was quiet and restrained. But each word was emphasized with the proper degree of force, and made to express its full meaning, especially in the more important passages.

Every part of the service connected with the worship, and not the sermon alone, must be minutely studied. An expressive and unaffected presentation of these various parts is very rare. Even the ablest preacher may utterly destroy the good influence of the sermon by carelessness in the conduct of the other portions of the service, while the lack of personal eloquence may be readily overlooked in the case of a faithful administrator in holy things.

¹ Rückblicke auf meine 70 jährige Pilgerschaft, Breslau, 1826, p. 416.

The proper reading of the Scripture lessons is highly essential. They should be selected with great care, their spirit studied, and then read with calm fervour.¹ With regard to singing, the minister is not required to accomplish more than any other member of the Church. But he is still expected to direct the singing to the extent of selecting the hymns which are to be sung. For this purpose, if for no other, a thoroughly intimate acquaintance with the hymn book, unfortunately so rare an acquirement, is of great advantage. Luther went too far when he said, "I will not look at a preacher who cannot sing." The pastor should do all he can, in his appropriate sphere, toward the improvement of the singing by seeing that the congregation are supplied with hymn books, and all possible helps. He cannot, therefore, permit himself to remain in ignorance of the poetical and musical treasures of the hymnology of his individual denomination, or of that of the Church as a whole.

The opportunity of attending public worship while travelling should never be neglected, from religious as well as homiletical and liturgical considerations, the object being to enlarge one's spiritual and mental horizon, and the combatting of prejudices that were previously entertained. A visit, for example, to a congregation of the Moravian Brotherhood will yield to every mind a profitable picture of Christian propriety and liturgical simplicity. Besides, every opportunity for a better acquaintance with the better specimens of ecclesiastical art and architecture should be seized upon cheerfully. No preacher visiting the older countries should neglect any privilege, both in services in the churches and in observation, to enrich his mind for better ministrations after his return home.

With regard to every part of the service, and more especially the administration of the sacraments, everything depends upon a sense of propriety, which itself results from thorough moral culture. At the communion table and the baptismal font the most learned pedant, the keenest critic, and the profoundest speculator, may be put to shame sooner than a simple, properly trained, modest, and inwardly consecrated and anointed servant of God. Such a man as that the preacher—if not that already—should endeavour to become.

¹ Such reading should not be declamatory, but suited to the spirit of the passage, and recitative. Comp. Ehrenfeuchter, p. 352; Bähr, p. 72.

SECTION XIII.

THE HISTORY OF LITURGICS.

Christian worship has developed itself out of the Jewish worship. It was at first simple synagogue worship, then, to an increasing extent, levitical priesthood and temple service, and, finally, a return to the simpler form through the agency of the Reformation. From that point it is possible to distinguish three periods: "The stormy period of the Reformation; then the quiet and often stagnant intermediate period; and, finally, the active and struggling period in which we live."¹

Liturgics is conformed in its method to these successive stages: The apostles already furnished hints respecting the proper behaviour at the time of worship (1 Cor. xi, 22; Eph. vi, 19; Col. iii, 16; James ii, 2, 3). The apostolical constitutions and the liturgies which were promulgated under the names of the Apostle James and the Evangelist Mark, of Jerusalem and Alexandria, are, as is well known, rejected by criticism. With them were connected, in the East, the liturgies of Basil and of Chrysostom, and, in the West, those of Gelasius and Leo I. These last, however, were superseded by the Roman Missal of Gregory I. Milan alone preserved its special liturgy.² When the Romish worship, under the supervision of the papacy, had developed into the ritual of the Romish mass, and the functions of the priesthood had extended over a wider area, it became necessary to provide guides for their conduct, such as Durandus (died 1296), in his Reason for Divine Offices, and similar works.

Luther transformed the mass into a simple observance of the Protestant ceremony of the Lord's Supper, and the Reformed theologians rejected both the name and the thing.³ The symbolical books contain the earliest liturgical principles, and they reappear occasionally in dogmatical works in connexion with the Church and the sacraments. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the flourishing period of German Church hymnology, did more in the way of furnishing a liturgical apparatus, such as hymn books and formularies, than in that of discussing the worship itself. It was not until a beginning was made, from the standpoint of modern rationalism, in the work of setting aside the ancient, or of conforming it to the so-called "demands of the spirit of the times," or the period of diluting the hymnology of the Church, that new theories were provided to accompany the new liturgical forms. This Rationalistic works. was done by Zollikoffer, Seiler, Diterich, Hufnagel, Wagnitz, and others, first in the journals of the period, and afterward in books. Specimens of these works may be seen in Bastholm's Improvement of the Outward Worship (Leips., 1786); Spazier's Frank Thoughts on the Protestant Worship of God (Gotha, 1788); Wolfrath, Questions on Liturgical Subjects (Hamburg, 1793-94); Burdorf's Hints for the Improvement of the Festivity of Public Worship (1795); Jenisch's Worship of God and Ecclesiastical Reform (Berlin, 1803), and Reinhold's Ideas on the Outward Worship (Neustrelitz, 1805). To these may be added Tzschirner, in his Cautious Improvement of Sacred Services (1815), who demands a natural worship of God, and Hebel, in his Liturgical Contributions, who admits the emotional element, but too strongly from a subjective point of view. The mystical and Romanizing tendencies, stimulated by the romantic school, likewise asserted themselves by the side of the rationalizing and sentimental tendencies in worship, in Horst's Mysteriosophy, and in the works of Fessler, and others.

¹ Lange, ubi supra, p. 109.

² Comp. Assemani, Codex liturgicus, Rom., 1649-65; xiii, fol.; Renaudet, Collectio Liturgiarum orientalium, Paris, 1716; Daniel, Codex liturgicus ecclesie universae, Lips., 1847, sqq.

³ Comp. J. C. Funk, Geist u. Form des von Luther angeordneten Cultus, Berlin, 1818.

Gass (died 1831), stimulated especially by Schleiermacher, was the first to provide a really scientific basis for evangelical liturgics, of which the writers mentioned in the literature below availed themselves in the further development of this branch, though generally governed by speculative rather than practical motives. Kapp was more largely practical than any other author. The latest Recent diversity of views. movements within the ecclesiastical territory have given rise to a great diversity of views. This we see in the union of the two Protestant Churches of Germany, and the connected dispute, extending into ecclesiastical law, respecting the ritual, in which Schleiermacher took part. We observe it also in the reaction against the Prussian service book, which emanated from the Old Lutheran party. To these must be added Puseyism, which originated in the Oxford School, and whose fundamental views in relation to ecclesiastical law and liturgics found acceptance in Germany as well. We see it also in Irvingism, which sought to restore a levitical worship.

In the Reformed Church it was felt to be necessary that at least a justification of the peculiar form of worship be furnished. Greater sobriety and caution were manifested from that point, in opposition to an æstheticising, mystifying, and speculative transcendentalism, which does not exclude the recognition of whatever may be more valuable among the possessions of other churches. It is in place here to recall the unfortunate dispute concerning the ritual in the Grand Duchy of Baden, and the hymn book controversy in the Palatinate, in connexion with which such a quiet discussion of principles as was to be desired, and as would have yielded fruit to the Church and to science, was not, in all probability, secured—a proof that not all times are equally prepared to admit of liturgical reforms, and that some will warn against retrogression in matters where others see only progress. Nor has the Roman Catholic Church been free from attempts to reconstruct the worship anew since the close of the last century. Not to dwell upon the Theophilanthropists of France (1796), who endeavoured to introduce a sentimental deism, and the church of the Abbé Chatel at Paris (from 1830), it may be sufficient to mention, in the theoretical department, the Principles of Liturgical Theology, of the Benedictine, Köhler (1788), and Winter's What the Liturgy should Be (Munich, 1809), together with the works of Schmidt, Hnoge, Lüft, and others. Ignatius of Wessenberg rendered especially meritorious service in the ennobling of the worship and the introducing of a German hymnology. His ideal, at all events, was to build up a German Catholic Church, though not of the kind produced in the fourth decade of this century, to which that name was applied. It remains to be seen how far the Old Catholicism of Döllinger and others will succeed in constructing a liturgy.

Controversy in Baden and the Palatinate.

LITERATURE OF LITURGICS.

GERMAN AND FRENCH.

- M. F. Scheibler, Josias seu de restituendo Dei cultu. Solisb., 1814.
 L. A. Köhler: Sendschreiben an einen Freund über die Erneuerung des Cultus. Lpz., 1816.
 * J. C. Gass, Ueber den christlichen Cultus. Bresl., 1815.
 G. Kr. Horst, Mysteriosophie, oder über die Veredlung des protestantischen Gottesdienstes. Frankf., 1817. 2 vols.
 J. H. Fritsch, Ueber die zweckmässigsten Mittel zur Wiederherstellung und fleissigen Benutzung des öffentlichen Gottesdienstes. Magdeb., 1817.
 Philadelphus Alethes (J. A. C. Löhr), Die kirchlichen Dinge. Lpz., 1823.
 J. J. Fessler, Liturgisches Handbuch. Riga, 1823.
 * G. F. W. Kapp, Grundsätze zur Bearbeitung evangel. Agenden. Erl., 1831.
 * Sal. Vögelin, Welche Veränderungen und Verbesserungen sollten in unserm evang.-reform. Cultus vorgenommen werden? Frauenfeld, 1837.
 J. W. F. Höfling, Von der Composition des christl. Gemeindegottesdienstes. Erl., 1837.
 * K. W. Vetter, Die Lehre vom christl. Cultus, nach den Grundsätzen der evang. Kirche. Berl., 1839.
 G. A. F. Goldmann, Der sonntägl. Hauptgottesdienst. Hannov., 1840.
 * F. Ehrenfeuchter, Theorie des christl. Cultus. Hamb., 1840.
 F. F. Klöpfer, Liturgik oder Theorie der stehenden Cultusformen. Lpz., 1840.

J. D. Seisen, Genius des Cultus. Heidelb., 1841.

* A. Ebrard, Versuch einer Liturgik vom Standpunkte der reformirten Kirche. Frankf. a. M., 1843.

* Th. Kliefoth, Theorie des Cultus der evangel. Kirche. Ludwigslust, 1844.

— Die ursprüngliche Gottesdienstordnung in den deutschen Kirchen lutherischen Bekenntnisses. Rostock, 1847.

K. Bähr, Der protestantische Gottesdienst vom Standpunkte der Gemeinde aus betrachtet. Heidelb., 1850.

E. Closter, Der Gemein-Gottesdienst und das Kirchenbuch. Lpz., 1853.

K. A. Dächsel, Ordnung des evang. Hauptgottesdienstes. Berl., 1854.

F. Nees v. Esenbeck, Der christliche Gottesdienst nach dem Bedürfniss der evang. Kirche. Kreuzn., 1854.

L. Schöberlein, Der Evang. Gottesdienst nach den Grundsätzen der Reformation. Heidelb., 1854.

— Das Wesen des christl. Gottesdienstes. Gött., 1860.

— Ueber den liturgischen Ausbau des Gemeindegottesdienstes in der deutschen evang. Kirche. Gotha, 1859.

Th. Kliefoth, Liturgische Abhandlungen. Schwerin, 1854–61.

K. R. Hagenbach, Grundlinien der Liturgik und Homiletik. Lpz., 1863.

By Roman Catholics:

F. X. Schmid, Liturgik der christkatholischen Religion. Passau, 1832.

† Jos. Marzohl and Jos. Schneller, Liturgia sacra. Luzern, 1834–41. 4 vols.

† Hnovek, Christkatholische Liturgik. Prag, 1835–42. 5 vols.

† Lüft, Kathol. Liturgik. Mainz, 1844, 1847. 2 vols.

† Joh. Hepp, Der Gottesdienst der kathol. Kirche. Mainz, 1853.

† M. Terklau, Der Geist des kathol. Cultus. Wien, 1853.

† Fluck, Kathol. Liturgik. Regensb., 1853, 1855. 2 vols.

HISTORICAL WORKS.

H. Alt, Der christliche Cultus, nach seinen verschiedenen Entwicklungsformen und seinen einzelnen Theilen historisch dargestellt. Berl., 1843.

† Probst, Liturgie der drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderte. Tüb., 1870.

H. Jacoby, Die Liturgik der Reformatoren. Gotha, 1871.

The hymns of the ancient Church are given in a collection by * H. A. Daniel, Thesaurus hymnologicus s. hymnorum, canticorum, sequentiarum collectio amplissima. Lips., 1841–56. 5 vols. Comp. F. G. Lisso, Dies irae, Hymnus auf das Weltgericht. Berl., 1840. 4. Ibid., Stabat mater. Berl., 1843. 4to. Simrock (Lauda Sion. 1850. 2d ed., 1868). Mone, Lat. Hymnen des Mittelalters, etc. 1853, 1854. 2 vols.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

Each of the denominations has its own form of service, and its special collection of hymns.

ARCHITECTURE AND ART.

Joseph Bingham, Origines Antiquitates. 10 vols. Lond., 1843.

M. Didson, History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages. Lond., 1851.

C. L. Eastlake, History of the Gothic Revival. Lond., 1872.

C. I. Hemans, History of Ancient Christianity and Sacred Art in Italy. 3 vols. Florence and Lond., 1866–72.

Anna Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art. 2 vols. Lond., 1879.

W. Lübke, Outlines of the History of Art. 7th ed. N. Y., 1878.

- C. E. Norton, Historical Studies of Church Building in the Middle Ages. N. Y., 1880.
 G. A. Poole, History of Ecclesiastical Architecture in England. Lond., 1848.
 J. E. Riddle, Manual of Christian Antiquities. Lond., 1848.
 G. G. Scott, History of English Church Architecture. Lond., 1881.

SECTION XIV.

HOMILETICS.

Liturgics determines the nature and form of worship. But homiletics has to determine the nature and form of the Christian sermon alone, and to furnish instruction respecting the mode of expounding the word of God in the congregation, and of presenting it in discourse. Liturgics directs attention to the entire contents of Christian revelation, whence the sermon is to derive its material; and the latter operates partly in the field of hermeneutics and partly in that of rhetoric, though with constant reference to the peculiar nature of sacred discourse, as distinguished from other forms of oratory.

Relation of Liturgics to homiletics.

The word homiletics is derived from ὁμιλία. It is usual to understand homilies as denoting only a single class of sermons, namely, those whose unity does not inhere in a theme which is propounded, but in the text, and which approximate to popular forms of speech in their language more than do those of other classes.¹ The ancient usage covered a broader ground with this term, however, and in conformity therewith we use the term homiletics to designate not only the theory of this single form of discourse, but that of the sermon in general. At this point, however, we must fix the limit. Homiletics must not be expanded into a theory of sacred, or even Christian or religious, eloquence, in general. It is possible to conceive of Christian addresses which are not included in the department of homiletics proper; for example, the missionary address (κήρυγμα). The latter may be denominated a sermon, in the peculiar biblical meaning of the word; but it, as well as the preaching of the apostles, is nevertheless unlike what our sermons can be, since they are not the product of the impulse of the moment, but bear the character of a regularly repeated and integral part of public worship. Herder remarks,² that "as soon as the sermon ceased to be what it really was in the mouth of the apostles, a message, it became an exposition of the word of God, its writings and teachings, and an application of what had been read in the midst of a quiet Christian assembly. This was termed a homily, and was not properly an oration."

Homiletics not a theory of sacred eloquence.

¹ Opinions differ greatly with regard to the propriety of homilies. While Herder has advocated their use, Harms has decided adversely to it, and says: "they fill, but do not satisfy." Schleiermacher was likewise not inclined to regard them with special favour. He considered homilies to be a mere aggregation of separate sermons.

² In Briefe über das Studium der Theologie, No. 40, the whole of which should be read in this connexion.

If it be desired to set forth a theory for the awakening preaching of an apostolic herald, or for the proclamation of the Word among the heathen, it will be found convenient to appropriate to it the name keryktics—a term first formed by Stier from the Greek word, κηρύσσω, to proclaim.¹ Such preaching precedes, in point of time, even catechetics, while the sermon, as ordinarily understood, is addressed to persons who already belong to the Christian community, so that homiletics carries forward the work of catechetics.

We would not assert that the usual sermon should involve no element of keryktics, for many nominal Christians exist to whom the call to repentance needs to be continually addressed, and Schleiermacher pivoted the question upon too fine a point when he excluded all hortatory sermons of this kind. Vinet urges the reality, which is stronger than any theory. It is equally certain, however, that many of our most zealous hortatory preachers miss the mark by incessantly driving the plough, instead of pausing to sow the seed and water it, and cherish the growing blade. By preaching only repentance we always tarry in the court of the Gentiles, and never enter into the most holy place. The needs of advanced Christians and growth in grace should not be disregarded. The treatment accorded to cold and formal Christians within the Church, moreover, is specifically different from that which the actual heathen, who "are without," can receive. An appeal may be addressed to their nominal Christianity, or, better, to the Christian name they bear. They may be reminded of their baptism, and everything may be presumed of them in an ideal sense, though it does not exist in a real form. Their conscience differs from that of the heathen, and discourse addressed to that conscience must differ from that which aims to reach the heathen mind.

Still other forms of discourse might be mentioned which belong to the keryktical, and not the homiletical, department; for example, the preaching of the crusades in the Middle Ages, and such free discourses in the open air as the mediæval friars were wont to deliver, or the bazar and street preaching of the most recent period. There is also a class of discourses which belongs within the circle of parliamentary speech, such as conference and occasional addresses. Occasional discourses stand at the very boundary line, and are included more especially under the pastoral or the liturgical function, as they are directed to the peculiar condition and religious needs of the respective persons concerned, or relate entirely to the particular occasion to be utilized. The ordination sermon, for example, grows out of the position held by the ordaining minister under the economy of Church government.

¹ Comp. Nitzsch in Stud. u. Krit., 1832, No. 3, p. 725: "Since it must be admitted that the word homily—whether so used in the New Testament or not, is immaterial in this connexion—does yet, when historically considered, and taken in the meaning assigned to it in the early usage of the Church, denote the function which embraces the whole of the service of the λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, it follows that homiletics is always to be regarded as a leading branch of practical theology by the side of catechetics. The combination of the two is, only in the case of the missionary, however, to be denominated keryktics, provided it is still necessary to retain the Greek designations for the sake of brevity, and of associating the conditions of the present with those of antiquity and history."

We, therefore, confine our attention to the sermon within the limits of the regular services of the Church, in which it assumes various characters in accordance with the solemnity, be it more or less, of the particular service, being either a Sunday morning or evening sermon, or a more popular discourse in familiar language, as the homily, or a practical exposition of some Scripture. The feature which makes a sermon of the sermon, and distinguishes it from other forms of religious or Christian discourse, is the text¹ or passage of Scripture which does not serve merely as a motto, but is the root from which the sermon must grow. This determines not only the contents of the sermon, which must be scriptural in any case, but also its form. The preacher is not simply a speaker, but also an expounder, with the single qualification that at one time the former function will be more prominent, and at another time the latter. The art of preaching has its field of exercise both in the department of hermeneutics and in that of rhetoric. With regard to the former branch we refer to the department of exegesis, treated in this work. With reference to the oratorical branch it is important to assure to pulpit discourse its special field. As religion itself is neither a formal knowing nor a doing, religious discourse likewise differs from those forms of discourse which direct their aim chiefly upon knowing or upon doing. The former class, of course, are not discourses, in a strict sense of the word, but approximate in character to treatises, such as academical addresses or lectures.

The text.

¹ Textus (from texo), a texture. Applied to the texture of discourse in Quint., 8, 6; Ammian. Marcellin., 15, 7. Comp. Stephani Thesaur. In the Middle Ages the term textus was applied to the Bible itself; comp. du Frêne. It is here given to a particular section taken from the Scriptures, which Campe not inappropriately renders by "Grundspruch" (fundamental theme). Examples are not wanting, in the history of homiletics, of sermons which have no other texts than verses from hymns or sections from the Catechism. But such discourses do not belong within the range of the sermon as fixed by the requirements of a fully developed Protestant worship. They may be serviceable for the work of edification in other directions, but they cannot replace the sermon. Addresses not founded upon a text are, as a rule, better adapted for occasional discourses, but they are termed occasional discourses for that very reason. Texts taken from secular books are even worse than no texts at all. In the Middle Ages sermons were based on Aristotle, later, in the fifteenth century, on Brandt's Ship of Fools, and the Rationalist Unitarians of England still draw their texts from Schiller and Byron. An instructive discussion as to whether a text is needed or may be dispensed with, and concerning the special difficulties involved in the being restricted to a text, is contained in Vinet, Homiletics, chap. 8.

The sermon should not be a lecture or treatise. It aims to The sermon not a lecture. enlarge and correct the religious apprehension, but only in order that the religious state of the soul may be more clearly understood and be more unimpeded in its expression. The preacher may not rest satisfied with having wrought conviction in the mind unless it make itself felt upon the heart. It should also pass over into action. The pulpit discourse differs, however, from all such addresses as aim directly to produce action, and in connexion with which the speaker is content with having the object realized which he has in view, without regard to the motive from which it is performed. This is the case with parliamentary and juridical addresses. The older homiletical writers of France distinguished between "eloquence of the bar" and "eloquence of the pulpit." It will be apparent, from this consideration, to what extent Demosthenes and Cicero may be regarded as our models. "The person," says Herder, "who, without qualification, regards the forensic orations of Demosthenes and Cicero as models to which our sermons are to be conformed, has no proper idea of the nature of either the sermon or the forensic address; he has not apprehended the design of either."¹ He elsewhere says: "Preachers cannot, like Demosthenes and Cicero, call forth sudden decisions and resolves to action; they cannot, because they should not; and they should not, because they cannot. There are no Philips before our walls that we should at once rush in wild enthusiasm to guard our gates—this is true, and who has ever wrought to secure that end? There are no felons to be instantly condemned or acquitted—who has ever spoken as if this were the case? But let it be supposed that something of this kind were yet to be devolved upon the speaker, then, teacher, you are compelled to perform the work, and will need to display ability in its accomplishment, or you speak but poorly. If a Christian duty, of whatever kind, ought to be instantly performed, and it were devolved upon you to make it clear and urge to action, it were weak not to do this despite whatever theory might be employed to furnish an excuse."¹

¹ Briefe, No. 40, Werke x, p. 18.

Should the sermon then aim simply to influence the religious feeling? By no means. A mere gush of feeling is not at all a discourse. The sermon should not be a monologue, an expanded prayer, a meditation in which the preacher appears only in his relation to God and Christ (after the manner of the ancient "speaking with tongues," 1 Cor. xiv, 2), and not in that sustained toward the congregation. This is a fault in which many emotional persons become involved, whose discourses soar upon the air, instead of being directed upon the heart like arrows from the quiver. A discourse is distinguished from the poem by the very fact that it is not a mere outburst of the feelings, but rather a homily, in the etymological meaning of the word—that is, a conversation with the hearer, who is to be regarded as not merely a recipient, but as joining with thought and feeling in the discussion, and possibly as replying to it and raising doubts. Vinet says: "Oratorical discourse thus appears as a contest, a combat; this idea is essential to it. At one time the orator combats an error by a truth, at another he opposes one sentiment to another sentiment. In its just use oratory is a combat waged against errors of the mind and heart with the warfare of speech!"² "The oratorical discourse is a drama, each word of the preacher is a question to which the auditor replies in himself, and his reply becomes a new question to which the orator replies. There is an interior in every oratorical art." Cicero, when asked to point out the result of rhetoric, replied: "Actio, actio, actio."³

We must, accordingly, include the dialectical element also, although this, again, must rest upon a profounder basis, namely, the common feeling of Christianity. But we must not resolve everything into dialectics. The sermon must necessarily be of a parenetic or hortatory character, and aim to excite to resolve and action. But such resolution must likewise grow out of the feeling which has been excited, and out of definite convictions. The sermon is a testimony of Christ and of life in him, and at the same time a proclamation of that life.⁴ It is discourse to an extent, perhaps, not equalled by any other form of address, inasmuch as it addresses the entire man, takes hold upon the inmost depths of his being, discloses that being to his thought, and raises him above himself.

Relation of the sermon to the congregation.

Oratory a conversation.

The sermon a testimony to Christ.

¹ Provinzialblätter, p. 374.

² Homiletics, Skinner's edition, p. 26.

³ Ehrenfeuchter, p. 358, assigns the latter only to the sermon, the former to prayer.

⁴ Comp. Herder, Der Redner Gottes (Werke zur Relig. und Theol., x, p. 475, sqq.).

The individuality of the speaker is, doubtless, more fully displayed in the sermon than in the liturgy. But this must not be understood as implying that his individuality, in the form of personal views, should assert itself in this work, or that the preacher should preach simply himself, or merely human doctrine. Christ attains to a distinct form in each separate individual, and it follows that the individual life can only be properly manifested in the higher peculiarities which it involves, and for the benefit of the common life of the Christian community. We will not, therefore, say that the preacher is required to renounce his individuality. This view presumes a conflict, which, unfortunately, arises in many cases between the convictions of the preacher and those of the Church. It should, rather, be the aim of the preacher to make the asserting of his individuality subserve the spiritual elevation of the congregation, and his human teaching reflect the word of God. For the preacher's individuality is not, in point of fact, to be considered a channel through which water flows, or a glass for the passage of the rays of light. On the other hand, we hold that the preacher is not to annihilate, but to perfect and idealize, his individuality. The speaker, carried along by the peculiarity of his Christian life, pours out upon the congregation what has been developed into life in his own personal experience, and thereby awakens new life in his hearers.¹

But he does this in an artistic form by first stripping off the evil features attaching to his individuality, including everything that is merely subjective and accidental, by permitting the product of his mind to become clear to himself through the process of meditating upon it, and to become, in a true sense, a part of his inner life, and by assuring himself, with an inward certainty that extends down to the individual expression, that he is justified in appearing in this precise manner, and not otherwise, before the congregation, as its speaker, and that he is called to labour precisely in that form. We do not question whether the preacher, by virtue of his official position, is alone competent to perform this function, and Lay preaching. not other members of the Church as well. Laymen officiated as speakers in the early Church. We consider it proper that our worship be so expanded as to admit of other than settled and stationed ordained preachers. Lay preaching, however, should have clearly defined limits. To judge of the sermon altogether from the pastoral, instead of from the liturgical and lay, point of view, and to consider the pulpit simply as an elevation upon which the one shepherd stands to feed his flock, appears to us an entire misunderstanding of the nature of the sermon. We do not disregard the benefits arising from the bond which joins pastor and people together, but all the gifts and graces for preaching are not confined to him who may be pastor.

¹ Beyer, ubi supra, p. 25, separates the idea of the sermon into three parts: (1) The creative; (2) The receptive; and (3) the mediating principle. He finds these three in (1) The word of God; (2) The congregation; and (3) The person of the preacher. "The word of God furnishes the sermon with its life-giving and saving contents, the life derived from God; the adaptation to the congregation gives to it historical and local form; and the mind of the preacher, in which the preceding elements are combined into unity, bestows upon it the power and colouring of personal life."

SECTION XV.

HOMILETICAL ARRANGEMENT AND MATERIAL.

Homiletics is divided into two parts, the General and the Special. The latter embraces, 1. Invention; 2 Disposition; 3. The Division of elaboration and delivery of the discourse. homiletics. Care is required, however, to avoid the danger of regarding such division in thought as having brought about a real separation in the concrete, and to guard in general against losing sight of the essential character and meaning of pulpit discourse, because of the influence of the arbitrary rules of the schools which have intruded themselves into the different divisions of homiletics.

The theory may be divided in conformity with the two questions, What shall be preached? and How shall it be preached? The limit of sacred eloquence. This was the plan pursued by Augustine in his Christian Doctrine. The matter may be considered in its general and its particular aspects, the general inquiry being, How far does the limit of sacred eloquence extend? That limit is determined by the Christian character. Nothing but what is connected with the Christian life as such,¹ and aims to establish, purify, and perfect that life, may properly be made the subject of homiletical discourse. But nothing that belongs within that circle can be excluded from the range of such discourse. This is, consequently, the place for determining the character of Christian preaching. The sermon should be pervaded by both doctrinal and ethical preaching. The two should interpenetrate each other, though the doctrinal element may at times predominate, and at other times the ethical. To what extent may political matters be discussed? How far may the course of nature, as the changes of the seasons, be regarded? In all these matters good taste and sound wisdom must be observed. There is a time for everything.

¹ We assume as self-evident the fact that the standard to which such Christian life is to be conformed is given in the word of God, and particularly in the teaching of Christ and the apostles.

The first division of homiletics is the theory of invention. No direct invention, in the ordinary meaning of the word, must be understood. The matter for our preaching was invented long ago. But the duty is devolved upon us of deciding what portion of the existing treasure shall now be presented to the congregation. With what subject should the preacher deal on this day, at this hour, in this particular instance? At this point we again meet the opposing elements of the prescribed and the free. There are certain great general topics, such as Christmas, the new year, Easter, important national days, and public events of paramount interest, which require special treatment, but the device of the text and mode of treatment are the province of the preacher in his individual capacity. To what degree may a preacher be guided by his personal mood? How far may outward circumstances govern his choice? Should he, in his regular ministrations, undertake a doctrinal or an exegetical series? Which parts and books of the Scriptures deserve to be separately treated? Should he select his texts chiefly from the Old or the New Testament? Should he prefer historical to doctrinal passages? Should he choose parables; larger or smaller sections; texts from the gospels, or the epistles, or the apostolic history? Guiding principles are needed in all these matters. There should be no accident or personal whim. Even eminent preachers have allowed themselves to be misled into the effort of exciting curiosity either by selecting peculiar texts or discussing piquant themes. Reinhard and Dräseke in Germany, and many preachers in both England and America, have erred in different directions upon this point; the one being misled by his ingenuity, the other by his wit. Reinhard, however, was tempted to go astray because of the restriction imposed by the topics prescribed by the ecclesiastical calendar. The custom of selecting abbreviated texts, mere starting points of texts, so to speak, prevails especially in the Reformed Church of France. This is very prominent in the sermons of Adolph Monod and Alexander Vinet.

A frequent and living intercourse with the Scriptures, the observation of its practical features, an acquaintance with the human heart, a correct estimate of the preacher's personal disposition, and especially a candid observation of the time and its needs, and of the Church at large as well as the local church, comprehend the secret of homiletical invention, and protect against the intellectual bankruptcy of being preached out, while they also cut off, at the beginning, all temptation to make use of unworthy artifices, such as an attempt to surprise by novelty and originality. A text that has been judiciously selected is worth half a sermon, and brief and striking texts are certainly very effective. Palmer remarks: "It is a beautiful and grand thing for the preacher to have succeeded in striking the proper chord in the very enunciation of his text, and an electrical effect is often produced when the congregation is made to realize at the outset that this is to be the subject which ought to be discussed to-day."¹

Conditions necessary for proper texts.

When the theme and text have been selected the work of arranging is in order. It is, first of all, necessary to determine the exact relation sustained by the text to the theme, and this decision will govern the further progress of the sermon, the theme being either at once evoked from the text, and then developed more extensively, or, being gradually developed before the hearer's mind, the discourse is strung upon the thread of the text. The former method is synthetic preaching; the latter, analytical. The two methods may frequently be combined and interpenetrate each other, especially when but little attention is bestowed upon unnatural and inflexible divisions, and more regard is had for a natural and attractive grouping of ideas. Arrangement is certainly needed, but not arrangement only. Connexion is also requisite. By this we mean a just distribution of effective points, not only in harmony with the laws of logic, but also with those of rhetoric and art.

Herder strikingly observes of a true disposition of the sermon: "There must be no figure, no clause, no comma, which does not grow, as it were, necessarily out of the theme as a branch and its limbs, or a flower and a leaf of the tree grow out of the root or the trunk. If it be not in this place it is nowhere, and the discourse is incomplete; it has a gap, a vacant place, as we say of paintings. A totally different question is that which asks whether the disposition should be set forth like a naked skeleton. Nature does not follow that plan, and the sermon should be the last to adopt it. Natural arrangement, and a continued analysis of the word of God, form the best disposition for its use."² The best mode of division, however, will always be that in which the connexion of the text determines the structure of the sermon, and where the latter grows out of the text. This, likewise, settles the question concerning the relative value of synthetical or analytical sermons.

The sermon should not be a mere unorganized agglomeration and aggregation of saws and sentences any more than it should resemble a skeleton. A fine human figure is resolved into its component members before the observer, but the members have an elastic connexion, and are not articulated with wires. The bones may no more stand out than they may be buried in obesity from sight. So with the sermon. This involves the entire secret of so-called sermonic division. Much pedantry has taken root in this field, but it is once more dying out. The aim was to divide off with the aid of line and compass, and an external symmetry, as in the Artistic division. closely clipped French gardens, came to be considered the law of beauty. A Procrustean bed was made ready, and everything was stretched or cut off until the parts, and secondary parts, were all of equal length. The utmost conscientiousness was employed in measuring and weighing whether a sermon should be divided into two or three parts, or whether more than three could be allowed, and how much space should be allotted to the introduction and every other member. Many preachers even made use of an arrangement obtained from others, as if theft were not a crime, and as if the arrangement and the execution did not mutually determine each other. A master must be competent to fit his own goods; only a bungler will construct a patchwork article.

¹ Page 384.

² Briefe über das Studium der Theologie, No. 45.

Much has been said upon the delivery of the sermon. It cannot be denied that the pulpit has its own peculiar style, any more than it can be denied that there is a special style of praying or singing, or of architecture, in the Church. The preacher should not talk, but speak, and speaking is an art. His tone should not be simply argumentative, nor merely hortatory, nor yet merely pathetic. The beauty of the discourse is dependent on its truthfulness. Beyer well says: "If the idea of the beautiful requires that thought should find its adequate expression in the concrete form, a sacred beauty must always be ascribed to the sermon. Its divine substance is to be presented to view under the form of human speech, and, therefore, must penetrate with glorifying power through the whole discourse, and appear in its structure, and even in the separate words. But the beauty of the sermon is for this very reason not such as may be intentionally sought out and artificially manufactured. It is no tinsel ornamentation."¹

The more fully justice is done to the sermon the richer will it be in fulness of expression, resembling the word of God, in which it has its origin. In its moments of elevation it may approximate to the poetical character, but without becoming poetry.² Everything that is unworthy, all that resembles the Capuchinade, all meretricious ornamentation, both that which recalls to mind the grosser affairs of ordinary life and that which involves the terminology of the schools and books; in a word, all that is purely technical, should be carefully excluded from the sermon. ^{Useless ornament to be avoided.} All foreign terms which are not contained in the Bible are, therefore, to be avoided whenever possible. Dignity and simplicity should combine in it into the higher unity of Christian earnestness. Popularity of style should not be carried to the extreme of triviality. The language should be select, but not strained. A true popularity, an adaptation to the level of common minds,¹ may most readily be secured by the study of the Scriptures and of the good, robust preachers of the earlier days. Such older forms of thought need to be recast into modern phraseology; however, in order that an adventurous pulpit jargon, having no affinity with actual life, may be avoided.

¹ Ubi supra, p. 348, and also p. 567.

² Comp. Palmer, Ueber das Malen in den Predigten, p. 85, sqq. We would not agree with him in designating Krummacher absolutely as a model, since his colours are at times altogether too glaring.

Whether the sermon should be written and memorized, or merely elaborated in the mind, will depend upon personal considerations, and theory has but little concern with the question. Palmer says: "The congregation does not ask, and has no right to ask, how you prepare to speak readily, whether by writing your sermon or otherwise. Your mode of occupation while in the study is your business alone. You may, if you choose, compose your sermons in Latin or in French; if you employ your language, the tongue of the congregation, readily while in the pulpit, the other processes involved in the sermon concern yourself alone." Schleiermacher has expressed the opinion that persons of placid disposition may venture upon extemporaneous speech, while emotional natures would do better to fix both thought and its expression by previous writing. The old Zalansky says a blunt word: "A young preacher should sit out and sweat out his sermons; first write them, and when they have been thoroughly finished present them to the people. . . . Shame upon them who even make it their boast that they have not in many years devoted a sheet of paper to the writing of their sermons." It does not follow from this that sermons should smell of the lamp. Artis est artem celare.

The internal process of preparing the sermon must never be allowed to appear in the delivery. The sermon, even though a written one, must always be mentally constructed with a view to its being spoken, and not as if ^{The sermon to be mentally constructed.}

¹ The popularizing of preaching was never more strongly urged than at a time when the true Christian life of the people had been wholly lost sight of. The best discussion of unction, is given by Vinet, in his Pastoral Theology, pp. 214, 215.

it were an article to be read.¹ It must lie in the mind as a speech, and be continually upon our tongues; the imagination must always picture us, as was always Guthrie's method, as standing in the pulpit with the open Bible before us, and the congregation assembled in our presence. Only thus shall we be able to retain sufficient freshness of mind to prevent the sermon from becoming stale in the process of protracted preparation, and to cause it to be constantly new and fresh while we meditate upon it, so that the time of delivery may become the real natal hour of the sermon, and the hearer may be impressed that it comes freely and directly from the heart at that moment. It is self-evident that a sermon which must be read, as a whole, can produce no such effect. Rosenkranz says: "The unfortunate habit, begun in early life, of relying upon reading and writing, and the fact that people have not been sufficiently accustomed to think, form the reason why free speech, which can only arise from an assured state of the mind, is kept down, especially in the case of persons of liberal culture." But a school-boy-like and poorly memorized sermon, and also one that is so completely extemporized that the pangs of labour under which the speaker brings forth his thoughts may be observed, will produce a painful, and, even if joined with much facility of speech, a repulsive impression.

As a final direction, it must be observed that the various operations of invention, arrangement, and elaboration are not to be separately employed in a mechanical way, but each must be made to exert a determining, supplementing, and correcting influence over the others, if the sermon is to retain its vital colouring. The entire sermon must already be present in the moment of mental composition, as the plant exists in the germ. It is simply to be resolved before the mind into its elements, and be precipitated and clarified, as in some chemical process. The arrangement often leads to a more exact fixing of the theme, and the elaboration reacts upon the disposition, while the written word cannot be corrected until the spoken word has been heard. A sermon may be excellent in point of style, and yet read by the preacher to himself to better advantage than it can be heard by a congregation. It is, therefore, necessary that the preacher should not only think himself into the sermon, but also take a wise estimate of the effect it will produce upon the ear. Often the repeating of the sermon aloud, or at any rate its imaginary delivery in thought, instead of merely thinking it over, will be very beneficial. Bishop Burnet was accustomed, when riding or walking, to speak upon a given text in a loud tone of voice, and without any preparation, by which practice he attained to such readiness that he became able to speak appropriately upon any subject without much previous thought. The sermon should be transfigured and spiritualized to its very centre down to the moment of delivery, in which it is thrown off as a ripened fruit from the mind of the preacher. If a sermon be delivered a second time, or many times, it should be improved for every new delivery. Thus only can there come the joy of creating with each repetition. To ride an old sermon to death is a sad business. "Dissatisfaction with old sermons," says Palmer, "should continue while life remains." Augustine was always dissatisfied with his sermons after they had been delivered. When shall the immorality of presenting in numberless churches a fossil sermon that has once, like a part in a play, been committed to memory, come to an end?

¹ Gossner remarks that the Holy Ghost at Pentecost distributed tongues of fire, but not pens for writing. Bengel's motto was, "Think much, and write little;" and yet he conscientiously wrote down at least the plan.

The rules with reference to delivery are generally of a negative character. Harms fancifully comprehends the whole under the three L's, "langsam, laut, lieblich"—slow, loud, pleasant. Canon Kingsley said: "Keep sacredly to the habit of breathing at every stop. Read and speak slow; and take care of the consonants, and the vowels will take care of themselves."¹ Upon the subject of gestures especially, in which much depends upon the speaker's individuality, it is possible only to indicate Gesticulation. precautions of the most general kind. Much depends upon the theme. The gesture should be the outgrowth of the thought and feeling. It is only effective when unconscious, like the breathing of a child. Be sure the gesticulation is imperfect, unnatural, if the speaker can remember afterward what it was. Herder had no gesticulation, and Schleiermacher next to none. The elder Edwards had almost none, even in his most overpowering discourses. The young preacher should guard against imitating some favourite gesticulator. Some use the mirror as a help in preparation. But a faithful friend, who directs attention upon our mistakes of emphasis and our faulty gestures, is the best kind of mirror within reach. Goethe's words, in Faust, will cover all our remaining ground:

If feeling does not prompt, in vain you strive;
If from the soul the language does not come,
By its own impulse, to impel the hearts
Of hearers, with communicated power,
In vain you strive—in vain you study earnestly.

¹ Letters and Memoirs of the Life of Charles Kingsley, p. 384. The entire letter addressed to Miss — is on Stammering, but will apply well to pulpit elocution.

Toil on forever; piece together fragments;
 Cook up your broken scraps of sentences,
 And blow, with puffing breath, a struggling light,
 Glimmering confusedly now, now cold in ashes;
 Startle the schoolboys with your metaphors;
 And if such food may suit your appetite,
 Win the vain wonder of applauding children!
 But never look to win the hearts of men,
 And mould the souls of many into one,
 By words which come seductive from the heart!

Be honest, if you would be eloquent;
 Be not a chiming fool with cap and bells;
 Reason and genuine feeling want no arts
 Of utterance—ask no toil of elocution;
 And when you are in earnest, do you need
 A search for words? O, these fine holiday phrases,
 In which you robe your worn-out commonplaces,
 These scraps of paper which you crimp and curl,
 And twist into a thousand idle shapes,
 These fligree ornaments, are good for nothing,
 Cost time and pains, please few, impose on no one;
 Are unrefreshing, as the wind that whistles,
 In autumn, 'mong the dry and wrinkled leaves.

SECTION XVI.

THE METHOD OF HOMILETICS.

Exercises which afford a preparation for preaching are: (1) The cultivation and quickening of the practical faculty in the general study of the Bible; (2) The preserving of particular thoughts in writing, which contain the germs of future themes; (3) Practice in delivery. Constant and devotional listening to sermons in the services of the Church, and also the reading of homiletical productions, whether old or new, aid greatly in the forming of the future pulpit speaker.

Exegesis should not be studied alone with a view to the pulpit. But practical exegesis should, nevertheless, always be enjoined with critical. The person who studies the Scriptures as a preacher should must often be struck by their flashes of light even when engaged upon the driest subjects. Such flashes indicate fruitful seasons. Every preacher should keep a notebook, upon which to enter the seedthoughts gained from the Scriptures, together with brief hints with regard to disposition and elaboration. In all his walks and most leisurely moments his eye should be on his pulpit.

The most useful scrapbooks for preachers are those which each man compiles for himself. Exegesis in preaching cannot be conducted on the same plan as surgical practice upon a skeleton. It is a skeleton, indeed, when a student is required to preach in the presence of his fellow students and a faculty of theologians, who are to personate the absent congregation. We suppose there is necessity for this in theological seminaries, but no student is expected to do full justice to himself under such circumstances. Young Rothe, in his student days, wrote this to his father: "Frankly stated, it appears to me that an experiment of this kind is a questionable matter. It is surely a repulsive thought that a Christian congregation should sit like a sort of wig-block upon which a young bungler is to try his sermon; and yet in another direction such an experiment can, in view of the entire nature of the sermon, be undertaken nowhere but in the congregation, and it must, therefore, be carried through in that way." A sermon may be read, or recited, or gone through somehow, before an audience of critics, but it cannot be delivered in the highest sense. Might it be proper in like manner to pray by way of test? or to exhort, or to censure or comfort, all by way of practice?

The pulpit always before the mind.

But there ought to be practice in delivery? Yes, and the more the better, provided it is rightly done. The school should aim to promote this end, and do this work. Student associations for practice in speaking will also render valuable aid. But when it is required that a sermon should be preached by way of practice—and this should come to pass in the last year of the course—let it be undertaken with the help of God, and with full allowances for all the disadvantages of the hour.

Many preachers attempt to display the whole of their theology in their first sermon; many others endeavour to concentrate in it all the feeling of their hearts. A wise restraint is highly needed at this point. Persons who have not yet passed beyond the period of theological conflict should beware of troubling the congregation with their doubts, or with the questions of the schools in general. Let them select themes which they are able to discuss, which have become transparent and concrete to their minds, and which they are competent to manage. Herder's paternal counsel has a general application here: "O friend, friend, do not hasten into the pulpit while too young or too thoughtless. You are not without other exercises which, though conducted in private, will forward you further on your way. If you insist on preaching, at least clothe yourself in modesty from head to foot.

Defects of first sermons.

Nothing is more attractive in a youthful speaker, and especially a pulpit speaker, than this."

Many, however, are restrained from entering the pulpit by excessive timidity, and by the fear of breaking down. Such difficulties, which have their origin as frequently in selfish pride as in a really sacred awe respecting the character of the office, can only be overcome in a moral way. The true παρρησία is a gift of grace. The best young preachers, however, have always been most alarmed. Pliny says: "Quod M. Cicero de stilo, ego de metu sentio. Timor est emendator acerrimus. Hoc ipsum, quod nos recitatuos cogitamus, emendat; quod auditorium ingredimus, emendat; quod pollemus, horrescimus, circumspicimus, emendat." Luther preached his first sermon in the convent of the Augustine monks before venturing to present himself before the public. Spenser says that when he entered the pulpit for the first time he felt as though he were being led to the place of execution. Moeves testifies that he trembled far more while preaching his first sermon than when listening to the thunder of his first battle.

Criticism may follow the sermon of the young preacher, but it should not be allowed to intimidate him beforehand. It is, moreover, a fact that he only is able to feel and hear himself into the real spirit of a sermon who gladly and frequently listens to the sermons of other men. One of the faults of our surfeited age consists in its unwillingness to hear other than distinguished orators. Something may be learned from every sermon, even though it be a poor one. But there is no objection to our becoming acquainted with what is best and most perfect whenever opportunity is afforded. In this direction the rich sermon literature of our English theology is of great assistance. The reading of a sermon is not, of course, equivalent to hearing it, but it possesses advantages of its own. Criticism may be applied with much less restraint in this case than when listening during the hour of worship in the church. The reading of sermons should be elevated into a study to a much greater extent than is actually the case. Artists are directed to examine works of art, and poets are obliged to read the works of other poets. Why should not a similar rule apply to sermons? To construct anew a sermon that has been read by a master in the pulpit, and to search out its effective points, penetrate into the mystery of its profound connexion with the Christian life, and compare its method with that of another, constitutes a valuable exercise for young ministers of the Gospel, and one upon which teachers of homiletics should lay greater stress. Such critical readings, moreover, afford the surest defence against the danger of slavishly imitating so-called "sermon skeletons," in which undertaking it generally happens that the imitators copy precisely their faults and excesses. Better study a great sermon than any skeleton. But do not steal either, or from either.

SECTION XVII.

THE HISTORY OF HOMILETICS.

I. HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN SERMON.

Schuler, Gesch. der Veränderungen des Geschmacks im Predigen, Halle, 1792-94, 3 vols.; and ibid., Beiträge zur Gesch. d. Veränd. des Geschmacks im Predigen, Halle, 1799; Ammon, Gesch. d. Homiletik, etc., Göttingen, 1804, Part I. (the first period from Huse to Luther, with historical introduction to the history of homiletics, from the rise of Christianity down to the beginning of the fifteenth century); Schmidt, Kurzer Abriss d. Gesch. d. geistl. Beredsamkeit u. Homiletik, Jena, 1790; Schuderoff, Vers. einer Kritik d. Homiletik, Gotha, 1797; Lentz, Gesch. d. christl. Homiletik, Brunsw., 1839; Paniel, Pragm. Gesch. d. christl. Beredsamkeit u. d. Homiletik, Leips., 1839; Schenck, Gesch. d. deutsch-Protest. Kanzelberedsamkeit von Luther bis auf d. neuesten Zeiten, Berl., 1841; Doering, Die deutschen Kanzelredner des 16ten u. 19ten Jahrhunderts, Neustadt a. d. Oder, 1830; Leopold, Predigtamt im Urchristenthum, etc., Lüneburg, 1846; Marbach, Gesch. d. deutschen Predigt vor Luther, Berl., 1873; Beste, Die bedeutendsten Kanzelredner d. ältern Lutherischen Kirche, von Luther bis Spener (2 vols.), Leips., 1856-58; Al. Vinet, Histoire de la prédication parmi les Réformés de France au dix septième siècle, Paris, 1830; Sack, Gesch. d. Predigt in d. deutschen evangel. Kirche, Heidelberg, 1886; Schmidt, Gesch. d. Predigt i. d. evangel. Kirche Deutschlands von Luther bis Spener, etc., Gotha, 1872.

For English and American bibliography, see below.

The earliest preaching was a κήρυγμα, a declaration, a heralding, and the formal homily was not developed until a system of Christian worship had been constructed, although it did not entirely supersede free discourse even then. Either homilies or free discourses were handed down by Origen, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Eusebius of Emisa, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Ephraem Syrus, Macarius, Amphilochius, and John Chrysostom. These were not always free from the influence of the ancient rhetoric learned from heathen schools. In the Latin Church the discourses of Zeno of Verona, Ambrose, Gaudentius, Augustine, Leo I., and others, are worthy of note.

Preaching declined in the Middle Ages. In the Greek Church John of Damascus and Photius delivered addresses in honour of the Virgin Mary and of images; but the Trullan Council (692) had already directed the clergy to make use of old and approved homilies. In the Western Church recourse was likewise had at first to collections, postils, i. e., post illa scil. verba Domini sive Scripturae Sacrae, the earliest of which were undertaken by Paul Warnefried and Alcuin, and followed by the similar collections of Raban Maur, Haymo of Halberstadt, and others. These collections were designed to serve as models for imitation in the vernacular. But this design was gradually laid aside as the growth of the hierarchy and of externality in the worship became more pronounced. The power of Christian oratory was henceforth less apparent in the church than in the open air, frequently in the public streets. The preaching in convents was conducted in the Latin language. St. Bernard (Doctor mellifluus), and also the great scholastic Thomas Aquinas, attained to special eminence in this regard. The Begging Friars, from the thirteenth century, gave a new impetus to preaching. According to the historians, Berthold of Regensburg (died 1272), a Franciscan monk, preached to sixty thousand people.

Among the Mystics special importance attaches to Master Eckart, The Mystic Heinrich Suso, and particularly to John Tauler. John preachers. Melicz, the forerunner of Huss, and the latter reformer himself, likewise brought a beneficial influence to bear upon the work of preaching. Chancellor Gerson preached in both Latin and French, and the great Florentine, Girolamo Savonarola, was especially powerful of speech. The fifteenth century brought with it some strange contrasts, the comical being closely connected with the serious. This reflection will serve to explain the burlesque mode of preaching followed by Gabriel Barletta, Olivier Maillard, Michael Menot, and, to some extent, by the excellent Geiler of Kaisersberg. The Brothers of the Common Life, on the other hand, contributed toward the promotion of Protestant preaching.

The Reformation of the sixteenth century, however, was pre-eminently a regeneration of the Christian sermon as based on the Preaching by word of God, Luther himself being distinguished above the Reformers. all others, although Zwingli does not need, upon the whole, to take a much lower place. The personal traits and situation of these men were very different. Calvin was also peculiar, and most of the remaining reformers, as Œcolampadius, Bullinger, and Haller, were good preachers. The time, however, when men attained to eminence in such labours soon came to an end. Luther's "postils" were followed by others, of which still others availed themselves with more or less benefit. Of writers of postils we may mention Anton Corvinus, Brentz, Avenarius (Habermann), Chemnitz, Osiander (Peasant Postils), Matthesius (Mountain Postils), and Dietrich (Children's and Home Postils).

Much insipidity prevailed at the close of the sixteenth century and during the seventeenth, and it was especially common to introduce disputes into the pulpit, and to chastise heretics. But worthy and edifying preachers were not wanting, of whom we name especially Arndt (died 1627), the author of the treatise on True Christianity, Herberger (died 1627), Andrea, and others. The structure of the sermon was now subjected to critical treatment, and all manner of artificial divisions were introduced; for example, the five different usus: (1) didascalicus; (2) elencticus; (3) paracleticus; (4) epanorthoticus; (5) paedenticus. In the end there were, literally, a hundred different methods, and all imaginable fancies Fanciful divisions. with regard to theme, exordium, and division. The want of taste reached its culmination—not, however, in a pedantic form so much as in a mere disposition to drift—in the Roman Catholic Church of Germany, in the person of the eccentric preacher, Ulric Megerle (Abraham de St. Clara, court preacher at Vienna, died 1709), who displayed many excellent qualities, but carried the effort to popularize his sermons to the extreme of triviality, and indulged his scurrilous method until his name became proverbial.

A very different state of things existed in France, where both the Reformed and the Catholic Churches were served by the most celebrated of their pulpit orators at this time. We may mention, of those belonging to the former Church, Mestrezal The French pulpit. (died 1657), du Bosc (died 1692), Claude (died 1687), and especially Saurin, who preached at the Hague, and died 1730. Of Roman Catholic preachers we may name: Mascaron (died 1703), and pre-eminently, Fléchier (died 1710), Bossuet (died 1704), Bourdaloue (died 1710), and Massillon. The fame of these preachers is based upon their classic style, Chrysostom being their model, more than upon the depth and consistency of their Christian sentiments. Fénelon (died 1715), on the other hand, was distinguished for his fervour. After the Huguenots, expelled under Louis XIV., had settled in Germany, the French style, as represented in Ancillon, Abadie, Jacquelot, Lenfant, and especially in Saurin, came to be regarded as a model also in that country. To this must be added the English model, found in the perspicuous and moderate Tillotson, who died 1694.

The preaching now became more mild in its doctrinal character, and gave greater attention to moral questions, besides making use of greater elegancies of style, its leading representatives being found in the Swiss preachers, Osterwald and Werenfels. The pietism of Spener and Francke led, in Germany, to a re- Sermons of the Pietists. newed recognition of the profound conditions upon which the life of the Christian sermon depends. But it was impossible that its influence should conduce to give it an artistic form. Spener's style was heavy. Wolfianism, too, was not favourable to the easy movement of discourse. The mania for definition and demonstration became highly ridiculous, in many instances of even this kind of labour. Rambach (died 1735) represents, in Germany, the transition from the pietistic to the philosophical method followed by Reinbeck, who died in 1741. Modern pulpit oratory, in that country, had its origin with Mosheim (died 1755), who was termed the German Bourdaloue, and whose model was Tillotson. He was followed by Cramer (died 1788), the elder and the younger Sack, Jerusalem, Spalding, Zollikofer, Resewitz, Teller, Bartels, and others. The reflective and moralizing elements constituted the predominant quality in most works emanating from these, in some instances, very celebrated preachers. They also gave increasing expression to the utilitarian theory. Under such influence sermons came to be degraded not only into dry disquisitions upon morality, but even into popular lectures on agriculture, hygiene, and similarly inferior topics. The more strictly evangelical method was not left without representatives, however, who continually asserted its claims in the face of such aberrations. In Würtemberg, Rieger (died 1743) was considered a model, and in Prussia the "divine orator" Willamovius became an ideal for the imitation of Herder.

Herder and Lavater apprehended the task of sacred oratory anew, and came into decided contrast, not only with the more strictly evangelical, but also with the rationalistic, method of preaching, which had its origin in Kantianism, and whose representatives appear in the persons of Löffler (died 1816) and others. Both Herder and Lavater were rather guided by their own genius than by the methods of any school. Reinhard (died 1812) became the founder of such a school, and the representative of a strictly logical method. His sermons, collected in thirty-five volumes (1793-1813), were long regarded as models. They were characterized by richness of thought, especially upon moral questions, clearness and definiteness of expression, force and dignity of style. Their deficiencies are, a farfetched and indirect treatment of the text, and, coupled with a degree of religious warmth, a certain dryness and prosaic rationalism. The method of Zollikofer and Reinhard found supporters among both rationalists and supranaturalists, and, in fact, occupies a theological position in which the contrast between their different principles has not yet been thoroughly overcome.

The more eminent preachers who, while retaining more or less of personal freedom and individuality, followed in the track of these earlier models, were Marezoll, Ribbeck, Hanstein, Ehrenberg, Eylert, Klefeker, Ammon, Bretschneider, Tzschirner, Schuderoff, Röhr, Zimmermann, Schmalz, Böckel, Alt, the Strasburgers Hafner and Blessig, the Swiss Müslin, Stolz, Häfele, Heer, Fäsi, and others.

The oratory of many of these men attained to a higher elevation than that of their models.

Schleiermacher (died 1834) introduced a new life into the method of preaching,¹ as, indeed, he did into theology generally. The prevalent moralizing method predominates ^{Schleiermacher.} in his earlier sermons, the First Collection. But the specifically Christian element comes into greater prominence in his later efforts, though in the manner which was peculiar to himself. His dialectic method has been frequently imitated to the injury of his followers. His sermons deserve rather to be studied than imitated. The sermons of Claus Harms, of Kiel—Sermons and United Postils—are constructed with a larger recognition of the condition and needs of the people, and are genuine models of Christian addresses in popular form, although it is necessary to distinguish between ^{Claus Harms.} the earlier (1808–11) and the later (1824–27). Harms concedes that “much rationalistic sin still attaches” to the former. But this cannot be said of the latter class, or of his “Christological Sermons” (1821), since the controversy that called forth his Theses gave to Harms a place among the most advanced defenders of Lutheran orthodoxy. It is also necessary to separate between an earlier and a later period in the case of Dräseke, whose affectation of originality often destroys the profound impression otherwise produced, although a noble enthusiasm, akin to that of Herder, exhales from his sermons.

Originality, carried to the verge of extravagance, and sometimes of insipidity, attains its highest point in the sermons of F. A. Krummacher. Therein’s sermons are characterized by great rhetorical talent and perfection of style. It may be stated, as a general fact, that the renewed infusion of life into theology restored life and individuality to preaching as well. A long list of names might be furnished of persons who are distinguished by logical keenness, or depth of thought, by intensity or elevation of feeling, or by the power of evangelical conviction and the fire of a newly awakened zeal, which, in some instances, assumes forms of every variety and with every degree of colour. It will be sufficient to recall the names of the more or less venerated persons without dwelling upon the different tendencies they represent—for example, Menken, ¹ Schweizer, Schleiermacher’s Wirksamkeit als Prediger, Halle, 1834; Rhenius, Magdeb., 1837; Rienäcker, in Stud. u. Krit., 1831, No. 2, pp. 240–54; Sack, ibid., pp. 350–85; Lücke, Erinnerungen an Schleiermacher, ibid., 1834, No. 3, p. 745, sqq.; concerning Schleiermacher’s political sermons, see Wehrenpfening in the Prot. Kirchen-Zeitung for September, 1859; Baur, Schleiermacher als Prediger in d. Zeit von Deutschland’s Erniedrigung und Erhebung, Leips., 1871.

Emmerich, Hossbach, Jonas, Sydow, de Wette, Al. Schweizer, Grün-eisen, Tholuck, Nitzsch, Strauss, Harless, Jul. Müller, Tob. Beck, Arndt, the two Hofackers, Krummacher, Ahlfeld, Schenkel, Rust, Palmer, Ehrenfeuchter, Ebrard, Steinmeyer, Conrad, Gerock, Hoffmann, Kohlbrügge, Sander, Mallet, Bernet, Büchsel, Kögel, Harms (of Hermannsburg), Langbein, Petri, Müllensiefen, Kapff, Bey-schlag, Rothe, Brückner, Kahnis, W. Baur, and others.

Modern rationalism is represented, though with various modifica-tions, by Schwarz of Gotha, H. Lang of Zurich, and Hausrath of Carlsruhe.

The sermons of the French pulpit orators, Adolph Monod, Alex-ander Vinet, Grandpierre, Bersier, and Pressensé, and, as represent-ing freethinking tendencies, Colani, Coquerel, father and son, deserve to be studied.

Among Roman Catholics, in addition to those already mentioned, the names of Sailer, Mutschelle, Boos, Brand, Förster, and Kälin deserve to be noted. Werner, of Vienna; Lacordaire; Father Hyacinthe, now practically separated in all but name from the Romish Church, and bearing the name of Loyson; Ventura, of Rome, Gavazzi, and the preachers of Protestant doctrines in Italy, have each, in his day, arrested attention.

For the American and the Englishman their models must be the successful preachers in the English language. In modern times none have equalled the masters in English theology as the makers of sermons. In the earlier English period may be mentioned Far-indon, Atterbury, South, Tillotson, Charnock, Baxter, Hall, Taylor, Beveridge, and Howe, while in the more recent we may mention the Wesleys, Whitefield, Heber, Simeon, Robert Hall, Robertson, Spurgeon, Punshon, Kingsley, Dean Stanley, Farrar, and Liddon.

II. HISTORY OF THE THEORY OF PREACHING.

Christ preached with authority, and not as the scribes. The apostles proclaimed in Christ's stead, "Be ye reconciled to God." No human instruction was needed for their guidance; the Spirit taught them what they ought to say. "It is, therefore," as Beyer says, "a leading duty of theological science to thoroughly deter-mine the nature of apostolic preaching in order to provide a stand-ard for Christian preaching in general." After the Church had been founded, however, and conditions of human arrangement had been introduced, the art of preaching was developed by the side of theological science. Origen laid down the proposition, and secured its recognition, that the didactic sermon is a work of art. The teachers of Christianity, Art of preaching a part of theological science.

moreover, were generally the pupils of heathen rhetoricians, such as Libanius and Themistius, and the theory was accordingly developed on the ground of the old time rhetoric, much in the same way as the ancient Platonic and Aristotelian philosophies were at first applied to the science of Christian theology. Augustine, starting with the recognition of the authority of rhetoric, gave instructions respecting the proper mode of presenting the doctrines contained in the Scriptures. In his Christian Doctrine he called attention to invention and expression in the sermon, Augustine. and followed Cicero in many respects, though with an intelligent apprehension of the real task of Christian oratory. He was succeeded by Cassiodorus, Isidore of Seville, and Raban Maur, in the latter's Clerical Institutes. Alanus, of the Island (died 1203), wrote a Summary of the Preacher's Art, and Humbert the Roman, a Dominican (died 1277), wrote on the Learning of Speakers. The homiletical views of Thomas Aquinas were collected from the writings of himself and others under the title of Treatise for Preachers, upon which followed Leonard of Udine's (died 1470) Tractate on the Fundamentals for Preachers (Ulm, 1478), and Nicholas Barianus of Milan's Sixty-Seven Questions on the Matter of Preaching, which appeared in Boulogne in 1511.

Reuchlin published a work upon the same subject, bearing the title of Book of Treasures in the Preacher's Art (Pforzheim, 1504). The Curate's Manual of the pastor Surgant of Basle, which immediately preceded the Reformation, and discussed the method of preaching in its details, is especially deserving of mention.

Luther was more practical than theoretical in everything, and we obtain only scattered hints from his works, the most valuable of which, in this respect, is Table Talk. This was collected for the first time by Porta, pastor at Eisleben, toward the close of the sixteenth century, and subsequently by Walch. Luther made the discriminating demand that the preacher should be both a dialectician and a rhetorician, but he also recommended that such Luther and a mode of preaching be adopted as would edify even Melanchthon. servants. In 1519 Melanchthon published his Rhetoric, and in 1535 he wrote his Office of Speakers. The Ecclesiastes of Erasmus was also extensively used. Directions for the art of preaching were given, among Protestants, by Hyperius, on the Function of Sacred Assemblies, or the Popular Interpretation of the Scriptures (1553); by Weller, a pupil of Luther, on the Mode and Reason of Address (Norimb., 1582); by Hemming, a pupil of Melanchthon, on Pastoral Instruction, and How the Flock of Christ should be Fed with Sound Doctrine; by Osiander, on the Reason of Address (Tub., 1582); by Andreas, on the Method of Address (Tub., 1595); and by Panerattus (1571). We find similar directions in The Speaker, by Rebban (1623), and the works of Hunnius, Hülsemann, Schleupner, Förster, the elder Carpzov, and Zalansky, the Lutheran pastor at Prague; Müller, in his Ecclesiastical Orator (Rostock, 1670, 4to), Baier, a pupil of Arndt, in his Compendium of Homiletical Theology (1677), and Leyser, in his Course of Homiletics (Viteb., 1701).

Among Reformed theologians we may mention Gaussen, on the Reason of Address (1678), and the Hollanders van Til (died 1713), Vitranga (died 1722), and Hollenbeck, in the latter's Best Kind of Address (1668; 2d ed., 1770). We may also recall Fordyce, an Englishman, who wrote on the Art of Preaching (1745).

After Spener had, in Pious Desires, directed attention toward a truly awakening and edifying mode of preaching, his exposition speedily led to the publishing of textbooks written in harmony with his views, which, in their turn, called forth the opposition of the old-school writers. Thus Löscher wrote his Homiletical Breviary (Viteb., 1720) in reply to Lange's Sacred Oratory (Francof., 1707). There was also a supply of insipid guides to flowery preaching, an example of which is furnished in the Elegancies or Flowers of Orations, written by Christian Weiss, rector at Zittau, whom others followed in a similar direction. Hallbauer, of Jena, on the other hand, became noteworthy at the beginning of the eighteenth century by the writing of his Necessary Instruction in Wisdom in Edifying Preaching. The Wolfian school produced Rambach, who wrote the Elucidation on Homiletic Precepts (Giessen, 1736), Reinbeck, the author of the Outline of a Method of Edifying Preaching, and Baumgarten, the author of Directions on Edifying Preaching (Frankf., 1752). This school carried the mania for definitions in the pulpit to an extreme, and was opposed by G. F. Meier of Halle, himself a Wolfian, in his Thoughts by a Philosophical Preacher (1762). Teller (1741), Kortholdt (1748), Simonetti (1754), Förtsch (1757), and others, issued additional works in this department about the middle of the century. The theories of Mosheim, in his Advice on Edifying Preaching (1771); of Teller, in his Outlines of Homiletical Lectures (Helmstedt, 1763); of Gruner (Halle, 1763); Bahrdr (1773); Steinbart (2d ed., Züllichau, 1784); Marezoll, On the Destination of the Preacher (Leips., 1793); Schmidt, Guide for Popular Pulpit Oratory (3 vols., Jena, 1795-1800); Thym (Halle, 1800), and Thiess (1801); all bear the stamp, in various degrees, of this same tendency with regard to preaching.

This, too, was the period to produce the largest number of journals, magazines, archives, sketches of sermons, and the like. "For," as Palmer observes, "no mercantile house has sent out into the world a larger number of commercial travelers, intended to traffic with the article 'sketches of sermons,' than has the firm 'Rationalism & Co.'"¹ The conclusion of the old, and more especially rhetorical, theory, is formed by the work of Schott, the scientific complement to Reinhard, which, in its own way, is not without value.

Theremin directed attention more especially to the inward source whence oratory has its rise, and a majority of the works, mentioned below, of recent times, have likewise treated homiletics in connexion with the ideas respecting the nature of religion, Christianity, the Church and its worship, as they have been brought out by philosophy and recent theology, and also in relation with the religious conceptions of art. The first among Roman Catholics, subsequent to the Reformation, to construct an Ecclesiastical Rhetoric, was Valerius of Verona (1574). He was followed by Alexander (1701); Gisbert, in his Idea and Practice of Christian Eloquence (1728); Roman Catholic writers. Fénelon, in his Dialogues on Eloquence in General, and that of the Pulpit in Particular (1788); and Maury, in his Principles of Pulpit and Forensic Eloquence (1789). Of German Roman Catholics, those deserving of mention are Ignatius Wurz (1769, 2 vols.), Rudolf Graser (died 1787), Brand, and Zarbl.

THE LITERATURE OF HOMILETICS.

GERMAN AND FRENCH.

- * A. H. Schott, Entwurf einer Theorie der Beredsamkeit. Lpz., 1807.
- Theorie der Beredsamkeit, mit besonderer Anwendung auf die geistl. Beredsamkeit. Lpz., 1815–28.
- C. F. Ammon, Handbuch der Anleitung zur Kanzelberedsamkeit. Gött., 1799.
- J. A. H. Tittmann, Lehrbuch der Homiletik. 2d ed. Lpz., 1824.
- Ph. Marheineke, Grundlegung der Homiletik. Hamb., 1811.
- J. Ch. W. Dahl, Lehrbuch der Homiletik. Lpz. and Rostock, 1811.
- F. Theremin, Die Beredsamkeit eine Tugend, oder Grundlinien einer systematischen Rhetorik. 2d ed., 1837. Amer. ed. by Shedd. N. Y., 1850.
- G. Ph. Ch. Kaiser, Entwurf eines Systems der geistlichen Rhetorik. Erl., 1817.
- J. G. Grotesend, Ansichten, Gedanken und Erfahrungen über die geistl. Beredsamkeit. Hannov., 1824.
- J. J. Chénevière, Observations sur l'éloquence de la chaire. Genève, 1834.
- A. G. Schmidt, Die Homilie, eine besondere geistliche Redegattung, in ihrem ganzen Umfange dargestellt. Halle, 1827.
- W. H. van Hengel, Institutio oratoris sacri. Lugd. Batav., 1829.
- G. A. F. Sichel, Grundriss der christl. Halieutik. Lpz., 1829.
- R. Stier, Kurzer Grundriss einer bibl. Keryktik, oder Anweisung durch das Wort Gottes sich zur Predigtkunst zu bilden. Halle, 1830.

¹*Homiletik*, p. 38.

- † J. Brand, Handbuch der geistl. Beredsamkeit. New ed. Const., 1850. 2 vols.
 † J. B. Zarbl, Handbuch der Katholischen Homiletik. Landshut, 1838.
 J. K. W. Alt, Kurze Anleitung zur kirchl. Beredsamkeit. Lpz., 1840.
 * Ch. Palmer, Evangel. Homiletik. Stuttg., 1842. 5th ed., ibid., 1867.
 * Al. Schweizer, Homiletik der evang.-protest. Kirche, systematisch dargestellt. Lpz., 1848.
 Gust. Baur, Grundzüge der Homiletik. Giessen, 1848.
 † J. Lutz, Handbuch der Kathol. Kanzelberedsamkeit. Tüb., 1851.
 A. Vinet, Homilétique ou théorie de la prédication. Par., 1853. Amer. ed. by Skinner. N. Y., 2d ed., 1855.
 * J. H. F. Beyer, Das Wesen der christlichen Predigt nach Norm und Urbild der apostolischen Predigt. Gotha, 1861.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

- Lyman Abbott, A Layman's Story. N. Y., 1873.
 J. W. Alexander, Thoughts on Preaching. N. Y., 1867.
 John A. Broadus, A Treatise on the Preparation and Delivery of Sermons. Phila., 1870.
 R. L. Dabney, Sacred Rhetoric. Richmond, 1866.
 Daniel P. Kidder, A Treatise on Homiletics. N. Y., 1864.
 Austin Phelps, The Theory of Preaching. N. Y., 1881.
 ———, Ministerial Culture. Andover, 1868.
 Henry J. Ripley, Sacred Rhetoric. Boston, 1849.
 W. G. T. Shedd, Homiletics and Pastoral Theology. N. Y., 1867.
 Abel Stevens, Essays on the Preaching Required by the Times. N. Y., 1856.
 R. S. Storrs, Conditions of Success in Preaching without Notes. N. Y., 1875.
 J. B. Sumner, On Apostolic Preaching and Ministerial Duty. N. Y., 1846.
 L. T. Townsend, The Sword and Garment. N. Y., 1871.
 C. Wordsworth, Outlines of the Christian Ministry. Lond., 1872.
 Yale Lectures on Preaching, by Various Authors, on the Sage Foundation, beginning 1872.
 For further literature, see Hurst's Bibliotheca Theologica, p. 304, ff.

SECTION XVIII.

PASTORAL THEOLOGY (IN THE LIMITED MEANING OF THE TERM).

American Presbyterian Review, Vol. III, 323.

While Liturgics and Homiletics are concerned with the functions of the clergyman in the sphere of public worship, Pastoral Theology in its limited meaning has to do with the direction of the life of the Christian society and of individuals, or, in other words, with pastoral care and the cure of souls. Here, again, it is possible to distinguish between functions whose exercise is largely governed by official restrictions, and others which admit of a greater personal freedom. The former serve to display the faithfulness of the pastor, and the latter his love and devotion. The rules which apply to the former may be grounded in Church government, but those which control the latter must be derived from Christian Ethics. In the case of either it is requisite that experience and practice should complete what the science is able to present only in its most general outlines.

The term is not definitely fixed.¹ Many embrace the whole of Practical Theology within its scope, but incorrectly.

Catechetics is most nearly allied to it of all the branches hitherto considered, being the common basis

The term Pastoral Theology indefinite.

of the entire body of ecclesiastical functions; while Homiletics and Liturgics are not to be regarded as Pastoral sciences. Harms correctly distinguished the preacher from the pastor. Only what has respect to the latter is Pastoral Theology. But to what extent is Pastoral Theology included in the domain of science? When Rosenkranz asserts² that there can be no Pastoral Theology in the evangelical Church because there are no special Ethics for the clergyman, and because the care of souls cannot be comprehended under a system of rules, and when he even terms it "a beginning of priestcraft," and charges it with amounting simply to "a guide to hypocrisy," and to "a system of belittling tricks which destroy the life of a true devotion," or "a low desire for the display of priestly greatness," his mind is evidently fixed upon the abuse of Pastoral Theology. There is certainly no special system of Ethics for the clergy; but a circle of special duties belonging to his calling exists for the minister as for any other man—duties devolved on him by reason of his office, or by a proper estimate of the position to which God has assigned him.

Is Pastoral Theology a science.

The function of Pastoral Theology is to determine what may be justly required of the minister, and what he must accept, as belonging within the sphere of his calling. This reaches over into Ecclesiastical Law. But matters which the clergyman in the exercise of his independent choice imposes on himself also need to be more specially and thoroughly discussed than is possible in the field of Ethics, where only the general principles which bear upon such matters are set forth. The chapter on good judgment, or, if it be preferred, on wisdom, i. e., genuine moral skill in conducting matters with reference to known ends, or in laying hold upon the appropriate means, covers a very broad field, which admits of being described in conformity with ethical principles, even though it cannot be comprehended within abstract rules. Mere book-learning will not, of course, be sufficient for that end; the individual judgment is required to perform most of the work. But the judgment may be directed and quickened, and in this the experience of other ministers becomes a valuable aid, though it cannot by any means be regarded as absolutely regulative.

Pastoral duties best learned from experience.

¹ On the word pastor, see Vinet, Pastoral Theol., Int., p. 1.

² Preface to the first edition of the Encyklopädie, p. xxxi, and second edition, p. 352. On the other hand, compare Schleiermacher, § § 299–308; Harms, III, p. 26–27, and especially Vinet, Theol. Past., p. 236, egg.

A collection of clerical anecdotes is, however, not yet a Pastoral Theology. Cases are never exactly parallel to each other, and a method which was adapted to the circumstances of a particular time and place will not be appropriate to a different time and place. But it is meritorious to point out how experience may be utilized, even to the student. If the name of science be denied to this loving apostolical service, which the gray-haired veteran in the office renders to inexperienced youth, we shall not delay to argue the question. We personally believe that at this point the wisdom of the professional chair reaches its limit, and that Pastoral Theology may be learned to better advantage at the hands of a guide who has been tested in the spiritual office than in the lecture-room. It will perhaps be necessary, after all, to admit, with Palmer, that Pastoral Theology, as such, is not a science, and that its substantial difference from Practical Theology consists in that fact. It contains consilia rather than pæcepta, and "its partially casuistical nature prevents its incorporation with any well-constructed organism." Theological science is required, nevertheless, to mark out in their broad outlines the paths over which the Pastoral life must move.¹ This becomes so much the more necessary at the close of the course of theological study, because so many students fail to find the bridge which leads over from the school into actual life. Pastoral Theology is required to build that bridge, and to furnish the future shepherd with staff and ring or confer upon him his spiritual investiture.

If it be now required that the field of pastoral duty belonging to the minister be outlined in so far as it may be theoretically determined in advance, it will be necessary to distribute his functions over three distinct departments, in each of which a further distinction may be made between the predominantly official and the free individual action, although the one reaches over into the other, as in the following scheme:

¹ "A better Pastoral Theology will be produced only when the Christian and the systematic interests shall mutually recognize and support each other."—Schweizer.

1. THE RELATION OF THE PASTOR TO THE CONGREGATION AS A WHOLE.

a. The pastor as the ordained head of the congregation.

As presbyter, κατ' ἐξουσίαν, the pastor is placed at the head of the congregation, and to him, therefore, belongs the guidance (κυβέρνησις) of the Church, and the administration of Church order and discipline, in which work he must have the co-operation of the Church, subject to the provisions of the laws in force in his particular communion. Here we enter upon the department of Ecclesiastical Law. But where the laws do not come to his assistance, the free impulses of love will lead him to let his light shine as he walks before his people and to approve himself as a faithful shepherd of the flock. Especially will he rejoice in every thing that is good which springs up among his people, even though it be not prescribed by superior authority; and, while he will take his stand in opposition to the unhealthful manifestations of a misled piety he will gladly co-operate in every work which gives shape to religious life, and will assist in preparing the way for such work.

The pastor as the head of the congregation.

b. The pastor in his personal relation to his people.

The Christian minister in charge of a congregation has duties to perform as important as preaching. He is the shepherd of his flock, and should know his people in their wants, cares, burdens, and griefs. It is his duty to show a reasonable personal interest in them; he, of all men, should rejoice with them that rejoice, and weep with them that weep. Hoppin lays down the principle that the "minister should become personally acquainted with every one of his people." This is not in every case practicable, especially in large cities, but at least he "should strive to know something of their varieties of character, their peculiarities of disposition, their mental maladies and speculative opinions, as well as their external history and circumstances."¹ Such thorough acquaintance with the people is secured by means of pastoral visitation, which can never be neglected without injury to the minister's usefulness. Shedd reminds us that the minister is apt to be deficient on the one or the other side of this double character of preacher and pastor, but advises him to make it his aim to "perfect himself in both respects."²

c. The minister as related to the administration of charities within the territory of his congregation.

How far should ministering to the necessities of the poor (δια- κοινὰ τῆς τροπῆς) be placed in the hands of him who is charged with the ministry of the word? (Compare Acts vi.) The mechanical duties may more readily be performed by other persons which was the original work of the diaconate; but he will not be able to withdraw from the work of general supervision. In cases, moreover, in which he is relieved from the keeping of accounts, he will show himself so much the more efficiently a father to the poor from choice.

¹ Office and Work of the Christian Ministry. By Jas. M. Hoppin. Pp. 533, 534.

² Pastoral Theology, p. 390.

2. THE RELATION OF THE PASTOR TO THE FAMILY.

This, too, is partly official, and determined by his position in the Church, and partly independent. The relations of the minister to the family assume an official form most frequently in connection with special events, which belong properly to this section, and only

Marriage. in part to the departments of Liturgics and Homiletics. The solemnizing of marriage, for instance, is a public ecclesiastical ceremony. Baptism, more than other ser-

Baptism. vices connected with the family, passes beyond the limits of the home circle, and becomes a public service of the Church. If baptism be administered at the house, the ceremony should not degenerate into a mere sentimental family festival, but should confer upon the Christian home the higher consecration of a temple. In the case of a death the sympathy of the Death. congregation is also largely enlisted; but members of the family are as a rule affected more than others, and the position of the minister thus leads him not only into the Church and to the grave, but also to the house of mourning and into the circle of the bereaved. The address delivered should be primarily adapted to the condition of the latter company; for which reason more extended funeral sermons should only be preached when demanded by the extraordinary nature of the case.¹ The more nearly perfect the development of piety in a family, the less inclination will there be to avoid the clergyman until a casus mortis shall demand his services in an official capacity; free intercourse with the clergyman will develop itself naturally, whose influence will tend to crowd out of sight more and more the distinction between clerus naturalis and positivus. When, on the other hand, the Christian home is yet upon a low level of piety, even the official visits of a clergyman will be productive of good; and in case such visits should not be formally required, a faithful pastor will know how to secure admission to such homes, not for the purpose of asserting his official character, but in order to aid the family in attaining to that freedom of action which is needed in all the occurrences of life by exciting its love and confidence.

¹ Palmer, Homiletik, p. 389, has adduced an illustration, which shows in a pointed way how contrary to good taste it is to select far-fetched texts for funeral sermons: "And the king said unto Barzillai, . . . Who desires to hear about Barzillai now?"

3. THE PASTOR'S RELATION TO THE MASSES OUTSIDE OF ALL CHURCHES.

The problem of reaching the masses is very simple, if ministers have the disposition to preach the Gospel to all sorts and conditions of men. As the masses, so called, constitute in every country the bulk of the population, it is as easy to find them as it is to find the sun or the sea; and they can be reached by a sincere Christian sympathy, even if at the first they repel our attempts to do them good.

Professor Phelps, of Andover, quotes as one of the sayings of his honored father: "The man who belongs nowhere belongs to me, and I must give account of him;" and Payson showed his readiness to serve all men by adopting as his motto: "The man who wants to see me is the man whom I want to see." All things are not possible to the minister, but the recognition of the fact that the people of all classes and conditions, dwelling in one neighborhood, are a community should be unmistakably made by every pastor and Church.

It may even be said in a certain sense that the aim of Pastoral Theology should be to render the specific office of pastor more and more unnecessary; for if the co-operation of the congregation is required in the public worship, it is far more necessary here. Such co-operation must of course be conceived of as analogous in character to the work of the pastor, and not as counteracting the latter in a separatist spirit. In this field, as everywhere, one extreme leads to the other. Any overstraining of the idea of office can only lead to evil consequences in one way or another. A distinction exists between the shepherd and the sheep in the economy of nature, but not in the spiritual field. The shepherd must not forget that he is himself a sheep belonging to the great flock, and that One alone is the Good Shepherd. And even he is designated in Scripture as "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." There are endless modifications, however, with reference to what has now been said. The duties of a rural pastor will differ from those of the city pastor, and further differences arise from the contrast of conditions in farming villages as compared with those of manufacturing towns, those of inland towns with those of large commercial cities. And, finally, there are also special fields of labor, such as those occupied by the chaplains of hospitals, prisons, orphanages, and of troops in garrison or in the field, all of which require a special theory, and all of which likewise require a suitable man, endowed with all the necessary qualities for his position.

SECTION XIX.

PRACTICAL SCIENCES AUXILIARY TO PASTORAL THEOLOGY.

A true insight into the conditions of the different spheres of life, and a scientific apprehension of their character, are necessary to the clergyman, because his duties everywhere reach over into the various relations of life. He will therefore need to become acquainted with various forms of knowledge which lie outside of the different departments of strictly theological science, and hence outside of Pastoral Theology as well, but which nevertheless involve a practical character. Among such forms we reckon Pedagogics, the theory of education, the theory of public charities, psychical, and, to some extent, also physical, therapeutics.

These matters certainly lie beyond the range of studies prescribed for the theologian, as such, and remarks like the above cannot, therefore, be intended to urge the incorporation of such branches with the theological course.¹ But it is important, in view of the practical nature of the future calling, that the conditions among which that calling must be exercised should at least be known. If the clergyman should be required to share in the supervision of Christian schools, and to express his judgment upon school matters in general, it will be necessary that he should be acquainted with the principles involved; and an additional argument arises from the fact that catechetics stand

The pastor should be a practical man.

¹ It has been wittily observed that they constitute "Pontius in the Credo" (comp. Graf, Prakt. Theol., p. 174). Very well; but a hint which prevents the inquirer from being sent from Pontius to Pilate, and gives him the necessary information at once, can do no harm. Our idea does not require that lectures should be delivered upon all such topics; many things may be preserved for the future ad notam. Harms asks his hearers (Pastor, p. 16): "Can you estimate architectural plans correctly? Can you draft a lease? Do you know what amount of clover seed should be sown to the acre? Can you deal roughly with lazy artisans employed upon your house at the expense of the Church?" We are entirely agreed with Schweizer that Theology proper has no answer to give to questions of this kind; but such questions are not so much out of place as may at first sight be supposed, and constitute interrogation points which in their appropriate sphere serve to show the way beyond the borders of a different territory.

connected with pedagogics. If he is to render substantial aid in the department of public charities he will not find questions relating to pauperism, now so frequently discussed, to be wholly foreign to his position. It will be necessary that he should learn to know the sources of poverty which lie in existing social conditions, if he is to aid in bringing it to an end; and for this reason a course in Political Economy, for instance, might be recommended to the theologian, in so far as it relates to the amelioration of pauperism. The clergyman will also need to understand the nature of the forms of business if he would be competent to estimate their influence over the physical, social, and moral welfare of the people. The opinion of religious teachers respecting the mighty progress of industrial enterprises in our day, for instance, is not an unimportant matter, for the latter not infrequently come into conflict with the Christian life, in appearance, at least, as appears from the low degree to which interest in the Church has sunken in a majority of manufacturing towns, the neglect of the Sabbath, and of Christian schools, and the exclusive attention given to business, the fashions, luxury, and recreations. Can any thing be accomplished with reference to such matters by merely protesting against the spirit of the age, while unable to resist its progress? And is not the cultivated clergyman compelled to learn the character of the time, with its requirements and its needs, if he would successfully deal with its excrescences and perverted tendencies? Will he not be compelled to devise methods of relief for breadless sufferers who complain that they lack remunerative employment? But all this can be accomplished only when he has obtained an insight into the conditions of the time.

SECTION XX.

THE METHOD OF PASTORAL THEOLOGY.

The Seminary and Vicariate.

L. Hüffell, über die Errichtung praktischer Institute zur Ausbildung der angehenden evangel. Geistlichen; Eine Vorarbeit für die bevorstehende badnische Generalsynode und zugleich allen Regierungen gewidmet, denen das Wohl der protestantischen Kirche am Herzen liegt. Karlsruhe, 1831; Hupfeld a. a. O. S. 52-55; Derselbe: "Ist die Bildung, welche Theologen auf der Universität erhalten, auch ausreichend für ihren Seelsorgerberuf?" in den Annalen der gesammten Theologie und christl. Kirche, Jahrg., 1838; Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit; one of the best exhibitions of practical pastoral life extant in English. See also J. W. Alexander's Thoughts on Preaching, p. 125, et seq.

The student will not be able to do more in the period devoted to academical instruction than to secure a clear understanding of the task of Pastoral Theology in its general outlines, and to cultivate a sympathy for its work. The appropriate school for this, and all other practical accomplishments, will be found either in the seminary or in the period of candidature which opens the way to the exercise of official functions. A practical school affording valuable aid in the work of preparation during the years of candidacy, is found in frequent intercourse with people belonging to different classes in society, and particularly in associating with experienced clergymen, in observing the signs of the times, in aiding to carry forward the objects of the numerous associations for Christian work; and a further special aid will be found in the reading of the biographies of eminent pastors.

Aids to a preparation for the pastorate.

To provide a bare sketch of Pastoral Theology is all that theory can accomplish; and it is therefore a question what shall be done to furnish a thorough practical training supplementary to that of the schools? Medical men have their hospitals and their clinics; should not something similar be provided for theologians? The proposition is not devoid of difficult considerations. At this point we come to consider the practical or professional seminary which may exist under diverse conditions, either as forming a part of the university, or as entirely distinct from it. It might be asked whether the monastic aspect which seminary training may assume does not tend to unfit rather than to qualify for actual life; whether theory does not in this, as in other respects, predominate over practice. Every thing will depend upon the spirit which pervades the different seminaries.

What shall be done for practical training?

The testimonies of persons who are familiar with such institutions are in their favor. But it is certain that even the seminary can produce no ready made preacher and pastor. It merely serves to lead over from the college or university into practical life; and lectures upon practical branches of study, which are often entirely too inadequate as delivered at the university, are certainly in place here. But who is to lead the seminary student to the bedside of the sick, or to the dwellings of the poor? Who will furnish him with opportunities for intercourse with farmers, or for studying life in its manifold conditions? Such considerations have led some minds in Europe to discuss the idea of founding seminaries in rural regions which should not be placed under the direction of professors, but of experienced and practical pastors. Such seminaries for Protestant clergyman would become a kind of model and metropolitan pastorates, from which surrounding villages and dependent churches might receive spiritual service, and to which the preachers might return, bringing new experiences, as bees bring honey to their cells. But it is to be questioned whether such a scheme could be carried practically into effect.

Value and limitations of the seminary.

Every candidate for the ministry should consider it a duty to visit clergymen in their fields of labor, and to be made acquainted with the duties of his station, though it should be at first merely as a non-participating observer. The preaching of a trial sermon, or the conduct of a catechization will be sufficient to entitle the youthful clergyman to enter a Christian home in the company of the resident pastor, or to visit the sick. Journeys of limited extent, and simple excursions, even, may likewise yield fruit, when it is sought after; and upon this, as other points, reading must be employed to take the place of personal observation when the latter is deficient. The reading of good popular authors will create an interest for the life and manners of the people, their needs, prejudices, and modes of thought; but it is necessary to guard against the forming of false ideals regarding the life of the people, and also concerning the life of the shepherd of the people. Least of all should one give way to the idyllic dreams of former days in an age like ours, which drives them even from the mind of the dreamer himself. The biographies of faithful pastors which describe their joys and sorrows, their lives, labors, and aspirations, are of greater value than the romantically tinged and imaginary pictures of model clergymen. The former constitute the true legends of saints for the evangelical theologian.

SECTION XXI.

THE HISTORY OF PASTORAL THEOLOGY.

The earliest pastoral instructions are those which were given by Christ to his Apostles (Matt. x), and those which they, in their turn, addressed to their pupils, especially through the pastoral epistles. Scattered elements are to be found in the early teachers of the Church, and in their works. When the care of souls became a priestly and hierarchical function, chiefly through the institution of auricular confession, the instructions provided for the use of confessors took on a similar character. The Reformation urged the importance of the pastoral work in addition to the work of preaching, with special emphasis. Zwingli wrote his Shepherd according to the Image of Christ and the Word of God, and many of Luther's letters afford rich materials for the use of pastoral learners. The literary and more or less systematic treatment of the subject begins with the Pastorale of Erasmus Sarcerius (1558), which was followed by the Pastor of Nicol. Hemming (1566) and the Pastorale Lutheri compiled by Conrad Porta (1582). The guides to pastoral work which

Association with experienced pastors.

The first instructions from Christ.

First systematic treatise.

appeared at a later day were again of a casuistical character (comp. Quenstedt, Ethica Pastoralis, 1678). Gottfried Olearius brought out a direct Pastoral Theology in his Collegium Pastorale, etc., which was written by him at the beginning of the eighteenth century (Leipsic, 1718). Spener's *Theologische Bedenken*¹ unquestionably originated in the recognition, according to the true spirit of Protestantism, of a priesthood which is common to all Christians; but the later Pietism led the way back into the casuistical discussion of clerical ethics, and thereby introduced many inappropriate elements into the practical administration. The Sammlungen by Steinmetz, abbot of Klosterbergen, and the Sammlungen zur Pastoraltheologie by Philip David Burk (1771-78) furnish a beautiful testimony in favor of the better Pietism and its tendencies, especially as displayed in its Wurtembergian representatives. Rationalistic Pastoral Theology took ground in opposition to the Pietistic treatment, making of the clergyman a philanthropic educator of the people, and restricting his field of labor principally to the banishing of prejudices and the elevating of social conditions, and, in the loftiest theories, to the improvement of the schools for the people (Sebaldus Nothanker, by Nicolai). Modern Pastoral Theology is based on more correct views respecting the nature of religion and the spiritual office, and must, therefore, be conceded to have divested itself of much of what Rosenkranz stigmatizes as savouring of priestcraft.

English literature abounds in practical treatises upon the duties of the pastor, although the discussions of pastoral theology on its theoretical side are not very many. Probably the one work which has made the deepest impression is Richard Baxter's Gildas Salvianus, or Reformed Pastor (1656). It was prepared by a most successful pastor for a conference of pastors, and is still a model of its kind. Doddridge advised the reviewing "of the practical part of it every three or four years," and John Wesley made the reading of it one of the duties of his lay preachers. Bishop Burnet wrote A Discourse on the Pastoral Care, and John Fletcher of Madeley, The Portrait of St. Paul. Among modern works may be named The Ministry of the Gospel, by Francis Wayland; Office and Work of the Christian Ministry, by Francis M. Hoppin; Homiletics and Pastoral Theology, by William G. T. Shedd; and The Christian Pastorate, by D. P. Kidder. The Yale Lectures on Preaching contain, both directly and incidentally, valuable suggestions for the right ordering of the pastorate.²

¹ Comp. the collection for the times made by Hennicke, Halle, 1838.

² For the English Literature of this subject, see M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclopedia, vol. vii, p. 787.

SECTION XXII.

THE FURTHER CULTIVATION OF THEOLOGICAL STUDIES.

The study of theology can never be exhausted,¹ more than that of any other science, and hence constant progress in its development is required. The germs of knowledge imparted by the schools are to be thoroughly elaborated, and especially in the years subsequent to graduation. Much, therefore, depends on a faithful improvement of the years of candidacy; but intercourse with the science is never to cease, even after the pastorate has been reached. Theological science can only retain its vitality, however, so long as it is sustained by theological views which have been tried and approved in the conflict of life. Much has been said with reference to the tendency of clergyman to deteriorate as students. There was a time in Germany and Switzerland when more good bee keepers than Church-guardians, more capable florists and cattle raisers than capable trainers of human beings, were to be found among the clergy. They were more skilful in the plant nursery than in the village school, and more at home in their cattle stalls than in the sheepfold of Christ. But the Church derives no greater benefit from one sided philologists and critics, nor from authors in the department of belles-lettres, or even of theology or ethics, if such employments cause the interests of the congregation to be neglected. A pastor who has not yet completed his studies in this regard should prefer not to be a pastor. His studies, in one word, ought not to be separated from his practical life so as to assume the appearance of ἀλλότρητα, but ought rather to be enlisted in the service of the practical life.

This does not imply that he should read only devotional works; at no time is he to remain unacquainted with the progress of theological science, because his entire efficiency must rise and fall with the Church, and Theology is the finger on the dial of the latter. But let him not study merely as a scholar or an amateur, but as a pastor, who has an eye to his congregation, and also to the Church, of which the congregation forms simply a part. Let him carry his people in his heart, and cause them to profit by all which he secures, and let him know how to obtain new seed for the field he has to cultivate from among the finest fruits that science affords. The best means for preserving the vitality of scientific pursuits among clergymen are found, aside from societies for reading, in the conferences of preachers and pastors, and in the more extended ministerial associations which have been springing up in increasing number in recent years. The object for which such associations have been established differs from that of the synods. The latter are directly engaged in the service of the Church, the former in that of the clergy; the latter fall within the department of Church government, the former in that of Church ministrations, to which they contribute a further incitement. The more thoroughly the two elements interpenetrate each other, the better it will be. The school affords training that fits for life, and life in turn becomes a school; and thus it should ever be with each one. Life ripens through conflict, and character, disposition, without which, beyond dispute, there can be no real theological science, are likewise steeled and purified by the heat of conflict.¹

Some wasteful occupations.

All study for the profit of the people.

¹ I have always been unable to regard the period of the university course otherwise than as a time of sowing and collecting materials, and have believed that the collecting must precede the digesting.—Rothe (Studienjahre, in Nippold, i, p. 70).

THE LITERATURE OF PASTORAL THEOLOGY.

GERMAN AND FRENCH.

I. In General.

- C. W. Oemler, Beiträge zur Pastoraltheologie für Landprediger. Jena, 1783.
 P. F. Ach. Nitsch, Anweisung zur Pastoralklugheit für künftige Landpfarrer. Lpz., 1791.
 J. Krünitz, Der Landprediger nach seinen verschiedenen Verhältnissen. Berl., 1794.
 C. B. Kindervater, Ueber nützliche Verwaltung des Predigtamtes. Lpz., 1802-6. 2 vols.
 Sam. Baur, Repertorium für alle Amtsverrichtungen eines Predigers. Halle, 1805-18. 12 vols.
 Ch. L. Mirow, Der Prediger in seinen verschiedenen Verhältnissen. Hannov., 1808.
 J. F. Jacobi, Ueber Bildung. Lehre und Wandel protest. Religionslehrer. Frankf. and Heidelb., 1808.
 Fr. Strauss, Glockentöne. Erinnerungen aus dem Leben eines jungen Geistlichen. Elberfeld, 1815. 7th ed., Lpz., 1840. 3 vols.
 J. G. Tobler, Gotthold oder der wackere Seelsorger auf dem Lande. Aarau, 1820.

¹ The pastor needs to possess a real creative faculty, a certain poetic element (ποιητικόν τι). This creative faculty is primarily related to the sermon, of course, but afterward also to the other departments of clerical labor, to instruction and pastoral care. The clergyman needs to understand the requirements in either field, and must know how to meet them all. If, therefore, he does not carry about with him an adequate fund, he can be, in his capacity as clergyman, only a sorry comforter, a chatterer, or a silent dog. Subordinate, unproductive, and otherwise contracted characters are usually able to make themselves useful in all offices, in some form, at least, but they are not qualified for the spiritual office. To be required, and yet not able to produce, is the most terrible torture conceivable by man.—Vilmar, p. 80.

- † J. M. Sailer, Vorlesungen aus der Pastoraltheologie. 3 vols. 5th ed. Sulzb., 1835.
 W. Schröter, Lebens- und Amtserfahrungen in ihren psychologisch-geschichtlichen Zusammenhänge dargestellt. Altona, 1827.
 C. Wyss, Ueber Antinomien im Berufe des Geistlichen. Bern, 1828.
 † F. S. Häglsperger, Festabende im priesterlichen Leben, gefeiert mit Betrachtungen und Erinnerungen. Sulzb., 1828-30. 3 vols.
 * Fr. Hoffmann, Pastoral-Grundsätze. Stuttg., 1829.
 * J. C. F. Burk, Evangel. Pastoraltheologie in Beispielen, aus den Erfahrungen reue. Diener Gottes zusammengestellt. Stuttg., 1838, 1839. 2 vols.
 E. L. Fecht, Der christliche Geistliche. Lahr, 1849.
 † F. Vogl, Pastoraltheologie. 6th ed. Regensb., 1851. 2 vols. 7th ed., 1855.
 F. Ch. H. Schönheit, Fingerzeige für junge Geistliche bei ihrem Eintritt in das Landpredigerleben. Weim., 1853.
 D. Müller, Die pastorale Seelsorge. Berl., 1854.
 † F. Herbst, Lebensbilder aus der Seelsorge. Augsb., 1854.
 C. Wyss, Etwas vom Kern und Stern der Seelsorge. Basel, 1858.
 * Palmer, Evangelische Pastoraltheologie. 2d. ed. Stuttg., 1863.
 Emil Ohly, Vademecum pastorale. 3d ed. Wiesb., 1872.
 W. Löhe, Der evangelische Geistliche. 2d ed. Stuttg., 1866. 2 vols.
 A. W. Schlag, Der Landpfarrer, oder Erfahrungen und Beobachtungen, Ansichten und Wünsche. Lpz., 1865.
 * A. F. C. Vilmar, Lehrbuch der Pastoraltheologie. Gütersloh, 1872.
 — Kirche und Welt oder die Aufgaben des geistlichen Amtes in unserer Zeit. Zur Signatur der Gegenwart und Zukunft. Gesammelte pastoraltheolog. Aufsätze. Vol. 1. Gütersloh, 1872.
 * H. Guth, Pastoralspiegel. Erlangen, 1878.

II. Ecclesiastical Polity.

- J. H. Boehmer, Jus ecclesiast. Protestantium. Hal., 1714 ss. Vols. i & ii, 5th ed., 1756-89; vol. v, 3d ed., 1768; vol. vi, 6th ed., 1760. 4.
 — Institutiones juris canonici. Hal., 5th ed., 1770.
 Ch. M. Pfaff, Juris eccles., libb. v. 2d ed. Tüb., 1727.
 J. L. Mosheim, Allgemeines Kirchenrecht der Protestanten. Helms., 1760; new ed. by Ch. A. Günther, Lpz., 1800.
 G. L. Boehmer, Principia jur. canon. speciatim jur. eccles. publ. et priv. quod per Germaniam obtinet, Gött., 1762; 6th ed., cur. Ant. Baur, 1819.
 A. J. Schnaubert, Grundsätze des Kirchenrechts der Protestanten u. Katholiken in Deutschland. 3d ed. Jena, 1805. 2 vols.
 G. Wiese, Grundsätze des gemeinen in Deutschland üblichen Kirchenrechts. Gött., 1798. 5th ed., by Kraut, ibid., 1826.
 — Handbuch des gemeinen in Deutschland üblichen Kirchenrechts. Lpz., 1799-1804. 3 vols.
 J. Schuderoff, Grundzüge zur evangel.-protestant. Kirchenverfassung und zum evangel. Kirchenrechte. Lpz., 1817.
 Th. A. H. Schmalz, Das natürliche Kirchenrecht. Königsb., 1795.
 — Handbuch des kanon. Rechts und seiner Anwendung in den deutschen evangel. Kirchen. Berl., 1815. 34.
 † S. Brendel, Handbuch des kathol. und protestant. Kirchenrechts. 3d ed. Hamb., 1839, 1840. 2 vols.
 † Ferd. Walter, Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts aller christlichen Confessionen. Bonn, 1822. 13th ed., 1861.

- H. Stephani, Das allgemeine kanonische Recht der protestantischen Kirche in Deutschland. Tüb., 1825.
- Chr. A. v. Eschenmayer, Grundlinien zu einem allgem. kanon. Rechte. Tüb., 1825.
- W. T. Krug, Das Kirchenrecht nach den Grundsätzen der Vernunft und im Lichte des Christenthums dargestellt. Lpz., 1826.
- J. G. Pahl, Das öffentl. Recht der evangel.-luther. Kirche in Deutschland kritisch dargestellt. Tüb., 1827.
- † C. A. v. Droste-Hülshoff, Grundsätze des gemeinen Kirchenrechts der Katholiken und Evangelischen. Münster, 1832–35. 2 vols.
- C. Hase, De jure ecclesiastico commentarii historici. Lips., 1828, 1832.
- * K. Fr. Eichhorn, Grundsätze des Kirchenrechts der kathol. und evangel. Religionspartei in Deutschland. Gött., 1831–33. 2 vols.
- * H. C. M. Rettig, Die freie protestant. Kirche oder die kirchlichen Verfassungsgrundsätze des Evangeliums. Giessen, 1832.
- J. A. v. Grollmann, Grundsätze des allgem. kathol. und protestantischen Kirchenrechts. 2d ed. Frankf. a. M., 1843.
- † E. W. Klee, Das Recht der einen allgemeinen Kirche. Magdeb., 1839, 1841. 2 vols.
- F. J. Stahl, Die Kirchenverfassung nach Lehre und Recht der Protest. Erl., 1840. 2d ed., ibid., 1862.
- G. F. Puchta, Einleitung in das Recht der Kirche. Lpz., 1840.
- * Aem. L. Richter, Lehrbuch des kathol. und evangel. Kirchenrechts. 2 vols. 6th ed. Lpz., 1867.
- Geschichte der evangel. Kirchenverfassung in Deutschland. Lpz., 1851.
- Otto Mejer, Institutionen des gemeinen deutschen Kirchenrechts. Gött., 1845. 2d ed., 1856.
- * Ch. J. F. Bunsen, Die Verfassung der Kirche der Zukunft. Hamb., 1845. Eng. ed., Lond., 1847.
- H. Thiele, Die Kirche Christi in ihrer Gestaltung auf Erden. Zürich, 1844.
- Die Knechtsgestalt der evangelischen Kirche, oder Roth und Hülfe. Zür., 1846.
- * (Weisse) Ueber die Zukunft der evangel. Kirche. Reden an die Gebildeten deutscher Nation. 2d ed., 1849.
- J. W. F. Höfling, Grundsätze evangel.-luther. Kirchenverfassung. Erl., 1850. 3d ed., 1853.
- * G. V. Lechler, Geschichte der Presbyterial- und Synodalverfassung seit der Reformation. (A prize essay.) Leyden, 1854.
- C. Trummer, Aphorismen über das christliche Kirchenrecht. Frankf., 1859.
- † G. Philipps, Kirchenrecht. Regensb., 1848–64. 6 vols.
- † J. F. Schulte, Catholisches Kirchenrecht. I. 1–3. II. 1, 2. Giessen, 1860–67.
- J. A. Ginzel, Handbuch des neuesten in Oesterreich geltenden Kirchenrechts. Wien, 1857–62. 2 vols.
- K. Kuzmany, Lehrbuch des allgemeinen und österreichischen evangel.-protestant. Kirchenrechts. Wien, 1856. 2 vols.
- Fr. Bluhme, System des in Deutschland geltenden Kirchenrechts. Bonn, 1858.
- Th. Harnack, Die Kirche, ihr Amt, ihr Regiment. Grundlegende Sätze mit durchgehender Bezugnahme auf die symbolischen Bücher der lutherischen Kirche. Nürnberg, 1862.
- C. F. Rosshirt, Beiträge zum Kirchenrecht. Heidelb., 1863.
- Encyklopädie des Kirchenrechts. Heidelb., 1865.
- R. W. Dove, Sammlung der wichtigsten neuen Kirchenordnungen des evangel. Deutschlands. Tüb., 1865.

F. Brandes, Die Verfassung der Kirche nach evangelischen Grundsätzen. Elberfeld, 1867. 2 vols.

O. Mejer, Grundlagen des lutherischen Kirchenregiments. Rostock, 1864.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LITERATURE.

I. Pastoral Office.

Alfred Barrett, Pastoral Addresses: Adapted for Retirement and the Closet. 2 vols.. 3d ed., 16mo, pp. 384.

Richard Baxter, The Reformed Pastor: Showing the Nature of the Pastoral Work. 8vo. N. Y., 1860. New ed., 12mo, pp. xvi, 311. Lond.

John Henry Blunt, Directorium Pastorale. The Principles and Practices of Pastoral Work in the Church of England. 8vo, pp. 456. Lond., 1865.

— The Acquirements and Principal Obligations and Duties of the Parish Priest: being a Course of Lectures delivered at the University of Cambridge to the Students in Divinity. 12mo, pp. 394. Lond., 1869.

Chas. Bridges, The Christian Ministry; with an Inquiry into the Causes of its Inefficiency. 8vo. N. Y., 1868.

John Brown, The Christian Pastor's Manual. A Selection of Tracts on the Duties, Difficulties, and Encouragements of the Christian Ministry. 12mo. Phila., 1837.

Henry F. Burder, Mental Discipline; or, Hints on the Cultivation of Intellectual and Moral Habits. Addressed Particularly to Students in Theology. 12mo. N. Y., 1830.

J. W. Burgon, A Treatise on the Pastoral Office, Addressed chiefly to Candidates for Holy Orders; or to Those who have Recently Undertaken the Care of Souls. 8vo, pp. xxiv, 470. Lond., 1864.

Gilbert Burnet, a Discourse on Pastoral Care. 32mo. Lond., 1849.

Geo. Campbell, Lectures on Systematic Theology, Pulpit Eloquence, and Pastors' Character. 8vo. Lond., 1840.

J. S. Cannon, Lectures on Pastoral Theology. N. Y., 1853.

St. John Chrysostom, On the Priesthood. In Six Books. Translated by B. H. Cowper. 12mo, pp. 239. Lond., 1866.

Adam Clarke, A Letter to a Preacher on his Entrance into the Work of the Ministry. 18mo. Lond., 1868.

A. F. Douglass, The Pastor and his People: Discussions on Ministerial Life and Character. 12mo. Lond., 1868.

C. J. Ellicott, Homiletical and Pastoral Lectures. Delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral before the Church Homiletical Society. Edited by C. J. Ellicott. 12mo. N. Y.

R. W. Evans, The Bishopric of Souls. 4th ed., 12mo. Lond., 1866.

P. Fairbairn, Pastoral Theology. A Treatise on the Office and Duties of the Christian Pastor. 12mo, pp. 386. Edinb., 1865.

Micaiah Hill, The Principles of the Pastoral Function in the Church. 12mo, pp. 456. Lond., 1855.

James M. Hoppin, The Office and Work of the Christian Ministry. 8vo, pp. 620. N. Y., 1869.

Alvah Hovey, The Christian Pastor, his Work, and the Needful Preparation: a Discourse, etc. 18mo. Boston, 1857.

Heman Humphrey, Thirty-four Letters to a Son in the Ministry. 12mo. Amherst, 1842.

John Angel James, An Earnest Ministry the Want of the Times. 12mo. N. Y., 1849.

Daniel P. Kidder, The Christian Pastorate: its Character, Responsibilities, and Duties. 12mo, pp. 569. N. Y., 1871.

Wm. Meade, Lectures on the Pastoral Office: Delivered to the Students of the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va. 8vo, pp. 241. N. Y., 1849.

- Thomas Murphy, Pastoral Theology; the Pastor in the Various Duties of his Office. 8vo, pp. 509. Phila.
- Ashton Oxenden, The Pastoral Office: its Duties, Difficulties, Privileges, and Prospects. 12mo. Lond., 1864.
- Edwards A. Park, The Preacher and Pastor, by Fénelon, Herbert, Baxter, and Campbell. Edited and Accompanied by an Introductory Essay. 12mo. N. Y., 1849.
- Joseph Parker, Ad Clerum; Advices to a Young Preacher. 16mo, pp. 266. Boston, 1871.
- Pastoral Letters from the House of Bishops to the Clergy and Members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. 12mo. Phila., 1845.
- W. S. Plumer, Hints and Helps in Pastoral Theology. 12mo, pp. 381. N. Y., 1874.
- Enoch Pond, The Young Pastor's Guide; or, Lectures on Pastoral Duties. 16mo, pp. 377. Bangor, 1844.
- William G. T. Shedd, Homiletics and Pastoral Theology. 8th ed., 8vo, pp. 429. N. Y., 1870.
- George Smith, The Doctrine of the Christian Pastorate. 8vo, pp. 123. Lond., 1851.
- Edward Spooner, Pastor and People; or, Incidents in the Every-Day Life of a Clergyman. 16mo, pp. 260. N. Y., 1865.
- James Stewart Wilson, The Life, Education, and Wider Culture of the Christian Ministry: its Sources, Methods, and Aims. Lectures delivered at Aberdeen, etc. 8vo, pp. 284. Lond., 1882.
- Henry Thompson, Pastoralia. A Manual of Helps for Parochial Clergy of the United Church of England and Ireland. 2d ed., 12mo, pp. 263. Lond., 1832.
- Tracts on Ministerial Duties. 5th ed., 8vo, pp. 443. Oxford, 1843.
- J. J. Van Oosterzee, Practical Theology. N. Y., 1879.
- A. Vinet, Pastoral Theology. 12mo, pp. 387. N. Y., 1854.
- Francis Wayland, Letters on the Ministry of the Gospel. 16mo, pp. 210. Boston, 1863.
- William Wisner, Incidents in the Life of a Pastor. 12mo, pp. 316. N. Y., 1851.

II. Ecclesiastical Law.

- L. Coleman, Manual on Prelacy and Ritualism. Phila., 1867.
- W. J. Henry and W. L. Harris, Ecclesiastical Law and Rules of Evidence. 8vo, pp. 511. Cin., 1879.
- Charles Hodge, Discussions in Church Polity. From Contributions to the Princeton Review. 8vo, pp. xi, 532. N. Y., 1878.
- Murray Hoffman, The Ritual Law of the Church; with its Application to the Communion and Baptismal Offices. N. Y., 1872.
- Ecclesiastical Law in the State of New York. N. Y., 1868.
- Sandford Hunt, Laws Relating to Religious Corporations. A Compilation of the Statutes of the Several States in Relation to the Incorporation and Maintenance of Religious Societies. N. Y., 1876.
- James W. Joyce, The Civil Power and its Relations to the Church; Considered with Special Reference to the Court of Final Ecclesiastical Appeal in England. 8vo, pp. xii, 240. Lond., 1875.
- William Strong, Two Lectures upon the Relation of Civil Law to Ecclesiastical Polity Property, and Discipline. 12mo, pp. 141. N. Y., 1875.
- R. H. Tyler, American Ecclesiastical Law: the Law of Religious Societies, Church Government and Creeds, Disturbing Religious Meetings, and the Law of Burial Grounds in the United States. 8vo. Albany, 1866.
- F. Vinton, Commentary on the General Canon Law and the Constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. N. Y., 1870.

APPENDIX.

I.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

The following titles, chiefly of English and American works, upon the relations of Religion and Science, may be useful to theological students. The list, though large, does not profess to be complete.

- Ackland, T. S. The Story of Creation as told by Theology and Science. 16mo. London.
- Agassiz, Louis. Contributions to the Natural History of U. S. of America. (An essay on classification. Vol. I, pp. 232. Boston, 1857.
- Methods of Study in Natural History. Pp. 313. Boston, 1871.
- The Structure of Animal Life. 8vo, pp. 128. New York, 1870. (The last lecture is entitled: Evidence of an Intelligent and Constantly Creative Mind in the Plans and Variations of Structure.)
- Anniversary Memoirs of the Boston Society of Natural History.* 1830–1880. Boston. (Contains a Critique of Darwinism by Prof. Hyatt.) 4to, pp. 635.
- Annual of Scientific Discovery.* Edited by Spencer F. Baird, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution; formerly by David A. Wells. New York and London, 1860–62. (Gives frequent notices of the discussions of the antiquity of man, origin of life, etc.)
- Argyll, The Duke of. Primeval Man. An Examination of some Recent Speculations. Pp. 200. New York, 1869.
- Bain, Alexander. Mind and Body, Theories of their Relations. 12mo. New York.
- Bascom, John. Science, Philosophy, and Religion. 12mo, pp. 311. New York, 1871.
- Bastian, H. C. Evolution, and the Origin of Life. New York, 1880.
- The Beginnings of Life. Being some Account of the Nature, Modes of Origin, and Transformations of Lower Organisms. With Numerous Illustrations. 2 vols., 12mo. New York, 1872.
- Beale, Lionel S. Protoplasm; or, Life, Matter, and Mind. 12mo, pp. 160. 2d ed. London, 1870. (A scientific refutation of Huxley's protoplasmic theory.)
- Birks, T. R. The Difficulties of Belief in Connection with the Creation and Fall. 12mo. Cambridge, 1855.
- The Scripture Doctrine of Creation, with Reference to Religious Nihilism and Modern Theories of Development. 16mo. New York, 1875.
- Brace, Charles L. The Races of the Old World. A Manual of Ethnology. 12mo, pp. 540. New York, 1863. (Discusses the geological question of the antiquity of man.)
- Bruntin, T. Landon. The Bible and Science. London, 1881. 12mo, pp. 415. (Aims to show the agreement of evolution with the Pentateuch.)
- Büchner, Louis. Force and Matter. Empirico-Philosophical Studies, intelligibly rendered. Edited by J. Frederick Collingwood. 12mo, pp. 374. London, 1870.

- Büchner, L. Man in the Past, Present, and Future. A Popular Account of the Results of Recent Scientific Research as regards the Origin, Position, and Prospects of the Human Race. 8vo. London, 1872. (Atheistic.)
- Cabell, J. L. The Testimony of Modern Science to the Unity of Mankind. 12mo, New York, 1860.
- Calderwood, Henry. The Relations of Science and Religion. The Morse Lecture, 1880. 12mo, pp. xiii, 323. New York, 1881.
- Chadbourne, P. A. Instinct: its Office in the Animal Kingdom, and its Relation to the Higher Powers of Man. 16mo, pp. 307. New York, 1872. (Argues that man has an instinctive belief in the existence of God.)
- Chapin, James H. The Creation and the Early Developments of Society. 12mo, pp. 274. New York, 1880.
- Christianity and its Antagonisms: Evangelical Alliance, Conf. of 1873. Division III. 8vo. New York, 1874.
- Christlieb, Theodor. The Best Methods of Counteracting Modern Infidelity. A Paper read before the Evangelical Alliance, 1873. 18mo, pp. 89. New York, 1874. (Discusses scientific unbelief.)
- Church and Science (The). The Debate between; or, the Ancient Hebraic Idea of the Six Days of Creation; with an Essay on the Literary Character of Tayler Lewis. Andover, 1860.
- Claims of the Bible and of Science: Correspondence between a Layman and the Rev. F. D. Maurice on some Questions arising out of the Controversy respecting the Pentateuch. 12mo. London, 1863.
- Clark, Edson L. Fundamental Questions: Chiefly Relating to the Book of Genesis and the Hebrew Scriptures. 12mo, pp. vi, 217.
- Clark, Henry James. Mind in Nature; or, the Origin of Life and the mode of Development of Animals. With over Two Hundred Illustrations. 8vo. New York, 1865.
- Cook, Joseph. Biology. 15th ed., 12mo, pp. 325. Boston, 1878. (Wholly popular in its treatment of the subject.)
- Creation, Vestiges of. 12mo. New York.
- Dabney, R. L. The Sensualistic Philosophy of the Nineteenth Century Considered. 8vo. Edinburgh.
- Dana, James D. Manual of Geology; with Special Reference to American Geological History. 8vo, pp. 814. Philadelphia and London, 1863. (Discusses the Antiquity and Unity of the human race.) 2d ed., pp. 828. New York, 1875.
- Darwin, Charles. The Descent of Man, and Selection in relation to Sex. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 409, 436. New York, 1875.
- The Origin of Species by Natural Selection; or, the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life. 6th ed., pp. xx, 458. London, 1873.
- Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication. 2 vols., pp. 494, 568. New York, 1875.
- Dawkins, W. B. Early Man in Britain, and his Place in the Tertiary Period. Pp. xxiv, 587.
- Dawson, J. W. Archæia; or, Studies of the Cosmogony and Natural History of the Hebrew Scriptures. 12mo, pp. 400. Montreal, 1860.
- Fossil Men and their Modern Representatives. An Attempt to Illustrate the Character and Condition of Prehistoric Men in Europe by those of the American Races. 12mo. New York.
- Nature and the Bible. Lectures delivered in Union Theological Seminary on the Morse Foundation. New York, 1875. Pp. 257.

- Dawson, J. W. The Chain of Life in Geological Time. London, 1880. Pp. 272.
- The Story of the Earth and Man. 12mo, pp. 493. New York, 1878.
- Dick, Thomas. Christian Philosophy; or, the Connection of Science and Philosophy with Religion. Revised edition. Illustrated with upward of 50 Engravings, 12mo. New York, 1857.
- Draper, John William. History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. New York, 1875. Pp. 378.
- Duns, John. Biblical Natural Science. Being the Explanation of all References in Holy Scriptures to Geology, Botany, Zoölogy, and Physical Geography. Super-royal 8vo, pp. 1152. London, 1864.
- Elam, Charles. Winds of Doctrine. An Examination of Modern Theories of Atomatism and Evolution. Pp. 163. London, 1877.
- Farrar, Adam Storey. Science in Theology. Sermons preached in St. Mary's, Oxford. 12mo, pp. 250. Am. ed. Philadelphia, 1860.
- Figuiet, Louis. Primitive Man. Revised Translation. Illustrated with Thirty Scenes of Primitive Life, etc. 8vo. New York, 1870.
- The To-morrow of Death; or, the Future Life According to Science, translated by S. R. Crocker. 16mo, pp. 395. Boston, 1872.
- The World before the Deluge. Edited by H. W. Bristow. 12mo, pp. 518. New York, 1872.
- Fiske, John. Darwinism, and other Essays. 12mo, pp. viii, 283. London, 1879.
- Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, based on the Doctrine of Evolution. 2 vols., pp. 465, 523. Boston, 1875.
- Fly, E. M. The Bible True; or, the Cosmogony of Moses compared with the Facts of Science. 12mo. Philadelphia, 1871.
- Fowle, T. W. The Reconciliation of Religion and Science. Being Essays on Immortality, Inspiration, Miracles, and the Being of Christ. 8vo, pp. 404. London, 1873.
- Fraser, William. Blending Lights; or, the Relations of Natural Science, Archæology, and History to the Bible. 12mo. New York, 1874.
- Geikie, Cunningham. Hours with the Bible; or, the Scriptures in the Light of Modern Discovery from the Creation to the Patriarchs. (Discusses the geological age of the world and the antiquity of man.) New York, 1881. (Vol. II is from Moses to Judges.)
- Geikie, James. The Great Ice Age and its Relation to the Antiquity of Man. Pp. xxv, 545. New York, 1874.
- Gibson, Stanley. Religion and Science: their Relations to each other at the Present Day. Three Essays on the Grounds of Religious Belief. 8vo. London, 1882.
- Glog, Paton J. The Primeval World. A Treatise on the Relations of Geology to Theology. 12mo, pp. 194. Edinburgh, 1859.
- Gray, Asa. Darwiniana. Essays and Reviews pertaining to Darwinism. 12mo, pp. 396. New York, 1876. (Aims to show that natural selection is not inconsistent with natural theology.)
- Natural Science and Religion. Lectures to the Theological School of Yale College, 1880. 12mo, pp. 111.
- Haeckel, Ernst. The History of Creation; or, the Development of the Earth and its Inhabitants from Natural Causes. (A popular exposition of the doctrine of Evolution.) Translated by E. Ray Lancaster. 2 vols., pp. 408, 374. London, 1876.
- Harcourt, L. V. The Doctrine of the Deluge, Vindicating the Scriptural Account from the Doubts which have been recently cast upon it by Geological Speculations. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1838.

- Harris, John. Man Primeval; or, the Constitution and Primitive Condition of the Human Being. 12mo. Boston, 1870.
- The Pre-Adamite Earth. Contributions to Theological Science. 5th ed., 12mo. pp. 300. Boston, 1857.
- Heard, J. B. The Tripartite Nature of Man: Spirit, Soul, and Body. 12mo, pp. xxiv, 374. Edinburgh, 1870.
- Hedge, Frederic Henry. The Primeval World of Hebrew Tradition. 12mo, pp. 233. Boston, 1870.
- Henslow, George. The Theory of Evolution and the Application of the Principles of Evolution to Religion. Pp. 220. London, 1873.
- Hill, Thomas. Geometry and Faith. A Supplement to the Ninth Bridgewater Treatise. 3d ed. greatly enlarged. 12mo, pp. 109. Boston and New York, 1882.
- Hitchcock, Edward. Religious Truth Illustrated from Science, in Addresses and Sermons upon Special Occasions. 12mo. Boston, 1857.
- The Religion of Geology and its Connected Sciences. 12mo, pp. 511. Boston, 1851.
- Hodge, Charles. What is Darwinism? 12mo, pp. 178. New York, 1874. (Argues that Darwinism is Atheistic.)
- Homo versus Darwin.* A Judicial Examination of Statements recently Published by Mr. Darwin regarding "The Descent of Man." 12mo. Philadelphia, 1872.
- Huxley, Thomas H. Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature. 12mo, pp. 184. New York, 1862.
- Critiques and Addresses. Pp. 350. London, 1873.
- Lay Sermons, etc. London and New York, 1872.
- The Origin of Species; or, the Causes of the Phenomena of Organic Nature. Pp. 150. New York, 1872.
- The Theory of Evolution. Lectures delivered in New York. New York Tribune Extra No. 36. Popular Science Monthly, 1876 and 1877.
- Janet, Paul. The Materialism of the Present Day: a Critique of Dr. Büchner's System. From the French. 12mo, pp. 202. London and New York, 1866.
- Jevons, W. Stanley. The Principles of Science. A Treatise on Logic and Scientific Method. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 463, 480. London and New York, 1874. (Argues that Science as well as Religion rests on probable evidence; and that there is no necessary antagonism between Science and Theology.)
- Kurtz, John Henry. The Bible and Astronomy; an Exposition of the Biblical Cosmology, and its Relations to Natural Science. 12mo. Philadelphia, 1861.
- Laidlaw, John. The Bible Doctrine of Man. The Seventh Series of Cunningham Lectures. 8vo, pp. 397. Edinburgh and New York, 1879. (Discusses Evolution.)
- Lange, F. A. History of Materialism. With a Criticism of its Present Importance. 3 vols., 8vo. Boston, 1880.
- Le Conte, Joseph. Religion and Science. A Series of Sunday Lectures on the Relation of Natural and Revealed Religion; or, the Truths Revealed in Nature and Scripture. Pp. 324. New York, 1874.
- Lenormant, François. The Beginnings of History, according to the Bible and the Traditions of Oriental Peoples. From the 2d French ed. 12mo, pp. 588. New York, 1882.
- Leslie, J. P. Man's Origin and Destiny Sketched from the Platform of the Physical Sciences. (Argues the consistency of evolution with theism, but rejects revelation.) Boston, 1881. 12mo, pp. 442.

- Lewes, George H. The Physical Basis of Mind. Forming the Second Series. 8vo. Boston, 1880.
- Problems of Life and Mind. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 434, 487. Boston, 1874-5.
- Lewis, Tayler. The Bible and Science; or, the World Problem. 12mo. Schenectady, 1856.
- The Six Days of Creation; or, the Scriptural Cosmogony. 12mo, pp. 416. New ed., 1879.
- Lubbock, Sir John. Prehistoric Times, as Illustrated by Ancient Remains and the Manners and Customs of Modern Savages. 8vo, pp. 640. New York, 1872.
- The Origin of Civilization, and the Primitive Condition of Man. Mental and Social Condition of Savages. 8vo, pp. viii, 380. New York, 1870.
- Lyell, Sir Charles. Principles of Geology; or, the Modern Changes of the Earth and its Inhabitants, considered as Illustrative of Geology. 2 vols., pp. 671, 652. New York, 1873. (Furnishes, in his "Uniformitarian" theory, the ground for Darwinism.)
- The Geological Evidences of the Antiquity of Man, with Remarks on Theories of the Origin of Species by Variation. 8vo, pp. 526. Philadelphia, 1863. Revised edition, pp. xix, 572. London, 1873.
- The Student's Elements of Geology. Pp. 624. London, 1871.
- Macdonald, Donald. The Creation and Fall. A Defense of the First Three Chapters of Genesis. 8vo. Edinburgh.
- M'Causland, Dominick. Adam and the Adamites; or, the Harmony of the Scriptures and Ethnology. 12mo, pp. 324. London, 1868.
- Sermons in Stones; or, Scripture confirmed by Geology. 16mo. London, 1870.
- M'Cosh, James. The Development Hypothesis. Is it Sufficient? 12mo, 104. New York, 1876.
- Martineau, James. Modern Materialism and its Relations to Theology and Religion. With an Introduction by H. W. Bellows. 18mo, pp. 211. New York, 1877.
- Maudsley, Henry. The Physiology and Pathology of Mind. From the London edition. 8vo, pp. 442. 1867. (Resolves Psychology into Physiology, and holds that mind is the highest form of force.)
- Mill, John Stuart. A System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Deductive. 8vo, pp. 600. New York, 1867. (Argues that we can give no account of the permanent causes in nature.)
- Miller, Hugh. The Testimony of the Rocks; or, Geology in its Bearing on the Two Theologies, Natural and Revealed. 12mo, pp. 511. Boston, 1870.
- Mivart, St. George. Lessons from Nature as Manifested in Mind and Matter. 12mo, pp. viii, 462. New York, 1876. (Anti-Darwinian.)
- Man and Apes. An Exposition of Structural Resemblances and Differences bearing upon questions of Affinity and Origin. 12mo, pp. 200. London, 1874.
- The Genesis of Species. 12mo, pp. 296. London, 1871. (An argument against Darwin for a Special Creation.)
- Molloy, Gerald. Geology and Revelation; or, the Ancient History of the Earth Considered in the light of Geological Facts and Revealed Religion. 12mo, pp. 380. New York, 1870.
- Müller, Max. Chips from a German Workship. 5 vols., 12mo. New York, 1876. (The essays in Vol. IV are chiefly on the science of Language.)
- Murphy, Joseph John. Habit and Intelligence in their Connexion with the Laws of Matter and Force. 2 vols., pp. 349, 240.
- The Scientific Basis of Faith. 8vo. London, 1873

- Nott, Josiah, and Gliddon, George R. Types of Mankind ; or, Ethnological Researches. 8vo. Philadelphia, 1854.
- Indigenous Races of the Earth ; or, New Chapters of Ethnological Inquiry Including other valuable contributions. Royal 8vo. Philadelphia, 1857.
- Ormathwaite, Lord. Astronomy and Geology Compared. 16mo, pp. 179. New York, 1872. (An argument against Darwinism as atheistic.)
- Owen, Richard. Paleontology ; or, a Systematic Survey of Extinct Animals and their Geological Relations. 2d ed., pp. 463. Edinburgh, 1861.
- The Anatomy of the Vertebrates. 3 vols. London, 1868. (Chapter 40 is especially important.)
- Paine, Martin. Physiology of the Soul and Instinct as distinguished from Materialism. With supplementary demonstrations of the Divine Communication of the Narratives of the Creation and the Flood. 8vo, pp. 707. New York, 1872.
- Painter, R. B. Science a Stronghold of Belief ; or, Scientific and Common Sense Proofs of the Reasonableness of Religious Belief. 12mo. New York, 1880.
- Paul, William. The Scriptural Account of Creation Vindicated by the Teaching of Science. 12mo.
- Peabody, Andrew P. Christianity and Science. Lectures delivered before the Students of the Union Theological Seminary. 16mo, pp. 287. New York, 1874.
- Pendleton, N. W. Science a Witness for the Bible. 12mo. Philadelphia, 1860.
- Peschel, Oscar. The Races of Man and their Distribution. From the German. 12mo, pp. 528.
- Phin, John. The Chemical History of the Six Days of Creation. 12mo. New York, 1870.
- Poole, R. S. The Genesis of the Earth and of Man ; or, the History of Creation and the Antiquity and Races of Mankind. 12mo. London, 1860.
- Pratt, John H. Scripture and Science not at Variance. With Remarks on the Historical Character, Plenary Inspiration, and Surpassing Importance of the Earlier Chapters of Genesis. 7 ed., revised and corrected. 12mo. London, 1872.
- Pratt, Henry T. A. The Genealogy of Creation, Newly Translated from the Unpointed Hebrew Text of the Book of Genesis. Showing the General Scientific Accuracy of the Cosmogony of Moses and the Philosophy of Creation. 8vo. London, 1861.
- Primeval Man Unveiled ; or, the Anthropology of the Bible*. Crown 8vo. London, 1871.
- Problems of Faith. A Contribution to Present Controversies*. Third Series of Lectures to Young Men delivered at the Presbyterian College, London, by the Duke of Argyll, Professor Watts, Dr. Donald Fraser, and William Carruthers. Edited by Oswald Dykes. 12mo. London, 1875.
- Quarry, John. Genesis and its Authorship. Two Dissertations. 8vo, pp. 635. London and Edinburgh, 1866. (Argues that revelation was not designed to teach any system of science.)
- Ragg, Thomas. Creation's Testimony to its God. The Accordance of Science, Philosophy, and Revelation. A Manual of the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion. 12mo. London, 1867.
- Rawlinson, George. The Origin of the Nations. 12mo, pp. 272. New York, 1878. (Aims to show the harmony between Genesis and the science of Ethnology.)
- Recent Scientific Conclusions, (Thoughts on,) and their Relation to Religion*. 12mo. London, 1872.
- Rigg, A. The Harmony of the Bible with Experimental Physical Science. A Course of Four Lectures. 18mo. London, 1869.

- Ritchie, A. T. The Creation. The Earth's Formation on Dynamical Principles, in Accordance with the Mosaic Record and the Latest Scientific Discoveries. 5th ed., revised, 8vo, pp. 680. London, 1882.
- Sandys, R. H. In the Beginning. Remarks on certain Modern Views of the Creation. 2d ed., crown 8vo. London, 1880.
- Saville, B. W. The Truth of the Bible. Evidence from the Mosaic and other Records of Creation; the Origin and Antiquity of Man; the Science of Scripture; and from the Archæology of Different Nations of the Earth. 8vo. London, 1870.
- Schmidt, Oscar. The Doctrine of Descent and Darwinism. Pp. 334. London, 1875.
- Science and the Gospel; or, the Church and the Nations. A Series of Essays on Great Catholic Questions. 12mo. London, 1870.
- Science and Revelation. A Series of Lectures in Reply to the Theories of Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, Spencer, etc. Lectures delivered in Belfast in 1874-75. Belfast and New York, 1875.
- Sewall, J. B. Evenings with the Bible and Science. 16mo, pp. 151. Boston and New York, 1864.
- Sewell, William. Christian Vestiges of Creation. 12mo. Oxford, 1861.
- Shields, Charles W. Religion and Science in their Relations to Philosophy. 8vo. New York, 1875.
- The Final Philosophy. A System of Perfectible Knowledge, issuing from the Harmony of Science and Religion. 8vo, pp. 609. New York, 1877.
- Smith, John Pye. Geology and Scripture; or, the Relation between the Holy Scriptures and Geological Science. 12mo, pp. 364. New York, 1840.
- Smyth, Thomas. The Unity of the Human Races proved to be the Doctrine of Scripture, Reason, and Science. 12mo. New York, 1850.
- Smyth, William W. The Bible and the Doctrine of Evolution. Being a Complete Synthesis of their Truth, and giving a Sure Scientific Basis for the Doctrines of Scripture. 12mo. London, 1873.
- Southall, James T. The Recent Origin of Man, as Illustrated by Geology and the Modern Science of Prehistoric Archæology. 8vo, pp. 606. Philadelphia, 1875.
- Spencer, Herbert. First Principles of a New System of Philosophy. 12mo, pp. 503. New York, 1864. (The fifth chapter attempts a reconciliation of Religion and Science.
- The Principles of Biology. 2 vols., pp. 492, 569. New York, 1871.
- St. Clair, George. Darwinism and Design; or, Creation by Evolution. Pp. 359. London, 1873.
- Stirling, James H. As Regards Protoplasm. In relation to Prof. Huxley's Essay on the Physical Basis of Life. 18mo, pp. 71. New Haven, 1870.
- Thompson, Joseph P. Man in Genesis and in Geology; or, the Biblical Account of Man's Creation tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Antiquity. 12mo, pp. 149. New York, 1870.
- Tullidge, Henry. Triumphs of the Bible, with the Testimony of Science to its Truth. 12mo, pp. 439. New York, 1863.
- Tyndall, Professor John. Fragments of Science for Unscientific People. A Series of Detached Essays, Lectures, and Reviews. New York. 12mo, pp. 422. 1871. (The second essay discusses prayer and natural law; the sixth, the scope and limit of scientific materialism.)
- Venn, J. On some of the Characteristics of Belief, Scientific and Religious. (Hulsean Lectures for 1869.) 8vo. London, 1870.
- Wallace, Alfred Russell. Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection. 2d ed., pp. 384. New York, 1869.

- Wallace, Alfred Russell. The Geographical Distribution of Species, etc. 2 vols., pp. 607, 503. New York, 1876. (Aims to apply certain facts in the distribution of species to the Darwinian theory of their origin.)
- The Malay Archipelago. Pp. 638. New York, 1869.
- Warring, Charles B. The Mosaic Account of Creation, etc.; or, New Witnesses to the Oneness of Genesis and Science. 16mo, pp. 292. New York, 1875.
- Warrington, George. The Week of Creation; or, the Cosmogony of Genesis, considered in its Relation to Modern Science. 12mo. London, 1870.
- Whewell, Wm. History of the Inductive Sciences. 3d ed., 2 vols., pp. 566, 646. New York, 1870.
- The Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences. 2 vols., pp. 586, 523. London, 1840.
- Whitney, M. Dwight. Language and the Study of Language. 12mo, pp. 505. New York, 1868.
- Oriental and Linguistic Studies. First and second series. 12mo, pp. 416, 431. New York, 1873, 1874.
- Wight, George. Geology and Genesis. A Reconciliation of the two Records. Commendatory Note by W. L. Alexander. 12mo. London, 1867.
- Williams, Charles. The First Week of Time; or, Scripture in Harmony with Science. 12mo. London, 1863.
- Wilson, Daniel. Prehistoric Man. Researches into the Origin of Civilization in the Old and the New World. 2 vols., 8vo. London, 1865.
- Winchell, Alexander. Pre-Adamites; or, a Demonstration of the Existence of Man before Adam. 8vo, pp. xxvi, 500. Chicago and London, 1880.
- Reconciliation of Science and Religion. 12mo, xvi, 403. New York and Cincinnati, 1877. (Argues that there is no contradiction between evolution and direct creation.)
- Sketches of Creation. A Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in Reference to the History of Matter and of Life. With Illustrations. 12mo, pp. xii, 459. New York, 1870.
- The Doctrine of Evolution. Its Data, its Principles, its Speculation, and its Theistic Bearings. 12mo, pp. 148. New York, 1874.
- Wiseman, (Cardinal,) Nicholas. Twelve Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion. 8vo, pp. xii, 404. London, 1837.
- Wright, G. Frederic. Studies in Science and Religion. 16mo, pp. 406. Andover, 1882. (The seventh essay discusses the Bible and Science.)
- The Logic of Christian Evidences. 12mo, xiv, 312. Andover, 1880.
- Wythe, Rev. Joseph H. The Agreement of Science and Revelation. 12mo, pp. 290. Philadelphia and London, 1872.
- Yorke, J. F. Notes on Evolution and Christianity. 8vo, pp. 296. London, 1882.
- Young, J. R. Modern Skepticism Viewed in Relation to Modern Science. 12mo. London, 1865.
- See also J. W. Dawson's address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Montreal. 1875; John L. Leconte's address before the same, Salem, 1875; Huxley's article on Biology in ninth edition of Encyclopædia Britannica; Professor Clerk Maxwell's article on Atoms in same; Edward S. Morse's paper before American Association in Popular Science Review, 1876; Goldwin Smith's article on Ascent of Man, in Macmillan's Magazine for January, 1877; M. A. Wilder's article on Natural Law and Spiritual Agency, in the New Englander for October, 1874.
- For an account of recent German works on Theology and Science, Darwinism, etc., see Bibliotheca Sacra for April, 1877, pp. 386 and 387, and July, 1877, pp. 577-584.

II.

HISTORIES OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES IN THE UNITED STATES.

The histories of the Churches in the United States are of so much importance to the theological student that we offer here a list of those most accessible. As many of the denominational publishing houses, from which they are generally issued, are not well known, the location of each has also been stated.

GENERAL.

- Baird, Robert. Religion in America; or, An Account of the Origin, Relation to the State, and Present Condition of the Evangelical Churches in the United States. With Notices of the Unevangelical Denominations. 8vo, pp. xvii, 696. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856.
- Religious Denominations of the United States. Their past History, Present Condition, and Doctrines, Accurately set forth in Fifty-three Articles by Clergymen and Lay Authors Connected with the Respective Persuasions. 8vo. Philadelphia: C. Desilver & Sons. 1871.
- Rupp, I. Daniel. History of the Religious Denominations in the United States. 8vo, pp. vi, 734. Philadelphia: J. Y. Humphreys. 1844.
- Sprague, William B. Annals of the American Pulpit; or, Commemorative Notices of Distinguished American Clergymen of Various Denominations, with Historical Introductions. 10 vols., 8vo. New York: R. Carter & Brothers. 1859-69.

BAPTIST.

- Anderson, Geo. W. The Baptists in the United States. 18mo, pp. 72. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society, 1420 Chestnut Street.
- Backus, Isaac. A History of New England; from 1629 to 1804. With Particular Reference to the Denomination of Christians called Baptists. 2d ed., with Notes by David Weston. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. x, 538; ix, 584. Newton, Mass. 1871.
- Bailey, G. S. The Trials and Victories of Religious Liberty in America. A Centennial Memorial, 1776-1876. 18mo, pp. 72. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society.
- Barrows, C. E. Development of Baptist Principles in Rhode Island. 18mo, pp. 104. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society.
- Benedict, David. General History of the Baptist Denomination in America and Other Parts of the World. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 970. New York: L. Colby. 1848.
- Bitting, C. C. Religious Liberty and the Baptists. 18mo, pp. 72. Philadelphia: Bible and Publication Society.
- Cramp, J. M. Baptist History. From the Foundation of the Christian Church to the Close of the Eighteenth Century. 12mo, pp. 598. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society. 1869.
- Crowell, W. Literature of the American Baptists During the Last Fifty Years. Missionary Jubilee Volume. New York. 1865.
- Curry, J. L. M. Struggles and Triumphs of Virginia Baptists. A Memorial Discourse. 18mo, pp. 71. Philadelphia: Bible and Publication Society.
- Hovey, Alvah. Progress of a Century. 18mo, pp. 70. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society.
- Minutes of the General Conference of the Free-will Baptist Connection from 1829 to 1856. Pp. 444. Dover, N. H.

- Moss, Lemuel, Editor. The Baptist and the National Centenary. A Record of Christian Work, 1776-1876. 8vo, pp. 310. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society. 1876.
- Stewart, J. D. History of the Free-will Baptists for Half a Century. 12mo, pp. 480. Dover, N. H., 1862.
- The Centennial Record of Free-will Baptists, 1780-1880. Pp. 266. Dover, N. H.
- Taylor, Geo. B. The Baptists and Religious Liberty. 18mo, pp. 36. Philadelphia: Bible and Publication Society.
- Taylor, G. B. Virginia Baptists. 18mo, pp. 35. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society.
- Williams, A. D. Memorials of the Free Communion Baptists. 8vo. Dover, N. H.: Free-will Baptist Printing Establishment. 1852.
- Williams, William R. Lectures on Baptist History. Philadelphia. 1877.
- Also various biographies of Free-will Baptist ministers, to wit: John Colby, pp. 316; William Burr, pp. 208; Clement Phinney, pp. 190; John Stevens, pp. 120; Martin Cheney, pp. 471; David Marks, pp. 516; George F. Day, pp. 431. Dover, N. H.: Free-will Baptist Publishing House.

CHRISTIAN.

- Summerbell, N. History of the Christians. Dayton, O.: Christian Publishing Association.

CONGREGATIONAL.

- Bacon, Leonard. The Genesis of the New England Churches. 8vo, pp. xvi, 485. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1874.
- Historical Discourses on the Completion of Two Hundred Years, from Beginning of the First Church in New Haven, Conn. 8vo. Boston: A. H. Maltby. 1849.
- Cambridge (Mass.) Platform of (Congregational) Church Discipline, 1648. Confession of Faith, 1680. Platform of Ecclesiastical Government, by N. Emmons. 12mo, pp. ii, 20-84. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society, Beacon Street. 1855.
- Clark, Joseph S. Historical Sketches of the Congregational Churches in Massachusetts, from 1620 to 1858; with an Appendix. 12mo, pp. 344. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society.
- Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of Connecticut; Prepared under the Direction of the General Association, to Commemorate the Completion of One Hundred and Fifty Years since its First Annual Assembly.* 8vo, pp. 578. New Haven: W. L. Kingsley. 1861.
- Dexter, Henry M. Congregationalism: What it Is, Whence it Is, etc. 8vo, pp. 338. 4th ed., Revised and Enlarged. 12mo. Boston: Lockwood, Brooks, & Co. 1876.
- The Congregationalism of the Last Three Hundred Years, as Seen in its Literature. With a Biographical Index. 4to, pp. xxxviii, 326. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880.
- A Monograph. As to Roger Williams and his "Banishment" from the Massachusetts Plantation, with a Few Further Words Concerning the Baptists, the Quakers, and Religious Liberty. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society.
- Felt, Joseph B. The Ecclesiastical History of New England; Comprising not only Religious, but also Moral and Other Relations. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 664, 721. Boston: Congregational Library Association. 1855.

- Government and Communion, Practiced by the Congregational Churches in the United States of America, which were Represented by Elders and Messengers in a National Council at Boston, A. D. 1865. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society.
- Mather, Cotton. Magnalia Christi Americana; or, Ecclesiastical History of New England, from 1620 to 1698. With Notes and Translations by Robbins and Robinson. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 626, 682. Hartford: S. Andrus & Son. 1853.
- Minutes of the National Councils of the Congregational Churches of the United States, from 1821, to 1883. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society.
- Morton, Nathaniel. New England Memorial, with Gov. Bradford's History; an Appendix Containing the Views of the Pilgrims and Early Settlers on the Subject of Church Polity. 8vo, pp. 536. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society.
- Palfrey, John G. History of New England During the Stuart Dynasty. 4 vols., 8vo, pp. xxxi, 636; xx, 640; xxii, 659; xxiv, 604. Boston: Little, Brown, & Co. 1858-77.
- The Congregational Year-Book. 5 vols. 1854-59. New York. Also for Succeeding Years.
- Tracy, Joseph. The Great Awakening: A History of the Revival of Religion in the Time of Edwards and Whitefield. 12mo, pp. 433. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society.
- Tyler, Bennet. Memoir of Asahel Nettleton, D.D. 12mo, pp. 376. Boston: Congregational Publishing Society.
- Udden, H. F. The New England Theocracy; a History of the Congregationalists in New England to the Revivals of 1740. Translated from the German by H. C. Conant. 12mo, pp. 303. Boston: Gould & Lincoln. 1858.
- Young, Alexander. Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers of the Colony of Plymouth, from 1620 to 1628. Boston, 1841.
- Chronicles of the First Planters of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, from 1623 to 1636. Boston, 1846.

LUTHERAN.

- Bernheim, G. D. History of the German Settlements and of the Lutheran Church in North and South Carolina. 12mo, pp. 558. Philadelphia: Lutheran Book Store.
- Christian Book of Concord; or, Symbolical Books of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Translated from the German and Edited by S. Henkel. 2d ed., 8vo. New Market, Va.: Henkel & Co. 1854.
- Hazellius, E. L. History of the American Lutheran Church, from its Commencement in 1685 to the Year 1842. Pp. 300. Zanesville, O., 1846.
- Jacobs, Henry E. The Book of Concord; or, the Symbolical Books of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. With Historical Introduction, Notes, Appendixes, and Indexes. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 429, 424. Philadelphia: G. W. Frederick. 1833.
- Morris, J. G. Bibliotheca Lutherana: List of Publications of Lutheran Ministers in the United States. 12mo. Philadelphia: Lutheran Board of Publication, 42 North Ninth Street. 1876. (Contains notices of many local histories.)
- Schaffer, C. W. Early History of the Lutheran Church in America to the Middle of the Eighteenth Century. 12mo, pp. 143. Philadelphia: Lutheran Board of Publication. 1857. New ed., 1868.
- Schmucker, S. S. The American Lutheran Church, Historically, Doctrinally, and Practically Delineated. 5th ed., 12mo, pp. x, 286. Philadelphia: E. W. Miller. 1852.

- Schmucker, S. S. Retrospect of Lutheranism in the United States. Baltimore: 1841.
- Stoever, M. L. Memoir of the Life and Times of Henry M. Muhlenberg, D.D. Pp. 120. Philadelphia, 1856.
- Reminiscences of Lutheran Ministers. Evangelical Review, v, 515; vi, 1, 261, 412, 542; vii, 63, 151, 377, 527; viii, 105, 186, 398, 501; ix, 1; xi, 202, 428, 585; xiii, 862, 561; xiv, 293; xv, 129, 428, 355; xvi, 470; xvii, 390, 485; xviii, 25, 232; xix, 89, 405, 622; xx, 381; xxi, 24, 171, 374.
- Lutheran Church in the United States. Congregational Quarterly, 1862.
- Strobel, P. A. The Salzburgers and their Descendants: Being the History of a Colony of German Lutheran Protestants, who Emigrated to Georgia in 1734, and Settled at Ebenezer. Pp. 308. Baltimore, 1855.

MENNONITE.

- Ellis, Franklin, and Samuel Evans. History of Lancaster County, Pa., with Biographical Sketches of many of its Pioneers and Prominent Men. Chap. xxvii. Churches of the Mennonites, Dunkers, Reformed Mennonites, River Brethren, and Amish.
- Funk, John F. The Mennonite Church and her Accusers. Elkhart, Ind.: Mennonite Publishing Co. 1878.
- Martin, E. K. The Mennonites. 8vo, pp. 17. Philadelphia: Everts & Peck. 1833.
- Musser, Daniel. The Reformed Mennonite Church: its Rise and Progress, with its Doctrines and Principles. Lancaster, Pa.: Inquirer Printing and Publishing Co. 1878.

METHODIST.

- Annals of Southern Methodism*. 1855, 1 vol., 12mo; 1857, 1 vol., 12mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Arnett, B. W. The Budget: Containing the Annual Reports of the General Officers of the African M. E. Church, etc., with Facts and Figures, Historical Data of the Colored Methodist Church, etc., Together with Religious, Educational, and Political Information Pertaining to the Colored Race. Pp. 136. Xenia, O.: Torchlight Printing Co. 1881. The same for 1883, pp. 154. Dayton, O.: Christian Publishing House Print.
- Asbury, Francis, Journal of. 12mo, 3 vols., pp. 524, 492, 502. New York: Methodist Book Concern, 805 Broadway. 1852.
- Banga, Nathan. A History of the Methodist Episcopal Church. 4 vols., 12mo. New York: Methodist Book Concern.
- Bascom, Henry B., Life of. 12mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Bascom, H. B., Greene, A. L. P., Parsons, C. B. Brief Appeal to Public Opinion in a Series of Exceptions to the Course and Action of the Methodist Episcopal Church, from 1844 to 1848. 8vo, pp. 202. Louisville, Ky.: Morton and Griswold. 1848.
- Bassett, Ansel H. A Concise History of the Methodist Protestant Church, from its Origin. Introduction by William Collier. 12mo, pp. 424. Pittsburg: James Robinson. 1877.
- Bennett, ——. Methodism in Virginia. 12mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Bond, Thomas E. The Economy of Methodism Illustrated and Defended: In a Series of Papers. 8vo, pp. 391. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1852.

- Deems, Charles F. Annals of Southern Methodism for 1856. 12mo, pp 312. Nashville, Tenn.: Stevenson & Owen. New York: John A. Gray.
- Drew, Samuel. Life of the Rev. Thomas Coke, LL.D. 12mo, pp. 381. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1837.
- Elliott, Charles. History of the Great Secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Year 1845, Eventuating in the Organization of the New Church Entitled "Methodist Episcopal Church, South." 8vo, pp. 1148. Cincinnati: Methodist Book Concern. 1855.
- Emory, Robert. Life of the Rev. John Emory. With an Appendix. 8vo, pp. 380. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1841.
- Finley, J. B. Sketches of Western Methodism. Cincinnati: Methodist Book Concern. 1875.
- Formal Fraternity. Proceedings of the General Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church and of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1872, 1874, and 1876, and of the Joint Commission of the Two Churches on Fraternal Relations at Cape May, N. J., Aug. 16-23, 1876. 8vo, pp 87. New York: Methodist Book Concern. Nashville, Tenn.: A. H. Redford.
- Goss, C. C. Statistical History of the First Century of American Methodism. 16mo, pp. 188. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1866.
- History of the Organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; Comprehending all the Official Proceedings of the General Conference, etc. 8vo, pp. 287. Nashville: Published by Order of Louisville Convention. William Cameron, Printer. 1845.
- Journal of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for 1854, 1866, 1870, 1874, 1878, 1882.* Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Lednum, John. A History of the Rise of Methodism in America. Containing Sketches of Methodist Itinerant Preachers from 1736 to 1785, etc., etc. 12mo, pp. 434. Philadelphia: John Lednum. 1859.
- Lee, L. M. Life and Times of the Rev. Jesse M. Lee. 8vo, pp. 517. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- M'Clintock, J. Biographical Sketches of Methodist Ministers. Cincinnati: Western Methodist Book Concern.
- M'Ferrin, John B. Methodism in Tennessee. 3 vols., 12mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Methodist Church Property Case.* Reported by R. Sutton. 8vo, pp. 372. Richmond and Louisville: John Early. 1851.
- Mood, F. A. Methodism in Charleston. Edited by T. O. Summers. 18mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Myers, Edward H. The Disruption of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1844-1846. Comprising a Thirty Years' History of the Relations of the two Methodisms. With an Introduction by T. O. Summers. 12mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Orwig, W. W. History of the Evangelical Association, from its Origin to the Year 1845. 12mo. Cleveland, O., Publishing House. Lauer & Yost, Agents.
- Paine, Robert. Life and Times of William M'Kendree. 2 vols., 12mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Redford, A. H. History of Methodism in Kentucky. 3d ed. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Sherman, David. History of the Revisions of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church. 12mo, pp. 422. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1874.

- Simpson, Matthew. A Hundred Years of Methodism. 12mo, pp. 369. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1876.
- Cyclopaedia of Methodism. Revised ed., 4to, pp. 1081. Philadelphia: L. H. Everts. 1880.
- Stevens, Abel. Centenary of American Methodism; with an Introduction by John M'Clintock. 12mo, pp. 287. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1866.
- History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America. 4 vols., 12mo, pp. 423, 511, 510, 522. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1867.
- Life and Times of Nathan Bangs. 12mo, pp. 426. New York: Methodist Book Concern.
- Summers, T. O. Biographical Sketches of Itinerant Ministers, Pioneers Within the Bounds of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. 3d ed., pp. 176. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Thrall, H. S. Methodism in Texas. 12mo. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Travis, Joseph. Autobiography of. Edited by T. O. Summers. 12mo, pp. 331. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Wightman, Bishop. Life of William Capers, Including an Autobiography. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
- Wood, E. M. Methodism and the Centennial of American Independence; with a Brief History of the Various Branches of Methodism, and Full Statistical Tables. 12mo, pp. 412. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 1876.

MORAVIAN.

- Moravian Historical Society, Transactions of. Vol. I. Containing all the important and interesting papers published by the Society, from 1857 to 1876. 8vo. Bethlehem, Pa.: Moravian Publication Office. E. G. Klose, Manager.
- Ritter, Abraham. History of the Moravian Church in Philadelphia from its foundation in 1742. 8vo, pp. 281. Bethlehem, Pa.: Moravian Publication Office. 1857.
- Rondthaler, Edward. Life of John Heckewelder. Edited by B. H. Coates. 1847. 8vo, pp. 150. Bethlehem, Pa.: Moravian Publication Office.
- Schweinitz, Edmund de. The Moravian Manual, containing an account of the Moravian Church or Unitas Fratrum. Second enlarged ed., with historical tables, extending from the foundation of the ancient Church to the present day. 8vo, pp. 208. Bethlehem, Pa.: Moravian Publication Office.
- The Provincial Digest*. Supplementary to the Results of the General Synod of 1879. Ordered by the Provincial Synod of the Northern District of the Province of the Moravians, held at Bethlehem, Pa., May 18–30, 1881. Bethlehem, Pa.: Moravian Publication Office.
- The Text-Book for 1884*. English and German editions. Bethlehem, Pa.: Moravian Publication Office.

PRESBYTERIAN.

- Alexander, Archibald. Biographical Sketches of the Founder and Principal Alumni of the Log College. Together with an Account of the Revivals of Religion under their Ministry. 12mo, pp. 279. Philadelphia: Presbyterian Board of Publication, 1834 Chestnut Street.
- Baird, Samuel J. A History of the New School, and of the Questions involved in the Disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1838. 8vo, pp. xii, 564. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger. 1868.
- Beard, Richard. Why am I a Cumberland Presbyterian? Nashville, Tenn. 1872.

- Breed, Wm. P. Presbyterians and the Revolution. 16mo, pp. 206. Philadelphia: Presbyterian Board of Publication. 1872.
- Brown, I. N. An Historical Vindication of the Abrogation of the Plan of Union by the Presbyterian Church. 8vo. Philadelphia: W. S. Martien. 1855.
- Centennial Historical Discourses delivered in the City of Philadelphia, June, 1876, by Appointment of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America*. 12mo, pp. 800. Philadelphia: Presbyterian Board of Publication. 1876.
- Crisman, E. B. Origin and Doctrines of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. 2 parts, 12mo, pp. iv, 180. St. Louis: Perrin & Smith. 1877.
- Division of the Presbyterian Church (A History of) in the United States, by a Committee of the Synod of New York and New Jersey*. 12mo, pp. vii, 278. New York, 1852.
- Gillett, E. H. History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 576, 605. Philadelphia: Presbyterian Publication Board.
- Hodge, Charles. The Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. 2 vols., 8vo, pp. xxiv, 576; xii, 605. Philadelphia: W. S. Martien. 1839-40.
- Moore, William E. The Presbyterian Digest of the Acts and Deliverances of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. 8vo, pp. 718. Philadelphia: Presbyterian Board of Publication.
- Presbyterian Reunion: A Memorial Volume, 1837-1871, with Map in separate vol., originally published in New York Evangelist*. 8vo, pp. viii, 568. New York: D. C. Lent & Co. 1870.
- Sprague, William B. Annals of the American Pulpit. Vols. III and IV. 8vo, pp. 632, 886. Presbyterian. New York: Robert Carter & Brothers. 1859.
- The Confession of Faith of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in the United States of America*. Pp. 286. Nashville, Tenn.: Board of Publication of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. 1875.
- Webster, Richard. A History of the Presbyterian Church in America, from its origin until the year 1760; with Biographical Sketches of its Early Ministers. 8vo. Philadelphia: J. M. Wilson. 1858.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL.

- Beardsley, E. E. The History of the Episcopal Church in Connecticut, from the Settlement of the Colony to the Present Time. 2 vols., 8vo. New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1865.
- Caswell, H. America and the American Church. 2d ed., 8vo. London: Mozley. 1851.
- Hawks, Francis L. Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of the United States of America. Vol. I. A Narrative of Events connected with the Rise and Progress of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia. Also an Appendix. 8vo, pp. xvi, 17, 286, 332. Vol. II. History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland. 8vo, pp. 524. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1836-39.
- Lord, Samuel. A History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. 12mo, pp. 357. New York: Stanford & Swords. 1849.
- Meade, William. Old Churches, Ministers, and Families of Virginia. 2d ed., revised. 2 vols., 8vo. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1858.
- Perry, William S. A Hand-Book of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, giving its History and Constitution, 1785-1880. 12mo, pp. 365. New York: Whittaker. 1881.

- Perry, William S. Papers Relating to the History of the Church in Virginia A. D. 1650-1776. 4to. New York: Protestant Episcopal Sunday-School Union. 1870.
- Same, in Pennsylvania, A. D. 1680-1778. 4to. New York: Protestant Episcopal Sunday-School Union. 1871.
- White, William. Memoirs of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America. 8vo, pp. xiv, 474. New York: Stanford & Swords. 1836.

REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA (DUTCH.)

- Anderson, James. Appeal to General Synod of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church on the Change of Name, November, 1867. 8vo, pp. 15. New York: Board of Publication, 34 Vesey Street.
- Bentley, E. W. "The Classis of Orange." An Historical Discourse. 8vo, pp. 80. New York: Board of Publication.
- Brinkerhoff, Jacob. History of the True Dutch Reformed Church of the United States of America. 12mo, pp. 189. New York: Board of Publication.
- Brownlee, Wm. C., Editor. Reformed Dutch Church Magazine. 4 vols., 8vo. New York: Board of Publication.
- Centennial Discourses. A Series of Sermons Delivered in the Year 1876 by order of the General Synod of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America.* 8vo, pp. 601. New York: Reformed Church Board of Publication. 1877.
- Collegiate Dutch Church. Proceedings at the Centennial Anniversary of the Dedication of the North Dutch Church, May 25, 1869, etc.* Illustrated. 8vo, pp. 76. New York: Board of Publication.
- Collegiate Reformed Protestant Dutch Church. Quarter Millennial Anniversary, Nov. 21, 1878.* 8vo, pp. 104. New York: Board of Publication.
- Demarest, David D. History and Characteristics of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church. 12mo. New York: Reformed Church Board of Publication. 1856.
- Ferrie, Isaac. Memorial Discourse; or, Fifty Years' Ministry in the Reformed Church of America. February 26, 1871. 8vo, pp. 38. New York: Board of Publication.
- First Reformed Church Memorial, Schenectady, New York. Two Hundredth Anniversary, 1680-1880.* 8vo. New York: Board of Publication.
- Hartley, J. S. Reformed Church, Utica, New York. Semi Centennial Discourse. 8vo. New York: Board of Publication.
- Matthews, J. M. "Fifty Years in New York." A Semi-Centennial Sermon. 8vo, pp. 44. New York: Board of Publication.
- Minutes of General Synod. Vol. I, 1771-1812.* 8vo. New York: Board of Publication.
- Stryker, Peter. Historical Discourse at the Last Service in the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, corner Broome and Greene Streets, New York, April 15, 1860. 12mo. New York: Board of Publication.
- Taylor, B. C. Annals of the Classis and Township of Bergen. 12mo. New York: Board of Publication.
- Thompson, Henry P. History of the Reformed Church of Peapack, New Jersey. 8vo, pp. 68. New York: Board of Publication.
- History of the Reformed Church of Readington, New Jersey, 1719-1881. 8vo. New York: Board of Publication.
- Wells, Theo. W. Brick Church Memorial, 1699-1877. 8vo, pp. 96. New York: Board of Publication.

- Wells, Theo. W. The Classis of Monmouth, its Members, its Churches, and its Work for Twenty-five Years. A Statistical History, with a Review of the Past, by Rev. Wm. Reiley. 8vo, pp. 30. New York: Board of Publication.

THE REFORMED CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES (GERMAN).

- Gerhart, E. V. Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. XX, 1863. "The German Reformed Church." Andover: Warren F. Draper.
- Harbaugh, H. Fathers of the German Reformed Church. 4 volumes, 12mo. Vol. I, pp. 394. Philadelphia: Reformed Church Publication Board, 907 Arch Street. 1857.
- Mayer, Lewis. The History of the German Reformed Church. To which is prefixed a Memoir of the Life of the Author, by Elias Heiner. Vol. I, 8vo, pp. 477. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1851.
- Russell, George B. Creeds and Customs: A Popular Handbook treating of the Doctrines and Practices of the Reformed Church in the United States. 12mo. Philadelphia: Reformed Church Board of Publication.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

- Bayley, J. R. Early History of the Catholic Church in the Island of New York. 12mo, 2d ed., 1870. New York: Catholic Publication Society, 9 Barclay Street, New York. Lawrence Kehoe, Manager.
- Memoirs of the Rt. Rev. Simon Wm. Gabriel Bruté, D.D., first Bishop of Vincennes. 12mo. 1876. New York: Catholic Publication Society.
- Clarke, R. H. Lives of Deceased Bishops of the Catholic Church in the United States. 2 vols., 8vo. New York: O'Shea, 37 Barclay Street.
- Finnotti, Joseph M. Bibliographia Catholica Americana. A List of Works written by Catholic Authors, and published in the United States. 8vo, pp. 318. New York: Catholic Publication Society. 1872.
- Grants of Land and Gifts of Money to Catholic and Non-Catholic Institutions in New York Compared*. New York: Catholic Publication Society.
- Hewit, F. A. The Life and Sermons of the Rev. Francis A. Baker. 8vo, pp. 504. New York: Catholic Publication Society.
- Kehoe, Lawrence. The Works of the Most Reverend John Hughes, First Archbishop of New York, containing Biography, Sermons, etc. 2 vols., 8vo. New York: Catholic Publication Society.
- Parkman, Francis. The Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century. 13th ed., pp. lxxxix, 463. Boston: Little, Brown, & Co. 1879.
- Shea, J. G. History of Catholic Missions Among the Indian Tribes of the United States, from A. D. 1529 to A.D. 1854. 12mo. New York: T. W. Strong. 1854.
- Spalding, J. L. Life of the Most Rev. M. J. Spalding, Archbishop of Baltimore. 8vo, pp. 465. New York: Catholic Publication Society. 1874.
- The Religious Mission of the Irish People, and Catholic Colonization. 12mo. New York: Catholic Publication Society.

QUAKERS (FRIENDS.)

- Biographies of William Penn*, by Marsillac, (1791,) Clarkson, (1818,) Ellis, (1852,) Hepworth Dixon, (1856.)
- Janney, S. M. History of the Friends to 1828. 4 vols., 12mo. Philadelphia: C. H. Davis & Co. 1859-67.

Janney, S. M. Life of William Penn : With Selections from his Correspondence and Autobiography. 12mo. Philadelphia : Friends Book Association, 706 Arch Street.

Wagstaff, W. R. A History of the Society of Friends, compiled from its Standard Records, and other Authentic Sources. 8vo, pp. 400. New York : Wiley & Putnam. 1845.

SHAKERS.

Evans, F. W. Shakers. Compendium of the Origin, History, Principles, Rules and Regulations, Government, and Doctrines of the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Coming. 16mo. New York : D. Appleton & Co. 1859.

Millennial Church, A Summary View of ; or, the United Society of Believers, commonly called Shakers, comprising the Rise, Progress, and Practical Order of the Society. 12mo, pp. 320. Albany : Packard & Van Benthuyssen. 1823.

UNIVERSALIST.

Adams, John G. Fifty Notable Years. One Hundred Biographical Sketches of Well-known and Distinguished Universalist Ministers. (It also contains the rise and progress of the Universalist Church in America.) Pp. 336. Boston, Mass. : Universalist Publishing House, 16 Bromfield Street.

Murray, John, Life of. Written by himself, with a continuation by Mrs. J. S. Murray. A new edition, with an Introduction and Notes, by G. L. Demarest. Boston, Mass. : Universalist Publishing House.

Proceedings of the Universalist Centennial held in Gloucester, Mass., September 20, 21, 22, 1870. 8vo. Boston, Mass. : Universalist Publishing House.

Thomas, Abel C. A Century of Universalism. Boston, Mass. : Universalist Publishing House.

UNITARIAN.

Channing, W. E., Memoirs of. 3 vols., 12mo, pp. 1400. Boston, Mass. : American Unitarian Association, 7 Tremont Place.

Ellis, George E. Half Century of the Unitarian Controversy, with particular reference to its Origin, its Course, etc. 8vo, pp. 536. Boston, Mass. : American Unitarian Association.

Frothingham, O. B. Transcendentalism in New England : a History. 8vo, pp. ix, 395. New York : G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1876.

Gannett, William C. Memoir of Ezra Stiles Gannett. Boston, Mass. : American Unitarian Association.

Ware, William. American Biography. Memoirs of Individuals who have been Distinguished in the Cause of Liberal Christianity. 2 vols., 12mo, pp. 396, 452. Boston : J. Munroe & Co. 1850-51.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST.

Lawrence, John. History of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. 8vo, 2 vols. in one. Dayton, Ohio : United Brethren Publishing House. (The same in German. Pp. 283.)

Spayth, Henry G. History of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. 12mo, pp. 344. Circleville, Ohio : Conference Office. 1851.

INDEX.

- Adhortatio, the, of Theobald Thamer, 122.
- Æsthetic feeling not the same as religious feeling, 34.
- Æsthetic religion as deficient as a merely legal religion, 21.
- Alexandrian classification of the Old Testament books, 155.
- Allegorical interpreters, Origen the first of the, 246.
- Allegorical method of interpretation, rise of the, 246.
- Alsted, John Henry, the Methodus of, 124.
- America, philosophical speculation in, 78. theological encyclopædia in, 133.
- American Presbyterians, alliance of Churches of the Reformed faith with, 106.
- Angelology and demonology, 426.
- Anthropology, 427.
the doctrine of sin, 428.
- Antiquities, Hebrew, German and English works on, 183.
- Apologetics, 403.
an introduction to dogmatics, 405.
Clement and Origen, 408.
divinity and truth of Scripture involved in each other, 407.
earliest apologetics, the field of, 408.
German apologies, 410.
Grotius and Limborch, 409.
history of, 408.
literature of, 411.
must precede dogmatic science, 404.
philosophy and Christianity, conflict between, 409.
relation of, to dogmatics, 403.
relation of polemics and apologetics to dogmatics, 404.
remote beginning of all departments in theology, 405.
separate science, not yet a, 411.
task of, a twofold one, 406.
- Apologetics and polemics, Schleiermacher's definition of the relations of, 417.
- Apostles, the, 283.
literature on, 284.
- Apostolic age requires separate treatment, 284.
Vol. III.
- Apostolos*, meaning of the term, 283.
- Arabic, a knowledge of, useful to the theologian, 168.
- Archæology, ancient writers on, 180.
classification of the material of, 176.
historical sketch of, 179.
includes more than Hebrew antiquities, 176.
narrowness of the term, 175.
works on, of a general character, 182.
- Archæology, biblical, 175.
related to exegesis and Church history, 262.
scope of, 175.
- Archæology, ecclesiastical, 388.
a history of worship, 389.
history of, 390.
necessarily related to the present, 389.
- Architecture, sacred, as related to Protestant worship, 509.
- Aristides, apology by, 408.
- Art, Law, and Doctrine co-related, 23.
- Artists and legislators the teachers of mankind, 19.
- Arts and sciences among the Hellenes and kindred peoples, 178.
- Asceticism and pedagogics, 461.
- Astronomy not necessarily related to theology, 71.
- Augustine, his instructions respecting the proper mode of presenting Scripture doctrines, 441.
qualifications of the minister according to, 118.
- Auxiliary sciences, the five, 159.
- Auxiliary sciences to Church history, 343.
- Bacon, Lord, strongly against confounding theology and philosophy, 82.
- Baden and the Palatinate, liturgical controversy in, 517.
- Basle and Saumur, the theologians of, 125.
- Bible, The:
constitutes a sacred literature, 149.
ethnography of, 177.
everywhere teaches a God for man, 424.
geography of, 176.
hermeneutics furnishes the key to, 280.

- Bible, The:
 historical form and development of the doctrine of, 286.
 its first exposition wholly practical, 245.
 narratives of, are God's word to mankind, 149.
 natural science of, 177.
 nature of Biblical narrative, 266.
 the object of exegetical theology, 146.
 original languages of, 160.
 presents only a single body of truth, 148.
 providentially guarded, yet subject to human vicissitudes, 203.
 reasons why it needs care in its interpretation, 229.
 reverence for the letter and style of, observable in English literature, 149.
 study of the Bible, relation of encyclopædia to, 147.
 the standard of judgment in Church history, 305.
 tie which binds the books of the Bible together, 148.
- Biblical archaeology, 175.
 history of, 179.
 related to exegesis and Church history, 262.
 scope of, 175.
 the Old Testament, always its principal source, 176.
- Biblical characters, English and American literature on, 270.
- Biblical criticism:
 historical sketch of, 213.
 in the Middle Ages, 214.
 no one need be startled by the phrase, 202.
 objects contemplated by, 202.
 often paltry, 204.
 revival of, in the eighteenth century, 215.
- Biblical dogmatics, the natural point of transition from historical to systematic theology, 144.
- Biography of Christ, history of the, 276.
- Briefe, defects of Herder's, 130.
- Calixtus, separates ethics from dogmatics, 397.
- Canon, changes in the, unlikely, 207.
 New Testament canon in the early Church, 194.
 New Testament canon not formed at one time, 159.
 object of a history of the, 191.
 period of the first formation of the, 194.
- Canonicity, conditions of, 204.
 should criticism consider the question of? 206.
- Vol. III.
- Canonica, the name proposed as a substitute for Introduction, 192.
- Biblical, 191.
- Casuistry, 461.
- Catechetical methods, 488.
- Catechetics a part of pastoral work, 491.
 demands a love for childhood, 492.
 endowment for, mental and spiritual, 492.
 function of catechetics, 489.
 real art of the catechist, the, 490.
 religious nature of youth should be studied, 490.
 Socratic method of, 489.
 work of the catechist, 488.
- Catechetics, 486.
 literature of, 497.
 scope of, 487.
 difference between ethics and catechetics, 488.
- Catechetics, history of, 493.
 affected by sceptical pedagogics, 496.
 authors, leading, between Luther and Spener, 495.
 catechisms, the first, 494.
 early catechetical works, 494.
 Heidelberg Catechism, the, 495.
 Luther's two catechisms, 494.
 "Philanthropic" method of, 496.
 Roman Catholic catechetics, 497.
 Schleiermacher, services of, to catechetics, 497.
- Catechists, the older, did but little theorizing, 495.
- Catechumens in the ancient Church, 493.
- Categories of Practical Theology, 478.
- Causality, twofold law of, in Church history, 303.
- Centurial division of Historical Theology wrong, 299.
- Chaldee, certain portions of the Old Testament written in, 160.
 knowledge of, useful to the theologian, 168.
- Character, formation of, 55.
 importance of, to the theologian, 55.
- Characteristics of Hebrew, 161.
- Characters, Biblical, English and American literature on, 270.
- Christian Ethics, 355.
- Christianity:
 Church, the idea of a, eminently peculiar to, 499.
 destined to develop into a system, 394.
 expansion and limitation of, 297.
 moral power of, the universal, 458.
 not chargeable with narrow Church history, 308.
 Wolfenbüttel assault on historical Christianity, 65.

- Christian language, the New Testament obliged to create a, 170.
- Christian philosophy, conditions of a, 86. the only possible, theistic, 86.
- Christian sermon, history of the, 585.
- Christian teaching: has superseded the old conditions, 298.
- Christian theologians should study the Old Testament, and why, 151.
- Christian theology conditioned by the history of Christianity, 62.
- Deism and Pantheism antagonistic to, 84.
- origin of formal, 64.
- Christology, 429.
- center of dogmatics, the, 429.
- doctrine of the Church on, improperly defined, 430.
- life of Christ the basis of Christology, 429.
- Chronology, ecclesiastical, 353.
- Chrysostom, beginnings of theological encyclopædia in, 118.
- Church, the:
- advantage of groupings in Church life, 298.
 - both external and internal, 296.
 - constitution of the, 297.
 - guidance of the Church the object of theology, 59.
 - historical development of the, 296.
 - must not be excluded from the school, 47.
 - not alone social or theocratic, 296.
 - not merely a society, 295.
 - Pentecost the beginning of the, 295.
 - philosophy in, after the Reformation, 75.
 - sacraments, the Church and the, 434.
 - soul-life of the, 297.
 - the early theological science in, 63.
 - theological tendencies in the early Church, 98.
 - theology and the Church, 44.
- Church Fathers, the, 370.
- Church History:
- acquaintance necessary with Church history of our own country, 311.
 - atomistic mode of treating, 303.
 - cannot be understood without a knowledge of ancient and oriental history, 70.
 - causality, twofold law of, 303.
 - central point of historical theology, 294.
 - centurial division of, wrong, 299.
 - Council of Trent, the, an epoch in Church history from the Roman Catholic standpoint, 301.
 - denominational character of, 315.
- Vol. III.
- Church History:
- extremes to be avoided in, 304.
 - God's word the standard of judgment in, 305.
 - great and exciting events in, demand a separate treatment, 299.
 - great epochs in, 300.
 - historian, the best, in sympathy with the people, 307.
 - history of Church history, 313.
 - individual Churches demand a separate treatment, 299.
 - in Middle Ages, necessity of understanding the, 311.
 - intimate relations of general and Church history, 343.
 - Latin Church historians, the, 314.
 - literature of, general and special, 316.
 - Lutheran writers on, 314.
 - method of, 309.
 - moral and religious disposition of the historian, 307.
 - Mosheim the reformer of, 315.
 - Neander, the work of, 315.
 - obscure causes, true value of, 304.
 - parallels, necessity of, 312.
 - prejudice in, damage from, 307.
 - principle of Christianity must be ever present in, 306.
 - proper treatment of, 302.
 - Protestant emphasis on the history of teaching, 312.
 - reciprocal influences in, 303.
 - requires a knowledge of the ancient world and its faiths, 344.
 - Reformation, effect of, upon, 314.
 - Reformed writers on, 314.
 - reports, difference in, 302.
 - sciences auxiliary to, 343.
 - sixteenth century, the division of the Church in the, an epoch in Church history, 301.
 - twofold criticism of sources, 302.
 - whole field of, must be understood, 309.
- Church symbols, the three principal, 381.
- Classic languages, value of the ancient, 69.
- Clergy, various designations of the, 48.
- Commentaries not to be too much relied on, 243.
- Commentator and interpreter, their functions distinguished, 239.
- Commonwealth, structure of the, 178.
- Community, the religious, 42.
- Concordances and lexicons of the New Testament, 172.
- Confessionalism, ecclesiastical, 104.
- Conscience, religious feeling becomes a steadfast disposition through, 40.

- Conscience, religious feeling not resolvable into, 40.
- Constitution, the, of the Church, 297.
- Critical methods, 208.
- Criticism, Biblical:
- carefully defined limits to be fixed to internal criticism, 210.
 - conjectural attempts not forbidden in needful cases, 211.
 - critical and exegetical skill the result of practice, 212.
 - critical hypotheses, frequent fallacies in, 211.
- Criticism and exegesis act on each other, 213.
- destructive criticism as applied to New Testament not yet successful, 205.
 - external criticism defined, 209.
 - first critical edition of the New Testament, 215.
 - higher and lower criticism, 208.
 - historical criticism, the place for, 262.
 - history of, 213.
 - hypotheses, critical, frequent fallacies in, 211.
 - leadership in criticism maintained by English scholars in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, 216.
 - Middle Ages, criticism in the, 214.
 - mischiefs done by dabblers in, 212.
 - necessary for understanding of the Gospels, 273.
 - negative and positive criticism, functions of, 210.
 - negative criticism no ground for alarm, 272.
 - objects contemplated by, 202.
 - office of internal criticism, 209.
 - often paltry, 204.
 - positive and negative, 210.
 - prejudice, necessity of freedom from, in criticism, 264.
 - relation of criticism to exegesis, 212.
 - revival of, in the eighteenth century, 215.
 - should criticism consider the question of canonicity? 206.
 - sometimes employed for perverse and frivolous ends, 203.
 - spiritual sympathy necessary to a correct view of the life of Christ, 274.
 - though often perverted, yet of great value, 203.
 - Tübingen tendency critical, the, 216.
- Culture, uses of æsthetic, 72.
- Danz's division of theology, 140.
- Deism:
- application of the term, 84.
- Vol. III.
- Deism:
- incapable of Christian ideas, 84.
 - in England in the time of Charles First, 76.
 - pantheism and deism antagonistic to Christian theology, 84.
- Demonology, 426.
- Denominational character of Church history, 315.
- DeWette and Grotius, rise of the school of, 249.
- Didascalion, the, of Hugo St. Victor, 119.
- Discussion, utility of oral, 54.
- Disputes, disorderly, antidote against, 54.
- Divine training of humanity, the notion of, 153.
- Division of Historical Theology into periods, 299.
- Divisions of knowledge—philosophy, nature, history, 67.
- Doctrine, development of, in the Protestant Churches, 65.
- no cessation in the development of, 394.
 - relation of life and doctrine, 288.
- Doctrine, Christian, ethical character of, 396.
- Christian doctrine a unit, 361.
- Doctrine, Law, and Art co-related, 23.
- Doctrine of the Bible, historical form and development of the, 286.
- Doctrines, history of, 358.
- arrangement controlled by dogmatic character, 362.
 - Baur's division of, 364.
 - changes in, necessity of recognizing, 365.
 - definition of, 359.
 - difficulty of discovery of beginnings of change, 363.
 - division of, into periods, 363.
 - dynamic principle, in, important, 635.
 - relation of history of Doctrines to symbolics, 382.
 - task of doctrinal history, the, 359.
- Dogma, inability of philosophy to originate, illustrated, 81.
- Dogmatical systems, interpretation should be independent of, 239.
- Dogmatics:
- biblical, 286.
 - apologetics an introduction to, 405.
 - apologetics and polemics, relation of to, 403.
 - a progressive science, 400.
 - began with the Reformation, 289.
 - both biblical and ecclesiastical, 414.
 - central point, the, of all theology, 399.
 - Christology the center of, 429.
 - defined, 399.

Dogmatics :

- difference between dogmatics and ethics, 397.
 - ecclesiastical dogmatics, 395.
 - ethics depends upon doctrine in the last analysis, 399.
 - flexible treatment of, 288.
 - history of Biblical, 389.
 - history of doctrines presumes acquaintance with dogmatics, 359.
 - method of, 420.
 - objection to Schleiermacher's definition of, 401.
 - object of, 395.
 - outline of dogmatical system, 428.
 - Schleiermacher's method in, 421.
 - Schweizer's method in, 424.
- Dogmatics, history of :
- Augustine's works, 442.
 - Calvin and his successors, 444.
 - degeneration of dogmatics, 443.
 - dogmatic literature in the Reformed Church, 444.
 - literature of the history of, 448.
 - local or topical method, in, 421.
 - Lutheran dogmatic writers, 444.
 - Melanchthon the founder of Protestant dogmatics, 443.
 - progress of most recent dogmatics, 446.
 - reactionary tendency of dogmatics, 445.
 - Roman Catholic dogmatists, 447.
 - Schleiermacher's dogmatics, 445.
 - Scholasticism and mysticism, 442.
 - summaries, 443.
 - transition to rationalism, 445.
 - Twisten and Nitzsch, 446.
- Dogmatizer, every judicious, a harmonizer, 415.
- Doubt, temper in which it should be met, 56.
- Doubt, true method of dealing with, 107.
- Early history of the Israelites, 267.
- Ecclesiastical confessionism, 104.
- Eighteenth century, theology in the, 100.
- Eloquence, the limit of sacred, 525.
- Empirics theological, 12.
- Encyclopædia, Theological :
- as treated by Harless, Lange, and Pelt, 134.
 - as treated by Pfaff and Buddæus, 128.
 - contributions of Semler and Mosheim to, 128.
 - Gerhard, John, the Encyclopædia of, 128.
 - in the early part of the eighteenth century, 132.
 - in the Lutheran Church, 126.
 - Isidore, the Encyclopædia of, 119.
- Vol. III.

Encyclopædia, Theological :

- keeps pace with science, 11.
 - made independent by Schleiermacher, 132.
 - nature of, 9.
 - relation of encyclopædia to the study of the Bible, 147.
 - Roman Catholic encyclopædia, 136.
 - study of encyclopædia can never be exhausted, 11.
 - study of encyclopædia necessary to the theologian, 15.
- England, theological encyclopædia in, 134.
- England, theological tendencies in, in the eighteenth century, 105.
- English Deism and Gibbon and Paine, 105.
- Episcopos and Presbiteros in the Apostolic Church, 47.
- Epoch, the Reformation a universal, 301.
- what constitutes an epoch, 301.
- Erasmus determines the proper aim of theological study, 120.
- merits of the work of, 121.
 - preface of Erasmus to the New Testament, 120.
 - rationalistic tendencies manifested by, 99.
- Erasmus Sarcerius, the Pastorale of, 558.
- Ernesti the restorer of sound exegesis, 248.
- Eschatology, 436.
- Christian hope to be realized only in Christ, 438.
 - immortality not to be confounded with, 437.
- Eschenburg the first to employ the title Wissenschaftskunde, 8.
- Ethics, Christian, 453.
- analytical, philosophical, synthetical, 454.
 - based on dogmatics, 454.
 - casuistry, 461.
 - Christ not a mere moral and statutory teacher, 458.
 - Christianity the universal moral power, 458.
 - Christ's work the basis of ethics, 457.
 - division of ethics, 459.
 - ethical labors of the Fathers, 462.
 - ethical reaction in the Church, 463.
 - first separate treatment of, 464.
 - general and special ethics, 459.
 - harmony of philosophical and Christian ethics, 455.
 - history of ethics, 462.
 - Humanism and ethics, 463.
 - includes duties which men owe to the State, 456.
 - Kant's treatment of, 465.
 - literature of, 466.

Ethics, Christian :

- distinguished from philosophical, 455.
- liturgics, relation of, to ethics, 504.
- place of Christian ethics, 453.
- positive element of, 457.
- Protestant ethical writers, 464.
- Reformers, the, and ethics, 463.
- Roman Catholic ethics, 464.
- Rosenkranz's system, 460.
- Schleiermacher's method, 460.
- transcends philosophical ethics, 457.
- views of Rothe, Harless, and others, 459.
- works of early writers, 462.

Ethnography, Biblical, 177.Eusebius the first of Bible geographers, 180.*Eusebius, work of, 313.*Evangelical Union of Prussia, 415.*Ewald's Life of Christ, 278.*Exegete, the New Testament, should be familiar with the Semitic languages, 168.*Exegesis :

- additional reasons for making it a separate department, 142.
- application of exegesis, the, 241.
- as much an ecclesiastical as a religious science, 140.
- complete exegesis dependent on religious growth, 241.
- critical and exegetical skill the result of practice, 212.
- criticism and exegesis act on each other, 218.
- definition of, 238.
- distinguished from hermeneutics, 238.
- effect of the Reformation on, 248.
- Ernesti the restorer of sound exegesis, 248.
- includes both interpretation and explanation, 238.
- influence of the Reformation on, 314.
- Kant's separation of dogmatical from ethical exegesis, 249.
- Latin Fathers, exegesis of the, 247.
- method of applying, 243.
- Middle Ages, exegesis in the, 247.
- neological exegesis, rise of, 249.
- New Testament, a knowledge of Hebrew necessary to the exegesis of the, 162.
- practical exegesis the result of the scientific, 241.
- process by which exegesis is made practical, 242.
- Reformed and Lutheran exegesis, 248.
- relation of criticism to exegesis, 212.
- sciences auxiliary to exegesis, 159.
- should not be studied alone with a view to the pulpit, 532.
- student's self-training in, 244.

Vol. III.

Exegete, spirit of the true, 240.Exegetical theology, definition of, 146.*first in order, 143.*practical sciences auxiliary to, 175.*reasons why exegetical theology should be a separate department, 141.*relations of exegetical theology with historical theology, 261.*the Bible the object of, 146.*Exposition of the Bible at first wholly practical, 245.*False readings, how originated, shown by internal criticism, 210.*Fathers, the Church, 370.*ethical labors of the, 462.*exegesis of the Latin Fathers, 247.*Feeling, in what sense religion is rooted in, 33.*Feeling, the theory of, 37.*Five auxiliary sciences, the, 159.*Founders of religions, 43.*France, theological encyclopædia in, 134.*French pulpit, the, 537.*General history, importance of familiarity with, to the Church historian, 343.*Genuineness of books and passages to be determined by Biblical criticism, 204.*Geography, Biblical, 176.*writers on, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, 180.*Geography, ecclesiastical, 352.*Gerhard, Andrew, the Theologus of, 123.*Gerhard, John, the Encyclopædia of, 123.*German Catholic works on theological encyclopædia, 137.*Gesenius and DeWette, rise of the school of, 249.*Gesticulation, pulpit, 531.*Glassius, Solomon, the first to bring together the grammatical peculiarities of New Testament diction, 171.*God. See Theology.*God-man, objections to the term, 430.*Gospel, the :*does not contradict itself, 272.*spoken first, then written, 153.*Gospels, the :*criticism necessary for understanding, 273.*discrepancies in the Gospels may be admitted, 272.*exposition of the Gospels an exegetical, not an historical, task, 261.*Grammars, Hebrew, 165.*Grammars of the New Testament, 172.

- Greek, history of the exposition of the character of New Testament, 171.
- Greek words, new meaning given to some current in the New Testament, 171.
- Growth of Biblical Hermeneutics, 231.
- Gymnastic exercises for students, advantages of, 57.
- Haliencies and Keryktics, 486.
- Harless, definition of encyclopædia by, 10.
- Harless, Lange, and Pelt, their treatment of encyclopædia, 134.
- Harms's scheme of practical theology, 481.
- Harmonies on the life of Christ, 282.
- Hase, his definition of religion, 25.
- Heads, theological, 420.
- Hebraistic character of the language of the New Testament, recognition of, 170.
- Hebrew language, a knowledge of, indispensable to the exegesis of the New Testament, 162.
- characteristics of Hebrew, 161.
- derivation of the word Hebrew, 161.
- historical sketch of the study of, 163.
- included in school curriculum solely for the sake of theology, 66.
- necessity of a knowledge of, 161.
- not perfected before the time of David, 163.
- study of Hebrew in several ages of the Church, 163.
- Hebrew antiquities, German and English works on, 183.
- Hebrew commonwealth, structure of the, 178.
- Hebrew grammars and chrestomathies, 165.
- Hebrew learning, Reuchlin the restorer of, 164.
- Hebrew lexicons, 166, 168.
- Hebrews, art and science among the, 178.
- religious institutions of the, 178.
- Hegelianism, theological encyclopædia treated in the spirit of, 133.
- Hegelian school, divisions of the, 76.
- Heidelberg Catechism, the, 495.
- Hellenistic-Greek the original language of the New Testament Scriptures, 169.
- Herder, great influence on theology of, 129.
- Herder and Schleiermacher, new direction given to theology by, 101.
- Hermeneutics:
- Biblical Hermeneutics a branch of general hermeneutics, 230.
- causes which make hermeneutics necessary, 229.
- definition of, 228.
- Vol. III.
- Hermeneutics:
- distinguished from exegesis, 238.
- distinguished from rhetoric, 228.
- furnishes the key to the Bible, 230.
- gradual growth of, 231.
- has the right to require unconditional surrender to its rules by the expositor, 231.
- literature of, 232.
- Heterodoxy, 440.
- Historian, the best, in sympathy with the people, 307.
- Historian, the, should be superior to the appeals of party interest, 307.
- Historical sketch of the study of Hebrew, 163.
- Historical Theology, 261.
- History and literature of theological encyclopædia, 118.
- History, biblical:
- difficulty connected with early periods of, 263.
- early history of the Israelites, 267.
- general and special, 361.
- must precede doctrine, 295.
- Christ's life the center of, 271.
- should precede dogmatics, reasons why, 144.
- study of, should follow philology, 69.
- History of the exposition of the character of New Testament Greek, 171.
- History, sacred, place of, 262.
- Hobbes, atheistic opinions of, attacked by Cudworth, 77.
- Holland, theological encyclopædia in, 134.
- Homiletics:
- arrangement and material, 525.
- artistic division of the sermon, 528.
- art of preaching, the, a part of theological science, 540.
- Christian sermon, history of the, 535.
- defects of first sermons, 533.
- delivery, 528.
- division of homiletics, 525.
- early homilies, the, 535.
- effect of a sermon to be studied by the preacher, 530.
- fanciful divisions, 537.
- French pulpit, the, 537.
- gesticulation, pulpit, 531.
- history of homiletics, 535.
- invention, 526.
- lay preaching, 524.
- lesson, every sermon may be a, 534.
- literature of, 543.
- medieval preaching, 535.
- method of homiletics, 532.
- Mystic preachers, the, 536.
- not a theory of sacred eloquence, 519.
- oratory a conversation, 523.
- Pietists, sermons of the, 537.

Homiletics :

- preaching, history of the theory of, 540.
- pulpit, preparations for, 532.
- pulpit, the, should be always before the mind, 533.
- pulpit, the, has its own peculiar style, 528.
- Reformed writers on homiletics, 542.
- Reformers, preaching by, 536.
- relation of the sermon to the congregation, 523.
- relation of, to liturgics, 519.
- repentance, necessity of a continual preaching of, 520.
- Roman Catholic writers on, 543.
- sacred eloquence, the limits of, 525.
- secret of homiletical invention, the, 526.
- sermon, the, not a lecture, 522.
- sermon, the, should be mentally constructed, 529.
- sermonic division, 528.
- synthetic and analytical methods, 527.
- testimony to Christ, the sermon a, 523.
- text, the, 521.
- texts, conditions necessary for proper, 526.
- useless ornament to be avoided, 529.
- Homilist, the, needs to be an exegete, 474.
- Hugo St. Victor, the Didascalion of, 119.
- Humanism and ethics, 463.
- Humanity, notion of the divine training of, 153.
- Hymnology:
 - existing treasures gladly used by liturgics, 511.
 - new hymns to receive recognition, 511.
 - old hymns not necessarily good, 511.
 - poetry of Protestantism culminates in the Church hymn, 511.
- Idealism and sensationalism both unchristian, 83.
- Idiom, the New Testament, based on the later Greek, 170.
- Individual, the, and his relations to science, 16.
- Industry, private, the supplement to public instruction, 53.
- Institutions, the religious, of the Hebrews, 178.
- Instruction, public, should be supplemented by private industry, 53.
- Interpretation of the Scriptures:
 - a religious disposition essential to the right, 240.
 - need for care in the, 229.

Vol. III

Interpretation of the Scriptures :

- rise of the allegorical method of, 246.
- should be independent of dogmatic systems, 239.
- sketch of the history of, 245.
- Interpreter and commentator, their functions distinguished, 239.
- Interpreters, the allegorical, Origen the first of the, 246.
- Introduction, Biblical:
 - either general or special, 191.
 - German and English literature on, 195.
 - properly limited to history of the canon and criticism, 193.
 - relation of general to special, 193.
 - scope and limits of not, precisely defined, 191.
- Isagogica, Biblical, 191.
- Isidore, the Encyclopædia of, 119.
- Israelites, early history of the, 267.
- nation, history of the, 263.
- people of God, the, 265.
- people under the law, a, 21.
- sources for history of, 267.
- Israelites, history of:
 - begins with the head of the race, 263.
 - literature on the, 267.
 - non-Jewish writers on, 267.
 - writers on, among Christian Fathers, 267.
- Jansenists, the, opposed philosophy, 75.
- Jesuits, the, favored philosophy, 75.
- Jesus Christ:
 - different views of, 275.
 - his life the center of history, 271.
 - his person the center of dogmatics, 422.
 - his walk the basis of ethics, 457.
 - life of, the basis of Christology, 429.
 - not a mere moral and statutory teacher, 458.
 - parallels between Christ and Socrates, 277.
 - worship of, in hymns and prayers, early manifestation of, 276.
- Jesus Christ, life of:
 - absurdity of the mythical theory, 275.
 - diverse views of different writers on, 275.
 - does not come within the range of Church history, 295.
 - efforts to eliminate the miraculous from the, 277.
 - English and American literature on, 282.
 - Ewald's Life of Christ, 278.
 - harmonies of the, 282.
 - history of the biographies of, 276.

- Jesus Christ, life of:
 importance of attaining to a satisfactory view of, 271.
 is matter for history only so far as it is definitely human, 278.
 its own explanation, 274.
 Keim's work on the, 279.
 literature of the, 279.
 negative criticism of, no ground for alarm, 272.
 Renan's Life of Christ, 278.
 separate historical study, a, 276.
 spiritual sympathy necessary for correct criticism of, 274.
 Strauss's Life of Christ, 277.
- Jewish Old Testament expositors in Middle Ages, importance of, 247.
- Jews. See Israelites.
- Justification and Sanctification, 488.
- Kant, categorical imperative of, 81.
 his separation of dogmatical from ethical exegesis, 249.
 his treatment of ethics, 465.
 influence of Kant on philosophy, 76.
- Keim, his work on the life of Christ, 279.
- Keryktics, 486.
- Kliefoth, his division of doctrinal history, 364.
- Knowledge, divisions of—philosophy, nature, and history, 67.
- Knowledge of Hebrew a necessity, and why, 161.
- Lange, Harless, and Pelt, their treatment of encyclopædia, 184.
- Language of the New Testament, not pure Greek, 169.
- Languages of the Bible, the original, 160.
- Latin Fathers, exegesis of the, 247.
- Latin writers of Church history, 314.
- Law and medicine, relations of theology with, 60.
- Law, art, and doctrine co-related, 28.
- Lay preaching, 524.
- Learning and religion, a desire for both needful to the study of theology, 17.
- Lecture, preparation and repetition to be added to the, 54.
- Lectures, attendance on too many, works injury and confusion, 54.
- Lectures, true method of profiting by, 58.
- Legend and myth, difference between, 265.
- Letter, the, is not science, 14.
- Lexicons and concordances of the New Testament, 172.
- Lexicons, Hebrew, 166.
- Life the object of all study, 12.
- Liturgics, 498.
 Vol. III.
- Liturgics:
 based on dogmatics, 485.
 contrast between Protestant and Roman Catholic liturgics, 502.
 ethics and ecclesiastical law, liturgics in relation to, 504.
 field of, 498.
 homiletical and liturgical elements, distinction between, 504.
 limitations of, 510.
 literature of, 517.
 living worship, need of a, 501.
 mechanical liturgy in Roman Catholicism, 502.
 Protestant recognition of, 505.
 Protestant liturgics, 503.
 relation of worship to art, 499.
 religious feeling, necessity of in liturgics, 508.
 Roman Catholic and Protestant liturgists, difference between, 508.
 sermon, place of the, defined by, 500.
 worship defined, 499.
- Liturgics, history of:
 Christian worship developed from the Jewish, 515.
 hymn-book controversy, the, in Baden and the Palatinate, 517.
 methodology of, 513.
 rationalistic works, 516.
 propriety, every thing depends upon a sense of, 514.
 Scripture lessons, proper reading of the, highly essential, 514.
 service, every part of the, must be minutely studied, 513.
 singing, the preacher's relation to the, 514.
- Logographs and mythographs, 264.
- Lord's Prayer, the:
 prayer should conclude with, 508.
- Lutheran Church, encyclopædia in the, 126.
- Lutheran dogmatic writers, 444.
- Lutheran exegesis, 248.
- Lutheran writers on Church history, 314.
- Luther, Martin:
 catechisms, his two, 494.
 his opposition to philosophy, 75.
 more practical than theoretical, 541.
- Maccabees, First Book of, importance of, to the post-exilian period, 267.
- Manuscripts, most important, of the New Testament, 214.
- Marheineke's method of practical theology, 480.
- Mathematical knowledge, uses of, to the theologian, 70.
- Mathematics, has to do with form and numbers, 70.

- Mary Magdalene, her conduct incomprehensible to the banqueters, 32.
- Mass, the:
 Reformed theologians rejected the name and the thing, 515.
 transformed by Luther into a simple observance of the Lord's Supper, 515.
- Mediæval preaching, 535.
- Medicine and law, relations of theology with, 60.
- Melanchthon, Apology of, 416.
 founder of Protestant dogmatics, the, 448.
 little tract of, the, 121.
 recommends the study of the Fathers with that of the Bible, 121.
- Methodology, dangers in the treatment of, 11.
 definition of, 11.
- Methodology of missions, 486.
- Methodology of systematic theology, the, 468.
 moral growth needed for the study of ethics, 471.
 of dogmatics both historical and philosophical, 469.
 religious experience necessary for the understanding of dogmatics and ethics, 470.
- Methodus, the, of John Henry Alsted, 124.
- Middle Age sense of the word theology, 63.
- Middle Ages, biblical criticism in the, 214.
 biography of Jesus Christ in the, 276.
 dogmatic tone of the, 64.
 exegesis in the, 247.
 necessary for Church historian to understand the, 311.
 theological tendencies in the, 99.
- Ministerial training, sketch of the history of, 51.
- Ministry, an undoubted religious impulse to the, has enabled many to surmount great difficulties, 17.
- Missions, history of, 355.
- Missions in Theological Encyclopædia, 50.
- Missions, methodology of, 486.
- Moabite Stone, works concerning, 182.
- Mohammed, appearance of, an epoch in secular history, 300.
- Mohammedanism, history of, important to Church historian, 344.
- Modern rationalism, the, 106.
- Moll's method of practical theology, 481.
- Moral action determined by outward conditions, 32.
- Moral feeling not identical with religious feeling, 35.
- Vol. III.
- Morality and religion have been found separated, 31.
- Morality based on independence, 33.
- Mosheim and Semler, contributions of, to encyclopædia, 128.
- Mosheim the reformer of Church history, 315.
- Music in worship, 309.
- Myth:
 difference between myth and legend, 265.
 meaning of the term, 264.
- Mysticism, 442.
 the preparation for the Reformation, 64.
- Mystic preachers, the, 536.
- Mystic tendency, the, in theology, 104.
- Mystics unconsciously borne in the direction of rationalism, 99.
- Mystics, the, their understanding of the term theology, 63.
- Mythical theory of Strauss, 277.
- Mythical theory of the life of Christ, absurdity of, 275.
- Narrative, the Bible, nature of, 266.
 sacred narrative as compared with profane, 266.
- Natural science of the Bible, 177.
- Natural sciences, acquaintance with the, important, 71.
- Neander, work of, as a Church historian, 315.
- Negative criticism of Christ's life no ground for alarm, 272.
- Neological exegesis, rise of, 249.
- Nestorius and the school of Antioch, 98.
- New Covenant, revelations of the, 266.
- New Testament, a knowledge of Hebrew necessary to the exegesis of the, 162.
 concordances and lexicons of the, 172.
 covers only a single generation of men, 156.
 embraces but few nations, 157.
 Erasmus's preface to his Greek, 120.
 first critical edition of the, 215.
 grammars of the language of the, 172.
 Greek of the, varies with the writers, 171.
 Greek synonymes of the, 175.
 Greek text-books on the, 174.
 Hellenistic-Greek the original language of the, 169.
 history of the exposition of the Greek of the, 171.
 its sub-divisions—history, doctrine, and prophecy, 158.
 most important manuscripts of the, 214.

- New Testament, new meaning given in the, to some current Greek words, 171.
 Scrivener's introduction to the, 217.
 Tregelles, text of, 217.
 various editions of the, 219.
 Westcott and Hort's text of the, 217.
- New Testament canon, the:
 in the early Church, 194.
 not formed at one time, 159.
- New Testament thought, form of, derived from the Old, 153.
- Nosselt's Introduction to Theology, 130.
- Old Catholic Party, the, 46.
- Old Testament:
 Alexandrian classification of the books of the, 155.
 always the principal source for Biblical archaeology, 176.
 contents of the, 154.
 covers a period of several thousand years, 156.
 critically revised portable editions of the, 217.
 different views as to the value of the, 153.
 its leading object visible throughout its contents, 156.
 Schleiermacher's treatment of the, 152.
 written mainly in Hebrew, 160.
- Oral discussion, utility of, 54.
- Oratory a conversation, 523.
- Origen:
 chief of the allegorical interpreters, 246.
 his threefold sense of Scripture, 247.
- Origin of formal Christian theology, 64.
- Origin of the term Theology, 62.
- Original languages of the Bible, the, 160.
- Orthodoxy and heterodoxy:
 orthodoxy not to be confounded with supernaturalism, 440.
 rationalism a heterodox phenomenon, 441.
- Palatinate, liturgical controversy in the, 517.
- Pantheism and Deism antagonistic to Christian theology, 84.
- Pantheism, theological and moral outcome of, 85.
- Pantheistic spirit has often donned the garb of superior orthodoxy, 102.
- Parallels in Church history, necessity of, 312.
- Patristic polemics, 217.
- Patristics:
 Church Fathers, 370.
 Classic, the term, 372.
 history of, 373.
 Vol. III.
- Patristics:
 limits of, in time, 371.
 literature of, 374.
 other terms for Church Fathers, 371.
 relation of, to doctrinal history, 372.
 the best works of the Fathers, 372.
- Patrology, 371.
- Pauline epistles, exposition of the, 284.
- Passion-plays, the, 276.
- Pastoral Theology, 544.
- Pastors, terms by which they are known, 47.
- Paul the apostle, 283.
 the founder of a body of doctrine, 283.
- Pedagogics, 461.
- Pelt, Lange, and Harless, their treatment of encyclopædia, 134.
- Pentecost the beginning of the Church, 295.
- People of God, Israelites the, 265.
- Philology, ecclesiastical, 353.
- Philology the first of the preparatory studies, 68.
- Philosophic speculation in America, 78.
- Philosophic thought in England much influenced by Mill and Coleridge, 77.
- Philosophy: branches of, important to theology, 87.
 cannot originate theological doctrine, 81.
 divisible into that of nature and that of mind, 88.
 hard terms of, should not be feared, 80.
 history of, 348.
 importance of a sound psychology to, 88.
 inability of philosophy to originate dogma illustrated, 81.
 influence of Kant on, 76.
 in the Church after the Reformation, 75.
 leading object in the study of, 80.
 literature of, 348.
 Luther's opposition to, 75.
 no sound objection to philosophy from the variety of systems, 83.
 philosophy, object of all, 79.
 Platonic and Aristotelian division of, 88.
 Schleiermacher's division as to, 76.
 sense in which it must be Christian, 86.
 should be pursued in connexion with other studies, 80.
 theology not bound to any one philosophy, 82. value of the several branches of philosophy, 87.

- Philosophy and Christianity, conflict between, 409.
- Philosophy and theology, early relations of, 64.
their relations traced historically, 74.
- Philosophy of religion—German literature on, 89.
- Physical qualifications demanded of the future servant of God, 57.
- Pietism:
fondness of, for dabbling with philosophy and natural science, 103.
joins the older supernaturalism, 103.
position of, in the current conflict, 103.
Spener's pietism, 290.
- Pietists, sermons of the, 537.
- Piety cannot take the place of learning, 18.
- Polemics, zeal for, diminished after the middle of the eighteenth century, 418.
- Polemics and Irenics:
every judicious dogmatizer a harmonizer, 415.
history of, 417.
literature of, 419.
not separate departments, 414.
Reformed writers on, 218.
Roman Catholic and Protestant polemics, modification of, 416.
- Positive science, theology as a, 58.
- Positive Theology:
all divisions of, relative only, 144.
departments of, 139.
Rosenkranz's threefold division of, 140.
Schleiermacher's division of, 140.
- Practical Theology, 472.
- Prayer:
closing prayer, the, should have direct bearing on the sermon, 508.
effeminacy and insipidity to be excluded from prayer, 512.
public prayer, 512.
should conclude with the Lord's Prayer, 508.
- Prayer and singing:
as forms of worship, 508.
should precede and follow the sermon, 508.
- Preacher, the:
should never cease to be a teacher, 24.
should study the possible effect of a sermon, 530.
- Preaching:
art of preaching, the, a part of theological science, 540.
history of the theory of, 540.
- Predestination, 428.
- Vol. III.
- Predisposition, the so-called avoidance of a prejudice, 239.
- Preparation and repetition to be added to the lecture, 54.
- Preparatory and auxiliary sciences, distinction between, 66.
- Preparatory sciences, the, 66.
- Preparatory studies, philology the first of the, 68.
- Presbyterians, American, 106.
- Prevailing tendencies of theological thought, 98.
- Priest, the title of, cannot be entirely appropriated by Protestant clergy, 48.
- Propædæutics, theology as related to, 66.
- Protestant Churches, development of doctrine in the, 66.
- Protestant emphasis on the history of teaching, 312.
- Protestant student, the, during his academical studies, 50.
- Prussia, Evangelical Union of, 415.
- Psychology, importance of a sound, to philosophy, 88.
- Pulpit, the:
has its own peculiar style, 523.
preparations for, 532.
- Qualities which should be united in the theologian, 61.
- Quadratus, Apology of, 408.
- Rational criticism, beginning of the, with Semler, 215.
- Rationalism:
a heterodox phenomenon, 441.
chief traits of modern rationalism, 100.
has ceased to dispose of miracles, 239.
largely a question of method, 109.
modern Rationalism, 106.
- Rationalism and Supernaturalism: approaches of, to each other, 101.
literature of the conflict, 109.
- Reason co-operative with religious feeling, 38.
- Recent theology, latest representatives of, 102.
- Rector, proper meaning of the term, 49.
- Reformation, the:
a universal epoch, 301.
effect of, on Church history, 314.
effect of, on exegesis, 248.
mysticism the preparation for the, 64.
sprang from moral, not doctrinal, causes, 396.
- Reformed and Lutheran exegesis, 248.
- Reformed Church, dogmatic literature in the, 444.

- Reformed writers on Church history, 314.
 on homiletics, 542.
- Reformers, the, and ethics, 468.
 preaching by the, 536.
 theological spirit of the, 96.
- Relation of life and doctrine, 288.
- Relations of philosophy and theology traced historically, 74.
- Religion a feeling of dependence upon God, 36.
- Religion and learning, a desire for both, needful to the study of theology, 17.
- Religion and morality, reasons for distinguishing, 30.
- Religion:
 a religion of reason impossible, 39.
 a subject in which the whole inner man is engaged, 41.
 based on dependence, 33.
 definition of, 25.
 evidence that it is not exclusively the product of the intellect, 28.
 in what sense is religion rooted in feeling, 33.
 is original spiritual power, 31.
 not a transcendental knowledge of the absolute, 27.
 not bare knowledge as grounded in the memory, 27.
 not bare knowledge as grounded in the understanding, 27.
 not identical with morality, 30.
 not identical with a supposed spiritual activity, 30.
 not merely action, 29.
 not merely knowledge, 26.
 requires more than action for its expression, 32.
 scope of the word, and distinction between it and other terms, 25.
 seeks to manifest itself symbolically in terms and imagery, 32.
- Religion, Philosophy of, German literature, 89.
- Religious disposition essential to the right interpretation of the Bible, 240.
- Religious disposition the only one that can apprehend a religious writer, 240.
- Religious doctrine, superiority of the teaching of, to law and art, 20.
- Religious feeling:
 becomes a steadfast disposition through conscience, 40.
 connects itself with the understanding and the will, 38.
 common to a community, 48.
 is aided by the imagination, 38.
 not identical with moral feeling, 35.
 not mere sensibility, 34.
 not resolvable into conscience, 40.
 Vol. III.
- Religious feeling:
 not the same as æsthetic feeling, 34.
 school and home culture of, 73.
 synthesis of, with our other faculties, 37.
 the root of the religious life, 39.
 twofold character in, 36.
- Religious teacher, the:
 position as to other teachers, 24.
 threefold task of the, 42.
- Remonstrants, the, 248.
- Renaissance of learning prepared the way for the Reformation, 28.
- Renan's Life of Christ, 278.
- Reuchlin the restorer of Hebrew learning, 164.
- Revelation, a belief in, requires criticism of the historical books of the Bible, 263.
- Roman Catholicism, mechanical liturgy of, 502.
- Roman Catholic dogmatists, 447.
- Roman Catholic encyclopædia, 136.
- Roman Catholic ethics, 464.
- Roman Catholic theologians, scientific character of, 46.
- Roman Catholic writers on homiletics, 543.
- Roman Empire, overthrow of the Western, forms an epoch in secular history, 300.
- Rosenkranz's threefold division of positive theology, 140.
- Rubrics, 298.
- Sacraments, the Church and the, 434.
 doctrine of the Church can only be understood through the doctrine of Christ, 435.
 faith the connecting medium, 436.
- Sacred history, place of, 262.
- Sacred writings:
 integrity of, necessary to their canonical reception, 207.
 not the exclusive property of a priestly order, 45.
- Salvation not dependent on subtleties, 439.
- Sanctification, 433.
- Saumur and Baale, the theologians of, 125.
- Schleiermacher:
 desired that philosophy and theology should remain distinct, 76.
 did not advocate mere sensibility, 34.
 division of positive theology by, 140.
 dogmatics of, 445.
 definition of dogmatics by, 400.
 early life nourished in piety, 17.
 his aim as to philosophy, 76.
 his definition of the term religion 26.
 his system of ethics, 460.

- Schleiermacher:
 his preaching, introduced new life into the method of, 539.
 his treatment of Old Testament, 152. made encyclopædia independent, 132.
 objection to his definition of dogmatics, 401.
 relations of apologetics and polemics, his definition of the, 417.
 reserved for him to allay the conflict between rationalism and supernaturalism, 101.
 services of, to catechetics, 497.
 the whole of theology greatly indebted to, 10.
- Schleiermacher and Herder, new direction given to theology by, 101.
- Scholar, every, should be familiar with the history of the Church, the Reformation, and Protestantism in his country, 310.
- School and home culture of religious feeling, 78.
- Scholasticism and mysticism, 442.
- Schoolmen and positive theologians, the quarrel between, 74.
- School, the, must not be bolted out of the Church, 47.
- Schweizer:
 arrangement of practical theology by, 479.
 defect of his division of practical theology, 480.
 dogmatical system of, 424.
- Science and learned pedantry, difference between, 11.
- Sciences auxiliary to Church history, 343.
- Sciences auxiliary to exegesis, 159.
- Sciences, the natural, acquaintance with important, 71.
- Sciences, the practical, auxiliary to exegetical theology, 175.
- Scientific instruction can only be conveyed in connected discourse, 52.
- Scientific spirit, dangers of the excess of the, 59.
- Scripture history, Christ's life the center of, 271.
- Scripture lessons, proper reading of, highly essential, 514.
- Scriptures, the:
 considered as the object of exegesis, 147.
 Origen's threefold sense of, 247.
 when interpreted to be practically applied, 241.
- Self-training, helps to, 244.
- Semitic languages, 161.
- Semler, beginning with, of the rational criticism, 215.
- Semler and Mosheim, contributions of, to encyclopædia, 128.
- Sensationalism and Idealism, both unchristian, 83.
- Sensibility, religious feeling not mere, 34.
- Sermon, the:
 a testimony to Christ, 523.
 defects of first sermons, 533.
 effect of a sermon should be studied by the preacher, 530.
 essential element of Protestant worship, an, 506.
 fanciful divisions of, 537.
 history of the Christian sermon, 535.
 not a lecture, 522.
 not to become a mere intellectual discourse, 24.
 place of the sermon in worship, 507.
 prayer and singing should precede and follow the, 508.
 relation of the sermon to the congregation, 523.
 sermonic division, 528.
 should be mentally constructed, 529.
 should be sustained by the whole economy of the worship, 504.
 the delivery of, 528.
 useless ornament in to be avoided, 529.
- Seventeenth century, theology in the, 100.
- Sin and repentance religious-ethical ideas, 31.
- Sin, the doctrine of, 428.
- Singing and prayer as forms of worship, 508.
- Singing, the preacher's relation to the, 514.
- Society, the Church not merely a, 295.
- Socrates and Christ, parallels between, 277.
- Soteriology, 431.
 Christ the mediator, 432.
 justification and sanctification, 433.
 subjective soteriology, 432.
- Spanish Jews, grammatical studies revived by, 163.
- Special Theological Encyclopædia, 146.
- Specialty, devotion to a, should not begin too early, 15.
- Spener:
 contributions to theological encyclopædia, 126.
 pietism of, 290.
 value of the work of, 127.
- Spurious works in the early Church, 204.
- Statistics, ecclesiastical, 390.
 best source for, 391.
 history must furnish statistics, 391.
 text-books in, 392.
 travel, shallow books of, 392.
- Strauss:
 mythical theory of the life of Christ, 277.

- Strauss:
 numberless works issued in reply to, 278.
- Strife, the old, in its newer forms, 102.
- Student, the:
 relation of, to rationalistic tendencies, 107.
 self-training of the student in exegesis, 244.
 teacher and student, relations of, 55.
- Supernaturalism, orthodoxy not to be confounded with, 440.
- Supernaturalism and Rationalism:
 approaches of, to each other, 101.
 literature of the conflict, 109.
- Sweden, theological encyclopædia in, 184.
- Symbolics:
 a broad science to-day, 383.
 definition of, 380.
 integral part of the history of doctrines, an, 380.
 literature, 384.
 Lutheran and Reformed views, opposition between, 384.
 Lutheran symbols, 381.
 origin of modern symbols, 383.
 pragmatic method of discussing, 383.
 principal symbols, the three, of the Church, 381.
 relation of symbolics to the history of doctrines, 382.
 symbol, first and later office of, 380.
- Synonymes, Greek, of the New Testament, 175.
- Synthesis of religious feeling with our other faculties, 37.
- Syriac, knowledge of, useful to the theologian, 168.
- Systematic and historical theology, relative positions of, 144.
- Systematic Theology, 394.
- Teacher, the:
 qualifications of the religious, 44.
 religious teacher, the, must be penetrated by religious principle, 42.
 student and teacher, relations of, 55.
- Teachers:
 an order of, necessary to the culture of mankind, 20.
 not an isolated order of society, 19.
 order of teachers, the, highest in society, 18.
- Teaching function, the:
 superiority of, to law and art illustrated, 22.
 more prominent in Protestantism than in Romanism, 23.
- Teaching, relation of, to art and legislation, 19.
- Testaments, the Old and the New:
 differences in the scope of, 157.
- Testaments, the Old and the New:
 relations of, 151.
- Text, a pure, indispensable, 208.
- Text-books, elementary, 166.
- Texts, the, conditions necessary for proper, 526.
- Thamer, Theobald, the Adhortatio of, 122.
- Theistic method, the, in Church history, 305.
- Theologian, the:
 a knowledge of Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic useful to, 168.
 Hebrew, a knowledge of, indispensable to, 163.
 qualities which should be united in the, 61.
 relation of the theologian to school and Church, 50.
 uses of mathematical knowledge to the, 70.
 obliged to give attention to human matters, 62.
 personal character in, necessity of a pure and well-endowed, 403.
 should be thoroughly familiar with the Scriptures, 121.
- Theologians and practical Church teachers, how distinguished, 46.
- Theologians, scientific, and pastors correlated, 46.
- Theologians, testimonies of great, 108.
- Theologians, the, of Saumur and Basle, 125.
- Theological doctrine, philosophy cannot originate, 81.
- Theological empiricism, 12.
- Theological Encyclopædia:
 both general and special aim to concentrate the mental faculties, 8.
 definition of, 7.
 demand for a proper science of, 8.
 differs from the Real Encyclopædia, or Dictionary, 9.
 German Catholic works on, 137.
 history and literature of, 118.
 history of, noticed, 8.
 in Holland, France, Sweden, England, and America, 134.
 its position, 7.
 missions as treated in, 50.
 relation of, to the body of theological science twofold, 10.
 separate contributions to, 138.
 Spener's contributions to, 126.
 treated in the spirit of Hegelianism, 133.
- Theological heads, 420.
- Theological learning rests on a classical basis, 67.
- Theological school, the, and the clergy, 46.
- Theological Science:
 in the early Christian Church, 63.

Theological Science:

must achieve its results through the Word, 14.

true method of making it practical, 14.

Theological spirit of the reformers, 99.

Theological student, true spirit of the, 44.

Theological study will increase faith, 108.

Theological tendencies:

in England in the eighteenth century, 105.

in the early Church, 98.

in the Middle Ages, 99.

in the seventeenth century, 100.

Theological thought, bias of, 98.

Theologus, the, of Andrew Gerhard, 123.

Theology:

angelology and demonology, 426.

approached by many with false expectations, 107.

as a positive science, 58.

as a practical art, 61.

as related to the preparatory sciences, 66.

centurial division of, wrong, 299.

conditions of a fully developed theology, 45.

Danz's division of, into a religious and a Churchly science, 140.

departments in theology, remote beginning of, 405.

departments of theology, and their relation to each other, 139.

does not stand or fall with any one system of philosophy, 83.

great influence of Herder upon, 129.

has never been able to separate itself from philosophy, 78.

historical development, 62.

historical and exegetical theology, relations of, 261.

Influence of the Wolfian philosophy on, 65.

Middle Age sense of the word, 63.

Nosselt's Introduction to, 130.

not bound to any one philosophy, 82.

origin of formal Christian theology, 64.

origin of the term, 62.

premonitions of a vocation to, 18.

relation of to the arts and general culture, 72.

relations of, with law and medicine, 60.

relations of, to philosophy, 74.

religious element of a doctrine should be prominent, 426.

representatives of the recent theology, 102.

the Mystic tendency in, 104.

Vol. III.

Theology, Historical:

worldly motives for the study of, not sufficient, 16.

archæology, 388.

doctrines, history of, 358.

doctrinal history, province of, 360.

general history, elastic treatment of, necessary, 362.

history and revelation, problem of, 360.

missions, literature of, 356.

missions, history of, 355.

Theology, Pastoral:

biographies, value of religious, to the student, 553.

business forms, the pastor should have acquaintance with, 551.

charities, the pastor as related to, 547.

Christ the first instructor in, 553.

congregation as a whole, relation of the pastor to the, 547.

English and American literature of, 554.

Erasmus Sacerius, the Pastorale of, 553.

experience, how it may be utilized by the pastor, 546.

family, relation of the pastor to the, 548.

history of, 553.

indefiniteness of the term, 545.

irreligious masses, problem of reaching the, 548.

literature of Pastoral Theology, 536.

method of, 551.

objects of pastoral theology, 544.

pastor, the, the head of the congregation, 547.

pastoral duties best learned from experience, 545.

pastoral duties divided into three departments, 546.

pastorate, aids to a preparation for the, 551.

pedagogics in relation to, 550.

people, personal relation of the pastor to the, 547.

practical sciences auxiliary to, 550.

practical training, what shall be done to furnish a, 552.

preacher distinguished from pastor by Harms, 545.

scientific pursuits among the clergy, best means of preserving, 556.

special events — Marriage, Baptism, and Death—position of the pastor in relation to, 548.

wasteful occupations of pastors, 555.

Theology, Practical:

all modes of division important, 473.

catechetical methods, 488.

- Theology, Practical :
 catechetics, 486.
 categories of, 478.
 clerical life, practical side of, 475.
 completes the theological course, 474.
 definition of, 472.
 former restriction of, 475.
 Harms's scheme of, 481.
 historical basis, of, 474.
 history of, 482.
 homiletics, 519.
 literature of, 484.
 liturgics, 498.
 Marheineke's distribution of, 480.
 method of treatment, 478.
 methodology of, 513.
 Moll's method, 481.
 necessity of emphasis on the practical side of clerical duties, 477.
 rationalistic teaching of, 483.
 Reformers, works of the, 482.
 relation of the preacher to practical theology and other departments, 478.
 Schweizer's division of, 480.
 scientific character of, 478.
 systems of Nitzsch and others, 479.
 universities, Practical Theology in the, 483.
 worship, forms of, and their relation to art, 506.
 worship, the theory of,—liturgics, 498.
- Theology, Systematic :
 anthropology, 427.
 apologetics, 403.
 Calixtus emancipated ethics from dogmatics, 397.
 Christian ethics as a part of, 453.
 Christianity destined to develop into a system, 394.
 Christology, 429.
 Christ's work the basis of ethics, 457.
 Church and the sacraments, the, 435.
 dogmatics, 399.
 dogmatics and ethics, difference between, 397.
 dogmatics, history of, 442.
 dogmatic interest, predominance of the, 396.
 dogmatics, method of, 420.
 dogmatics, object of, 395.
 ecclesiastical dogmatics, 395.
 eschatology, 436.
 methodology of, 468.
 orthodoxy and heterodoxy, 440.
 polemics and irenics, 413.
 soteriology, 431.
 theology, meaning of, 424.
 Trinity, the, and predestination, 438.
 Vol. III.
- Theology and Astronomy, not necessarily related, 71.
Theology and Philosophy, early relations of, 64.
Theology, Pastoral :
 literature, 544.
 Thirty Years' War, the, 301.
 Threefold sense of Scripture, Origen's, 247.
 Tractarian movement in the United States, 106.
 Tractarian movement, the, 106.
 "Tracts for the Times," the, 105.
 Training, general, must precede special, 15.
 Tregelles, basis of his text, 217.
 Trinity and Predestination :
 salvation not dependent on subtleties, 439.
 Trinity less emphasized than God's relation to man, 439.
 Tübingen School, the :
 destructive efforts of, 284.
 elder, the, 290.
 Tübingen tendency critics, 216.
- United States, the Wesleyan revival in the, 106.
Universities, the rise of, 51.
University, the, 52.
University lecture system, the, 52.
Utility of oral discussion, 54.
Value of Spenser's work, 127.
Vocation, choice of the theological, 15.
Vocation to theology, premonitions of a, 18.
Wesleyan, revival, the, 105.
 in the United States, 106.
 Westphalia, peace of, 300.
 Wissenschaftskunde, Eschenburg the first to employ the title, 8.
 Wolf opposed by the Pietists, 75.
 Wolfenbüttel assault, the, on historical Christianity, 65.
 Wolfenbüttel Fragmentist, the, 276.
 Wolfian philosophy, influence of, on Theology, 65.
 Wolfian school, the :
 homiletical writers, 542.
 Works, a mechanical doing of, no. religion, 30.
 Worldly motives for the study of theology not sufficient, 16.
 Worship altogether an expression of the feelings, 40.
 architecture, sacred, as related to Protestant worship, 509.
 Christian worship developed from the Jewish, 515.
 elements of worship, 506.
 eucharistic element, the, 506.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

3 9015 06813 5790

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 456729

THE GIFT OF
Mr. Louis Blanchett

BR
/
.L69
v.4

LIBRARY

OF

BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL

LITERATURE

EDITED BY

GEORGE R. CROOKS, D.D.

AND

JOHN F. HURST, D.D.

VOL. IV.—CHRISTIAN ARCHÆOLOGY

NEW YORK: HUNT & EATON.
CINCINNATI: CRANSTON & STOWE
1890

24

Gift
Louis Blanchet
8-23-30

PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE design of the Editors and Publishers of the BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY is to furnish ministers and laymen with a series of works which, in connection with the Commentaries now issuing, shall make a compendious apparatus for study. While the theology of the volumes will be in harmony with the doctrinal standards of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the aim will be to make the entire Library acceptable to all evangelical Christians.

The following writers will co-operate in the authorship of the series: Dr. Harman, on the Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures; Dr. Terry, on Biblical Hermeneutics; Dr. Bennett, on Christian Archæology; Dr. Miley, on Systematic Theology; the Editors, on Theological Encyclopædia and Methodology; Dr. Ridgaway, on Evidences of Christianity; Prof. Little, on Christian Theism and Modern Speculative Thought; Dr. Crooks, on the History of Christian Doctrine; and Bishop Hurst, on the History of the Christian Church. The volumes on Introduction to the Scriptures, Biblical Hermeneutics, Theological Encyclopædia and Methodology, and Christian Archæology have now been issued

In the case of every treatise the latest literature will be consulted, and its results incorporated. The works comprised in the series will be printed in full octavo size, and finished in the best style of typography and binding.

CHRISTIAN ARCHÆOLOGY

BY

CHARLES W. BENNETT D.D.

PROFESSOR OF HISTORICAL THEOLOGY IN GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, EVANSTON, ILLINOIS

WITH AN

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE

BY

DR. FERDINAND PIPER

PROFESSOR OF CHURCH HISTORY AND CHRISTIAN ARCHÆOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN

NEW YORK: HUNT & EATON.
CINCINNATI: CRANSTON & STOWE.
1890.

Copyright, 1888, by PHILLIPS & HUNT,
New York.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

IT is with much diffidence that I send forth upon its mission this work on Christian Archæology. I will let that veteran Christian archæologist, Dr. Piper, my much-revered instructor, speak of the need of some such book as this. In the Introductory Note, which he has had the great kindness to furnish, the scope and value of this Discipline are sketched in his own inimitable style. While the master speaks it behooves the pupil to keep silence.

The arrangement is a departure from the usual one. I have thought that by giving the Archæology of Christian Art the first place in the discussion, the results of this study could best be utilized in the illustration of the Constitution, Worship, and Life of the Church.

It only remains for me to express my sincerest appreciation of the kindly encouragement and aid which have been so freely given me both at home and abroad. It would be invidious to make distinctions, but to my associates in theological instruction, to friends who have helped me in making the requisite travels for personal study of monuments, to my most highly esteemed preceptor and guide in the Berlin University, and to those who have assisted in the proof-readings and indexing, I would express my especial obligations. If careful readers of the work would communicate to me any errors which they may discover, it would be regarded as a personal favour, as well as help to the attainment of truth.

GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, EVANSTON, ILL., May 15, 1888.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

AT the invitation of the esteemed author, I write a few words of introduction to this volume. It is with pleasure that I greet the first work on Christian Archæology which has appeared on American soil. With hearty good wishes I welcome it to a position of prominence, even before it has come into my hands. At the same time, I cannot be in doubt in regard to its character. The acquaintance I have with the method of the author's studies, his protracted connection with our University, his travels in the Old World and their purpose, give assurance of its solid worth. Since numerous plates and illustrations, as well as several maps, accompany the text, the work comes to have the character of an Art-Archæology, and will be helpful in theological instruction. Thus it appears that the book is designed for the Monumental section of ecclesiastical science.

I. The title itself is full of significance. In Classical Antiquities, where the word ἀρχαιολογία is in common use, it refers primarily to the historic life of a nation, as Roman, Jewish, etc. ; since the idea of life (ὁ ἀρχαῖος βίος τῆς πόλεως), as the essential content of Political Antiquities, occupies the foremost place. Only after several modifications, through the development of the "Archæology of Art" in connection with Classical Antiquities, has the present character of archæological science been determined. By further adding the Inscriptions (which as a whole are excluded from Classical Antiquities), we reach the Discipline which has too long been neglected in the department of theological inquiry. In view of the progress made in the corresponding philological fields of Archæology and Epigraphy, and of the pressing demands of theological science, it is evident that this neglect cannot much longer continue. In the United States, where an able Journal of Archæology has received support for several years, a commendable zeal already exists, so that the author's work does not appear prematurely there.

The work is devoted exclusively to the first six centuries, although the name Archæology does not, in itself, have reference only to what is ancient. But for this very reason we call attention to the significance of this field of inquiry for the study of theology and for the service of the Church.

II. This significance lies, first of all, in the fact that it reveals a source of information which supplies a serious lack in our knowledge of Christian Antiquity: for the nearer we approach the beginnings of the Church the more meagre are the literary sources of evidence. These, for the most part, are all which have hitherto been taken into consideration. Here, accordingly, the contemporary monuments in stone, metal, and color, found by thousands in all parts of the world, especially in the countries around the Mediterranean, are of immense assistance. It is the work of the archæologist to make a critical examination of these, and to determine their historic value. The discovery of Pompeii and Herculaneum affords an illustration from Classical Antiquities more complete than had been thought possible. When Paciaudi immediately thereafter visited Herculaneum and the Museum at Naples, he exclaimed, "O what treasures! what wonders!" He ventured to affirm that by the spending of a week in the Museum he had learned more than by ten years of previous study. In the domain of Church history nothing similar were possible, because through the excavation of Pompeii the entire domestic, civil, and religious life was revealed, whereas Church history is chiefly concerned with the latter. Subterranean discoveries pertaining to the ancient life of the Church have, however, been made for centuries, and with such rich results that a special theology of the Catacombs might be compiled from them. And even above ground, in recent years, numerous remains of ancient Christian architecture dating from the flourishing period of the early Church have been discovered, ruined cities of Central Syria which might be characterized as new Pompeiis.

But these objects and these discoveries are of service not to Historic Theology alone, but every branch of theological investigation has thereby been benefited, especially Biblical Interpretation and Dogmatics, since texts of Scripture and doctrinal opinions frequently furnish the fundamental thought expressed in these sculptures and paintings. Moreover, the iconographic expression, even when comprised in lines and colors, has a certain advantage over the written, especially in that frank unconsciousness which is often obscured by words.

Hence it is that however large a share the "holy building fathers" may have had in these ruined edifices, all were nevertheless intended for Christian worshippers and grew out of their needs, so that their faith and sentiments are therein expressed. It was as true then as to-day, that in order to understand the religious life of a community it is necessary to visit their places of burial ; and fortunately innumerable cemeteries of ancient Christendom have been preserved to aid us in our theological investigations.

But all these remains should not exist merely for the purpose of forwarding the investigations of the scholar and the theologian. The religious community at large ought also to derive enjoyment and profit from them. There are no more memorable sites than these sacred places on the border-land between time and eternity, with their testimonies in word and symbol to the truth on which the ancient believers based their lives, and in which they died. They are inestimable gifts, intelligible without learned interpretation, refreshing to simple and unlettered Christians, and inspiring even to the youth of the Church. On this account, the founding of museums, especially the systematic arrangement and exhibition of copies (where originals are not to be had) for schools and congregations, has long been a thing to be desired. But this cannot be effected unless theologians do their duty and earnestly devote themselves to the work. For this purpose a volume like the present is an available help.

III. The appearance of this work in the United States is also of special significance. The monuments which are therein discussed direct our thoughts to Christian antiquity. But, without disparagement to the remains of a primitive civilization which are found on that continent, the governments and peoples of America belong to modern times. Christian Archæology cannot, therefore, be studied on American soil. The consciousness of this fact is, of course, there fully recognized. Hence among American scholars there is a natural impulse, stronger than that for ordinary professional purposes, to study their own first beginnings on this side of the sea. This is the impelling motive which leads to the old home, Europe, and the still older Asia. This powerful incentive readily determines the American scholar to undertake the voyage, and he reckons the journey short. This also leads the professional theologian, both for practical and scientific purposes, to the memorials of ecclesiastical antiquity to be found in the seats of primitive Christianity, where, above all, the theater of the events affords the best possible setting for their history. Thus measurably the past becomes the present. As a traveller in the tropics, while ascending a high mountain, passes within a few hours through all climatic conditions, even to polar cold ; so is it possible for the archæologist, as he examines the sites and memorials of historic developments, to enter into their spirit as an eye-witness, and so cause them again to pass before him. Is he concerned with the apostolic times, it is certain that Paul's sermon on Mars Hill is nowhere read so intelligibly as on the spot where it was delivered, in sight of the Acropolis and its temples, and looking out over the land and sea. And from high ecclesiastical antiquity, which possesses no documents more precious than the letters to the Church in Smyrna, and those to the Churches in Lyons and Vienne concerning their martyrs, we may take as examples the stadium at Smyrna (whose site is perfectly recognisable) where Polycarp suffered, and at Lyons the crypt of St. Denis where the prisons of Pothinus and Blandina are shown. When authenticated, these places and a thousand others, next to those in the Holy Land, incite the theologian to make his pilgrimage.

If the poet sings of sacred Palestine,

"It was no strange desire,
When pilgrims numberless embarked
But at Thy sepulcher to pray,
And kiss with pious zeal
The earth Thy foot has trod," it is not to be wondered at that American theologians in great numbers leave their native shores to visit historic spots where they may view the mementoes of the past.

If, then, this work, next to the knowledge which it imparts, may also awaken among the writer's countrymen a still stronger desire—following the example of the highly esteemed author, who in the course of his investigations has several times crossed the ocean, and so gained the right to speak from personal observation—to undertake that pilgrimage, in order to reach the origins of the Church and to get a view of its primitive monuments, it will thereby render another valuable service.

DR. FERDINAND PIPER.

BERLIN UNIVERSITY, Jan. 15, 1888.

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

FIGURE	PAGE
1. CEILING DECORATION FROM SANTA DOMITILLA, ROME. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW	57
2. CEILING DECORATION FROM SAN PRÆTESTATO, ROME. KRAUS	58
3. ULYSSES AND THE SIRENS. FROM THE CRYPT OF SANTA LUCINA, ROME. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW	65
4. A CHRISTIAN SARCOPHAGUS, WITH TRAGIC MASKS. ROLLER	66
5. FROM A CHRISTIAN SARCOPHAGUS, DECORATED WITH DOLPHINS. ROLLER	66
6. COIN OF CONSTANTIUS, SHOWING THE MINGLING OF HEATHEN AND CHRISTIAN EMBLEMS. PIPER	67
7. A COIN OF MAJORIAN, FIFTH CENTURY. PIPER	67
8. AMOR AND PSYCHE, FROM SANTA DOMITILLA. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW ..	68
9. AMOR AND PSYCHE WITH THE GOOD SHEPHERD, SAN CALISTO, ROME. KRAUS.	69
10. GENII IN A VINTAGE SCENE. A WINGED GENIUS HOLDING BACK THE VEIL. FROM A CHRISTIAN SARCOPHAGUS. ROLLER	70
11. SUPPOSED EUCHARISTIC SCENE. FRESCO FROM THE OLDEST PART OF SANTA DOMITILLA, ROME. KRAUS	79
12. THE FISH ASSOCIATED WITH OTHER CHRISTIAN SYMBOLS. FROM AN EARLY CHRISTIAN SARCOPHAGUS. PIPER.	80
13. FRESCO FROM THE "CHAMBER OF THE SACRAMENTS," SAN CALISTO, SUGGESTING THE EUCHARISTIC MEAL. ROLLER	81
14. FRESCO FROM A CHRISTIAN CATACOMB IN ALEXANDRIA, REPRESENTING THE EUCHARISTIC MEAL. KRAUS	82
15. THE SWASTIKA, WITH CHRISTIAN EMBLEMS. MÜNTER	84
16. MONOGRAM ON COIN OF ANTHEMIUS, A. D. 467. PIPER	86
17. VARIOUS FORMS OF THE CROSS, ESPECIALLY OF THE MONOGRAM OF CHRIST. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW	86
18. MONOGRAM OF CHRIST ON AN ARCOSOLIUM OF SAN CALISTO, ROME. KRAUS ..	86
19. THE CONSTANTINIAN MONOGRAM, WITH PALM BRANCHES AND THE LEGEND, IN-SIGNO. PIPER	87
20. THE MONOGRAM OF CHRIST ENCIRCLED BY A WREATH. MÜNTER	87
21. A JEWELLED CROSS FROM RAVENNA. PIPER	88
22. THE A Ω, WITH MONOGRAM IN CIRCLE. MÜNTER	89
23. MONOGRAM AND A Ω IN TRIANGLE. MÜNTER	89
24. A Ω, WITH DOVES AND MONOGRAM. FROM A BURIAL MONUMENT. PIPER	89
25. CARICATURE OF CHRIST. A PAGAN GRAFFITO PROBABLY OF SECOND CENTURY. PALACE OF THE CÆSARS, ROME. BECKER	95
26. FROM AN ANTIQUE GEM. A SUPPOSED CARICATURE OF THE TEACHING CHRIST. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW	96

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

xiii

FIGURE	PAGE
27. COIN OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT—AN ASS AND ITS FOAL. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	96
28. FRESCO CEILING FROM SANTA DOMITILLA, ROME. ORPHEUS IN CENTER. KRAUS.	99
29. CHRIST RAISING LAZARUS. FROM A FRESCO. PIPER	100
30. FRESCO FROM THE CEILING IN A CHAMBER IN SAN CALISTO, ROME. NORTH- COTE AND BROWNLOW.....	101
31. BUST OF CHRIST FROM SAN PONZIANO. PROBABLY FROM NINTH CENTURY. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	102
32. BUST OF CHRIST FROM A CEMETERY OF NAPLES. PROBABLY FROM THE SIXTH CENTURY. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	103
33. BUST OF CHRIST FROM THE CRYPT OF SANTA CECILIA, CEMETERY OF SAN CA- LISTO. KRAUS.....	103
34. FRESCO FROM THE CEMETERY SANTA GENEROSA, NEAR ROME, CHRIST WITH SAINTS. KRAUS.....	105
35. VIRGIN AND STAR, FROM SANTA PRISCILLA, ROME. AFTER PHOTOGRAPH FROM ROLLER.....	106
36. VIRGIN AND CHILD, FROM SANTA DOMITILLA, ROME. NORTHCOTE AND BROWN- LOW.....	107
37. VIRGIN AND CHILD, FROM SANTA AGNESE, ROME. KRAUS.....	108
38. A GOOD SHEPHERD, FROM SANTA GENEROSA, KRAUS.....	109
39. A FRESCO OF ST. CECILIA, FROM CRYPT OF SANTA CECILIA, ROME. KRAUS....	109
40. VINE ORNAMENT FROM SAN CALISTO, ROME. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW....	110
41. MOSAIC VINE ORNAMENT, FROM MAUSOLEUM OF GALLA PLACIDIA, RAVENNA. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	111
42. MOSAIC OF CHRIST, IN ARCHBISHOP'S PALACE, RAVENNA. KRAUS.....	124
43. MOSAIC FROM THE APSE OF SS. COSMAS E DAMIANO, ROME. SCHNAASE.....	126
44. MOSAIC OF CHRIST, FROM SAN APOLLINARE NUOVO, RAVENNA. KRAUS.....	127
45. MOSAIC OF CHRIST, FROM ST. SOPHIA, CONSTANTINOPLE. SCHNAASE.....	129
46. STATUETTE OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD, LATERAN MUSEUM. FROM AN ORIG- INAL DRAWING.....	132
47. GOOD SHEPHERD WITH CROOK OR STAFF, LATERAN MUSEUM. FROM AN ORIG- INAL DRAWING.....	133
48. THE GOOD SHEPHERD. TO COMPARE WITH HERMES-KRIOPHOROS. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW	134
49. HERMES-KRIOPHOROS, FROM WILTON HOUSE. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW...	134
50. RESTORED STATUE OF HIPPOLYTUS. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	135
51. A VINTAGE SCENE, WITH GOOD SHEPHERD. AFTER ROLLER.....	138
52. THE TRANSLATION OF ELIJAH. KRAUS.....	139
53. THE HISTORY OF JONAH, FROM A SARCOFAGUS. PIPER.....	139
54. EARLY CHRISTIAN SARCOFAGUS. KRAUS.....	141
55. SARCOFAGUS OF THE FOURTH CENTURY. KRAUS.....	143
56. THE FALL, FROM SARCOFAGUS OF JUNIUS BASSUS. PIPER.....	144
57. FROM THE JUNIUS BASSUS MONUMENT. PIPER.....	144
58. A LATE SARCOFAGUS. AFTER A PHOTOGRAPH BY ROLLER.....	146
59. THE NATIVITY AND THE OFFERING OF THE MAGI. KRAUS.....	147
60. SARCOFAGUS FROM THE FIFTH CENTURY. AFTER ROLLER.....	148
61. THE LAST JUDGMENT IN SCULPTURE. AFTER ROLLER.....	149
62. A CRUCIFIXION, FROM AN IVORY. KRAUS.....	152
63. IVORY CARVING FROM THE CATHEDRA OF BISHOP MAXIMIANUS, RAVENNA. SCHNAASE.....	154

FIGURE	PAGE
64. A CHRISTIAN LAMP, WITH CONSTANTINIAN MONOGRAM. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW	155
65. A SO-CALLED BLOOD-PHIAL. KRAUS.....	156
66. THE HOUSE OF PANSÆ. POMPEII.....	166
67. ATRIUM TUSCANICUM. DEHIO.....	167
68. ATRIUM DISPLUVIATUM. DEHIO.....	168
69. ATRIUM DISPLUVIATUM, WITH COVERED COMPLUVIUM. DEHIO.....	170
70. HEATHEN SCHOLA, VIA APPIA, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	170
71. ANOTHER HEATHEN SCHOLA, VIA APPIA, ROME. DEHIO.....	171
72. CHRISTIAN SCHOLA ABOVE SAN CALISTO, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	171
73. FORM OF AN EARLY BASILICA, A BRONZ LAMP. DE ROSSI	171
74. CELLA AND ARRANGEMENT OF GRAVES ABOVE SAN SISTO, ROME. SCHNAASE..	172
75. BASILICA IN SANTA GENEROSA, ROME. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	173
76. GROUNDPLAN OF BASILICA IN SANTA PETRONILLA, ROME. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW	174
77. VIEW OF BASILICA IN SANTA PETRONILLA, ROME. KRAUS.....	176
78. PLAN OF BASILICA FROM THE VILLA OF QUINTILIAN. STOCKBAUER.....	177
79. PALACE OF DIOCLETIAN, SPOLATRO. SCHNAASE.....	179
80. BASILICA, FROM VILLA OF HADRIAN, TIVOLI. DEHIO.....	182
81. ANOTHER BASILICA, FROM VILLA OF HADRIAN. DEHIO.....	182
82. INTERIOR OF SAN CLEMENTE, ROME. LÜBKE.....	185
83. GROUNDPLAN OF SAN CLEMENTE, ROME.....	186
84. INTERIOR STRUCTURE, DEVELOPMENT OF CROSS-RIBBED ARCHES. WIEGEMANN..	189
85. A CLUSTERED COLUMN. LÜBKE.....	191
86. A GOTHIC INTERIOR.....	192
87. SAN CLEMENTE, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	193
88. CROSS-SECTION OF BASILICA SESSORIANA, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	193
89. GROUNDPLAN OF THE SAME. DEHIO AND BEZOLD.....	194
90. GROUNDPLAN OF SANTA PUDENZIANA, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	195
91. SAN PIETRO IN VATICANO, ROME. FRONT ELEVATION. DEHIO AND BEZOLD..	198
92. PERSPECTIVE INTERIOR OF SAN PIETRO, ROME. SCHNAASE.....	199
93. ATRIUM OF SYLVANUS, VIA APPIA, ROME. DEHIO.....	200
94. SAN LORENZO FUORI LE MURA, ROME. DEHIO AND BEZOLD.....	204
95. SANTA AGNESE FUORI LE MURA, ROME. INTERIOR VIEW. DEHIO.....	205
96. GROUNDPLAN OF SANTA SINFOROSA, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	206
97. ENTABLATURE, ETC., OF SAN APOLLINARE NUOVO, RAVENNA. SCHNAASE....	208
98. SAN APOLLINARE IN CLASSE. SCHNAASE.....	209
99. SAN APOLLINARE IN CLASSE. INTERIOR VIEW. SCHNAASE.....	210
100. ST. DEMETRIUS, THESSALONICA. CROSS SECTION. STOCKBAUER.....	212
101. BASILICA AT EL-BARAH, CENTRAL SYRIA. DE VOGÜÉ.....	214
102. CHURCH AT TOURMANIN, CENTRAL SYRIA. DE VOGÜÉ.....	215
103. BATHS OF DIOCLETIAN. STOCKBAUER.....	219
104. TEMPLE OF ROMULUS, VIA APPIA, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	222
105. GROUNDPLAN OF ST. GEORGE, THESSALONICA. STOCKBAUER.....	224
106. ST. GEORGE, THESSALONICA. EXTERIOR VIEW. SCHNAASE.....	224
107. SAN VITALE, RAVENNA. INTERIOR VIEW. SCHNAASE.....	225
108. SAN VITALE, GROUNDPLAN. SCHNAASE.....	226
109. SAN VITALE, LONGITUDINAL SECTION. SCHNAASE.....	227
110. CAPITAL FROM SAN VITALE. LÜBKE.....	228
111. CAPITAL FROM ST. SOPHIA, CONSTANTINOPLE. LÜBKE.....	228

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

17

FIGURE	PAGE
112. SS. SERGIUS AND BACCHUS, CONSTANTINOPLE. STOCKBAUER.....	229
113. HALL IN ANCIENT ROMAN PALACE. DEHIO.....	229
114. SECTION OF ST. SOPHIA. STOCKBAUER.....	233
115. SECTION OF THE BASILICA OF CONSTANTINE, ROME. STOCKBAUER.....	234
116. GROUNDPLAN OF ST. SOPHIA. SCHNAASE.....	237
117. ST. SOPHIA. LONGITUDINAL SECTION. SCHNAASE.....	238
118. SECTION OF SANTA CONSTANZA, ROME. DEHIO AND BEZOLD.....	241
119. SANTA MARIA MAGGIORE NOCERA DE PAGANI, SECTION. SCHNAASE.....	242
120. BURIAL CHAPEL OF GALLA PLACIDIA, RAVENNA. STOCKBAUER.....	244
121. SECTION OF THE SAME. DEHIO AND BEZOLD.....	245
122. CATHEDRAL OF TRIER. SCHNAASE.....	246
123. GRAFFITI FROM PAPAL CRYPT, SAN SISTO, ROME. ROLLER.....	269
124. CROSS IN CIRCLE WITH INSCRIPTIONS. MÜNTER.....	270
125. COLUMN FROM THE BASILICA OF PETRONILLA, ROME. NORTHCOTE AND BROWN- LOW.....	270
126. BAPTISM OF CHRIST. FRESCO FROM SANTA LUCINA, ROME. ORIGINAL DRAW- ING.....	399
127. ANOTHER BAPTISM OF CHRIST. AFTER ROLLER.....	400
128. SUPPOSED BAPTISM. FRESCO FROM PRETESTATO, ROME. AFTER DE ROSSI... ..	401
129. A BAPTISM, FROM SAN CALISTO, ROME. AFTER DE ROSSI.....	401
130. A BAPTISM, FROM SAN CALISTO, ROME. AFTER DE ROSSI.....	402
131. A BAPTISM ON A FRAGMENT OF A GLASS CUP. AFTER MARTIGNY.....	403
132. BAPTISM OF CHRIST. MOSAIC FROM SAN GIOVANNI IN FONTE, RAVENNA. AFTER PIPER.....	404
133. BAPTISM OF CHRIST. MOSAIC FROM SANTA MARIA IN COSMEDIN, RAVENNA. AFTER QUAST.....	405
134. A BAPTISM, FROM A FRESCO IN SANTA PUDENZIANA, ROME. AFTER MARTIGNY	405
135. A BAPTISM OF CHRIST, FROM A FRESCO IN SAN PONZIANO, ROME. MÜNTER..	406
136. A BAPTISTERY FROM A SARCOPHAGUS, ROME. AFTER DEHIO AND BEZOLD....	410
137. GROUNDPLAN OF A BAPTISTERY AT DEIR SETA, CENTRAL SYRIA. AFTER DE VOGÜÉ.....	410
138. VERTICAL SECTION OF BAPTISTERY OF SAN GIOVANNI. DEHIO.....	411
139. VERTICAL SECTION OF BAPTISTERY IN ALBEGNA. DEHIO.....	412
140. AN ALTAR (mensa) OF THE FIFTH CENTURY. AFTER ROLLER.....	427
141. A ROMAN COLUMBARIUM. AFTER GUHL.....	513
142. A STREET OF TOMBS LEADING FROM HERCULANEUM GATE, POMPEII. AFTER GUHL.....	515
143. ENTRANCE TO SANTA DOMITILLA, ROME. KRAUS.....	517
144. A GALLERY IN CATACOMBS. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	518
145. PLAN OF SANTA AGNESE, ROME. KRAUS.....	518
146. AN ARCOSOLIUM. KRAUS.....	519
147. SECTION OF CHAMBER AND LUMINARIUM. NORTHCOTE AND BROWNLOW.....	520
148. ROCK-HEWN TOMBS AT EL-BARAH, CENTRAL SYRIA. DE VOGÜÉ.....	521

PLATE I. GILDED GLASSES AND BRONZE BUSTS, REPRESENTING PETER AND

PAUL.....	FACING 112
" II. THE SARCOPHAGUS OF JUNIUS BASSUS, PHOTOGRAPH.....	FACING 144
" II ^a . THE SARCOPHAGUS OF JUNIUS BASSUS, ENGRAVING.....	FACING 145
" III. CHRISTIAN INSCRIPTIONS ASSOCIATED WITH CHRISTIAN SYMBOLS..	FACING 258

	PAGE
PLATE IV. CHRISTIAN SYMBOLS ON BURIAL MONUMENTS.....	FACING 261
“ V. EPITAPHS FROM FIRST HALF OF THE THIRD CENTURY.....	FACING 262
“ VI. INSCRIPTIONS OF DOCTRINAL IMPORT.....	FACING 264
“ VII. INSCRIPTIONS OF POPE DAMASUS, FOURTH CENTURY.....	FACING 265
“ VIII. EPITAPHS OF SECOND HALF OF THE FOURTH CENTURY.....	FACING 267
“ IX. FACSIMILE OF THE FIRST PAGE OF THE ANTIPHONARIUM OF GREGORY THE GREAT.....	FACING 313
“ X. NUMÆ FROM EARLY CODICES.....	FACING 314
MAP OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE AT THE END OF THE REIGN OF JUSTINIAN, SHOWING THE CHIEF SITES OF CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS....	FACING 22-23
MAP OF ROME AND ITS ENVIRONS, SHOWING THE LOCATION OF THE CATACOMBS, PRINCIPAL CHURCHES, AND OTHER IMPORTANT OBJECTS.....	FACING 545

CONTENTS AND ANALYTIC OUTLINE.

INTRODUCTION.

CHAPTER I.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

1. Definition.....	13	(3) Of worship and rites.....	14
2. Divisions.....	13	(4) Of Christian life.....	14
3. Divisions of Christian archæology.		4. History of archæology.....	15
(1) Of Christian art.....	13	5. Relations of Christian to classical archæology.....	16
(2) Of constitution and government.....	14	6. Chronological limits and reasons..	17, 18

CHAPTER II.

UTILITY OF THE STUDY.

1. Connection of archæology with history of civilization.....	19	(3) Has aided to correct the text of patristic writings.....	20
2. Utility of archæology.		(4) Has helped to write the history of heresies.....	21
(1) Has corrected chronology.....	20	(5) Unconscious testimony.....	21
(2) Has corrected false notions of the hatred of art.....	20	(6) They help to ascertain what Christ taught.....	22

BOOK FIRST.

ARCHÆOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN ART.

CHAPTER I.

GEOGRAPHY AND CHRONOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN ART MONUMENTS.

1. Reasons of the rapid spread of the Gospel.....	25	(2) Nevertheless limited.....	28
2. A message to the poor.....	25	(3) Ruthless destruction of, reasons.....	28, 29
3. Gained some of the better classes....	26	8. Monuments of first century.....	29, 30
4. Number of Christians in the empire..	26	9. " " second ".....	30, 31
5. Spirit of the new religion.....	27	10. " " third ".....	31-34
6. Adoption by the state.....	27	11. " " fourth ".....	34-36
7. Monuments.		12. " " fifth ".....	36-39
(1) Increase of.....	28	13. " " sixth ".....	39-41

CHAPTER II

THE RELATIONS OF CHRISTIANITY TO ART DURING THE FIRST SIX CENTURIES.

1. Three chief questions involved.		(5) The second commandment does not prohibit art.....	43
A. The Jewish origin of the first Christian converts, and the peculiarity of the Semitic imagination.		(6) The temple site.....	44
(1) First Christians of Jewish origin.....	42	(7) Vegetable and animal forms....	45
(2) Jewish exclusiveness.....	42	(8) The commandment a hindrance to art.....	45
(3) Depressed condition of Jewish people.....	43	(9) The Semitic imagination impetuous.....	45, 46
(4) This unfavorable to art culture.	43	(10) Examples from Scripture.....	46
		(11) Confirmed from examples, the temple, sculpture, poetry..	47, 48

B. Diverse opinions of Jews and Greeks relative to the nature and revelation of God.		4. The mythological element in Christian art.
(1) Hebrew monotheism unfavorable to arts of form.....	49, 60	(1) Barberini Diptych.....	60
(2) The Greek mythology, its externalness, favorable to arts of form.....	49, 50	(2) Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus.....	60
(8) Illustration in St. Paul's writing.....	50	(3) Greek manuscript.....	61
C. The growing influence of Christianity, and its effect on art culture.		(4) Roman imperial coins.....	61
(1) Universalism of the Gospel.....	51	5. Types.....	61
(2) Powerful art influences.....	51	6. Heathen elements in Christian structures.
(3) Early opposition of Christians to art—its extent.....	52, 53	(1) Sarcophagi.....	62
(4) Decorative art the earliest form.....	54	(2) Churches.....	62
(5) Originality of Christian art.....	54	7. Prophecies and preparations—examples.
(6) Symbolism of Christian art.....	55	(1) Translation of Elijah and Apollo.....	63
(7) The Church appropriated what was at hand.....	55	(2) The good shepherd and the ram bearer.....	62
(8) Decoration of burial monuments.....	56	(3) Christ and Orpheus.....	64
2. The Roman Catacombs, decorative art in the same.....	56-58	(4) Christ and Hercules.....	64
3. Commingling of Christian and pagan elements.....	59	(5) Temptation and the Sirens.....	65
		(6) Christ and Mars.....	66
		(7) Numismatic examples.....	66, 67
		8. No bacchic nor amatory scenes.....	68
		9. Amor and Psyche the type of eternal reunion.....	68, 69
		10. The genii.....	69
		11. The phoenix a symbol of the resurrection.....	70, 71

CHAPTER III.

SYMBOLISM OF CHRISTIAN ART.

1. General principles.		(6) The Tau cross.....	88
(1) Definition of symbol.....	72	4. The Alpha-Omega monuments.....	88
(2) Not arbitrary.....	73	5. The vine.....	89
(3) Caution in interpretation.....	73	6. The Good Shepherd.....	90
(4) Canons of interpretation.....	74	7. This symbol not necessarily derived	91
(5) Schools of interpretation.....	75	8. The disciples and the Church.
2. Examples—Christ.		(1) The door—its significance...	91
(1) No portrait of Christ preserved.....	76	(2) The fish.....	92
(2) The lamb.....	76	(3) The sheep and the lambs.....	93
(3) The fish—the eucharist.....	77-83	(4) The ship explained.....	93
3. The cross and crucifix.		9. Other symbols.
(1) Pre-Christian.....	83	(1) The anchor.....	93
(2) Signs of the cross.....	84	(2) The palm-tree and the palm branch.....	93
(3) Pre-Constantine cross.....	84	(3) The crown, lyre, peacock, etc.	93
(4) Not of Indian origin.....	84	10. The caricatures of Christ and his doctrine.....	94-96
(5) The monogram of Christ... 85-87

CHAPTER IV.

EARLY CHRISTIAN PAINTING AND MOSAICS.

1. Earliest paintings in the catacombs.	97	11. Various types of the Virgin.
2. Similarity of Christian to heathen painting.....	97	(1) The Virgin and star... ..	106
3. The cycle of Christian art peculiar.	98	(2) Virgin and child in Santa Domitilla ..	107
4. The principle of artistic balancing..	98	(3) Virgin and child in Santa Agnese.....	108
5. Naturalness of early Christian art..	99	12. The Good Shepherd and St. Cecilia.....	109
6. Two types of Christ.....	100	13. Vine ornaments.....	110, 111
7. The later frescos depart from the earlier type.....	101	14. Paintings on gilt glasses.....	111
8. Reasons of this change.....	104	15. Primacy of Peter.....	111, 112
9. The orantes	106	16. Miniatures and illuminations.....	113
10. No symbolic representation of the Virgin.....	106	17. Fragment of a Latin Bible.....	114

MOSAICS.

1. General principles.		10. Saint Paul beyond the walls.....	120
(1) How classified.....	114	11. Santa Maria Maggiore.
(2) Nearest allied to painting.....	115	(1) Description.....	120
(3) Kinds of mosaics.....	115	(2) The teachings of these mosaics.....	121
2. Limited use in the Catacombs.....	115	12. Mosaics of Ravenna.
3. Utility of their study.....	115	(1) San Giovanni in fonte.....	122
4. Caution against restorations.....	116	(2) Mausoleum of Galla Placidia.....	122
5. Chronology.....	116	13. Other mosaics of the fifth century..	128
6. Santa Costanza in Rome.		14. Mosaics of the sixth century.
(1) Its style.....	117	(1) SS. Cosmas and Damian, Rome, description....	124, 125
(2) Its description.....	119	(2) San Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna.....	125
(3) Transition in style, and the cause.....	119	(3) St. Sophia, Constantinople.....	127-129
7. Chapels in San Giovanni in Laterano.....	115	(4) St. Sophia, Thessalonica.....	129, 130
8. Santa Pudenziana.....	119	(5) St. Catharine's, Mt. Sinai....	130
9. Santa Sabina.....	120

CHAPTER V.

EARLY CHRISTIAN SCULPTURE.

1. Why Christianity seemed hostile to sculpture.....	131	9. The decorative principle united with the symbolic.....	137
2. Why sculpture experienced a decadence.....	131	10. Examples of combination.
3. No portraits of Christ.....	131	(1) Translation of Elijah.....	138
4. The Good Shepherd in statuary....	132	(2) The History of Jonah.....	139
5. Difference between the Good Shepherd and the ram-bearing Mercury.....	133	11. Frequency of recurrence of Scriptural subjects.....	142
6. The bronze statue of St. Peter.....	133	12. Architectural elements in sarcophagi.....	142, 143
7. Statue of Hippolytus, its Christian origin questioned.....	133, 134	13. The Junius Bassus monument.....	145, 146
8. Types of Christ in Christian sculpture.....	136	14. The nativity in sculpture.....	148
		15. The last judgment in sculpture....	150

CARVINGS IN IVORY.

1. Ivory diptychs.....	151	4. Carving on book-covers.....	155
2. Consular and ecclesiastical diptychs.....	151	5. Ivory paxes.....	156
3. One of the earliest representations of the crucifixion.....	152	6. Sculptured lamps.....	157
		7. Ampullæ or blood-phials.....	157, 158

CHAPTER VI.

EARLY CHRISTIAN ARCHITECTURE.

§ 1.—The Christian Basilica.

1. Origin of the basilica:		2. Origin of pagan Roman basilica.
(1) Alberti's theory from the Roman basilica.....	157	(1) Form of the law basilica.....	175
(2) Zestermann's theory, a Christian development.....	158	(2) The apse.....	177
(3) His five classes.....	159	3. Constructive elements.....	178
(4) The hypæthral temple.....	159	4. Erroneous theories.....	178
(5) Messmer's theory, from the triclinium.....	161	5. Earliest notices of Christian basilicas.....	180
(6) From the private dwelling..	162	6. The Christian Church an organization.....	181
(7) From the pagan schola	162	7. The apse the unifying member in the Christian basilica.....	181
(8) An eclectic view, its discussion.....	162-166	8. Suggestion of the apse in heathen structures.....	182
(9) Relations of private dwellings to churches.....	166	9. Differences between heathen and Christian basilicas.....	183
(10) Development of the atrium.....	167-169	10. The parts of the basilica:
(11) The schola and burial guilds.....	170-172	(1) The apse and its furniture... ..	184
(12) The cellæ.....	172-175	(2) The vestibule.....	185
		(3) The transept.....	187
		(4) The triumphal arch.....	157
		(5) The naves.....	158

- | | |
|---|---|
| 11. The influence of the Christian basilica on other forms of Christian architecture. (1) First germs of the Gothic.... 189 (2) The unifying spirit..... 189 (3) Further transformations..... 190 12. Some of the earliest Christian churches. (1) Few pre-Constantine..... 191 (2) Examples..... 193-196 13. Basilicas of Roman origin in the time of Constantine. (1) Constantine's influence..... 196 (2) Few churches survive—examples..... 197-202 | 14. Some basilicas of the post-Constantine period. (1) Contrasts between East and West..... 202 (2) Splendour of Constantine's reign..... 203 (3) Examples of churches... 203-206 15. Churches of Ravenna. (1) Periods of architecture in Ravenna..... 207 (2) Examples of churches in each period..... 208-211 16. Christian basilicas in other countries..... 211-217 |
|---|---|

§ 2.—The Central or Domed Church.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. Its peculiar home in the East..... 217 2. Origin of the domed structure. (1) Very obscure..... 218 (2) Resemble baptisteries..... 218 (3) Central building in Constantine's time..... 220 3. Classification of domed structures. (1) With niches..... 220 (2) Cruciform structures..... 221 (3) The simple rotunda..... 221 (4) With niches and columns—examples..... 222-229 4. Byzantine architecture. (1) Syncretism in art..... 230 | (2) Valuable art services of Byzantium..... 231 (3) A product of the Oriental spirit..... 232 (4) Three historic periods..... 232 (5) Fixedness of art forms in the second period—reasons, 232, 233 5. Saint Sophia. (1) Difficulties of structure..... 234 (2) Vast preparations..... 235 (3) Description..... 236-241 6. The circular structure, and examples..... 241-244 7. The cruciform buildings, and examples..... 244-246 |
|--|--|

CHAPTER VII.

EARLY CHRISTIAN EPIGRAPHY.

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1. Definitions and principles. (1) Early Christian use..... 247 (2) Increased interest in later times..... 247 (3) Value of Christian epigraphy..... 248 (4) Number of Christian inscriptions..... 248 (5) Materials on which inscriptions are found..... 249 (6) Kinds of inscriptions..... 249 2. Palæographic principles. (1) How are inscriptions read.. 250 (2) Punctuation..... 250 (3) Orthography of inscriptions. 251 3. Chronology of inscriptions. (1) Indictions..... 252 (2) Provincial eras..... 252 (3) Inscriptions without dates.. 253 (4) Special indications..... 253 4. The subject and content of inscriptions. (1) Pagan influence in Christian epigraphy..... 254 (2) Becker's four conclusions respecting D. M..... 255 | (3) Views of death and of the future..... 256, 257 5. Application of principles and their illustration. (1) The magi..... 258 (2) Paradise..... 258 (3) Orantes..... 258 (4) The church..... 259 (5) Tapers in church service... 260 (6) Other symbols..... 261, 262 (7) The significance of dormit. 263 (8) Carelessness in preparation of inscriptions..... 263 (9) The future life..... 264 (10) The Damasene inscriptions. 264 (11) Prayers to the dead..... 265 (12) The terms for chief pastor.. 266 (13) Warning against hasty inductions..... 267 (14) Possible ignorance of Christians as to the significance of certain inscriptions... 267 6. Eulogistic character of later inscriptions..... 268 7. The Graffiti..... 268, 269 8. Epigraphic and pictorial aids to history illustrated... 270, 271 |
|--|---|

CHAPTER VIII.

EARLY CHRISTIAN POETRY AND HYMNOLOGY.

1. Preliminary considerations.	4. The poetry and hymnology of the Western Church.
(1) Relations of poetry to religion..... 272	(1) Two kinds of sacred poetry. 283
(2) Earliest hymns..... 272	(2) Lyric poetry an exotic in Rome..... 284
(3) Early Christianity prolific of poetic themes..... 273	(3) High character of Christian lyric..... 284
(4) Yet not favourable to metrical forms..... 273	(4) Commodianus, his poems, their value..... 285
(5) The Psalter at first in general use..... 273	(5) Lactantius and Juvenius..... 285-287
(6) Gems of hymnology in the New Testament..... 273	(6) Damasus, hymns of, and character..... 287, 288
(7) The probable use of hymns in the second century.... 274	(7) Disturbed conditions under Constantine..... 288
(8) Mûnter's conclusions..... 275	(8) Julian and his policy, its effects upon Christian literature..... 289, 290
(9) The Greek fathers favourable to the use of hymns. 276	(9) Paulinus of Nola, his theory of poetry, and his themes..... 290, 291
(10) Reason of the fewness of hymns..... 276	(10) Ambrose, his education and contributions to hymnology..... 291, 292
2. Sacred poetry of the Syrian Church.	(11) Influence of Arian hymns... 292
(1) Antioch the mother city.... 277	(12) Prudentius, his works and their character..... 293-295
(2) The hymns of the Gnostics. 278	(13) Fortunatus, his poems... 295, 296
(3) Ephraem of Edessa, his methods..... 278	(14) Other hymn writers..... 296
(4) His poems numerous, their metrical principles..... 279	(15) Doxologies..... 296, 297
(5) Example of his poetry. 279, 280	(16) Gregory's hymns of doubtful genuineness..... 296
3. The Greek hymnology.
(1) The Pædagogus of Clement. 280
(2) Gregory of Nazianzen..... 281
(3) Synesius, his defects..... 281
(4) Anatolius and his hymns.. 282

CHAPTER IX.

EARLY CHRISTIAN MUSIC.

1. Educational value of Jewish ceremonies..... 298	18. The Greek musical notation—its complex character..... 307
2. Hebrew music lost..... 298	19. Romans not patrons of art..... 307
3. First Christians familiar with Jewish forms..... 299	20. Christianity first developed the diatonic..... 308
4. Greek influence powerful..... 299	21. Ambrose reduced the modes to four 309
5. The old temple service a partial conservator..... 300	22. The modes and scheme..... 309
6. Influence of Jewish sects..... 300	23. Other musical writers—Macrobius, Boethius, etc..... 310
7. The early Christians adopted what was then at hand..... 301	24. Gregory the Great, his services in reforming music..... 311
8. Improvisation..... 301	25. The Authentic and Plagal modes.. 312
9. Music not an imitation of nature... 302	26. Explanation of these and the nature of the development..... 312-314
10. The beginnings of Christian music uncertain in date..... 302	27. Gregorian Antiphonarium..... 314
11. Arian influence..... 303	28. The Neumes—illustrations and translations proposed—the key lost... 315
12. Conciliatory action..... 303	29. Perpetuations of the Gregorian chant—its originality..... 316
13. Opinions as to this action..... 303, 304	30. Decline of music in the Eastern Church... 316
14. Character of the singing service... 304	31. Connection of religion with art culture..... 317, 318n
15. Ambrosian chant..... 305	32. Remarks of Cousin..... 318n
16. Changed circumstances of the Church—its effect on music..... 305
17. Music and poetry associated by the Greeks..... 306

BOOK SECOND.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF THE CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT OF THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN ITS IDEA AND ORIGIN.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. New Testament idea of the Church.
(1) A kingdom..... 322
(2) Ekklēsia 322
(3) The body of Christ..... 323
(4) A temple..... 323
(5) The bride..... 323
(6) A visible form..... 323
2. The names applied to its members.
(1) Disciples..... 322
(2) Believers..... 323
(3) Brethren..... 323
(4) Opprobrious epithets..... 323
(5) The clients of their Master, Christ..... 323 | 3. The Apostolate.
(1) The triumph of the Church assured..... 323
(2) No ineapred form of the Church..... 324
(3) Chariuns..... 324
(4) Christ alone was teacher, the apostles were disciples..... 324
(5) A fellowship..... 325
(6) Apostles known to the Jewish Church..... 326
(7) Other ministers..... 328
(8) The Twelve—its significance..... 327
(9) Other apostles..... 328
(10) The first test of apostleship..... 328 |
|--|--|

CHAPTER II.

THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH—ITS COMPOSITION AND OFFICERS.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. The apostles and deacons.
(1) First officers..... 329
(2) But one order at first..... 330
(3) Who were the deacons?..... 330
(4) Gravity of their functions..... 330
(5) Adopted by the Gentile churches also..... 331
(6) Deaconesses..... 331
(7) The diaconate peculiarly Christian..... 331
(8) The deacons also preached..... 332
(9) Prior to the first persecution no formal church..... 332, 333
(10) The Church organized..... 333
(11) James, his office..... 333
2. Presbyters and bishops.
(1) First pertained to local societies..... 334
(2) Presbyters common to Jewish and Christian societies..... 334
(3) A council—what?..... 334
(4) The entire community had a share in the deliberations..... 335
(5) Each congregation independent..... 335 | (6) The presbyters chiefly officers of administration..... 335
(7) The early type republican, not monarchical..... 336
(8) Presbyters also teachers..... 336, 337
(9) Presbyters in Gentile churches..... 337, 338
3. Essential identity of bishops and elders.
(1) Reasons for so believing..... 338
(2) Schaff's summary..... 339
(3) Why two terms? Two theories..... 339, 340
(4) Supervisor of charities..... 340
4. General conclusions.
(1) Duties of officers at first not sharply defined..... 341
(2) Chariuns the first preparation..... 341
(3) Clement makes no distinction between bishops and presbyters..... 342
(4) No trace of a primacy..... 342 |
|--|--|

CHAPTER III.

THE POST-APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION FROM THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM TO IRENAEUS.

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. Influence of the death of apostles and the destruction of Jerusalem.
(1) Their vast importance..... 343
(2) The destruction of Jerusalem scattered the apostles abroad..... 343
(3) Emancipated the Church from Jewish prejudices..... 343
(4) Compelled a more compact organization..... 344
2. The Ignatian episcopacy.
(1) Functions of a bishop..... 344
(2) Bishops and presbyters differ in their derivation..... 345 | 3. The Clementine homilies.
(1) A monarchical episcopacy..... 346
(2) Bishops successors of the apostles..... 346
(3) Arbiter of doctrines..... 347
4. The Shepherd of Hermas and Polycarp.
(1) Distinction between the lay and clerical element..... 347
(2) No Catholic Church yet recognized..... 348
(3) The bishop the unifying power..... 348
(4) Church letters..... 348
(5) No priesthood of the clergy in the New Testament..... 349 |
|---|--|

CONTENTS AND ANALYTIC OUTLINE.

7

(6) Rise of sacerdotalism, its effects 349 (7) The views found in "The Teaching" 350 A. The form of government. (1) A congregational episcopacy. 350 (2) The charism a result of the office... 351	(3) The choice of bishops..... 351 (4) The episcopacy a development 351 (5) Relations of bishops to each other..... 352 (6) Bishop of Rome..... 352 (7) Change in presbyterial power 352 (8) Different authority of bishop and presbyter..... 352
--	---

CHAPTER IV.

THE CHURCH CONSTITUTION FROM IRENEUS TO THE ACCESSION OF CONSTANTINE.

1. The theory of Irenæus. (1) Peculiar conditions of the Church..... 353 (2) The Gnostic threats..... 353 (3) Divisions..... 354 (4) Testimony of Hegesippus—of Irenæus..... 354 (5) The Church principle of Irenæus (a) Harmony of apostolic teaching..... 354 (b) The bishops the depositaries of this teaching..... 355 (c) A regular succession..... 355 (d) Compilation of lists of bishops..... 355 (6) Others in harmony with this principle..... 356 2. The influence of Cyprian. (1) Unity of Church identical with the episcopate..... 356 (2) Which unity proceeds from the chair of St. Peter's..... 357 (3) Power and authority of tradition..... 357	(4) The episcopate no longer congregational but general.... 358 (5) This effected by ordination.... 358 3. The sacerdotal principle. (1) Growth of sacerdotalism..... 358 (2) The priesthood of the clergy came from the priesthood of the body of believers..... 359 (3) Cyprian's view..... 359 (4) Did the sacerdotal principle come from the Jewish or Gentile Churches?..... 360 (5) Lightfoot's opinion..... 360 (6) This not so clearly established. 361 4. The Apostolic Constitutions. (1) The Church a divine state.... 362 (2) Ordination, how effected, and its significance..... 362 5. Conclusion. (1) The Church forms and government affected by their environments..... 362 (2) Church government a development..... 362
---	---

CHAPTER V.

THE OFFICES AND OFFICERS OF THE POST-APOSTOLIC CHURCH.

1. Origin of episcopacy. (1) Theoria. (a) Of apostolic origin 363 (b) It originated in household societies..... 364 (c) It was formed out of the presbyterial office by elevation..... 364 (2) Conclusion..... 365 2. The presbyters, deacons, deaconesses, etc. (1) Duties and prerogatives..... 365 (2) Limitations of the rights of the laity..... 365 (3) Functions of the presbyters.... 366 (4) Changes in the functions of the deacons..... 366 (5) Could baptize..... 367 (6) Could not consecrate the eucharist..... 367 (7) When eligible to this office.... 367 (8) The number of deacons..... 368 (9) The archdeacon. (a) How elected..... 364 (b) His importance..... 368 (10) The deaconesses. (a) Qualifications..... 368	(b) Their ordination..... 369 (c) Did not baptize..... 369 (d) Their duties..... 369 3. Chorepiscopi, metropolitans, and patriarchs. (1) Divisions of the empire accepted by the Church..... 369 (2) Subordination of officers..... 370 (3) Chorepiscopi. (a) Occasion of institution.... 371 (b) Presbyters or deacons.... 371 (c) Functions..... 371 (d) Sat in councils..... 371 (4) Primates. (a) Time of origin uncertain... 372 (b) How appointed..... 372 (c) Their duties..... 372 (5) Patriarchs. (a) Arose gradually..... 373 (b) Duties..... 373 4. Suborders of the clergy. (1) Providential indications.... 373 (2) Subdeacons..... 373 (3) Acolytes..... 374 (4) Exorcists, their duties..... 374 (5) Other inferior officers, as readers, door-keepers, etc..... 374
--	---

CHAPTER VI.

SYNODS AND COUNCILS—THEIR AUTHORITY.

1. The synod of Jerusalem.....	375	8. Œcumenical councils.....	376
2. Church synods after the analogy of civil leagues.....	375	(1) Who assembled the councils?	376
3. Necessary to preserve Church unity.....	375	(2) Who presided?.....	376
4. Provincial synods.....	375	(3) Subjects considered.....	377
5. Decline of lay influence.....	375	(4) Method of voting.....	378
6. Metropolitan synods.....	376	(5) Were their decisions binding?	376
7. The representative principle.....	376	(6) Growing authority of concil- iary decisions.....	377

CHAPTER VII.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

1. Reasons and degrees of punishment.		(1) The lapsed.....	381
(1) Design of church discipline.....	378	(2) Four orders of penitents.....	381
(2) Catechumenical training a lat- er institution.....	378	(3) Special penitential presbyter.....	382
(3) The regula fidei	379	(4) Decline of the penitential sys- tem.....	382
(4) Church discipline incurred no loss of civil rights.....	379	(5) Ceremony of readmission.....	382
(5) Sins venial and mortal.....	379	(6) Five stages of absolution.....	383
(6) Admonition and lesser ex- communication.....	379	(7) The care of the early Church respecting discipline.....	383
(7) The greater excommunication.....	379	3. Discipline of the clergy.
(8) Notice to other churches.....	380	(1) More stringent than lay disci- pline.....	383
(9) Did not annul benefits of bap- tism.....	380	(2) Penalties inflicted.....	383
(10) Right of appeal.....	380	(3) Deposed clergy rarely rein- stated.....	383
2. Penitential discipline.....		(4) Ancient discipline wholesome.....	384

BOOK THIRD.

THE SACRAMENTS AND WORSHIP OF THE EARLY CHURCH.

INTRODUCTION.

1. Nature of the sacraments.....	389	3. The number of sacraments.....	388
2. Confounding sacraments with mys- teries.....	387, 388	4. Irenæus' view of sacrament and mys- tery.....	388a

CHAPTER I.

THE SACRAMENT OF BAPTISM.

§ 1. The Idea.

1. The formula.....	389	3. Opinions respecting its nature.....	390
2. Peculiarity of the baptism instituted by Christ.....	389	4. Its characterizations.....	390

§ 2. Subjects of Baptism.

1. First subjects were adults.....	391	5. Origen's testimony.....	392, 393
2. Scriptures and Apostolic fathers si- lent respecting infant baptism.....	391	6. Infant baptism postponed till third year.....	393
3. Patristic views.....	391 392	7. Liberal practice of the Church.....	393
4. Not general until fourth century.....	392

§ 3. Catechumenical Training of Adults for Baptism.

1. Baptism immediate on profession of faith.....	394	2. Special training necessary in case of Gentile converts.....	394
---	-----	---	-----

§ 4. The Ministers.

1. A function of the bishops.....	394	2. Others could administer it in extreme cases.....	395
-----------------------------------	-----	--	-----

§ 5. The Mode of Baptism.

1. Christ made use of known modes... 395	(2) Frescoes from San Pretestato 401
2. Analogies traced..... 395, 396	(3) " " San Calisto. 401, 402
3. Immersion the usual mode among the Jews..... 396	(4) Glass from the Equiline..... 403
4. Jewish proselyte baptism..... 396	(5) Mosaics from Ravenna.. 404-407
5. Immersion the usual mode, but liberty permitted..... 397	(6) Other frescoes..... 405-407
6. "Teaching of the Twelve" as to mode..... 398, 399	8. Clinic baptism..... 407
7. Monumental testimony..... 398-406	9. Cyprian's opinion of clinic baptism..... 407, 408
(1) Frescoes from Santa Lucina.. 398-400	10. Baptism by aspersion by Celtic and Coptic churches..... 408

§ 6. Times and Places of Baptism.

1. Apostolic custom..... 408	3. A reasonable liberty allowed..... 409
2. Favorite times of baptism..... 409	4. Baptisteries..... 409-412

§ 7. Immediate Preliminaries.

1. Profession of faith required..... 412	3. Sponsors and obligations..... 413
2. Renunciation of the devil..... 412

§ 8. Accompanying Ceremonies.

1. Trine baptism of the nude figure.... 413	4. Influence of the Arians..... 414
2. Tertullian's and Ambrose's account 413, 414	5. Unction..... 414
3. Explanations of the practice..... 414	6. Imposition of hands..... 415

CHAPTER II.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

§ 1. Idea and Mode of Celebration.

1. The meal symbolic..... 416	13. Oblations of the whole Church.... 420
2. Celebrated daily..... 416	14. Liturgical forms gradually developed..... 421, 422
3. Testimony of early frescoes.... 416, 417	15. Character of the liturgies..... 421
4. A communal meal..... 417	16. No recognition of a sin-offering.... 421
5. Its administration not confined to a class..... 417	17. In what sense a sacrifice..... 421, 422
6. How celebrated..... 417	18. Opinions respecting the eucharist 422, 423
7. The agape discontinued..... 418	19. Obligation to commune..... 424
8. The two parts of worship..... 418	20. No private mass..... 424
9. The simplicity of early observance 418, 419	21. Elements sent to the sick, etc..... 425
10. Early accounts of..... 418, 419	22. Where celebrated..... 425
11. Order of celebration..... 419, 420	23. When and how often celebrated. 425, 426
12. Infant communion..... 420	24. No elevation of the host..... 426

§ 2. The Altar and its Furniture.

1. Names and forms..... 426	4. Richness of altar furniture..... 426, 429
2. Position of altar..... 426, 427	5. Protest against luxury..... 429
3. The chalice and paten..... 428

CHAPTER III.

EARLY CHRISTIAN WORSHIP.

§ 1. The Apostolic Age.

1. Suggestions of an early liturgy..... 430	4. Composition of early churches.. 431, 432
2. Jewish influences..... 430	5. Greater independence among heathen converts..... 433
3. Forms of worship..... 431

§ 2. Worship in time of Apostolic Fathers.

1. Statement of "The Teaching".... 433	3. Heathen testimony..... 434
2. Testimony of Ignatius..... 434

§ 3. Public Worship in Second and Third Centuries.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. Justin Martyr's account..... 434, 435 | 3. Cyprian's and Augustine's testimony, 436, 437 |
| 2. Tertullian's statement..... 436 | |

CHAPTER IV.

THE EARLIEST LITURGIES.

§ 1.—Origin.

- | | |
|---------------------------------|--|
| 1. Occasions of growth..... 438 | 3. Have undergone great modifications. 439 |
| 2. Penitential system..... 438 | |

§ 2.—Classification and Description.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. Neal's classification..... 439, 440 | 5. Liturgy of St. Mark..... 441 |
| 2. Two parts of a liturgy..... 440 | 6. Classes of Western liturgies.... 441, 443 |
| 3. Liturgy of St. Clement..... 440 | 7. The philosophy of the liturgy..... 443 |
| 4. Liturgy of St. James..... 441 | 8. Central thought in each..... 442, 443 |

CHAPTER V.

THE LORD'S DAY, OR SUNDAY.

§ 1.—Historic Statement.

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. Reason for observing the first day... 444 | 4. Imperial rescripts concerning... 445, 446 |
| 2. Relation of the seventh to the first.. 444 | 5. Humane provisions..... 446 |
| 3. Early testimonies to..... 445 | |

§ 2.—Sanctity and Ground of Observance.

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1. The resurrection of Christ..... 446 | 6. The fourth commandment not the basis of obligation..... 449, 450 |
| 2. No positive enactment..... 447 | |
| 3. Early testimony..... 447, 448 | 7. Patristic testimony respecting the grounds of obligation..... 449, 450 |
| 4. Provisions for observance..... 448, 449 | 8. Reasons of seeking a legal sanction.. 450 |
| 5. Gentile churches not bound by the Jewish law..... 449 | 9. The legal at length supplanted the moral..... 451 |

CHAPTER VI.

EASTER AND OTHER FESTIVALS.

§ 1.—Idea and Time of Observance.

- | | |
|--|------------------------------|
| 1. Influence of the Jewish pas-over.... 452 | 3. The parties..... 452, 453 |
| 2. Controversy about observing Easter 452, 453 | |

§ 2.—Attempts at Reconciliation.

- | | |
|--|------------------------------------|
| 1. The import of the question..... 453 | 4. Conciliatory decisions..... 454 |
| 2. The demand of Victor..... 453, 454 | 5. Rule for celebration..... 454 |
| 3. The arguments..... 454 | 6. Different cycles..... 454, 456 |

§ 3.—The Ceremonies of Easter.

- | | |
|---|--------------------------------------|
| 1. Two divisions of the festival..... 455 | 3. Lengthened observance of..... 456 |
| 2. Acts of mercy..... 456 | |

§ 4.—The Festival of Pentecost.

- | | |
|--|--------------------------------|
| 1. Two uses of the word Pentecost. ... 456 | 2. Mode of observance..... 456 |
|--|--------------------------------|

§ 5.—The Feasts of Epiphany, Christmas, etc.

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. Multiplication of feasts..... 456 | 4. Supposed origin of Christmas..... 457 |
| 2. Origin of the festival of Epiphany.. 456 | 5. Conclusions reached..... 457, 458 |
| 3. Date of birth of Christ unknown.... 457 | 6. Influence of Mariolatry..... 458 |

BOOK FOURTH.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

THE CHRISTIAN FAMILY.

1. The family a type of the Church....	461	dren	465
2. Christ's sanction of the family.....	461	11. The Church had oversight of mar-
3. The apostles in harmony with		riage.....	466
Christ.....	461, 462	12. Prescribed limits of consanguinity.	466
4. Teaching of the Fathers.....	462, 463	13. Influence of asceticism and celibacy.	467
5. Position of woman among the Ro-		14. Possible origin of asceticism.....	467
mans.....	463	15. Heathen examples of asceticism.....	467
6. Evils under the later Republic.....	463	16. Causes strengthening it in the
7. Christian and heathen view of abor-		Church.....	468
tion.....	464	17. Civil legislation adverse to asceti-
8. Opinions respecting infanticide.	464, 465	cism	468
9. Training of children.....	465	18. Evil effects of the exaltation of cal-
10. The Roman law concerning the chil-		ibacy and virginity in the Church	469

CHAPTER II.

THE CHURCH AND SLAVERY.

1. The relations of the Church to civil		emperors on abolition of slavery.	473 government.....	470	9. The moral type influenced aboli-
2. Christianity gave a new law.....	470	tion.....	473, 474
3. Slavery a fixed institution in the		10. The simplicity of Christianity un-
Roman empire.....	470	favorable to slavery.....	474
4. Condition of the slave.....	470, 471	11. Slaves eligible to office in the Church	474
5. Christianity did not attempt direct		12. Monumental evidence of equality of abolition.....	471, 472	all classes under Christianity	475, 476
6. Its care for the slave.....	472	13. The testimony of the bullæ	476, 477
7. Emancipation encouraged and prac-		14. Christianity elevated labor.....	477
tised	472	15. Illustrative inscriptions	477
8. Slight influence of first Christian		16. Evidence entirely harmonious.....	478

CHAPTER III.

RELATION OF THE EARLY CHURCH TO CIVIL AND MILITARY LIFE.

1. Christianity encouraged labor	479	11. Actors excluded from the Church..	483
2. Trying position of the early Christ-		12. Conciliary action.....	483
ians.....	479	13. Roman love of spectacles.....	483
3. Certain trades condemned.....	480	14. Aversion to military life	484
4. Patristic opinions.....	480	15. Tainted with idolatry.....	484
5. Public amusements interdicted....	480	16. Decadence of the military spirit....	485
6. Low condition of the Roman drama	481	17. Milder views at length prevail.....	485
7. High tragedy unpopular.....	481	18. The provision of the Church for
8. Legal disabilities of actors.....	481	soldiers.....	485, 486
9. All shows tainted with idolatry....	482	19. Monumental evidence.....	486, 487
10. Tertullian's and Cyprian's state-		20. Few monumental references to mil-
ments.....	482, 483	itary life.....	487

CHAPTER IV.

CHARITIES IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

1. Poor-relief by heathen peoples.....	488	9. True inspiration of Christian charity	491
2. Teaching of the Stoics.....	488, 489	10. One family of believers.....	491
3. Its defects.....	489	11. Financial prosperity in the Roman
4. The clubs and guilds.....	489	empire	492
5. The element of selfishness in them.	489	12. Its influence on charities	492
6. Influence of the Collegia on Christ-		13. Adverse influences.....	493
ian charities.....	490	14. Christian charities broad and organ-
7. The Church a true community.....	490	ized.....	493, 494
8. Heathen charities tainted with self-		15. Influence of Christian charity on
ishness	490	pauperism	495

16. Opportunities for Christian charities in persecutions and misfortunes	496, 497	18. Influence of union of Church and State	498
17. Influence of Montanism upon charity	497	19. Decay of pure charity	499
		20. Rise of hospitals	499

CHAPTER V.

THE RELATIONS OF THE EARLY CHURCH TO EDUCATION AND GENERAL CULTURE.

1. The culture of the apostles difficult to ascertain	500	10. Embarrassments of the Christians	504
2. Influence of Jewish practices	500	11. The Catechumenate	505
3. Schools in time of Christ	501	12. The uses of Greek learning	505
4. Influence of the synagogue	501	13. The schools of Alexandria and An- tioch	505-507
5. Christ's method suggestive	502	14. A more favorable view of pagan cul- ture	507
6. Exalted character of the apostolic teachings and writings	502, 503	15. Christian theory of education as de- veloped by the Christian fathers	507-509
7. The Christian duty to children	503	16. Effects of the barbarian invasions	509
8. The prevalence of secular schools	504	17. Education in the Eastern Church	509
9. The declining condition of education in the West	504

CHAPTER VI.

CARE FOR THE DEAD IN THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

1. Jewish burial customs	510	13. Christian care for the dead	515
2. Burial, not burning	510	14. Inhumation and not burning	516
3. Three kinds of tombs	511	15. The family idea preserved in bur- ial	516
4. Jewish monuments	511	16. No secrecy necessary	516
5. Greek burial customs	511	17. Burial clubs	516
6. Both burying and burning prac- tised	511, 512	18. Origin of Roman catacombs	516, 517
7. Cheerfulness attempted	512	19. Description of catacombs	517
8. Roman customs	512, 513	20. Extent of catacombs	517, 518
9. Legal provisions	513	21. Cubicula not used for public wor- ship	519
10. Both burial and burning practised	513	22. The lighting of the catacombs	520
11. The Columbarium	514	23. Theology of the catacombs	520
12. Ornamented tombs on the public streets	514, 515	24. Tombs of Central Syria	521

ADDENDA.

I. Glossary of Terms	523	III. Translation of Inscriptions	529
II. Italian Churches and Catacombs, with English Names	527	IV. Literature of Christian Archæology	538
		V. General Index	549

INTRODUCTION.

CHAPTER I.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

ARCHÆOLOGY (ἀρχαιολογία)¹ is the science of antiquity. Its province is to ascertain the life of ancient peoples by the study of their monuments, customs, laws, institutions, etc. It is an auxiliary of general history.

Definition.

It may be divided into general and special archæology. General archæology considers those fundamental principles which must alike control in the study of the early life of all peoples. Special archæology has reference to the life and institutions of a particular people or age, or to a particular kind or class of evidence.

Divisions.

Christian archæology should be further limited to the systematic study of the art, constitution, government, discipline, worship, rites, and life of the early Christian Church.

Further limitation of the term.

It can be conveniently examined under the following fourfold division :

a. The archæology of Christian art.

Divisions of Christian archæology.

This examines Christian thought, life, doctrines, and institutions as they are found crystallized and expressed in monuments; monumental evidence being here used in distinction from documentary. It therefore includes the examination of the geography and chronology of Christian art monuments; the influences exerted upon Christian art by Judaism and heathenism ; the symbolism of Christian art ; the history and monuments of Christian painting and mosaics, of Christian sculpture, architecture, music, and poetry. It carefully studies the Christian burial monuments, also Christian inscriptions, coins, medals, seals, rings, diptychs, and furniture.² A

¹ The word ἀρχαιολογία seems to be the adequate Greek synonyme for the Latin Antiquitates. Hence some writers, notably Bingham, have preferred to use the latter term.

² Otto Jahn would rank numismatics among the sources of history, and regard epigraphics as an auxiliary of philology.

scientific treatment presupposes a correct estimate of monumental evidence, which is the result of a thorough knowledge of the autoptics,¹ criticism, and hermeneutics of Christian art monuments.²

b. Archæology of the constitution and government of the Christian Church.

This includes, 1.) The examination of the fundamental idea of the Christian Church as revealed in the New Testament Scriptures. 2.) The Church in its organized form. 3.) The offices and officers of the Church; the superior, including the bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and the inferior, including the subdeacons, deaconesses, catechists, acolytes, exorcists, etc. The government by councils, synods, etc. 4.) The Church discipline, which examines the conditions and methods of admission into the Church; the duties of the individual members to the organic body; the nature and extent of penalties, etc.

c. Archæology of Christian worship and rites.

This embraces, 1.) The means of public religious education and edification, including prayer, singing, reading of the Scriptures, preaching, etc.; in which all might participate. 2.) The sacraments, their nature, number, efficacy, candidates, ministrants, mode and place of celebration. 3.) The sacred times and seasons, as Sabbath, Easter, Christmas, Quadragesima, etc.

d. Archæology of Christian life.

This considers, 1.) The Christian family, its basis and significance. 2.) The opinion of the Church respecting the marriage relation, the treatment of slavery, household religion, etc. 3.) The relation of Christians to trades and business; what vocations were lawful, what forbidden. 4.) The relation of the Christian Church to charities; the care for the poor; the existence of orphanages, hospitals, etc. 5.) The social and literary position of the early Church. 6.) The care for the dead, Christian burial, prayers for the dead, etc.³

¹ This term is applied to the simple description of monuments; their material, extent, degree of preservation, style, place of discovery, etc.

² Kraus: Ueber Begriff, Umfang, und Bedeutung der christlichen Archæologie. Freiburg, 1879. s. 12.

³ v. Schultze: In Zöckler's Handbuch der theologischen Wissenschaften, etc. 3 Bde. 1894. Vol. ii, ss. 236-272.

This is mainly after the analogy of classical archæology; and no valid reason can be urged why the archæology of the Christian Church should not have like logical division.

The two latest treatises upon Christian archæology are:

J. Mallet: Cours Élémentaire d'Archéologie religieuse. Paris, 1883.

Reusens: Éléments d'Archéologie chrétienne. Aix-la-Chapelle, 1885.

The former defines archæology as the science of ancient monuments. "Archæology,

The study of Christian archæology properly dates from the sixteenth century. It was occasioned not only by the general revival of classical learning, but especially by the earnest controversies of the reformation period. The Protestant reformers had vigorously arraigned the Church for a wide departure from the primitive simplicity of worship, doctrine, and polity, and they believed that this charge could be best justified by a thorough examination of the life, the institutions, and the customs of the early Christian centuries. The Magdeburg centuriators¹ thus became the pioneers in special archæological studies; to justify the revolt against the mediæval Church was their chief aim.

To answer this arraignment of the centuriators, the adherents of Rome were in turn compelled to enter upon like fundamental studies. Cæsar Baronius († 1607), a priest of the Roman oratory, then a cardinal, after thirty years of most laborious investigation published his Annales Ecclesiæ, a work which has ever since been regarded as the well-furnished arsenal from which the Roman Catholic writers have derived their weapons of defense.²

While the thought, doctrines, usages and life of the early Christin the sense in which we use it, includes the study of architecture, sculpture, painting—all, indeed, embraced under the term arts of design; also palæography, or the science of inscriptions and ancient writings: numismatics, or ancient coins and medals; glyptics, or engraving on precious stones; sphragistics, or the science of seals; ceramics, or a knowledge of pottery; and, finally, furniture—this last term not being confined to its ordinary meaning, but including every thing connected with Christian worship, as baptismal fonts, chairs, stalls, sacred vessels, crosses, chandeliers, censers, vestments, and liturgical ornaments." pp. 1, 2.

Canon Rousens says: "The study of antiquity can be divided into two parts: 1.) Sciences philological. 2.) Sciences historic. The first embraces the literary sources, the second the monumental. The word Christian archæology has chief reference to the latter, or monumental. It therefore, properly speaking, includes the study of the monuments of Christian worship, that is, church edifices, and church furniture in its broadest sense."

¹Matthias Flacius, a preacher of Magdeburg, an Illyrian by birth, associated with himself a number of learned Protestants, among whom were Matthew Judex, Holtzner, Andrew Corvinus, and Basil Faber, for the purpose of writing a history of the Church by centuries. Hence these writers are called centuriators. This work is learned, and exhibits much acuteness and great powers of generalization, but, as might be expected, is too often intensely partisan.

²While not himself an archæologist, in the strict sense of the term, Baronius nevertheless in certain sections of his Annales examines the archæological materials that are important to answer certain debated questions of the early Christian history. These were afterward collected and edited by Schulting: Thesaurus Antiquitatum Ecclesiasticarum, etc., 1601.

ians were characteristic, they can, however, best be studied in connection with Jewish and classical archæology. The first converts had been adherents of the then extant religious systems, Jewish and heathen. On their acceptance of the new faith prejudices were not immediately corrected, but long continued in the Church as modifying factors. The tenacity of the Jew for his venerated religion and its stately ritual caused serious embarrassment to the apostles and early Christian fathers. The heathen mythology left its deep impress upon the art of the early and mediæval Church.¹ The philosophic systems of Plato and Aristotle furnished a vigorous and exact terminology for the expression and defense of Christian doctrine,² while the corrupted Neo-Platonism of a later period was the fruitful source of dangerous heresies. The methods of investigation and the forms of expression that matured under the influence of classical antiquity greatly aided in the discussion and precise formulation of Christian thought. These philosophic systems were not merely negative in their relations to Christianity, but they contained positive elements of the good, the true, and the beautiful. They have remained unsurpassed for terseness and comprehensiveness, for beauty and variety.³ Thus Christian archæology receives important aid and illustration from the study of Jewish and classical archæology. These latter disciplines are, however, with respect to their content, almost the exact antipodes of each other. Aside from purely literary remains, nearly all the materials for classical archæology are to be found in works of architecture, sculpture, and epigraphy, while the Hebrews largely lacked the ability to produce works of a high order of excellence in formative art. Hence many of the ablest classical archæologists make the formative arts the centre and kernel of classical archæology,¹ while writers on biblical archæology must necessarily regard these arts as constituting but a comparatively insignificant part of their investigations.²

¹ Compare Piper: Mythologie der christlichen Kunst von der ältesten Zeit bis in's sechzehnte Jahrhundert. Weimar. Bd. i, 1847. Bd. ii, 1851. Fr. Münter: Sinnbilder und Kunstvorstellungen der alten Christen. Altona, 1825. F. X. Kraus: Die christliche Kunst in ihren frühesten Anfängen. Leipzig, 1873.

² Besides the numerous histories of Christian doctrines, see especially Ueberweg: History of Philosophy, translated by Morris. 2d Part: The Patristic and Scholastic Period. Becker: Das philosophische System Plato's in seiner Beziehung zum christlichen Dogma. Freiburg, 1862. Ackermann: The Christian Element in Plato and the Platonic Philosophy. Edinburgh, 1861. Cocker: Christianity and the Greek Philosophy. New York, 1870.

³ Compare Kraus: Lehrbuch der christlichen Geschichte. Treves, 1872. Sepp: Das Heidenthum und dessen Bedeutung für das Christenthum. Bd. iii, ss. 285-289. Döllinger: The Gentile and the Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ. Translated by N. Darnell. London, 1862. Piper: Virgil als Theologe und Prophet in Evangel.-Kalender, 1862.

The date from which (terminus a quo) this examination should begin is naturally when the first germs of the Christian Church appear, or when their existence can be well authenticated, even though the documents and monuments may have entirely disappeared.³ This limitation will, however, be determined by the main purpose which the investigator may have in mind. With respect to the other limiting period (terminus ad quem) widely different opinions have been entertained. In this case there is no natural terminus. Some have regarded the death of Gregory the Great, A. D. 604, a proper limit to Christian archæological inquiries.⁴ Others have extended it to the eleventh century, or to the age of Hildebrand;⁵ while still others would make the Reformation of the sixteenth century the line of separation between the old and the new.⁶ Some of the later writers on Christian art archæology would place no boundary to its appropriate study, regarding whatever is past as falling legitimately under the term archæological.⁷

While no strictly historic limit can be fixed, beyond which Christian archæological studies may not be continued, we shall confine our examinations to the period ending with the second Trullan Council at Constantinople, A. D. 692. Prior to this the Church had undergone most of its fundamental changes, and Christian art and institu-

¹ Stark: Handbuch der Archæologie der Kunst. Leipzig, 1880, 1te Theil. Otto Jahn: Ueber das Wesen und die wichtigsten Aufgaben der archæologischen Studien. Winckelmann: Geschichte der Kunst des Alterthums. 2 vols., 4to, 1776.

² For discussion of causes, v. Bk. i, chap. ii.

³ Guericke: Lehrbuch der christlich-kirchlichen Archæologie. 2te Aufl. Berlin, 1859, § 1.

⁴ Bingham: Origines Ecclesiasticæ; or, Antiquities of the Christian Church. 2 vols. 1867. Guericke: Op. cit. Rheinwald: Die kirchliche Archæologie. Berlin, 1830, § 3.

⁵ Augusti: Handbuch der ch. Archæologie. 3 Bde. Bd. i, s. 23. Augusti rather inclines at times to the sixteenth century as a better limit.

⁶ Baumgarten: Vorlesungen über christlichen Alterthümer.

⁷ Hagenbach: Encyclopædia der theologischen Wissenschaften. 6te Aufl., §77. Crooks & Hurst: Theological Encyclopædia and Methodology, pp. 388, 389. Rosenkranz: Encycl. der theol. Wissenschaften, 1867, § 96. Piper: Einleitung in die monumentale Theologie, 1867, § 17. Piper says: "Of course for the monuments of art the Reformation constitutes a distinct line of demarkation, occasioned by the revival of the study of classical literature, and by the changed conditions of life in which, besides Christianity, still other elements of culture made themselves effective. . . . But to this branch of theology (monumental) the close of the Middle Ages can by no means furnish a proper limit, since the Christian spirit can never cease to interest itself in monumental studies. To this extent only is this limitation reasonable, namely, that tions had developed a type that remained essentially fixed for five hundred years. This comprehends the classic period of ancient Christian art and the formative period of Christian doctrines. In it are most clearly noted the teachings of primitive Christianity, and just to what extent art may be a helpful auxiliary of the Church or become a corrupting and misleading power. From the close of the seventh century begins a new period, in which the Græco-Roman element in the West yields to the Teutonic, and the Byzantine church life and art become stiff and immobile. The Church, by the controversy over image worship, was now sundered, and thenceforth two distinct historic streams flow side by side. There is no longer one undivided Church, but the Greek and the Latin-Germanic develop each its own distinctive character and life.

The more noted modern archæologists¹ substantially agree to limit the term Christian antiquity to that period during which Christianity moved chiefly within the compass and influence of Græco-Roman civilization. While the duration of this movement varied somewhat in Rome, in Gaul, and in the Orient,² it will be sufficiently exact for the purposes of our inquiry to limit the period to the Council in which the great schism between the Eastern and Western Churches originated. In this limitation the Christian archæologists are in substantial harmony with the more recent historians³ of the Church, who regard the seventh cen-

Archæologists and historians
in agreement.

at the period of the Reformation art activity is divided into the contrarieties of a Protestant and a Catholic art. But the products of art history do not connect with past history alone; the present has also matured in both communions the ripe fruits of a higher art endowment, and of a profounder insight into the sacred Scriptures. As such works exert over each other a powerful spiritual influence, a suggestion is thus furnished that in art may be found a ground not, indeed, of ecclesiastical union, but of real reconciliation." s. 52.

¹ v. especially De Rossi: Inscriptiones Christianæ urbis Romæ. I. Romæ, 1861, fol. Roma Sotterranea. I. Roma, 1864; II. Roma, 1867; III. Roma, 1877.

Garrucci: Hagioglypta s. Picturæ et Sculpturæ sacræ antiq., etc. Paris, 1856. Vetri ornati di Figure in Oro, etc. Roma, 1857. Storia dell' Arte cristiana, Prato, 1873, 3 vols. fol.

Le Blant: Manuel d'Epigraphie chrétienne, 1869. Inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaul, 1856-1865.

Martigny: Dictionnaire des Antiquités chrétiennes, 1877.

² It is well known that, while the death of Gregory the Great (A. D. 604) marks sufficiently the point of transition from the antique to the mediæval type of the Church in Italy, the Græco-Roman civilization was felt as a controlling power in Gaul for nearly a century later; so that our studies must be extended among the monuments of Gaul till near the close of the seventh century.

³ Neander, Gieseler, Baur, and others begin the second or mediæval period with the death of Gregory the Great; Niedner begins the second period with the middle, and Kurtz, Hase, Alzog, and others with the last quarter of the seventh century.

tury as the line of division between ancient Christianity and that of the Middle Ages; between the period during which the Church was influenced by and influenced in turn Græco-Roman thought, and that period during which she came more directly into contact with the Teutonic and Slavonic peoples.

CHAPTER II.

UTILITY OF ARCHÆOLOGICAL STUDIES.

THE opinion has too commonly prevailed that archæology is a study of the merely strange and curious, and that it chiefly contributes to the gratification of the relic-hunter and antiquarian.¹ Doubtless there was some reason for this opinion when things ancient were examined in their isolation and for their own sake, rather than in connection with the organic development of a civilization of which they are the surest indexes. Since archæology is connected vitally with the past, and shows that any type of civilization is measurably influenced by a given environment, it ranks among the most practical of disciplines.

Vital connection of archæology with history of civilization.

The materials of an earlier civilization sustain relations somewhat similar to those of the organic remains that may have been collected by the paleontologist. So long as the latter are preserved in museums simply to gratify the curious they are of little value. But when by the application of clearly defined principles each bone and fragment becomes the means of constructing the entire skeleton of an animal of a far-off age, whose habits and habitat are thereby reproduced before the eyes—the ancient world being thus made real to the geologic investigator—paleontology becomes a vital science, and these otherwise dead organic remains are instinct with life.

Archæological objects like organic remains.

So with archæological objects of either heathen, Jewish, or Christian origin. Through the story which they have told many serious errors of ancient history have been corrected, the past of long-buried dynasties has been made to pulsate with a life before wholly unknown, the plans, occupations, and institutions of men have been revealed as clearly as though they were passing before our eyes.

¹ v. Crooks and Hurst: Encyclopædia and Methodology, p. 389. "By taking archæology out of its connection with the living development of the Church and making it an incense-breathing reliquary, we degrade it, as a science, into a mere hunt for bric-a-brac, and give it an un-Protestant varnish of idle curiosity and favoritism."

As by the study and interpretation of Egyptian hieroglyphics the history of that ancient people has been thoroughly reconstructed; as Assyrian history has received richest illustration and been entirely transformed by the discovery of art and epigraphic remains on the sites of buried cities;¹ as the Hellenic scholars already feel that the most thorough and elaborate treatises of Grote and Curtius no longer furnish adequate statements relative to many phases of Greek life and thought;² so, too, in the history of the Christian Church has archæology essentially aided in the correction of many misleading statements, and led to a fuller, juster, and more satisfactory knowledge of the early Christian centuries.

Among many that might be named, the following points may suffice to illustrate the utility of these studies:

1. Much erroneous chronology of the history of the first three centuries has been corrected, while the faithful study of the inscriptions, both classical and Christian, has been the means of casting an unlooked-for light upon the lives and writings of the early Christian fathers.³

2. Archæological studies have also corrected the false notions relative to a supposed hatred of, or aversion to art on the part of the early Christian fathers. The remains of the catacombs clearly teach that they, on the contrary, encouraged the cultivation and practice of the fine arts.⁴

3. They have been useful in perfecting the text of the Patristic writings. By them the spurious has been separated from the genuine, and falsifications have been detected and eliminated. By the use of the analytic method they have enabled the investigator to bring into a fair historic

¹ "It is hardly necessary to refer to their value as contributions to mythological, historical, and philological knowledge, as this is now universally recognized. They suddenly appear as apparitions of a departed past which at one time it was supposed would never be recovered. The history of the West had been told in glowing pages of the Greeks and Romans: that of the East, a hazy and ill-defined conception of thought, remained so, till rock and clay, leather and papyrus, had been compelled to reveal the secrets of the unknown and almost magical characters in which that history was written. Some errors in translation—as in all things—but the grand outlines and principal details remain, and nothing can mar the chief outlines and beauties of the history." S. Birch: Records of the Past.

² v. H. L. Hicks: A Manual of Greek Historical Inscriptions, pp. xi, xii.

³ Piper: Zur Geschichte der Kirchenväter aus epigraphischen Quellen in Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, 1876.

⁴ de Rossi: Roma Sotterranea, Introductory Chapter. Inscriptiones Christiane etc., Prolegomena.

succession what was before mixed, confusing, and uncertain. By likeness of alphabet, by similarity of expression, by comparing etymological and art characteristics as noticed in inscriptions and surviving art works, a juster and truer text has resulted.¹

4. The history of the early heresies has received important aid from the study of inscriptions both on burial monuments and on gems and seals. "Thus the new religions of mixed origin that flourished under the Roman Empire, the Mithraic, the later Egyptian, and the various forms of Gnosticism, cannot be properly studied without a constant reference to these genuine illustrations (the Abraxas gems, etc.) of their doctrines; since the only written documents concerning them have been transmitted to us by either ignorant or prejudiced adversaries, whose sole object was to heap as many foul charges as they could collect or devise upon the members of the rival sects."²

5. The peculiar nature of monumental evidence must not be overlooked. Inscriptions and art remains become unconscious witnesses to the facts of history, and to the extent of this unconsciousness is their value augmented. This becomes more manifest when we consider how large a part of the surviving literature of the first three Christian centuries is of the nature of apologetics. These writings were designed for the defence of the Christian system against the attacks of adversaries, or to correct erroneous doctrines of heretical sects. They contain, therefore, a strong personal element that is not most favorable to the revelation of the whole truth. Some of the most extended and valuable treatises are marked by evidences of strong passion which manifestly leads the writer to represent the opinions of opponents in the most unfavorable light, and to conceal the weak points of the apologist. Such weakness can hardly attach to monumental evidence, since this implies calmness as well as unconsciousness, and is, therefore, more of the nature of average judgments, and expresses more nearly the general public opinion. "The unimpeachable form of inscriptions"³ is a characterization of this species of evidence which has come to be generally accepted. A rude inscription with grammatical inaccuracies, a palm branch, a symbol scratched upon the soft plaster used to close a Christian tomb, a simple "depositus," or "in pace," may thus unconsciously

¹ British Quarterly Review, October, 1880, p. 470.

² King: Antique Gems, pp. xviii, xix.

³ Hatch: The Organization of the Early Christian Churches, p. 16.

tell the story of the real thought and life of the early Church more truly and justly than the most elaborate treatise.¹

6. The attention of scholars is now more than ever before directed toward the first Christian centuries. In the estimate of earnest Christian investigators, the questions of supreme importance are: Who was Jesus of Nazareth? What were the doctrines which he inculcated? What was the genius of the kingdom which he established? What were the institutions that he ordained? What were the life, the customs, the accepted beliefs of the original Church before it was allied with earthly and governmental powers? What were the sources, nature, and intensity of the forces that vitiated the purity and simplicity of the first Church? What are the truths of absolute authority, because uttered and enforced by the Founder, or by his immediately inspired apostles? What is of mere human origin, or of prudential value, which may, therefore, be accepted or rejected according to the shifting environment of the Church? These are some of the pressing questions which Christian archæology is specially helpful to answer, because it regards the objects which it investigates as indexes of the life and will of the early Christian actors and of the real spirit of the Church.

¹ Stevens: The Old Runic Monuments of Scandinavia and England. London, 1865, 1867, 1868. "This absence of 'grammatical propriety,' and this presence of 'a most illiterate and unskillful artist' are doubly precious in the eyes of the speech-killer, even as much so as the 'accurate spelling' indulged in by the more wealthy and educated families of the deceased. They open out to us glimpses of the most ancient and widely spread and popular Lingua Rustica, in its various dialects, which, rather than the Book-Latin, of which it was independent, is the base of all the Romance tongues now flourishing in Europe, with all their various and old patois." Vol. ii, p. 394.

The quotations in the above passage are from Burgon's remarks on the great variety of monuments and inscriptions in the Roman catacombs.

BOOK FIRST.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN ART.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN ART.

CHAPTER I.

GEOGRAPHY AND CHRONOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN ART MONUMENTS.

THE rapid propagation of Christianity during the first three centuries has long been the vexed problem of the deistic, the naturalistic, and the mythical schools. Solutions have been various, but each has proved inadequate. Only a religion of divine origin and sanction can explain the facts of the early Christian history. Absolutely unassisted by human philosophy or state patronage, stubbornly opposing the indulgence of passion, awakening no hope of temporal reward, in directest contradiction to the prevalent thought and life, a pronounced monotheism in the midst of a debased polytheism, it nevertheless gained disciples in every province of the Roman Empire and in the far-off regions beyond.

The wonderful history recorded in the Acts of the Apostles (Chapter II) represents that persons from widely separated countries were converted by the preaching of Peter on the day of Pentecost.

The rapid spread of the Gospel.

Doubtless many returned to their homes after the celebration of the great national feasts at Jerusalem, and others would naturally hasten to spread the tidings of salvation among their former associates. From each of these, as from a centre, the rapid propagation of the Gospel in distant parts went forward. By the sparks that were scattered abroad from this pentecostal baptism of fire a bright and unquenchable flame was kindled throughout the Roman world.

To the poor and the oppressed the Gospel must have been especially precious. The carpenter's son spoke comforting words to the enslaved, and dignified the honest toiler. He who in the agonies of the crucifixion said so tenderly to his favored disciple, "Behold thy mother" (John xix, 27), founded a religion that appealed with especial force to the heathen woman of the East. In these very countries where her condition was most degraded, Christianity elevated her to be the peer of her husband. By virtue of a communion of spirit and a common hope it gave to marriage a new sanction, to maidenhood a new sacredness, to the whole life of woman a higher worth.¹

A message to the poor.

Few, indeed, of the official class were at first attracted toward the new religion; yet the testimony of records, as well as of the monuments, is conclusive that some of the refined and of the honorable early embraced the new faith. The mention during the apostolic times of Joseph of Arimathæa (Matt. xxvii, 57-60, et. al.); Sergius Paulus (Acts xiii, 6-12); Dionysius of Athens (Acts xvii, 34); and of Priscilla, Aquila, and Pudens, "dearly beloved in the Lord," in whose house at Rome Christian services were held (Rom. xvi, 3-5; 1 Tim. iv, 21); as well as the evidence of the interment of some members of the Flavian family of Domitian's reign in the cemeteries of Domitilla and Lucina at Rome, fully confirm the belief that the Gospel had already found faithful witnesses among the patrician classes and even in the imperial household.² The governor of Bithynia complained to Trajan that persons of every age and of both sexes embraced the pernicious faith.³

In the second century Tertullian boasted that in Carthage one tenth of the population were Christians, including some even of senatorial rank. "We are a people of but yesterday, yet we have entered all your places—cities, islands, fortifications, towns, market-places, yea, your camp, your tribes, companies, palace, senate, forum."⁴ This must be taken with caution, since at a still later date Origen says that the number of the Christians as compared to the whole population was very small. From a letter of Pope Cornelius it has been estimated that under Maximian the Church at Rome could not have numbered more than fifty thousand, or one twentieth of the population, and the total throughout the empire could not have been more than one twelfth to one tenth of the entire people, or approximately from eight millions to twelve millions.⁵ By the middle of the century

¹ Friedländer: Sittengeschichte Roms. Bd. iii, s. 587.

² de Rossi: Bulletino Arch. Christ. iii, 1865, p. 33, etc.; Roma Sotterranea, t. i. pp. 196, 319-321.

³ Pliny: l. x., ep. 97. "Multi enim omnis ætatis, omnis ordinis, utriusque sexus," etc.

⁴ "Hæsterni sumus et vestra omnia implevimus urbes, insulas," etc. Apologeticus ad versus gentes, cap. xxxvii.

⁵ Staudlin: Univ. Gesch. der christ. Kirche, 1833, s. 41, places the number of Christians at the crowning of Constantine at (la moitié) one half of the population of the empire. Matter: Hist. de l'Église, t. i, p. 120, puts it at one fifth. Gibbon: Decline and Downfall, etc., chap. xv, places it at one twentieth; Chastel: Destructio the apologists of the Church were numerous, and were equal in learning and controversial power to their ablest opponents. While the foregoing statement of the zealous African is to be taken with caution, it nevertheless illustrates the earnestness and fidelity of the early Christians, and the marvelous propagative power of their religion. These results seem all the more remarkable in the entire absence of evidence of an organized association for the spread of the new faith into foreign parts. Rather did the rapid extension of the Gospel in the century of its origin result from the apostolic preaching, from the enthusiasm which this must have aroused among peoples impoverished in faith and longing for spiritual nourishment,¹ from the consistent and devoted lives of its individual professors, and from the simple testimony of the men and women, who had accepted the divine message, to its saving power. The words of Christ, "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid" (Matt. v, 14), were eminently true of the members of the early Christian community. Before the accession of Constantine the influence of Christianity had penetrated the thought, the principles, and the life of the empire. While the old systems showed a most remarkable tenacity of life, their hold on the nation was nevertheless becoming weaker and weaker.

The clear, discerning genius of Constantine saw in the new religion the sure promise of the future. With it he united his fortunes, and in legalizing he subjected it to perilous temptations not before experienced even in the times of fiercest persecution. From this time the Church took on a form of organization before unknown to it. The empire as a political machine was now transferred to the rule of Christ; its laws and its institutions were placed on a Christian foundation.² The recognition of Christianity as the established faith, the protection of its votaries, and the patronage of it by the government must be reckoned among the most powerful influences to win the mass of the population to the profession of Christianity. The new system could now count the emperor as its chief pontiff, and thus the religious sense of Rome remained true to its traditions.

From the fourth century the extension of Christianity must have tion du Paganisme dans l'Empire d'Orient, p. 36. at one fifteenth in the Western Empire, and one tenth in the Eastern; La Bastie: Du Souv. pontif. des Emp. (Acad. d. Inscr. tom. 12, p. 77), at one tenth.

¹ v. Reuss: History of the New Testament, 2d ed. (translated by Houghton), vol. ii, p. 446.

² Merivale: Conversion of the Roman Empire, London, 1864, p. 14.

been rapid indeed. The fear of persecution having been removed, multitudes who had before been intellectually convinced of its superiority, and multitudes more who were ever ready to be identified with a winning cause, swelled the number of the converts. From this time, therefore, the evidences are much strengthened through the preservation of burial monuments, by the building of churches and their richer adornment and furniture, by the imperial coins that contain Christian symbols, and by other remains of plastic and epigraphic art.

The expectation that these monuments may now be found as widely distributed as was the Church of the first four centuries is not, however, fulfilled. In this, as in every other period of history, the important and substantial monuments must have been few as compared with the total number. Only in the great marts of trade and in the cities of wealth and of power could the needed means for the erection of abiding monuments be found. Only these centers, therefore, generally furnish the materials for monumental study. The instances of chance preservation are necessarily few and widely separated. Even these must have been largely modified by climatic influences and by the civil and military fortunes of the different provinces. Within a limited belt of country on either shore of the Mediterranean were the chief centres of the civilization of the first six Christian centuries. The advantages of climate, of soil, and of easy intercommunication are the manifest reasons of this concentration. Moreover, the geologic and climatic conditions were most favorable to the erection and preservation of monuments. The dryness of the air, the almost complete immunity from frosts, the abundance of valuable quarries, the superiority of the beds of clay, and the excellence of the materials for the famous cements, contributed to the erection and preservation of many structures which are invaluable witnesses to the civilization of the times.

But the ruthlessness and cupidity of men have proved even more destructive than the forces of nature. The fearful invasions of the Teutonic tribes, and the inroads of the more savage Huns, blotted out from the Roman world many of her noblest monuments.¹ Nor must it be forgotten that the edicts of the Christian emperors resulted in the loss of the most noted monuments of pagan art. Statues of incomparable beauty, and temples of matchless grandeur were ruthlessly destroyed in Syria, Egypt, Italy, and Gaul. Invaluable materials for comparative studies were thus hopelessly lost. The edicts of persecution also resulted in the destruction of many Christian churches. To these must be added the still more sad effects of the wars of rival Christian sects and factions. The squabbles of the Green and the Red at Constantinople often resulted in conflagrations in which many beautiful churches were consumed.

¹ v. Bunsen: Beschreibung der Stadt Rom. Bd. i, ss. 234. etc. "But the damage which the so-called barbarians caused to Rome consisted not so much in the destruction of buildings and public monuments as in the robbery of the public treasures and jewels."—s. 230. Yet it must be remembered that these very objects rather than imposing structures often supply the best materials for writing the history of civilization.

In the wretched wars over image worship the best statuary and paintings of the early Christian world were irretrievably lost. The burial places of Rome were terribly devastated by the Lombards under their king, Astolpho, in A. D. 757, so that their abandonment was hastened, and the remains of martyred saints were gathered into the crypts of churches.¹ The iconoclastic fury of the Mohammedan invaders further despoiled the seats of Christian power of their finest works of art, while the Crusades completed the destruction of most that then survived. Only by the more kindly treatment of nature have some of the most precious records of the past been preserved. The buried cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum, and the art remains that were hidden in the obscurity of the catacombs, furnish some of the most valuable monuments that continue to our age.

FIRST CENTURY. It has been questioned whether any well-authenticated Christian monuments of the first century survive. Nevertheless, some of the ablest Christian archæologists find satisfactory evidence that parts of some Roman catacombs are contemporary with the apostolic age. "Precisely in those cemeteries to which both history and tradition assign an apostolic origin, do I, in the light of the most exact archæological criticism, see the cradle as well of the Christian catacombs as of Christian art and epigraphy. I also there find monuments of persons who appear to belong to the time of the Flavii and of Trajan, as well as inscriptions that date from this same period. Since these things are so, a sound understanding, which alone can be a safe guide in all historical as well as archæological matters, must say to every one who is free from preconceived opinions, that such a mass of concurrent indications, monuments, and dates cannot possibly be the work of chance, that we accordingly therein may find a warrant for the truth of the origin of these monuments which we have maintained" (that is, the first century).² The sepulchres of the Vatican, certain inscriptions in the cemetery of Santa Lucina, on the Via Ostia, near the present church of San Paolo fuori le mura, the decorations of the entrance to Santa Domitilla, the Virgin with the Child and star, and portions of the cemetery of Santa Priscilla, are also believed by some archæologists to belong to the first century.¹ To this century have also been attributed certain portions of the walls of the house of Pudens, within whose area stands the present church of Santa Pudenziana, at Rome. The outer wall of this palace "can be seen behind the altar, with the large hall windows in it, of the first century."² In regard to the chronology of these and a few other monuments there is such difference of opinion that they become of somewhat doubtful evidential value.³

¹ de Rossi: Rom. Sott. t. i, p. 220.

² de Rossi: Rom. Sott., i, p. 185.

SECOND CENTURY. In the second century the zeal of modern archæological research has firmly placed a number of most interesting and valuable monuments. Rome, as before, furnishes most that has been preserved. The cemetery of Santa Priscilla on the Via Salaria Nuova, of Santa Domitilla (Nereus and Achilles) on the Via Ardeatina, of San Prætestato on the Via Appia, and of San Alessandro, on the Via Nomentana, also the ceiling decorations in San Gennaro dei Poveri at Naples are about all that with certainty can be referred to it. In the frescos of these cemeteries is noticed the beginning of that symbolie treatment of art which in the next century reached its climax. In the second century some archæologists have likewise placed the so-called Abraxas gems. The Abraxas gems. By some these are believed to have arisen among the Basilidian Gnostics, by others they are regarded as the product of the strange syncretism of Indian, Zoroastrian, Egyptian, Jewish, and Gnostic-Christian thought which was so prevalent in the second century. In some respects they resemble the early Egyptian Scarabean gems.¹ While comparatively few, these monuments are, nevertheless, most interesting and important for their artistic and doctrinal suggestions.

¹ Kraus: Synchronistische Tabellen zur christlichen Kunstgeschichte, 1880, ss. 4, 5. Schultze: Die Katakomben, 1882, s. 91. Ch. Lenormant, Les Catacombes, 1858, does not hesitate to place the paintings of Santa Domitilla in the first century. For like reasons, namely, the essential likeness of the art spirit of these to the wall decorations of Pompeii, and to the paintings in the pyramid of Caius Cestius, Raoul-Rochette and Welcker agree with Lenormant.

² J. H. Parker: The House of Pudens in Rome. v. Archæological Journal, vol. xxviii, pp. 42, 43. This is a most interesting fact, since we are led at once into the meeting-place of those converts to Christianity who were companions of Paul during his last imprisonment.

³ The chronology of these monuments is most thoroughly examined by de Rossi: v. Rom. Sott., t. i, pp. 184-197. Contra, J. H. Parker: The Archæology of Rome, 1877, 12 vols. v. vol. iv, in which he treats of the Christian catacombs. He does not recognise any picture of a religious subject as of earlier date than the fourth century. It must be evident that his conclusions are not the result of careful inductive processes, but are somewhat hastily reached from almost exclusively one kind of evidence. On architectural questions Parker is an authority of the first order, but on questions relating to painting his opinion cannot be regarded as decisive. Renan, Marc-Aurèle, p. 543, concludes that the pictures in Santa Domitilla cannot be earlier than the third century. Th. Mommsen, than whom there can be no more reliable authority on Latin inscriptions, would, largely on epigraphical grounds, refer the cemetery of Domitilla to about the middle of the second century; v. Contemporary Review, May, 1871.

THIRD CENTURY.—By the third century Christianity had gained a firm foothold in nearly every province of the empire. The claims of the Christians for protection had more and more secured the attention of the government. The higher social position of the adherents of the Church further conciliated the favor of government. Clement, Origen, and others had already The Alexandrian school. given great dignity and fame to the theological school at Alexandria. Before the middle of the century Egypt had more than a score of bishops. In A. D. 258 Cyprian assembled in Carthage a synod of eighty-seven bishops, and a Latin translation of the Scriptures had already been made for the use of the West African churches. Gaul had been visited, and by the Progress in Gaul. third century influential bishoprics existed in Lyons, Vienne, and Marseilles. There is, also, strong evidence that by the middle of this century the Celtic Church had a vigorous life and organization. In Asia Minor and Greece were Asia Minor and Greece. seats of many influential bishoprics, presided over by a most thoroughly learned clergy—the forerunners of those great theologians who, in the following century, were to give form to Christian doctrine in the councils of Nice, Chalcedon, and Constantinople.

The monuments which survive from this century are, as might be presumed, more numerous, and are found in more widely extended districts; Rome is, however, still the seat of the most interesting and instructive. The subterranean burial places are much more extensive and rich in art remains than in the previous century. The incorporation of brotherhoods for the burial of the Burial brotherhoods. dead, and the special protection accorded to places of sepulture, encouraged the Christians to greater care for their cemeteries. We are informed¹ that Callixtus was intrusted with the direction of the clergy, and had supervision of the cemetery that bore his name. Doubtless this has reference to the fact that the Christian congregations of Rome took advantage of the legal provision² to care for property held by them in common, especially for such as was devoted to the cemeteries and to the charities of the Church, by the appointment of a legal representative. This led to the founding of the celebrated cemetery of San Calisto. Calisto, on the Via Appia, in which so many martyrs, bishops, and popes were interred; and it also accounts for the change of the burial-place of these high church officials from the Vatican to this cemetery.

¹ Bellermann, J. J.: Drei Programmen über die Abraxas-Gemmen. Berlin, 1820. Kraus: Op. cit., s. 7. Among the earlier expositors of these curious objects were Gottfried Wendelin, Beausobre, and others. Among the more recent are Matter, King, and others.

At this time, also, are first met the so-called Fabricæ that St. Fabianus, in A. D. 238, ordered to be constructed. These appear to have been small buildings, placed near to, or over the entrance to the cemeteries; they were used as oratories and for the celebration of the eucharist. All these probably disappeared during the persecutions of Decius and Valerian, when the necessity for concealment of the entrances to these places of Christian sepulture was first felt. Notwithstanding these persecutions, and the still more sweeping edict of Diocletian, in A. D. 303, by which all Christian cemeteries were confiscated and all Christian churches were ordered to be razed to the ground, the catacomb of San Calisto has continued to our day, a marvellous museum for the study of Christian life and doctrines in the third century.

Recent excavations, conducted by the Abbé Delattre on a site called Damous-el-Karita, near the ancient Carthage, have revealed an open-air cemetery of very considerable dimensions. The importance of the discovery appears from the fact that only two or three other open-air cemeteries are known. Delattre considers the date of this area as the end of the third or the beginning of the fourth century.³

The only remains of churches in Rome from this century are possibly portions of the subterranean San Clemente, a small part of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, and of Santa Pudenziana.⁴ By some authorities the beauti-

¹ Philosophumena. This has been well-nigh demonstrated to be the work of Hippolytus, and not of Origen, as was thought by the Benedictines and others.

² Digest, iii, 4, 1, § 1, de Collegiis. "Quibus autem permissum est corpus collegi societatis," etc.

³ v. Delattre: Archéologie chrétienne de Carthage.—Fouilles de la Basilique de Damous-el-Karita. Lyon: 1886.

⁴ As we have before seen (p. 30), Mr. Parker refers portions of this Church to the first century.

ful statue of the Good Shepherd (Fig. 45), now in the Lateran Museum, a marble sarcophagus discovered in 1853 in the cemetery of San Pretestate at Rome, and the statue of St. Hippolytus,¹ also in the Lateran Museum, are placed in this century.

Sculpture.

From this century a large class of symbols, many allegorical pictures, and biblical scenes of symbolico-allegorical significance have also been preserved. A limited number of historical and liturgical representations are likewise believed to date from the latter part of it. Figures wrought in gilt upon glass vessels, found in the Roman catacombs and at Cologne, and a few gems of clearly recognised Christian origin, have been referred to this period.

Glass vessels and gems.

In Africa, on the site of the ancient Castellum Tingitanum, the modern Orleansville, are found the remains of the Church of St. Reparatus, some parts of which, from an inscription still extant, are by some believed to date from the year A. D. 252.² By some archæologists the churches found at Djemlia and at Announa in Algeria, at Ibrim in Nubia, and at Arment or Erment, the ancient Hermonthis, in Egypt, have been referred to the third century. The excavations on old sites in Asia Minor,³ in Syria, and in the Hauran, are bringing to light remains of old Christian churches whose age has not yet been fully determined, but Architectural monuments.

¹ Much discussion has been had over this statue and the bronze statue of St. Peter in San Pietro Vaticano, at Rome. Many deny to both a Christian origin and character. But the Easter cycle, engraved upon the chair of the statue of St. Hippolytus, is a significant circumstance, and seems to furnish a strong argument for its Christian origin and genuineness. v. Salmon: Chronology of Hippolytus, in Hermathena, for 1873, pp. 82-85; also Döllinger: Hippolytus und Callistus, ss. 23-27.

² The inscription bears the year 285 of the Mauritanian era. If we are to follow some of the archæologists and epigraphists this era began thirty-three years before the Christian era (v. Prevost); according to others it began forty years after the Christian era (v. Henzen, on Nos. 5337, 5338, and 5859 of Orelli's Inscript. lat.). In the former case the date of the inscription would point to A. D. 252; in the latter, to A. D. 325. Fergusson: Hist. of Arch., vol. i, pp. 403, 404; Mothes, O.: Basilikenform, s. 30; Kugler: Gesch. der Baukunst, Bd. i, s. 372, and others accept the earlier date. Schnaase: Gesch. der bildende Künste, 2te Aufl., Bd. iii, s. 3, note 4; Kraus: Synchron. Tab., etc., s. 18, and others hold to the later date.

³ v. J. T. Wood: Discoveries at Ephesus, Boston, 1857, pp. 58, 59. He believes that he has discovered the tomb of St. Luke, that seems to belong to the last part of the third or to the early part of the fourth century. Near this was found what appeared to be a basilica, one of the earliest churches in Ephesus. v. pp. 99, 100. Many of the sarcophagi bear the well known monogram, A X O, of the fourth or fifth century. v. p. 120. Excavations on the sites of "the seven churches which are in Asia," promise well for the illustration of the history. Much has already been done, but comparative studies are still greatly needed.

which seem to date back as early as to the close of the third or to the early part of the fourth century.¹

FOURTH CENTURY.—The able reign of Diocletian was to close in disgrace and most cruel injustice. The fourth century opened with the last but most fearful trial by persecution to which the Church was to be subjected. Except in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, where the co-regent was more lenient, the emperor's cruel edicts were most mercilessly executed. The imposing houses of worship were despoiled of their collections of sacred writings, of their costly decorations, and of the numerous vessels of gold and silver which were used in the administration of the sacraments. What treasures of art, what invaluable manuscript copies of the sacred Scriptures, what wealth of materials for the history of the early Church, which had been accumulated through the previous forty years of peace, were forever lost must remain a matter of mere conjecture. It is only certain that scarcely a church escaped this visitation.

In A. D. 311, Galerius issued his unlooked-for edict of toleration, which was followed, in A. D. 313, by the edict of the co-regents, Constantine and Licinius. By its provisions all confiscated church property was restored to the Corpus Christianorum at the expense of the imperial treasury,² and complete toleration of worship and belief was granted. By the defeat of Licinius in A. D. 323, Constantine became sole emperor. From this event dates a new period of monumental art as well as of church history.

From the last three quarters of the fourth century numerous interesting monuments still survive. In all the chief cities churches were now built under imperial patronage, and ornamented and furnished with the utmost magnificence. The monuments are now more widely distributed and varied in character. From this time numismatics and epigraphy become important aids in the interpretation of Christian life and doctrine. To the fourth century can probably be referred the following basilicas at Rome: San Giovanni in Laterano, founded about A. D. 340; Santa Pudenziana, enlarged about A. D. 345 (?); San Pietro in Vaticano, about A. D. 350; San Paolo fuori le mura, about A. D. 386; San Clemente, rebuilt before A. D. 392.

¹ "Recent researches in Africa have shown that when properly explored we shall certainly be able to carry the history of the Romanesque style in that country back to a date at least a century before his (Constantine's) time. In Syria and Asia Minor so many early examples have come to light that it seems probable that we may, before long, carry the history of Byzantine art back to a date nearly approaching that of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus." v. Fergusson: History of Arch., vol. i, pp. 403, 404. Hübsch: Die altchristlichen Kirchen, etc., Carlsruhe, 1863, fol., ss. xxiv, xxv, etc., believes that besides the so-called chapels of the catacombs, the churches San Alessandro, San Steffano, San Andrea in Barbara, the basilica in Orleansville, San Agostino in Spoleto, and the oldest part of the cathedral in Treves, are to be referred to the pre-Constantine period. Also v. Mothes, O.: Die Baukunst des Mittelalters in Italien, Jena, 1884, 2 vols., 8vo, who holds to nearly like views. On the contrary, Schnaase, C.: Gesch. d. bilden. Künste, 2te, Aufl. 1869, Bd. iii, s. 37, claims that no churches which have been preserved to our day are older than the time of Constantine. Of nearly like opinion is Bunsen: Beschreibung d. Stadt Rom., Bd. i, ss. 418, 419.

² For the account of large sums given to the African churches in A.D. 314, v. Eusebius: Hist. Eccles., x, 6, and de Vit. Const. iv, 28.

Revival of church buildings.

Architectural monuments.

The catacombs were now less used for interment, and less frequented by visitors. During the last quarter of the century burial in subterranean recesses seems to have been almost discontinued. Basilicas, built over or near the entrances to the catacombs, supplied their place.¹ Portions of the catacombs of Naples probably belong to a very early date in this century. They are especially valuable for their paintings, and for the information which they furnish relative to the early practice of Christian burial.

Catacombs less used.

Monuments in Naples.

Slight remnants of the Neapolitan churches, San Gennaro dei Poveri, Santa Maria della Sanita, and Santa Maria della Vita, also survive.²

The catacombs of old Syracuse have awakened much careful inquiry as to their origin and age. Nearly one hundred inscriptions and several paintings have been discovered and described. The museum of Syracuse contains more than a hundred Christian lamps found in the catacomb of San Giovanni of that ancient city. The form, the orthography, and general contents of the inscriptions, as well as the symbols on the lamps, clearly indicate that they belong to the last half of the fourth century. A few may be of the time of Constantine.³

Catacombs of Syracuse.

The records establish the belief that in the East a very large number of churches were built under the special patronage of Constantine, his family, and his immediate successors. Unfortunately, nearly all of these have perished. The basilica of the Nativity at Bethlehem, St. Mary's,

Many churches have disappeared.

¹ Kraus: Roma Sotterranea, s. 98.

² Schultze: Die Katakomben von San Gennaro dei Poveri in Neapel. Förster: Mittel-u. Unter Italien, ss. 414, 429.

³ Schultze: Archäologische Studien über altchristliche Monumente, ss. 134-139; de Rossi: Bull. Arch. crist., 1877. Tav. x, xi. Contra and in favor of a pre-Christian origin v. Quatremère de Quincy, Hirt, and Schubring.

remains to illustrate the character and style of these churches.¹ Some interesting Christian inscriptions have been found amidst the massive ruins of Baalbec. They seem to date from about the time of the founding of the Basilica of Theodosius, A.D. 379-395.²

The catacombs of Malta must be assigned to the fourth or fifth century. While Caruana³ holds that these are of pagan origin, and were transformed into a place for Christian burial during the period of Arabian dominion, in the latter part of the ninth century, his argument seems to be entirely unsatisfactory. The reference of these burial places to a Christian origin in the fourth or fifth century is much more consistent with the facts. They suggest nearly the same cycle of artistic and religious thought as the Roman catacombs, although the number of objects is comparatively small. Christian inscriptions of the fourth century, and well-preserved figures in sculpture, have been found at Tripoli in Asia Minor. One of these is a figure of Christ with the hammer, probably representing the carpenter's son.⁴

Traces of churches, probably from this century, have been found in Egypt and in the country bordering on the West Mediterranean in Africa;⁵ also a few other monuments of Christian origin have been recently excavated in these regions. Likewise in middle and southern France, at Arles, Marseilles, Narbonne, Toulouse, etc., Christian monuments dating from the fourth century have been discovered. Some beautiful sarcophagi with Christian symbols and biblical historic scenes, found in these cities, are from this time, while others more probably belong to the Merovingian period.⁶ Connected with the churches of this century are found some beautiful mosaics, while the sculptured sarcophagi and a few mural paintings in the cemeteries fairly illustrate the condition of Christian art. The numerous inscriptions from the tombs, catacombs, and churches furnish interesting and valuable epigraphic material, and the coins of the emperors contain many rich suggestions.

FIFTH CENTURY.—The brief but earnest attempt of Julian to ¹ De Vogüé maintains that the present Church is the original structure. He argues this from the simplicity of the style, and the entire absence of features that are peculiar to the buildings of Justinian's day, as well as from the lack of references in literature to any changes.

² v. Survey of Western Palestine, special papers, 1881, pp. 135, 136.

³ Caruana: Hypogeum Tal-Liebru, Malta, Malta, 1884.

⁴ Survey of Western Palestine, pp. 152, 153.

⁵ Fergusson: Op. Cit., vol. i, pp. 403, seq.

⁶ de Caumont: Abécédairé d'Archéologie; Éra Gallo-Romaine, pp. 350-352.

revive the decaying heathenism had proved utterly abortive. Himself a pervert from Christian teaching, his misdirected effort brought to him deepest sorrow and disappointment. Notwithstanding the tenacious life of pagan institutions, Christianity was now the accepted belief, and the Roman world was thoroughly pervaded with Christian thought. The Church had put on the strength of a long organized institution. The monuments are now greatly multiplied. While this was a century of waning political power and of general art decadence in the West, and the destructive incursions of the Teutonic hordes swept away many of the most noted and beautiful churches, enough survives to furnish highly valuable monumental evidence.

General decadence in the West.

In Rome this century is represented by Santa Sabina on the Via Aventina, built, as the mosaic inscription informs us, about A. D. 423 by Pope Celestine; and Santa Maria Maggiore, first built in A. D. 352, but rebuilt by Sixtus III. in A. D. 432. This is probably the earliest church of Rome that was dedicated to the Virgin. It contains some noteworthy original mosaics and sarcophagi which become valuable aids in the illustration of the Christian sculpture of the fifth century.

San Pietro in Vincoli, built by Eudoxia between A. D. 440 and 462, has well preserved the form and general appearance of the early Christian basilica.¹ In a very few instances the furniture of the churches still survives. The mosaics, altars, ambos, sarcophagi, etc., which still remain in these churches, are of inestimable value. Coins of both the Eastern and the Western Empire now are found. Numismatics now becomes of real confirmatory service, especially in correcting chronology. The number of Christian inscriptions is very greatly increased, and they assume more of a dogmatic character, thus clearly reflecting the strifes and controversies of the times.

Other churches of Rome.

During this century Ravenna² becomes a most interesting center

¹ For a full and generally reliable account of the basilicas of Rome v. Bunsen and Plattner: Beschreibung Roms. 5 Bde., with magnificent illustrations by Gutensohn and Knapp.

Hübsch: Die altchristliche Kirchen, 1863.

H. Gally Knight: The Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy.

² For a careful scientific description of the Christian monuments of Ravenna, see among others, Quast: Die alt-christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna. 1 Bd. fol., Berlin, 1842.

Richter, J. P.: Die Mosaiken Ravennas. Wien, 1878.

Rahn: Ravenna, Eine kunstgeschichtliche Studie. Leipzig, 1869.

Berti: Sull' antico duomo di Ravenna. Ravenna, 1880.

Müntz: Lost Mosaics of Ravenna, in Am. Journal of Archaeology, vol. i, pp. 115-120.

of Christian monuments which greatly aid in understanding the condition and progress of Christian art in nearly every department. Among the most interesting buildings which survive are the Baptistery, Baptisterium Ecclesiæ Ursianæ, probably first erected in the fourth century, but restored in A. D. 451 by Archbishop Nero; San Francesco, from about the middle of the century; San Giovanni Evangelista, a votive three-apsed church, built by Galla Placidia in A. D. 420; SS. Nazario e Celso, the place of sepulture of Galla Placidia, which was erected before A. D. 450, and is well preserved and most instructive; Santa Maria in Cosmedin, an Arian baptistery, very like in form and mosaics to Baptisterium Ecclesiæ Ursianæ. These churches are rich in sarcophagi, altars, ambos, and mosaics.

In the Byzantine Empire very considerable archæological material from the fifth century has survived. In Egypt and West Africa many interesting objects have recently been discovered on the sites of old monasteries which prove of invaluable aid to the history of monasticism.

In southern and middle France is found a large number of interesting monuments, especially sarcophagi, which probably belong to the fifth century.¹ Roman Judea and Samaria, called Palestine, in the fifth century Palestina Prima, had thirty-three episcopal towns. The expectation that a region so permeated with Christian influence would furnish many monuments of its former prosperity is largely disappointed, since the number of churches and other objects connected with Christian history hitherto brought to light is comparatively small. What treasures more extensive systematic excavations in the old centers of Christian activity may yet reveal can only be conjectured. From the rich finds at Troy, Olympia, Larnica, Pompeii, etc., we may hope that equally valuable results may repay the Christian explorer in Palestine.

Remains of many Christian churches and other antiquities are found at various points in Syria. Their chronology has not been fully determined; yet some able archæologists place them as early as the fourth century.² They promise much

¹ v. de Caumont: Op. Cit., Architecture Religieuse, pp. 48-56.

Laborde: Plata cviii.

And very excellent and thorough, Le Blant: Étude sur les Sarcophages chrétiens antique de la Ville d'Arles. Paris, 1878. 1 vol. 4to, with numerous plates.

Inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule. 2 vols. 4to, Paris, 1856-65.

His Épigraphie chrétienne is a most convenient and instructive manual.

² "We are transported into the midst of a Christian society; we are surprised at its life. It is not the concealed life of the catacombs, nor a humiliating, timid, and suffering existence that is generally represented here; but a life generous, opulent, for the illustration of Christian architecture in a period hitherto enveloped in much obscurity. Especially the trans-Jordanic region must hereafter become a most inviting field to the Christian archæologist.¹

During the excavations at Olympia, in Greece, a Byzantine church was discovered, also many Christian graves. This church was built on what Pausanias describes as the Olympia. "workshop of Phidias." Its entire plan as well as the rich details seem to indicate a marked revival of art in the Byzantine Empire during the first half of the fifth century.²

The archæological remains found on numerous sites in Italy, Albania, Hungary, etc., which aid to illustrate the history of the fifth century, cannot be further described. They are interesting and important.³

SIXTH CENTURY. Numerous monuments still survive from the sixth century. Notwithstanding the general decadence of art and the fearful political upheavals, several imposing churches are believed to have been built in Rome during this century. The older parts of San Lorenzo and of Santa Balbina Sixth century churches in Rome. are generally referred to this period. In Ravenna portions of the churches of San Apollinare Nuovo, Santa Maria della artistic, in grand houses . . . and magnificent churches, flanked with towers and surrounded with elegant tombs. . . . The choice of (Scripture) texts indicates an epoch near to the triumph of the Church; there prevails an accent of victory. . . . The date of the Roman epoch is given not only by the style of the architecture, but by inscriptions of considerable number which form an almost continuous chain from the first to the fourth century."—De Vogüé: Syrie Centrale; Architecture Civile et Religieuse, vol. i, pp. 7, 8.

W. Waddington, who accompanied De Vogüé on his tour of discovery, has given the archæology, the history, and the inscriptions of this interesting region under the title of Inscriptions Grecques et Latines de la Syrie. 1870.

¹ "That the Christians were in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries spread through the whole country, the survey abundantly testifies; from the deserts of Beersheba to the slopes of Hermon we have come across innumerable churches which cannot be dated later than that period. The nomenclature of the country bears witness to the existence of flourishing communities, charitable convents, and holy Christian sites, in every part; and the titles given to many ruins show the fate they finally underwent in perishing by fire." v. C. R. Conder: Survey of Western Palestine.

Special Papers: Christian and Jewish Traditions, p. 232.

v. also, Merrill: East of the Jordan.

² v. Curtius, Hirschfeld, etc.: Ausgrabungen zu Olympia, Bd. ii, ss. 6 and 18. For description of Church v. Bd. iii, ss. 29–32. For plans, etc., v. Bd. iii, Taf. xxxvi.

³ v. especially Garrucci: Isoria dell' Arte cristiana. Prato, 1875–79. 5 vols. fol. Vol. i, Text; vol. ii. Burial monuments, plates, and explanations; vol. iii, Monuments other than burial; vol. iv, Mosaics in catacombs and elsewhere; vol. v, Sarcophagi in cemeteries. Magnificently executed, and a latest authority from the Catholic standpoint, yet extreme in his theory of Christian symbolism.

Rotonda (the burial chapel of Theodoric), San Apollinare in Classe, and the most interesting and instructive of all, San Vitale, are yet preserved. Though it has been much tampered with, the dome of the small baptistery of San Giovanni in fonte, in Naples, contains some very rich mosaics of the latter half of this century. In Constantinople St. Sophia is the most magnificent monument. Traces of two other churches are still seen in this capital. Some of the original portions of St. George in Thessalonica, the modern Salonica, survive, with some of the richest mosaics of the century.¹ St. Catharine, on Mount Sinai, must also be referred to this century. A few other churches of this period which retain some parts of their original structure are found scattered over the old empire, both east and west. Numerous sites furnish individual objects of great interest. In Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Hungary, Egypt, Numidia, Cyrene, Carthage, Spain, and southern France explorations are yielding rich results which happily illustrate the stage of art advancement and the condition of religious and ecclesiastical thought of the early Christian centuries.

The archæological societies of Germany and Great Britain have been most diligent and zealous in the discovery and description of much that has enriched the materials for writing the history of the christianization of the original dwellers in those lands. Especially along the borders of the Rhine and its immediate tributaries these archæological researches have been abundantly rewarded, while in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland unexpected treasures have been discovered.²

Some beautifully illuminated manuscripts from the sixth century have also been preserved, which show the complete subjection of art to ecclesiastical service, especially in the Greek Church. A regular series of illustrations of the Book of Genesis,³ in ten plates, is found in a manuscript preserved in Vienna. Also in the Codex Syriacus, now in the Laurentian library of Florence, are plates from the sixth century,¹ in which the life of Christ and the events of the Church to the day of Pentecost are pictured. In the Codex Vaticanus are eleven plates devoted to Old Testament scenes. A series of paintings illustrating the book of Joshua² and thirty-six pictures, in gold and colors, of ecclesiastical vessels, etc., are in the Vatican library.

¹ Texiere & Pullan: Byzantine Architecture, Plates xxx, xxxi, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxv, and pp. 136-141. These authors also hold that St. Sophia of Thessalonica also belongs to this century.

² Invaluable materials have been collected in the art journals of Germany, as the Zeitschrift für christl. Archæologie und Kunst, the Organ für christl. Kunst, the Christliche Kunstblatt, etc., and in the proceedings of the local art and archæological societies. The Christian inscriptions found in the British Islands have been collected and edited by Huebner: Inscriptiones Britannicæ Christianæ. Berlin and London, 1876.

³ v. Garrucci: Op. cit., vol. iii. These have been described by Daniel de Nessel, v. also d'Agincourt: t. ii, pp. 49, 50, and plate xix.

The number of art monuments belonging to the first six centuries of the Christian era is very great. They furnish illustrations of nearly every branch of Christian art, and become the silent and unconscious witnesses to the life, the belief, and the social condition of the early Church. Many have been arranged in museums for purposes of convenient study, and the zeal of investigators seems never to abate. While it is very difficult to give these monuments a classification according to chronological order, and different archæologists differ widely in opinion with regard to their age, they must, nevertheless, be regarded as invaluable auxiliaries to the complete understanding of the history of the Christian Church.³

¹ Some refer this manuscript to the fourth century. v. d'Agincourt: t. ii, pp. 52, 53, plate xxvii. Others assign it to a later date than the sixth century.

² d'Agincourt: t. ii, pp. 53, 54, plate xxxviii. Garrucci: Op. cit., vol. iii.

These interesting manuscripts are more fully described under chapter iv.

³ An immense amount of materials has been accumulated in the transactions of learned societies, and in the journals that are especially devoted to Christian archæology. Probably the foremost among the latter are the Bullettino Archeologia cristiana of Rome, which has been the special organ of de Rossi and his learned and enthusiastic associates, and the Revue Archæologique, which has been conducted with marked ability for many years.

CHAPTER II.

THE RELATIONS OF CHRISTIANITY TO ART DURING THE FIRST SIX CENTURIES.

It has been common with one class of writers to represent the early Christian Church as indifferent or even hostile to the fine arts. By some the teaching of the Christian fathers has been declared antagonistic to art; by others this view has been controverted.¹ Much of this contrariety of opinion is plainly attributable to a failure to notice the varying condition and the ever shifting environment of the Church of the first three centuries. Three questions need to be considered: 1. The Jewish origin of the first Christian converts, and the peculiarity of the Semitic imagination. 2. The diverse opinions held by the Jews and the Greeks with respect to the nature and revelation of God. 3. The growing influence of Christianity through the conversion of cultivated and wealthy pagans, and its final adoption as the state religion.

1. Christ and his first apostles were Jews. For nearly a generation after the ascension many of the adherents to the new faith were of Jewish origin, felt the obligation of the Jewish law, and loved the Jewish ritual. In their earlier history the Hebrews had been a pastoral people. Prior to the time of the kings their intercourse with other nations had been very limited. These circumstances were unfavorable to art origination and culture. After their return from the Babylonian captivity, the custom of carefully refraining from intermarriage with the surrounding peoples made their isolation still more complete. From this time Judaism assumed an exclusiveness before entirely unknown. While a nominal dependency of Persia, the Jews had been content to purchase peace and quietude by prompt payment of tribute money. Their influence seemed so insignificant that the Jews of Palestine were scarcely thought worthy of mention by the Greek historians of Alexander's time. Those who had been transported to the newly founded African metropolis furnish a partial exception to this exclusiveness; nevertheless their attempt to harmonize the Hebrew Scriptures with the current Greek thought awakened in the minds of the Jews of Palestine a hatred scarcely less bitter than was felt toward the Samaritans themselves. "The founding of the Syro-Grecian kingdom by Seleucus and the establishment of the capitol at Antioch brought Judea into the unfortunate situation of a weak province, placed between two great conflicting monarchies."¹ From this time the condition of the Jewish people became deplorable in the extreme.

¹ Dorner: Lehre von der Person Christi, i, s. 290, note.

Depressed condition of Jewish people.

It was one continuous struggle for existence from without, a state of fierce contentions and rivalries within. Even the patriotism of the Maccabean princes proved only the brilliant flicker of an expiring national life. True, the Jews were no insignificant factor in the society and business of many of the cities of the empire. In Alexandria and in Rome a separate quarter was assigned to them.² Hellenizing influences had, indeed, been marked and powerful. Nevertheless, they remained essentially isolated in religion and in social customs;³ while the partial syncretism of thought and style which sometimes resulted must be regarded as unfavorable to a healthy art development. From the time of their return from Babylon to the days of Christ, therefore, their conditions, social, financial, commercial, and religious, were least favorable to the successful cultivation of the fine arts.

Their condition unfavorable to art culture.

While the second commandment evidently acted as a check to the encouragement of painting and sculpture, its prohibition of art representation cannot be regarded as absolute.⁴ It must apply mainly to images which tempt to idolatry. The subsequent history of the Hebrews and their divinely instituted ritual justify this opinion. The injunction to Moses "to destroy the altars of the people, to break their images,

The second commandment not prohibitory of art.

¹ Milman: History of the Jews. 4th edition, London, 1866, vol. i, pp. 450, 451.

² For their numbers and influence in Cicero's day. v. pro Flacco, 28; in the reigns of Julius and Augustus, v. Suetonius, Caesar, 84; Tiberius, 36; Josephus, Antiq., xvii, 11, 1; xviii, 3, 5.

³ On their social standing at Rome v. Hausrath: Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, 2te Aufl., Bd. iii, ss. 71-81.

For the epigraphic evidence of the constitution of the Jewish society at Rome v. Schürer's valuable monograph, Die Gemeindeverfassung der Juden in Rom. Leipzig, 1879.

⁴ "It may, perhaps, be admitted that the prohibition expressed in our verse [Exod. xx, 4] has exerted a retarding influence upon the progress and development of the plastic arts among the Hebrews, as a like interdiction in the Koran has produced a similar effect among the Arab tribes; for plastic art, in its beginnings, equally stands in the service of religion, and advances by the stimulus it affords. But it is an incomprehensible mistake if it is believed that plastic arts in general, sculpture and painting, are forbidden in our text."—Kalisch: Historical and Critical Commentary of the Old Testament.

and cut down their groves" (Exod. xxiv, 13), and the sweeping prohibition, "Thou shalt make thee no molten gods" (ver. 17), are coupled with the reason, "For thou shalt worship no other god, for the Lord whose name is Jealous is a jealous God" (ver. 14). It was, therefore, "images of gods" and not every species of art representation whose making was here forbidden. The preparation of the tabernacle and of its furniture were of divine appointment and after a divinely given pattern (Exod. xxv, 9). The artificers of the work, Bezalel and Oholiab, were called and inspired of God (Exod. xxxv, 30, 31, and xxxvi, 1). This was the prevalent opinion among the Jews in the time of Christ (Heb. viii, 5). Yet on the furniture of the tabernacle were representations of vegetable forms, as the almond-shaped bowls of the candlesticks (Exod. xxv, 33), and the pomegranates and bells of gold on the hem of the priest's ephod (Exod. xxviii, 33, 34); also of animal forms, as the golden cherubim (Exod. xxv, 18-20), and the embroidered cherubs upon the particolored veil dividing "between the holy place and the most holy" (Exod. xxvi, 31-33).

Four and a half centuries later, when the government had taken on the form of an hereditary monarchy, David essayed to build a resting-place for the ark of God. The scriptural account conveys the impression that this temple, built by Solomon, was after a pattern revealed by God to David (1 Chron. xxviii, 6, 10, 12, 19, and 2 Chron. vi, 10; per contra, 1 Kings v, 6; 2 Chron. ii, 3, 7; 1 Kings vi, 2; 2 Chron. vi, 2). The connection of the choice of the site with the terrible punishment of the sin of taking the census of Israel gave to this temple a most solemn interest. This threshing-floor of the fallen Jebusite king, where first was given the vision of the coming pestilence, became the center of the national worship for more than a thousand years, and to-day is held in equal veneration by the conquering sons of Ishmael. The temple hereon erected was far more than an architectural display. It supplied the framework of the history of the kingdom of Judah. It was the center of the whole religious life of Israel.¹ Slight as is our knowledge of the details, it is plain that "its general arrangements were taken from those of the tabernacle."² Such was the Jewish opinion to a very late period of their national history. Its form and size were similar to those of the tabernacle.³ It is certain that the introduction of vegetable and animal forms into the structure and furniture of the temple of Solomon was still more free than in the case of the tabernacle. Besides the golden cherubim were now found the twelve oxen or bulls of brass, supporting the great brazen laver, while the lesser lavers rested upon forms of cherubs, lions, and bulls. In addition to almonds and pomegranates lilies are now found, or, as some understand the text, the great laver itself was in the form of a flower of the lily.

¹ Stanley: Hist. of the Jewish Church, 2d series, p. 150.

² Ewald: Hist. of Israel, vol. iii, p. 247.

³ Fergusson: v. article "Temple," in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.

These arrangements plainly show that the second commandment could not have been sweeping in its denunciation of the arts of form, or else there is in both the tabernacle and temple a like wide departure from the spirit of the law. The latter alternative opinion can hardly comport with the manifest claims of each structure to a divine origin. While we must, therefore, doubt the exclusiveness of the prohibition expressed in the second commandment with reference to the use of art forms in the sacred edifices and ritual of the Jews,¹ there can be as little doubt that this law greatly discouraged the cultivation of the arts of form. Wherever religion, which is the chief inspiration and patron of high art, is hostile or indifferent, the cultivation of art must languish and the character of its products become indifferent.

Vegetable and animal forms.

The commandment nevertheless a hindrance to art patronage.

We must, however, find the solution of the slender products of this people in sculpture, painting, and architecture chiefly in the peculiar character of the Semitic imagination. This has been noticed by students of general art history, as well as by writers on Hebrew poetry and music.²

The peculiarity of the Semitic imagination.

This people was not wanting in imagination or in art susceptibility. Few came nigher to the heart of nature, none were more sensitive to her subtler beauties.³ But the Semitic imagination was wild and restless; it was strong, daring, and impetuous. It had a

¹ "Even the principle of the second commandment, that Jehovah is not to be worshipped by images, which is often appealed to as containing the most characteristic peculiarity of Mosaism, cannot, in the light of history, be viewed as having had so fundamental a place in the religion of early Israel. The state worship of the golden calves led to no quarrel between Elisha and the dynasty of Jehu; and this one fact is sufficient to show that, even in a time of notable revival, the living power of the religion was not felt to lie in the principle that Jehovah cannot be represented by images."—W. Robertson Smith, The Prophets of Israel, pp. 62, 63.

² Hotho: Geschichte d. ch. Malerei. Stuttgart, 1867. 1ten Abschn., 1te cap., ss. 24. seq. Schnaase: Geschichte d. bildenden Künste, 2te Aufl. Dusseldorf, 1866-78. Bd. i, 3te Bd. cap. 3, ss. 232. seq.

Bp. Lowth: Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews. London, 1847. Lect. 13, et al.

³ Comp. Psn. viii, 3, 4; xix, 1, 4, 5; civ, 1, 2, 24; Isa. xl, 22; Hos. v, 7; Sirach xliii, 1, 9, 11, 12; Matt. vi, 28, 29; 1 Cor. xv, 41, etc.

direct and manifest influence upon the logical faculty.¹ It gave tone and hue to much of their sacred literature. This inquietude causes every figurative representation that flits before the mind to be quickly supplanted by another. Either the first is inadequate for the metaphorical purpose, and the second is summoned to complete it; or through the manifoldness of its appearance it brings to mind yet something else that is closely related to the subject in hand, which thus becomes blended with the first picture of the fancy, only to obscure and weaken the sharpness of its outline.² Hebrew poetry furnishes numerous illustrations of this principle, and the writings of the Prophets confirm it.³ Take the passage in 1 Kings xiv, 15, as an example of the restlessness and impetuosity of the Hebrew imagination. Israel is here represented as a person who is to receive chastisement at the hand of the Lord. Its infliction causes him to reel, which effort suggests the slender reed shaken by the resistless blast. This new object to which the attention is directed is now the recipient of a further action—the rooting out of the land—thus calling up the promised inheritance. The further effect of the chastisement is not only the removal to another place, but the scattering beyond the river, and the dissolution of this personified Israel into its individual members.⁴ The picture of the blessings of Christ's kingdom as given in Isa. xxxii, 2, is another example of the same restlessness of fancy. The primal notion of safety and nourishment is plain and simple; but the imagination rushes from “a hiding-place from the wind and a covert from the storm” to “rivers of waters in a dry place,” and thence to “a great rock in a weary land.” Here is unity of thought, but we attempt in vain to reproduce by arts that appeal to the eye the diverse objects here presented. Of Isa. xiv, 4, 27, an enthusiastic admirer and commentator of the Hebrew poetry has written, “How forcible is this imagery, how diversified, how sublime! How elevated the diction, the figures, the sentiments! The Jewish nation, the cedars of Lebanon, the ghosts of the departed kings, the Babylonish monarch, the travelers who find the corpse, and, last of all,

¹ e. g., the curious and repeated involutions of the argument in the Epistle to the Romans; thus greatly adding to the difficulties of its exegesis. This was noticed by Irenæus (Adv. Hæc., iii, 7, § 2) who attributes the irregularities of Paul's style to the impetuosity of the spirit within him.

² Schnaase: Op. cit., Bd. i, s. 236.

³ v. 1 Kings xiv, 15; Psa. xviii; Isa. xiv, 4, 27; xxxii, 2; xxxviii, 11, 14, and numerous other passages.

⁴ v. Schnaase: Op. cit., ibid.

JEHOVAH himself, are the characters that support this lyric drama."¹ While the imagery is poetic, it is incapable of representation by painting or sculpture. This restless impetuosity of imagination is found not only in warnings and prophecies of destruction, but in depicting peaceful scenes, holy triumphs, pastoral simplicity, and even in historic narration.

It is a well accepted principle of formative art that it requires a measure of fixedness and repose. This limits the im- Accepted art principle. agination to a single and well defined subject. A painting implies limitation in time and place; a statue is the crystallization of one leading thought; high architecture obeys the laws of symmetry and proportion. These arts demand unity, sharpness of outline, and obedience to well settled principles of execution. We have only to refer to the above-mentioned products of the Jewish imagination, or recall some of the invocations to praise, or the description of God's majestic ways in nature, as found in the Book of Job, the Psalms, or the Prophets, to be convinced that the Semitic imagination was too restlessly nervous, or too daring in its flights, to obey the canons imposed on sculpture, painting, and architecture.

Like results are reached from the study of the Solomonic temple and the sculptured and pictorial forms which were Confirmation from examples of the formative arts. admitted into the ornamentation of its furniture. The outline of this sacred building was that of a mere box, destitute of artistic proportions or elegance.² The beautiful symmetry, the harmony of color, and the perfection of details, met in the Greek temple of the golden age, are in marked contrast with the baldness of form and the barbaric splendor of Solomon's temple. Even more striking is the difference between the The Jewish temple. few artistic forms which were allowed in the one and those adorning the temple of a Zeus or of an Athene. The figures of the cherubim which overshadowed the mercy-seat were of olive-Examples of wood, overlaid with gold (1 Kings vi, 23-28). These sculpture. figures were colossal, but were wanting in symmetry, while their lack of adjustment to the containing space manifested an indifference to artistic harmony. In the descriptions of the seraphim in the vision of Isaiah (Isa. vi), and of the cherubim in the vision of Ezekiel (Ezek. xli), all is wild and involved. In these forms is noticed an absence of unity and proportion, an impatience of boundary and definition. They transcend the limits of the human, and are allied to the mysterious and the supernatural.

¹ Bp. Lowth: Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, Lect. 13.

² Dean Milman seems to convey an erroneous impression of the architectural peculiarities of Solomon's temple when he says, "Yet in some respects, if the measurements are correct, the temple must rather have resembled the form of a simple Gothic church."—Hist of the Jews, Book vii. It is difficult to trace any likeness in these two widely separated and very diverse styles of architecture. Indeed, we could hardly find a stronger contrast than exists between Solomon's temple and a Gothic church. More correct is his statement, p. 311: "The temple itself was rather a monument of the wealth than of the architectural skill and science of the people." Dean Stanley's estimate is certainly justified by the best results of modern investigation: "The outside view must, if we can trust the numbers, have been, according to modern notions, strangely out of proportion."—The Jewish Church, London, 1875, vol. i, p. 174.

This idiosyncrasy, so unfavorable to arts which appeal to the eye, is not incompatible with high excellence in poetry and music. Nevertheless, a like diversity may be traced in the poetry of the Jews and of the Greeks. This is manifest from a careful comparison of passages from the Hebrew bards with those taken from Homer, where like objects are described, or like poetic images are involved. Homer treats each element of the figure consecutively and exhaustively; the Hebrew bard flits from point to point in rapid succession. Homer gives many elements of one view; the Hebrew presents single elements of many views.¹

2. The relations of the divine to the human as conceived by the Semitic mind were very different from those recognized by the Hellenic peoples. The monotheism of the Hebrews was peculiar.
The Hebrew monotheism. Their Jehovah was not merely the one living and true God, but he was at the same time the illimitable and unfathomable Mystery, the Unapproachable, whom no form can contain, no symbol may adequately represent. The assurance given to Moses, "Thou canst not see my face, for no man shall see me and live" (Exod. xxxiii, 20), inspired in the worshiper a pervading awe. The infinity of the attributes of One whom "the heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain" (2 Chron. ii, 18), "the ¹ Of the Hebrew lyric poetry, as an exhibition of the Hebrew imagination, Lotze says:

"Here the mind dwells upon its communion with God, and extols with all the power of the most passionate expression, as proof of divine omnipotence, every deep-felt individual feature of cosmic beauty. For among the divine attributes it is certainly omnipotence which, above all, is felt, and gives a coloring to æsthetic imagination; we do, indeed, meet with innumerable pictures of nature which, taken separately, have often that inimitable beauty and charm which civilization, entangled by a thousand unessential accessories of thought, finds it so difficult to attain; but these pictures are not utilized for the development of a progressive course of thought, but merely juxtaposed as though to magnify from different but corresponding sides the omnipresent influence of that divine activity which they depict." v. Microcosmus, translation, New York, 1885, vol. ii, p. 403.

King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God" (1 Tim. i, 17), made the fitting representation of Jehovah through form or symbol inconceivable and self-contradictory. Of all the Oriental peoples the Jews most abhorred the degradation of Deity to the plane of nature. In their conception the forces of nature were only the agents and instruments of God which he used to accomplish his will. These views of God and nature tended to drive the Jew back upon himself, and to encourage the study and development of a subjective life. Lacking, therefore, a religious sanction and encouragement, art among the Jews could have but a partial development, since all history and philosophy are accordant in teaching that art has achieved its grandest triumphs when inspired by the truths of religion, while religion has found in art its closest handmaid and successful interpreter.

Unfavorable to representative art.

How different was the thought of pagan Greece and Rome! While in their early history both these peoples were eminently religious, their conceptions of the divine were nevertheless indistinct and shifting. The most devout Greeks could affirm without public offence that Hesiod and Homer were the authors of their mythology. Their opinion of the deities was fixed neither by law nor by the authority of a divinely instituted priesthood. The priests were not a favoured class, but were generally chosen from year to year to minister to the people and communicate the will of the gods. Nature was not merely an instrument by which the one infinite Ruler accomplishes his purposes, but was apportioned to a multitude of divinities whose domain was limited and defined. Natural forces were personified, and these personifications were the products of the popular fancy, or were traditions which were invested with no supreme authority. It has been said that the Greeks idealized nature. In comparison with the low materialistic tendencies of many Oriental peoples this claim is fairly just. Certainly their religion was for the most part bright and cheerful. It turned toward the outward. The deep subjective element of the Hebrew faith was feeble in both the heathen Greek and Roman. While the earlier Greek religion had been characterized by freedom of thought, and the Roman, on the contrary, was to the last degree prescribed, these religions nevertheless agree in the common quality of externality. Paul's masterly summary was descriptive of all pagan systems alike; "They worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator" (Rom. i, 25). To the Greek there was no holy God; all divinities were alike subject to the weakness of change, and to the sway of passion. "Instead of holiness, beauty took the supreme place."¹ Loyalty to the family and to the state was to the Roman the highest ideal of piety. To represent their gods in beautiful and perfected forms seemed appropriate to peoples whose conceptions of deity shifted with their own varying history. Hence their relation to the formative arts must have been widely different from that of the Hebrews. While to the Jew the divine worship and the house of worship must be only symbolic of the mysterious power and presence of Jehovah; while, therefore, proportions and outlines need not be subject to strict law or definition, but might defy the principles which govern mere finite existence; the worship, the statues, and the temples of the Greeks had a clearness and a distinctness which were entirely consonant with the nature of gods who were merely a projection of finite thought, and the embodiment of what was best and highest in humanity. By a method of limitation and degradation of their divinities to an image or statue, the Greeks used the arts of form as didactic means of a religious education. Thus as minister and illustrator of religion formative art among the Greeks found its richest themes and its highest inspiration, while among the Hebrews its isolation from religious thought and religious service resulted in an imperfect development and a languishing life.

The Greek mythology.

Externality of the heathen religions.

We have a most conspicuous illustration and proof of this Jewish indifference to the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture in the person of St. Paul. Born in Tarsus, the seat of advanced Greek culture, where objects of exquisite taste adorned the markets and public squares, he must have enjoyed abundant opportunity for the study of the formative arts of the period. Yet, in the account of his missionary visit to Athens is found no single expression of friendly interest in the matchless works with which that noted city still abounded, not one intimation of æsthetic pleasure awakened by their study.² Rather did he see in these richest and grandest pro-

¹ Uhlhorn: Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism. Translation, revised edition 1879. P. 33.

² "Any sense of the dignity and beauty of pagan art was impossible to one who had been trained in the school of the rabbis. There was nothing in his education (we might add, in his people) which enabled him to admire the simple grandeur of the Propylæa, the severe beauty of the Parthenon, the massive proportions of the Theseum, the exquisite elegance of the Temple of the Wingless Victory. From the nude grace and sinewy strength of the youthful processions portrayed on frieze or entablature, he would have turned away with something of impatience, if not of disgust."—Farrar: Life of St. Paul. London, 1882. Vol. i, p. 527.

Results of these differences to art culture.

St. Paul an illustration of Semitic indifference to the fine arts.

Farrar's statement.

ducts of the human imagination, in statues of matchless beauty, in altars of faultless form, in temples of incomparable proportions, naught but the plainest proofs of a mournful departure from the one true God, and unmistakable evidences of the degradation and helplessness of the heathen world.

3. While the Gospel must be first preached at Jerusalem, and while by their monotheistic faith and Messianic hopes the Jewish people formed the proper point of union between the old and the new, the spirit of universalism taught by Jesus could not be limited by the prevalent exclusiveness. His was a Universalism of the Gospel. system of truth and salvation for the race. When Paul and Barnabas said, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii, 46), the grandeur of the Gospel mission was first made manifest. Most gladly did the poor and the oppressed of heathendom hear the proclamation of deliverance from their spiritual bondage.

The estimated number of converts to Christianity at the close of the first century is 500,000; at the close of the second 2,000,000; at the close of the third 7,000,000 to 10,000,000. Number and character of converts. Even at the close of the first century, probably the majority of Christians had been gathered from heathen peoples. The Gentile element rapidly increased. By the middle of the second century Jewish influence and tendencies had well-nigh disappeared. After the second century, with the exception of some isolated communities, the Church consisted essentially of converts who must have been thoroughly familiar with pagan art.

It is impossible to believe that families of high station, that had been entirely favorable to the patronage of the fine arts, could, on embracing Christianity, immediately change their tastes and practice, especially since nothing inimical to the cultivation of art is found in the teachings of Christ or in the writings of his apostles.

Every chief city in the Roman Empire had become a museum into which had been gathered the treasures which the Greeks had produced during a long period of art activity and origination. Powerful art influences. Temples, altars, shrines; vale, grove, and mountain; public squares, market-places, the halls of justice, private houses—contained objects which familiarized the looker-on with the thought that the divine may be represented in visible form. The pagan moralists regarded these images as most helpful means of instruction, and a most healthful stimulus of the faith of the worshipper.

Like the Christian apologists for images in a later century, the priests of paganism taught that the people could thus be brought near the person of the divinity. Art works regarded helpful by the heathen moralists. While some of the more thoughtful, as Seneca, rejected this view, the majority taught that the gods were truly present in the images. The untutored multitude believed that their deities had as many different personalities as there were representations. Herein the faith of the adherents to the old religions was strikingly like that of the Christians during the most flourishing periods of image worship.¹

Thus had art been made the illustrator and teacher of religion. They had become so closely joined that the protests of some of the Christian fathers against its practice and encouragement sounded harsh and discordant to the pagan moralists. But the accessions to the Church of families of wealth and high social position, the cessation of the fierce struggle of heathendom for re-establishment, and the removal of the dangers that threatened the lapse of Christianity into heathen idolatry, furnished new conditions for the cultivation and patronage of the fine arts. The inherent love of the beautiful found means of rational gratification; the new religion breathed into the old forms a quickening spirit, and originated a treatment peculiarly Christian. The decadence everywhere observed in the pagan world from the blight of faith was measurably arrested by the vital union of the true and the beautiful in Christianity. The changed relations of the Christian to the Jewish Church, the juster view of the nature of God and his government of the material universe, and the recognition of Christianity as an important factor in the civilization of the empire, favored the alliance of the Church with art, which thus received a truer inspiration.²

Some, however, who had been converted from the pagan system were, at first, scarcely less pronounced against the use of art forms in the places of worship than the Jewish Christians themselves.³ This seeming hostility of a few of the Christian fathers was chiefly occasioned by the corrupting associations of the prevalent art. As before remarked, the Christian and pagan views of the divine nature and government were in directest contradiction. The one believed that each stream, wood,

Causes of Christian art encouragement.

Early opposition to the arts of form in Christian services.

¹ Friedländer: Darstellung aus der Sittengeschichte Roms, Bd. iii, s. 565, et al.

This author compares the heathen belief in the diversity of the nature of the gods with that of the Neapolitans respecting the Madonna and her various art representations.

² "Christianity only discouraged art so long as art was the handmaid of sin: the moment this danger ceased, she inspired and ennobled art."—Farrar, Life of St. Paul, chap. xxvii.

"Christianity by exalting moral above physical beauty, the soul above the body, encouraged the development of ardent and passionate men of genius"—E. Müntz: Les Artistes célèbres. Donatello.

³ Piper: Mythologie der christlichen Kunst. Weimar, 1847. Bd. i, s. 2.

and mountain was governed by a separate divinity, and that every act and event of human experience from birth to death was under the direction of some special deity; the other regarded the universe as the work of the one true God, and this world as the theatre for the display of the divine mercy and glory, and for the manifestation of behavior under the divine government.¹ Through the universal decadence of belief and the corresponding corruption of morals, that which had originally been inspired by strong faith in the supernatural had become the minister to the most degrading rites and ceremonies. Hence, some of these works of art were at first doubly repulsive to the heathen converts themselves. It was originally a war against images; subsequently it extended itself by a law of association to all decorative and art Extent of this forms connected with the heathen worship. At first opposition. even objects in free statuary and paintings used to beautify private houses and household furniture were forbidden. The artist whose skill was employed in the production of these works was placed under the ban of the Church. On assuming church membership he was, at times, compelled to abandon his craft. The Apostolic Constitutions are very positive in their teachings on this point. A maker of images of the gods who shall have become a Christian must either abandon his business or be excommunicated.² Some influential Christian fathers were most outspoken. So late as the beginning of the third century Tertullian argued the case with great vehemence. He urges that while the Christian artificer Tertullian's teaching. did not himself worship these images, he was placing in the hands of others objects which might be most misleading. One cannot consistently confess the one true God with the mouth, and yet preach polytheism with the hand. While Christian artisans themselves may not offer incense to these images of the gods, they are, nevertheless, putting into their work their powers of mind and soul, and are thus consenting to derive their own comfort and support from a soul-destroying idolatry.³ Clement of Alexandria was of like mind.' But the use of such facts to prove the hostility of these fathers to art per se, and the indifference of the early Church to the cultivation of the fine arts, is manifestly misleading. Such conclusions are denied by the evidence of the senses.²

¹ "If the pagan religions had explained the government of the universe by the government of man, thus multiplying the realms of law, each under a distinct law-giver, the Christian had achieved that highest possible generalization, sublime in its simplicity, of a single realm and one universal divine government."—Holland: Jurisprudence, p. 14.

² Apostolic Constitutions, viii, c. 32: "Idolorum opifex si accedat, aut desistat ant-repellatur."

³ De Idolatria, c. 6: "Quomodo enim renuntiavimus diabolo et angelis ejus, si eos facimus? . . . Potes lingua negasse, quod manu confiteris? verbo destruere, quod facto struis? unum Deum prædicare, qui tantos effolis? verum Deum prædicare, qui falsos facis?"

The adornment of dress, and the decoration of furniture, utensils, and wall-spaces in the private house, have generally been the earliest product of the æsthetic faculty. So probably with the art of the early Christians.³ It was so far removed from the associations of heathen worship as to awaken little opposition. This view finds confirmation in the writings of the early Christian fathers. The next step seems to have been the decoration of tombs and the wall-spaces of crypts in the catacombs, which often served the double purpose of sepulture and of a place of assembly for the celebration of the sacraments. Hence the archæologist must betake himself to the careful study of these burial monuments to gain the truest conception of the nature and mission of early Christian art.⁴

Unquestionably, the Christian Church accepted and appropriated to its own use many of the art forms that were at early Christian hand. To create an absolutely new school was, under the circumstances, impossible. The earliest Christian painting and sculpture follow the heathen type; no wide departure is anywhere observable. The originality of the Christian artists

¹ Among other passages v. Pædagogus, lib. iii

² An interesting parallel may be drawn between the teachings of the Christian fathers of the second and third centuries and those of some of the great reformers of the sixteenth. The early apologists clearly discerned the threat to the purity of Christian life and doctrine coming from the indiscriminate use of heathen art; Luther, Zwinglius, Beza, and Calvin would exclude images from churches, not because they did not love art, but because these objects were misleading the simple worshippers. v. Grüneisen: De Protestantismo artibus hand infesto. Tübingæ, 1839. Also an essay, Catholicism and Protestantism as Patrons of Christian Art, in the Methodist Quarterly Review, January, 1877.

³ What modification of opinion might be necessary were the countless objects that have been lost to be recovered, it is impossible to say. The materials are often very meagre, and sometimes the archæologist must be guided by analogical evidence.

⁴ "Probably religious representations were transferred from private houses to churches at the end of the third century, for the Church of Elvira, A. D. 305, protested against this use of images in the churches."—Neander: Church Hist., Torrey's trans., vol. ii, p. 508. This opinion of Neander needs very important qualification. It seems to be founded upon documentary rather than upon monumental evidence. With the latter he interested himself very slightly. Indeed, nearly every great work on church history in this century—for example, Neander, Giessler, Niedner, Baur, Kurtz, etc.—is strangely silent on the monuments. Schaff, in his last edition, forms a striking and pleasant exception.

consisted essentially in pressing into the service of the new faith what before had ministered to the religions of paganism. A new spirit was infused into the old body, not immediately to modify and transform it, but to teach new and saving truths. The early employment of symbolism indicates the chariness of the Church in the use of free statuary and painting. symbolism among the earliest forms of Christian art. The authority of Scripture was invoked. The Fathers assumed that to represent to the eye what the Scriptures teach by word-symbol was not idolatrous. Jesus spoke of himself and of his saving offices under the symbol of a vine; he called himself the Good Shepherd, and his followers the sheep. The finally saved were the sheep placed on his right hand in paradise; the finally impenitent were the goats which were to be banished from his presence forever. Thus the cycle of Christian symbolism which became so effective in teaching was greatly enlarged, and aided to introduce the arts of form into the service of the Church.

It is, therefore, scarcely philosophical or in accord with historic facts to attribute the symbolic character of the pre-Constantine art to merely outward circumstances, as fear of persecution, or an aversion to exposing to profane eyes the mysteries of the Christian religion. The transition from the symbolic to the literal representation was rather in obedience to a fundamental law of art development. Transition from symbolic to literal representation. The deep spiritual life of the Church must precede the outward expression. The decadence of religious sentiment in the pagan world had caused a like decadence in all forms of representative art, whether poetry, music, painting, sculpture, or architecture. The higher spiritual life of the Christian Church must supply the necessary conditions of a completer art which would be developed whenever the outward circumstances might favor.¹

The history of the first three centuries clearly shows that just as the heathen philosophical thought was used by the Church fathers to give concise expression to Christian doctrine, and the Roman state furnished the type for an ecclesiastical hierarchy, just so were the forms of pagan art and its principles of expression pressed into the service of the triumphant religion.² This appropriation went so far as frequently to use

¹ Piper: Mythologie der ch. Kunst, Bd. i, ss. 5, 6.

² A similar contribution of heathen thought is seen in the Roman guilds.

"The constitution of these guilds, and the kind of life developed within them, have been of the greatest importance in the history of Christian charity and its development. Certainly it was the case that these guilds laid down the recognised heathen symbols for Christian purposes. Confining himself at first to the simple but significant symbolism of the biblical cycle, the artist afterward employed any heathen emblem which had conveyed an analogous truth. It must be supposed that this practice in some form was quite general in the Christian Church. But the remains of this earliest art industry are limited to a very few centres. Only in Rome is the cycle at all complete. These Christian symbols are often found associated with burial monuments. So long as places of sepulture were under the special protection of law we may suppose that there was no necessity for concealment. The chapels erected over the graves of Christians eminent for piety or for the services they had rendered were adorned with works which have unfortunately almost entirely disappeared. But when, by the edict of Valerian (A. D. 257), assemblies in these burial chapels were prohibited, and fierce persecutions were practised, the Christians were compelled to betake themselves to places of concealment for worship and for the celebration of the sacraments. Thus originated some of the most interesting portions of the catacombs which have been so rich a mine for the Christian archæologist. The preservation of these treasures of Christian art seems almost providential. They remain as samples of the work of the artists of the early Christian centuries.

What added helps might have been furnished for the elucidation of Christian art in the first six centuries, had not the works outside the catacombs so generally perished, can only be conjectured. The catacombs are for the study of Christian art what the discoveries at Pompeii are for heathen; they furnish invaluable information relative to the art susceptibilities and spirit of their time. The Roman catacombs furnish the only examples of Christian paintings of an earlier date than near the close of the fourth century.

Of the nearly sixty catacombs which have been already excavated, those of SS. Calisto, Priscilla, Domitilla, Prætextato, Sebastiano, and Agnese are richest. Their narrow and often winding passages are skirted on either side by rows of loculi or recesses for receiving the dead. On the faces of slabs of stone which close the loculi was sculptured, sometimes painted, sometimes scratched in the soft mortar, a symbol or epitaph to reveal the belief of the departed, or to indicate the triumph of Christian faith. At the place of intersection these passages were forms in accordance with which, when once the power of true love began to stir the Christian communities, their charity was to be exercised."—Uhlhorn: Christian Charity in the Ancient Church, p. 27. New York: 1883.

frequently widened, and their height increased to form chambers which were sometimes the burial place of martyrs of peculiar sanctity. Upon the wall-spaces and ceilings are found the paintings which most clearly reveal the artistic taste of the Christians prior to the fourth century. In the oldest catacombs is noticed a tendency to use the arts of mere decoration. In the spirit and execution the paintings quite closely resemble those found on heathen monuments of the same age. The motive is not essentially different. Birds, flowers, genii, etc., are represented in the most easy and natural style of drawing, and in a spirit worthy of the best periods of pagan art.

Decorative art in the cata-combs.

Some of the vaulted ceilings of the cemetery of Santa Domitilla at

Fig. 1.—Ceiling decoration from Santa Domitilla, Rome. Probably from second century.

Rome are believed to belong to the first half of the second century. On one portion of this ceiling-surface (Fig. 1) the vine is treated in the most unconventional manner, with leaves, fruit, and the genii of the vineyard. There seems to be no attempt at geometrical handling, but a spirit of naturalism inspires the whole work.'

A little later in the century the principle of geometrical division and balancing seems to supplant in a measure this free handling. A very striking example is met in the vaulted ceiling of the cemetery of San Prætestato, in Rome (Fig. 2). In the lower section a reaping scene is depicted in a style equal to the best contemporary pagan art. Above is a beautiful and very lifelike sketch of vine and leaf work in the midst of which birds are sporting, while above all the laurel branch seems to be introduced. On the other sides of this room in the lower zone are children who are picking roses, a vintage scene, in which the gathering, carrying, and treading of the grapes are most vigorously represented, and men who are harvesting olives. The whole artistic design seems to be merely decorative.¹ A class of writers would see in all these a symbolic teaching, but this is manifestly pushing the principle of symbolism to an unwarranted extreme.

Fig. 2.—Ceiling decoration from San Prætestato, Rome. Last half of the second century.

¹ Roller: Catacombs de Rome, Pl. xii, No. 3. Kraus: Roma Sotterranea, ss. 77, 78.

² v. Roller: Catacombs de Rome, t. i, chap. xiv. Northcote & Brownlow: Roma Sotterranea, vol. i, p. 138. Kraus: Roma Sotterranea, s. 83.

In the midst of other figures occasionally appear what must be regarded as distinctively Christian symbols. These depart so widely from the prevalent teaching as to suggest a different origin and inspiration. This commingling of subjects and motives was a most natural, and we may say necessary, result of the situation. The beautiful spirit of purity, gentleness, brotherly kindness, fidelity to principle, the quietness and love of the family life, and the firm attachment to the society of the believers, as expressed in the celebration of the love-feasts and eucharist, could continue only so long as Christianity held itself aloof from the life and duties of the state. So soon, however, as its adherents went from obscurity to mingle in public affairs, they necessarily encountered the power and resistance of heathen customs and laws. Christian doctrine could no longer remain untouched by heathen philosophy, nor its life be uninfluenced by the prevailing fashions. No less could its art be developed apart from

Commingling of pagan and Christian elements.

pagan motives. Hence the commingling of pagan and Christian elements in some of the best examples of Christian art during the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Nevertheless, in the strange and almost unparalleled syncretism of nationalities, beliefs, philosophies, rites, and ceremonies then prevalent in Rome, it is noteworthy to how slight a degree the earlier Christian art was influenced. Only by comparison of the subjects, the symbols, and the execution of the art of the catacombs with contemporary works of Rome can a just conception of the restraining and modifying power of Christianity be gained.¹ That early Christian art should be of the highest order of excellence is not to be anticipated. Christianity made its advent at a time when art was in a condition of decadence which marked all its forms, poetry, music, painting, sculpture, and architecture.

Yet Christian art retained an exceptional purity.

¹ "The artist has long cherished a secret grudge against morality. The prudery of virtue is his great hinderance. He believes that it is our morality that prevents us from rivalling the arts of ancient Greece. He finds that the individual artist seems corrupted and spoiled for his business if he allows morality to get too much control of him. The great masters he notices show a certain indifference, a certain superiority, to it; often they audaciously defy it. The virtuous artists are mostly to be looked for in the second class, into which, moreover, it is doubtful whether they have not been admitted by favor. Hence he becomes most seriously and unaffectedly skeptical about the unapproachable sovereignty of the law of Duty." Supernatural Religion, vol. i, p. 120. Does the learned author forget that Greek art perished with its dying religiousness? Poetry decays in the period of a decadence of faith. Christianity used the Greek to produce a better art, for example, music, and originated some of the grandest and most imposing forms, for example, Gothic architecture.

Hence it must be erroneous to regard Christian art as either a sudden leap into a better and purer form, or a sudden decline from classic excellence. Rather must it be regarded as a progressive development.¹

The mythology of the ancient world influenced Christian art as well as Christian literature and doctrine. It is found either as an historic representation, thus having a typical or religious significance, or it introduced powers of nature under a symbolic form, and then had a purely artistic purpose.² Sometimes these were united. As an instance of the latter may be mentioned the ivory tablet from the fourth century, known as the Barberini Diptych.

Constantine. In the upper part of this tablet is a bust of Christ, in the act of benediction, while on the other parts are various mythological representations. A like commingling of motives is seen on the noted sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Plate I), who, as Præfect of Rome, died shortly after his baptism.

The main panels are occupied with delineations of characters and events from both the Old and the New Testaments—the translation of Elijah, the offering of Isaac, the Hebrew children in the fiery furnace, and scenes from the life of Christ. But in the angles and niches are found heathen mythological representations which seem to have very little connection with the main subjects, and must, therefore, be regarded as having been introduced more for artistic effect than for religious teaching.

Of like character is the noted Greek manuscript of the book of Joshua, now in the Vatican Museum. It consists of fifteen sheets of parchment, nearly thirty feet long and about one foot wide, on which the chief events of the first ten chapters of Joshua are represented. Opinions differ as to the age of this parchment; yet it seems hardly possible that it can be later than the eighth century, while some of the most competent critics³ regard it as among the very earliest of Christian monuments. In the personification of rivers, cities, mountains, etc., the ornamentation of this parchment is in the peculiar spirit of pagan art.

The influence of heathen symbols and thought is apparent on the coins of the Roman emperors who embraced Christianity. The coins prepared by Constantine in commemoration of his victory over Licinius contain the Labarum, which, with the monogram of Christ, rests upon a dragon. The cities of Constantinople and Rome are represented under the symbol of the goddess of Fortune, and the statues of the Christian emperors are sometimes associated with the goddess of Victory.

¹ Piper: Mythologie der ch. Kunst, Bd. i, s. 7.

² Piper: Op. cit., Bd. i, s. 18.

³ v. Rumohr: Italienische Forschungen, Th. 4, p. 166. v. d'Agincourt: Plates xxviii, xxix, xxx. D'Agincourt places it in the seventh or eighth century. In this, as in other monuments, restorations of a later date are suspected. This is one reason of the diversity of opinion respecting its age.

Roman imperial coins.

Not less noteworthy is the commingling of Christian and pagan thought and motive in the case of private Christian burial monuments. Genii of the seasons, Cupid and Psyche, as well as genii of a festive nature, are here found to typify the joy and fruition of the departed.¹

Closely connected with these are representations in which mythological subjects are used as types of biblical persons and events. If the tree of the knowledge of good and evil is associated with the serpent in like manner as, in the heathen myth, the Garden of the Hesperides is guarded by the dragon, or if the translation of Elijah suggests the ascending sun god, this resemblance is merely outward. Yet it may be very easy to transfer the one to the other, and thus commingle pagan and Christian ideas.² So, likewise, may the ram-bearing Mercury be mistaken for a figure of the Good Shepherd, because of a seeming likeness, while all parallelisms in office or nature may be wanting (v. Figs. 47, 48).

Types.

Careful distinction must be made between monuments which contain representations closely resembling each other in mere outward form while there is no likeness in thought, from those which agree in motive, and hence may have been transferred from pagan associations to be used in Christian instruction. It is likewise important to discriminate between heathen inscriptions and symbols on monuments in situ from those that may be found on the walls of churches, on slabs which close the loculi in the catacombs, or on marbles afterward used in the construction of church furniture or of the tombs of eminent Christians. It is well known that in many instances the materials used in Christian structures were gathered from the ruins of ancient pagan temples and shrines.³ Hence, by failure to erase the symbol or inscription,

Difference between outward resemblance and real likeness of thought.

Heathen materials in Christian structures.

¹ Respecting the reference of these figures to the category of symbol or ornamentation there is wide difference of opinion among the archaeologists.

² v. Piper: Op. cit., Bd. i, s. 39.

³ This same commingling of diverse materials is noticed in buildings of the Middle Ages. Among many examples in the North may be mentioned the walls of the close there seems at times an incoherent commingling of pagan and Christian elements.

Millin¹ has given an account of a beautiful sarcophagus of Flavius Memorius, who lived under Maximian or Constantine. It was discovered at Arles, and is now in the museum of Marseilles. In this the appropriation of heathen art work to a Christian burial monument is evident. The work is of pagan origin; moreover, its high order of artistic excellence points to a very early date; yet the inscription, which was manifestly an after thought, is Christian in sentiment. Also Platner² has described a sarcophagus in the cloister of Santa Agnese in Rome. On either end is the favorite representation of Cupid and Psyche; below, the ocean is symbolized by the reed and the water urn, and the earth by the horn of plenty. Above, in the middle of the monument, is a bust in relief held by two cupids. This bust likeness is clearly a Christian work of later origin, and represents St. Agnes, whose remains this sarcophagus formerly preserved.

This curious commingling of elements is also noticed in early Christian churches. Sometimes the columns separating the main from the side naves are of different orders of architecture, of different diameters, and sometimes of different materials. Gathered from the decaying or forsaken heathen temples, these were incorporated into Christian edifices either on account of the poverty of the Church, or to indicate her greater triumph. The churches San Niccolo in Carcere, Santa Maria in Trastevere, and Santa Maria in Cosmedin, at Rome, are instructive examples of this practice. Santa Maria in Trastevere, a three-naved church, has twenty-two granite columns of different heights and diameters, on whose capitals can still be seen sculptures of Jupiter, Juno, and other heathen deities. Santa Maria Cosmedin occupied the site of a temple which stood at the entrance of the Circus Maximus. Built into the walls are still preserved eight beautifully fluted columns of the Roman style, whose capitals can be seen in the loft above the vestibule. Eighteen columns of very ancient origin support the middle nave in the interior.³ of Salisbury Cathedral, England, which contain many sculptured stones taken from other structures. Also in filling in window and door passages in the Cathedral of Winchester a like practice is noticed.

¹ Voyage dans le midi de la France, t. iii, pp. 151-156; Pl. lvi, figures, 2 3. 4.

quoted by Piper, Op. cit., i, s. 45.

² Beschreibung Roms, iii, 2, s. 450. Piper: Op. cit., i, 47.

³ Forster: Mittel-u. Unteritalien, ss. 264-73.

A like syncretism of pagan and Christian subjects is found on gems, and church furniture, as chairs, ambos, baptismal fonts, etc.'

It was one purpose of the early apologists to trace the relations of the pagan religion to the Christian along the line ^{Prophecies and} of prophecies and preparation. In their controversies ^{preparation.} with heathen opponents they repeatedly insisted that many of the elements of the popular mythology were only echoes of an original revelation; that the beautiful myths to which the people clung so fondly were perversions of an earlier truth; that these often pointed to the time of deliverance which had now been consummated by their Lord Christ. It might not be unreasonable to expect that these agreements in motive might give rise to similar art representations. While some modern interpreters profess to see evidences of mythological import in works of Christian art where such likeness is very feeble,¹ there are, nevertheless, many monuments in which such parallelisms of use, or relation, or sentiment are clearly traceable. The translation of Elijah, as sculptured on a Christian sarcophagus of the fifth century, contains a heathen element in that the Jordan is represented as a river god. ^{Translation of} In this there is also a likeness to the pagan representa- ^{Elijah.} tion of the sun god, Apollo, who leads in the day in his flaming chariot, while the ocean is symbolized by a river god, and the earth by the horn of plenty. Still more striking is the resemblance of Christ as the Good Shepherd and Mercury as the Ram-bearer (v. Figs. 47, 48). That the central idea is of Christian origin appears from the teaching of Christ himself, "I am ^{The Good} the Good Shepherd." Again he says, "When he hath ^{Shepherd and} found it (the lost sheep) he layeth it on his shoulders ^{the Ram-bear-} rejoicing" (Luke xv, 5). But that the style of the art representation may have been suggested by the pagan subject is highly probable. It is not always easy to discriminate between the heathen and the Christian origin of monuments which bear this symbol. A scientific treatment demands that all monuments bearing this figure must not, for that reason, be reckoned of Christian origin.

Again, both the gods and the heroes of paganism furnish types for Christian art, not on account of resemblance in nature, but of likeness in office. The introduction of Orpheus into Christian frescos furnishes an illustration (v. Fig. 27). Frequent reference is made to this mythical hero in the apologetic writings of the Christian fathers. With some he suggests Christ by contrariety rather than by likeness. Clement of Alexandria¹ claims that Orpheus and others of his class were arch-deceivers, who, under the pretence of teaching music and song, corrupted the manners of the people, and led them under the bondage of idolatry; while Christ came to break the enslaving yoke which the demons have imposed upon the race. Christ alone has tamed man, the wildest beast; the bird, the most inconstant; the reptile, the most treacherous; the lion, the most passionate; the swine, the most greedy of enjoyment; the wolf, the most rapacious; and the stones and clods, the most insensate. He has awakened the seeds of holiness and virtue in those who believe on him, and through heavenly song has changed these wild beasts into civilized men.

¹ For interesting examples v. Texier and Pullan: Byzantine Architecture, London, 1864, especially the chapter "Pagan Temples Converted into Churches."

² v. Piper: Op. cit., i, ss. 66-77, where an obscure parallel is traced between the representation of the fall by the serpent, the apple, and our first parents, and the dragon watching the tree and fruit in the Garden of the Hesperides.

Eusebius² more usually speaks of Orpheus as a type of Christ, and sometimes as his forerunner. This view came from ascribing to this mythical bard the authorship of the Orphic verses which were by many regarded as containing a heathen prophecy of the true Messiah. Again, he compares the influence of the Thracian singer to that of Christ. As Orpheus by the sweet strains of his lyre tamed the wild beasts of the forest, and even caused the trees to move, so has the all-harmonizing Word of God, when it became flesh, healed the wild passions of men through the medicine of heavenly doctrine. At times Orpheus is made the type of Christ by contrasting the different realms in which his power was exercised, as when it is said that what Orpheus has wrought in the physical and irrational world has been completed by Christ in the spiritual, and what Orpheus did by sorcery was done by Christ through divine power and truth.

Occasional references to the labors of Hercules are met in early Christian monuments. The parallelism seems to be drawn between the power of Hercules and that of Christ as deliverers of men from the thralldom of evil. Also Apollo and Jupiter find occasional mention in connection with Christ. Another curious example of the use of heathen subjects upon ¹ Cohort. ad Gentes, c. i, ἀνδρες τινές οὐχ ἀνδρες, etc. "Certain so-called men, not men, but deceivers, who under the pretext of music corrupted the life of the people," etc.

² Orat. de laud. Constan., c. 14. Orpheum quandam omnia bestiarum genera cantu delinuisse, etc.

Christian sarcophagi is that of Ulysses and the Sirens. A slab (Fig. 3) found in the crypt of Santa Lucina seems entirely pagan in its subject with the exception of the involved inscription at the left, which has been deciphered TYRANIO, ^{Ulysses and} the Sirens. and is believed by some to be an obscured cross. This heathen fable is, nevertheless, alluded to by the early Christian writers, and is made to serve a happy purpose in the enforcement of Christian fidelity and self-denial.¹

Fig. 3.—Ulysses and the Sirens. From the crypt of Santa Lucina, Rome.

These references to the pagan mythology are only what might be regarded as antecedently probable from the intimate acquaintance of the Christian fathers with the pagan systems, and from the attempt to show that in each religion was an element of truth which the other should respect. More especially after Christianity became the state religion many admixtures of heathen and Christian motives are met. According to a law of spiritual life and growth, the cessation of persecution and opposition brought laxity of morals and a decay of pure faith. Multitudes of men and women now formally professed Christianity, while little change was effected in belief or life. The influence of classical literature, the contact with pagan customs, and the appropriation of pagan symbols, now ^{Influences adverse to purity of doctrine.} gave little offence to these nominal Christians; while the increasing splendor of the church ritual and the growing wealth of the clergy diverted the attention from the severity of discipline and the purity of doctrine.

Thus was the prevalent thought modified by intercourse with the pagan world. Art standards were likewise changed. The mingling of heathen with Christian belief brought with it an easy acceptance of what was before regarded as dangerously contaminating. It cannot, however, be supposed that all monuments thus transferred from pagan to Christian uses ^{Influence upon art representation.} were known to be of a character to mislead. Their heathen origin and spirit may not have been understood, or they may have been used allegorically by the Christian teachers.

¹ Philosophumena, vii, i. Clement Alex.: Cohort. ad Gent., c. 12.

Many of the mythological subjects were only for purposes of decoration—as the heads of satyrs, tragic masks, etc. (Fig. 4). Of like import and design must we regard the occasional introduction of dolphins (Fig. 5), sea monsters, etc. It is not easy to discover in these any symbolical significance, and the attempts to so interpret them have usually involved violations of the true principles of symbolism. Where, however, the figure of Apollo, associated with the cross, appears upon the coins of Constantine, we must regard Apollo as a symbol of Christ; or when the figure of Mars appears in connection with the sacred monogram, it must be considered as an allegorical representation of the Saviour.

Fig. 4.—A Christian sarcophagus with tragic masks.

A statue of Victory was set up in the senate chamber by Augustus. Each senator on entering the hall offered to it wine and incense. This statue was the occasion of a most persistent struggle between the defenders of the pagan religion and the Christian bishops.¹ The result was favorable to the Christian party.² Nevertheless, the figure of Victory is not infrequently associated on Christian monuments with the cross or with the sacred monogram. In a few instances it is connected with a bust of Christ on ivory diptychs, and on coins during the Constantinian and post-Constantinian period. A fine example of this is found on a gold coin of Constantine the

Fig. 5.—From a Christian sarcophagus. Decorated with dolphins.

¹ For a fuller statement, v. chap. viii.

² v. Ambrose: Epist. xviii. This is addressed to the Emperor Valentinian in answer to the appeal of Symmachus.

Great, where Victory holds in her hands trophies and a palm branch, while the inscription, encloses a field in which appears the monogram of Christ. A bronze coin of Constantine bears a representation of the emperor holding in his right hand the labarum with the sacred monogram, while he is crowned by a Victory, and HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS is the inscription.¹ This syncretism is very strikingly exhibited on some coins of Constantius. In Fig. 6 the bust of the emperor is on the obverse, and on the reverse his full length figure is seen on the ship of state, holding in one hand the standard on which is the $\chi\rho$, while upon the other hand perches the phenix, the symbol of rejuvenation of the government under Constantine and his sons.

VICTORIA CONSTANTINI AUG.,

Fig. 6.—Coin of Constantius—showing the mingling of heathen and Christian emblems.

This is further illustrated by the usual inscription FEL. TEMP. REPARATIO, and by a Victory who is guiding the state to its glorious destination.

A century and a quarter later we find on a coin of Majorian the imperial ensign crowned with the cross (Fig. 7); this is held by the emperor in one hand, while on the other perches the figure of Victory. He is here represented as treading the dragon under foot, a not unusual manner of indicating the triumph of the government over foes, and over the discordant elements of society. On the obverse is the bust of the emperor, and the shield is inscribed with the $\chi\rho$. On coins of the Græco-Roman empire the figure of Victory appears associated with Christian symbols from the time of Constantine to that of Heraclius I. The same commingling of pagan and Christian elements likewise appears on the coins of the Arian barbarian kings, on those of the Frankish, the West Gothic, and Longobard princes, and continued thus associated with Christian emblems until the ninth century.

Fig. 7.—A coin of Majorian, fifth century.

We might antecedently expect that mythological subjects of an amatory character would find little favor with the early Christians. The positive teachings of their religion, the perils often attending its profession, and the general disrepute in which its early adher-ents were held, gave a seriousness to life little favorable to the cultivation of the more delicate sentiments. Moreover, Venus and Amor stood as the personifications of a passion whose canker was eating out the moral life of the Roman world. With that vice which was the peculiar besetment of the converts from paganism, and against which Paul speaks so strongly in his Corinthian letters, the Christian Church could make no compromise. The suggestions made by figures of Venus and Cupid were peculiarly repugnant. Hence early Christian poetry furnishes scarcely an example of a nuptial song, nor until a comparatively late date do the monuments contain any reference to the erotic deities. They were but sparingly introduced, and in most instances the genuineness of the monuments upon which these figures appear has been gravely questioned.

¹ Piper: Op. cit., i, s. 177.

Scarcely less aversion was felt to Bacchic scenes. The higher significance of the Bacchic myth is occasionally recognized on sarcophagi of unquestioned Christian origin, but the paucity of these monuments plainly indicates the opinion of the Church respecting their influence.

Somewhat different, however, was the feeling with regard to the myth of Amor and Psyche. In this was veiled a deep spiritual import. The fundamental thoughts were the wanderings of the soul in this life as in a vale of death, its trial and purification, and the reunion of the spiritualized wanderer with eternal love in the life to come. The association of this heathen fable with scriptural scenes on burial monuments of acknowledged Christian origin¹ (Fig. 8) indicates a likeness of opinion of paganism and of Christianity with respect to the significance of probation and the rewards of a future state. This is suggested in Fig. 9, which is from the fragment of a sarcophagus, in relief sculpture, found in the cemetery of San Calisto, and now preserved in the Lateran Museum at Rome. Amor and Psyche are here in immediate association with the Good Shepherd. There can be little doubt but that the deeper significance of this myth is here intended; possibly there is the further suggestion that the sojourner here can be successful in his attempt at purification and restoration to the bosom of Eternal Love only by the merit and the protection of the Good Shepherd, who, when he hath found the straying one, layeth it upon his shoulders and bringeth it back to the fold.

Fig. 8.—Amor and Psyche. From Santa Domitilla.

¹ This scene has been variously interpreted by the archæologists. Some claim that it is merely decorative, depicting a pleasing garden or autumn scene.

Fig. 9.—Amor and Psyche with the Good Shepherd, San Calisto, Rome.

In the severe criticisms to which the heathen systems were subjected by the early Christian fathers, comparisons are frequently instituted between the pagan teachings and the sacred Scriptures relative to the agencies that may be employed in the administration of the government of the world. Both pagans and Christians alike believed in a realm of supernatural intelligences by which human affairs are influenced. In the heathen system the inferior gods and genii held a place somewhat similar to that of the angelic hierarchy in the Christian scheme. As in classical mythology to each human being was assigned a particular genius, representative partly of the ideal man and partly of the peculiar gifts and powers of the individual, so in the writings of the Christian fathers the doctrine of guardian angels was developed and taught. These points of contact in the two systems may furnish one reason for the commingling on Christian monuments of heathen genii with Scripture characters and scenes. The earlier view of the fathers that the heathen genii were evil spirits, messengers of temptation to the human soul, was afterward modified, and the peculiar offence given by the representation of genii was so far diminished that from the fourth to the sixth centuries many examples of these, nude or draped, are seen upon the Christian burial angels.

Guardian

Genii.

monuments (v. Fig. 10). Just how far these figures of genii were for purposes of mere ornament, or may have had a religious or dogmatic significance, has divided the opinions of the ablest archæologists.¹ To draw the line between the genii monuments which plainly represent heathen ideas and those whereon the figures express the Christian belief in angels is not an easy task.

Besides that of Orpheus, to which reference has already been made, other heathen myths were widely appropriated by the Christian fathers in the exposition of the Scriptures, and in the illustration of doctrine. Among these the phenix played an important role. The later version of this fable was most commonly used by the Christian apologist, and its representation is met with on Christian monuments. Artemidorus says that when it is about to die the phenix comes from unknown parts to Egypt, and builds a funeral pile of frankincense and myrrh. From its ashes comes a worm, from which arises another phenix that then leaves Egypt to return to its unknown home. Thus in this fabled creature the two ideas of immortality and perpetual rejuvenation were united. On the coins and other monuments of the empire since the time of Hadrian this figure is the symbol of the returning golden age,² of the apotheosis and immortality of the same period. Vintage scenes, genii of the seasons, Cupids nude or draped, Hercules with lion's skin (No. 5), genii holding the inverted torch (the pagan symbol of death) etc., appear especially on those sarcophagi that are believed to belong to the third century. See also Matz und v. Duhn: Antike Bildwerke in Rom, and Garrucci: Storia dell' Art cristiana.

Fig. 10.—Genii in a vintage scene. A winged genius holding back the veil. From a Christian sarcophagus.

¹ v. Fig. 6.

² Grousset: Etude sur l'Histoire des Sarcophages chrétiens, Paris, 1885, 8vo, has given a catalogue and description of one hundred and ninety-five Christian sarcophagi found in Rome outside of the collection in the Lateran Museum. On many of these is noticed the commingling of Christian and pagan motives. Indeed, in many instances the Christian character of the sarcophagus is determined solely by its inscription, while the art and the decorations are in no way to be distinguished from the heathen sarcophagi of the rulers, and of the eternal duration of the Roman government. The fable had also found its way into Jewish literature. Occasionally the Christian fathers thereby illustrated the story of the creation, but usually it was quoted in defence of the peculiarly Christian doctrine of the resurrection. In the first century Clement of Rome uses this argument. It is also found in the Apostolic Constitutions, in Cyril of Jerusalem, and in Epiphanius. The Latin fathers were equally ready to use this fable. Tertullian argued from the lesser value of the phenix to the greater value of mankind; that if the former thus rises from its own ashes to a new and youthful vigor it cannot be unreasonable to expect that God will care for those whom he created in his own image. In like manner argued Ambrose, Augustine, and Rufinus. Ambrose quoted the rising of the phenix as analagous to the supernatural begetting of Christ without father, and Rufinus referred to the renewing of the phenix and its producing itself from itself as a sufficient answer to the heathen who ridiculed the story of the birth of Christ from a virgin.¹

A symbol of the resurrection.

The artistic representation of this fable is sometimes met on the coins of Christian emperors and on other Christian monuments. It is associated with the palm-tree or the palm branch on sarcophagi plainly of Christian origin, in mural paintings, and in Church mosaics (Fig. 42) of later origin. In nearly all these examples the same ruling thought is recognised; namely, the resurrection from the dead and life beyond the grave.²

These few examples, chosen from a wide cycle, illustrate the intimate connection of heathen and Christian thought, and the corresponding influence upon Christian art as seen in surviving monuments.

¹ Ambrose: Psa. cxviii. serm. 19, c. 11. Rufinus: Comment. in Symb. Apost., c. 11, quoted by Piper: Myth. d. christ. Kunst, Bd. i, s. 455.

² Münter: Sinnbilder, etc., Heft. i, ss. 94-97.

CHAPTER III.

SYMBOLISM OF CHRISTIAN ART.

§ 1. General Principles.

A SYMBOL is the outward sign of a concept or idea. It is the visible, sensuous veil of that which is unseen and spiritual.¹ It is Definition. used not for its own sake, but to bring to mind something not sensuously present as though it were present.

Originally it was more specially limited to the cycle of religious thought, and served for the illustration of divine-human relations.²

All sensuous things to which a higher meaning, aside from the natural significance, is attributed, are symbols.³ All religions are measurably symbolic in character. The expression of spiritual truths and abstract notions by analogous phenomena in the physical world has been common to all peoples and religions. To communicate these conceptions to others, and fix them by the laws of association, it is necessary to give to them formal expression. Hence the successful teaching of the doctrines of a religion must in some sense involve symbolism.⁴

This was the favorite method employed by Christ to initiate the disciples into the deeper mysteries of his kingdom.⁵

Used by Christ and his apostles. The writings of the apostles and of the early Christian fathers abound in symbolic expressions which were designed to arrest the attention of those whom they addressed, and more powerfully to impress the lessons which they would teach.

Also practised in art. What was thus practised in language became likewise common in art representation. To guard the heathen converts on the one hand against idolatry, and on the other against

¹ Bähr: Symbolik des mosaischen Cultus, Bd. i, s. 15.

² Creuzer: Symbolik u. Mythologie, Bd. i, ss. 32-42.

³ Dürsch: Der symbolische Character der christlichen Religion u. Kunst, s. 8.

⁴ Hence the use of the word symbol to express the formulated belief of a religious party.

⁵ "His example was helpful in giving direction to the thought of the believers of the early centuries. To a great degree symbolism was found in the mysteries of all ancient religions. It also supplied a secret password whereby communication became more free than otherwise were possible. The intellectual mysticism of that age also greatly contributed to the same end." Roller: Les Catacombes de Rome, vol. i, p. 38.

the pernicious effects of the Docetic heresy, early Christian art betook itself to symbolism, by whose aid the deeper truths and mysteries of the religion could be more effectually impressed upon the masses of the people. Thus in art as well as in language the symbol was the means of revealing the higher spiritual reality.¹ Herein Christian art resembled the later Roman, which seldom represented objects literally, but employed visible forms to express abstract notions.²

Since art symbols address the beholder in a language peculiar to themselves, the relation between the idea and its symbol must not be merely fortuitous or arbitrary, but must be such that the one suggests the other; and while the connection may not be independently discoverable by all, it will be immediately recognised when explained. The outward form must be developed from the inner spirit, whose expression and symbol it is.³

Likewise the interpretation of art symbolism requires good judgment and caution, lest unworthy and misleading conclusions be accepted, and the symbolism of early Christian art thus become a wild maze of contradiction and absurdity. Its interpretation should not be arbitrary or whimsical, nor should it become a stage for the display of baseless fancies. Symbols appeal to the sober reason rather than to the æsthetic feeling or to the imagination. Hence all the aids of history and of literature, as well as of art, must be brought to their correct interpretation. A single historical reference, contemporary with the symbol to be explained, is often of greater value than all the ingenious speculations of learned critics. Familiarity with the cycle of the thought of an age and with its tendencies and spirit is needful for correctly interpreting its art symbolism. The work is greatly aided when a considerable number of references to the symbol can be found in the contemporary literature. It is, therefore, a canon of interpretation that the literary references be carefully considered. By comparing the works of Christian symbolism with each other, with those of the contemporary Canons of In- heathen art, and both of these with the holy Scriptures, terpretation. the writings of the Christian fathers, and with the related inscriptions and literature of the times, most satisfactory results will be reached. Hence a second canon of interpretation is that the sense must be accepted which best accords with these results of comparative study.¹

¹ "Light becomes the symbol of intellectual clearness; the murky and beclouded atmosphere, of a troubled spirit; water, of bodily purification and spiritual regeneration; the circle, or the serpent holding its tail in its mouth, of eternal duration; the tree, as it puts forth its verdure, decays, and blooms again, of the changing seasons; the engendering bull and ram, of generative and creative power; the cow or the matron with many breasts, of the all-nourishing power of nature; the butterfly, bursting forth from the entombed chrysalis, of the resurrection." v. Carrière: Die Kunst in Zusammenhang mit der Culturgeschichte, Bd. i, ss. 70-72.

² Kugler: Geschichte der Malerei.

³ Jacob: Die Kunst in Dienste der Kirche, ss. 16, 17. v. Heinrich Otto: Kunst-archäologie des deutschen Mittelalters, 4te Aufl., 1868, s. i, etc. "Art is the appropriate representation of an idea in sensuous form. To completely represent Christian ideas under sensuous forms is absolutely unattainable: hence the symbolic character of all Christian art and the necessity of faith as a condition of its true understanding and interpretation."

Happily, in many instances the coincidences are so numerous and important that the interpretation is clearly manifest; in others it may be doubtful; while in still others opinions of the significance of the symbol may be absolutely contradictory. For the interests of both art and religion, in these latter cases it is wise to suspend judgment until further discoveries, rather than to press doubtful monuments and interpretations into the service of any preconceived theory.

Christian archæologists may be divided into schools according to their opinions of the originality of early Christian art, and of the design of the various works which are found in the Christian catacombs and elsewhere.

One school holds that the art works of the catacombs were prepared under the direction of ecclesiastics for the purpose of inculcating a definite system of Christian doctrine. They are, therefore, to be regarded as strictly of a symbolic character, whose significance was understood by the initiated of the Christian Church, but was veiled from profane eyes. According to this theory the clergy were the real artists, while they who executed the works were mere artisans who had no part in their origination. Even where the presence of purely decorative elements is undeniable, and these have plainly been derived from classic art, little inquiry is made respecting the probable influence of the heathen cycle of thought upon the Christian, but the symbolic and dogmatic character of these monuments is strenuously maintained. This class of writers is entirely consistent; for if the purely symbolic character of the remains is conceded, their dogmatic purpose must follow, since it is hardly conceivable that the Christian artificers could have had the ability or the purpose to work out a consistent cycle of Christian symbolism. If, therefore, it is maintained that the origin of these works must be found in a desire to teach the doctrines of the Church to the initiated—that they were a sort of biblia pauperum—then must their symbolic character be conceded.¹

¹ Kraus: Roma Sotterranea, ss. 200, 201.

The position of a second school is well defined by Hasenclever: “The art work found on and in Christian burial monuments is essentially decorative, not symbolic. But whatever of a symbolic character is connected with them first originated from an association of figures which were already widely known and used with Christian ideas. These figures created the symbolism, but the purpose to use a symbolism did not originate the figures.”² It is as unhistorical to sunder the connection of the symbolism of the early Christian burial monuments from that of the contemporary heathen monuments as to sunder the whole cycle of Christian art, the entire Christian civilization, and even the very origin of Christianity itself from its connection with the intellectual, æsthetic, and moral development of the non-Christian world.³ This principle, eminently just in itself, has, however, insensibly blinded the eyes of its defenders to certain historical facts, or, at least, has led them to underrate their value. There has resulted a general denial of the originality of Christian art works, and a depreciation of the biblical cycle of events as the source of much of the early Christian symbolism. This school has erred by its lacks, as has the former by its excesses.

As in most other controverted questions, sound criticism suggests the happy via media. The more moderate school recognises the influence of contemporary heathen thought, and yet does not disregard the powerful influence of the biblical history, nor deny to the early Church a measure of symbolic art origination.⁴

¹ To this school belong de Rossi and most of those who have made his Roma Sotterranea the source and foundation of their investigations. While a most admirable scientific spirit has characterized the great master, de Rossi, others have pushed their theory to the wildest extremes, and have endeavored to use this symbolism not only for apologetic, but even partisan, purposes. This is conspicuous in the works of Garrucci, especially in his last and greatest work, Storia dell' arte cristiana, Prato, 1873, et seq. 6 vols. See also Martigny: Dictionnaire des Antiquités chrétiennes, 2d ed, Paris, 1877.

² Der altchristliche Gräberschmuck, Braunschweig, 1886, s. 260.

³ To this school belong Raoul-Rochette, Parker, and others.

⁴ In this class of writers may be placed Piper, who has done so much to emphasize the influence of the classical mythology upon early Christian art, yet has given the Church due credit for symbolic origination. Also Victor Schultze, who has assailed the extreme claims of the first school, yet may not have been consistent in all his interpretations, belongs to this more moderate school. Roller has aimed at the same results, but is sometimes lacking in unity, and seems at times confused.

§ 2. Christ.

No authentic portrait of Christ has been preserved to our time. Whether such ever existed is a matter of serious question.¹ The circumstances of his earthly ministry were entirely unfavorable to his portraiture. Neither the social rank of his family, the character of his first disciples, the reception which his doctrine met, nor the spirit of the religion which he founded, would warrant the presumption that any authentic likeness of Christ could ever have been produced. Indeed, all literal representation of its Founder seems to have been avoided by the Church of the first three centuries. His person, life, and office were concealed under symbols which were especially valued by those whom persecution and a common interest united by still firmer ties of friendship, and whose significance was understood only by the initiated.

Among the earliest and most frequently recurring symbols is the lamb. It is found on mosaics, is associated with inscriptions on burial monuments, and is chiseled on sarcophagi, or painted on walls of the catacombs. Both the character and work of Christ are shadowed forth under this form. The mention of it is so frequent, both in Scripture and in the writings of the early Christian fathers, that there can be no doubt as to its reference and significance. Such passages as Isa. liii, 7; John i, 29; 1 Pet. i, 19; Rev. v, 6, 8, 12; Rev. xiii, 8, and many others are decisive. Moreover, the representation of the lamb in connection with the cross, with the A Ω, or with the monogram of Christ, , further confirms these references. It is found upon sarcophagi of marble, and in the mosaics which adorn the triumphal arches and apses of the ancient churches. Sometimes the lamb stands upon the summit of a hill from which issue four streams, at whose base a number of sheep are found.² This seems to have reference to Psa. ii, 6, and to Ezek. xliii, 12, where the king is in his holy hill, and where "upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy," or to Rev. vii, 17, where the "Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of water." The streams are usually interpreted as either the four rivers which flow from paradise, or as the four evangelists, and the sheep as the members of Christ's Church. This symbol, with a variety of accompaniments, continued in the Church until its further use was forbidden by the Trullan Council at Constantinople, A. D. 692. The prohibition seems to have been occasioned by Prohibited in the East. the mystical, extravagant, and misleading role which it then played. The Western Church, however, did not accept the decision, and the lamb continued to be used in ecclesiastical art until the reign of Charlemagne, and in connection with Continued use in the West. the crucifix (as in the Agnus Dei) long remained an object of reverence in the Latin Church.

¹ The traditions of the painting of portraits of the Saviour by St. Luke are of late origin, and wholly lack foundation. Evagrius of the sixth century, the last continuator of Eusebius's history, is the first who mentions the portrait of Christ which the Saviour is said to have sent to Abgar, prince of Edessa. While the tradition is much older than the sixth century, it is entirely untrustworthy. The legend of St. Veronica is of still later origin. Also the statue of Christ, which was set up at Cæsarea Philippi, was described by Eusebius from a mere local tradition. Of no greater value is the description of Christ's personal appearance attributed to Lentulus, a reputed contemporary of Pontius Pilate, in his letter to the Roman Senate.

² v. Fig. 42. In the lower zone of this mosaic this scene is depicted.

Of frequent recurrence on Christian monuments, and of even deeper symbolic and dogmatic significance, is the fish. The fish. It is among the earliest art forms, and pertains to the period of church history which causes it to be among the most interesting and important objects in the whole range of Christian symbolism. It can be studied on monuments that bear the simple word ἰχθῦς, and on those which have its pictorial representation. The interpretation of the symbol is determined by its age, its associations, and the testimony of the early fathers. De Rossi has divided the Christian inscriptions at Rome prior to the seventh century into two general classes, namely: 1. The subterranean, Two classes of Christian inscriptions. which are the oldest. 2. Those which are found in church burial places above the surface, especially in and near basilicas. The latter class belongs for the most part to the post-Constantine period. At the time of Constantine the catacombs were generally used for Christian burial. Between the years A. D. 338 and A. D. 364 two thirds of all interments were still Interment in the catacombs at Rome. made in them. From A. D. 364 to A. D. 369 the numbers buried in the catacombs and elsewhere were about equal. On account of the restoration of the catacombs by the zeal of Pope Damasus, from A. D. 370 to A. D. 371 burial therein again became almost universal. From A. D. 373 to A. D. 400 The ichthus monuments pre-Constantine. only about one third were there buried; while with the year A. D. 410 these places of interment ceased to be used. Of the monuments found at Rome, which bear this symbol, very few (probably none at all) belong to the second class, and, therefore, cannot be regarded as of a later origin than the beginning of the fifth century. The symbolical Ichthus is associated with none of the hundreds of inscriptions found upon the extra-catacombal monuments in and near the basilicas of Rome.¹

From the great difference in the number² of monuments bearing an exact date before and after the time of Constantine, from the form of the letters, and from the character of the associated inscriptions and paintings, de Rossi concludes that most of the Ichthus monuments belong to a time either before or during the reign of this emperor. The figure is met on monuments of the fifth and sixth centuries, but it had then lost the dogmatic significance which was attached to it during the third and fourth centuries, and is used rather for ornamental than symbolical purposes. From a variety of considerations it is believed that its peculiar and general use fell in the period when the persecuted Church was compelled to express its faith under forms and symbols which were unmeaning to their enemies, yet were well understood by the initiated who were participants in the holy sacraments.

But what truth is conveyed under this strange symbol? The discovery by de Rossi, in 1865, of a new part of the cemetery of Santa Domitilla at Rome was further confirmatory of the opinion before held by many archæologists. Through a vestibule of severest classic style the visitor passes along a broad entrance, somewhat inclined, from which small chambers and side passages extend to the right and left. The ceilings contain paintings which, from their simplicity and naturalness, point to an origin prior to the time of Roman art decadence. De Rossi has not hesitated to place the frescos of this part of the cemetery in the time of Domitilla, that is, at the close of the first century, or, at latest, in the first part of the second. On the walls of this portion of the catacomb are found the mutilated remains of a fresco, represented by Fig. 11, to which careful attention should be directed. We notice two persons sitting upon a couch; before them is a table of the ordinary Roman type, upon which lie three loaves of bread and a fish.

A person, apparently a servant, is standing near by. The representation plainly suggests to every one a meal. It corresponds quite closely with similar scenes depicted on the graves of heathen families. But the fish is not of frequent occurrence on non-Christian burial monuments. In such cases it is the symbol of extreme luxury which came to be associated only with royalty or the favored few. The conclusion reached is that the two sitting figures represent two persons who were buried in this catacomb, and that before us is a scene from their every-day life. The fish on the burial monuments of the Christians cannot comport with the idea of luxury; hence, we must interpret it in accordance with the opinion which the Christian fathers had long entertained, namely, that this must be the symbol of Christ. Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτὴρ is the confession of faith whose initial letters form this word which is so frequently met, and whose pictorial representation is seen in the case before us. The meal here celebrated must be regarded as having a eucharistic significance; the table of the householder becomes the table of the Lord, and the proper priestly character of each private Christian is here asserted. Herein is fulfilled the prophecy (Isa. lxi, 6) of the old dispensation, as it was witnessed and affirmed by the apostles of the new¹ (1 Pet. ii, 5, 9). The growth of the literature suggests a like ¹ Only by carefully distinguishing the God of the priesthood from the God of prophecy, in ancient Judaism; and by clearly discriminating between Christianity as it was founded by Jesus and is contained in the New Testament, from the Church of the times of Tertullian and Cyprian, can the full force of this argument be felt. In the new kingdom of heaven sacerdotalism was absolutely ignored by Jesus and by his apostles. It is as little recognised by the apostolic fathers, Justin Martyr, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Till the beginning of the third century Christianity corresponded both in idea and spirit to the Judaism of prophecy—the entire sanctified people constituting a holy priesthood unto God. After the beginning of the third century the idea and form of sacerdotal Judaism which afterward characterized the Latin Church were revived.

¹ The seeming exceptions to this statement appear to have belonged originally to the catacombs, and to have been removed to churches for purposes of ornament or on account of their peculiar sanctity.

² Of the pre-Constantine period only about thirty dated inscriptions from Rome have been preserved, while of the post-Constantine prior to the seventh century more than thirteen hundred survive. But none of the inscriptions after the fourth century bear the symbol of the fish.

Fig. 11.—Supposed eucharistic scene. Fresco from the oldest part of Santa Domitilla, Rome.

Judaism and Christianity compared in historical development.

result. Prior to the fourth century this explanation of the symbol is infrequent, and then is mentioned in very obscure terms; but toward the end of the fourth and at the beginning of the fifth century many undoubted references to it are met in the writings of the Christian fathers.¹ These remove all doubt of the interpretation and dogmatic significance of the symbol. The 'ΙΧΘΥΣ is plainly Christ. No other explanation is suggested by these writers. It is met in the eighth book of the Sibylline oracles (ver. 217-250). The unknown author of this remarkable acrostic has by some been assigned to the end of the second century or to the beginning of the third.² It has been conjectured that he derived the sentiment of the prophecy, as well as the suggestion of its acrostic form, from the creed then accepted, and from the initial letters of this 'ΙΧΘΥΣ which was in common use by the persecuted Church.³ This article of faith, so fundamental and yet so much a subject of derision and stumbling on the part of the heathen world, was concealed under a word whose pictorial representation afterward played an important rôle in the symbolism of the Church. Whenever this word or the figure of the fish should be seen, whether rudely scratched in the fresh mortar upon the stones that closed the graves in the catacombs, or more elaborately chiseled in figure in connection with other symbols and inscriptions (v. Fig. 12),⁴ or engraved upon gems in signet rings, or for purposes of ornament, in all alike was recognised this precious doctrine of their faith:

Conclusion. I, 'Ιησοῦς, Jesus; X, Χριστός, Christ; Θ, Θεοῦ, of God; Υ, Ὑιός, Son; Σωτήρ, Saviour—JESUS CHRIST, SON OF GOD SAVIOUR.

Fig. 12.—The fish associated with other Christian symbols. From an early Christian sarcophagus.

¹ Becker: Die Darstellung Jesu Christi unter dem Bilde des Fisches. Breslau, 1866. Pitra: Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. iii, under the article 'Ιχθυς, where very full references to the Christian fathers are given.

² This collection of writings evidently contains an admixture of Jewish, pagan, and Christian thought. The subjects referred to, as the golden age, the future fortunes of the imperial city, the coming of a Saviour, etc., show a diverse authorship. For literature of the subject v. Schürer: Die neueste Zeitgeschichte, s. 513.

³ Becker: Op. cit., s. 14.

⁴ v. Becker: Op. cit., No. 71, ss. 62-64. While the inscription on the monument points to a heathen origin, Becker and de Rossi have shown that it belongs to the highest Christian antiquity. The association of the fish with other symbols of manifestly Christian character go far to fix its reference and signification.

Other mural paintings from the catacombs at Rome and elsewhere confirm the correctness of this interpretation. Some of them bear unmistakable evidence of the eucharistic character of the feast, in which the fish is the central figure.¹

Among the most instructive is the series of frescos from the Catacomb of San Calisto—that portion called the “Chamber of the Sacraments” (Fig. 13). On the left of the central scene “we see the three-legged table having on it bread and fish, with a woman standing on one side of it in the attitude of prayer; and a man on the other, clad only in the pallium, extending his hands, and especially his right hand, toward the table in such a way as to force upon every Christian intelligence the idea of the act of consecration.”² In the central group are seen seven men sitting at a table with bread and fish, and before them are eight baskets of loaves. To the right is the representation of the sacrifice of Isaac, while on the extreme right and left of the picture are forrores with arm extended, and the pickaxe in usual form resting upon the shoulder. Some have suggested that the figure at the left, with hands extended in prayer, symbolizes the Church, which is represented as the Bride of Christ (Eph. v, 24; Rev. xxi, 2 and 9); but it is better to regard it as one who is giving thanks in the celebration of the eucharist.

Fig. 13.—Fresco from the “Chamber of the Sacraments,” San Calisto. Suggesting the eucharistic meal.

¹ de Rossi: Roma Sotterranea, vol. ii, Tav. xv, No. 2; Tav. xvi, No. 1; Tav. xviii, No. 5. Becker: Darstellung, etc., ss. 101, 103, 110, 116, etc. Northcote and Brownlow: Plates 16 and 17; also vol. ii, pp. 71, sq. Kraus: Roma Sotterranea, Taf. viii. Roller: Catacombes de Rome, vol. i, chap. 19.

² Northcote and Brownlow: Op. cit., vol. ii, p. 86.

Fig. 14 represents a very remarkable fresco from a Christian catacomb discovered in Alexandria, Egypt. It is found directly over the altar in one of the chapels, and has been referred to the first half of the fourth century. The details of this mutilated fresco merit careful study, both on account of its location and the interpretation which accompanies it.¹ In the middle is Christ, whose head is encircled with the nimbus, and whose name is clearly indicated by the letters $\overline{\text{IC}}$, $\overline{\text{XC}}$. Peter, $\overline{\text{ΠΕΤΡΟΣ}}$ is on his right, and Andrew, $\overline{\text{ΑΝΔΡΕΑΣ}}$, on his left, bearing a plate with two fishes. Baskets containing loaves are on the ground on either side. Further toward the right of Christ appear the legends (TA) $\overline{\text{ΠΑΙΔΙΑ}}$, servants, and $\overline{\text{ΜΑΡΙΑ ΜΑΡΙΑ}}$, Holy Mary. The mutilated condition of the fresco in this part gives uncertainty to the interpretation, but it has been suggested that it may represent the first miracle, at the marriage in Cana. At the extreme left of our Lord persons seem to be seated at a meal, while above is the significant legend, $\overline{\text{TAC ΕΥΛΟΓΙΑC ΤΟΥ ΧΥ ΕΘΙ-ΟΝΤΕC}}$ —"Eating the benedictions of Christ."

Fig. 14.—A fresco from a Christian catacomb in Alexandria, representing the eucharistic meal.

In 1 Cor. x, 16, the same word, εὐλογία, is used by Paul in speaking of the communion of the body and blood of Christ. "The cup of blessing (εὐλογία), which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?" Compare also Matt. xvi, 36, where the word used to describe the giving of thanks in the multiplication of loaves, εὐχαριστήσας, is the same as that used in Matt. xxvi, 27, to consecrate the wine of the holy sacrament; while in Matt. xxvi, 26, a derivative from the same word found in the legend of this fresco is used to consecrate the bread. "And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed (εὐλογήσας) it," etc. The word used in Mark vi, 41, to bless the loaves and fishes is found in Mark xiv, 22, to describe the consecration of the bread in the eucharist. From such comparisons of Scripture, and from the teachings of the Christian fathers, especially of St. Cyril of Alexandria, the conclusion seems almost inevitable that in this fresco the eucharistic meal is represented, and that the true ἰχθύς is Christ, upon whom the soul feeds by faith.'

¹ v. Wescher and de Rossi: in Bullett. di Arch. crist. 1865, pp. 57 sq., 73 sq.

That the cross was widely known in pre-Christian times has been most clearly shown by independent investigators.² The cross and It is met in a variety of forms³ on both continents, crucifix. through wide extents of territory and reaching through long periods of time. The interpretations of this symbol have been almost numberless. Indeed, its origin and significance Pre-Christian. are often matters of question. But the Christian cross can have no doubtful import. It was ever the emblem of blessing through suffering and sacrifice, or of a triumphing faith, and the Church has cherished it as among her most precious and suggestive symbols. For this she had the warrant and sanction of the sacred Scriptures. It was the magic form that played an important role in the exegesis of the Christian fathers.⁴ To them this Among the sacred symbol appeared in all nature, in the great Christian circles of the heavens, in the flying bird, in the ship fathers. speeding under full sail, in the arms outstretched in prayer, in the ¹ v. Kraus: Roma Sotterranea, ss. 216, 217. Important confirmatory evidence is supplied by the inscriptions, notably the ichthus inscription of Autun, France. This has occasioned an extended literature. v. Le Blant: Inscript. chrét. de la Gaul. tom. i; for literature v. Pitra's Spicilegium Solesm., vol. i.

² v. Stockbauer, Inman, Zöckler, Haslam, Lipsius, Zestermann, the Edinburgh Review, for 1870, etc. The literature is very extensive.

³ Speaking of a temple in Lorillard City, Central America, M. Désiré Charnay says: "The roof of the edifice is slightly oblique, as in the buildings of Palenque. There is a grand frieze, richly decorated, the ornamentation consisting of large human figures, these accompanied with arabesques or hieroglyphs. The temple had then five portals, with lintels and jambs of sculptured stone. Here we find bas-reliefs of remarkable beauty, and I have made casts of one of them, which exhibits two human figures of the Palenque type, each holding in the hand a regular Latin cross with flowered arms." v. North American Review, No. 308.

⁴ However extravagant and even puerile in the light of modern criticism may appear the exegesis of some of the Christian fathers, it must not be forgotten that their work was inspired by a deep, pervading love of the crucified One, and by a desire to enter into the mysteries of his expiatory sufferings. v. Zöckler: Das Kreuz Christi, s. 134.

branches of trees, and in a multitude of forms in the vegetable and animal world. The demons could not withstand its power, the followers of the crucified One were safe under its protection.¹

In the pre-Constantine period the sign of the cross seems to have been in quite general recognition by private Christians. Tertullian's well-known words clearly show this. "Wherever we go, or what-sign of the ever we attempt, in all coming in or going out, at cross.

putting on our shoes, at the baths, at table, at the time of candle lighting, at bed-time, in sitting down to rest; whatever conversation employs us, we press the forehead with the sign of the cross."² Doubtless there is noticed on the part of the disciples of the crucified One a desire to conceal this symbol, which in the minds of the heathen was associated with every thing humiliating and disgraceful. In the earlier inscriptions and monuments, therefore, it is generally associated with the monogram of Christ. In such cases it symbolized the person of Christ, all that he was in himself, and all that he had done for the world. There is, however, early noticed an attempt to use the cross independently of the  monogram. In such case it often appears under a form well known to other than Christian peoples, namely, the so-called swastika (v. Fig. 15, lower form), many examples of which are found on monuments very widely separated in time and place. While their chronology is somewhat uncertain, it seems that under this somewhat obscure form the Christians of the pre-Constantine period chiefly represented the death and expiatory work of the Saviour.³ But the claim that therefore this doctrine was derived from the Indian religions lacks firm support. Much confusion of thought has obtained, and much misleading assertion has been indulged by writers who would deny to Christianity all originality, and would trace its leading doctrines to the Indian or

Pre-Constantine cross.

Fig. 15.—The swastika, with other Christian symbols.

Magian systems. While an eminently Buddhist symbol, even the swastika seems to have lacked sacredness, and had little suggestion of religious doctrine.⁴ To regard the symbolism of these

¹ Prudentius: Cathemerinæ—Hymnus ante somnum. "Crux pellit omne crimen," etc.

² De corona Militis, iii. "Ad omnen progressum atque promotum," etc.

³ This is a question on which the archaeologists are still divided. Some claim that the opinion that any form of the cross was used by the Christian Church prior to the introduction of the  lacks substantial foundation.

⁴ E. Thomas: Ancient Indian Weights, p. 58. "Pānini described it as a mark of cattle."

religions as the suggestive source of the symbols found on Christian monuments of the West, from the second to the eighth century, is shown to be entirely unwarranted as the Indian paleography and inscriptions are more carefully studied. The Indian inscriptions are found to be of no high antiquity,¹ and are, therefore, of little avail in a question of this nature. Rather the indebtedness of Buddhism to Christianity for the doctrine of a genuine Trinity seems now to be established beyond reasonable question,² while the claims of the priority and great antiquity of the Zoroastrian or Maydyasan tenets, resembling the Christian teachings, have been proved to lack firm foundation.³

The monogram of the name of Christ appears frequently upon early Christian remains. It is found upon burial monuments, ancient lamps, glass vessels, gems, and coins

The monogram
of Christ.

¹ "There is not, however, a South Indian inscription which can be accepted as genuine with a date before the fifth century of the Christian era, though one or two (without dates) exist which may be safely attributed to the fourth century A. D." A. C. Burnell: Elements of South Indian Paleography from the Fourth to the Seventeenth Century A. D., 2d ed., London, 1878, p. 12.

² "We have been entertained occasionally by being told how our Christian religion owes such and such of its leading elements of faith to Buddhist, Brahmanical, or Zoroastrian teachings, but the progress of knowledge now enables us to turn the tables, and to prove that our antagonists were the real borrowers. The Buddhists have been credited with priority over our conception of the Trinity, but the earliest documents of their creed, dating in 250 B. C., or nearly three centuries after Nirvana of Buddha, neither suggest nor foreshadow any such combination; though we can well conceive how easily their missionaries may have caught the infection of the Aryan devotion to threes. . . . The Brahmans, in their turn, as has lately been discovered, appropriated without limit or scruple, but of course without acknowledgment, the ideas and the very expressions contained in the New Testament. . . . Some suspicion might possibly have been thrown upon the originality of our received versions; but the question of derivation has been comprehensively examined and determined in our favor by Dr. F. Lorinser, whose verdict had already been facilitated by the researches of other eminent Orientalists. Burnell: Op. cit., pp. 27, 28. . . . We can no longer doubt, therefore, the possibility of the hypothesis that the composer of the Bhagavad-Gîtâ . . . used Christian ideas and expressions, and transferred sayings of Christ, related in the Gospels, to Krishna."—Indian Antiquary, October, 1873. See also among others, Lorinser: Bhagavad-Gîtâ, Breslau, 1869, Weber: Indische Studien, i, s. 400. Lassen: Indische Alterthumskunde, i, 623; iii, 398. Wheeler: History of India, i, 407. Kuenen: Hibbert Lectures, 1882, pp. 223-236.

³ Among others who have established this statement may be mentioned Westergaard, Breal, and Oppert. The indebtedness of the East to the Greeks for astronomical principles has been shown by Biot: Journal des Savants, April, 1859; and Holtzman: Ueber den Ursprung des indischen Thierkreises.

The earnest comparative studies of the Indian scholars are yielding rich results, and correcting many errors into which some earlier writers have fallen.

(Fig. 16). The form of this monogram is various—sometimes very simple, at other times richly adorned with wreaths, palm branches, and gems (v. Fig. 17). It is not well settled at what time it first appears, but it seems probable that it was used before its adoption by Constantine I. as a sign upon the shields and standards of his army.¹

Fig. 16.—Monogram on coin of Anthemius, A.D. 467.

While the genuineness of some monuments cited in confirmation of this opinion may be questioned, still little doubt can reasonably be entertained respecting its use during the third century. Fig. 18 represents the earliest known

Fig. 17.—Showing various forms of the cross, especially of the monogram of Christ.

Fig. 18.—Monogram of Christ on an arcosolium of San Calisto, Rome.

example in the Catacomb of San Calisto. This monogram has been most noted from the fact that it largely displaced the eagle on the standards of Rome (v. Figs. 6 and 7). Like many other events in the life and reign of Constantine the Great, the cause and circumstances of its adoption are variously explained. Whether through a miraculous appearance of Christ, or a dream, or a vision near sunset, or through some other means,² the fact of the choice of this symbol cannot be doubted, since from this time it plays a most important part on the coins of the empire, and on the monuments of the Church.

¹ v. Ludwig Jeep: Zur Geschichte Constantins des Grossen.

² Among the defenders of the miraculous appearance of Christ to Constantine are the older historians, and Guericke, Döllinger, Alzog, and J. H. Newman, among modern writers. For an optical illusion or natural phenomenon, with which may have been connected a prophetic dream, argue Augusti, Schroeckh, Mosheim, Neander, Gieseler, Niedner, Schaff, Stanley, Heinichen, Koelling, Mozley, and others. Arnold. Thomasius, Lardner, Gibbon, Waddington, and others regard it either as a fable or a pious fraud. This last view seems to be the least consistent with the authorities, with the character of Constantine, and with the events conceded flowing from this circumstance.

It has been universally conceded that these are the initial letters of the name of Christ,¹ and that the monogram is prima facie evidence of the Christian character of the monuments on which it appears. Other meanings must be shown by positive proof. There is no sufficient evidence that the Christians derived this from the crux ansata which was quite common among the Egyptians.

After the wide use of the $\chi\rho$ upon the shields and standards of the army and upon the coins of the empire, the Church attached to it a new and deeper significance. Henceforth the conquering, all-prevailing Name was prominent in their thought. Fig. 19 shows the $\chi\rho$ associated with palm branches and the celebrated motto, IN SIGNO. The transition from the thought of humiliation and suffering to that of authority and power was but natural. The art of the Church reveals this change. The monogram appears surrounded with garlands (Fig. 20), and in places of honor and dominion. Now is noticed the beginning of that opinion respecting the person and office of Christ

Fig. 19.—The Constantinian monogram, with palm branches and the legend, IN SIGNO.

Fig. 20.—The monogram of Christ encircled by a wreath.

which afterward clothed him with the attributes of the severe and awe-inspiring Judge, and later furnished the conditions of the rapid growth of Mariolatry.

The tradition of the finding of the true cross by Helena, the mother of Constantine, rests on even less secure foundation than the vision of the cross by the emperor himself.

The legend of finding the true cross.

While, however, the acceptance of the $\chi\rho$ symbol by the empire was comparatively harmless, and even contributed to exalt the name and office of the Saviour, without danger of idolatry, the traditional discovery of the cross by Helena proved the occasion of most hurtful superstitions which fostered the worship of relics and suggested the religious pilgrimages of the following centuries. The relation of these pilgrimages to the Crusades has often been traced by historians.

¹ The upright χ is the oldest and most frequently recurring form of this monogram.

The Tau or patibulary (sometimes called Egyptian) cross is found in the catacomb of San Calisto, at Rome, probably as early as the third century.¹ In such cases it is not easy to discover the primary reference. By some it is regarded as chiefly representative of the idea prevalent among the Egyptians, namely, the source of life, and of hope of the world to come; to others (Didron, et al.), it seems to connect with events of the Hebrew history, as the sacrifice of Isaac, and the brazen serpent in the wilderness—thus becoming an Old Testament type; while still others insist that it is the deliberately chosen symbol of the person and propitiatory work of Christ.² Sometimes this form of the cross is met in the mosaics, richly jeweled, having the firmament, thickly strewn with stars, for a background, as in Fig. 21, which is from SS. Nazario e Celso, Ravenna.

Fig. 21. — A jeweled cross from Ravenna.

Alone, as well as frequently associated with the monogram of Christ and other Christian symbols, the $\Lambda \Omega$ symbol appears in Italy from about the middle of the fourth century, and in Gaul, in connection with dated inscriptions, from A. D. 377 to A. D. 547.³ This manifestly refers to Rev. i, 8, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is and which was and which is to come, the Almighty." By comparing Isa. xlv, 6, with Rev. i, 17, 28, also xxii, 13, it appears that these letters refer to One who, being of like essence with God, stands at the beginning as at the end of all being, who rules all development, who is the centre and goal of human history, and who is Lord of the Church. While Jesus Christ is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever" (Heb. xiii, 8), he also becomes the significant force in the beginning of the creation, and in the final consummation of the divine purposes.

The monuments upon which these letters appear are quite numerous; from their associations they aid in the interpretation of symbols that were otherwise obscure. Connected with the monogram en-

¹ v. de Rossi: Bullett. Arch. crist., 1863.

² The cross and the fish are found on early Christian monuments in Scotland. From its peculiar associations, the latter is believed to have been an object of worship. v. Forbes Leslie: The Early Races of Scotland and their Monuments. Edinburgh 2 vols., 1876.

³ At Rome from A. D. 355 or 360 to 509; in Gaul from A. D. 377 to 547. De Rossi: Inscr. christ. Rom., Nos. 127, 143, 491. Boeckh: Inscr. Cor. Græc., Nos. 412, 55. Le Blant: Manuel d'Épigr. chrét., p. 29.

closed in a circle (Fig. 22), the A Ω suggests the eternity of the person thus symbolized. When associated with the ρ within the equilateral triangle (Fig. 23), it awakens in some the thought of the Trinity. When found on burial monuments with the Constantinian monogram, the doves, and the olive branches (Fig. 24), the victory and present fruition of the departed through Him who is the beginning and the end, the resurrection and the life, are significantly suggested.¹

Fig. 22.—The A Ω with monogram in circle.

Fig. 23.—Monogram and A Ω in triangle.

The Church was not slow to adopt the beautiful symbol of the vine. This was so manifestly sanctioned by the words of Christ himself

The vine.

(1 John xv, 18) that the most iconoclastic spirit could take no offence at its use. The lessons which it conveyed were so vital and precious that its place among the wall decorations of the oldest catacombs at Rome seems eminently fitting. To distinguish the symbolic from the merely decorative use is not always easy; yet that the early Christians regarded the vigorous vine, whose branches were laden with luscious fruit, as symbolic of the Saviour and of the disciples who abide in him cannot once be doubted.²

Fig. 24.—A Ω with doves and monogram. From a burial monument.

Nor should too much stress be laid upon the fact that very similar scenes are depicted upon heathen monuments, where the manifest reference is to Bacchus and his worship. This similarity of representation cannot safely be regarded as proof that a like truth was designed to be thus symbolized; much less can the derivation of the Christian symbol from the pagan mythology be hence inferred. So common was it among ancient peoples to represent life, joy, and abundance under the symbol of the vine and its products that each may reasonably be regarded as an independent origination, and its teaching distinctive.¹

This symbol need not have been borrowed.

¹ A class of archæologists denies all symbolical character to the circle, the triangle, the doves, and the olive branches in this class of monuments, and regards them as simply decorative. While this view seems at times the most natural and just, in some instances it is difficult to harmonize it with all the attendant conditions.

² For illustrations, see Figures 1, 2, which are chiefly decorative, yet whose association with numerous religious subjects might also suggest a symbolic character.

The beautiful symbol of the Good Shepherd is among the earliest The Good Shepherd. and most frequent of the entire Christian cycle. Like the vine, it had the sanction of Christ himself (John x, 11, 19), and was, therefore, the source of little apprehension to the Christian fathers in their efforts to guard the early Church against the idolatrous tendencies of much of the heathen plastic art.

The opinion held by some archæologists, that Christianity had no creative art power, but borrowed every thing from the heathen world,² would regard this symbol as immediately suggested by like representations on pagan monuments. That the ram-bearing Mercury³ has some general resemblance to the Good Shepherd of the Christian cycle has often been remarked. Also a satyr bearing a goat or sheep upon his shoulders suggests a similar office work. The frescos of Herculaneum, and some burial monuments, clearly of heathen origin, in which the seasons are depicted, contain like representations. Nor need this be regarded as at all surprising when Heathen counterpart. it is remembered what a prominent place the sheep and the shepherd held in the thought of ancient peoples. To each the shepherd's care for the flock would be the most readily suggested symbol of tenderest solicitude and secure protection. The Hebrew Scriptures abound in references to the shepherd and his flock (Psa. xxiii; Isa. xl; Jer. xxiii; Ezek. xxxiv, et al.). To a pastoral people, acquainted with the dangers incident to this mode Common to ancient peoples. of life, the thought of the shepherd, to guide and defend, must have been among the most natural and precious. While, therefore, it is true that very similar representations of the relation of the shepherd to the sheep are common to both ¹ Some writers on comparative religion and comparative mythology would erroneously teach that because of great similarity in the beliefs or myths of two different peoples, therefore the one must be a derivation from the other, or both must root in some more ancient belief; whereas, each may be entirely independent of the other, and may be indicative of a like stage of spiritual or religious development. "I hardly suppose that the most ardent hunters after histories which tell of the loves of the sun and the dawn would maintain that it was from the observation of the sun and the dawn that mankind first gained its idea of two lovers." Keary: Outlines of Primitive Belief, Preface, x.

² Very emphatically, Raoul-Rochette: Discours sur les types imitatifs qui constituent l'art du Christianisme. Paris, 1834. Tableau des Calacombes. Paris, 1837. Trois Mémoires sur les antiquités chrétiennes. Paris, 1839.

³ The epithet, Kriophorus, was applied to Hermes from his driving away a pestilence from the town of Tanagra, in Bœotia, by carrying a ram on his shoulders round the walls. He is to be regarded, therefore, as the guardian against pestilence rather than as the god of herds. v. C. J. Hemans: in Academy, 1872, p. 147.

heathen and Christian monuments, it would be illogical to infer that the heathen symbol was the original, and the Christian the imitation. It is manifest that the Christian Church used the art forms which were at hand; nevertheless it would be misleading thence to conclude that the motive or spirit of the Christian monuments was like to or derived from the prevalent heathen thought or mythology. At times the teaching is directly contradictory of Christian thought. The student needs only to be cautioned against the hasty inference that all monumental representations of the relation of the shepherd to the sheep are necessarily of Christian origin and character. The sound principle here to be observed is that something more than the simple form is necessary; that some additional marks or confirmatory circumstances must aid in the classification. Fortunately such evidence is frequently at hand. The Good Shepherd monuments often bear other distinctive Christian symbols, as the fish, the , the Λ Ω , or these combined (v. Fig. 12), while in other cases the figure and the associated inscription are mutually helpful in the interpretation. In any case, to the early Church this figure of the Good Shepherd suggested all those beautiful and consolatory offices which Christ's own words so clearly taught (John x, 11-19). Hence it is not a figure of the Good Shepherd alone which is met, but this is sometimes accompanied with the badges of his office, the staff, the shepherd's pipe, etc. (v. Fig. 37). While it is easy to become bewildered by a wild and extravagant interpretation of these various accessories, the teaching of the central figure is manifest to every looker-on.¹

Other symbols of Christ and his work are occasionally met on the monuments, as Orpheus, noticed elsewhere; the lion, which was usually understood as a symbol of power and might; and the fisher, who takes into the net of his kingdom the fishes that are purified in the waters of baptism.

§ 2. The disciples and the Church.

The followers of Christ, whose representations have here been traced, delighted to use a like symbolism to express their own relations to Him, "the way, the truth, and the life," as well as their associations with each other in the fellowship of love and faith. The dove is among the most frequent ¹ In Étude sur l'histoire des sarcophages chrétiens (Paris, 1885), Grousset gives more than forty examples of the Good Shepherd found on the one hundred and ninety-five sarcophagi in Rome outside of the Lateran Museum, which he describes.

Christian symbols; it is of especial significance when found upon burial monuments. It usually expresses the innocence and purity of the persons thus commemorated. "Harmless as doves" may have been in the mind of those who laid away the faithful with the sweet expectation that their Lord would very soon awaken them from their temporary slumber to enter upon the fruitions of his own kingdom. Here, too, caution is necessary to distinguish between symbolism and simple decoration. Doubtless some of the figures of the dove, and certainly those of other birds, are used upon Christian monuments as mere aids to ornamentation, and as subjects to complete the artistic balancing of a picture (see Fig. 29). When the dove bears in the beak a palm or olive branch, it may justly be regarded as a symbol of overcoming victory, and expectation of eternal life (Fig. 24). Examples of this are numerous, and it is generally agreed that they are of deep doctrinal significance. At Rome, they do not appear before the last half of the third century, and disappear, for the most part, after the first quarter of the sixth. In Gaul this symbol, as most others, does not appear until nearly a century later, and continues a century longer than in Rome.¹

The fish, which we have shown to be of deepest import when applied to Christ, is also used to represent his disciples.
The fish. Probably, as suggested by Tertullian,² the water and rite of baptism were prominently in their thought, while secondary reference may have been had to the parable of the net, or to the command of Christ to Peter and Andrew—"Follow me and I will make you fishers of men" (Matt. iv, 18, 19).

Corresponding to the symbol of the Good Shepherd is that of the sheep or lambs, representing Christ's disciples. It is
The sheep and lambs. sometimes found on the mural paintings of the catacombs, and quite frequently on Christian sarcophagi and in mosaics. They are sometimes cared for by the Good Shepherd, who leads them into green pastures, sometimes they are grouped around him in the attitude of earnest attention to hear the Master's teaching. In the mosaics the twelve apostles sometimes appear under the symbol of sheep, who stand six on either side of the Saviour to "hear his voice" (Fig. 42). Occasionally the hart, drinking of the living waters, takes the place of the sheep in the symbolic representation of the disciples, probably with reference to Psa. xlii, 1.

¹ De Rossi: Inscript. christ. Rom., t. i, Nos. 10, 923, 991. Le Blant: Inscript. chrét. de la Gaule, Nos. 7, 561.

² de bapt., c. 1.

On several monuments the Church is found symbolized by a ship under full sail. On the sail sometimes appears a second symbol, as the dove, which seems to teach that in the perilous voyage of life the ship of the Church, under the care of its heavenly Pilot, affords the only secure refuge. Also in several instances a rude box represents the ark of Noah, from which the dove goes forth on the waste of waters, or is returning bearing the olive branch in its beak. This was a favorite symbol, to which the Christian fathers refer to teach in most impressive way the saving power of the Church.¹

The ship.

§ 8. Other symbols.

Of the many other symbols we have space to refer to but few. The anchor is often found upon coins and gems, sometimes associated with the , at other times in connection with the fish, the Good Shepherd, etc. (Fig. 12). Its primary reference is probably to Heb. vi, 19, 20; sometimes the meaning is very obscure.

The anchor.

The palm tree and the palm branch are also of frequent occurrence on the burial monuments, on lamps, on glasses, on gems, and in the mosaics. These were also common to pagan monuments, and were not unfamiliar to the Jews. In the use of this symbol upon the burial monuments of Christians the primary reference seems to be to Rev. vii, 9, and plainly indicates that the deceased has triumphed over death and the grave through faith in Him who declared himself "the Resurrection and the Life" (John xi, 2).

The palm tree and the palm branch.

Of like import is the crown, which is of less frequent occurrence. The lyre is usually the symbol of praise or of abundant rejoicing. The peacock sometimes symbolizes immortality, in like manner as does the phenix the resurrection and the life eternal. The serpent is also met on Christian monuments. It may be connected with representations of our first parents as a tempter to sin; or with the brazen serpent in the wilderness; or occasionally it seems to be used as a symbol of wise spiritual discernment. The latter is especially true of some gems of the Gnostic sects. We shall examine in another connection the cycle of Old Testament scenes, events from the history of Moses, Jonah, Daniel, the three Hebrew worthies, etc., which were regarded as types or prophecies of events under the new dispensation.

The crown, lyre, peacock, phenix, and serpent.

¹ Tertullian: de baptismo, cc. 8, 12. Cyprian: Epistolæ, Nos. 69, 74. Justin Martyr: Dialogus cum Tryphone, c. 138.

Occasionally are met what have been generally regarded as caricatures of the Christian religion. Their fewness, and the lack of aid to their proper interpretation in the contemporary literature, cause uncertainty with respect to their significance. Nevertheless, the very paucity of the monuments which illustrate the feeling of the pagan world toward the new religion enhances their value; their study has, therefore, engaged the attention of some of the ablest archæologists.

One of the most interesting of these is the graffito discovered in 1856 amid the ruins of the palace of the Cæsars, on the southwest slope of the Palatine Hill.¹ It was one of many graffiti scratched upon the walls of a number of rooms that had been excavated in this part of the Palatine. Becker's conclusion is that this one originated in the second quarter of the second century, through the playfulness of some pagan scholar in the imperial Pedagogium. Fig. 25 shows the rudeness of the drawing and the barbarousness of the Greek inscription. The usual deciphering of the characters is ΑΛΕΞΑΜΕΝΟC CEBETE (σέβεται) ΘΕΟΝ, and the translation has been suggested, "Alexamenus worships (his) God." Careful comparative study has made it probable that this was scratched on the wall of a school-room by a heathen pupil to caricature the god to whom his fellow Christian pupil was offering worship. In opposition to Becker, Garrucci attributes this work to the early part of the third century, for the reason (among others) that just at this time the Christians were charged with worshipping the head of an ass, as shown by the answer of Tertullian. In his *Apologeticus*² the recognition of the charge is clear and explicit, and his answer not less so. His attempt to account for this misunderstanding, from the heathen mind confounding the Jewish with the Christian religion, argues the prevalence of the calumny, and may account for the existence of the caricatures. On the other hand, however, it is very noteworthy that amidst all the strange syncretism prevalent in Rome during the first three Christian centuries no account is left of the worship of a god with the head of an ass, least of all of one who was crucified. Yet here is almost the oldest surviving representation of the most sacred and significant event in the life of Christ, the crucifixion, under an offensive caricature; thus showing that the description of the prophet was most appropriate : " he hath no form nor comeliness, and when we shall see him there is no beauty that we should desire him " (Isa. liii, 2).

¹ For discussions of the chronology, location, and significance of this graffiti, v. Garrucci: Il Crocifisso graffito in casa dei Cesari Roma, 1857. Becker: Das Spott-Crucifix der römischen Kaiserpaläste. Breslau, 1866. Kraus: Das Spott-Crucifix vom Palatin und ein neuendektes Graffito. Freiburg, 1872.

² l. i, c, xvi.

Fig. 25.—Caricature of Christ. A pagan graffito probably of the second century. Palace of the Caesars, Rome.

Another example of the same style of caricature is seen in Fig. 26. This is the representation on an antique gem which was first published in the seventeenth century. An almost exact description of it is found in Tertullian's writings.¹ It is a figure clad in the Roman toga, in an erect position, but with the head of an ass. The fore leg is extended as in the attitude of teaching, while before it are two figures, one standing the other sitting, in the posture of attentive listeners.² Tertullian declares that under this represensation was found the inscription—"Deus Christianorum ONO-KOIHTHΣ." Many translations of this have been suggested, but some of the best lexicographers have preferred "an ass of a priest." A like mention of this charge against the Christians is met in Minucius Felix.¹ "The heathen attribute to them (the Christians) the folly of regarding the head of an ass a sacred thing." While resenting such folly and wickedness, in common with Tertullian, he makes the charge of like folly against the heathen, who have incorporated into their cultus things equally puerile and monstrous.

¹ Apologeticus, c. xvi; ad nationes, l. i, c. xiv, and l. ii, c. xi.

² The genuineness of this gem has been questioned.

Fig. 26. From an antique gem. Supposed to be a caricature of the teaching Christ.

The copy of a coin apparently from the time of Alexander the Great (Fig. 27) contains another enigma which has not been satisfactorily solved. The head of Alexander on one side, and an ass with its foal on the other, are the strange figures here met. But the inscription, DN IHY XPS DEI FILIYS, is still more curious, and has divided the archæologists with respect to its reference and signification.²

Fig. 27.—Coin of Alexander the Great, an ass and its foal.

This worship of the figure of an ass is obscure in its origin, and the cause of this misconception of the heathen of the third century, respecting the nature of the Christian religion, is not well understood. Nevertheless occasional references to this animal and its worship are met from time to time in the writings of the Christian fathers.

¹ Octavius, cc. ix and xxviii.

² Northcote and Brownlow: Roma Sotterranea, vol. ii, pp. 351, 352. These authors suggest the translation, "Our Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God." May not this be another of the many examples of the syncretism of pagan and Christian thought?

CHAPTER IV.

EARLY CHRISTIAN PAINTINGS AND MOSAICS.

THE earliest Christian paintings which have been preserved to our day were found in the Roman catacombs. Their chronology is still unsettled. While de Rossi (v. p. 29) finds sufficient reason to refer some of them to the first, Earliest paintings in the catacombs or early part of the second century, Parker, Momm-sen, and others (v. p. 30, note) believe that they are of later origin. The evidences of an early origin become more convincing as the comparative studies are more thorough and extensive. It seems well established, however, that these paintings were chiefly decorative. Their use in secular relations Oldest paintings decorative. could awaken little prejudice in the minds of the Christian teachers. These earliest catacombal paintings were evidently designed to add to the cheerfulness of the subterranean rooms whose walls they adorn, and which were often the places of assembly for the Christians in times of persecution.

On careful comparison of these with the contemporary frescos of heathen origin, a like artistic spirit is seen to be similarity of Christian to heathen painting. common to both. The ceilings in Santa Domitilla at Rome, and in the vestibule to the first catacomb of San Gennaro dei Poveri in Naples, are divided into harmoniously balanced parts, while some of the decorations can only with greatest care be distinguished from the heathen mural pictures of the same age (v. Fig. 28).¹ In each is manifested a like love of nature in representations of the seasons, scenes from reaping and from the vintage, dolphins, birds, flowers, etc. (v. Figs. 1, 2). The earliest Christian frescos are, however, generally wanting in architectural perspective, as this is seen in the Pompeian decorations, and are usually less artistic in technical execution.²

Probably the artisans in the catacombs were generally unskilled, nor did they attempt to execute these paintings with perfection of detail. The frescos were manifestly painted rapidly in broad, full line, since in dimly lighted subterranean rooms minute details could be of but slender utility. This may suggest a reason for the difference in the artistic character of the frescos of Christian and pagan origin, since the latter were used to adorn rooms where light was abundant, and where the festive character of many of the subjects demanded more careful handling. Pains-taking study of models seems to have been seldom practiced, since it is hardly possible to suppose that in the early part of the second century the Church had a school of professionally trained artists. Nevertheless, the narrowness of the cycle of artistic subjects and their frequent repetition might secure readiness of execution and a fair degree of ease and vigor of treatment.

¹ v. Schultze: Die Katukomben. etc., s. 12, and plate iv.

² Reber: Hist. of Medieval Art. New York, 1887. pp. 73, 74.

The introduction of symbolism was of somewhat later date. Their more distinctively Christian character then first appears. The merely decorative and pleasing then assumes a deeper significance, the paintings become a means of religious teaching, and the mind is directed toward certain important doctrines. The figures, the dress, and the adornments do not widely differ from the prevailing pagan style. Notwithstanding this close alliance of Christian painting with the current heathen art, Christianity had, nevertheless, an entirely unique cycle of subject and thought.

The cycle of Christian art peculiar. The spiritual depth and significance of its portraitures, as distinguished from the mere superficial beauty of the pagan art, justify the claims of Christian painting to a good degree of originality.

The office work of Christ as Good Shepherd is sometimes revealed only by the accompanying flock, or single sheep borne on the shepherd's shoulders, or by the implements of his office, as the crook, the pails of milk, and the shepherd's pipes (Fig. 38). The costume is the ordinary Roman tunic and pallium, and the feet are generally clad in sandals. The same vigor characterizes other figures in the earliest mural paintings of the catacombs. Old Testament scenes, as the sacrifice of Isaac, the smiting of the rock by Moses, the loosing of his sandals in the presence of the burning bush, etc., are treated with considerable force and naturalness.

As before stated, some of the earlier ceiling frescos reveal a purpose of artistic balancing and harmony. It must not, however, be inferred from this that a corresponding balancing of the subjects of the pictorial teaching was intended. This would be an abuse of the symbolic principle. For example, in An artistic balancing.

Fig. 28, the antithesis of Moses smiting the rock, and Christ raising Lazarus, cannot be regarded as type and antitype, since this would compel the use of too fanciful and far-fetched analogies. The same is true of Daniel in the den of lions, and David with the sling. Nor can we suppose that the artistically balanced pastoral scenes were designed to teach dogmatic or practical truths, well-understood by the initiated but unknown to others. This, too, were to carry the symbolic principle to an unwarranted extreme.

Fig. 28.—Fresco ceiling from Santa Domitilla, Rome. Orpheus in center.

While there is a general similarity of technical treatment to that of the contemporary heathen art, and the originality of the Christian handling, coming from juster and more ^{Naturalness of} ^{Christian art.} inspiring views of nature, has been questioned,¹ these frescos,

¹ Woltmann and Woermann: History of Painting, translated by Colvin, 1880, vol. i, pp. 163, 164. Contra v. Schnaase: Geschichte d. bild. Künste, 2d Auf., iii, ss. 102, sq. "Christianity first unlocked the sense for nature by teaching us to understand a creation groaning with us and by showing the connection of nature with ourselves and our own life." Uhlhorn: Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, Rev. ed., pp. 66-69.

nevertheless, become invaluable indexes of the belief and life of the infant Church. They prove that the æsthetic feeling, common to all men, is struggling for expression amidst the adverse influences of the times, and that the new religion, so far from being hostile to art, is seeking to purify and inspire it by its own richer spiritual truths. They show that the early Christians were animated by a religion of cheerfulness and hopefulness. The objects in these mural decorations directly or symbolically represent persons, offices, or beliefs that are soul-sustaining. Nearly the whole Old Testament cycle—the history of Noah; Abraham offering Isaac, and God's interference to save by a substituted victim; the smiting of the rock by Moses; the preservation of the Hebrew children in the fiery furnace; Daniel in the den of lions; the history of Jonah—all these are of a character to support and inspire the faith of the early believers.¹

In the pictorial representations of Christ, two² general types are met. The first is that of a beardless young man of considerable force and freshness, quite closely resembling the sculptures on heathen sarcophagi of the same date. This type is usually connected with the cycle of Christ's miraculous works, as the opening of the eyes of the blind, the healing of the paralytic, the raising of Lazarus (Fig. 29), etc. A like buoyancy of spirit is met in the paintings of Christ as the Good Shepherd. We have elsewhere (v. p. 61) noticed the relations of this figure to the rambearing Mercury of the heathen mythology. This type is usually without a beard, as in Fig. 29, in the multiplication of the loaves, and the raising of Lazarus in the encircling lunettes.

Fig. 29.—Christ raising Lazarus. Fresco.

The second type, though somewhat more severe, is still youthful, but bearded and with long flowing hair. It is rarely, if ever, found in the mural paintings of the catacombs, but appears later upon the gilded glasses.

In both these types the influence of heathen thought is manifest, since the quite prevalent opinion respecting the Saviour, which was held by some of the Christian fathers, as derived from Isa. lii, 23, is here dominated by the heathen idea that the gods must be conceived

¹ v. Fig. 30, in which most of these scenes, together with the healing of the paralytic, the multiplication of the loaves, and the resurrection of Lazarus, are grouped about the Good Shepherd.

² A third, found in the mosaics of the post-Constantine period, is elsewhere noticed.

of as endowed with vigor and beauty. The Greek believed that only the ethically good could be in the image of the gods ; contrariwise, that the highest physical perfection was requisite in the sensuous representation of the divine. To his apprehension virtue and beauty, vice and ugliness, were in indissoluble union. The beautiful was the good, and deformity was felt to be a consequence of evil. It was therefore necessary that the most worthy embodiment of the divine should be in perfect and beautiful forms. Unlike the gods of the Indians and the Egyptians, with which much of the grotesque and ugly was often connected, the gods of the Greeks, being conceived as free from moral imperfections, were represented by images of true nobility and beauty, and free from every trace of sorrow and weakness.¹

Fig. 30.—Fresco from the ceiling of a chamber in San Calisto, Rome.

But this type of Christ underwent a remarkable transformation. Fig. 31 is the representation of a fresco bust discovered by Bosio in the catacomb of San Ponziano, at Rome. This is a wide departure from the type found in the earlier frescos. The form of the cross, the richly jeweled

The later frescos depart from the earlier types.

¹ v. Alt: Die Heiligenbilder, etc., pp. 4-7.

corona, the more grave and mature cast of countenance, the peculiar curve of the eyebrows, are positive proofs of a new era of art. A somewhat similar art type is seen in Fig. 32, which is from one of the catacombs of Naples. It is of the sixth century. The long, pointed beard, the elongated features, the countenance bearing an appearance of haggardness and of sorrow, are in directest contrast with the air of youthful vigor and cheerfulness that characterizes the frescos and bass-reliefs which represent the biblical cycle of Christ's works. The corona, the open book, and the hand raised in the manner of teaching, show that the conception of Christ has shifted from that of the benevolent wonder-worker to that of the severe, authoritative, and majestic teacher and ruler.

Fig. 31.—Bust of Christ from San Ponziano. Probably from ninth century.

The crypt of Santa Cecilia is among the most interesting in the immense cemetery of San Calisto. It is connected with the martyrdom of one of the most revered female saints of the early Church, and is rich in epigraphical and pictorial objects which aid in the understanding of some portions of her curious history. The pictures now preserved in this crypt are manifestly of a much later date than the original ornamentation, since there are unmistakable evidences that mosaics and slabs of porphyry have in some instances been removed.

FIG. 32.—Bust of Christ from a cemetery of Naples. Probably of the sixth century.

In one of the burial niches is found a bust of Christ, represented by Fig. 33, which has been referred to the seventh century. The Greek nimbus, the hand in the position of blessing or of teaching, and the book held in the left hand, are symbols of authority. The whole expression and execution of the fresco suggest a distinctively Byzantine influence, and indicate that the art of the Church has fallen under the direction of ecclesiastics.

tics, and has lost the freedom and grace of the pictures produced under the influence of the classic spirit.

The tendency to increased decoration, and to clothing the person of Christ with the insignia of authority, in contrast with the simplicity of the earlier frescos, is further seen in the accompanying representation of a mural painting found in the small suburban cemetery of Santa Genesio, near Rome (Fig. 34). It is believed to belong to the seventh or eighth century. Christ is here associated with saints, whose names are inscribed on the walls in the style of the later Byzantine pictures. He is clad in the customary tunic and pallium, whose drapery lacks grace and flexibility; his right hand is extended in the fashion of the teacher, or, as some discover in it, in the act of benediction after the Greek manner; in the left is held the book, highly ornamented with jewels. The entire picture indicates a later origin, and a wide departure from the youthful vigor and naïve simplicity of the earlier figures of Christ. The jeweled crowns, and the excessive ornamentation in the case of the female figure, are further evidences of art decadence.

FIG. 33.—From the crypt Santa Cecilia, cemetery of San Callisto. Probably of seventh century.

While the fact is unquestioned, the reason of the transition from the youthful type of Christ, as it is met in the earlier frescos and sculpture, to the more severe and majestic type of the later representations is not manifest. A change so marked and general could not result from fortuitous or transient causes. Had the earlier type of Christ tallied with the conceptions of the later Church it would have continued.

It is not improbable that the Arian controversy left its impress upon the art representations of the Saviour in the fourth and following centuries. It is well known that interest in the nature and person of Christ was not limited to the theologians, but the question of his divinity was debated by all classes of the Roman world. The adoption of the Nicene and Constantinopolitan creeds must necessarily have greatly exalted the conception of the dignity and power of Christ. This personage, "the one Lord Jesus Christ, . . . Light of Light, very God of very God, . . . by whom all things were made, . . . who cometh to judge the quick and the dead," must find a representation in art which should correspond with this sublime conception. Evidently the earlier simpler forms of the Good Shepherd and of the benevolent Wonder-worker failed to express the thought which the creed had embodied. To develop a type which might more fully accord with the prevailing belief was but natural and necessary. Moreover, a triumphing Church demanded that the elaborate mosaics which now adorned the apses and triumphal arches of the basilicas should impress upon the worshippers the truth of the accepted symbols. The dogmatic interest must have influenced the art development, and may have occasioned the introduction of the new type which is the representation of the mighty, the exalted, and superhuman Christ. This type became common in the imposing mosaics, in some of the frescos, and on some of the more prominent portions of the sarcophagi, while the earlier type was continued in the cycle of biblical history and in symbolic representations. While the artistic execution in the latter is inferior it more fully embodied the prevailing belief.

Fig. 34.—Fresco from the Cemetery Santa Genesio, near Rome. Christ with saints.

The representations of persons with uplifted hands as in the act of prayer, technically called Orantes, are quite frequent in the early Christian art of the Roman catacombs. While their reference is not always clear, by association with other objects their import is sometimes suggested. Probably they indicate the devout character of the departed on or near whose tomb they are found. Possibly in exceptional cases reference may be had to the Virgin Mary. Examples are also found sculptured on sarcophagi.

Representations of the Virgin are quite frequent.¹ But an isolated picture or a veritable portrait of Mary is not met in the pre-Constantine frescos of the catacombs, in the oldest mosaics of Santa Maria Maggiore, nor anywhere in the earliest Christian sculpture. Generally she is associated with the child Jesus, who sits upon her lap or is held in her arms. The Virgin is never, like her divine Son, represented symbolically.²

The Virgin with the star (Fig. 35) is probably the oldest fresco

Fig. 35.—Virgin and star from Santa Priscilla, Rome.

¹ De Rossi mentions more than twenty.

² Eckl: Die Madonna als Gegenstand christlicher Kunstmalerei und Sculptur, 1883, p. 3. On a few gilt glasses of a later origin she appears alone, and a single example of a marble found in Gaul, much defaced and of unknown date, bearing the inscription MARIA VIRGO MINISTER DE TEMPLO GEROSOLA, has sometimes been referred to as showing her consecration to the temple service during her infancy. This opinion finds very slender monumental support—probably none earlier than the seventh century.

of this subject. It is found in the cemetery of Santa Priscilla, and is claimed by de Rossi to belong to the first century¹ or early part of the second. The most natural suggestion of the scene is that of the holy family. Joseph points to the star, which is the key to the subject of the fresco, and thus confines it to the cycle of biblical history. The more labored interpretation of de Rossi, that the male figure refers to one of the prophets of the old covenant (probably to Isaiah), who points forward to the Star of Bethlehem which was to indicate where the Virgin mother and the infant Jesus were to be found, seems unnecessary, and adds little to the value of the testimony of such paintings. In either interpretation the fresco would have a purely biblical character, and represent an historical event wholly void of the dogmatic significance which has been attributed to it by some Catholic commentators.

The Virgin and child from Santa Domitilla (Fig. 36), has been referred to the second half of the third century. There is evidence that it was originally a part of a representation of the "adoration of the magi," since faint traces of four of these magi are here seen, as in the fresco from SS. Pietro e Marcellino outlines of two only appear. The whole scene is simply biblical. It has a severity of artistic treatment suggesting a very early origin. The fresco in the cemetery of Santa Agnese (Fig. 37), on the Via Nomentana, belongs to the fourth or fifth century. It represents the Virgin Mary and the child Jesus.

Fig. 36.—Virgin and child, from Santa Domitilla, Rome.

The Virgin extends the hands in the attitude of prayer, in harmony with the class of figures called Orantes. Neither the Virgin nor child is encircled with the nimbus, but the sacred monogram clearly indicates¹ the subjects. This seems to be the first attempt to produce any thing like a portrait of Mary. The growing taste for ornamentation is noticed in the jeweled necklace;

¹ We give this and a few other photographs to convey to the uninitiated some idea of the real condition of these frescoes. From the elaborate engravings and chromolithographs of Peret and others, entirely unjust opinions of the artistic excellence of these remains might be formed. Frequently much must be supplied both in outline and color to complete the fresco. Our plate is after a photograph by Roller.

Fig. 37.—Virgin and child, from Santa Agnese, Rome.

the wide departure of the details of the figure from the noble simplicity of the earlier frescos points to a later origin, and plainly suggests a possible Byzantine influence.²

From the close of the fourth century the artists who portray the Virgin and the child depart from the simple biblical story. The frescos, and especially the elaborate mosaics,³ seem to be "little less than embodied creeds, reflecting from century to century the prevailing tone of opinion on the part of those of highest authority in the Church."⁴ The simplicity of faith and the supporting trust and hope which characterized the Christians in the age of obscurity and persecution yielded to the pomp and splendor of a triumphing and protected Church.⁵

¹ The circumstance that the P of the monogram points in both instances toward the figures is manifestly of no dogmatic importance. The claims of some Catholic writers, based on this seemingly accidental circumstance, must be regarded as unscientific.

² From the absence of the corona in case of both mother and child, and from the general style, de Rossi has been led to place this in the time of Constantine.

³ These are described later in this chapter.

⁴ Mariott: The Testimony of the Catacombs, etc., p. 34.

⁵ "It was the truth of the Incarnation which they (the early Christians) embodied in their pictures of the Virgin mother and her holy Child. "Christ crucified," they recalled, even in the emblematic letters inscribed beside him; Christ the Good Physician of body and soul, in their oft-repeated pictures of the healing of the sick, or the giving of sight to the blind; Christ the Bread from Heaven, in the miracle of the loaves; Christ the Prince of life, in the raising of Lazarus from the grave; Christ, the Star risen out of Jacob, and the Desire of all nations, in the star-led magi, laying their offering at his feet in Bethlehem; Christ, above all, in that form which to Christian hearts is the tenderest and most loving embodiment of their Lord, the Good Shepherd, bearing back upon his shoulders the lamb, that, but for him, had been lost." Mariott: Op. cit., p. 30.

Fig. 38, a fresco of the Good Shepherd from the seventh century, shows a like decadence. The peculiar shepherd's pipes, the cruz gamma, A like transition in other subjects. upon the tunic, the inscription "Pastor" above the head, are new elements which find no place in the simpler and nobler figures of the "Good Shepherd" from the earlier period of Christian painting.

So also in Fig. 39, which is a representation of Saint Cecilia, found in the crypt of Santa Ce-cia in the catacomb of San Calisto. It gives evidence of having been painted over an earlier mosaic, some traces of which still remain. From the peculiar ornamentation, the richness of dress, etc., it seems justifiable to refer it to the seventh century, or to the very close of the period of which we propose to treat. It shares the general inferiority of the works of this century, and plainly reveals the subjection of art to the influence and authority of the Church.

Fig. 38.—A Good Shepherd, from the cemetery of Santa Genesio.

Fig. 39.—Fresco of Saint Cecilia, from the crypt of Santa Cecilia, Rome.

The simple vintage scenes undergo like transitions of style. Figs. 1 and 2 (v. pp. 57, 58) show the ease and grace of the treatment of these subjects as found in the early frescos of the catacombs. Nothing could be more completely natural than the arrangement of the vine in Fig. 1, while the action of the genii in Fig. 2 is most free and charming. When compared with Fig. 40 the change in treatment is manifest. "Nobody can fail to notice how widely they depart from the truth and beauty of nature, and with what arbitrary violence the branches are twisted into regular form, so as rapidly to degenerate into a mere decorative pattern."¹ Later still a further hardening of the lines and an artificial restraint are noticed, till in the mosaic decorations in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia (Fig. 41), at Ravenna, "Græco-Roman art has reached the Byzantine stage of high conventionality, still retaining great beauty."²

Fig. 40.—Vine ornament from San Callisto, Rome. Fourth century.

¹ Northcote and Brownlow: Roma Sotteranea, vol. ii, p. 151. To these authors we are indebted for permission to use these and other plates.

² Tyrwhitt: Christian Art Symbolism, pp. 66, 67, and The Art-Teaching of the Primitive Church, p. 117, quoted by Northcote and Brownlow. It is difficult to see

From the fourth and fifth centuries a considerable number of ornamented gilt glasses which possess much artistic and dogmatic interest have been preserved. A few probably belong to the third and sixth centuries. They can hardly be regarded as paintings, but are rather drawings made by a

Paintings on gilt glasses, or Pondi d'Oro.

Fig. 41.—Mosaic vine ornament from dome of the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, Ravenna, A. D. 440.

sharp pointed instrument upon gold foil which was placed upon glass; this plate was then covered by another, and the whole fused together. These have been fully described by Garrucci and others.¹ Their cycle is not essentially different from that of the catacomb frescos, except that the representation of saints is somewhat more frequent, and the dogmatic element seems to be more prominent. On these the Virgin is found associated with Christ, with the apostles, Paul and Peter, and in a few instances of late date she is the solitary figure.² The frequent pictorial association of Peter and Paul is instructive in the examination of the art testimony to the dogma of the primacy of Peter (v. Plate I).

Primacy of Peter.

how these mosaics can with any propriety be described as "rich acanthus scroll-work." v. Venables: "Mosaics," in Dict. of Chris. Antiquities, p. 1330.

¹ v. especially Vetri ornati di figure in oro travati nei cimiteri de' cristiani primitivi di Roma, 4to, Roma, 1864, and his extensive work, Storia dell' arte cristiana, etc., 6 vols., 4to. Prato, 1873, seq. Also, de Rossi: Roma Sotterranea, 3 vols., 4to. Roma, 1864, 1867, 1877. Roller: Les Catacombes de Rome, 2 vols, 4to. Paris, 1882.

² It has been questioned whether this name may not apply to some saintly person named Mary, rather than to the mother of Jesus; since the earlier Christian monuments seem not to introduce the Virgin in her individual and independent character, but the infant Jesus was the raison d'être for the representation of the mother.

With the exception of a very few of late origin there is in these gilded glasses no intimation of any preëminence of Peter over Paul. In some instances, where these apostles are associated with Christ on the same glass, Paul has the place of honor; in others, Peter is at the right hand of Christ; thus showing that the primacy of either would not once be suggested by the pictorial representations. Both wear the corona, as in Fig. 3; both are represented in like dress as youthful and beardless, as in Fig. 4; both are receiving a common crown, as in Fig. 5; both are seated upon like Roman chairs, and bear equally the rolls as a symbol of apostolic authority, as in Fig. 7; both alike are being crowned from above, as in Figs. 8, 9, 10. In these art representations there is no intimation of a superiority or primacy of any sort whatever. This is more noteworthy from the fact that these glasses belong to a period when the primacy of Peter had already been asserted. Their teaching, however, entirely accords with the general tradition of the joint agency of Peter and Paul in founding the Church of Rome. In Fig. 1 there is manifestly an attempt at portraiture. The bronzes, Figs. 1 and 2, have given rise to much discussion relative to their age and character. Many archæologists believe that in Fig. 1 are found the traditional characteristics of these chief apostles. Peter has a firmer, rounder head, thick curled hair, and a short matted beard; Paul has more elongated features, thinner hair inclining to baldness, a longer yet more scanty beard. Amid the contrariety of opinions it is impossible to pronounce absolutely upon the age of bronze Fig. 1, or the person represented in Fig. 2. The artistic excellence of the work would suggest an early origin.¹

It is quite remarkable that in the cemeteries and churches of Italy, and in the art monuments of the first four centuries The cycle of subjects uniform. in other lands, the cycle of the subjects of painting, of sculpture, and of the glyptic arts is nearly uniform. The same symbols from the animal and vegetable kingdoms, the same biblical events, the same historical characters, are everywhere repeated. Some archæologists have accounted for this uniformity on the supposition that the Church had given its sanction to these as a means of expressing and perpetuating a common faith, and of teaching doctrines which were regarded as fundamental, thus guarding against the attempts of heretical teachers to divide the Church.

Outside the catacombs the number of surviving paintings of the first six centuries is very limited. From documentary evidence ¹ While these bronzes properly belong to the department of plastic art or sculpture, it seems more convenient to refer to them here in connection with the gilded glasses containing like subjects.

PLATE I.—Gilded glasses and bronze busts, representing Peter and Paul.

1

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

2

3

4

we are justified in believing that the art influence of the Roman-Christian world extended far and wide in the countries of western and northern Europe which had been Paintings still in existence.

Christianized through the zealous labours of missionaries. We infer that painting was extensively used in the decoration of imposing churches in Gaul, along the banks of the Rhine, and in Spain. The style and subjects of such paintings were probably similar to those of Christian Rome, somewhat modified by influences peculiar to the barbarian peoples. Ireland, which was converted in the first half of the fifth century, and had developed its ecclesiastical life almost independently of Roman influence, was not wanting in attempts to ornament the churches with appropriate mural paintings. Of these none of an earlier date than the seventh century have survived.

A few illuminated manuscripts have been preserved to our time. The art of illumination common to the classic peoples was practised by the Christians from the fourth century, and Miniatures and illuminations. reached its highest perfection in the Middle Ages. Such manuscripts were sometimes dedicated to persons of high official station, or were given by the wealthy to religious houses. This was probably one reason of their rich ornamentation. The purpose of the illumination was partly artistic and partly didactic. The beautiful illuminations of portions of the Scriptures, of Psalters, and of prayer-books which have come to us from the mediæval period suggest a similar practice of the Church from the fourth to the seventh century.

A fine example of illumination of Greek origin, believed to date from about the close of the fifth century, is preserved in the Imperial Library at Vienna. This work Book of Genesis. comprises biblical characters and allegorical figures which are helpful in the interpretation of the text. "It contains twenty-four leaves illuminated on both sides, in most cases with pictures arranged in two rows on purple vellum. The execution is slight, almost superficial, but yet shows certainty of touch. We still find here a close observation of the life of men and animals; the figures show considerable power of bodily expression and movement; they are of sturdy build, for slenderness of proportion is not, as often supposed, the sign of Byzantine as distinguished from Western art, but rather of a later period as opposed to an earlier."¹

The religious books are generally more fully and carefully illustrated than the ancient treatises on science, or even the fragments of classic literature. The pictures are not of persons only, nor are they confined to the representation of historical events or places, but delineations of mental qualities, virtues and vices, protective powers, etc., are not infrequent. The borders of these manuscripts are often rich with ornamentation in which the harmony of proportions and colour is carefully studied.

¹ Woltmann and Woermann: History of Painting, vol. i, p. 190. Labarte: Histoire des Arts industriels, etc., 2d ed., 1872. Plate 42 gives a colored reproduction of a single scene—the interview of Jacob with his sons.

The few leaves of a Latin Bible preserved in the Royal Library of Berlin belong to the sixth century. On these are found somewhat mutilated representations of the history of Saul. It is to be regretted that they have suffered so much, since their artistic excellence appears to have been exceptional.

A Syrian Gospel-book, of the last quarter of the sixth century, is specially interesting for containing one of the earliest pictorial representations of the crucifixion. We have already seen that the early Christians avoided depicting the painful and more repellent scenes in the life and passion of Christ. Later, however, when the Church had secured complete recognition, and art had declined, these subjects were represented in all their literalness. In the border of this manuscript the crucified Lord appears fastened to a cross by four nails; on either side are the thieves, while below St. John, the Marys, and the soldiers casting lots for Christ's garments are pictured; in another part the resurrection, the Marys at the tomb addressed by the angel, and the Saviour appearing to the women are delineated. As might be expected, this provincial work, the manuscript of which was written in the convent of St. John at Zagba, in Mesopotamia, and the painting executed by Rabula, a monk, is quite inferior in execution to much that is preserved in the great centers of commerce and enlightenment.¹

Most of the illuminations of the sixth century exhibit considerable artistic power, and give evidence of an attempt at art revival after the fearful destruction and decadence of the fifth century.

MOSAICS.

A very interesting class of monuments, illustrating the thought and artistic power of the early Church, are the Christian mosaics.

They can be classified neither with paintings nor with sculpture. They can hardly be ranked among the fine arts at all, since their production seems in some respects to depend more upon the mechanical than upon the artistic faculty. This consideration would lead us to classify the mosaicist among artisans rather than among artists. To what extent the musivist was also the creator of his design cannot now be known. Since, however, mosaic is a branch of pictorial art, or art on a surface including two dimensions, in which color effects are studied, it is ^{Nearest allied to painting.} most nearly allied to painting, and can best be studied as the historic successor of the frescos of the catacombs.

¹ On this illuminated manuscript v. Garrucci: Isbnria, etc., Plates 128-140, and Labarte, Op. cit., vol. i, pp. 164, 165, Plate 44.

With other arts the Christian Church inherited from the heathen world the mosaic also. Some of the most elaborate ^{Borrowed from antiquity.} decorative works of antiquity were in this style. The Scriptures speak of pavements "of red, and blue, and white, and black marble in the palace of Ahasuerus" (Esther i, 6). The frequent mention of mosaics by Pliny, and the preservation of such beautiful examples as the "Bellerophon," the "Doves of the Capitoline Museum," the "Battle of Arbela," and the fountain pieces of Pompeii, show that this art had been carried to great perfection by pre-Christian peoples. The Romans recognised three kinds of mosaics: 1. The opus tessellatum, which consisted of small pieces of stone or bits of marble, arranged in regular geometric forms. This was the most ancient style. 2. The opus vermiculatum, which received its name from the fineness of the pieces of marble of which the work was composed. 3. The opus sectile, which was formed of plates of marbles of different colors, making thereby a decorated veneer.

The genuine Christian mosaic, that is, the use for decorative or didactic purposes of cubes of colored glass on walls ^{Limited use in the catacombs.} or ceilings, instead of in pavements, is but very sparingly found in the catacombs. The few examples which still survive adhere quite closely in general style and subjects to the contemporaneous frescos. The Saviour seated between Peter and Paul, the raising of Lazarus, the healing of the paralytic, Daniel in the lions' den, a couple of medallion busts of a man and wife, the latter with arms outstretched in prayer in the general fashion of the Orantes, comprise nearly all the subjects treated in these mosaics. They are usually of inferior workmanship, and promise little for that wealth of ornamentation afterward met in the Constantinian and post-Constantinian churches.

An incidental benefit of the study of the mosaics from the fourth to the tenth century is the aid thus afforded in determining the age of the paintings in the catacombs themselves.¹ Little doubt can be entertained relative to the progressive ornamentation of subterranean burial places through the zeal and devotion of the popes. Careful study of the Church mosaics between A. D. 350 and A. D. 450 (the latter date marking the destruction attending the terrible irruption of Attila) shows three types: those of Santa Constantia, which are allied to classic art; those in the Chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna, whose Good Shepherd suggests immediately the primitive paintings of the catacombs, belong to the cycle of symbolic art; and the mosaics of Santa Maria Maggiore at Rome, which represent purely historical and biblical events. All belong to the old Roman rather than to the Byzantine school.¹ The latter school seems to have had complete sway from the middle of the fifth to the seventh century, except where the Lombard churches show a partial emancipation from its influence.

¹ de Jouy: Les Mosaïques chrétiennes, etc., Paris, 1857, p. 6.

Their extensive use for decorative and dogmatic purposes, and their great durability, give to mosaics almost a first rank among archæological monuments. With regard to no other objects, however, are greater skill and caution needed to ensure correct results.

Caution against restorations. Such is the nature of the materials, the permanence of the colors, and the ease with which insertions can be made, that experts may be deceived. It is probable that hardly an important mosaic has escaped attempts at restoration. Their evidential value may thus be seriously impaired. Only when there is some assurance that even the restorations are in the spirit of the original can these monuments be regarded as witnesses to the life and thought of their age.

The location of mosaics is various in different churches and in the same church. They are more usually employed Where found. in the vaulted ceilings of the tribune, in the broad spaces on the face of the triumphal arch, on the spandrels of arches in the main nave, and on the entablatures. These positions not only afford the greatest available area, but also place the pictures, decorative or didactic, in the most favorable light for study.

The question of the chronology of these, as of other early Christian monuments, has greatly divided the opinion of Chronology. archæologists. Rome is probably the site of the earliest and best preserved, unless we except the remarkable group in the dome of St. George in Thessalonica (modern Salonica). If this St. George of Thessalonica. Church was dedicated by Constantine during his sojourn in that city in A. D. 323,² then its mosaics excel all other extra-catacomb ones in age, extent, and magnificence. Its dome (v. Fig. 105), two hundred and sixteen feet in circumference, is almost entirely covered with elaborate and imposing designs which have been estimated to contain more than 36,000,000 tesserae, or small cubes of glass. The style of the decoration is somewhat like that on the walls of Pompeii, and immediately reminds the student of some of the early frescos of the catacombs. This circumstance would suggest an early origin.

¹ Tyrwhitt: Art Teaching of the Primitive Church, London, 1882, pp. 148, 149.

² Texier and Pullan: Églises Byzantines, plates xxxi-xxxiv. In this work the origin of the church is discussed at some length. Especial stress is laid upon the fact that the portraits in mosaic are all of those saints who lived before Constantine. Also the character of the symbols on the bricks of the pavement is regarded of great

The grouping of the figures is more easy and natural than in the later Byzantine art. There is manifest attention to perspective, while the variety of character and expression is indicative of artistic power and freedom. The cupola is divided into eight nearly equal compartments. The handling of subjects is generally uniform, though in some particulars there is striking variety. Each segment contains the representation of a building, evidently designed for Christian worship, wonderfully elaborated, decorated, and furnished with the paraphernalia for ritualistic service. In the foreground of each are two majestic figures, clad in the robes of the officiating clergy, with hands extended in the attitude of prayer or benediction. In the fashion of the Byzantine art the names of these are written upon the wall near the figure.¹ They refer to some of the noted men of the Eastern Church whose labors were effective in shaping its history and in formulating its doctrines.

The only rival of St. George in the age of its mosaics is the circular Church, Santa Constanza of Rome. As elsewhere stated (v. Fig. 118), this building was erected by Constantine, and is therefore of the fourth century.² What was the original purpose of its erection, whether for a baptistery to the adjacent basilica of Santa Agnese, or as a burial place for the emperor's daughters, Constantia and Helena, may not be known. The style of some of its mosaics certainly indicates an early origin.

importance. v. pp. 133-135. Unger: Ersch u. Gruber's Encyclopædia, lxxxiv, 407, places these mosaics at a much later period. Woltmann and Woermann: v. History of Painting, vol. i, p. 198, note, share Unger's opinion. Bayet: Recherches pour servir à l'histoire de la Peinture, etc., v. p. 85 and note, inclines to place them between the age of Constantine and that of Justinian, but is in doubt. Kraus also accepts Unger's opinion.

¹ This is generally quoted in proof of a later origin, though not decisive.

² The age of these mosaics has likewise been a subject of controversy. Doubtless one reason of the widely different opinions is the failure to discriminate between the originals and the restorations. That some of the restorations belong to the seventh century is conceded, but that some portions reach back to about the middle of the fourth can hardly be doubted.

The rich decoration upon a white ground, representing the vintage, together with many figures of genii, birds, fruit, etc., liken it very strongly to the heathen art of the period. There is in it very little which is distinctively Christian. The space is divided into twelve sections or compartments, two of which extend into the form of an apse. The subjects seem to be arranged on the general principle of artistic balancing, somewhat after the style of some early frescoed ceilings of the catacombs. The mosaics of the dome have long since disappeared.¹

A like classical spirit is noticed in the slight mosaic remains in two chapels of the Baptistery of San Giovanni in Laterano, at Rome. They belong to the latter part of the fifth century. While the opinion that they were part of the palace of Constantine has been questioned, they nevertheless bear the peculiar character of naturalism which associates them in the same class with Santa Constantia of Rome, and St. George of Thessalonica. But this richness of decoration soon passed away. The later mosaics are executed with a very different feeling. A more sober, didactic purpose seems to control the artists. Dr. Woltmann says: "This decorative style, with its playful symbolism, did not in the long run suit the seriousness of the Christian spirit. When St. Nilus (A. D. 450) was consulted about the decoration of a church he rejected, as childish and unworthy, the intended design of plants, birds, animals, and a number of crosses, and desired the interior to be adorned with pictures from the Old and New Testaments, with the same motive that Gregory II. expressed afterward in the following words: 'Painting is employed in churches for this reason, that those who are ignorant of the Scriptures may at least see on the walls what they are unable to read in the books.' From this time, accordingly, church pictures become no longer purely decorative; they serve for edification, for instruction, for devotion. With this object Christian art makes the great step from mere symbolic suggestion to real representation."²

This statement finds happy illustration in the remarkable mosaic of Santa Pudenziana, on the Esquiline, in Rome. The work also shows the necessity of careful discrimination between originals and restorations. Labarte¹ believes that the apostles and female figures are from the close of the fourth century, but that the Christ, the symbols of the evangelists, and some other portions are of later origin.² Garrucci, Woltmann, and others refer this mosaic to Pope Siricius, who built the church in 390 A. D. It certainly marks a transition from the decorative style to the historic and didactic. In the center is a colossal figure of a bearded and nim-bused Christ, seated in a richly jeweled chair and clad in flowing robes. He extends his right hand in the Description. manner of blessing, while in his left is an open book. On his right and left are arranged the apostles, Peter and Paul being next to the Saviour. On the heads of the latter, female figures of great dignity, supposed to represent the Jewish and the Gentile Churches,³ place wreaths of triumph. Behind the Christ is a richly jeweled cross, standing on a mountain apart by itself. Rising in the distance are architectural structures representing the two sacred cities, Bethlehem and Jerusalem, while above in the clouds float the symbols of the Evangelists. The whole work is of a most serious, yet artistic, character.

¹ E. Müntz: Notes sur les Mosaïques chrétiennes de l'Italie, in the Revue Archeologique, 1875 and 1878, attempts to show that this cupola displays a composition entirely pagan in character. He claims that it represents a triumph of Bacchus, which is indicated by the accompanying satyrs, bacchantes, tigers, etc. Possibly this may furnish a ground for the opinion that this church was originally a temple of Bacchus, as advocated by Ciampini (v. De sacris ædificiis), and by other more recent archaeologists.

² History of Painting, vol. i, p. 167.

The transition from the style of Santa Constantia to that of Santa Pudenziana is most remarkable. That within a half century there should be presented so great a contrast in interior church decoration certainly suggests some exceptional Transition in style, and the cause. cause. The classic character of nearly every part of this mosaic differs much from the art of the age of Constantine and of his immediate successors. Moreover the seriousness of the religious teaching embodied in it is noteworthy. The Christ seems to stand midway between the youthful and, for the most part, impersonal Christ of the catacombs and that severer and more gloomy type which is prominent in the later frescos and mosaics. Probably the art historians are correct in attributing this result mainly to the impulse given to art studies by the legal enactments of the emperors. The demand of the now established religion for churches not only of greater dimensions but also of increased magnificence was in itself a stimulus to art activity. There is also discovered in some of the mosaics of this period a tendency

¹ Arts industriels, vol. ii, pp. 338-342, and 454, plate lvii. v. also Vitet: Études sur l'Histoire de l'Art, Paris, 1864, vol. i, pp. 18-39.

² Crowe and Cavacasse: History of Painting in Italy, London, 1864, vol. i, pp. 12, 13, recognise numerous restorations in these figures.

³ Garrucci: Istoria, etc. Woltmann and Woermann: History of Painting, vol. i, p. 167. Others see in these the representations of the sisters SS. Pudenziana and Praxedes. v. Gerspach: La Mosaïque, p. 140; also Barbet de Jouy: Les Mosaïques chrétiennes, p. 49.

to return to classic models, and to subject the artist to the rules of the ancient school.¹

The mosaics of Santa Sabina at Rome belong to the fifth century.

Santa Sabina. They consist of two female figures, one marked "Ecclesia ex circumcisione," or the church of the circumcision; the other "Ecclesia ex gentibus," or the church of the Gentiles; also of an inscription of seven verses, which gives the occasion of the origin of the mosaic, and contains a highly eulogistic notice of the artist.² The type of these is entirely Roman.

The few remnants of the mosaics of San Paolo fuori le mura, on St. Paul beyond the Via Ostia, must also be referred to this century. the walls. The destruction of this interesting church by fire, in 1823, removed some of the most valuable Christian monuments of the fifth century which had anywhere survived. The few original mosaics upon the triumphal arch were prepared by the order of Galla Placidia, daughter of Theodosius.³

The completest series of mosaics at Rome, dating from the fifth century, is in Santa Maria Maggiore, called also the Santa Maria Maggiore. Liberian Basilica. Their exceptionally artistic character has frequently been noted by critics. They seem to be entirely isolated from works before and after the period. The suggestion has been made that the artists formed these mosaics after the fashion of the classical bassreliefs, especially those of the columns of Trajan and of the Antonines, while their predecessors had taken the frescos of the baths as their models, and their successors were influenced by Greece or Byzantium.⁴ The arch of the Description. tribune, divided into three zones, is decorated with New Testament scenes. In the first are the Annunciation and the Presentation in the temple; in the second the Adoration of the Magi, and the Dispute of Jesus with the doctors

¹ "Laws were enacted by Constantine (A. D. 334 and 337) to promote the training of architects, and to grant them specific exemptions, as well as to painters, sculptors, and workers in mosaic. In A. D. 375 the emperors Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian promulgated an edict granting important privileges to professors of painting." Woltmann and Woermann: History of Painting, vol. i, p. 169.

² C. J. Hemans claims that of the whole mosaic composition in Santa Sabina only these two figures, representing the Jewish and Christian covenants, are original. v. Academy, 1874, p. 415.

³ Barbet de Jouy: Les Mosaiques chrétiennes, etc., pp. 18, 19. Förster: Unter Italien, p. 276. Gerspach: La Mosaique, pp. 47, 48.

⁴ v. Edmund Venables: Article "Mosaics" in the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, vol. ii, p. 1327. Also Lord Lindsay: History of Christian Art, 2d edition, London, 1885, vol. i, p. 264; Vitet: Études sur l'Histoire de l'Art, Paris, 1864, vol. i, p. 241.

in the temple. In the first division of the third zone are found the Massacre of the Infants and all the accompanying circumstances and persons—as Herod, his guards who execute his orders, and a group of females who shield their little children in their arms. The second division is occupied by the cities of Bethlehem and Jerusalem, made sacred by the birth and death of the Saviour. The mosaics which are arranged on the entablatures on either side of the main nave are given to the illustration of Old Testament history. By destruction and replacement, the original forty-two distinct pictures of the series have been reduced to twenty-seven. The first series begins in the upper left hand portion with the interview of Abraham with Melchizedec, and terminates with the history of Isaac and Jacob. On the right hand the series begins with the finding of Moses, and ends with the battle of Beth-horon. The treatment of the mosaics in the nave is far superior to that on the triumphal arch. Much animation and spirit characterize some of ^{Their teaching.} the figures. The presence of a classical freedom and excellence is manifest in many of the forms. Yet the strong biblical character of these mosaics indicates the introduction of a didactic principle into the decoration of the churches, in harmony with the teaching of the more influential Christian fathers.¹

Some of the most interesting mosaics of Ravenna must also be referred to this century. In no other city can this art ^{Mosaics of Ra-} be so consecutively studied in the monuments. They ^{venna.} are well-preserved, and have suffered fewer changes from restoration. Moreover, they seem to have been arranged as an integral part of the architectural plan, rather than to serve the purposes of mere decoration. Nearly all of them, too, were constructed upon classical principles, free from that Byzantine influence which a little later so effectually repressed the naturalness of art expression.

The earliest mosaics of Ravenna² are preserved in the baptistery

¹ For a description see Bunsen: Basiliken Roms, Bd. iii, Th. 2, pp. 262, etc. For good views see Bunsen: plates ix, x; and Garrucci: Istoria, etc., plates ccxi-ccxxii. For art estimates see Vitet: Histoire de l'art, vol. i, pp. 241-243; Lord Lindsay: Hist. of Christ. Art, vol. i, p. 265. For a very full description of this church v. Valentini: La patriacale basilica Liberiana. This is one of four treatises on the four great basilicas of Rome, prepared and published under the auspices of the Roman Academy of Fine Arts.

² For the mosaics of Ravenna among others see London Times, Sept. 25, and Dec. 30, 1876. Gerspach: La Mosaique. Richter: Die Mosaiken Ravennas, Wien, 1878. Quast: Die alt christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna, Berlin, 1842. Woltmann and Woermann: Hist. of Painting, vol. i. Texier and Pullan: Les Églises Byzantines. Labarte: Histoire des arts industriels, etc., vol. iv.

of the church formerly called Ecclesia Ursiana, now San Giovanni San Giovanni in fonte; they date from A. D. 430. The building fonte.

is octagonal, surmounted by a cupola. The spandrels of the lower tier of arches are enriched with eight noble figures of prophets upon a background of gold, and decorated with acanthus leaves and scroll work. The cupola is divided into two zones, the lower of which is ornamented with colonnaded churches, throned crosses, altars, chairs, tombs; the upper contains the twelve apostles, who circle round the crowning scene, the baptism of Christ by John in Jordan. The ac-

The apostles and the baptism tion of the apostles, as they advance with jeweled of Christ.

crowns toward the figure of Christ, is spirited and in the style of the best classical work. The Baptist, a strong, half nude figure, pours water from a shell upon the head of the Saviour, who stands in the stream, while the descent of the Spirit in the shape of a dove ratifies the sacrament. The one incongruous element is the representation of the Jordan by a river-god, in true mythological style. This is a further illustration of the religious syncretism which was so widely prevalent.

Equally interesting, and even richer in mosaics, is the mauso-Mausoleum of leum of Galla Placidia, built in A. D. 440. It is a Galla Placidia. church in the form of a Latin cross, and is now known as SS. Nazario e Celso. It is impossible by mere description to give an adequate idea of the magnificence of this church. Nearly the entire interior, both walls and ceiling, is covered with mosaics of exceeding richness and high artistic excellence. They can be classified under neither the earlier nor later school, but have been justly regarded as representing a transition from the style of the earlier catacombs to that of genuine Byzantine art. Amid the multitude of interesting objects two figures especially arrest attention and challenge careful study. The first is in the chief lunette opposite to the entrance. It is that of a man of earnest St. Laurence.

mien striding rapidly along, his robe flying in the wind, bearing a cross upon his shoulder and an open book in his right hand. Before him is a burning grate; behind, a closet, where rolls supposed to represent the gospels are seen. The old reference of this to Christ now finds few defenders, since it is essentially different from all other delineations of our Lord known to art. The reference of it to St. Laurence and his martyrdom seems to be the most reasonable interpretation of the scene.¹ The second notable figure of this church is that of the Good Shepherd, found in the arch over the entrance. He sits in the midst of a somewhat rugged landscape, clad in a golden tunic and purple mantle, holding in one hand a shepherd's staff which terminates in a cross, while the other is stretched across the breast to caress a lamb. The face is that of a young and beardless man, the hair is long and flowing, and the head encircled with the nimbus. The general mien is dignified, and the figure seems to express the personality, as well as to symbolize the office, of the Redeemer. The animals and plants are of inferior style, indicating little sympathy with a purely naturalistic treatment.¹ The mosaics of this church are exceedingly important in revealing the art tendencies and the character of the religious and dogmatic thought of the fifth century.

¹ Woltmann and Woermann: Op. cit., vol. i, p. 174. Variables: Article "Mosaics" in Dictionary of Christian Antiquities. Contra, Gerspach: La Mosaïque, p. 50, who regards it a picture of Christ. Also Quast: Op. cit., pp. 14, 15.

Some instructive mosaics are still preserved in the churches of San Lorenzo and San Ambrogio in Milan. The Christ in the chapel of San Aquilino (San Lorenzo) is of youthful appearance, beardless, and in some features suggests the type found in the earlier catacombs. There is an almost entire absence of Byzantine influence. The figures of Christ and the apostles are varied in expression and attitude, and the landscape is treated with unusual naturalness. The A. Ω. in the cruciform nimbus encircling the head of Christ leaves no doubt respecting the personage here represented.

The mosaics in the chapel of San Victor (San Ambrogio) are of a high order of merit. They have by some archæologists been assigned to the fifth century.² The treatment of the wreath encircling the head of San Victor is skilful, and the balancing of the parts by the figures of the evangelists is artistic and pleasing.

The beautiful chapel of the archbishop's palace in Ravenna, which still survives, has usually been ascribed to Bishop Peter Chrysologus. This view would regard it as a work of about the middle of the fifth century.³ The interior arrangement is quite similar to that of SS. Nazario e Celso of the same period (v. Fig. 120).

¹ Compare the representation of vine ornamentation in the dome-vaulting of this church. Fig. 41, with the frescos of Santa Domitilla, Figs. 1 and 2.

² The chronology of these mosaics has been a matter on which archæologists and historians of art have widely differed. Here, as in so many other cases, may not the failure to discriminate with sufficient care between the original parts and the restorations be one reason of this wide divergence of opinion? It is certainly very difficult to refer the entire work of these mosaics to the fifth century. Some portions point rather to the eighth or ninth century.

³ Schnaase: Op. cit., Bd. iii, s. 206.

Under the dome of this chapel are mosaic medallions of Christ and six of the apostles, three on either side, and in the side arches on either side are like medallions of six male and six female saints. Fig. 42 represents the mosaic of Christ. The jeweled corona in

Fig. 42.—Mosaic of Christ in the archbishop's palace, Ravenna. Fifth or sixth century.

the form of a Greek cross, the treatment of the hair, and the general facial expression are quite unique. Vigorous young manhood is here expressed, yet the cast of countenance is somewhat sedate; the drawing is accurate, the coloring appropriate. A somewhat striking red tints the cheeks, while a brilliant white sets off the eyes and higher lights. As a whole this mosaic scarcely conforms to any of the known types of Christ.¹

After the destructive invasions and the political disruptions of the fifth century, art activity at Rome experienced a very considerable revival. More clearly than ever before the power of the Church in preserving the elements of civilization in the midst of threatened barbarism is seen. Of the mosaics of the sixth century we can refer only to some of the more important. Well preserved examples are found in Rome, Ravenna, Parenzo in Istria, and Constantinople.

SS. Cosmas and Damian.

The most important mosaic monuments of this century at Rome are preserved in the Church of SS. Cosmas e Damiano, which was built by Felix VI., A. D. 526-530; they are in the apse and triumphal arch. These represent three distinct scenes or conceptions. On the triumphal arch the apocalyptic vision of the Lamb amidst the seven churches is pictured. A lamb, surmounted by a cross, rests upon a jeweled altar, on either side of which are the golden candlesticks. Beyond these, right and left, are two angels, while still further toward each extreme are symbols of the Evangelists. The most elaborate and imposing work is in the apse (Fig. 43). The central figure here is Christ, who is represented as floating on fleecy clouds. He extends the right hand in benediction, while in the left he holds a roll—the symbol of authoritative teaching. The head is nimbused, the face bearded, the drapery rich and flowing, and the mien severely majestic. On the right (spectator's) of the main figure is Peter leading forward St. Cosmas, who bears a crown indicative of martyrdom; beyond is St. Theodore. On the left Paul in like manner is leading St. Damian, who also bears a martyr crown, while beyond is Felix, the founder of the Church. The extremities are occupied by palm trees, on one of which is perched the phoenix, symbol of immortality. In a narrow zone below, the third scene is depicted. A nimbused lamb stands upon a hill or mountain, from whose base flow four rivers marked by their names.¹ On either hand, pressing toward the central figure, are six lambs, representing the twelve apostles, while on the extremes the sacred cities Jerusalem and Bethlehem appear. The entire mosaic, in each of its three scenes, is full of naturalness and life, and is a remarkable example of the recuperative art power of the Church.

¹ Schnaase: l. c.

A class of mosaics of exceeding richness and value in Ravenna and Constantinople must be referred to the sixth century. The reign of Justinian was powerful in its influence on Church and State. The convenient codification of the civil law was only a single illustration of the painstaking care of this ruler for the varied interests of the empire. Among the best preserved and most instructive mosaics of the sixth century are those of the Church of San Apollinare Nuovo, in Ravenna.² The friezes on either side of the nave are occupied by triumphal processions of holy men and women. On the south side martyrs and confessors, chiefly of the Ravenna church, clad in white garments, press toward the tribune to present their crowns to Christ, who is enthroned, and attended by four angels. The figure of

¹ These are not shown in the cut.

² v. d'Agincourt: Architecture, p. xvii, 17-22, who gives ground plan, section, and a few details of this church. Quast: Die alt-christliche Bauwerke von Ravenna, ss. 19, 20, Taf. vii. Garrucci: Storia dell' art crist., iv, Tav. ccxlii-cclii. Richter: Die Mosaiken von Ravenna, 1878, s. 69.

Fig. 43. — Mosaic from the apse of SS. Crispino e Damiano, Rome. Sixth century.

Christ (a partial restoration) is most imposing (v. Fig. 44). The expression is dignified, the face bearded, the hair long and flowing, the head encircled with the cruciform nimbus, and the right hand indicative of the teaching office. On the opposite or north frieze is a similar procession of holy women clad in rich attire, bearing crowns, passing from the city of Classe to join the Magi who reverently offer their gifts to the Holy Child sitting upon the lap of Mary, also enthroned and attended by four angels bearing sceptres in their hands. Both mother and child extend the hand in invitation and blessing.

From Fig. 97, which represents a portion of the north frieze, it will be seen that these processions are full of spirit and naturalness. This cut will also help us to understand the arrangement of the rich

Fig. 44.—Mosaic of Christ in San Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna. Sixth century mosaics between the windows, and in the cornice above, also the medallions in the spandrels of the arches. The peculiar relations of Mother and Child in this mosaic, especially their like attitude in the act of blessing, would suggest that the cultus of Mary, which soon afterward exalted the Mother above the Son, had already made considerable progress.¹

Interesting mosaics are also found in other churches of Ravenna, as Santa Maria in Cosmedin, San Vitale (the arrangement of whose mosaics can be seen from Figs. 107, 109), and San Apollinare in Classe (v. Fig. 99).

In extent and richness the mosaics of St. Sophia were entirely worthy of the grandest church of the Byzantine Empire. The magnificent pavements and dados of richly variegated marble found their counterpart in the brilliancy and perfection of the mosaics upon the vast and varied expanses of ceiling and dome. The historic value of these monuments is somewhat lessened by the uncertainty of their age.¹ The repeated attempts of the iconoclastic Mussulman to obliterate the mosaics by removing the tesserae, and by covering the whole with coats of whitewash, greatly marred their original incomparable beauty. The repairs of this church, under the direction of the Italian architect Fossati, gave opportunity for careful drawings of the parts which have survived.² These mosaics differ from those of Galla Placidia of Ravenna, Santa Pudenziana of Rome, and others, in that there is little attempt at pictorial effect or perspective. They are for the most part isolated figures of prophets or saints, generally of great dignity, with the attendant ornamentation of vines, borders, flowers, etc. The fixedness of type which later characterized nearly all the pictorial art of the East is not prominent in these mosaics of St. Sophia. The adornments of the panels, of the spandrels of the arches, etc., are free and cheerful. In the sections of the vast dome the outlines of four colossal figures of seraphs with overshadowing wings are still seen.³ They have a vigor and freshness of treatment indicative of an age of considerable artistic freedom. Also the mosaics of the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, exhibit much skill in the origination of independent forms and expression, while their variety of attitude argues wholesome exemption of the artist from the rigid ecclesiastical art canons which later became imperative.

¹ Quast: Die alt-christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna, s. 20, also Taf. vii, Figures 3, 5.

The immense mosaic picture (v. Fig. 45) of Christ, with the prostrate emperor and the medallion busts of Mary and an angel (St. Michael?), is believed to be of later origin. This is shown by the style and accessories of the composition. Christ, seated on a magnificent throne, raises his right hand in the attitude of blessing or teaching, while the left supports the open book. His head is surrounded by the nimbus, the face is bearded, the whole mien impressive. Before him, in the attitude of servile prostration, is the emperor,⁴ clad in most gorgeous attire, with nimbused head and ¹ Woltmann and Woermann: History of Painting, vol. i, pp. 233, refer these mosaics to the reign of Basil the Macedonian, in the latter part of the ninth century. Evidently they are of various dates, but some bear evidence of an earlier origin than those authorities suppose.

² Fossati: Aya Sofia, Constantinople, as recently restored by order of H. M. the Sultan, Abdul Mejid. London, 1852. Salzenberg: Alt-christliche Baudenkmale von Constantinople, with magnificent plates.

³ See Fig. 116, a section of St. Sophia, where two of these are shown.

⁴ Opinions relative to the sovereign here represented are various. Some (Woltmann and Woermann and others) have seen in it Basil I., who restored the western apse of the church into which this entrance leads; others (Venables, et al.) call it jeweled crown. Oriental taste is prominent, and art decadence is here painfully manifest. The subjection of the temporal to the spiritual power is plainly taught by this mosaic; the supremacy of the "Divine Wisdom," to whom the gorgeous temple was dedicated, is most conspicuous. The other mosaics of this church, many of which are of exquisite workmanship but of varied artistic merit, cannot here be described. Each has a valuable lesson for the historian of art and for the student of the history of the Greek Church.

Fig. 45.—Mosaic of Christ from St. Sophia, Constantinople.

Nearly contemporaneous with St. Sophia at Constantinople is St. Sophia of Thessalonica. An immense expanse of mosaics, said to cover nearly six hundred square yards, represents the ascension. The parts in the center of the dome have suffered much. This was occupied by the ascending Christ, attended by angels. The other prominent personages were the Virgin and the apostles, wrought out in colossal figures more than twelve feet high. Texier and Pullan¹ are of the opinion that these mosaics were produced before the influence of ecclesiastical art traditions had checked the freedom of the Eastern artisans. They notice the survival of creative and technic power in the variety of posture and of the facial expression in the figures. Instead of the stiff uniformity of a later period, the Virgin and the two angels (one on either side), who address the apostles, have each decided personal characteristics. The treatment is vigorous, and the handling of the colors in the drapery, etc., is Constantine Pogonatus; while still others (Gerspach, et al.) call it Justinian. The general style of this figure in expression and dress is so different from well known pictures of Justinian elsewhere preserved that it is very difficult to believe that it is intended for this emperor.

¹ Églises Byzantines, plates xl, xli. pp. 142-144.

free and pleasing. Instead of the fixed attitude of the eighth and ninth centuries, each one of the apostles has an individuality ; some look upward into heaven, others with downcast face are in prayerful meditation, while others raise the hands in expression of surprise.¹

Considerable mosaic work is also found in the apse of St. Catharine's on Mount Sinai. The subjects have been variously described by travellers. The transfiguration, with figures of Christ, Moses, and Elias, is the central scene. The accompanying figures of prophets, apostles, and saints, medallion busts of Justinian and Theodora, and the oft-repeated scenes of Moses at the burning bush and the receiving of the tables of the law, contain little that is peculiar.²

¹ There seems to be a very intimate connection between this church and St. Sophia at Constantinople.

² No thorough study of these has yet been made by competent specialists. The want of trustworthy photographs or plates leaves the chronology and technical execution, as well as the archæological value, of these mosaics undetermined. Many valuable articles upon Christian mosaics have appeared from time to time in the European reviews. Attempts have been made to supply the lack of monuments by the literary references to many now lost mosaics. Among the most skillful and successful of these workers must be reckoned Eugene Müntz of Paris, and Professor Frothingham of Princeton University.

CHAPTER V.

EARLY CHRISTIAN SCULPTURE.

WE have before (Book i, chap. ii) traced the effect of the Jewish law and of the Semitic imagination upon the cultivation of the arts of form ; also the influence of these factors in the development of the Christian art of the first two centuries.

The avoidance of the seductive power of beauty, as embodied in the matchless creations of the heathen artists, and of art in its associations with a corrupting polytheism, was most manifest with respect to sculpture.¹ As before noticed, the pictures of Christ were more readily tolerated than his presentation in free statuary. This was probably due to the Reasons of the seeming hostility to art. fact that sculpture is the most materializing of all the fine arts. It was most employed in connection with the pagan cultus, and was therefore most threatening to the purity of a monotheistic faith.

There was no agreement in the traditions of the early Church respecting Christ's physical characteristics and appearance. Moreover, when the Christian Church was in Reasons of decadence of sculpture. circumstances favorable to the cultivation of the fine arts, sculpture, which had formerly been almost the foremost art among the Greeks, had fallen into a condition of sad decadence,² and painting had assumed the chief prominence. Hence few, if any, works of Christian sculpture of an earlier date than the last of the third or the beginning of the fourth century have been preserved to our day. Indeed, the number of free statues No portraits of Christ. of early Christian origin is exceptionally small. Scarcely a half dozen of Christ have survived from the first five centuries. While Eusebius¹ testifies to having seen at Cæsarea Philippi a statue of Christ extending his hand toward the woman having an issue of blood, to cure her, and Philostorgius² speaks of its being destroyed under Julian, it is generally agreed that the traditions respecting the early portraiture of Christ, pictorial or plastic, have very slender support. The free statues which remain are manifestly not designed for portraiture, but are of a symbolic character. In all alike Christ is represented as the Good Shepherd "who careth for the sheep." The dress is that of the shepherd of the period, the ordinary tunic; the feet are either naked or sandaled, while the implements of the shepherd's vocation, the purse and the staff, are sometimes present.

¹ We have already said that this seeming hostility of some of the Christian fathers to the patronage and production of works of art was not due to a lack of æsthetic feeling, but it arose from fear of the contaminating influence of heathen worship. The same tendency is noticed from time to time in the history of the Church. The denunciations of the revived heathenism in the Italian painting at the close of the fifteenth century, by Savonarola, produced a marked revolution in the style of some of the great painters of the period. A like result is noticed in the attempts of Zwinglius, Calvin, and others in removing statues from the churches. v. Lecky: Hist. of Rationalism, vol. i, pp. 259, 260; and Grueneisen: De Protestantismo artibus haud infesto.

² Labarte: Histoire des arts industriels, tom. i, p. 12.

Figs. 46 and 48 are representations of the finest and best preserved of these free statuettes. It is now in the Lateran Museum at Rome. It has been restored in parts. The spirit and naturalness of the work are exceptionally fine, and readily suggest a classic sympathy and origin.

Fig. 46.—Statuette of the Good Shepherd. Lateran Museum.

A second example is given in Fig. 47. The original is also in the Lateran Museum. The execution is rude, and the general tone of the work is far inferior to that represented by Fig. 46. The general spirit of the biblical symbol is, however, fully preserved. Instead of the shepherd's purse, as in Fig. 46, here is the shepherd's staff or crook.³

There are two other statuettes, one preserved in the church museum of the College of Rome, the other in the basilica San Clemente, which differ little in general art character from the last, and are in close affiliation with it in subject and spirit. Hüb-ner¹ has described a small statue of the Good Shepherd found in Seville, Spain. The figure of the lamb is wanting. The origin and chronology are uncertain, although he inclines to place it near the close of the fourth century.

¹ Hist. Eccles., vii, 18.

² Hist. Eccles., vii, 2.

³ These and all other autotypes used in this chapter are taken by permission from the excellent work of Th. Roller: Les Catacombes de Rome. We have preferred these impressions to elaborate engravings, since they give to the lay reader a juster idea of the original objects. With great generosity, M. Roller, in a letter full of the true spirit of the Christian scholar, placed all his plates at the disposal of the author of this hand-book.

The general artistic treatment of these statues closely conforms to the contemporary heathen art; nevertheless, in all alike the subject is distinctively Christian: the office work of the Good Shepherd in bringing back to the fold the lost sheep.² The difference between these and the statues of the ram-bearing Mercury, Hermes-Kriophoros, is manifest.

Invariably a full drapery is found in the statues of the Good Shepherd, while the pagan Kriophori have complete or partial nudity as a characteristic feature.³

This is well illustrated by comparing Figs. 48 and 49.

Another work, claimed by some able writers to be of Christian origin, is the celebrated bronze statue of St. Peter, now found in the middle nave of St. Peter's, Rome. Opinions respecting its origin, chronology, and motive have been various and sometimes contradictory. The statue is certainly very imposing, and, if genuine, must be regarded as by far the most important plastic work of the early Christian centuries. The apostle is represented seated in a chair of Roman style, uplifting the right hand in the attitude of teaching. The head is firmly set; the hair is thick and curled, and is of the type traditionally ascribed to Peter, which is met upon early sarcophagi and in frescos from the catacombs. The folds of the drapery are not unworthy the best classic period, while the general pose is equal to that of the

Fig. 47.—Good Shepherd with crook or staff. Lateran Museum.

The bronze statue of St. Peter.

¹ Die antiken Bildwerke von Madrid, Berlin, 1862, s. 324.

² v. Th. Roller: Les Catacombes de Rome, vol. i, p. 265, where the extreme view of Raoul-Rochette respecting the absolute lack of originality of Christian art is vigorously treated.

³ Chanot: In the Gazette Archeologique, 1878, pp. 17, et seq., and pp. 100, et seq. We have elsewhere more fully examined these differences, Book i, chap. iii. v. also Veyries: Les Figures Criophores dans l'art grec, l'art Gréco-romain et l'art chrétien, Paris, 1884, pp. 61–81, especially pp. 80, 81.

more celebrated works of the fourth century. Every part of the statue indicates a careful adherence to some antique model, and therefore evinces little originality of treatment.¹ The key in the left hand is an addition of a later period, probably of the sixteenth century.

Fig. 48. — The Good Shepherd. To compare with Hermes-Kriophoros, Fig. 49.

Fig. 49. — Hermes-Kriophoros from Wilton House. To compare with Fig 47.

Another work in free sculpture is the statue of St. Hippolytus, now preserved in the Lateran Museum, Fig. 50. It was discovered in 1551. Only the lower part of the figure and the chair are original, the other parts being modern restorations. In its present restored form it represents St. Hippolytus seated on a cathedra, clad in the garb usual to the ancient philosophers, ¹ Luebke: History of Sculpture, vol. i, p. 337. It is for this and other reasons that the Christian origin and subject of the statue have been stoutly denied.

holding in his left hand a book upon which rests the right elbow. The Canon Paschalis, or table for calculating Easter, which he is said to have invented, is engraved in Greek characters on one side of the chair ; on the other is a partial list of his writings. The restored statue is a work of great dignity and excellence. As in the case of the statue of St. Peter, there has been much controversy respecting its Christian origin. There seems to be sufficient reason, however, for believing that it cannot be of a later date than the sixth century, while, from artistic considerations, some able archæologists are led to place it in the last quarter of the third, or the beginning of the fourth century. We have not space to enter into the examination of these arguments.¹

Fig. 50.—Restored statue of Hippolytus.

The general type of Christ found in Christian sculpture is rather that of the early Christian frescos, and seems to conform more closely to the pagan conception of deity, that is, that divinity must be represented under the form of a beautiful and vigorous manhood. The historic scenes are usually realistic. The lessons are for the most part easily understood; mystery and an esoteric exclusiveness are seldom suggested. Sometimes a purpose to depict scenes in the order of their historic development, or of their dogmatic connection, is apparent; at other times the principle of artistic grouping or balancing seems dominant. Into some of the most noted sarcophagi an architectural principle is introduced, whereby the surface is divided into sections by means of pillars which support an ornamental entablature. Upon these surfaces are found inscriptions or figures in relief. Sometimes the space is divided into zones, in each of which a progressive history or a rich symbolism may be found.

The timid caution which influenced the Christian fathers to indulge but sparingly in the use of free statuary was not cherished respecting these works in relief. From the first part of the fourth century the sculptures on burial monuments are numerous. In general style they adhere quite closely to the contemporary pagan art. In the distribution of motives, in the pose and balancing of parts to make a harmonious whole, and in the character of their technique, the Christian sarcophagi can claim little originality. The marked difference is in the changed cycle of the embodied thought. In this respect they are in striking contrast with similar pagan monuments. Nevertheless the subjects sculptured on these sarcophagi are very like those of the frescos and mosaics. Here, too, is found a rich symbolism ; here are seen the suggestive biblical type and antitype, as well as the instructive Scripture history. There is hardly a scene that has not already been met in the discussion of Christian painting. The creation of our first parents, the temptation by the serpent, the sacrifice of Isaac, Moses in the presence of the burning bush, or striking water from the rock, the history of Jonah, the three Hebrew worthies in the burning furnace, Daniel in the lion's den, and sometimes the translation of Elijah, are the chief subjects from the Old Testament history ; while the various benevolent works of Christ, the first miracle in Cana of Galilee, the multiplication of the loaves, the healing of the paralytic, the opening of the eyes of the blind, the cure of the woman with the issue of blood, and the raising of Lazarus are the favorite scenes from the New Testament. Incidents in the life of Christ, the nativity, the teaching of the disciples, the arrest, the trial, the denial by Peter, the handwashing by Pilate, the resurrection, and probably the ascension are also found sculptured on these burial monuments. Representations of the crucifixion are for the most part avoided during the first four and a half centuries;² also the other scenes of special suffering in the life of our Lord. The scope of these sculptures, as well as their art value, can best be learned from a few examples.

¹Among many see Bucher: In Migne's edition of the works of St. Hippolytus. Engravings, giving both side views of the statue and the text of the Canon Paschalis are there given, and Bucher examines the content of the Canon itself. Bunsen: Hippolytus und seine Zeit., 1te Abth., ss. 163, 164. Northcote and Brownlow: Roma Sotterranea, 2d ed., vol. ii, pp. 262-265. Appelt: Monuments of Early Christian Art p. 5.

Fig. 51 represents one of the older Christian sarcophagi that have been preserved. We are immediately reminded by this of some of the earliest frescos of the catacombs. The joyous scene of the vintage, the pastoral simplicity shown in the free association of the genii with the animal world, the rich luxuriance of the vine and its fruit, suggest a decorative rather than a symbolic principle. In the absence of the figures of the Good Shepherd there would be nothing in the scenes to show the Christian character of the sarcophagus; they would be equally becoming to a pagan burial monument. Indeed, in general spirit the sculpture well accords with that found on many works of heathen origin. Yet the peculiarities of the three figures bearing the sheep upon the shoulders, to which reference has elsewhere been made (r. p. 133, 134), clearly prove them to be designed for the Good Shepherd, and not for representations of the ram-bearing Mercury. While, therefore, it may not be unreasonable to regard the vintage scenes as mainly decorative, it is possible that to the mind of the designer or of the artizan there may have been present a reference to the symbol of the vine and its branches, and to the joys and fruition of those who are under the tender care and heavenly guidance of the Good Shepherd. The vigor and naturalness of the artistic treatment would point to an origin prior to the serious art decadence of the fourth and fifth centuries.

¹ The interpretation of the scenes in which some archæologists see the ascension depicted is somewhat doubtful.

² This question has been examined elsewhere, v. p. 84.

The translation of Elijah (Fig. 52) is a subject of very infrequent occurrence in early Christian art. We have elsewhere (p. 61) noticed the resemblance of this to the heathen representations of the sun-god and his chariot. The Christian character of this, and of a somewhat similar sarcophagus given in Bosio's work, cannot, however, be doubted. A fresco of the same scene is likewise found in the catacomb of SS. Nereus and Achilles. At a somewhat later date, likewise, it reappears on some of the sarcophagi of Arles. The two main figures and their action are understood without difficulty. Plainly the ascending prophet is giving to his successor in office his Translation of Elijah.

cance.

mantle, and therewith is to come a double measure of his spirit. The significance of the small figures in the central background, and of the bear in the lower right hand corner, is not so manifest. Some have suggested that herein might be a reference to the children who mocked the prophet, and to the instrument of their fearful punishment. The other sarcophagus in Rome which sculptures this scene contains a plainly mythological element in the form of a river-god that personifies the Jordan. This is a majestic, half-nude figure, in a reclining posture, with rich flowing hair held back by a band. He rests one arm upon an urn from which flow the living waters, and holds in the right hand a reed, also symbolic of the river. The action in these sarcophagi is full of life, and the artistic quality of the work fairly good.

Fig. 51.—Sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum. Showing a vintage scene, with the Good Shepherd.

Fig. 52.—The translation of Elijah. Sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum.

Fig. 53 represents a sarcophagus from the crypt of Saint Peter's. The crowded condition of the objects in alto rilievo causes a little obscurity, and consequent uncertainty in the interpretation. The main scene in the lower portion of the sarcophagus is plain; it illustrates the history of Jonah. The tempest is indicated by the full-swelling sail, and by the figure above, blowing upon it from the conch-shell. The sea-monster receives the erring prophet whom the crew cast overboard, and vomits him forth upon the land, while above Jonah is represented reclining in peace under the grateful shade of the gourd. On the extreme right of the upper zone the Good Shepherd leads forth the sheep from a house, the fold, the church, while at the extreme left appears the Wonder-worker raising Lazarus. The center is occupied with what appears to be the scene of the smiting of the rock by Moses, where the people slake their thirst with the refreshing water. The history of Jonah frequently recurs on the Christian sarcophagi,¹ since the truth it foreshadowed was among the most distinctive and precious of all which the apostles inculcated.

Fig. 53.—The history of Jonah and other scenes. From a sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum.

A work of much artistic excellence is represented by Fig. 54. It was formerly in the church San Paolo fuori le mura, Rome, but is now in the Lateran Museum. The two busts in the shell-like frame are in alto rilievo, as are most other figures of the sarcophagus. The artistic handling and execution are exceptionally vigorous. The grouping is varied and natural, the pose well-studied, the drapery wrought out with unusual care. The division of the space into two zones is often met. While the reference in most of the scenes is readily understood, it is not easy to discover any necessary relation of these ideas one to the other in the order of a series. The principle of artistic balancing is manifestly observed, also the study of economy of space. In the upper zone on either side of the busts are noticed eight larger figures, while the cock, in the scene of the denial of Peter, is balanced by the child, in the sacrifice of Isaac. The hand of Moses, receiving the table of the law, is balanced by the outstretched arm of Abraham which is arrested by the hand breaking forth from the clouds. In the lower zone, also, eight adult figures are on either side of the central scene, while one of the lions on the left is balanced by the figure of the blind receiving his sight. It is noticeable that here, also, the type of Christ in each of his acts—of raising Lazarus, of rebuking Peter, of opening the eyes of the blind, and of multiplying the loaves—conforms to that of the earlier frescos of the catacombs, and is more consonant with the pagan notion that divinity should be represented under forms of highest physical perfection.

The frequency of the recurrence of several Scripture scenes

¹ Burgon: Letters from Rome (Letter xx), says that of fifty-five sarcophagi which he examined twenty-three contained the history of Jonah. Of one hundred and ninety-five in Rome, outside the Lateran Museum, twenty-eight contain this history. v. p. 142, note 2.

FIG. 51.—Early Christian sarcophagus. Laternan Museum.

is quite remarkable. On fifty-five sarcophagi which Burgon¹ examined in the Lateran Museum, he found the smiting of the rock to occur twenty-three times; the miracle of the loaves, twenty times; the giving sight to the blind, nineteen times; the raising of Lazarus, sixteen times; Daniel in the lions' den, fourteen times; the sacrifice of Isaac, eleven times. While these are thus frequent, the crowning with thorns occurs but once, and of a real crucifixion there is no trace. One hundred and ninety-five Christian sarcophagi at Rome, outside of the Lateran Museum, contain the history of Jonah twenty-eight times; Moses smiting the rock, ten times; our first parents, nine times; sacrifice of Isaac, eight times; the raising of Lazarus, six times; the multiplication of the bread, and the miracle in Cana, each six times.²

Rich architectural effects are met upon several of the best sarcophagi in the vaults of the Vatican and in the Christian museum of the Lateran. One face of such sarcophagus is represented in Fig. 55. The seven compartments are formed by columns richly ornamented with the vine and its tendrils. The central figure is plainly Christ in the attitude of the teacher, in the midst of his apostles. The roll held in his left hand is supported by one of the disciples, while the positions of the hands, both of Christ and of those whom he is addressing, are indicative of conversation, rather than of the formal discourse of the great Teacher. The Christ is of the more youthful, vigorous, and pleasing type, and has in it elements which are suggestive of the better period of sculpture. The other figures are self-explanatory. On the extreme right is Christ before Pilate, who is washing his hands in token of his innocency of the blood of the royal Victim. On the extreme left is the frequently recurring scene of the sacrifice of Isaac, which here, more than is usual, seems to be a type of the great Sacrifice for the sin of the world. The curious figure beneath the Saviour, who is holding a veil above the head, is not easy of interpretation. It occurs in one or two other sarcophagi, notably in that of Junius Bassus. Perhaps the suggestion that a mythological element is here introduced, the figure representing either Uranus, the heaven, or Tellus, the earth, may be most satisfactory.³

¹ Letters from Rome, Letter xx.

² Grousset: Étude sur l'histoire des sarcophages chrétiens, Paris, 1885, 8vo.

³ Schmaase: Geschichte d. bildenden Künste, 1te Aufg., Bd. iii., s. 75. Lübke: Hist. of Sculpture, Transl., vol. i, p. 345, regards it as a figure of Oceanus. Northcote and Brownlow: Roma Sotterranea, vol. ii, p. 256, say, "The vault of heaven beneath His feet being expressed (as in pagan monuments) by the veil which the female figure holds above her head."

Probably the most elaborate sarcophagus of the early Christian centuries which has been preserved is that of Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus.

Junius Bassus, in the crypt of St. Peter's, Rome.¹ The inscription along the upper band of this monument gives the desired information relative to the character and age of the person whose memory is hereby perpetuated. It is as follows: IVN. BASSVS VC QUI VIXIT ANNIS. XLII MEN. II. IN IPSA PRAEFECTVRA VRBI. NE OFITVS IIT AD DEVM. VIII KAL SEPT EVSEBIO ET YPATIO COSS. "Junius Bassus, of patrician rank, who lived forty-two years and two months. In the very year in which he became prefect of the city, a neophyte, he went to God on the 23d of August, Eusebius and Hypatius being Consuls" (A. D. 359).

¹ Good casts of this sarcophagus are found in the Lateran Museum, also in the Museum of Christian Archaeology, Berlin, which was founded by Professor Piper, and under his indefatigable labors has become one of the most useful collections in Europe for purposes of study.

The facts of the inscription are confirmed by contemporary historians, thus giving positive information respecting the time of the origin of the monument, and, therefore, aiding in appreciating the cycle of subjects here portrayed, as well as the artistic value of the work. The architectural principle is likewise introduced into this sarcophagus, dividing the surface into compartments, in each of which is found a scriptural scene. On the extreme left of the upper zone is the sacrifice of Isaac, in which the knife raised to slay the boy is arrested by a hand stretched out from the clouds, while, near at hand, the substituted ram is found. It is difficult to account for the frequent introduction of this event in Scripture history, except that it may have a typical or symbolical signification—pointing to the real sacrifice, the Lamb of God, who was to “take away the sin of the world.” On the other extreme is the hand-washing of Pilate. The lower zone is equally significant, showing in the middle portion Christ’s triumphal entry into Jerusalem. On the right is the representation of Daniel in the lions’ den. Here in the case of Daniel a draped figure is introduced, while in other delineations of the same scene the figure is entirely nude. On the left is the temptation of our first parents. The serpent is winding around the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; the sheaf of wheat by Adam indicates the life of labor which he must lead, and the lamb symbolizes the employment of Eve. Some interpreters find in this figure of the lamb a symbol of the promised Redeemer. The relation of the elements of this scene can best be studied from Fig. 56. The middle figure of the upper zone has been variously interpreted. Some have seen in it the teaching Christ, the two figures being those of his disciples. The roll and the attitude of the hand would suggest this. Others have associated it with the central scene in the lower zone. As the latter is representative of his triumph before the people, so is the upper scene (v. Fig. 57) the transfiguration, with Moses and Elias as his companions. This, it is claimed, is indicated by the figure below, which is to represent earth as his footstool, under the form of Tellus, who holds a veil over the head, thus symbolizing the firmament. The latter interpretation appears hardly accordant with the principles of a rational symbolism. The other scenes are, respectively, on the ex-

Fig. 56.—The Fall.
From sarcophagus of Junius Bassus.

Fig. 57.—From the Junius Bassus monument.

a rational symbolism. The other scenes are, respectively, on the ex-

PLATE II.—Sarcophagus of Julius Bassus. Crypt of St. Peter's, Rome. A. D. 250.

PLATE II.—Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus. Crypt of St. Peter's, Rome. A. D. 359.

treme left, in the lower zone, the humiliation of Job; on the right the arrest of Peter; on the upper zone, Christ's arrest, and his arraignment before Pilate. In the spandrels of the arches is a most suggestive symbolism.¹ In one part a sheep is striking with a staff the rock, whence flows water which another sheep is drinking. In another section a sheep is receiving the table of the law; in another it performs the miracle of the loaves; a third lays its forefoot upon the head of another, over which baptismal waters flow, while the rays stream from the beak of the dove which represents the Holy Spirit. Thus in all the symbolic character of the lamb is most manifest; the central thought being Christ the source of power, blessing, and life.

The sculpture, Fig. 58, is of later origin, probably of the sixth century. The central figure is one quite frequently met in the frescos—an orante—on either side of whom stands a figure whose signification it is difficult to determine. The presence of the palm-trees points to the thought of victory or of joyousness in the heavenly inheritance. The extension of the hands in prayer is the usual attitude met in the early monuments—frescos, sculptures, and mosaics. It is plain that this position of standing with outstretched hands in prayer was the usual or prescribed one. No instance of prayer to God in the kneeling posture is met in the monuments. Supplication for aid from another, as in case of the woman with the issue of blood, etc., may be met; but that this was not the usual attitude in case of public worship seems evident. In this the monuments and the literary evidence are in entire accord. The other members of this sculpture are familiar. On the right the multiplication of the loaves in the hands of the disciples—a most favorite scene with the early Christians; on the left the first miracle in Cana of Galilee, which is hardly less frequent upon the early monuments. The extreme right has been by some interpreted to be the afflicted Job sitting in ashes, attended by one of his friends.² This is less certain in its reference than the other portions of the sarcophagus. As a work of art this is much inferior to many others: it indicates a wide departure from the classic spirit, and a decay of originating power, as well as feebleness in execution.

The representation of the Nativity and its attendant circum-

¹ Unfortunately, these do not appear with much distinctness in our plate, on account of the difficulties of photographing in these dark crypts.

² Roller: Catacombes de Rome, vol. i, p. 297.

stances is quite exceptional on the Christian sarcophagi. In the Lateran collection but a single example is met, The Nativity in sculpture.

Fig. 58.—A later sarcophagus, now in the Lateran Museum.

upon a fragment of a small sarcophagus, represented in Fig. 59. The scene is easy of interpretation. Joseph and Mary occupy the extreme right. The central portion suggests the manger scene, the sacred babe in swaddling clothes laid in a basket, while the ox and the ass in their stall help to complete the picture of the lowliness of the birthplace of the Lord.¹ Toward the left the magi, clad in their usual dress, are bringing gifts. On the extreme left is a winged genius in the peculiar style of pagan art, showing the syncretism of thought in Christian sculpture, or, at least, the readiness with which these figures were introduced for decorative purposes.

The interesting sarcophagus represented by Fig. 60 is from the latter part of the fifth century. As a The appearance of the real cross in sculpture. work of art it plainly belongs to the period of decadence. The scenes in the life of Christ also show by their peculiar treatment that the age of persecution is past, and the age of triumph has been reached. The hand-washing by Pilate is mani-

¹ Some interpreters have suggested that reference may be had to Isa. i, 3; that while the brute creation recognise their Lord and Creator, and the heathen world (the magi) is full of expectation, and is ready to worship the infant Redeemer, "Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider."

Fig. 59.—The Nativity and the offering of the magi. From a sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum.

festly the scene presented on the extreme left. This is indicated by the basin, the pouring out of the water from the pitcher by the

Fig. 60.—Sarcophagus from fifth century. Lateran Museum. The appearance of the real cross—no longer in symbol.

soldier, the attitude of the sitting figure, etc. Next is the figure of Christ attended by the soldier, who bears a spear and wears the usual Roman helmet. Christ seems in the attitude of speaking. The position of the hand, with the two forefingers extended, as is customary with the teacher, might suggest the answer to the inquiring Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world. . . ." "Art thou a king then?" "Thou sayest that I am a king." The scene first on the left of the center is plainly the crown-

Interpretation of scenes.

ing of Christ by the soldier. But may not the time of the origin of this sculpture be conjectured from the fact that the crown is no longer one of thorns but of garlands? On the extreme left is the cross-bearing. To what extent the crown of garlands may suggest triumph, or how far it may be merely ornamental, and is used to complete the artistic balancing required by the like crown in the hand-washing, may not be determined with certainty. The central portion is full of suggestion. A curious combination of elements indicates that the period of suffering and the time when the cross must be concealed are past. The Constantinian monogram rests upon the cross. This would be indicative of sacrifice, but it is crowned by a chaplet which is emblematic of victory. This would be further emphasized by the idea of the resurrection, suggested by the watch of Roman soldiers who were set to guard the sealed tomb.

Early Christian art contains few references to the retributions of a future state. Herein it is in completest contrast with the art of the later Middle Ages, and with some of the most celebrated works of the Renaissance. In this we observe the influence of that spirit of simple faith and love which led the early Christians to dwell rather upon the beneficent offices of our Lord, and upon the more cheerful and winning aspects of the religion which he established. The statements already made in relation to the frequency on the early monuments of such scenes in the life of Christ, and of events in the biblical history which contemplate the elevation of the individual or of the race, fully confirm this opinion. In the sarcophagus, Fig. 61, is almost the only instance of a representation of the last judgment in early Christian sculpture. It is a simple reproduction of the Scriptural statement in Matt. xxv, 31-46. Here is the shepherd, not the angry judge, separating the sheep from the goats. The whole action of the sculpture is most effective. The pressing forward of the sheep in obedience to the glad invitation, "Come, ye blessed of my Father," the hand laid approvingly upon the head of the nearest, the face of the shepherd turned toward those who had done his will in acts of beneficence, are in striking contrast to the attitude of the proud goats who were approaching with eager confidence, but who, arrested by the fearful words, "Depart from me, ye cursed," now shrink back from the touch of the averted

The last judgment.

Its scriptural character.

Fig. 61.—The Last Judgment. From a Christian sarcophagus of unknown date.

hand, and are troubled by the face turned away in sorrowful condemnation. Nothing could more fully and effectively express the decisions of the last judgment in a manner completely in harmony with the Scripture conception.¹

CARVINGS IN IVORY.

Another very interesting class of objects are the carvings in ivory. They are considerable in number, and on account of the durability of the material have suffered less from the forces which have seriously marred works in stone and bronze.

Some of the most important of these ivory carvings prior to the eighth century are in the form of diptychs. This term, Ivory diptychs. while properly applying to any thing folded together (δίπτυχον), has more especial reference to tablets used by the ancients for writing with a stylus of ivory or metal. They often had three leaves (triptychs), sometimes four and more. The inner surface was covered with a thin film of wax, the outer, or cover proper, was often elaborately carved.

For general art archæology the most important of these are the Consular diptychs most important for chronology. consular diptychs, since they are usually larger, more elaborate, and bear dates and legends which are often helpful in the solution of historic and chronologic problems. These were usually presents which the newly appointed consuls were accustomed to send to their friends and adherents, and differed in value and artistic excellence according to the social rank or political influence of the recipients. Some of the consular diptychs were afterward presented to churches and ecclesiastical communities, and were changed in their character from secular and heathen to Christian by the removal of portions of the original carving and the substitution of subjects of religious significance. As might be anticipated, they sometimes present a commingling of heathen and Christian elements.

Diptychs were also quite common in the public service of the early Church. Their uses have been well summarized as follows: First, like the church registers of modern times, they contained names of all baptized and unbaptized persons of the parish or district; secondly, in them were recorded the names of bishops and chief personages who had been benefactors and patrons of that particular church; thirdly, they contained the names of those who had suffered martyrdom, or who were of specially saintly character—Ecclesiastical diptychs. these names being often read at the public services to show the unity of the Church militant and the Church triumphant; fourthly, there were diptychs in which were written the names of the deceased members of the particular church or district, who were to be remembered at mass.¹ This was regarded a matter of extreme interest, since the erasure of a name from the diptychs was equivalent to actual excommunication, and the name so erased could no longer be mentioned in the prayers of the church.² The number of ecclesiastical diptychs prior to A. D. 700 is very small; yet they are of peculiar interest in the illustration of the sculpture of the period prior to the liberation of Christianity from Græco-Roman influence, and of the development of an art peculiarly its own.

¹ Roller: Catacombes de Rome, vol. i, pl. xliii, No. 3.

A single leaf of a beautiful Christian diptych, plainly of Byzantine origin, is now in the British Museum. It represents an angel of young and vigorous mien standing under an arch supported by Corinthian columns. He is clad in a tunic and flowing mantle. In the right hand he bears a globe surmounted by the cross, very much in the style of the Byzantine emperors, and with the left supports a long scepter similar to the lance borne by warriors. The general character of the work is good, and suggests that the artist must have been influenced by the classic statues with which Constantinople then abounded.³ A second example from the sixth century is now in the British collection; both leaves are preserved. One represents the Virgin and child enthroned, with two angels in waiting; on the other leaf Christ is seated between SS. Peter and Paul. A third, now belonging to the treasury of the Cathedral of Monza, also from the sixth century, has both leaves preserved. It has been suggested that it was early converted from a consular diptych to the cover of an antiphonarium of Gregory the Great.⁴ On one leaf is a figure in consular robes; but the head shows the tonsure, and the staff terminates in a cross. It has been claimed to be a representation of Gregory himself. The other side contains a somewhat similar figure, but lacks the tonsure, and is associated with the inscription, DAVID REX. This association of Gregory

¹ Gori: Thesaurus veterum diptychorum, Florentiæ, 1759, t. i, pp. 242, 243. Bingham: Antiquities of the Christian Church, Book xv, ch. iii, §. 18.

² Among others see Bingham: Op. cit., Book xvi, ch. iii, §. 12; Book xix, ch. ii, §. 11. Dodwell: Fifth Cyprian Dissertation. Ad Epistolam X. De nominum e diptychis ecclesiæ recitatione in Eucharistia. Oxen, 1684.

³ Labarte: Op. cit., t. i, pp. 30, 31. Oldfield: Select Examples of Ivory Carving from the Second to the Sixteenth Century. London, 1855, p. 10.

⁴ Gori: Op. cit., t. i, p. 201. Oldfield: Op. cit., p. 10. Maskell: Ivories, Ancient and Medieval, etc., p. xxxvi. Contra, Pulszky: The Fejérvári Ivories, p. 23. Labarte: Op. cit., t. i, p. 16.

and David has been thought to be very appropriate on account of their similar interest in sacred music and song. While the work is rude, and indicates great artistic decadence, it is nevertheless of great importance in the art study of a period from which comparatively few examples of sculpture have survived.

It has often been remarked by investigators of early Christian monuments that they are remarkably free from scenes of suffering, as the early inscriptions furnish few examples of the expression of a spirit of complaining, despair, or vindictiveness. It is quite generally agreed that in the first four centuries no instance of a representation of the crucifixion of Christ upon the monuments has yet been found. The reason of the avoidance of these scenes has elsewhere been suggested (v. p. 104). Hence the agony in the garden,

Fig. 62.—A Crucifixion. From an Ivory in the Maskell Collection in British Museum. Probably of the fifth century.

the scourging, the cross-bearing, and the crucifixion, all of which became favorite subjects of art portraiture in the mediæval period, are rarely met in the art of the first three and a half centuries. Fig. 62 is from an ivory carving, and is believed to be one of the oldest representations of the crucifixion yet discovered. It cannot be of a date earlier than the fifth century. From its general style and resemblance to the sculptures of the Roman sarcophagi, its genuineness has come to be accepted by the best critics, and its date determined. It is now in the collection of the British Museum, and was part of the celebrated Maskell cabinet of ivories which have come to be so highly prized. The scenes here represented, one of four divisions of the ivory, are manifest. The Saviour, extended upon a Latin cross, receives the thrust from the soldier's spear, while on the other side appear the beloved disciple and the sorrowing mother (John xix, 26, 27). On the extreme left is the representation of the history given in Matt. xxvii, 5: "And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself." Previous to the discovery and description of this ivory carving, the earliest representation of the crucifixion was believed to be that contained in the decoration of a Syriac manuscript of the gospels, now in Florence, which bears the date A. D. 586.

An interesting instance of ivory carving upon covers of books is found in the National Library of Paris. Three principal scenes are represented; namely, above, the Annunciation; in the centre, the Adoration of the Magi; below, the Massacre of the Innocents. The entire composition is in very superior style of art, indicating the thorough acquaintance of the artist with the best works of antiquity.¹

A second example of like character is in the treasury of the Cathedral of Milan. Both covers have been preserved. The central portion of the one is occupied by a richly jeweled Agnus Dei with circled and jeweled nimbus. In the upper part is represented the Nativity, flanked by symbolic figures of Matthew and Luke. In the lower portion is depicted the massacre of the Innocents, while on either side of the cover are three scenes from Gospel history. The center of the other leaf contains a jeweled cross, above which is the adoration of the Magi, with symbolic representations of Mark and John; below is the marriage in Cana, while six scenes from the life of Christ enrich the sides. From the circumstance that Christ is represented as young, unbearded, and without a nimbus, as well as from the fact that while his presentation to the women after the resurrection is the subject of one of the carvings, the crucifixion is here avoided, some have been inclined to assign this ivory to a very early date. It is probable, however, that it cannot antedate the fifth century.²

This last work in ivory is surpassed in value and interest only by the noted cathedra of Bishop Maximianus, now preserved in the sacristy of the Duomo in Ravenna. It is entirely covered with carvings, many of which are of the finest design and technic. Ten scenes from the life of Joseph are of very Cathedra of Bishop Maximianus.

¹ Labarte: Op. cit., t. i, p. 32.

² This celebrated work has been described by many writers. Labarte, Op. cit., t. i, p. 32, has given a very fine plate; and Oldfield, Op. cit., p. 11, has given a partial description.

superior workmanship, while the animals and plants reveal a warm sympathy of the artist with nature. Only the figures of saints that fill the front side show the stiffness and artificiality of the later Byzantine style. Fig. 63 represents one of these figures—an ecclesiastic in the attitude of preaching. The sacred book lies open upon the ambo, or reading desk, and the two forefingers of the right hand indicate the office of the teacher. The attitude of the figure itself is constrained, while the whole artistic treatment, from the head to the sandals upon the feet, is stiff and unnatural. This and other like figures are specially helpful as a means of ascertaining the vestments of the clergy and their position in preaching, as well as suggesting the quality of the church furniture then in use.

In a few instances ancient ivory boxes, or pixes, are still preserved.¹ They were generally placed upon the altar to contain the consecrated eucharistic elements which were to be distributed to the sick. Garrucci claims that the subjects depicted upon fourteen of the fifteen known sacred pixes relate directly to the eucharist. The only exception is an ivory pix from the early part of the sixth century, which is now in the British Museum. Upon it are represented the martyrdom and glorification of the Egyptian saint, Menas. This circumstance has therefore suggested another use of these sacred pixes; namely, to contain relics of saints and martyrs.²

Fig. 63.—Ivory carving from the cathedra of Bishop Maximianus, in the Duomo of Ravenna.

This St. Menas was held in highest veneration by the Egyptian

¹ v. Hahn: Fünf Elfenbein-Gefässe des frühesten Mittel-alters. Hanover, 1862. Lebarte: Histoire des arts industriels.

² v. Garrucci and Nesbitt, in the Archæologia, vol. xlv, pp. 320–330, and plates x and xi.

Christians, and also in Rome. He is often represented upon the flattened flasks or bottles which are found in considerable numbers in Egypt.

Another interesting class of antiquities are the Christian lamps. They are numerous and of different materials, as terra sculptured cotta, bronze, silver, and amber. They are of various forms, and contain a great variety of symbols, as the dove, the cross, the Constantinian monogram, A Ω , etc. The Christians used these lamps not only to lighten the otherwise gloomy recesses of the catacombs, but, in common with the heathen peoples, attached to them a symbolic significance, especially when used in connection with the burial of the dead. Some of these lamps are works of high art, and show an exquisite taste in matters of form as well as in respect to workmanship and symbolic import. Fig. 64 is one of the finest of the hanging lamps in bronze. It contains three orifices for lighting, and its handle is wrought out in an elaborate χ and the representation of Jonah reclining under the shadow of the gourd.

Fig. 64.—A Christian lamp, with Constantinian monogram.

For over two hundred years great interest has attached to a class of relics found more especially in the Roman catacombs and crypts of churches; these are the so-called ampullæ, or blood-phials.

or blood-phials, Fig. 65. An almost acrimonious controversy has continued respecting the uses of these clay and glass phials and their contents. One cause of this controversy was a decree of the Congregatio Rituum et Reliquiarum, issued in 1668, to the effect that the marks of true relics of the martyrs, as distinguished from the false or doubtful, shall be the presence of the palm-branch and a vessel coloured with their blood. This test was maintained as decisive by nearly all the old archæologists, and has been very vigorously defended by many in the present century. Two opinions of the contents of these phials have been held: one, that they contained the blood of martyrs; the other, that the colouring matter found in them was due to wine used for eucharistic purposes. The question is not yet satisfactorily settled.

Fig. 65.—A so-called Blood-phial. From Roman catacombs.

Many other interesting and instructive objects of antiquity are found in museums and private collections. The subject of seals and rings has received careful attention. Numismatics has become a special science, also glyptic art has contributed much toward a knowledge of Christian thought during the first six centuries. The special examination of these archæological remains is, however, precluded by the limits of this hand-book.

CHAPTER VI.

EARLY CHRISTIAN ARCHITECTURE.

SECTION I.

THE CHRISTIAN BASILICA.

§ 1. Origin of the Christian Basilica.

THE origin of the species of Christian church called basilica has been most earnestly investigated. The answer to the question, "Whence arose Christian architecture?" would also furnish a partial answer to the related questions of the condition of art feeling in the early Church, the originality of monuments usually called Christian, and the connection of the Roman Christian and Gothic architecture with the early Christian basilica in a process of organic art development.¹ The subject is one of great difficulty, on account of the fewness of surviving monuments from the first three centuries, and from the meagre references to this subject in the writings of the Christian fathers, or in Vitruvius, the only architect of the first century whose works have come down to our time. It is not, therefore, surprising that able writers should have differed in their account of the origin of the Christian basilica.

Origin of the Christian basilica.

Various opinions have divided the archæologists. 1. The first is that advocated in the latter part of the fifteenth century by Alberti,² which claims that the early Christian basilica is a close imitation of the Roman pagan basilica, with unimportant departures from the original. By placing the plan of each side by side, to the superficial observer this similarity appears quite striking and the theory plausible. This opinion was accepted by leading archæologists for three and a half centuries.³ 2. It remained almost unchallenged until subjected to a most rig-

Alberti's theory, from the Roman basilica.

¹ "With respect to the discovery of new germs (of art) in the period of the downfall, the following questions especially would come under examination: First, the question in how far Christianity had a share therein?" etc. v. Mothes: Die Baukunst des Mittelalters, etc., Bd. i, ss. 2, 3.

² De Re Edificatoria. Florentiis, 1485.

³ The English authorities seem to know no other theory of the origin of the Christian basilica (v. article Basilica, in Encyclopædia Britannica, and in Dictionary of Christian Antiquities); this also prevails in America.

idly critical examination by Zestermann¹ in 1847. This writer concedes that the resemblance of the churches of the fourth century to the Roman basilicas in respect to the rows of columns on either side, the lean-to roof, the enclosing wall, and the windows resting upon the columns beneath, justifies the classification of such Christian churches under the term basilica; but these are insufficient to establish an organic connection between the Christian and the heathen structures. He argues that the Christian basilica was chiefly developed through the needs and spirit of the Christian church itself, and is, therefore, a distinct style of architecture. In the solution of this question the stoa basilica and the agora, found at Athens in the time of Pericles, are successively examined with an earnestness and learning truly praiseworthy. The first of the so-called basilicas at Rome was built by Marcus Porcius Cato in B. C. 184. After this followed others, the most noted of which were the Basilicas Æmilia, Fulvia, Julia, and Ulpia. From Rome these buildings were extended throughout the entire empire. Zestermann claims that they fall under four general classes, according to the purposes which they served; namely, the law basilicas, the private basilicas, the basilicas for pedestrian exercises, and the wine basilicas. Each of these had peculiar features adapting it to its specific uses. All alike appear to have been suggested by the Roman forum, this general type being modified only so far as might be necessary by the greater or smaller building area. This author rejects the derivation of the word from the Greek, in the sense of "a house of the king," or "a royal habitation," but claims that even in the time of Plautus the word basilicus had already become a distinctively Roman adjective, meaning "magnificent," "imposing," "grand." Hence, to distinguish it from other porticos, the building of Cato was called "porticus basilicus," the magnificent house, and afterward simply "basilica."

The Christians applied the term basilica to an imposing building used only for ecclesiastical purposes. Zestermann claims that the groundplan and the arrangement and development of all its parts had sole reference to the purposes and needs of Christian worship, and no relation whatever to Roman pagan buildings of like name. He sees the progressive growth of the Christian society revealing itself in the basilica, slowly transforming and perfecting it, as new wants arise, until the imposing structures of the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries were the outcome. In harmony with this opinion he professes to be able to group the early churches into five classes, each one of which represents a stage in the attempt to properly adapt them to the needs of Christian worship :

¹ Die antiken u. die christlichen Basiliken nach ihren Entstehung, Ausbildung, u. Beziehung zu einander. This was crowned as the prize essay by the Belgian Academy of Arts, Literature, and the Fine Arts.

Classification of early Christian churches.

- (1.) Buildings of an oblong form with a middle and side naves.
- (2.) Those of oblong form with middle and side naves and an apse.
- (3.) Those of oblong form, middle and side naves, apse, and transept.
- (4.) Those of oblong form, middle and side naves, apse, and transept; but without an atrium, and having the porch leaning on the main building.
- (5.) Those having the characteristics of the last class, but having several apses.

This writer defends his theory with great learning, and concludes that "the origination and development of the Christian basilica are completely explained by, and find their justification in, the activities and needs of the Christian spirit."¹

3. A third opinion has been defended with much earnestness and with great wealth of learning. It holds that the early Christian basilica was developed from the ancient private house and the Greek hypæthral temple.² The following considerations are urged in favor of this origin : After their complete separation from the Jewish Church the Christians assembled in private houses for worship. This is distinctly stated in the Acts of the Apostles, in the Epistles, and by the early Christian fathers. The accepted and regular form of the Roman house at the beginning of the Christian era can be well ascertained, and the adaptation or adjustment of such a room to the purposes of a Christian assembly can be easily traced. The resemblance of these temple.

Hypæthral

Private house.

¹ Zestermann has a zealous disciple in J. Kreuser: Christlicher Kirchenbau, 1851 and 1860; and still more positively in his Wiederum Christlicher Kirchenbau, 1868. This author holds, 1. That the Christian basilicas had nothing to do with the attic royal hall. 2. Under the term, hypæthral temple, he can understand nothing more nor less than a building that is open and free to the light and air. Diogenes's tub in the street might be an example of a hypæthral building. 3. Zestermann is the foremost and best author who has written on the basilica, and his explanation of its origin is the only correct one. 4. Egypt had the first basilica. From two passages in the Talmud it is evident that this name was peculiar to Egyptian works of architecture. 5. The Egyptian, or, more strictly, the Africano-Palestine, method of building was copied in Rome, and from these arose the basilicas for holding the courts of law.

² W. Weingärtner: Ursprung und Entwicklung des christlichen Kirchengebäudes. Leipzig, 1858.

to the early Christian churches is seen in the peristyle, and the so-called œci lying behind it. These two rooms were related to each other both in space and situation very nearly as were the parts of Herod's temple at Jerusalem, which was built in the Grecian style. After the destruction of this temple, and the spread of Christianity over the known world, it was natural that the Christians, when erecting independent houses of worship, should take their suggestions from the Græco-Roman temples, which contained all the essential parts of a Christian church. It was also natural that the form should be selected which had been most perfected, and most nearly satisfied the demand for the observance of their own religious services. This was the hypæthral temple. It was open to the sky, thus giving abundance of light, and had a recess, the cella, where could stand the high altar for the celebration of the eucharist. This cella, which was taken from the circular or polygonal burial temples, was demanded by the Christian societies, since soon afterward a place of worship, and a place of burial for the martyr or saint to whom the church was dedicated, were combined in the same building. With the exception of the greater elevation of the middle nave, the outer form of the hypæthral temple corresponded to that of the Christian church. Still more close was the likeness of their interior arrangement. This influence of the pagan temple upon the Christian building was most apparent in the time of Constantine. It was seen in the use of like terms, in the adoption of the circular or polygonal groundplan, and in working out the details of the interior. The ground outline, the rows of columns, and the consequent division of the interior space into naves, the lower porticos, the choir and its general arrangement, the sacramental table, the baldachin, the place of burial for the martyr, the crypts beneath, the apse, and, later, the ambos, or reading desks near the front railing, are all prefigured in the Roman pagan temples. The purest form of the continuation of the antique temples were the Roman basilicas, which maintained their peculiar characteristics as late as the twelfth century.¹

This writer thus attempts to show the intimate relation and dependence of the early Christian churches on the private house, and especially on the hypæthral temple, both in external form and interior arrangement. He holds that the law basilicas of the Romans were so entirely different from the Christian that it is unscientific to regard the latter as the continuation and perfection of the former, and claims that the Christian church could only be derived from the ancient private house, with such suggestions as were afforded by the hypæthral temple of the Greeks.

¹ v Weingärtner: Op. cit. pp. 136, 137.

4. A fourth theory of the origin and development of the Christian basilica has been suggested and very ably defended Messmer's theory. by Dr. J. A. Messmer.¹ He starts from the well attested fact that the earliest Christian societies were accustomed to assemble in the private house of some one of their number, and in the room most spacious and convenient for their services, and which at the same time would best afford protection from sudden interruptions by their enemies. Plainly this would be the triclinium, or banqueting-room. Among the Romans this was a rectangle, whose length was twice the breadth. From the triclinium. The more wealthy the owner of the house the more spacious and elegant, was this room, and the more nearly did it resemble the form of the basilicas which were found in the palaces of the more noted Romans. These dining-rooms of the nobles are so minutely described by Vitruvius that we cannot be in doubt with regard to their form, arrangement, and decoration (v. Fig. 78). Rows of columns, both Corinthian and Egyptian, often supported architraves and beams on which a place for promenading was constructed, while above were other columns supporting a roof or a wall pierced with windows for lighting the interior. In these rooms public business was frequently transacted and legal causes determined. We also read of a church in the houses of wealthy public men who had accepted Christianity, as in the case of Pudens and Aquila.²

Jerome assures us that the noble Lateranus opened his private basilica for the assembly of the Christians, and that it afterward was transformed into one of the most Examples of noble Christians. splendid churches of Rome. Ammianus Marcellinus³ says that a like assembly found a stated place of meeting in the Basilica of Sicinianus, another noted Roman. There is trustworthy evidence that such change from the triclinium of the house of a wealthy citizen, named Theophilus, to a Christian church took place at Antioch in the first half of the third century; and it seems incredible that the pseudo-Clement could mention in his romance these transformations of private basilicas into Christian churches unless the fact was well known. Thus, while the triclin-

¹ Ueber den Ursprung, die Entwicklung, und Bedeutung der Basilika in der christlichen Baukunst. Leipzig, 1854. Also and more thoroughly in an article, Ueber den Ursprung der christlichen Basilika, in the Zeitschrift für christliche Archæologie und Kunst, 1859, vol. ii.

² I Cor. xvi, 19. v. also p. 30.

³ Ammian. Marcellin., xxvii, 3. "Et in concertatione," etc.

ium of the private house and the private basilicas of the more wealthy were used for the assembly and worship of the early Christians, it was found that they combined, more fully than any others, elements of architecture which were afterward developed into the distinctive edifice known by the generic name of Christian basilica. While the Roman name was retained, the building was transformed by the peculiar power of the new religion. Thus was provided a type of church architecture peculiarly adapted to the genius of Christianity, and in many respects the most convenient ever devised. Christianity became the heir to the late Roman art, but its inheritance was improved and perfected by a new and living spirit.

5. A fifth theory, very ably advocated by Dehio,¹ finds the germs of the Christian basilica in the private house, in which for two centuries the early Church was accustomed to meet for worship. He attempts to trace this development, step by step, from the simplest structure of the common Roman dwelling-house to its perfected form in the imposing basilicas of the fourth and fifth centuries.

6. The latest theory is that recently advanced by Professor Lange, of Halle,² and substantially accepted by Professor G. Baldwin Brown,³ of the University of Edinburgh. This theory traces the beginnings of Christian architecture to the pagan scholæ. While the architectural evidence cited in support of this view is not decisive, it is believed that from the outward resemblance of the Christian communities to the various religious organizations and clubs of the heathen world,⁴ and from the confounding of these by the legal authorities, it would naturally follow that their places of assembly must have been similar in outward appearance and in internal arrangement. The adaptation of these scholæ to the needs of Christian worship is pointed out, and the fact that the protection of government given to the clubs would thus be extended to the Christian assemblies is emphasized.

These different theories of the origin of the Christian basilica illustrate the difficulties of the subject. It seems probable that each contains a partial truth, and that by a judicious eclecticism a juster view of the beginnings and growth

¹ Die Genesis der christlichen Basilika. München, 1883.

² Haus und Halle. Leipzig, 1885.

³ From Schola to Cathedral. Edinburgh, 1886.

⁴ Hatch: Organization of the Early Christian Churches, London, 1882, has developed this subject, using with great effect the monumental evidence.

of early Christian architecture may be gained. Let us look at some well-established facts.

The first Christians assembled for worship in the temple,¹ in private houses,² in upper rooms, through fear of disturbance and persecution from their enemies,³ in the synagogues of the Jews,⁴ and by the river side.⁵ In the synagogues, which had been founded in every chief city of the empire, the apostles could address a multitude composed of Jewish and non-Jewish elements.⁶ Doubtless the free republican spirit which characterized the service, in marked contrast with the exclusiveness of the temple, was another reason for the assembling of the apostles and first Christians in these buildings. Moreover, the synagogues were places for consultation, and for discussion of questions upon which the opinions of the rabbis were divided; so that persons of vigorous intellect and of inquiring spirit were often attracted to them. This is manifest from the accounts given of the Berean Jews,⁷ as well as from the fact that Paul could speak freely in the synagogue at Ephesus "for the space of three months, reasoning and persuading as to the things concerning the kingdom of God."⁸

Advantages of the synagogue.

The fact that some of the Judaizing sects, as the Ebionites, still resorted to the synagogues for worship⁹ may suggest one reason why, during the first century, the pagan world regarded the Christians as only a sect of Jews, and why the fierce opposition of the latter to the Christians was judged by the Roman governors to be of little importance in the eye of the civil law.¹⁰ While despised by the pagan world, the Jews had, nevertheless, received at the hands of some of the emperors very favorable regard, and were granted some most valuable immunities. The inscriptions and art remains of the Jewish catacombs at Rome entirely confirm the testimony of the literary monuments touching this point. With this erroneous conception respecting the true nature of Christianity was connected a decided advantage to its first adherents. There can be little doubt that thereby the early Church secured exemption from sweeping persecution just at the time of its greatest need. Even at the close of the second century a Christian father of eminent ability recognises this obligation.¹¹

Christians judged a sect of the Jews.

Privileges of the Jews.

Incidentally advantageous to the infant Church.

¹ Acts iii, 1; v, 12.

² Acts xii, 12, seq.

³ Acts i, 13; xx, 7-9.

⁴ Acts ix, 20; xiii, 5, 16, et al.

⁵ Acts xvi, 13.

⁶ Acts xiii, 16, 26, 44, 46, 48; xiv, 1; xviii, 4.

⁷ Acts xvii, 11.

⁸ Acts xix, 8.

⁹ Irenæus: Adv. Hæres. lib. i, c. 26.

¹⁰ Acts xviii, 12-17.

¹¹ Tertullian: Apolog., c. 21.

But from the first it was manifest that Christ had established a Church whose spirit could not be confined within the narrow limits of Judaism. The events at Ephesus are instructive. The awakened hostility compelled the withdrawal of the Christians from the synagogue, and they assembled in the school of one Tyrannus,¹ where these meetings were "continued by a space of two years." A somewhat similar state of things existed in Corinth.² Various passages in the history of the apostolic Church clearly prove that the A separate place of gathering in private houses. customary places of meeting were in upper rooms³ or in private houses.⁴ This was the case at Troas;⁵ and Aquila and Priscilla,⁶ "with the church that is in their house," send salutations to the Corinthian brethren. Also Paul sends greetings to "Nymphas and the church which is in his house,"⁷ and to Philemon and "the church in thy house."⁸ His own custom for two years was to receive all who came unto him in his own private house at Rome, "preaching the kingdom of God and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ."⁹

The continuance of the custom of gathering in private houses The custom continued. after the apostolic age is clearly evidenced from the literary monuments both Christian and pagan. It is well-nigh demonstrable that the worship of the Christian Church for nearly two hundred years was chiefly a private service, avoiding the publicity permitted to a religion already recognised and protected by the state.¹⁰ So far as can be known, to the close of the second century no stately or characteristic buildings for the ceremonies of Christian worship had been erected. Probably some houses had already been erected and set apart for Christian services, but they must have been unpretentious, and probably mostly of the nature of private halls, or of the class of buildings called scholæ, which were either given by the wealthier Scholæ. members, stately thrown open for the use of the societies,¹¹ or built by means of a common fund. Doubtless, however, these unpretentious buildings contained evidences of the art susceptibility which had already found expression in the earlier pictures of the catacombs.

In consequence of the high esteem felt for the confessors and

¹ Acts xix, 9.

² Acts xviii, 7.

³ Acts i, 13.

⁴ Acts vii, 15.

⁵ Acts xx, 7, 8.

⁶ 1 Cor. xvi, 19.

⁷ Col. iv, 15.

⁸ Philem. 2.

⁹ Acts xxviii, 30, 31.

¹⁰ Pliny: Epist., lib. x, ep. 96.

¹¹ The houses of Pudentiana and of Lucina at Rome, and of Briccius and Eutochius at Tours, are familiar examples.

martyrs, the practice of burial feasts and festivals soon arose. Celebrated in the houses, and during seasons of persecution in the catacombs, these exerted a powerful influence on the architectural arrangement of the places of meeting, and on the furniture and art of the church. Feasts in honor of the dead were very common among the pagan peoples, and there can be no reasonable doubt that the Christians found in them many suggestions for their own practices. From the reign of Marcus Aurelius burial festivals became especially frequent, on account of the great number of devoted men and women who were victims of the terrible persecutions. It is plain that the arrangement of the meeting-houses and the nature of the services were modified through the great reverence for those whose remains were deposited in crypts beneath the altars of the churches, or in the small chapels where the hunted Church gathered for the celebration of the meal in memory of the sainted dead.

There is abundant evidence that at the beginning of the third century private houses were still in general use for divine worship, and for the meetings of the Christian societies. Optatus is very specific in his information touching this subject, speaking of various members in whose houses such assemblies were accustomed to be held.¹ But the changed social condition of the Church, which now reckoned among its adherents some of the noted families of the capital and of the empire, was more favorable to the erection of buildings devoted exclusively to Christian uses. It is impossible to determine their number, size, and degree of elegance. Optatus informs us that the schismatics destroyed forty churches which had been the property of the orthodox party at Rome. He calls them "basilicas," but their peculiar character he does not indicate. We also have the account of the erection of a very imposing structure at Nicomedia in the last part of the third century,² as well as of its destruction at the beginning of the execution of Diocletian's edict to raze all the Christian churches and burn the sacred books.

It must, however, be remembered that not until the reign of Commodus did entire families of the Roman aristocracy pass over to the Christian Church, and that, two generations after Constantine, Christianity could claim hardly a majority of the prominent families of Rome. For the first two hundred and fifty years the adherents of Christianity were largely of the middle and lower classes, and were, therefore, accustomed to the simple Roman dwelling-house, or were crowded together in the many-storied tenant houses of Rome and of the larger towns. While there is good reason to believe that, from the second century, converts from noble families opened or devoted their spacious dwellings to the Church for Christian worship, this number must, nevertheless, have been comparatively insignificant. In times of peace the common dwelling-house was the usual place for the celebration of the sacraments, and for the instruction and edification of believers. It is incredible that these forty so-called basilicas at Few noble and wealthy Christians.

¹ De schism. Donat., i, 14, 23; v. also Acta Martyrum, cc. 8, 9.

² Eusebius: Hist. Ecclesiæ, lib. viii, cc. 1, 2.

Rome, near the close of the third century, were elegant dwellings furnished by the richer and nobler members. Rather must we suppose that the main features of the rooms in which the Christians were accustomed to assemble, and of the service which had been adjusted to this environment for two and one half centuries, would impress themselves upon the more imposing churches which were erected during the peaceful interval of forty years between the reigns of Decius and Diocletian, and after final exemption from persecution had been ensured. It is, therefore, important to examine the form and arrangement of the ordinary dwelling-house of the empire.

Relations of the private houses to the churches.

Fig. 66.—The House of Pansa (Casa di Pansa), Pompeii. An elegant Roman house.

There was a general uniformity in the internal arrangement of the early Greek and the Italian private house.¹

The chief sources of information are Vitruvius, the Capitoline Fragments, and the houses which have been disinterred on various sites, as Pompeii, Herculaneum, etc. From these we infer the most important portions of the Roman house. First was the vestibulum, which was a vacant space before the door, forming a kind of court, one side of which opened upon the street, the other sides bounded by the house itself. From the vestibule a passage or hall, called the ostium (v. Fig. 66, A), led to the main room of the interior, which went under the names of the atrium and cavædium, B (cavum ædium). This was roofed over, with the exception of an opening in the center, the compluvium, toward which the roof sloped to conduct the rain into a cistern in the floor, the impluvium, I. In the rear of the atrium was the tablinum, E, and right and left the alæ, DD. On the sides of the atrium were found the sleeping-rooms, cubicula, CC, and behind and on either side the triclinium were the servants rooms, CC. The triclinium is open, and allows an uninterrupted view of the other parts of the house. Vitruvius refers to five kinds of atria,¹ representing as many stages in the development of the Roman house. The atrium Tus- Five classes of the atrium.

The Roman dwelling-house.

Its arrangements.

¹ Mommsen: History of Rome, vol. i, pp. 46 and 307.

canicum was the earliest and most simple (Fig. 67). In this the roof was supported by four beams, crossing at right angles, thus forming the compluvium. It is plain that this construction was available only in the smaller houses. The atrium tetrastylum differed from the first in that the beams were supported at their intersection by columns, instead of extending to the walls of the house. This would admit of an enlargement of the atrium. In the atrium corinthium the beams were supported by rows of columns, thus giving opportunity of farther enlargement.²

Fig. 67.—Atrium Tuscanicum.

In the atrium displuviatum the roof sloped outward toward the walls, instead of inward toward the compluvium—thus carrying the water away from the interior impluvium (v. Fig. 68). The atrium testudineum was entirely roofed over, and lacked the compluvium, and consequently the interior impluvium (v. Fig. 69). The atrium was the chief room. In the ordinary dwellings it was devoted to a variety of uses, to the customary intercourse and the festivities of the family; in the houses of the wealthy it was fitted up with magnificence, and was the reception room where the patron was accustomed to meet clients, hear petitions, and dispense favors.

Description.

Uses for the atrium.

¹ vi, 3.

² In fig. 67 these columns and the changed interior thus resulting can be easily supplied by the imagination.

At the further end of the atrium, opposite the entrance, was the deep recess or room, called the tablinum, which could be made private by means of folding doors or hangings. It was the place of honor, the seat of the householder. On either side of the atrium, leading right and left, were small recesses or rooms, called alæ (v. Fig. 67). Such seems to have been the simple arrangement of the Roman house at the end of the republican period. In the country, and during the early history of the cities, it was of one story, or, at most, it added a second story in which were the cubicula, or bed-chambers, whose breadth and height to the cross beams were one third or one fourth the length of the atrium.

Fig. 68.—Atrium Clispluviatum.

But in the period of the empire, when the crowded condition of the towns made building sites expensive, and the increasing wealth of leading families created a demand for more elegant dwellings, the construction of the Roman house underwent an important change which is connected with the history of early Christian architecture. The enlargement of the dwelling could be attained only by increasing its length; hence the more elegant Roman houses, after the manner of the Greeks, added to the simple atrium a large space in the rear. This, the peristyle, (Fig. 66, GG), was a court open to the sky in the center, which was surrounded by columns, and was somewhat larger than the compluvium of the atrium. In the center of this peristyle was a plot for grass and flowers, and at the sides the triclinia, KK, or rooms in which the couches and tables were usually placed for social or religious feasts.¹ At the rear of the peristyle in the larger and more imposing houses was found the œcus, L, which held the same relation to the peristyle as did the Enlarged in the Imperial period.

The peristyle and triclinium.

¹ Fortunately the excavations have revealed examples of each class of the Roman house. The so-called casa di Sallustio (Sallust's house), in Pompeii. Examples from Pompeii. has a groundplan almost precisely answering to our description of the atrium, with its alæ raised to admit the light; while the casa di Pansa (Fig. 66) is a fine example of the more pretentious houses, with the peristyle and its architectural accompaniments.

tablinum to the atrium. It was sometimes semicircular.¹ From the œcus a passage led to the porch, PP, whence was a way to the garden in the rear.

Doubtless the private basilicas of the more wealthy families that had embraced Christianity contained architectural elements which afterward found expression in the churches of the Constantinian and post-Constantine periods, but it is difficult to believe that they furnished all the essential norms of the Christian architecture of the fourth and fifth centuries.²

The lighting of the dwelling-house is connected directly with the history of Christian ecclesiastical architecture. In the simplest Roman house the atrium was lighted from the vestibule. At a later stage of the development, the alæ were extended to the roof and sides, thus admitting abundant light to the interior. When the houses in the towns became continuous, and the sides were bounded by continuous walls, a new method of lighting the inner rooms was required. The most obvious way was to admit light through the compluvium. But the defence against moisture and cold required that this central opening be protected, while light might still be admitted. The construction of a gabled roof, supported by columns above the compluvium, thus shielding the interior from cold and rain and yet allowing a free admission of light, was the next step in the solution of the problem. This gave rise to a structure represented by Fig. 68, which is a conjectural reproduction of the form which the atrium displuviatum would thus assume. From this figure it may be seen how the spaces on the enclosing walls, as well as on those separating the atrium from the lateral apartments, were preserved, and which afterward furnished opportunity for the extended ornamentation introduced into the churches.

The more recent excavations in Rome, Syria, and North Africa have brought into prominence other architectural forms which had manifest influence on the development of the Christian basilica. They are the curia, the cella, and the schola. These terms were applied to the meeting-houses of associations, where the members were accustomed to assemble for business purposes

¹ The celebrated villa of Herculaneum, the largest and richest which has yet been excavated, lacks the œcus. The villa in the Farnese garden and the house of Livia on the Palatine have no peristyle; while the recently discovered atrium of Vesta, which is one of the most elegant dwelling-houses yet excavated in Rome, has a very spacious œcus, but lacks the peristyle.

² This is virtually the theory of Messmer.

Lighting the interior.

Guarding the compluvium.

The cella and schola.

From Herculaneum and Rome.

or for advancing the interests of their organization. These societies were very numerous, and were carefully guarded by legal enactments. The places of gathering were called curiæ, or scholæ,

Fig. 69.—Atrium displuviatum with covered compluvium.

according to the dignity and importance of the body therein assembling; usually the term curiæ being applied to halls of greater size which were used for public business, the term scholæ to buildings occupied by private clubs. Among the more important of such organizations were the burial guilds. On account of the great regard of the Romans for their dead, special privileges were granted to these associations to hold groundplots for the interment of their deceased members. On them (which were beyond the city walls) a building was erected for the celebration of the memorial feasts, and still others for the occupancy of the persons specially charged with the care of the cemeteries. This space, having the technical name of area, usually enclosed by walls and often embellished with statues, flowers, etc., was a spot of peculiar privacy and sacredness.

Fig. 70.—Heathen schola, Via Appia, Rome.

On the Via Appia are found the remains of these scholæ of heathen origin. Fig. 69 is the groundplan of such a one.¹ It was a building of square form, with three semicircular niches, fronted by a columned portico.

¹ v. Canina: Via Appia, Tav. xx.

One represented by Fig. 71 is likewise on the Via Appia. Here are six niches, and the tendency is to the circular form. This portico is lacking in columns.¹ Some whose outlines closely resemble those of the earliest Christian churches have also been excavated at Pompeii. Moreover, the testimony of the inscriptions is full and explicit respecting these structures. Much information is given concerning their legal tenure, the donors of the grounds and of the buildings erected thereon, the purposes to which they were devoted, the character of the feasts, etc.

Fig. 71.—Heathen schola, Via Appia, Rome.

Structures of like form and used for like purposes have also been discovered in connection with Christian cemeteries in various parts of the Empire. Two such cellæ, measuring about thirty feet on each side of the square, have been found in the open-air portion of the catacomb of San Calisto in Rome² (Fig. 72); also the oratories in the cemetery of San Pretestate are of like general character.

Fig. 72.—Christian schola above San Calisto, Rome.

Many suggestions relative to the forms and arrangement of these earlier Christian meeting-places are found upon the sarcophagi, in the buildings which are depicted in the great mosaics of Rome, Ravenna, and Thessalonica, and sometimes in objects of less striking character. Fig. 73 represents a bronze lamp discovered in Africa.¹ It is in the form of a primitive basilica or schola. Almost precisely the same form is met in the great mosaics of St. George, Thessalonica.² By a comparison of these with the plans and outlines of buildings found in the Capitoline fragments and at Pompeii, little doubt can be felt relative to the resemblance of the early Christian meeting-houses to the scholæ and curiæ of pagan Rome. By a comparison of Figs. 70 and 72 the likeness of the heathen burial chapel to the Christian cella will be obvious. That like principles of construction and arrangement held in each must be manifest.

Fig. 73.—Form of an early basilica, a bronze lamp found in Africa.

¹ Canina: Op. cit., t. ix.

² De Rossi: Roma Sotterranea, iii, p. 468. Ritter calls them "the first early Christian churches built above ground."

The cella of San Sisto at Rome, situated in the midst of an open air cemetery (Fig. 74), affords a good illustration of the form of these burial chapels, and of their relation to the places of sepulture and the enclosed area. It was a principle, holding in the arrangement of the cemeteries controlled by the burial clubs, that the area of the open-air plot should exactly correspond to that of the subterranean space. Great care was observed that no society should intrude upon the rights of another. It will be seen that this cella terminates in a semicircular apse, whose upper portion suggests the beginning of the semidomical or conchoidal style. It also shows the probable location of the altar, and the space for the distribution of the couches, etc., in the celebration of the burial feasts. The principle of the cella, oratory, or schola finds further illustration in the room discovered in 1868 in the cemetery of Santa Generosa, near Rome (Fig. 75). The apse is almost perfect. In the extreme rear part is found another smaller recess or apse for the cathedra of the bishop; back of this is a window. Further excavations behind the window revealed a cubiculum on whose walls were frescos, the style of which points to the seventh century as the time of their origin.

Fig. 74.—Cella and arrangement of graves above San Sisto, Rome.

¹ de Rossi: Bullettino di Archeologia cristiana, 1866.

² Texier et Pullan: Arch. Byzantine, pl. xxx-xxxiv.

Fig. 75.—Basilica in Santa Generosa, Rome.

Another interesting example of an excavated Christian basilica, illustrating the same structural arrangement, is Santa Petronilla, at Rome, Figs. 76 and 77. The vestibule, the four rows of columns, dividing the interior space into five naves, the terminal semicircular apse, are clearly preserved. Moreover, the mural paintings, of a style not inferior to the best contemporary art, the ornamentation in stucco, crypts of great extent, not hewn in the rock as elsewhere, but carefully and elegantly constructed out of terra-cotta and building stone, with pilasters and other architectural details, show that the Church was not opposed to art, nor in a condition of extreme poverty and persecution, but all the reverse. Also a large number of inscriptions, not materially different in form from the best heathen work, whose dates in some cases reach back to the second century, further confirm this view.¹ De

¹ Kraus: Roma Sotterranea, ss. 87, 88.

Rossi¹ has shown that this Petronilla belonged to the Flavian family, and lived in the first century. The groundplan (Fig. 76) shows the complexity of the structure.

Fig. 76.—Groundplan of basilica in Santa Petronilla, Rome.

De Rossi² reported a most important discovery made at the entrance of the most ancient catacomb at Rome, Santa Domitilla.

¹ v. Bullettino Arch. crist., 1874, 1875.

² Bullettino Cristiano, 1865.

The use of the interior space was suggested by the stone bench which runs along the walls; "an immense triclinium for a great number of guests; in fine, a schola sodalium very like ^{Santa Domi-} to those of the pagan brotherhoods founded for burial ^{tilla.} purposes." Somewhat similar triclinia have been discovered at Pompeii, whose internal arrangements bear a very ^{Also at Pom-} close resemblance to this anteroom to the cemetery ^{peil.} of Santa Domitilla.

We must here consider the structure of the pagan basilicas, and determine their influence upon early Christian ar- ^{Origin of the} chitecture. They are believed to have been derived ^{pagan Roman} immediately from the Greeks, but had been brought ^{basilica.} to their greatest perfection at Rome during the later period of the republic, and the reign of the first emperors. The resemblance of the Roman basilica to the Roman forum is well known. Their uses, also, somewhat corresponded.

The opinion that the basilica derived its form from the forum has good foundation. Vitruvius connects the basilicas with the markets, and says they should be built in the warmest places in order that the traders might there meet in winter.¹ In this statement he seems to mistake the object of these buildings, since among the Romans, as among the Greeks, they were certainly used as halls of justice.² So far as can be known the first basilica was built at Rome, B. C. 184, by Marcus Porcius Cato, from whom it was named the Basilica Porcia. Seven of rare magnificence are mentioned during the republic.

The law basilicas of Rome were oblong, rectangular buildings, whose length was usually twice their breadth. They ^{Form of the} were of one, three, or five naves, were usually without ^{law basilica.} roof, and open to the sky. The rectangular space was inclosed by a wall. This has been questioned by some writers³ ^{An enclosing} who believe that the early basilica lacked the full en- ^{wall.} closing wall. This opinion is chiefly supported by the remark of Plutarch, that the Roman knights and armed men stormed through the Basilica of Paulus. But the passage can be easily explained by the existence of numerous doorways or openings in the side walls, while the positive testimony of equally trustworthy⁴ writers in-

¹ I. C.

² Hirt: Die Geschichte der Baukunst bei den Alten, 1827, Bd. iii, ss. 180, 181.

³ v. Schnaase: Geschichte d. bildende Künste.

⁴ Vitruvius, Quintilian, and Seneca among the ancients. Among modern writers see Otfried Müller, Bunson, Zestermann, and Messmer. The excavations make it probable that the Basilica Julia lacked this outer bounding wall.

Fig. 77.—View of basilica in Santa Petronilla, Rome.

duces the belief that the Roman law basilicas generally had the enclosing wall.

The early Roman basilica terminated opposite the entrance in a semicircular niche, called the apse or tribune (see Fig. 78).¹ This was not an unusual form for other Roman buildings. It is seen in the baths of Titus and of Diocletian, while in the baths of Pompey the long hall terminated in a clearly defined semicircular niche, which formed a half-domed recess above. A like arrangement is noticed in many of the temples, where the semicircular niche was often occupied by a pedestal, on which was a statue of the god.² Vitruvius distinctly mentions this recess or apse as connected with the Roman basilicas, and his description of the tribune leaves no doubt as to its location and purpose. The semicircular termination of the pagan basilica³ corresponded to its purpose, and to its derivation from the forum. The latter structure has clearly preserved this arrangement in a semicircular portico supported by columns. To the same result would point the representation of the Basilica Ulpia, found on the Capitoline Fragments, where a like outline of the tribune is clearly seen. The Basilica of Constantine the Great also contains the same form. The latter monument is of great value for the determination of this question, since its loca-

The apse.

Fig. 78.—Plan of basilica from the villa of Quintilian.

Basilica Ulpia and of Constantine.

¹ v. Canina; Via Appia, t. xxxii.

² v. Otf. Müller: Archæologie der Kunst, ss. 344–346.

³ Contra, v. Zestermann and Kreuser: "The old basilica had no apse." Kreuser: Christlichen Kirchenbau, s. 28.

tion, the time of its erection, and its founder are well known. Its ruins are also so well preserved that it may be regarded as a fair example of an ancient basilica, and one, too, which probably was afterward devoted to Christian purposes. Also the Basilica of Otricoli entirely corresponds to this form. From all the evidence to be gathered from baths, halls, curiæ, temples, and even from porticos, the conclusion may be safely reached that the semicircular termination was a peculiarity of this style of Roman architecture. History, ancient authors, and monuments unitedly furnish good reason for concluding that the public basilicas of the Romans often, if not generally, terminated in a semicircular apse.¹

Upon an elevated platform, opposite to the entrance, the high judge, surrounded by his assistants, presided. Below and on either side were the judges; in front were the witnesses and advocates, while the remaining space of the apse was for the use of the people who gathered to hear the causes. On the rows of columns, dividing the interior into three or five naves, rested either entablatures or that type of round arch seen in the palace of Diocletian at Spolatro, on the coast of Dalmatia² (Fig. 79). Above, a second row of columns supported a wall, on which rested the rafter-work and the ceiling supports. According to Pausanius the ceiling of the Basilica Ulpia was bronzed. The ceiling of the temple at Ephesus was wrought out most elaborately in cedar, while the interiors of some of the public buildings of the west were made most beautiful and impressive by the rich carving and gilding of the ceilings. The portico was quite the ordinary arrangement in the more pretentious public buildings of Rome, such as palaces, temples, and basilicas, and in some private houses.³

The Christian basilica of the fourth century was evidently the result of growth. The theory which attributes its immediate origin to the toleration of Christianity granted by Constantine and his sons, or which supposes a direct and slavish adoption of the Roman law basilica, or claims a widespread conver-

¹ Of many who substantially agree with this view may be cited Otfried Müller: Archæologie der Kunst, § 291. Kugler: Geschichte der Baukunst, 1856, Bd. i, ss. 280, 281, 354. Schnaase: Geschichte d. bildenden Künste, Bd. iii, ss. 44, 45. Carrière: Die Kunst im Zusammenhang der Culturentwicklung, Bd. iii, s. 96.

² Schnaase: Op. cit., iii, 23, 24. "The long rows of columns no longer support an architrave, but arches; the wide wall surfaces are ornamented with rows of round windows, or niches, between lofty columns which support corbels." Compare Mothes: Die Baukunst des Mittelalters, Bd. i, ss. 12-24.

³ v. Otf. Müller: Op. cit., s. 384.

FIG. 70.—Palace of Diocletian, Spolito.

sion of the heathen law basilicas into Christian churches, lacks historic foundation. The main elements of the Christian basilica had been well known from the first, and the churches which are met in the fourth century are the result of two and a half centuries of growth and seemingly unconscious appropriation to its wants of whatever was useful.

On comparison of the Roman law basilica with the Christian Church of the same period, certain general resemblances are noticed, giving rise to a theory of its origin which was unquestioned for two and a half centuries, and is still embraced by a large class of writers on archæology.¹

There is no earlier notice of the use of the basilica for distinctively Christian purposes than that in a letter written to Macarius of Jerusalem by the Emperor Constantine, whose attention had been directed to the peculiar beauty and magnificence of a Christian basilica in that city. The theory that the name βασιλική was derived from the Emperor Constantine, βασιλεύς, is untenable. The letter of Constantine would show that the peculiar class of buildings to which he refers was well known to Macarius himself, hence must have been widely diffused at the time.² Moreover, the statement of Optatus regarding the forty basilicas at Rome at the time of Diocletian strengthens this opinion. It is noteworthy that no attempt to trace the derivation of the word is met before the seventh century. When Isidorus Hispanus says, "Formerly basilicas were called dwelling places of kings, hence the name, since βασιλεύς is a king and basilicas are royal habitations; but now divine temples are named basilicas because therein are offered service and sacrifice to God, the King of all," we may find a useful suggestion to the later Christians, but it scarcely affords a satisfactory explanation of the origin of a name which had characterized a whole class of structures from the fourth century. That the same name was attached to the heathen building and to the Christian is probably owing to their partial resemblance and likeness of arrangement.³

¹ v. J. Richter: Christliche Architecture u. Plastik in Rom vor Constantine dem Grossen. "Notwithstanding the most thorough investigations it cannot be positively denied that the Christian basilica was derived from the pagan hall of justice."

² We cannot, with Konrad Lange, Haus und Halle, s. 324, understand this to refer to the then existing basilicas which were used as halls of exchange, or to some modifications of these to adapt them to the purposes of Christian worship, but to churches which had previously existed.

³ Messmer: Ueber den Ursprung, die Entwicklung, und Bedeutung der Basilika in der christlichen Baukunst, Leipzig. 1854, ss. 15, 16.

The naved and columned church resembled the heathen basilica in being an oblong rectangular structure, whose interior was divided into three or five naves by two or four rows of columns extending throughout its length. Resemblance to pagan basilica. In some of the older churches these columns were taken directly from heathen monuments, thus introducing into the composition an element of strange incongruousness.¹ The columned arrangement would be as readily suggested by the banqueting hall of the more wealthy Romans as by the law basilicas themselves. In this case the result would be a three-naved building, which was the more usual form.

The Christian Church was a body of believers, an organism, in which the dependence of each part on every other was so vital that "whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it" (1 Cor. xii, 26). The Christian church an organism. In it there must be chosen men to minister in holy things. The sacerdotal character of this ministry had already been recognized. The Church of the fourth century, therefore, required a place of assembly, and a high altar where the sacrifice of the holy eucharist could be made, and whence the divine will and purpose could be declared. In the Constantinian churches, the thought of the worshipper was directed toward the spot where communication was believed to be established between the invisible, eternal, all-wise God and the body of believers, through the ministrations of the priesthood. In the Christian basilica this spot was the semicircular niche opposite the entrance, where stood the high altar with its accompanying furniture, and where the bishop and his attendants conducted the imposing ceremonial. In Christian literature this niche is called the apse. The apse the unifying member. The term is found in common use by the early Christian writers, and always in the same sense.² The name was evidently of Roman origin, and is important in the study of the development of Christian architecture.

We have already seen that the law basilica likewise terminated in an apse. But the principles governing the two structures are entirely different. Different principles govern in the heathen and Christian basilica. While business of diverse character might be transacted in various parts of the heathen basilica, in the Christian church the interest of the entire assembly was one and common. In the heathen basilica, therefore, the apse assumed no such importance as in the Christian church. This is manifest from the difference in the columnar structure. In the heathen basilica the columns were extended across the side opposite to the main entrance, making the colonnade continuous on the ground floor and in the galleries, thereby obscuring the view of the apse; in the Christian basilica, on the contrary, the columnar arrangement is absent from the apsidal termination, its place being often supplied by the triumphal arch (v. Fig. 82). Thus was secured an uninterrupted view of the apse, which was the center of all religious interest, toward which all lines of the building converged and the thought of all worshippers was directed. Here was the throne of the bishop, who was supported on either side by his presbyters, while near at hand were the deacons ready for service. Facing the east the bishop officiated at the altar in front of his chair, while the attention of the entire congregation was concentrated on this point of supreme interest, without architectural hindrance. For this reason a class of writers have found the origin

¹ Schnaase: Op. cit., Bd. iii, s. 48. "The columns taken from buildings of the pagan period are very seldom entirely alike, but often of different materials and various dimensions. In order to have the height of the capitals equal, the columns which are too high are shortened or sunk into the earth; such as are too short are placed upon a higher base."

² For numerous authorities confirmatory of this statement see especially Kreuser: Christliche Kirchenbau, ss. 84-87.

The apse suggested by the tablinum.

was wont

Fig. 80.—Basilica from villa of Hadrian, Tivoli.

apse is rectangular with a breadth of more than sixteen feet. Another room connected with this villa is single-naved and terminates in a semicircular apse (Fig. 81).

In the heathen basilica the second story was usually a place of promenade from which the visitor gained a view of the business transacted on the ground floor. The columnar arrangement corresponded to that of the first floor. This is seen in the Basilica Sessoriana (Fig. 88), and in the palace of Diocletian of the apse in the cella of the burial chapels.¹ But it would seem to have an earlier suggestion in the tablinum of the private house, where the householder was wont to preside, and where, without doubt, was the seat of the officiating bishop during the period when Christian worship retained its household character. The fact that in a few structures the rectangular form of the apse, especially in its exterior outline, is still retained would seem to further strengthen this opinion.² This is seen in the basilica preserved in the ruins of the villa of Hadrian, at Tivoli (Fig. 80), whose

Fig. 81.—Basilica from villa of Hadrian, Tivoli.

¹ See the able article "Basilika" by Kraus in the Real-Encyclopädie der christlichen Alterthümer, pp. 118-120.

² v. Dehio: Die kirchliche Baukunst, 1te Lief., s. 336.

(Fig. 79), and seems to have been preserved in a few oblong Christian basilicas, as in the five-naved church St. Demetrius at Thessalonica (v. Fig. 100). But this was not the law governing the second story of the Christian church. Instead of a gallery for the free intercourse of visitors, or for promenade, as in the law basilicas, in the Christian churches above the first row of columns was usually a continuous wall whose upper part was pierced with windows for lighting the interior. By this construction opportunity was afforded for more extended decoration, as is noticed in Santa Maria Maggiore, San Apollinare in Classe, and other churches of the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. It hardly seems credible that so important a modification could have occurred suddenly on the transition of the Church from a condition of persecution to that of toleration. Rather, may not this wall expanse be but a slight modification of the essential features of the atrium displuviatum (Fig. 68), where the walls of the lower portions are changed to columns, while the upper portions are preserved as wall expanses? Also the arrangement of the roof of the three and five naved churches seems to be derived from the private house and the private basilica, rather than from the perfected law basilicas of Rome.

Moreover, the construction of the ceiling in the two classes of buildings was at times widely different. The heathen basilica very uniformly preserves a symmetrical division of the space into squares, with rosette ornaments. The ceiling of the main nave of the early Christian church, while sometimes adhering to this classical type,¹ more frequently consisted of open rafter-work and beams ornamented with gilt, bronze, and colors, to inspire the feeling of hope and aspiration² (San Pietro in Vaticano, see Fig. 92), or were of the cylindrically vaulted type, as in the churches of Egypt and Syria.

We therefore regard the oblong Christian basilica as a growth from elements with which the Church had been familiar during the first two and one half centuries of its varied history. The ordinary private dwelling-house, the triclinia of the more elegant houses of the nobler families that had embraced Christianity, the lodge-rooms, the cellæ of the burial chapels, and the imposing interior arrangement of colonnades in the heathen law basilicas, are the sources whence are derived the germs which, under the fostering and inspiring spirit of the new religion

¹ In Santa Maria Maggiore at Rome the ceiling is of later origin.

² Old San Pietro was a fine example of this open rafter-work. v. Schnaase: Op. cit., Bd. iii, ss. 48, 49.

This radical difference not suddenly realized.

The difference in ceiling construction.

Conclusion.

during periods of toleration and peace, were developed into a distinctively Christian architecture, whose chief characteristics continued for a thousand years.¹

§ 2. The Parts of the Basilica.

The adaptation of the basilica to Christian needs will appear from a more full description of its parts, and of the particular uses to which they were devoted.

The unifying power of the apse has already been noticed. The tendency of all lines of the building toward the semicircular niche was indicative of the concentration of attention on this focal point of interest to the worshipers. So, also, the transformations which we have already noticed show the supreme importance of the tribune and of its attendant parts. As the new wine of the Gospel could not be contained in the old bottles of Roman thought and life, so the Christian spirit was not content to simply enter into existing structures and use them for worship, but by its superior power it moulded these heathen elements into forms essentially new. The symbolic character of much of the ritual demanded fit means for its embodiment. From a general adaptation the basilica was adjusted in all its details to the needs of the church.

The simple semicircular recess of the pagan basilica was, in the Christian, elevated and covered by the conchoidal or vaulted roof; the altar was protected by a baldachin, supported by four columns, from whose under side, in the form of a dove descending upon the altar, hung the vessel containing the eucharistic elements. Somewhat further toward the middle nave a space was cut off from the rest of the building by railing for the use of the lesser clergy and the singers.² On the north side of this space stood the lectorium (ambo), or reading-desk, for the gospel; on the south side, that for the epistle. The apse and the triumphal arch were highly decorated; the pavement was wrought out in marble mosaic; the rafter work of the ceiling added picturesqueness to the interior space (v. Fig. 82). Following outward from the altar, the main nave was entered, at whose farther end doors led to the vestibule or entrance portico. In the earlier form, this vestibule was an open space bounded by rows of columns, in whose center stood ^{The vestibule.} the fountain (cantharus) for the purification of the entering worshippers (v. Fig. 83). In later structures this open space was covered, and became an appropriate spot for meditation and penitence, or was more thoroughly incorporated into the main structure, as in San Lorenzo (v. Fig. 94). The vestibule was always present in the eastern churches; in some of the western it was lacking. From this circumstance some writers have believed that in the portico were found traces of the Jewish spirit and influence.

¹ The conclusion reached by Konrad Lange, Haus und Halle, s. 323, "that the Edict of Milan is the determinate event for the introduction of the basilica form in place of the single-naved church which had before prevailed, and that the year 313 (and, in a broader sense, the year 323) is the birth-year of the Christian basilica, whose introduction is the monumental expression of the elevation of Christianity to be the religion of the state," seems to us untenable. It disregards the great law of historic development, and does not accord with the monumental and literary evidence.

² To aid in gaining a clearer conception of the parts of the basilica, consult Figs. 82 and 83.

Fig. 82.—Interior of San Clemente, Rome.

While a careful comparison of the Roman with the early Christian basilica reveals a general resemblance, there is an almost total want of likeness in the details, and in individual members of the buildings. In outline each old Roman basilica had a marked individuality; the oblong Christian basilicas, however, with wide liberty respecting minute details, have a stereotyped plan which controls the entire development.¹ So in the Christian basilica, the form, the garment, were Roman; but the dedication of the building to a distinct purpose, by making the sanctuary the central and controlling thought of the entire structure, caused it to lay aside the old and assume a new and distinctive character. The whole building now had a richer significance. From a tribunal of justice and place of business it became the house of the King of kings, the Victor over the world and the grave. This completes the transformation of the Roman into the Christian basilica. Now for the first time the earlier explanations of its meaning seem appropriate. It is now, indeed, the dwelling-place of the one eternal King—the only wise Lord God Almighty. The tribunal of the imperial prætor has lost its significance; it has now been transformed into the seat of concord and unity, where Christ, the Mediator, insures the truest and highest peace between God and man.²

Fig. 88.—Groundplan of San Clemente, Rome. Vestibule and Cantharus in front.

In the earlier and smaller basilicas the southern nave was usually set apart for the men, the northern for the women; in such cases the middle nave was occupied by the clergy for the responsive and choral service. In the more spacious and elegant basilicas this arrangement was no longer necessary, since the tribune itself was of sufficient capacity to accommodate all the officiating. In the western church the separation of the sexes gradually fell into disuse, but continued in the East.

The middle nave with its independent and loftier roof-construction, and the side naves with their lower ceilings and dependent roof, constitute a harmonious balancing of the parts. The side naves become the complementary numbers of the main nave right and left, as do the apse and the entrance portico in the direction of the length.

¹ Stockbauer: Der christliche Kirchenbau, s. 4.

² Messmer: Op. cit., p. 61.

The early Christian basilica impresses by its chaste yet noble simplicity; in it the student of delicate art sensibility may discover the germs of that richer and fuller development which was afterward realized in the Gothic cathedral. Here is seen ^{The problem} the solution of the most important problem of sacred ar- solved.

chitecture; namely, to develop the form through the influence of the religion whose rites were therein to be celebrated; in other words, to effect a harmony between the containing material and the contained and inspiring spirit.¹ This significant victory was achieved by the Christian religion. Herein is noticed the difference between the exterior of the Greek temple. Subjective truth and beauty are here shown to be of more worth than material splendor. Instead of passing from a perfect exterior to an unmeaning interior, the basilica obeys the law of all true development and growth in first invigorating and purifying the subjective spirit, and then, by virtue of the transforming power of truth, subordinating to this the exterior form.

Greek and the Christian idea of architecture.² The spir- ^{The Christian} itual significance of the interior of the Christian basilica ^{vs. the Greek} is in strong contrast with the imposing grandeur of the ^{spirit.}

It was not to be expected, therefore, that the somewhat conglomerate character of the earliest Christian basilica would remain unchanged. By degrees the heterogeneous elements disappeared, and from the original form was developed a new type of Christian architecture.

The most important departure from the fundamental form resulted from the introduction of the transept. ^{The later de-} The monotony caused by the long extent of unbroken space ^{velopment.}

in the naves was relieved by opposing to it the transept of equal height and breadth of the middle nave. This would furnish an appropriate termination to the longitudinal extension, and give to the sanctuary still greater dignity and impressiveness.

^{The transept.} The enlargement of the transept to the width of the entire church soon followed. At length the walls of the cross nave were projected beyond those of the main structure, giving to the foundation the form of the Latin cross.³ The transept thus became an intermediate member between the apse and the middle nave, and connected the sanctuary with the space occupied by the body of worshippers. At the place of intersection of the transept and main nave, a lofty arch, reaching from one wall to the other, spanned the intermediate space (see Fig. 81). This so called triumphal arch rested upon two columns at the terminus of the middle nave, and constituted a most important feature of the later and more elaborate basilicas. The spaces on the ceilings were generally ornamented with forms of Christ and his apostles, of saints and of angels wrought out in painting or rich mosaics, while imposing pictures of Christ usually filled the altar niche.¹ At a still later period the naves were intersected by two or more transepts. By this means two or more triumphal arches resulted, and an increased wall and ceiling surface was secured for more elaborate ornamentation. The wide departure from the simplicity of the early Christian basilica during the later mediæval period resulted in serious architectural decadence.

¹ Messmer: Op. cit., p. 63.

² "At all times the ruling idea in architectural art has been essentially determined by the prevailing position of religion in the general spiritual life of a people." v. Dehio: Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlandes, s. 15.

³ This is seen in the noted Basilica of St. Paul, and also in that of St. Peter's, at Rome. v. Fig. 92.

§ 3. The Influence of the Christian Basilica on other forms of Christian Architecture.

The parts of the basilica were brought into still more harmonious relations by means of the vaulted roof, while the whole was unified in idea by the sanctuary. This marks the further transition from the earlier form of the Christian basilica to the round-vaulted or Roman style of church architecture. The development of the basilica did not at first admit of the round-arched vaulting, but of that which resulted from the intersection of the main nave with the transept. The thrust or pressure upon the lateral walls was too great to allow of a cylindrical vaulting over the middle nave, except where these walls were of unusual thickness, whereas the arches resting upon the terminal columns of the middle nave, and extending diagonally to like columns or pilasters at the boundary of the apse, would distribute one half of the pressure from the imposed mass in the direction of the line of the wall (v. Fig. 84).² Thus the support of the triumphal arch would be secured without unduly increasing the thickness of the enclosing wall.

The intersection of the vaulted roof of the main nave with that of the transept necessarily so divided the space as to compel the use of the cross vaulting rather than the cylindrical. A like necessity to distribute the thrust of the supported roof in the direction of the series of columns led to the construction of diagonal ribbed arches, and the consequent transformation of the cylindrically vaulted ceiling into a series of cross-vaulted spaces, which mark the first stages in the development of Gothic architecture.¹

¹ v. Schnaase, Kugler, Quast, and others on this transformation.

² Messmer: Op. cit., pp. 77, 78.

Fig. 84.—Showing the development of the cross-ribbed arches, and distribution of the pressure.

Thus by successive changes and transformations the contradictions and incongruities of the early Christian basilica were removed, the various parts were brought more and more into harmony, until the richer, more complete, and glorious Gothic style was the final outcome of all the struggle of the preceding centuries.

In the simple basilica were contained those germs which, under the quickening influence of the Christian religion, developed into the style of architecture which may be called preeminently Christian, in which every minutest part equally with every necessary member finds its truest significance in being included in a richer and more complete organism. This is in exact accordance with the philosophy of the spiritual edifice "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone ; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord : in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. ii, 20-22) ; or of the bodily organism which suggested the other : "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free ; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. 1 Cor. 12, 13.

¹ Rudolph Wiegmann: Ueber den Ursprung des Spitzbogenstils, s. 28. A careful comparison of Figs. 84 and 86 with Figs. 91 and 95 will help to an adequate conception of the process of transformation from the early Christian basilica to the Gothic cathedral.

What the ancient basilica contained in itself as a possibility the Gothic cathedral realized in its rich efflorescence and crowning unity. This interior unity first appeared in the pointed arch, and in the architectural style which it originated. In the pointed style the basilica, which was the normal type of Christian architecture, was developed into the greatest beauty, the richest variety, yet the purest simplicity. The essential features of the original groundplan and outline were retained and brought to their highest possibilities. The longitudinal extension, and the tendency of the whole interior toward the sanctuary, were not changed, but rather found in the polygonal termination of the choir of the Gothic cathedral their structural unification and goal. The simple apse was transformed into the unifying choir; the vestibule was closely and constructively joined to the main and side naves, and as the supporting member of the towers it became the real entrance to the sanctuary, the point of transition from secular thought to genuine worship. Thus, in no way had the original portico been dispensed with, but by its completeness of development it became a constituent part of the structural whole. The threefold western entrance into the basilica was thus transformed into those enchanting portals which, by their deep oblique recesses and glorious crowning of gables, so greatly contributed to the majesty of the mediæval cathedral. The supporting and enclosing walls no longer constituted the essential mass of the structure, as in the original basilica. The wall is no longer continuous; the parts are bound together by opposing buttresses; while all is spiritualized and transfigured by the lofty painted windows in the main and side naves.¹ The columns, as well as the intervening pilasters, have now a deeper significance. The germinal form was circular. These, however, by the necessities of connecting the main and side naves, and of supporting the vaulted roof, were developed into polygonal or clustered forms (Fig. 85). On these rest the slender ribs that connect the ceiling with the wall. With this final connection of all parts of the ceiling structure by means of the ribs with pointed arch, was completed the interior unification, just as in the ancient gable-roof of the basilica was found the external completion of that building (v. Fig. 86). What at the beginning was only an architectural germ was thus developed into a rich, beautiful, and unified style. In this respect, therefore, is the basilica entitled to be called a Christian form, emphatically the Christian temple, since it has been unfolded by a living Christian principle to meet the wants of the Church in the celebration of its perfected worship. Just herein lies the triumph of Christianity. By interpenetrating indifferent foreign forms with its own spirit it developed a style of such perfect artistic harmonies that further improvement may well be despaired of. In this respect can Christian architecture be justly called original.

Further transformation.

¹ Messmer: Op. cit., p. 85.

Fig. 85.—A clustered column.

How far was the Christian basilica a creation?

§ 4. Some of the Earliest Christian Churches.

Unfortunately, not a single early Christian basilica has been preserved in its integrity. Numerous additions and transformations, which the misdirected zeal of princes and popes effected, have, in many instances, entirely destroyed the original features of these churches. Their reconstruction from the few remaining portions, from the meagre notices of early Christian writers, and from comparative studies, is a work of extreme difficulty. Even the remains of these early basilicas are few and questionable. Some fell into decay, others were destroyed by the enemies of Christianity,¹ while still others were superseded by more imposing edifices during the reigns of Constantine and his successors.

Few remains of pre-Constantine churches.

Ciampini² has given a very full description of the Basilica Siciniana as it remained in the seventeenth century. This was probably the most perfect example of a heathen basilica transformed into a Christian church³ whose description has been preserved. From Ciampini's drawings⁴ a good knowledge of the original form and decorations can be gained. The plans show an oblong, rectangular

¹ Especially during the Decian and Diocletian persecutions.

² Vetera Monimenta, Pars i, pp. 9, 10.

³ Probably San Andrea in Barbara.

⁴ Tab. xxi-xxv.

structure with a portico and broad apse, without interior columnar division; hence a single-naved basilica.¹ Its walls were adorned with mosaics and paintings which commemorated, as many believe, the triumph of Anthony. These mural decorations preclude the supposition that it was originally used for Christian purposes; but they plainly point to a Roman monument. It is believed to have been built by Junius Bassus, A. D. 317.² The mosaics of the apse were introduced after its dedication as a Christian church. A. D. 470.

Fig. 86.—A Gothic Interior. To show the unification of the supporting and supported members.

¹ de Vogüé: Syrie Centrale, plate 67, gives the groundplan of a similar church in Bahonda. It is from the fifth century.

² Dehio: Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlandes, p. 82.

Another original private basilica was San Clemente, at Rome.

In the ninth century Pope John VIII. introduced the marble balustrades of the presbyterium, together with the chancels, high altar, and seats. Excavations¹ show that the present church is a reduction of a larger one, which, in turn, stood partly upon a very ancient wall of binding masonry of tufa (possibly from the time of the kings), and partly upon a brick wall that probably belonged to the dwelling-house of Clement himself (v. Figs. 82, 83, and 87). This foundation furnishes a good example of the form of the private Roman basilica.²

A third example is the church of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, in Rome. At the request of Helena, mother of Constantine, the pagan Basilica Sessoriana was changed, as tradition says, into a depositary for a piece of the true cross. This building (Figs. 88 and 89) is three-naved, and preserves more nearly than others the peculiar features of the Roman law basilica. The galleries, from which a view of the lower floor could be had through the spaces between the columns, are conformable to the original type, and the

Fig. 87.—San Clemente, Rome. Groundplan, showing variety of structures.

Fig. 88.—Cross-section of Basilica Sessoriana, or Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, Rome.

At the request of Helena, mother of Constantine, the pagan Basilica Sessoriana was changed, as tradition says, into a depositary for a piece of the true cross. This building (Figs. 88 and 89) is three-naved, and preserves more nearly than others the peculiar features of the Roman law basilica. The galleries, from which a view of the lower floor could be had through the spaces between the columns, are conformable to the original type, and the equal height of the ceiling of the main and side naves also suggests its pagan origin. According to the restorations, as given by Hübsch (Fig. 89), the vestibule was decorated with six columns; the apse was of unusual breadth, reaching almost to the outer enclosing walls, leaving only a narrow passage-way to rooms at the extremity of the church; the outer boundary walls were rectangular, thus giving no suggestion of the spacious semicircular apse within.

¹ v. de Rossi: Bullettino Arch. crist., April, 1863.

² The single-lined parts of Fig. 86 give the form of the original church; the double-lined represent the old tufa wall from the time of the kings; the black portions show the remains of the Clementine palace, while the blank outline is the modern church.

Fig. 89.—Groundplan of Fig. 88.

Among the very earliest and most noteworthy monuments of Christian architecture, Hübsch¹ ranks the Church of Santa Pudenziana, at Rome. Its traditions reach back to the apostolic times. It is said that the senator Pudens lodged the apostle Peter in his palace on this very site, that his sons built baths therein, and that at the earnest request of St. Prexedes, Pope Pius I., about A. D. 145, in honour of St. Pudenziana, converted this palace and the baths into a Christian church, under the title of SS. Pastor and Pudens.²

Without being able to account for all the motives, it is plain that the transformation of a secular building into a place of Christian worship lay at the foundation of this tradition.³ The opinion expressed by Hübsch that this refers only to the small chapel of the church, Santa Pudenziana, in which, at present, the altar of St. Peter is pointed out, is entitled to respectful attention.⁴ This church (Fig. 90)⁵ is an oblong parallel-

¹ Altchristliche Kirchen, Carlsruhe, 1862, fol., s. 6, taf. vii, viii. de Rossi has examined this church with much care, and has also traced the argument for its great age. v. Bullettino crist., 1864, 1867, 1869, 1875.

² v. J. H. Parker: The House of Pudens in Rome, in Archæological Journal, vol. xxviii, 1871, pp. 42, 43.

³ Stockbauer: Der christliche Kirchenbau, s. 48.

⁴ Op. cit., s. 7.

⁵ The dark lines mark the boundary of the church; the other lines are the outline of vaulted rooms adjacent, and very ancient.

ogram, of about the same size as the Basilica Siciniana (San Andrea in Barbara). It has been made ugly through recent restorations. The interior is three naved with a portico. The vaulted space behind the apse is very ancient, also the before-mentioned chapel, whose apse appears to be connected with the wall of an ancient foundation which belongs to the best period of Roman architecture. With little doubt it may be regarded as a portion of the ancient senatorial palace.¹ The side naves were one-storied, whose roof was a lean-to, but which, by the unusual elevation of the enclosing wall, became nearly equal in height to that of the middle nave. In front of the present entrance is found a very ancient portal with twisted columns. The shafts of the columns bounding the middle nave, of dark gray marble, have been taken from some ancient monument, while the capitals and bases seem to have been wrought out expressly for their present use.² For the study of the original derivation and structure of the Christian basilica this church is of first importance. Its arrangement enables the archæologist to distinguish the changes which pagan buildings underwent to adapt them to the purposes of Christian worship. The resemblance of the apse of this church to that of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme is most striking and suggestive (v. Fig. 89).

Fig. 90.—Groundplan of Santa Pudenziana, Rome.

Perhaps the most perfectly preserved monument of a pre-Constantine Christian basilica is the crypt of Santa Maria in Cosmedin. It seems to have been built within the enclosure of an ancient heathen temple. It is certain that the present church, founded by Hadrian I. in the eighth century, and enlarged and beautified by Calixtus II. in the twelfth, contains several parts of the original building. Noteworthy are eight fluted columns, which are clearly of antique origin. The pre-Constantine portion is subterranean, having a length of thirty-four palms (Roman) and a breadth of seventeen palms. The smooth, vaulted ceiling of large blocks of travertine¹ rests immediately upon capitals whose rudeness proves them to be of different origin from the shafts themselves. The six columns of marble and granite, standing in the nave and aisles, were evidently taken from the temple on whose site the basilica was built. In the wall are seen small niches, resembling a columbarium,² which were used, as the learned Crescimbeni conjectures, as places of prayer and meditation. This church was built, it is believed, as early as the third quarter of the third century by Dionysius, Bishop of Rome. Its severe simplicity of style and arrangement, as well as its high antiquity, give to it the greatest importance among Christian art antiquities.³ The suggestions it furnishes with respect to the activity of the Church and the toleration of the Roman government prior to the Christian emperors are most valuable.

¹ Stockbauer: Op. cit., s. 49.

² Stockbauer: Op. cit., ss. 48, 49.

§ 5. Basilicas of Roman Origin in the Time of Constantine.

Amid the conflicting opinions respecting the character of Constantine, and the motives which influenced him to make Christianity the religion of the Roman state, there is more substantial agreement respecting the wonderful influence of his conversion on the fortunes of the Christian Church, on its doctrine, polity, and life. In many important respects his reign was epoch-making: the more profoundly it is studied the more clearly do the high, statesmanlike qualities of this great ruler appear. He may justly take rank among a score of noted men whose influence has been indelibly impressed upon human history, since his clearly conceived policy affected the fortunes of the Christian Church for a thousand years.

To what extent remorse for the fearful crimes of which he was guilty, in causing the death of Crispus, of young Licinius, and of his own wife, Fausta, may have influenced Constantine to favor the Church and to encourage the building of basilicas, may not be known. The donation of the Lateran palace to the Roman bishops, the building of St. Peter's, and the pilgrimage of Helena, the stricken, suffering mother, to Jerusalem, and the erection of the basilicas at Bethlehem, Jerusalem, and on Olivet, where tradition had located the three most important events in the life of Christ, appear to have been nearly coincident with these crimes which were perpetrated during his last visit to Rome. Our subject is more directly concerned with the fact that from this time Christian art received remarkable encouragement from the emperor.

¹ Förster: Mittel u. Unter Italien, s. 264.

² Förster: Id. l. c.

³ Hemans: Ancient Christianity and Sacred Art, pp. 8, 9.

From the Church of the catacombs to be the Church of the empire was an unparalleled transition. Yet even such a change could but slowly and gradually transform the prevalent fashions and tastes. It is generally true that "institutions lag behind the circumstances that furnish opportunity for their growth and development." The social, moral, and political inertia ^{The transformation gradual.} of an age prevents it from immediately leaping to the embrace of all its possibilities. Hence history furnishes few violent catastrophes. Even barbarian invasions can bring but partial ruin, and the resistance to change which is inherent in the race causes an ebb and flow in human affairs rather than a destructive cataclysm. Architecture likewise obeyed this general law. Here, too, transitions were gradual. The opportunities and demands for more impressive forms of religious service, and the greater numbers that from various motives now crowded the places of worship, created a need for further changes in the interior of the buildings already dedicated to Christian uses, and furnished the occasion for the new and imposing structures erected during the Constantinian and post-Constantinian period. Here, too, the needs of worship, ^{imposing} and not the demands of art, begat the fundamental churches. form.¹ Its origin is, therefore, due to the religious feeling and to the spirit of worship, rather than to the æsthetic feeling.² In the readjustment of the existing churches, as well as in those newly erected, the Christian artists of the fourth century were unconsciously planning a building that would, through the efforts of succeeding centuries, be developed into the glory and perfection of ecclesiastical architecture.

At first the oblong rectangular basilica was extended throughout the whole empire. Not until the fifth century did the central system give rise to any imposing churches, while the distinctively Byzantine did not reach its full development ^{little from Constantine's time survives.} till the sixth. The west, however, adhered closely to the basilica type for a thousand years. Rome furnishes the best examples; unfortunately, however, of the many churches built during the reign of Constantine little has been preserved.

The most trustworthy accounts lead us to believe that during the first five centuries more than a hundred churches were built in Rome and its immediate vicinity. The originality of these ^{Lack of originality.} structures was at first very slender. The appropriation of pagan structures to Christian worship, and the use of columns and ready prepared materials for building new churches, was not favorable to original production. At first the new spiritual life only Decay of the sanctified what was at hand. The four hundred temples heathen tem- that had so long been a stumbling-block to the purity ples and wor- ship. of the Church, and whose rites must have caused deep regret to the followers of Christ, became nearly empty and forsaken.

¹ Schnaase: Op. cit., 2te, Ausgabe, Bd. iii, s. 53.

² Rosengarten: Handbook of Architectural Styles, p. 170.

 Upon their ruins were to arise "the houses of the Lord." "During one portion of her history Rome was as a defiling, putrefying corpse; during an equal period she renewed her youth. Thus she had a double being in the history of humanity, whose capital she was twice called to be."¹

From historic notices we must believe that, of all these churches, San Pietro in Vaticano, built upon the site of the circus of Nero, was the most imposing (Figs. 91, 92). It was five-naved, with a straight entablature. The naves were of unequal

Fig. 91.—San Pietro in Vaticano, Rome. Front elevation.

height, the ceiling was finished with open rafter-work; the roof of the side naves
 abutted against the wall of the main nave so that it was continuous above both the side naves. The height of the ceiling of the side naves was determined by the slant of the roof. This church was thoroughly renovated and greatly enlarged in the ninth century, and continued to be the most conspicuous example of an early Christian basilica until it was supplanted at the beginning of the sixteenth century by the present imposing church of St. Peter's. It was also cruciform, being about 351 feet long, and about 190 feet broad, the middle nave being over 70 feet wide. The twenty-three columns on each side of the middle nave were 26 feet 7 inches high.²

In many parts of the structure were unmistakable proofs of the practice of incorporating heathen handicraft into Christian temples. The particolored fragments placed in the walls showed the lack of competent artists to guide the ¹ Gregorovius: Geschichte der Stadt Rom im Mittelalter, Bd. i, ss. 5, 6.

² Platner u. Ulrichs: Die Basiliken d. christlichen Rom, TT. i-iii. Platner u. Bunsen: Beschreibung der Stadt Rom, Bd. ii, s. 50, seq. Kugler: Geschichte der Baukunst, Bd. i, c. 384.

Fig. 82.—Cross-section of San Pietro in Vincoli, Rome, showing nave, pier-work, mosaic decorations, etc.

taste of Christians in the ornamentation of their public buildings. Figure 92 also shows the arrangement of the triumphal arch and of the sanctuary, together with the method of ornamentation with mosaics, etc. From the notices that have been preserved it is believed that in front of the church proper was a vestibule, or atrium, which was enclosed by a peristyle. In the center of this enclosed space was the fountain, around which were seats for the use of those who kept the burial feasts when funeral rites were celebrated. A description of such feasts in his time has been given by Paulinus of Nola. The arrangement very closely corresponds to that found at the entrance to the Catacomb of Domitilla, before referred to (v. pp. 175, 175), and has an almost exact counterpart in the pagan schola. Fig. 93 is the representation of a schola from the republican period. It is known as the Atrium of Sylvanus, discovered on the Appian Way. It has the portico, the fountain in the center of the enclosed square, and the stone benches running around the walls, which could be used by those who celebrated the burial feasts.¹

Fig. 93.—Atrium of Sylvanus, Via Appia, Rome.

Another interesting church of its day was San Giovanni in Laterano, otherwise known as the Basilica Constantiniana or in Laterano. Salvatoris. It is doubtful whether any portion of the original survives in the modern gorgeous building. Some have claimed that the octagonal baptistery, with its eight antique porphyry columns, belongs to the age of Constantine; but more probably this was erected by Sixtus III. about the year A. D. 432. From every account of the historians this Lateran palace, which had belonged to Fausta, was the gift of the great emperor to the Bishop of Rome. The palace and church of the Lateran, rather than St. Peter's and the Vatican, became the center of Christian and papal Rome. This, and not St. Peter's, was the cathedral church where all the Roman councils have been held.² It was the early residence of the Roman pontiffs, and is still the place where they are enthroned and crowned.³

¹ Canina: Via Appia, t. 42, p. 174.

² The Vatican Council assembled by Pius IX. is an exception.

³ v. Stanley: History of the Eastern Church, Lecture vi.

On the Ostian Way just outside the city walls, over the spot where tradition says the pious matron Lucina had prepared in the subterranean passages on her estate a grave San Paolo fuori de la Mura. for St. Paul, Constantine had built a small basilica.¹ It was soon after (probably near the close of the fourth century) displaced by the magnificent basilica of St. Paul—the San Paolo fuori de la mura of a later day—which, notwithstanding numerous restorations, retained many of its original features till its destruction by fire in 1823. Fortunately full descriptions and plans of this noble monument have been preserved, from which an adequate notion of it may be gained. It was five-naved with a transept, three hundred and ninety-two feet long and two hundred and two feet wide. The middle nave was seventy-eight feet wide. Round arches connected the rows of twenty columns separating the Description. naves. The columns bounding the main nave well illustrate the methods of church construction after Christianity had become the religion of the state: they were thirty-two feet high. Twenty-four of the most beautiful, of Corinthian order, were taken from some building belonging to the best period of Roman architecture. The others were of very inferior workmanship.² Those in the side naves, seemingly prepared expressly for this church, mark the sad decadence of art in the time of Constantine and of his immediate successors. Prudentius informs us that the ceiling was decorated with gilt rafter-work.³

Reference has already been made (p. 197) to the motives of Constantine in building votive churches on the sacred sites in Palestine. He aimed to conciliate the East, which he had conquered from his rival Licinius. Special privileges and aid for church building were granted to the bishops of the most influential dioceses in Asia Minor and Syria. Notices of many of these have been preserved by Christian writers, especially by Eusebius and Prudentius, and the ruins of a few still remain to attest their magnificence. Of the beautiful basilica built by Paulinus at Troy, and described by Eusebius,⁴ nothing survives. So, also, with the Church of the Holy Sepulcher at Jerusalem, and the Church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives. Fortunately, the church at Bethlehem, built over the cave where tradition locates The Church of the Nativity. the birthplace of the Saviour, has partially survived. It seems fairly established that most of the present structure is

¹ Förster: Mittel u. Unter Italien, s. 275.

² H. Gally Knight, vol. i, plate iv.

³ Peristephanon, Hymn xii.

⁴ Hist. Eccles., lib. x, cap. iv. v. Quast: Die alt-christlichen Baumerk von Ravenna, ss. 29, 30.

original. It is five-naved, with Corinthian columns supporting a straight entablature on which rests the wall. On it outlines of earlier paintings can still be traced.¹ At the end of the naves are a spacious transept, choir, and apses, well lighted by a series of windows in the upper part of the church. One is immediately carried back to such a Roman basilica as was built by Constantine for

A good example of the basilica. Christian worship, but which by being developed and transformed became the point of departure for the religious architecture of the subsequent centuries.²

Few visitors to this venerable building are not deeply impressed by its noble art and massive grandeur. It stands as a mute yet eloquent witness to the power of the religion whose spirit yet finds expression in this monument which has survived the rude shocks of fifteen centuries.

§ 6. Some Basilicas of the Post-Constantine Period.

The establishment of two independent empires, each having its own capital, gave opportunity for the development of each in harmony with its own peculiar genius. While originally receiving its inspiration from the East, the Latin soon became more purely and intensely Latin; the East, the mother of all, became more and more Oriental. These contrasts reveal themselves alike in State and Church. The Byzantine empire degenerated into an Oriental absolutism; the West steadily developed a practical and efficient constitutionalism. The Greek Church was content with immobility in doctrinal and political forms; the West was ever agitated by earnest struggles respecting life, doctrine, and polity. The practical mind of the West aimed to keep institutions abreast with the growing spirit of freedom among the people; the speculative spirit of the East was often content to exhaust itself in controversies whose effect was scarcely felt beyond the local church or the cloister.

A like contrast is noted in the art of the two empires. Each pursued its own chosen course of development, and each alike was influenced by the different conditions of social, political, and religious life. The West soon felt the modifying power of the invading tribes, while the East produced its peculiar art forms almost uninfluenced by its neighbours. Ravenna formed a middle ground where, through the patronage of remarkable rulers, the Teutonic spirit, modifying both the Eastern and the Western thought, produced some most interesting and instructive architectural monuments.

¹ Lützow und Lübke: Denkmäler der Kunst, Stuttgart, 1879, Text, s. 116.

² De Vogüé: Les Églises de la Terra Sainte, Paris, 1860, ch. ii.

Excepting the temporary interference by Julian, Christianity in the West enjoyed the patronage and protection of government. Although it was a period of serious art decadence, the churches increased in number and splendour. The decline of the old faith and the increasing spread of the new contributed to these results. The pagan temples were transformed into Christian basilicas, while new churches rose upon sites made sacred by the ashes of saints and martyrs. The untrammelled spirit of Christianity now further modified the basilica, and fashioned it into forms fit for the expression of the sublimest truths. Herein is the significance of Christianity in the art history of this period. Although on the one hand a decaying and on the other an embryo art contributed to their construction, these Christian basilicas produced, in the main, a sublime and inspiring effect, which is chiefly attributable to the beautiful simplicity of their essential features.¹

The reign of Constantine was characterized by an abounding splendour and luxury in court-dress and equipage. Its magnificence also appears in the buildings of his reign and those of his successors. But this spirit did not at first so much effect a change in the form of the basilicas as in the extent and magnificence of their decorations and furniture.

Of the churches of the fourth century still preserved in Rome, Santa Maria Maggiore is among the richest and most instructive.² It was originally built in A. D. 352, and renewed in A. D. 432. It is believed to be the first church dedicated to the Virgin. It is two hundred and sixty-two feet long and ninety-nine broad. Notwithstanding many attempts to modernize it, it still retains parts of the original structure. Its imposing ranks of columns, well-preserved ancient mosaics, and horizontal entablature make it most notable among the churches of Rome. Its ceiling follows the classical rather than the early Christian style—being divided into squares and ornamented with rosettes rather than finished in rafter and timber work.

Santa Maria in Trastevere disputes with Santa Maria Maggiore the honor of being the first church dedicated to the Virgin. If we are to accept the tradition, very early and resting upon some foundation, it was first founded in A. D. 340, while Santa Maria Maggiore was built twelve years later. Among the most interesting features of the interior are the twenty-two granite columns which divide the church into three naves. They are of different heights and thickness, and surmounted with capitals of different styles, on which are wrought out figures of Jupiter, Juno, and other gods of the Grreeks. This arrangement illustrates the entire freedom with which the Church of the fourth century incorporated into its houses of worship materials already at hand.

¹ Rosengarten: Architectural Forms, p. 170.

² Bunsen: Basiliken d. ch. Roms, tt. ix, x. Förster: Mittel u. Unter Italien, ss. 264, 265. Kugler: Geschichte d. Baukunst, Bd. i, s. 386. H. Gally Knight: The Ecclesiastical Buildings of Italy. Valentini: La Patriarcale Basilica Liberiana.

Portions of several basilicas of the fifth century remain, whose peculiarities are interesting and important in the history of ecclesiastical architecture. Among the most noteworthy in the West is Santa Sabina. Santa Sabina, believed to have been founded in the first quarter of the century. It is the best example of the original basilica that has survived. It, too, has twenty-two antique columns of pagan origin. They are of remarkable beauty, having Attic bases, Corinthian capitals, and somewhat slender shafts, fluted through one third of their length. A very considerable portion of the pavement belonging to the original structure is still preserved.¹

Fig. 94.—San Lorenzo fuori le mura. Showing arrangement of vestibule and roof.

Of considerable architectural importance is the church San Lorenzo fuori le mura (v. Fig. 94). It was begun in the fourth century, but underwent many changes in the sixth and thirteenth centuries. It is a good representative of the class of Christian churches which preserved the side galleries in the second story, in imitation of the peculiar feature of the pagan law basilica (v. Fig. 95). This was not, as we have already seen, introduced into the earliest churches, since, instead of a gallery, the walls bounding the middle nave were continuous to the roof, thus affording greater space for interior decoration.¹ To the same class belongs Santa Agnese fuori le mura (Fig. 95), built, according to the tradition, by Constantine above the catacombs where the remains of St. Agnes were found. The side galleries in the second story are well preserved in this church also.

¹ Bunsen: Basiliken der christlichen Roms, t. viii, B. Förster: Mittel u. Unter Italien, ss. 284, 285.

Fig. 95.—Santa Agnese fuori le mura. Interior view.

Another extra mural church of the fourth century is Santa Sinfiorosa, nine miles from the city gates. It is of special interest, as illustrating the growth of important churches of the basilica form from cellæ, beneath which the bones of martyrs were supposed to rest. It has been elsewhere stated that the burial feasts were celebrated in or near these cellæ, or in exedrae, and that where sites were of especial sacredness multitudes were accustomed to leave the city to engage in these festivals. To accommodate the increasing numbers the simple cella in time expanded to the imposing church, and the services assumed a character of dignity and impressive grandeur. The exploration of Santa Sinforosa revealed the existence of a cella, of the usual from, From a burial chapel.

¹ Dehio und Bezold: Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlandes, text, ss. 107, 108; taf. 16, 4. Bunsen: Op. cit., tt. xii, xiii, xiv. Förster: Op. cit., ss. 257, 258.

lying directly back of the apse of the basilica, and connected with it by a passage-way (v. Fig. 95). It is believed that this basilica originated in the manner above indicated, and that it was especially hallowed by its immediate proximity to the resting-place of St. Sinforosa and her seven sons.¹

Fig. 96. — Groundplan of Santa Sinforosa.

Like the churches of San Lorenzo, Santa Agnese, and Santa Sinforosa, so, also, are the two most important basilicas of Rome — San Pietro in Vaticano, and San Paoli fuori le mura—believed to have originated in sacred shrines outside the city walls. Of the fifth century is also San Pietro in vin- San Pietro in vincoli.

coli, a three-naved basilica, with flat ceiling of wood, and with twenty antique columns of finest Parian marble, whose severe Doric style gives to the interior an air of impressive simplicity.

Outside of Rome are found remains of several churches of the basilica type of architecture from the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Ravenna is among the most rich and instructive centers. It is a favorable circumstance that their complete history is found in the Biographies of the Bishops Good historic and monumental evidence.

of Ravenna, by Agnellus.² These churches have more fully preserved their original form than those of Rome or Constantinople, where the unwise zeal of succeeding popes, patriarchs, or emperors has in many instances modified nearly every feature of the original structure. It is, therefore, highly important to understand the nature and teachings of these architectural monuments.

Compared with those of Rome, the oblong basilica churches of Ravenna had usually a very simple ground plan. They were mostly three-naved, without transept or galleries. Simple in outline.

¹ Bullettino cristiano, 1878, p. 75. G. Baldwin Brown: From Schola to Cathedral, pp. 64, 65. Delio und Bezold: Op. cit., text, s. 104; taf. 17, 2.

² v. Quast: Die alt-christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna.

In contrast with most of the ancient churches of Rome, they seem to have been built of materials specially prepared for them. Instead of the curious conglomeration of styles in the columns, with respect to order, diameter, and height, and of the materials of the buildings, in Ravenna a general harmony and consistency are noticed.¹ The style is, therefore, more distinct, Generally harmonious. and the stage of architectural development more clearly marked. The interior arrangement is likewise simple and harmonious. The architrave is entirely wanting, the entablature being uniformly supported by the round arch. The capitals do not immediately support the arches, but are crowned with an abacus (v. Fig. 99). The tribune is generally well defined and carefully decorated. In marked contrast with modern churches, the exterior was simple and undorned, the material being usually brick.

Quast² divides the Christian architectural monuments of Ravenna into four periods. The first extends from the introduction of Christianity to the downfall of the Western Empire in A. D. 476; the second from the Roman downfall to the death of Theodoric, A. D. 476-526; the third from the death of Theodoric to the death of the Archbishop Agnellus, A. D. 526-566; the fourth period from the death of Agnellus to the termination of art activity in Ravenna—A. D. 566 to about A. D. 900. Kugler³ divides into three periods, corresponding to the three chief periods of the history of the city. To the first period belongs the cathedral church of the town, the Ecclesia Ursiana, which was built near the beginning of the fifth century. Unfortunately, on its reconstruction at the beginning of the eighteenth century the original structure was totally destroyed. Yet, from trustworthy notices that have been preserved, we learn that it was a five-naved basilica, which preeminence it enjoyed with only three of the most noted churches of Rome. Certain expressions of Agnellus lead us to believe that the entire church area was covered with a vaulted ceiling. It was originally dedicated to the resurrection of Christ. Its pavements and walls were adorned First period. Ecclesia Ursiana. Its decorations. with costly marbles and rich mosaics. The arrangement of the choir resembled that of San Clemente at Rome.⁴ The surviving baptisterium is elsewhere described.

¹ v. Quast: Op. cit., s. 44. Kugler: Op. cit., Bd. i, s. 394.

² Die alt-christlichen Bauwerken von Ravenna, ss. 2, 17, 27, 40

³ Geschichte der Baukunst, Bd. i, s. 395.

⁴ Quast: Die alt-christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna, Berlin, 1842, s. 2. Dehio und Bezold: Op. cit., Taf. 17, Fig. 4. D'Agincourt: Pl. lxx, Fig. 21.

To the same period belongs Santa Agata, a three-naved church closely conforming to the typical oblong basilica, yet possessing little of special interest.

Santa Agata.

The period of civil commotion following the death of Valentinian III. was unfavorable to the patronage of ecclesiastical art. The fearful inroads of Attila and Odoacer had brought destruction in their pathway until the triumph of the Ostro-

Second period.

gothic king, Theodoric, in A. D. 495. This remarkable ruler restored to Italy a measure of the prosperity enjoyed before her desperate struggles with the barbarians. Though unlettered, he was a patron of learning, and greatly beautified Ravenna and other cities of his realm by the erection of many new churches. His task was one of extreme difficulty. An Ostro-

The policy of Theodoric.

gothic king, he must not only reconcile the two fiercely contending peoples, but also pacify the orthodox and Arian parties in the Church. The Gothic tribes had largely embraced the Arian doctrine, and Theodoric was himself its defender. His nobility of character is shown in his carefully refraining from persecution of opponents, and by granting to the orthodox party the privilege of building and owning their own churches, and of using their own confession of faith and forms of worship. The architectural interest of his reign is connected very largely with the churches of the Arian party, some of which were built outside the walls of the city, and some at the port of Classe. Several within the city have been preserved to our time, and constitute an interesting group of ecclesiastical monuments. Among the most noted is San Apollinare Nuovo, formerly called Basilica San Apollinare San Martini in cælo aureo, so named from its great splendour. It was connected directly with the royal palace, and seems to have been regarded as specially the court church.¹

His tolerant spirit.

Fig. 97.—San Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna, showing interior structure and decoration.

The exterior of the upper part of the middle nave has been preserved entire. The same style of round arch, built of brick, which we have before met in the churches of the first period (as in Santa Agata), is here repeated. The columns of the interior (v. Fig. 97) have Corinthian capitals with a square abacus quite in the Byzantine style.¹

¹ Quast: Op. cit., s. 19, Taf. vii, Fig. 1, 2, 3, 4. Dehio und Bezold: Taf. 16, Fig. 5. D'Agiucourt: Plate xvii, 17-22.

The splendid churches built by the Catholic party belong properly to the third period. The most noted had been commenced during the Gothic supremacy, but were finished and decorated at a later date. For the most part they were no longer constructed under the direction of kings and rulers, but of the ecclesiastics who held allegiance to Constantinople. From this time, therefore, the Byzantine influence is much more pronounced in the buildings of Ravenna.

The Christian archæologist, in search of new illustrations of the life and vigor of the early Church, meets few more impressive monuments than the Basilica of San Apollinare in Classe. During the three-mile walk from Ravenna to Classe amid scenes so full of historic and literary interest, the memories of events decisive in the world's history troop before the visitor like specters from the entombed generations. This church stands out in its solitariness, the sole survivor of all the edifices that crowded the busy port of Classe, where Augustus moored his conquering fleets. Its tower still stands to point the faith of men to the Author of a religion that shall never know decay, while beneath it sleeps the dust of forty generations.

Fig. 98.—San Apollinare in Classe.

¹ For description of mosaics see pp. 125, 127. Fig. 97 gives a good idea of the construction of the columns, the form of arches, the rich mosaic decorations of the entablature, etc.

Even to the portico, the building remains in all its original integrity.

The interior. Only a portion of the marble which lined the interior walls has been removed (v. Fig. 99). It is a three-naved basilica with elevated choir, to which lead stairs of the entire breadth of the middle nave. It is one hundred and eighty-six feet long and one hundred feet broad, having on either side twelve tapering columns of Grecian marble with Corinthian capitals.¹

The furniture, altar, etc., are still preserved. The original mosaics in the tribune (v. Fig. 99) and on the side walls remain etc. in all their freshness to tell the story of the religious thought of the sixth century. On the beautiful frieze above the columns bounding the middle nave is a series of mosaic medallions (v. Fig. 99) of the bishops of this church from the time of St. Apollinarius. They are most noteworthy. The capitals of the columns, as of the pilasters, have much value and interest in the history of architectural development, since they are the first examples of an ornamentation which was subsequently widely diffused.²

Fig. 99.—San Apollinare in Classe. Interior view.

Exterior construction. The exterior of the church is of brick, whose joints of mortar are nearly as thick as the bricks themselves. The vestibule, apparently contemporary with the main structure, is of great interest from containing the remains of many successive bishops of this church. In San Apollinare in Classe, in common with several other churches of Ravenna, a growing External beau- attention to exterior beauty and harmony is noticed. ty.

¹ Förster: Mittel u. Unter Italien, ss. 389, 390. Quast: Op. cit., ss. 34–37, Taf. ix. D'Agincourt: Plates lxxviii and lxxix. Dehio und Bezold: Op. cit., Taf. 16, Fig. 8.

² Quast: Op. cit., s. 35, taf. ix, Figs. 3, 4.

Previously the basilicas had very broad and open windows; a construction unfavourable to the support of the heavy weight resting on the architraves; but when the round arch was generally introduced this difficulty no longer existed. The windows were The windows. made narrower, the light admitted became less and less, until the passion for "a dim religious light" led to the entire absence of windows in the upper part of the middle nave.

Of much interest are the cathedral church of Novara, from the sixth century, and the cathedral of Parenzo, in Istria, Cathedrals of Novara and Parenzo. from the seventh. They are distinguished by having a forecourt and a baptistery very closely incorporated into their architectural structure. This feature is believed by Hübsch to have been first introduced during the sixth century. The latter church has been well preserved, is rich in mosaics and Mosaics. paintings, and retains the original marble pavement in the middle nave. While the mosaics of the façade are weather-beaten and much faded, from their outlines a fair idea of their subjects and style of treatment can be gained.

In the non-European lands are still preserved many examples of the oblong rectangular basilica, whose original may be St. Reparatus. traced from the fourth century down. Prominent among these is the Basilica Reparatus, discovered on the site of the ancient Castellum Tingitanum (the modern Orleansville), in Algiers.¹ It was a five-naved church with semicircular apse which projected toward the middle of the church, thus forming rooms on either side, while the exterior boundaries of the church were straight lines.²

Ruins of like churches are also found at Tafaced (Colonia Tipæsa), at Annuna, etc. Farther toward the East, at the old port of Apollonia, three ruined basilicas have been found, whose art remains are interesting for showing the commingling of Christian and Egyptian symbolism.³ Also in many parts of Egypt ruins of In Egypt, also. these early Christian churches of the basilica form are still met. They are not confined to the cities nor to the Nile valley, but are found on oases in the Lybian desert, as at El-Hayz, El-Gabuat, and El-Zabu.

¹ For the chronology of this church see p. 33, note 2.

² The form of this apse is very similar to that of San Croce in Gerusalemme, Fig. 81.

³ Kugler: Geschichte der Baukunst, Bd. i, ss. 373, 374. These have been well described by H. Barth, in his Journeys through the Coastlands of the Mediterranean.

In the Nile valley, extending far south, churches of the fourth and fifth centuries still preserve many very interesting ^{Extensively} and instructive features. Their number and size, their ^{diffused in the} Nile valley. rich art remains, their connection in some instances with extended convents and religious communities, are confirmatory evidence of the widespread influence of Christianity among the Egyptian peoples, while their peculiar architectural features seem to furnish some foundation for the theory that Egypt was the native home of the basilica, being appropriated by the Greeks, and then, in modified form, becoming a ruling type in the West-Roman Empire.

Also the church of St. Demetrius (Fig. 100), at Thessalonica (modern Salonika), belongs to the fifth century. It is a five-naved structure with a transept. It departs, in some respects, quite widely from the usual basilica form. The spaces between the columns are spanned by semicircular arches surmounted by an entablature covered with paintings. Above this is a second row of columns with a like entablature, and above this a third, in which are the windows for lighting the interior. Like many of the conspicuous churches of the Orient, it is now a Mohammedan mosque.¹

Fig. 100.—St. Demetrius, Thessalonica. Cross section.

Contemporary with St. Demetrius is another church of Salonika, now called the mosque Eski-Djouma. It is three-naved with a transept, and its general features are similar to those of St. Demetrius.

Of still greater interest are the churches of central Syria. These ^{Central Syria.} have been made better known through the diligent re- searches of the Count de Vogtlié.² It is evident from his discoveries that during the fifth and sixth centuries, while the West was in a condition of disruption and fearful decadence, Christian art in Syria was in a state of unwonted activity. The number of churches, the chaste simplicity of their style, and their close adherence to the oblong basilica type, argue a period of peace and of remarkable prosperity of the Church. Prior to the fourth century little survives, but from the fourth to the seventh the Christian architectural monuments are almost innumerable,¹ being built in great measure of materials already at hand. "We are transported," says de Vogüé, "into the midst of a Christian society. We are surprised at its life: not the covert, hidden life of the catacombs, not an existence humble, timid, suffering, is here generally represented, but a life generous, rich, artistic; spacious houses built of brown stone, conveniently arranged, with galleries and covered balconies; beautiful gardens planted with the vine, presses for making wine, and stone vats and casks for its safe storage; immense subterranean kitchens, and stables for the horses; beautiful squares, surrounded with porticos and elegant baths; magnificent churches, adorned with columns, flanked with towers and encircled with elegant tombs."²

¹ Texier and Pullan: L'Architecture Byzantine, p. 134, pl. xvii-xxvi. Kugler: Geschichte d. Baukunst, Bd. i, s. 433. Stockbauer: Der christliche Kirchenbau, s. 47.

² Syrie Centrale: Architecture Civile et Religieuse du 1^{er} au 7^e Siècle. Paris, 1865-1877. 2 vols., fol.

The Church in a state of prosperity.

In nearly all the basilicas of Africa and Syria there is a departure from the style of the West with respect to the ceiling finish and decoration. Instead of the open beam-and-rafter work so usual with Roman basilicas, we find the semicylindrical vaulted ceiling. It is believed that this peculiar construction was determined by the character of the materials at hand—the Egyptian and Syrian lands being destitute of timber suitable for the ceiling decorations, while at the same time both stone and brick were abundant and cheap. A like ceiling vaulting is sometimes met in southern France. While hewn stone was seldom used in Italy (brick being the material in general use for the purposes of ceiling vaulting), it was quite common in Syria and the East.³

The vaulted ceiling.

Among the numerous monuments scattered thus over Syria, those of Kherbet-Hass, El-Barah, and Tourmanin are very conspicuous. Each comprises a group of buildings for religious observances, including one or more churches, chapels, and houses for meditation, or convents for Christian orders.

The group at Kherbet-Hass consists of a larger and a smaller church, both three-naved, with distinct internal semicircular apse, and opening upon spacious courts. Besides these are found rooms for the school, for the library, for lodging the various Church officials, and a place of burial for the chief ecclesiastics.⁴

Kherbet-Hass.

¹ Op. cit., t. i, p. 7. ² Op. cit., t. i, p. 9. ³ Delio u. Bezold: Op. cit., s. 130.

⁴ De Vogüé: Op. cit., t. i, p. 96; t. ii, plates 59, 61.

Fig. 101.—Basilica at El-Barah, Central Syria.

At El-Barah are three churches in close juxtaposition. Fig. 101 represents this collection of religious edifices.

El-Barah.

The principal church, with its adjacent chapel, has on the front and sides spacious courts with irregular colonnades. Near to this church are the school, the rooms for the various servants, for the ecclesiastics, and for the library. The entire group of buildings shown in Fig. 101 is connected with this imposing ecclesiastical establishment, and well illustrates the flourishing state of the Syrian churches in the fourth and fifth centuries.

The curious assemblage of buildings at Tourmanin comprised a church, and an immense structure which seems to have been an ecclesiastical hostelry for lodging pilgrims. The church, restored from a careful study of the surviving portions (Fig. 102), follows the general plan and arrangement of most Syrian churches of the sixth century. The façade has an imposing character,¹ while the disposition of the lines gives to it a picturesque effect. The careful balancing of parts resulted in a building of great solidity, whose permanence was almost entirely independent of cement. The interior is the usual oblong basilica of three naves. The apse has the form of a regular half-dodecagon. The internal arrangements and decorations show that architecture at this period had attained a very high order of excellence, and indicate a very prosperous condition of the Syrian Church during the sixth century.

Fig. 102.—View of the church at Tourmanin, Central Syria. Restored from the ruins.

¹ v. De Vogüé: Op. cit., t. i, pp. 138-140; plates cxxx-cxxvi.

All the churches both at Kherbet-Hass, El Barah, and Tourmanin are of the pure oblong basilica type which so generally prevailed in Syria and Egypt. As before said, they lack the wood rafter work in the ceilings, instead of which they employ cut stone for the vaulting. These churches varied very little in their general outline and plan, the architects being content to introduce variety into the decorations and subordinate members. In the disposition of the interiors there is great uniformity. The columns are generally monoliths, with bases which remind us of the classic style, while the imposed mass is directly supported by the capitals without the intervention of the abacus.¹

The grandest monument of Central Syria are the church and convent of St. Simon the Stylite. It is now called Kalat-monastery of Sem'an—the Chateau of Simon. It is situated in the north-east corner of central Syria, a short distance north of Djebel Cheikh Bereket. It was built in honor of that most singular character, Simon the Stylite, who died A. D. 459. The date of the church is somewhat uncertain. From considerations drawn from the style of the decorations, de Vogüé is disposed to place its erection in the latter half of the fifth century.² It was a cruciform, three-naved basilica, whose three arms are of equal length; the fourth, containing the apse, being thirty-six feet longer than the others. The arms of the cross at their intersection form an octagonal court one hundred feet in diameter, which was open to the sky. The longest arm terminated in a semicircular apse not only for the main but also for the side naves. The length of the church from east to west was 336 feet, from north to south 300 feet. The width of the main nave was 36 feet, that of the side naves 18 feet. The principal entrance was from the south through a porch of imposing magnificence. This church, with its attendant chapels, oratories, and sarcophagi, is a reminder of the best classical period. Although in treatment it is somewhat bald and meagre, the style of the capitals is decidedly original. The oblique direction given to the return of the leaves is quite common to the Byzantine architecture. In this and other respects the capitals resemble those of San Apollinare in Classe, in Ravenna, and those employed in the principal entrance of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem.¹ The interior decoration of this and other Syrian churches of the fifth and sixth centuries cannot be ascertained with certainty. From a few specimens of painted cornice found on the spot, de Vogüé has, however, inferred that the color was applied directly to the stone, and ^{The coloring.} that much of the brilliancy of the classical buildings might have belonged to these Syrian ecclesiastical structures.² He does not believe that these churches were ornamented to any considerable extent with mosaics of gilt and glass. The smooth, polished faces of the stone in the choir, which was the only place ^{Destitute of} where mosaics could be used, forbid the supposition of ^{mosaics.} their employment for ornamentation. Yet the mass of pieces of colored marbles, found in connection with the ruins of this church, suggests the probability that the pavement may have been wrought out in beautiful mosaic patterns.

¹ De Vogüé: Op. cit., t. i, p. 97: t. ii, pl. 60.

² Syrie Centrale: t. i, pp. 141-154: t. ii, plates 145-151.

SECTION II.

THE CENTRAL OR DOMED STYLE.

Contemporary with the oblong, naved, rectangular basilica was another style of Christian architecture, the so-called central or domed structure. This was not unfrequent in the West, but in few if any instances does it seem to have been used in buildings originally designed for Christian churches. It was rather limited to those structures of pagan origin which were appropriated to Christian uses, or to buildings subordinate to the main church edifice, as ^{Not powerful} burial or memorial chapels, baptisteries,³ etc. Hence ^{in the West.} in the Occident it seemed to be wanting in power of growth and development; it had at best a feeble, sickly life, and the mediæval architecture received from it but a scanty inheritance. In the Orient it was far otherwise. Here the church adopted and fashioned it to satisfy its own peculiar wants. One type ^{Its peculiar} appeared in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at ^{home in the} Jerusalem, and another, after a rapid and brilliant development, attained its goal and highest perfection in St. Sophia of Constantinople.⁴ From the so-called Byzantine architecture was properly derived the constructive principle which enabled the me-

¹ De Vogüé: Op. cit., t. i, pp. 150, 151.

² Id., t. i, p. 152, plate 151.

³ Schnaase: Gesch. d. bildend. Künste, iii, 48; Dehio u. Bezold, i, 20, 21.

⁴ Dehio und Bezold: Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlandes, Stuttgart, 1884, 1te Lief., s. 21.

diæval architects to transform the flat ceiling of the basilica into the vaulted, and ultimately into the beautiful, soaring, pointed style of the Gothic cathedral.¹

§ 1. Origin of the Domed Structure.

The origin of the domed principle in architecture is even more obscure than that of the oblong rectangular basilica. While the Etruscans were familiar with the vaulted roof, as this was applied to the cloacæ and aqueducts, they have left no works of marked architectural character which lead us to believe that they are the originators of the dome structure as it was found in the West just prior to the Advent. It is very remarkable that the most beautiful and complete dome of the world is the Pantheon of Rome, a sort of architectural Melchizedek, without father or mother, and also wanting, so far as can be determined, the long antecedent process of development which such perfection presupposes. It is likewise curious that the oblong basilica is the most persistent form for the Christian church in many parts of the Orient, which has usually been accounted the native land of the so called Byzantine architecture.

Of the churches of central Syria, described by de Vogüé, only two of importance are of the domical form, and these from the sixth century.² It is claimed that they were constructed on an entirely different principle from that governing in St. Sophia. They were compact and unified; their parts were members of a living organism. Each was firmly bound to the other, each was the natural and necessary complement of all. St. Sophia, on the other hand, was a vast concretion of brick and mortar, and of rough blocks of stone, distributed into arches, vaulted surfaces, cupolas, and hemicupolas, whose expansions, resting upon fixed points, and balancing one part against the other, were brought into a condition of perfect equilibrium. The principle of construction was not different from that in the Roman baptistery, developed, enlarged, and made more light and soaring through the boldness of two men of eminent genius,

¹ We believe, therefore, that the concluding paragraph of the statement of Professor G. Baldwin Brown, From Schola to Cathedral, 1886, p. 143, needs important qualification: "Rome possessed a world-famed cupola several centuries before the first Byzantine dome, and during those centuries dome construction had advanced on parallel lines in the West and in the East, so that the Middle Ages inherited in the West as genuine a tradition in regard to the cupola as any which flourished in the East."

² De Vogüé: Syrie Centrale Architecture civile et religieuse, plates 21, 23.

both of whom were Greeks. Their work, too, was Greek in the sense that it was the result of the application of the logical spirit of the Greek school to a new and foreign principle, which became most fruitful of results. These two artists originated a style which completely supplanted the preceding in all the countries which were afterward submissive to Byzantine rule. Yet essentially Greek. The opportunity it furnished for the employment of mediocre workmen, and for utilizing the cruder materials, as brick and lime, as well as the gradual introduction of Oriental tastes, assured its success. It characterized the Byzantine period, properly so called, and was the last evolution of Greek art, destined in turn to be absorbed in the Saracenic.¹

Whether the central architecture of the West was an indigenous product, or was the result of Greek influence whose monumental expression has perished, or whether both the Roman and the so-called Byzantine were alike the revival of an old eastern type which had fallen into partial decay,² it may not be possible to affirm. The subject is beset with peculiar difficulties, and awaits more thorough investigation. It is, however, evident that the Christian baptisteries and burial chapels have a strong resemblance to the contemporary pagan baths and mortuary monuments.³ An interesting example of this is found in a portion of the baths of Diocletian (Fig. 103). This was converted, in the sixteenth century, into the church San Bernardino de' Termini. The semicircular niches were perpetuated in the Christian structure. The more prominent features of this building recur from time to time in the Central style.

The description of circular temples by Vitruvius would imply their prevalence in his day. In a few Christian mosaics, both in Rome and Ravenna, the domical form appears in connection with

Fig. 103.—Baths of Diocletian, San Bernardino. Groundplan.

¹ De Vogüé: Op. cit., vol. i, pp. 17, 18.

² The Sassanid domes of Persian palaces.

³ Rosengarten: Architectural Styles, p. 172.

more imposing structures which are believed to represent the buildings for Christian assembly, while in Christian literature are found quite detailed accounts of noted churches that have entirely disappeared. Of these the circular domed building erected by Constantine in the early part of the fourth century over the traditional site of the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem,¹ and the magnificent church at Antioch which Eusebius has described at length, were among the most notable and influential. He says: "At Antioch, the capital of the Orient, he (Constantine) built a thoroughly characteristic church. He enclosed the whole by a peribolos, within which he built an oratory of unprecedented height. It was of octagonal form. To the exterior round about he added many chapels and exedra, as well as crypts and galleries. The entire work was completed by ornamentation in gold as well as in ivory and other costly materials."² The relation of this and similar structures to the development of church architecture at Ravenna and other centers is most intimate. It becomes of great value in interpreting the forms met in the churches of San Vitale in Ravenna, San Marco in Venice, SS. Sergius et Bacchus in Constantinople, etc.³

Central building in Constantine's time.

The Church of the Holy Sepulchre served as a model for burial chapels, while that of Antioch was a model for buildings for congregational assembly. The great importance of the latter in Christian architecture arises from the circumstance that its chief features were copied into other structures, both East and West, and gave an impetus to (if it was not the genesis of) the style afterward characterized by the name Byzantine.

Importance of the Church of Antioch.

§ 2. Classification.

Different principles of classification of these buildings have been proposed by writers on the history of architecture. Principles of classification. The adoption of the simple rotunda as the normal form, and the development of the central construction from this norm, has much to recommend it.⁴ According to this view, the first step in the development was the addition of members in the form of niches in the enclosing walls. Both artistically as well as constructively this was of importance. The bounding of a space within narrowest possible limits, as well as the securing of better architectural effects, would thus result. For the most part the number of these niches does not exceed eight, being all of the Addition of niches.

¹ Eusebius: De Vita Const., iii, 31.

² Vita Const., lib. iii, cap. 50.

³ Quast: Die Altchristlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna, ss. 30, 31.

⁴ v. Delio und Bezold: Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlandes, i, ss. 19, ff.

same form or having alternating rectangular and semicircular niches.¹ Sometimes these simple rotunda interiors were further enriched by columns placed in the niches, which also served a useful constructive purpose (v. Fig. 112). A further development is noticed in the attempts at enlargement of these circular buildings, by breaking through the walls of the niches, thus securing a series of attached rooms by means of an outward enclosing wall. This occurs in Figs. 116 and 120. It is believed that this change was first introduced into the churches from liturgical rather than artistic considerations—especially to secure more privacy for the high altar—but by continuous modifications it became the occasion of developing some of the most beautiful and imposing architectural effects.

A fourth type of the circular church architecture is that in which the domical portion, supported by columns, is surrounded by a corridor of lesser height than the central structure. The addition of a corridor.

This has sometimes, without sufficient reason, been characterized as an application of the basilica principle to the central style—hence called the circular basilica—and has been claimed to be the most distinctive and original product of the early Christian Church. The claim seems, however, to lack firm support, since some of its features manifestly find many suggestions in pagan architecture, while it is difficult on this theory to account for its somewhat limited dissemination, and for the fact that the oldest examples of this type of buildings are the most striking, thus indicating a retrogradation rather than a real development.²

Under the class of the central or domical architecture some writers reckon the cruciform buildings, whether with equal Cruciform structures. arms, or, by the lengthening of the main axis, in the form of the Latin cross. While this form was more usually found in burial chapels, it was also incorporated into other and more imposing buildings.³

§ 3. The Simple Rotunda.

Of the simple rotunda form but few examples survive. These are chiefly of baptisteries attached to churches. A plain hexagonal building of this kind is the baptistery of the basilica in the Colli di Sto Stefano in Tivoli; another is the octagonal baptistery of the cathedral of Parenzo.⁴ A few chapels in the catacombs approach this simple outline.⁵ Examples of simple rotunda.

¹ For examples of uniform semicircular niches, see Fig. 103; for uniformly rectangular niches, see Fig. 105: and for rectangular alternating with the circular niche, see Fig. 104. ² Dehio und Bezold: Op. cit., ss. 31, 32. ³ Idem, ss. 43, 44.

⁴ Dehio und Bezold: Op. cit., 1te Lief., s. 24, t. 1, Fig. 10, and t. 16, Fig. 2.

⁵ Hübsch: Op. cit., t. i, Fig. 6. Peret: Les Catacombes de Rome, pp. 36, 39.

§ 4. With Niches and Columns.

Most of the circular domical forms add, however, the niches and columus, and thus pass to the second stage of development. To this general class may be referred some of the most interesting Christian architectural monuments of the first six centuries. The prominent features of the class are likewise met in the pagan monuments; but to claim that the Christian were only a copy or slavish imitation of the heathen structures were unhistorical and misleading. While it is evident that the Christian baptisteries and burial monuments found suggestions in the baths and sepulchral monuments of the classical world, with respect to this as to other branches of art the spirit of the new religion often modified, transformed, and adjusted them to the needs of the Church.

No slavish imitation of heathen buildings.

Fig. 104 is the groundplan of the so called Temple of Romulus, son of Maxentius, found on the Via Appia,¹ Rome. Here are found the circular enclosing wall, the niches alternately rectangular and semicircular, the portico enclosing the area in front, etc., most of which elements were continued in buildings of Christian origin.

Fig. 104.—Temple of Romulus, Via Appia, Rome. Groundplan.

Prominent among the Christian monuments of this class is the baptistery of the Ecclesia Ursiana, in Ravenna, now known under the name of San Giovanni in Fonte.

It is an octagonal building, having two entrances and four niches or tribunes. The whole is covered by a somewhat flattened dome. The interior construction and decoration are noteworthy. The harmonious arrangement of the columns, and the spanning of larger by smaller arches, as appears in the second story of the exterior, and in the arrangement for the support of the dome in the second story of the interior, seem like a prophecy of the Gothic architecture; while the form of the capitals and many minor details clearly point backward to an earlier age of Greek art.¹ It has two stories. The lower part is formed by eight pilasters in the angles, which are connected by semicircular arches. The walls are lined with slabs of porphyry and different colored marbles.

¹ Canina: Via Appia, tav. x, pp. 77, 78.

Another notable monument of this type is Santa Maria Rotonda,² in Ravenna, called also the mausoleum of Theodoric. Santa Maria Rotonda. It differs from other churches of Ravenna in being built of hewn stone instead of brick. The dome is thirty-three feet in diameter, consisting of a single stone of more than forty-five hundred tons weight.³ It must have been brought from a great distance by water.⁴ It is a work of high art, and the elevation to its place is a good proof of the excellent engineering of that age.⁵ The church is a decagon of two stories. One half of the lower part is now under water. Each side of the exterior is relieved by a niche produced by a round arch that spans the intermediate space. The arches are built of dentated stone, which is first met in the later Roman architecture, but afterward became a prominent feature of the Byzantine and Arabian art. This church has given rise to much speculation upon the influences under which it was built. In its chief members there is not a trace of the Byzantine style; in its details this sometimes appears; while in some features it reveals a decidedly Gothic impress. As a whole, it seems to stand as a prophecy and suggestion of the style which rose in such glory and grandeur five hundred years later.⁶ The interior. Exceptional architectural elements.

In this class must also be reckoned the Church of St. George of Thessalonica,⁷ the modern Salonika. The date of its erection has been elsewhere discussed (v. p. 116). It is a brick structure of more than seventy feet in diameter, having ¹ Quast: Op. cit., ss. 4, 5; taf. i. Dehio u. Bezold: Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlands, 1te Lief., s. 25; t. 3, Fig. 9, 10; taf. 37.

² Quast: Op. cit., s. 5; t. i, Figs. 2, 3, 4. Kugler: Geschichte der Baukunst, Bd. i, s. 398. Dehio und Bezold: Op. cit., 1te Lief., s. 25; t. 3, Figs. 7, 8; t. 37.

³ Quast: Op. cit., ss. 24-26; t. vii, Figs. 17-28. D'Agincourt: Architecture, pp. xviii and xxxii. Dehio u. Bezold: Op. cit., s. 25; t. 3, Figs. 9, 10. Rahn: Ravenna, ss. 38, sq.

⁴ Quast: Op. cit., s. 24, claims that it was brought from Istria.

⁵ Kugler: Op. cit., Bd. i, s. 398. H. Gally Knight: Op. cit., t. viii.

⁶ Quast: Op. cit., s. 25.

⁷ Kugler: Geschichte der Baukunst, Bd. i, s. 432. Texier and Pullan: Églises Byzantines, plates xxxi-xxxiv. Unger: In Ersch u. Gruber's Encyclopædia, taf. lxxxiv.

eight rectangular, chapel-like niches in the wall. The enclosing

Fig. 105.—Groundplan of St. George, Thessalonica.

East, it has been converted into a Mohammedan mosque.

wall is nearly twenty feet thick, but in the niches it is reduced by the extent of their depth. One of the niches opens into the extended tribune, while another is used for entrance to the church (see Fig. 105). About the middle of the perpendicular height the wall is set back, giving the impression to the visitor that a corridor is thus secured on the interior (v. Fig. 106). In outline it has a very striking resemblance to the Roman Pantheon. Its rich and instructive mosaics are elsewhere described (v. pp. 116, 117). Like most surviving churches of the

Fig. 106.—St. George, Thessalonica. Exterior view.

In passing from the simple rotunda, with rectangular and semi-circular niches, to that further expansion of the central style in which by a more widely extended enclosing wall an added space was secured, and a more complex construction and artistic arrangement resulted, we are brought to the examination of some of the most impressive and significant churches of the first seven centuries. Among these San Vitale of Ravenna, and SS. Sergius et Bacchus and St. Sophia (Hagia Sofia) of Constantinople, are unrivalled. They are nearly contemporaneous, belonging to the reign of Justinian, in the first half of the sixth century.

Third stage of development.

FIG. 107.—San Vitale, Ravenna. Interior view.

San Vitale was begun in A. D. 526, and dedicated in A. D. 547. It is an octagonal building about one hundred and two feet in diameter, with a tribune triliteral on the exterior, but semicircular on the interior. The second story forms an arcade supported by pillars and pilasters below (v. Fig. 107); above the pilasters and the arches resting upon them the dome rose to the height of nearly eighty feet. Some writers have held that San Vitale, and San Marco at Venice as well, are merely diminutive imitations of St. Sophia at Constantinople; but the resemblances between San Vitale and San Marco are not such as to justify their reference to a common model. In groundplan, interior arrangement, and roof construction they differ very widely. San Vitale is octagonal and two-storied; San Marco is in the form of the Greek cross and without galleries. San Vitale groups the central spaces into one which is covered by a central dome, rising high above the other parts of the structure; San Marco, on the contrary, has five depressed domes, above each arm of the cross, and over the central space where the two arms intersect.

San Vitale.

Not a copy of San Marco.

On careful study the diversities between St. Sophia and San Vitale will also appear so great as to set aside the theory ^{Nor of St. So-} that the one was the model or the copy of the other. ^{phia.} Their relation¹ is only that of the three most noted surviving examples of the architecture of the first half of the sixth century.

Fig. 108.—San Vitale. Groundplan.

The long-extended vestibule, C, (Narthex or Ardica), of San Vitale is peculiar to ^{Irregularity of} this church (Fig. ^{groundplan.} 108). It is not placed opposite or perpendicular to the axis of the tribune, as is usual in other churches, but makes a wide departure from the regularity of groundplan which might be expected. Many conjectures as to the reason of this have been made, but the real cause is unknown. The exterior of the church is like many other buildings of Ravenna, of brick with thick layers of mortar. Most of the mosaics, which formerly made it one of the most brilliant in Christendom, have ^{Mosaics lost.} unfortunately disappeared; yet the descriptions given by the historians are so full that their artistic and dogmatic significance can be easily determined.

The form of the arches supporting the dome, as well as the columnar arrangement of the second story, may be seen from the section given in Fig. 109. Likewise the style of the capitals, and the rich statuary, arabesque, and mosaic effects, in pavement and ceiling, making the interior of this church exceptionally impressive, ¹ Quast: Op. cit., s. 29. Compare Fig. 108, groundplan of San Vitale, with Fig. 116, groundplan of St. Sophia; the section of San Vitale, Fig. 109, with that of St. Sophia, Fig. 117.

Fig. 109.—San Vitale. Longitudinal section.

are well shown in Figs. 107, 109. The contrast between this church and the Roman basilica, with its columns of varied styles, lengths, and diameters, is very marked. "Instead of simple, long-extended right lines, here is found an artistic combination of numerous curves, which, while departing from different centers, nevertheless complement each other and find in the dome the completest centralization. . . . In all this labyrinthian arrangement a most magnificent effect from this development of forms cannot be denied."¹ The church was begun under the East Gothic supremacy, and finished under Byzantine; it is, therefore, generally classified under the head of Byzantine architecture. The propriety of such classification may, however, be reasonably questioned, since neither in groundplan nor elevation, but only in decorative features, does it seem to be accordant with the Byzantine style.² The beauty of the deco-

Contrast with Roman basilica.

Not strictly Byzantine.

Fig. 110.—Capital from San Vitale, Ravenna.

Fig. 111.—Capital from St. Sophia, Constantinople.

ration of the churches as well as their likeness in details may be seen by comparing the capitals of columns from each (v. Figs. 110 and 111).

Nearly contemporary with San Vitale is SS. Sergius et Bacchus (Hagios Sergios) of Constantinople.³ Here, too, the dome rests upon eight immense buttresses connected together in the lower story by a richly sculptured entablature, and in the second by arches. At the four corners are semicircular niches (in which are supporting columns) that lead into rooms

¹ Schnaase: Geschichte der Bildende Künste, 1te aufl., Bd. iii, ss. 131, 132.

² Stockbauer: Der christliche Kirchenbau, s. 89.

³ Delio u. Bezold: Op. cit., 1te Lief., ss. 28, 29, taf. 4, Figs. 5. 6. Stockbauer: Op. cit., s. 90. Kugler: Op. cit., Bd. i, ss. 420-422. Salzenberg: All-christliche Baudenkmale v. Constantinople.

bounded by the exterior wall (v. Fig. 112), which is quadrangular instead of octagonal, as in San Vitale. Upon the interior face of the entablature, extending around the entire nave, is a fulsome inscription to Justinian, and to the martyrs Sergius and Bacchus, who were in high repute among the Dardanians and Illyrians. In the arrangement of the ground-plan and of the Stronger tendency to the vaulted spaces, Byzantine.

the characteristic development of the Byzantine school is already noticed; but on careful study of details antique elements are found to predominate, so that this church must be regarded as belonging to the transition period of architecture in the Greek Empire.¹

Fig. 112.—SS. Sergius and Bacchus, Constantinople. Groundplan.

Fig. 113.—Hall in ancient Roman palace. To compare with SS. Sergius and Bacchus.

This form of the Christian church does not differ very widely from some pagan buildings. Fig. 113 is the representation of a hall in an ancient Roman palace. Here, too, the alternation in the interior of the rectangular with the semicircular niche, and the enclosure of the whole by a strong rectangular wall, are so nearly like the arrangement of SS. Sergius et Bacchus as to suggest the same general style.²

§ 5. Byzantine Architecture.

The removal of the capital of the Roman Empire to Byzantium must be accounted among the epoch-making events of history. All the secret motives influencing Constantine to this decision may not be known; some are, however, well understood. Heathen and Christian prophecies alike had foretold the approaching downfall of Rome; the Trojan coasts were the fabled native home of the Roman people; only by Reasons of removal of capital.

¹ Salzenberg: Text, ss. 41–45, Blatt v. Op. cit., Text, ss. 43, 45.

² Stockbauer: Der christlichen Kirchenbau, s. 90.

residence in the East could the complete overthrow of his rival, Licinius, be effected. The beauty of the situation of Byzantium was proverbial, and its military and strategical importance manifest. In the East were the sacred seats, the holiest traditions, the ablest defenders, and the richest doctrinal development of the new religion which he had befriended. The Oriental luxury and magnificence were to him most agreeable, and the absolutism of the East, unchecked even by the feeble apology for a Roman senate, comported best with Constantine's imperious nature. The principle of centralization was the kernel and essence of his empire. He would establish a new court in a place free from hoary traditions and unpolluted by the crimes of a thousand years of bitter syncretism.

struggle. The strange commingling of Christian and heathen elements in the new capital was only the visible symbol of the religious belief and character of its great founder. Pagan at heart, and little acquainted with the central truth of the Christian system, he nevertheless saw in it the promise of perpetuity. In the center of the forum was set up the noted porphyry column, crowned with the statue of the all-conquering Phidian Apollo, and around it were clustered the gods of paganism. Here, too, was seen the statue of the goddess of fortune, on whose head was placed the cross of Christ, and at whose dedication the people sang the Kyrie Eleison. Opposite to this, the double statue of the emperor and his mother Helena bore a cross with the inscription, "One is holy, one is the Lord Christ, to the glory of God the Father;" but in the middle of the cross, amidst forms of incantation, was again affixed the image of Fortune. To her, to Rhea, mother of the gods, to Castor and Pollux, temples were erected, as well as Christian churches in great number and magnificence. The art treasures of the world were collected to adorn the public squares and buildings, thus making Constantinople at the same time a rich museum of ancient, and a cradle of Christian, art.¹

The western mind was mostly occupied with the consideration of contrast of practical questions of life. The customs and morals of East and West. the people were considered; the forces that measured and controlled these were carefully estimated. The Oriental mind, on the contrary, was occupied with questions of dogma and abstract speculation. It did not aim so much to elevate the masses of the people; rather by mingling the mysteries of religion with the everyday affairs of life it educated the populace to the grossest superstition. The strong common sense Socratic philosophy, which had recognized the dignity and the responsibility of the individual, had been largely supplanted by the system of Neo-Platonism, in which the unity of the universe more than the freedom and selfhood of the individual was made prominent. A little later the spirit of Orientalism, which had more or less affected the entire Roman world, became dominant in the Byzantine Empire.

¹ Carrière: Die Kunst im Zusammenhang der Culturentwicklung und die Ideale der Menschheit, Bd. iii, ss. 113, 114. Gibbon: Decline and Fall, chap. xvii. Salzenberg: Alt-christliche Baudenkmale von Constantinople, ss. 1-10.

With the absolutism of imperial power necessarily resulted the decline of individual rights. The idea of personal freedom, and the worth of man as man, which was a ruling element among the Teutonic peoples, wellnigh died out. Banishments, imprisonments, tortures, and death were inflicted at the mere caprice of the sovereign. Hence all tended toward stagnation and death. After a sleep of a thousand years the Orient remained cold and lifeless, while the West had been heaving with the throes of a new and progressive life.

This dark picture of the Byzantine Empire is, however, relieved by a few bright lights. Her good offices to the world were neither few nor unimportant. She preserved the thought of unity in government, which exerted a strong and salutary influence upon the susceptible German peoples, and gave to them the true idea of nationality. Through her best ruler, Justinian, she bequeathed to the world the body of codified law which has powerfully influenced the jurisprudence of Europe even to the present hour. Through all the centuries of her insensibility and sloth Constantinople was the museum where were collected and preserved to later times most precious treasures of ancient art and literature, which the crusades were to diffuse throughout the West to enkindle a new life and stimulate to higher endeavor.

But the decadence of morals and of art was already so great that the attempts of Constantine to found schools for the education of skilled architects proved only partially successful. From this time Christian art in the Orient came under the control and guidance of an imperialism in state and Church, and crystallized into a fixedness of type that has been perpetuated to the present day. A pomp and stateliness, a splendor and even gaudiness in art, were only the reflex of a like character in the imperial state. Religion was no longer a matter of conscience and of the inner life of the individual, but of state authority and dictation. The symbols of faith were largely the creatures of the government, and the bishops were servants of the state. Instead of the former apotheosis of the deceased emperors, a divinity was made to attach to the living ruler. Into his presence the subject must approach with signs of deepest veneration. The stately ceremonial of the court awed the visitor. Costliness took the place of classic forms and artistic beauty. Freedom had died, and with her departed the soul and inspiration of art.

The principle of centralization found its best expression in the strictly Byzantine architecture. It completed what the Roman Byzantine basilica had suggested and attempted. Around a central member was grouped the entire structure in essential unity. Every subordinate part pointed toward the dome, which crowns the middle of the Greek cross, as to the imperial governing power of the whole. The strengthening Orientalism caused the architecture more and more to depart from the simplicity and unity of the early Greek, and thus was developed a style which may be truly called Byzantine.

The history of Byzantine architecture is usually divided into two distinct periods. The first begins with the reign of Constantine and closes with the rule of Justinian, about the middle of the sixth century. The second extends from the reign of Justinian to the latter part of the twelfth century, or to the first revival of art through the influence of Cimabue. During the latter period art forms were cast in an unchanging mould. In the eastern provinces they became still more contaminated by Oriental influences; while in some parts of the West new forces effected slight modifications of the original type. It has already been noticed (o. p. 197) that in the first period most of the churches of the Orient preserved the Roman style of the basilica, excepting the open rafter work and ornamentation of the ceiling. In a few instances the intersection of the main nave and transept had been surmounted by a small cupola, but gradually this was developed into the complete and imposing dome structure covering a square area: this is the distinctive feature of the later Byzantine architecture. From the age of Justinian this was the prevailing style in the Eastern Empire, while in the West the tower was developed to produce a like effect in the Romanesque and Gothic churches.¹ We have already met this form and growth in the churches of Ravenna. The perfection of Byzantine architecture was, however, first attained in the Church of St. Sophia. It furnished a model for all the subsequent churches of the East. The history of the empire furnishes an easy solution of this fact. After Justinian, stagnation and decay characterized the Eastern civilization. All turned backward to his reign as to the golden age. An earlier Church of St. Sophia, built by Constantine, had been consumed by fire during a popular uprising. For its re-building Justinian drew upon the resources of the entire empire. The planning and erection were entrusted to the two most noted architects of the age, Isodore of Miletus and Anthimius of Tralles. It is claimed by a class of writers on the history of architecture, and by some archæologists,¹ that these wise architects had clearly in mind the St. Sophia.

¹ Salzenburg: Op. cit. ss. 14, 15.

Fig. 114.—Section of St. Sophia. To compare with the Basilica of Constantine, Rome.

Church of SS. Sergius et Bacchus, and the so-called Basilica of Constantine at Rome, as models for their great work. By careful comparison of Fig. 112 with Fig. 116, and Fig. 114 with Fig. 115, the points of resemblance will be apparent. The general division of the enclosed space into nine parts, the use of strong buttresses to support the domed coverings and provide against the lateral thrust, ¹ v. Stockbauer: Op. cit., ss. 92, 93, taf. v, Figs. 2, 3, 4, 5. Dehio u. Bezold: Op. cit., ss. 29, 30, taf. 6, Fig. 1; taf. 39, Fig. 14.

the unification of the three middle compartments into one grand and most imposing room, etc., are some elements of likeness in these buildings. Doubtless, however, the erection of one imposing dome, supported by four massive buttresses, over a square space, is a new departure, and places upon St. Sophia the stamp of originality.

The traditions connected with the building of this most noted church are numerous and interesting. The problems ^{Difficulty of the} to be solved in the suspension of a dome one hundred feet in diameter a hundred feet in midair were most difficult.

Fig. 115.—Section of the Basilica of Constantine, Rome. To compare with St. Sophia, Constantinople.

The enormous weight was a serious obstacle to the architects of that day. The reputed revelations in dreams, the discovery of bricks in the island of Rhodes of one fifth of the ordinary weight, etc., are only evidences of the perplexities felt by Justinian and his architects. But the greatest cause of wonder, even to builders of modern times, is the completion of this church in the incredibly short space of six years. It was a wonder to every beholder, and remains to our day in many respects the most remarkable architectural monument of Christendom. Since its transformation into a Turkish mosque, on the downfall of Constantinople in 1453, it has lost much of its original magnificence. Mohammedan zeal against images in their sacred places led to the attempt to destroy the splendid mosaics which had been preserved in much of their original integrity. But happily these have been carefully measured and copied, so that we have the means of comparing this building and its decorations with the descriptions found in the Byzantine writers.¹

As before remarked (p. 233), the Church of St. Sophia, built by Constantine, had been burned in A. D. 532, during a fearful conflagration originating in a popular outbreak between rival factions. Justinian resolved to rebuild it on a scale of magnificence worthy the first temple of Christendom. A man of comprehensive plans, he was also possessed of a rare practical talent to secure the means of their accomplishment. Tradition says that the plans were ready within forty days after the destruction of the first church. To the governors of the provinces the emperor issued edicts to procure the most costly materials for this work. To beautify this church pagan temples in Asia Minor and Greece were plundered of their richest art treasures.² The historians tell us that all the available revenues of the empire were laid under contribution, and many new taxes were afterward levied for its completion. To make the building fireproof was one of the first conditions imposed upon the architects. An immense number of workmen were employed.³ Justinian himself, by daily visitations, and by encouragements or rebukes, pushed on the work with such marvelous rapidity that it was dedicated in December, 537 A. D.

The dangers from fire had been averted, but those from another source had not been foreseen. Twenty-two years after its dedication portions of the dome and of the furniture of the church were ruined by an earthquake. Justinian hastened to strengthen the supports, elevated the dome about twenty-five feet, renovated the interior, and within five years the church was rededicated. For thirteen centuries it has stood uninjured by repeated shocks of earthquakes which have toppled many other structures to ruins.

¹ One of the best authorities on the Byzantine architecture, as it has been preserved to our time, is Salzenberg, W.: Alt-christliche Baudenkmale von Constantinople vom V bis XII Jahrhundert. Berlin, 1854. On the occasion of the extensive repairs of the Church of St. Sophia in 1847-48, the Prussian government took occasion to despatch Salzenberg to Constantinople to make careful drawings and take accurate measurements of this church. Fortunately the celebrated architect, Fossati, was superintending these repairs, and gave to Salzenberg every aid to complete his work. The extensive scaffoldings, reaching to the highest point of the dome, gave opportunity to make all necessary measurements, and the removal of the thick coats of whitewash revealed the mosaics in all their original magnificence. Thus has been preserved a complete description of the forms and interior decorations of this magnificent church.

² Salzenberg: Op. cit., s. 46. Gibbon: Decline and Fall, chap. xl.

³ The Byzantine chroniclers claim that ten thousand were thus employed.

The visitor to St. Sophia first enters the fore-court of the church, which is bounded on three sides by a row of columns, and on the fourth by the building itself (v. Figs. 116, 117). Passing by the fountain in the middle of the court, he reaches the narthex, the place for the penitents. From this space five marble doors, richly decorated with bronze, lead into a second somewhat more extended and spacious vestibule having vaulted ceilings richly adorned with variegated marbles and mosaics. Here the sexes separated. The women proceeded to the doors on either side of the vestibule that opened to the staircase leading to the second story. This was called the gynæceum, because exclusively set apart for the use of the women. The men passed through nine folding-doors to the groundfloor of the main nave.¹

The groundplan of this church is nearly square (v. Fig. 116). The inner length, exclusive of the tribune, is 234 feet, the breadth 217 feet.² Over the central portion rises the cupola to the 40 windows in the cornice; and thence a dome reaches to the vertex, about 180 feet above the pavement below. The dome is supported by four massive arches which spring from immense buttresses. Leading east and west from the square area beneath are rooms of semicircular outline, to each of which three colossal niches are connected. These immense semicircular spaces are covered by semidomes, which partly lean upon the main arches which support the central dome, and are partly supported by the cylindrically vaulted ceiling of the three niches (v. Fig. 117).

The two side niches, called exedra, are also semicircular and covered with smaller semidomes.³ The two center niches have, however, cylindrically vaulted ceilings. The east one terminates in a semicircle, covered by a concha which rises from the enclosing wall, and forms the apse or tribune. All

¹ Schnaase: 1te Aufl., Bd. iii, ss. 137, 138.

² Distinction must be made in the plan between the church proper and the annexed portions. The dome, a b, covers the central part of the church proper.

³ The arrangement of the parts of this remarkable building can be understood by frequent reference to the vertical section (Fig. 117).

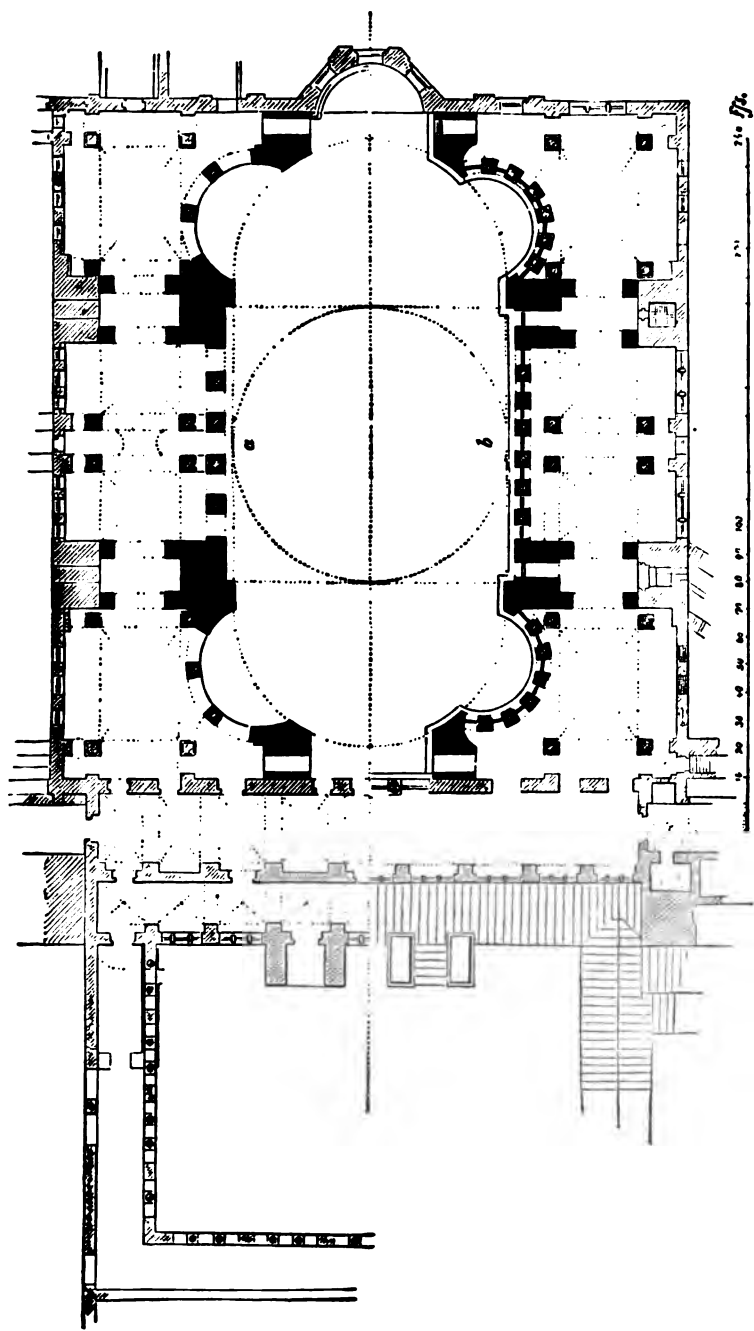

Fig. 116.—St. Sophia. Groundplan.

Fig. 117.—St. Sophia. Longitudinal section.

of these spaces taken together form the naos, or temple proper. Between this and the enclosing walls on the north and south sides extend the two-storied side halls, each of which is divided into three parts. Four colossal pillars furnish the foundation for the arches supporting the dome, while behind these to-^{Dome support.}ward the north and south, in the enclosing wall, are four buttresses connected with these pillars by arches. By a series of buttresses and connecting arches firm supports are secured for the conchas and the cylindrically vaulted ceilings. Thus the entire building, while possessing this diversity of outline, is bound together into a beautiful and harmonious unity. All ceiling spaces are cylindrical or domed. In addition to the enclosing walls and the system of buttresses these are supported in the lower part by forty columns and eight free pilasters; in the upper part by sixty columns.¹

The lighting of the interior of St. Sophia is very brilliant. Wherever space and safety permit are placed windows ^{The lighting.} in great number and of marked dimensions, so that a flood of light pours through them into the house of God.² At the base of the central dome are forty windows, and each of the half domes has five. The first rays of the morning sun stream into the nave through the six large windows in the tribune, while the setting sun, shining through the immense semicircular window over the entrance in the west, bathes the whole interior in golden effulgence. Twelve windows admit the light through the arches on the north, and an equal number on the south diffuse an abundance of light throughout the lateral halls above and below. There is evidence that some of the window spaces existing in the time of Procopius have been closed by masonry; nevertheless, the present mosque is very brilliantly lighted.³ The injunction of Justinian ^{Fireproof.} to build a fireproof church was most carefully heeded, even in the arrangement of the windows. By an ingenious and expensive combination of brick work and marble plates even the frame settings of the windows are entirely lacking in wood.

The impression made upon the visitor on his first entrance to this church is that of vastness, grandeur, and magnificence. ^{Impression upon the visitor.} The eye wanders over the immense nave, peers into the adjacent halls, rests upon the beautiful gynæceum, then is lifted to the enormous dome that seems to float in midair. At every step new beauties are revealed. The richness of the materials, and the completed unity in the midst of almost infinite diversity, entrance the beholder. In Justinian's time, when to all essentials of the structure preserved to our day were added the rich adornments of the high altar, the beautiful ambos, the sparkling of the vessels of gold bedecked with gems, the gleaming of countless candelabra, the splendour of the garments of the retinue of clergy and helpers, the sonorous-voiced priests as they intoned the sublime ritual, the response from the hundred-voiced choir, rolling through the corridors and arches like the voice of many waters—the worshiper must have been impressed that this was a temple worthy of dedication to the ETERNAL WISDOM, and one where his Spirit would delight to dwell.

¹ Salzenberg: ss. 53, 54, 55.² Salzenberg: a. 84.³ Salzenberg: Op. cit., id.

Of the unparalleled richness of the decorations we cannot speak in detail. The pavement was wrought out into very elaborate and beautiful patterns of marble mosaic. The columns were of the richest and rarest materials. The walls were lined with slabs of marble and of verde antique of most exquisite coloring. The walls and ceilings in the great dome and in all the adjacent parts were enriched with mosaics of saints of colossal size.¹

St. Sophia furnished the type for all later churches of the Byzantine Empire. It brought to perfection a style that can strictly be called unique. The whole spirit of the exterior was harmonious with the theory of inperialism prevalent in the Eastern Empire and Church. Art was pressed into the service of dogma. It crystallized into stiff and unchanging types which continued in the Russian-Greek churches till the time of Peter the Great.

The transformation of St. Sophia into a Mohammedan mosque left almost unchanged the narthex, the nave, the side halls, and the gynecæum; but the other portions, especially those more immediately used in the Christian cultus, have been entirely lost. The marble railing separating the clergy from the laity, the seats of the priests, the throne of the patriarch, the ciborium, the ambos, and all the utensils of the church have perished. From documents still extant² we learn that under Justinian not less than five hundred and twenty-five persons were employed in the direct service of this church, while in the reign of Heraclius the number had increased to six hundred.³ These also cared for three other churches of the capital.

The bema probably extended to the border of the eastern half dome, while the solea, for the inferior clergy, occupied the entire space covered by the eastern concha.¹ The ambos must have stood still farther toward the west, and must have occupied a very prominent place, from the fact that here the Scriptures were read, the sermon preached, and the emperors crowned. Near by, in the adjacent spaces, were stationed the singers under the direction of leaders. In the exedra, toward the north and south, were collected the deacons who were to assist in the sacred ministrations. The sacred table of gold, inlaid with gems, rested on golden columns and was supplied with golden furniture.² Over it rose the beautiful ciborium on four silver columns, between which were spread the richly ornamented hangings. The lofty octagonal dome above was crowned by a silver globe surmounted by the cross. From the ceiling of the ciborium hung the silver dove, representing the Holy Ghost, which contained the sacred elements to be distributed among the sick. From the description of Paulus Silentarius we infer that the accompaniments of candelabra, lamps, and halos for the illumination of this church must have been incomparably rich and imposing.

¹ v. the representation of the great mosaic of Christ and the emperor that was wrought out over the grand portal (Fig. 44, p. 129).

² v. Du Cange: Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iii, p. 71.

³ Du Cange: iii, 71. They are given as follows: 80 priests, 150 deacons, 40 deaconesses, 70 subdeacons, 160 readers, 125 chanters, 75 doorkeepers.

§ 6. The Circular Structure.

A fourth type of the central building is the circular, with an inner portico which surrounds the area covered by the dome.

Fig. 118.—Section of Santa Constanza, Rome.

Few churches following this general plan were erected in the west during the reign of Constantine the Great.

The most typical example of this circular architecture from the ¹ Paulus Silentarius: i, v. 240, etc. Evagrius: Hist. Eccl., lib. iv, c. xxxi.

² Paulus Silentarius: ii, v. 335.

fourth century is Santa Constanza,¹ on the Via Nomentana in Rome (Fig. 118). Tradition says it occupies the site of a former Bacchus temple. Its rotunda is sixty-seven feet in diameter. Twenty-four columns in double rows support the dome and the vaultings of the outer corridor. Here the sarcophagus² of Constantia, the daughter of Constantine, was formerly preserved. It seems probable that the entire building was once used as a mausoleum to the imperial family, rather than as a temple to Bacchus.³ This building marks a transition from the classic to the mediæval spirit. The degeneracy of the old is apparent, while at the same time elements are here introduced which play a most important part in the development of Christian architecture.⁴

Fig. 119.—Santa Maria Maggiore, Nocera de Pagani. Vertical section.

Of somewhat similar arrangement is the church Santa Maria Maggiore, in Nocera de Pagani, near Naples (Fig. 119). This also seems to belong to the fourth century. It is a baptistery of sixteen sides. The central domed space is thirty-five feet in diameter, while that of the entire building is seventy-three feet. While its exterior is wanting in attractiveness, the interior nevertheless makes upon the mind of the visitor "an impression of the fullness of mystery in which the church of that ¹ Ciampini: Vetere Monumenta, Tom. i, Tab. i, etc. Kugler: Geschichte d. Baukunst, Bd. i, ss. 327, 328. Dehio u. Bezold: Op. cit., s. 34, Taf. 8, Fig. 1, 2.

² Now in the Vatican Museum.

³ Förster: Mittel u. Unter Italien, s. 250.

⁴ Kugler: Op. cit., Bd. i, s. 328.

period must vie with the decaying splendor of heathen temples and shrines."¹ While grouped in the same class as Santa Costanza, this building differs from it in many essential features, in some respects being quite closely allied to San Vitale of Ravenna.²

A third example of this architectural type is the baptistery of San Giovanni in Laterano in Rome.³ Tradition attributes the foundation to Constantine I., but it is highly probable that the building was erected by Sixtus III., in the first half of the fifth century. De Fleury argues this from its architectural features. Eight columns support an entablature upon which rests a second series of columns, by which the dome is supported. Between the central space and the enclosing wall is a broad passage-way which is lighted by windows placed in the lower section of the dome. While much pertaining to this baptistery is conjectural, it is nevertheless fairly well established that the main features were as here represented. The general custom of devoting a separate building to the celebration of this initiative rite of the Christian Church is here illustrated.

The diversity of opinion relative to the connection and reciprocal influence of eastern and western architectural principles is very manifest in the case of San Stefano rotondo,⁴ of Rome. "It is an enigma in the architectural history of Rome" (Dehio u. Bezold). By some it has been regarded as a transformation of an earlier temple of Vesta; by others (specially by some of the French archaeologists) as an apartment of the grand market of Nero; by still others (Bunsen) as an original church, while others (Hübseh) regard it as a most striking proof of the inventive genius of the early Christian architects. While lacking demonstrative evidence the opinion is nevertheless fairly established that it originated in the fifth century, probably in the reign of Theodosius the Great, just prior to the Roman downfall. It likewise possesses elements allying it to the central buildings of the Orient which originated in the reign of Constantine I. Just to what extent the liturgical needs of the Church influenced its peculiar construction may not be fully determined. Certainly its arrangement of concentric circles in connection with two perpendicular axes justifies its classification under the head of central domical buildings.⁵

¹ Burckhardt: Cicerone, s. 89.

² Dehio u. Bezold: Op. cit., 1te Lief., ss. 34, 35, Taf. 8, Fig. 3, 4.

³ Rohault de Fleury: Le Lateran, pl. 7, Fig. 3, 4. Bunsen: Die Basiliken des christlichen Roms, Taf. xxxvii. Dehio u. Bezold: Op. cit., ss. 34, 35, Taf. 8, Fig. 3, 4.

⁴ Fergusson: History of Architecture. Bunsen: Beschreibung d. Stadt Roms, iii. Die Basiliken d. Christ. Roms, Taf. xix, B. C. Hübseh: Die alt-christliche Kirchen.

⁵ Dehio u. Bezold: Op. cit., s. 41, Taf. 11, Fig. 1, 2.

Among other noted churches of this class may be mentioned the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, at Jerusalem, and the Church of the Ascension, on the Mount of Olives, both from the Constantinian period. Unfortunately, they are known only through the descriptions of the historians. An example of the purest Byzantine style, wrought out by Byzantine artists, yet for Mohammedan uses, is the Mosque of Omar, at Jerusalem, built on the site of Solomon's temple. It belongs to the seventh century. It is the finest example of the central structure that has been preserved, and ranks among the most impressive sacred buildings of the world, not from its vastness, but from the purity of its style and the intense interest associated with its site.¹

§ 7. The Cruciform Buildings.

A fifth class of central buildings of the early Christian centuries is the cruciform. They were at first mostly with equal arms—the Latin form of the cross being later introduced into the oblong basilica through the development of the transept. Christian structures in the general form of the Greek cross were commonly used for burial chapels. Like forms are met in buildings of pagan origin, and devoted to like purposes; yet it is most probable that the Christian Church first attached to the form of the cross a deep religious significance, and found it especially adapted to the purposes of public worship.

FIG. 120. — SS. Nazareo e Celso. Burial Chapel of Galla Placidia, Ravenna. Groundplan.

The Church of SS. Nazareo e Celso,² of Ravenna (Figs. 120, 121), is a good example of this species of central structure. It was the burial chapel of Galla Placidia, and is still among the most instructive monuments of early Christian architecture.³ The fate of this woman, whose ¹ The controversies respecting the origin, location, and fate of the buildings erected on this sacred site have been protracted, and at times passionate. The most calm, thorough, and generally satisfactory examinations have been made by the Count de Vogüé in his Le Temple de Jerusalem and Les Églises de la terre sainte.

² H. Gally Knight: Op. cit., plate vi. Quast: Op. cit., ss. 10–15, tt. ii–vi. Delio u. Bezold: Op. cit., s. 45, t. 12. Fig. 4, 5.

³ The church proper is the Latin cross, the upper portion of the figure; the other parts show the groundplan of buildings connected with the church.

fortunes were so strangely romantic, cannot be established with complete historic certainty, nor has the question whether she died in Rome or Ravenna been satisfactorily determined. The fact of her interment in this building is, however, generally accepted. The magnificent interior, which is in the spirit of the truest art, suggests the mausoleum of some royal personage, and indicates a period when correct art principles had not yet been supplanted by the rudeness of a later barbarism. The groundplan is that of a Latin cross (v. Fig. 120) like some that had already been built in Rome and in the Orient; but it is note-worthy that this is the oldest existing church in which the dome covers a quadrangular space in the form of the cross.¹ The exterior is of brick, and of very indifferent appearance. The interior form and arrangement are, however, quite peculiar, approaching more nearly to the classic spirit than do other so-called Byzantine buildings in the Occident. The decorations in mosaics and marbles are rich and harmonious (v. Fig. 121). The figures are well executed, the details pleasing, and all contribute to the perfection of the whole. In it are five sarcophagi.² Their history is somewhat uncertain, yet by combining the traditions and all the known facts it seems probable that the building was designed for a mausoleum for Galla Placidia and her family. Under the dome, between the sarcophagi, stands an altar which is of much archæological interest in connection with the appointments of the Church of the fifth century.³

Fig. 121.—SS. Nazareo e Celso, Ravenna. Longitudinal section.

¹ Quast: s. 11, t. ii, 5.

² The position of three of these is seen in Figs. 120 and 121.

³ Quast: s. 13, t. iii, 2.

Another species of this class of cruciform structures is represented by the Cathedral of Trier, from the fourth century, A. D. 370 (Fig. 122).

Fig. 122. — Cathedral of Trier.
Groundplan.

This cannot with strict propriety be called a central structure; nevertheless the other parts are so brought into architectural unity by the middle portion that its likeness to other buildings of the central type is striking. The intersection of four vaulted ceilings in the middle of the church, over which rises the dome, suggests a rivalry between the Byzantine style and that of the oblong basilica.

Among the most important of this species of churches is San Lorenzo of Milan, probably from the fifth century. Whether its origin was pagan or Christian has been warmly debated, nor is it certain what portions of the present structure are original. Nevertheless, the attractiveness of its style and arrangement, as well as its probable antiquity, have justified the thorough study of its details.

CHAPTER VII.

EARLY CHRISTIAN EPIGRAPHY.

§ 1. Definitions and Principles.

EPIGRAPHY treats of the content, character, chronology, deciphering, and interpretation of inscriptions.

The term inscriptions is applied to "all non-literary remains of a language with the exception of coins, letters and journals."¹ They are found in widely separated districts, on various materials, and executed for a great variety of purposes. While some would refer these chiefly to the department of literary history,² it is evident that they are likewise invaluable in the study of political history, of private life, of religion, laws, arts, and beliefs.

When Paul, on Mars Hill, said to the Athenians, "I perceive that in all things ye are very religious. For, as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO AN UNKNOWN GOD" (Acts xvii, 22, 23), he recognized the importance and utility of epigraphical teaching. The apostolic example was frequently imitated by the Christian fathers in their apologetic writings against their heathen opponents, and afterward in the defence of the Catholic doctrines as against the heretical teachers. Not infrequently inscriptions are quoted in their exegetical works and in their sermons, while the early Church historians, Eusebius and Socrates, depend for some of their statements upon the evidence furnished by inscriptions which were well known in their times but afterwards perished.

Since the great revival of the sixteenth century this department of archæology has been very diligently cultivated. By the added evidence of epigraphical remains the history of Asiatic dynasties and of Egypt has been entirely reconstructed, and the character of these far off civilizations has been determined with a good degree of certainty. The military conquests, the social status of the people, the implements of peaceful industry and of war, the provisions for education, the condition of science, literature, and art, are often most clearly attested by these silent, unconscious witnesses. The results of epigraphical studies have not been less interesting or helpful in writing the history of the Christian Church. They have fully confirmed the opinion that Christianity was early embraced by members of the better families at Rome. They have more clearly illustrated the contrast between heathen and Christian morality, life, and hopes. They have greatly strengthened confidence in the integrity and accuracy of some of the early Church historians, upon whose statements unstinted ridicule had hitherto been cast. They have proved the tenacity of heathen faith and practices, and their vitality long after the time to which it had been usual to refer their decadence and death. They have confirmed the statements relative to the rapid progress of monasticism in the West during the fourth and fifth centuries, and have suggested sufficient reasons for the marvellous success of this institution. They have shown that the accounts of suffering, and of the number of martyr deaths among the early Christians, were not exaggerated by the ancient Church historians (Eusebius and others), and that the attempts (notably by Gibbon and his school) to diminish the horrors of the Neronian and other persecutions are not justified by the evidence. They have unconsciously testified to the orders and duties of the clergy, and to the number, modes of administration, and efficacy of the Christian sacraments. They have clearly proved the acceptance and strong supporting power of the distinguishing doctrines of Christianity in the midst of the most trying circumstances. They have been the means of correcting serious errors in chronology, and of determining the genuine text of the early Christian writings.¹

¹ v. Huebner: article "Inscriptions" in the Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th edition.

² v. Boeckh: Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum, vol. i, Preface, p. vii.

The number of Christian inscriptions of the first six centuries already described is very great. It is impossible to speak with precision, since hundreds are yearly added to the number. Probably more than twenty thousand have been discovered, and accessions are made almost daily.² Of these by far the larger portion (probably more than three fourths) have been found in Rome and its immediate vicinity. Great as is the number already known, it is but a small fraction of what once existed. "From collections made in the eighth and ninth centuries it appears that there were once at least one hundred and seventy ancient Christian inscriptions in Rome which had an historical or monumental character, written generally in metre, and to be seen at that time in the places they were intended to illustrate. Of these only twenty-six remain in whole or in parts. In the Roman topographies of the seventh century, one hundred and forty sepulchres of famous martyrs and confessors are enumerated; we have recovered only twenty inscribed memorials to assist us in the identification of these. Only nine epitaphs have come to light belonging to the bishops of Rome during these same six centuries; and yet, during that period, there were certainly buried in the suburbs of the city upward of sixty."¹ De Rossi believes that more than one hundred thousand Christian inscriptions of the first six centuries once existed, four fifths of which have been lost.

Number of Christian inscriptions.

¹ "Inscriptions are discoveries capitalized, as it were, and the income of them is only gradually realized."—W. P. P. Longfellow in the American Journal of Archæology, 1885, p. 203.

² In 1862 de Rossi affirmed that the number of Christian inscriptions of the first six centuries then known was about fourteen thousand, of which eleven thousand were found in Rome and vicinity, and three thousand in all the rest of the world. v. De la Détermination Chronologique des Inscriptions chrétiennes in the Revue Archéologique, December, 1862. The archæological world has long awaited the publication of de Rossi's second volume of the Inscriptiones Christianæ. Until this appears many things are left to mere conjecture.

The early Christian inscriptions are mostly found upon stone (generally marble), bronze, or on tables of baked clay. A few examples in which the inscription is upon lead Materials on which inscriptions are found. tablets or plates have been preserved.² The letters are usually sunk into the stone; in very few cases, if at all, are they in relief. Sometimes, especially in the catacombs of Rome, Syracuse, and Naples,³ the inscription is painted, usually with red pigment; in some instances the sculptured letters are gilded.

The writers on Latin epigraphy divide the inscriptions into two classes: "(1) those which were written upon other ob- Kinds of inscriptions. jects of various kinds, to denote their peculiar purpose, and in this way have been preserved along with them; and (2) those which themselves are the objects, written, to be durable, as a rule, on metal or stone. The first class is that of inscriptions in the stricter sense of the word (tituli); the second is that of instruments or charters, public or private (leges, instrumenta, tabulæ)."⁴ Some writers on Christian epigraphy⁵ incline to a threefold division, namely: (1) Those cut in stone or bronze (marmora, tituli, lapides); (2) those painted in colors or sometimes written with coal (Ital.

¹ Northcote and Brownlow: Roma Sotterranea, vol. ii, part iii, p. 3.

² In this respect they correspond to the heathen inscriptions, only very few of which are found on thin lead plates, which were rolled up, placed in the tombs, and thus preserved. v. Franz: Elem. Epigr. Gr., p. 168.

³ v. Schultze: Katakomben v. S. Gennaro dei Poveri in Neapel., pp. 37, 50, etc. Martigny: Dictionn., etc., p. 361. Bullettino Arch. crist., 1880, t. i; 1881, t. vii and viii.

⁴ Huebner: Op. cit.

⁵ De Rossi, and his commentators and disciples.

dipinti); and (3) those which have been scratched on stone, mortar, or cement (Ital. graffiti). Under the second are usually classified the painted and gilded glasses and the colored mosaics, which are somewhat numerous and important.¹

It is highly probable that inscriptions of the first class were prepared in the shops of the workers in marble (marmorarii). The sign of such an artisan has been found in Pompeii.² The painted inscriptions and some of the graffiti, on the contrary, seem to have been sometimes prepared by the friends of the deceased, or by the Fossores. In a few graffiti are indications that they were prepared to ridicule the Christians and their faith³ (v. Figs. 25, 26).

In Christian epigraphy, as in manuscripts, well settled paleographic principles must be observed in order to determine the genuineness and age of inscriptions. While these principles have not been so scientifically determined in the case of Christian inscriptions as in those of classical origin, much aid is, nevertheless, furnished by them to the student of Christian antiquities to settle doubtful chronologies and to detect spurious monuments.

Three forms of writing are used in Christian inscriptions; namely, capitals, uncial characters, and cursive writing.⁴ The capitals are generally used in the earliest inscriptions, but are often found in connection with the more popular and convenient cursive writing. The uncials are related to the cursive in their inclination to round the character, but more nearly resemble the capital. This begins to appear during the fourth century, while in the fifth it is first fully popularized.

Usually, as in English, these inscriptions are read from left to right; in a few instances they are read from right to left, while in some others they must be read from top to bottom (v. Plate VI, No. 3). The lines are usually of equal length, of considerable regularity, and are broken up without respect to the division of single words. In later inscriptions, especially, the spaces between the letters are very evenly divided.

Punctuation seems to have been governed by other principles than are now recognized. Instead of indicating the sense, it marked lines, words, syllables, and even letters. No

¹ For reasons elsewhere given we have not observed this classification.

² "Titulos scribendos vel si quid operis marmorar (ii) opus fuerit, hic habes."

³ v. Garrucci: Il Crocifisso Graffito in casa dei Cesari. Becker: Das Spott-Crucifix.

⁴ v. Zell: Handbuch der röm. Epigraphik. Le Blant: Inscriptions chrét. de la Gaul, etc. Also his Manuel d'Épigraphie chrétienne.

regularity is observed, oftentimes punctuation being wholly wanting. The marks vary from a point to a heart-shaped leaf (Plate VIII, No. 6), a cross¹ (Plate VIII, No. 3), a star, a  (Plate VIII, No. 2), or a triangle, while the end of an inscription is seldom marked at all. In common with other ancient inscriptions, those of Christian origin are often greatly abbreviated,² either by the union of letters or their omission. The abbreviations by joined letters (literæ ligatæ) are presumably of later origin.

The orthography of Christian inscriptions often departs widely from accepted standards, and not seldom from that in ^{Orthography of} current use. This incorrect spelling rapidly increased ^{inscriptions.} during the fifth century, the period of the destructive invasions of the northern hordes. It consists in change of vowels, in the interchange of the linguals and labials, in the omission of letters, etc. There is frequent departure from the current syntax in the use of unusual and non-classical forms with prepositions, of relative pronouns, etc. At times attempts to correct these errors are noticed. Occasionally Latin words are written with Greek characters, and conversely; sometimes both Latin and Greek characters are found in the same inscription, and in a few instances the inscription stands in both Latin and Greek.

For historical and archaeological purposes the determination of the date of inscriptions is of prime importance. Only ^{Chronology of} thus are they helpful to mark the changes which the ^{inscriptions.} Church underwent in successive periods of its history. Since but a small number of the monuments containing inscriptions bear a definite date,¹ it has been necessary to agree upon principles to govern in ascertaining the chronology of those lacking in this particular. Upon monuments of the West are found most frequent indications of the time of their preparation. In this the heathen and Christian monuments alike agree. The most usual means of marking the date is by the consular era, the year being sometimes expressed by figures, sometimes by letters. The usual abbreviations for consul and consular occurring on the pagan monuments are likewise used in Christian inscriptions: COS, CONS, COSS, CONSS, CC-SS, and CS for CONSVLE, CONSVLIBVS. This method of indicating dates continued until the abolition of the consular office.² In the Orient, however, there are only exceptional cases of the use of the consular era. In the fourth century first appears the title CON., CONS before the name, and the added abbreviations VC, VVCC, that is, vir(i) clarissimus(i); likewise the mode of reckoning after the consulate: \overline{PC} , POST CON, POS, \overline{PCC} , etc., begins in the same century.

¹ Opinions differ as to the significance of the heart-shaped leaf and the cross in the midst of Christian inscriptions. The first has by some (de Rossi: Inscriptiones, etc., i, pp. 70, 148) been interpreted to indicate the grief of surviving friends. Both are found in connection with heathen inscriptions, and therefore can scarcely be regarded as having in themselves a religious significance. "C'est un usage antique adopté par les chrétiens, parce qu'il n'avait aucun caractère essentiellement religieux."—Martigny: Dict., p. 186.

² The hermeneutical principles of classical epigraphy are equally applicable to inscriptions of Christian origin. It is to be regretted that there is no good handbook on this subject. Many valuable suggestions can, however, be found in the various collections of inscriptions. Among the older may be mentioned Morcelli: De Stilo Inscript. lat.; among the later, the valuable collections of Orelli, Mommsen, de Rossi, Le Blant, Boeckh, etc. In the preface of the Corpus Inscript. Græcarum, Boeckh has given some laws that have not been superseded. C. T. Newton: Essays on Art and Archaeology, has made instructive suggestions. Also, McCaul: Christian Epitaphs of the First Six Centuries, in the introductory chapter, furnishes valuable information as to methods of interpretation, etc. This great want of a treatise (elementary) upon Greek epigraphy seems now to be supplied in the late work of Reinach, Salomon: Traité d'Épigraphie Grecque. Paris, 1885.

With A. D. 312³ the Romans began to reckon by the cycle of Indictions.
indictions, that is, by cycles of fifteen years, or the time at the end of which a new census was taken and new taxes were levied. Examples of this method of reckoning occur at an earlier date in the East than in the West, no instance appearing in Rome earlier than A. D. 423, and in Gaul in A. D. 491.⁴ The usual abbreviation is IND; but besides this are met INDIC, IN-DICT, INDE.

In various parts of the Roman Empire the date was sometimes Provincial eras.
indicated by the provincial era. In Spain the burial monuments follow the Spanish era (B. C. 38); in North Africa the era Maurretanica (A. D. 40⁵) is met with, etc. The Dionysian era does not appear until much later. The month, day of the month, and week are frequently indicated in accordance with Roman custom. The interpretation of dates, when recorded, be-

¹ Le Blant: Op. cit., says that of 720 inscriptions in Gaul, only 147 bear any mark of date; of 200 in Trèves, only one contains a definite date; of about 11,000 described by de Rossi in his first volume on the Christian inscriptions of the first seven centuries, only 1,347 contain any chronologic indication of a date, and of this number only about 150 are earlier than 350 A. D.

² Discontinued under Justinian, and legally abolished by Leo the philosopher.

³ Some have attributed the introduction of the indiction to Constantine, others to Diocletian.

⁴ Le Blant: Inscrip. chrét. Gaule, No. 388. Some epigraphists insist that no example of Christian inscriptions reckoning by indictions appears at Rome earlier than A. D. 517.

⁵ Some writers say B. C. 33. v. p. 33, note.

comes therefore a matter of comparatively little difficulty. But it is far more difficult to fix the chronology of inscriptions that bear no date. Herein appear the value and necessity of epigraphical science.

Inscriptions without dates.

By patient and protracted comparative study of inscriptions whose dates are well ascertained, the epigraphist has discovered means of determining with considerable accuracy the chronology of others. Well-established criteria have thus simplified the study of epigraphical remains, and sound scientific methods have been developed and successfully applied. For the chronology of Christian inscriptions the following particulars have been found especially important; namely, the character of the writing, (paleography), the formularies, the proper names, and the presence or absence of symbolic characters, as the cross, the monogram of Christ, $\chi\rho$, the Λ Ω , the dove, the fish, the peacock, etc. Also the peculiar cycle of the subjects of the paintings with which the inscriptions may be found associated.¹

General principles.

Brief and simple formulas, without statements relative to the character of the person, or the place and time of burial, as HIC IACET, HIC REQUIESCIT, etc., are presumably of highest antiquity. The introduction of special circumstances, such as HIC IACET IN NOMINE CHRISTI, HIC REQUIESCIT IN PACE, etc., usually indicate a later date.² Also minute descriptions of the age, and of the day of death and burial, the enumeration of praiseworthy qualities, the metrical form, and the stately eulogium are indications of a later origin.³

Special indications.

With respect to the date of the introduction of the various symbols there is wider difference of opinion. More thorough study of these interesting Christian remains inclines the historian of art, as well as the epigraphist, to give to them a greater antiquity than was formerly allowed. The dove was formerly believed to be found on no Christian monument of an ear-

Date of symbols.

¹ v. De Rossi: Inscriptiones Christianæ urbis Romæ, etc., pp. cviii and cix. "Illud restat inquirendum, quomodo inter hos ipsos terminos singularum inscriptionum ætas pressius possit definiri. Id examinatis litterarum formis," etc.

² Of the close of the fifth and the following centuries. v. Le Blant: Manuel d'Épigraphie chrétienne, etc., p. 35; also Hübner: Inscriptiones Hispaniæ Christianæ, p. ix.

³ Compare especially de Rossi: Introduction to his Inscriptiones Christianæ; his treatise—De la détermination chronol. des Inscript. chrét. (Revue Archéol., 1862). Le Blant: Inscrip. chrét. Gaule, p. vi, et al.; J. Ritter: De compositione titul. Christ., Berol. 1877, s. 12, et al. De Rossi and Le Blant, while independent workers, are in entire harmony touching the principles governing the interpretation of inscriptions. There is also a remarkable agreement in their conclusions respecting the most important questions.

lier date than A. D. 268 in Rome, and A. D. 378 in Gaul;¹ but it is found in connection with inscriptions now believed to belong to the first half of the second century.

§ 2. The Subject and Content of Inscriptions.

As has already been shown (v. p. 60, et seq.), Christian monuments of the first three centuries were closely associated with those of heathen origin. As in monuments of plastic art, so in the department of epigraphy, the influence of pagan thought is manifest. Christian art liberated itself only by degrees from its first teacher and guide, and developed an independent character. This holds equally true of Christian inscriptions. On many monuments their Christian origin cannot at all be inferred from their contents. In some other instances the added expressions IN PACE, EN EIPHNH, or the wishes VIVAS IN DEO, VIVAS IN AETERNVM, are the only grounds of distinction.² The agreement of pagan and Christian in regarding death as a sleep is sometimes plainly seen. The added thought of a continuance of life after death is peculiarly Christian.³ Even in the

¹ Le Blant: Inscript. chrét. de la Gaule. Paris, 1856.

The following table gives his opinion respecting the chronology of some of these symbols: v. p. xiv.

SYMBOL.	ROME.	GAUL.
The dove.....	From A. D. 268-500, 524 ?.....	From A. D. 378-612.
✠	" " 298 ? 331-451 or 474....	" " 377-493.
A Ω	" " 355 ? 363-509.....	" " 377-547.
P	" " 355 to between 542 and 565.....	" about A. D. 400-525 or 540.
The vase.....	" " 391-472 or 489.....	" about A. D. 450-563.
The cross in the body of the inscription.....	" " 375 ? 407-527.....	" A. D. 448 till after 585.
The cross at the beginning of inscriptions.....	" " 450-589.....	" " 503 to about 680.

v. also his Manuel d'Epigraphie chrétienne, pp. 27, 28, 29.

² The expressions IN PACE, EN EIPHNH, are also found upon Jewish burial monuments of the pre-Christian period. v. Le Blant: N. 621: C. I. Gr., NN. 9902, 9909, 9921, 9923, etc. Supi, p. 177. Victor Schultze: Arch. Stud., s. 260, N. 6, et al., is of opinion that ἐν εἰρήνῃ is proof of Christian or Jewish origin.

³ Raoul Rochette (Deuxième Mem. sur les ant. chrét., p. 27) is thoroughly consistent with himself in claiming that χοιμᾶσθαι ἐν εἰρήνῃ, dormire in pace, are also found on pagan burial monuments. But this opinion seems to lack firm archæological support.

fourth and fifth centuries, after Christianity had achieved an essential triumph in its fierce encounter with paganism, traces of heathen influence are present in Christian epigraphy as well as in plastic art.

The abbreviation D· M·, D· M· S· (dis manibus, dis manibus sacrum), occurs on monuments of the third and fourth century (in Greek Θ. Κ. θεοῖς καταθνήσκεις). More than a hundred examples of this kind have already been found, many of the monuments of the third and fourth centuries belonging to this class. The original religious significance of these abbreviations seems in a later period to have been lost sight of, and they became a mere traditional heading for inscriptions on burial monuments. In some instances the monogram of Christ, $\overline{\text{P}}$, $\overline{\text{P}}$, stands connected with the D· M·; thus $\overline{\text{P}}$ D· M· $\overline{\text{P}}$ or D· M· $\overline{\text{P}}$ S·.¹

A careful examination of this subject has led Becker to the following conclusions:

1. The signs D· M·, D· M· S· can never mean any Becker's conclusions. thing else than Dis Manibus or Dis Manibus Sacrum. The translation Deo Magno, or Deo Maximo, finds no justification in any single Christian monument.

2. The reason for placing the sign, D· M·, on Christian burial monuments is found in its very commonness of use. This was the customary beginning of sepulchral inscriptions, and thus a fashion was established.² At length this formula lost its original significance, and became almost meaningless.³

3. The opinion that the Christians purchased in the shops stones on which the D· M· had already been wrought by heathen artists is scarcely tenable. It seems to lack solid foundation.

4. With respect to their chronology, these monuments do not pertain to the earliest period of Christian inscriptions. The majority belong to the third century, and to the age of Constantine.⁴

¹ v. Spano: Scoperte Archeol., p. 39. F. Becker: Die heidnische Weiheformel D. M.

² We must trace the later HIC IACET, and the Germ. "HIER RUHET IN GOTT," and the English "HERE LIES" to the same source.

³ In one instance, at least, there seems to be a sort of protest against this use of the D. M.; since the Christian A Ω is associated with it, as in the following from Anagni, quoted by V. Schultze: Die Katakomben, p. 250.

aD	Mω
VALERIA	RODE
VALERIAE	RODE
NI MATRI	CAR.
BEN
MERENTI	FO

$\overline{\text{P}}$

⁴ v. Becker: Op. cit., p. 65, et seq.

The expressions occasionally found on Christian and Jewish monuments seem to indicate a want of universal belief in the reality of a future life. Inscriptions like the following, ΘΑΠCI TATA MHTHP ΟΥΔΕΙC ΑΘΑΝΑΤΟC,¹ as well as the designation of the grave as domus æterna, perpetua sedes, οίκος αλάνιος, show that the Christian thought is yet influenced by the heathen doubt respecting the future. It lingers as an unpleasant and entangling inheritance, and proves the power of traditional systems, or argues the unconscious use of a language whose original significance had already faded out, but whose form remained. The desire that the body should be interred, in order to secure the repose of the spirit, was quite general among the Greeks. Many precautions were taken that the tombs might remain undisturbed. The penalties threatened to the despoilers and plunderers of graves are often expressed in very strong terms.² The necessity of burial as a condition of future rest, and of attaining to a resurrection, is also sometimes expressed in these burial inscriptions. The longings, laments, prayers, and execrations found upon Christian monuments are occasionally in almost exact imitation of the heathen custom;³ although the most incredulous must be persuaded that the general spirit of these inscriptions is that of patience, forgiveness, love, cheerfulness, and hope. Occasionally is met the "eternal memory," the "eternal sleep," the "raging Tartarus," the "Elysian grove," the "anger of Styx," etc. At times quotations from the heathen poets are found, and the terms perire and vita privatus are used to express dying. Indeed, in the Christian inscriptions that syncretism is noticed which becomes so general during the fourth and fifth centuries

¹ From San Ciriaco in Ancona. v. Buonarroti, Osservazioni sopra alcuni frammenti di vasi antichi di vetro, etc., Firenze, 1716, p. 169.

² Comp. Wood, J. T.: Discoveries at Ephesus. Inscriptions from tombs, sarcophagi, etc., p. 7, No. 6.

Εἰ τις τοῦτον, etc.

"If any one shall either destroy or throw down this altar or tomb, or shall erase a letter, he shall pay to the exchequer 2,500 denarii."

³ Corpus Inscript. Lat., ii, N. 5,415, is an inscription from the basilica of St. Julian at Como running, ADIVRO VVS OMNES ΧΡΙΑΝΙ ΕΤ ΤΕ | CVSTVDE BEATI IVLIANIP DO ΕΤΡ ΤΡΕ | ΜΕΝΔΑ ΔΙΕ ΙΥΔΙΧΙ VΤ ΗΥΝC SEPVLCRVM n u nqAM VLLO TEMPORE VIOLETVR | sed conservet (ur) usque ad finem mundi | ut proxim sine impedimento in vita | redire cum venerit que iudicaturus est vivos et mortuos. . . . See also Reinesius: Synagoga Inscript., xx, 435; Corpus Inscript. Græ., iv, nn. 9,303, 9,802; Ritter: De Composil. tit. Christ., i, p. 36, seq.; Bosio: Roma Sotterranea, p. 436, where the imprecations against those who disturb the graves of the departed seem to reach the climax of severity: MALE PEREAT INSEPVLTVS IACEAT NON RESVRGAT CUM IVDA PARTEM HABEAT SIQIS SEPVLGRAM HVNC VIOLAVERIT.

in every department of thought and life. Great care is, therefore, necessary in their interpretation, and the wide difference between the Christian and pagan view of death as taught by these monuments, which has been claimed by some zealous writers, must be accepted with caution. We are not, however, to suppose that the clear statement of faith in the resurrection and in immortal life is wanting in Christian inscriptions. The Christian Church was much slower to liberate itself from the influence of antiquity in the case of inscriptions than in the case of the plastic arts. Only very seldom is this freedom attained during the pre-Constantine period. While we cannot doubt as to the origin of these inscriptions, the writers of the early Church seem content to indicate the Christian sentiment by a single word or phrase, rather than by the entire writing. This should not cause surprise, since to devise an entirely new terminology or method of expression would require much time and study, and many of the modes of thought then extant were entirely adapted to the needs of the new religion. Hence we find the ancient acclamations to the dead freely used in Christian inscriptions, such as vale, ave, have, salve, XAIPE, etc.

Others plainly and peculiarly Christian.

The expressions in pace, EN EIPHNH, cum pace, with the addition of requiescat, or the words, spiritus tuus in pace, pax tibi, in pace domini, pax tecum, etc., seem to embody more perfectly the Christian spirit and belief. It is when the condition of the departed is expressed in words of hope or congratulation that the contrast between pagan and Christian thought relative to a future life appears in strongest relief. The earnest hopes contained in the simple VIVAS, VIVES, VIVIS, VIVIT, IN AETERNO, IN CHRISTO, IN DEO, IN GLORIA DEI, IN DOMINO IESV, etc., are peculiar to the Christian inscriptions, expressing a cycle of thought entirely unknown to heathen epigraphy. The belief in a resurrection and a future life is here clouded by no doubt which might have come from association with the pagan world. Through a wide geographic and chronologic range these assurances of a future life by the power of Christ are met. In Rome, Gaul, Africa, and the Orient, extending through centuries of time, they frequently occur.¹

§ 3. Application of Principles and their Illustration by Means of Specific Examples.

Plate III is a reduced reproduction of Plate X of Roller's Catacombes de Rome, which was engraved from a photograph of a portion of the Christian Museum of St. John Lateran at Rome.¹ It contains fifty epitaphs, which are illustrated by some of the most prized of the Christian symbols.

¹v. Examples in de Rossi, Le Blant, Boldetti, Corpus Inscript. Græc., Corpus Inscript. Latin., Roller, Kraus, Schultze, etc. The number is large, and the criticism and commentary upon them have been exhaustive.

No. 1 is a monument to Severa, whose bust adorns the slab. The scene here represented is the visitation of the magi, bearing gifts to the infant Christ, who rests upon the lap of his mother. The star is nearly above the head of Mary, while a figure behind, whose character has been a matter of controversy, extends the hand in blessing, or to point out the star to the wise men. The inscription, in Deo vivas, is found very frequently in the third century, but does not pertain to it exclusively. The epigraphist is rather inclined to place this in either the third or fourth century. It was found in a cemetery on the Via Salaria Nova, Rome.

Nos. 2, 3, and 4, are instances of the Good Shepherd upon the burial monuments. The simple inscription on No. 4, Florentius in pacae, would lead us to regard it as of very early origin. Much is said about the symbolism of these and similar scenes. A class of archæologists would say that the trees are the symbol of paradise, to which the soul has departed in peace under the kindly care of the Good Shepherd. This is probably an unwarranted extension of the principle of symbolism, since these trees could more properly be regarded as ornamental, to complete the balancing of the scene.

The Good Shepherd idea is likewise prominent in Nos. 5, 6, 7, 9, 12, and 14. We believe the presence of the tree in 5, 6, and 9 can be more naturally and justly considered artistic than symbolic. Nos. 5, 43, 44, and 45 embody another class of figures, called Orantes, which have been elsewhere examined.

While these figures are not infrequently met in the frescos, their occurrence in connection with inscriptions is quite rare. No. 5 is from the most ancient portion of San Calisto, Rome, reaching back, it is believed, to the first half of the third century. The paleographic suggestion would agree with the other evidences respecting this date. The Greek, ΜΟΥΧΗ ΖΩΝ ΕΠΟΙΗCΕΝ ΑΤΩ ΚΑΙ ΤΗ ΓΥΝΕΚΙ, is not an unusual method of expressing the dedication of a monument by the living to the dead.

¹ The plates here used in illustration of Christian epigraphy are for the most part reduced from those in Roller's magnificent work. This Museum contains the richest collection of Christian inscriptions in the world. By special correspondence, in which M. Roller's desire to extend a knowledge of Christian archæology completely dominated every other motive, arrangements were made to use these and other plates. Grateful acknowledgment of this kindness is here made.

PLATE III.—Christian Inscriptions associated with Christian Symbols.

Nos. 8 and 9 illustrate the commingling of Latin and Greek in the same inscription, No. 8, and the omission of letters, Commingling of symbols. COIVGI for CONIVGI, No. 9. They have a curious combination of symbols. No. 8 has for a central figure the Good Shepherd, on one side of whom is a lion, on the other some devouring monster whose character is not well defined. It has been suggested that these may represent the foes that threatened the life of the sheep which the Good Shepherd will rescue. The anchor and the  plainly point to the ground of the Christian's hope. The right hand figure in No. 9 is a rude form of the ark, toward which the dove is flying, bearing in its beak the olive branch. In No. 49 this scene is repeated. This is a very frequent symbol of the nature and office work of the Church— The Church. the ark of safety bearing its precious freight over the dangerous sea of life.¹

The frequent recurrence of the anchor (8, 18, 19, 21, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28) is very noteworthy, since these are found on monuments discovered in and near Rome. So the frequent use of the fish on these burial monuments (Nos. 11, 16, 20, 22) has been discussed elsewhere (v. pp. 77-83). No. 15 represents a scene frequently met in the frescos, and not seldom found on the sculptured monuments. Raising of Lazarus. The raising of Lazarus by Him who is the Life was symbolic of the doctrine of the resurrection, which was the central truth of the apostolic preaching, and the source of solace to a despised and oftentimes suffering Church. No. 10 is also the representation of a mummy-like figure in a tomb, surmounted by the , the hope of the deceased.

The  monuments have been elsewhere discussed, and the aid which they furnish in determining the chronology of inscriptions with which they are associated has been pointed out. Nos. 29, 30, 31 are noteworthy as containing the swastica in connection with other symbols; with the simplest form of the cross in a circle, as emblem of eternity, in No. 31, with the B·M· in No. 29, and with the  in No. 30. The origin of this symbol has been elsewhere examined (v. pp. 84, 85). No. 32 has, in connection with the name AGAPIS, an unusual combination of symbols. Unusual combination of symbols. The Tau, or an obscure form of cross, is directly associated with the A Ω and with the . It may well suggest the question whether the sculptor had in mind the idea of the crucifixion. The crucifix, wherein is a direct and literal representation of the divine Victim upon the cross, has not yet found its way into the art of the Church; the early Christians prefer to shadow forth this supreme event under the garb of symbolism. Still, it may be difficult to interpret this symbolism in any other way than by the suggestion of sacrifice upon the cross. Nos. 43, 44, 45 have associated with the central figure—an orante—certain marks and characters which are quite infrequent in monumental art. The two busts in 43 and 44 have an uncertain reference. The suggestion that they may represent the chief apostles may have something in its favor, yet there is nothing to absolutely confirm it. No. 44 has likewise on each side of the praying figure a candelabrum resting upon a tripod of dolphins. The style of these candelabra would point to a Byzantine influence, and would suggest a date as late as the sixth or seventh century. That evidence is here found that ^{Tapers in the}lighted tapers were used in the forms of worship ^{Churchservice.} may not be accepted; but that lights had already been introduced into parts of the service is generally conceded. Above the orante, in No. 45, is seemingly the representation of the choir of a basilica. Here, too, the tapers are introduced; but the interpretation is obscure and unsatisfactory. Probably the artist had in view the ornamentation of the tomb, and was guided in his work by the necessity of a proper balancing of parts. As before observed, the introduction of some of these figures seems plainly for decorative purposes; this view is more reasonable than to violate the principles of symbolism by suggesting some unfounded or fanciful interpretation.¹

¹ Even Hasenclever: Der altchristliche Gräbersmuck, Braunschweig, 1886, s. 114, concedes that this figure of the ship and ark are used as religious symbols, and not simply to indicate the maritime industries of the Christians of Alexandria.

Plate IV, containing a representation of sixty-five sepulchral monuments, is also from a photograph of a section of the Lateran Museum, Rome.² It is designed to illustrate the symbolism in prevalent use among the early Christians. Many of the subjects contained in Plate III are here repeated. The orantes, as found in Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, preserve the general character of these figures as they are met in the frescos. The presence of the χ in most of these vouches for their Christian character, and also enables us to fix their chronology as not earlier than the beginning of the fourth century, nor later than the latter quarter of the fifth century, if the monument is of Roman origin, nor later than the close of the fifth century, if found in Gaul.¹ The simplicity of No. 11, Alexandra in pace, as well as the accompanying figure of the dove, might suggest a monument of the middle of the third century or the beginning of the fourth.

¹ It is not proposed to enter into the explanation of every inscription or burial monument represented in the plates. They are given as samples of the style of inscriptions which illustrate the principles before enunciated. To leave a portion of each plate to be deciphered by the student may contribute to a greater facility in reading and interpretation.

² After Roller.

PLATE IV.—Christian Symbols on Burial Monuments.

In Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18 is found repeated the box-like ark, believed to be the symbol of the Church, and of safety to all who enter it.

The frequent recurrence of the dove upon burial monuments has given occasion for much writing on its significance.

As with respect to other figures, so here, too, is wide difference of opinion. Interpreters who would reduce Christian symbolism to its minimum of meaning, or regard it as only imitative of the pagan thought, would see in the dove little more than an appropriate and pleasing decoration for the monument, with no symbolic significance; while another class, who are finding in each object connected with the Christian monuments a hidden yet important lesson, would in every instance attach to this figure of the dove the idea of innocence, of purity, etc., as illustrative of the character of the deceased, or as symbolic of the soul itself, which finds its rest and assurance in the presence of Christ—the . In Nos. 24, 38, it is very difficult for the observer to be convinced that any thing more than a pleasing ornamentation was designed; yet in these, and in monuments like 27, 28, 29, the school of extreme symbolism has professed to find a reference to the eucharist: the grapes suggesting the wine, the wine suggesting the words of Jesus, "I will not drink henceforth of this ." The grapes.

fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom" (Matt. xxvi, 29). In No. 50 is found a very unusual combination for a Christian monument. The inscription, Ælia Bictorina posuit Aureliæ·Probæ, "Ælia Victorina set this up to Aurelia Proba," is a very common form. The peacock was likewise used as a symbol of immortality; but the other figure is obscure in its reference. If it is to be regarded as a lion, then the suggestion that it may refer to Christ as the Lion of the tribe of Judah may not be unreasonable, and the whole monument may teach that the immortality of the departed soul was secured through this One who had been victor over death, whose power and worthiness are the subject of the inspiring apocalyptic vision given in Rev., chap. v.  The lion.

In 62, 63 is the recurrence of the ship or ark, with the addition of the tower or lighthouse. It may not violate any law of symbolism to regard this tower as the goal of the earthly voyaging, the eternal mansions which are to receive the faithful wanderer over life's perilous sea. "Firmia Victora, who lived sixty-five years," is the simple inscription; the symbols tell a more significant story.

¹ Le Blant: Manuel d'Épigraphie chrétienne, pp. 27–29.

The palm-branch is of very frequent occurrence on the marbles, as The palm branch. in the frescos. In Nos. 54, 55, and 56 this appears as the prominent symbol. It is not difficult to interpret this, since here is the frequently recurring reference of the Apocalypse to the victory which the redeemed shall finally achieve, as in 60, 61 the like triumph is symbolized by the chaplet or crown.

Plate V represents inscriptions from the first half of the third century. The first four give the simplest expressions used upon the burial monuments of the early Christians. Decessit, often abbreviated to dec., dep. depositus, sep. sepultus, are the Simple inscriptions. most common designations of Christian interment. The Greek KATAΘECIC is most nearly synonymous. Rather it would be more strictly correct to say that this is the original word, since the Greek language is usually the earlier in Christian inscriptions of Rome, and depositus may be looked upon as the adequate translation of the Greek KATAΘECIC. It is generally agreed that the primary idea of these words is here preserved, namely, that of a Significance. temporary deposit, in distinction from the idea of a permanent and final act, which the heathen generally expressed by the word positus and compositus. This is not an unimportant fact when the view of death entertained by the pre-Constantine Church is considered.

No. 5 has few distinguishing marks of a Christian inscription. Its fulsome characterization of the offices and relations of the deceased is not in harmony with the usual simplicity of the second or third century. The fact that he was of the emperor's household as well as his freedman is clearly stated; but that a Christian should receive appointment to these important offices at the hand of a very cruel and profligate ruler has given rise to doubt as to the Christian Christians in governmental offices. character of the inscription itself. It is, however, supposed that here, as in case of other well known examples, this libertinus may have, quietly, and unknown to his patron, maintained his associations with the Christian Church, yet, from his superior fidelity to the duties of his offices, have been a favorite with the emperor. Some aid to understand No. 5 is furnished by the very mutilated inscription on the back part of this sarcophagus, in which this name of Prosenes again occurs. By this means the Christian character of the monument is proved. The expression receptus ad Deum is not found in pagan epigraphy.

No. 6 connects with its inscription two well-accepted Christian

DECESSIT

· DEP ·

SEP ·

ΚΑΤΑΘΕCIC
ΦΑΔΙΑΝΗC

M·AVRELIO AVGG·LIB·PROSENETI
A CVBICVLO·AVG·
PROC·THESA VROR VM
PROC·PATRIMONI·PROC·
MVNERVM·PROC·VINORVM
ORDINATO AD IVOCOMMODO
IN KASTRENSE PATRONO PISSIMO
LIBERTI·BENEMERENTI
SAR C O P H A G V M D E S V O ADORNAVERVNT·

AN 236
TI·CL·MARCIVS·ET
CORNELIA·HILARITAS
CORNELIAE·PAVLAE·PAR
FECR·QVAE·VIX·ANN·X·DIEB
VIII·DEC·X·KAL·AVG·MAX ET VRB·COS

PROGENES RECEPTVS ADDEVM·V·NON SSA
BIB·REPTVS IN VRBER·EXP·ENTI ONIVS SCRIBITAMPELVIS LIP·
NIA·PRAESENTE·ET·EXTRICATO·TI

AN 235
AVRELIA DVLCISSIMA FILIA QVAE
DE SAECVLO RECESSIT
VIXIT ANN XV·M·IIII·
SEVERO ET QVINTIN·COSS·

AN 238
Η ΠΑΛΙΤΟC ΘΕΘΟΛΙΑ
ΕCΤΑΤΟC ΕΖΗCΗΕΤΗ
ΠΑΡΗΓΕ ΝΟCΗCΕΝΗ
ΡΙΘΕ ΑΕΥΤΑΤΙ ΡΟΙΑΚΜΑΙ
ΤΙCΑΙ ΠΟΝΤΙΑΝΟΥ ΤΑΥ
ΕΑΝΘΙΑCΗΤΗ ΠΕΛΗΝΩΤΕ
ΙΕΝΟΥΤΟC ΕΛΛΗΝΟC

AN 269
ΑΛΙΑΔ ΑΜΠΟC ΑΥΓΕΜΙ
ΕΡΑΥΙCΙΝΟ CΟC ΔΟCΗC

AN 269
CΕΠΤΙΜΙΟC·ΠΡΑΙΤΕ·ΑΤΟC·ΠΑΙΚΙΛΑΝΟC·
Ο ΔΟΥΛΟC·ΤΟΥ ΔΙΟΥ ΑΞΙΩC·ΒΙΩCΑC
ΟΥ ΜΕΤΕΝΟΗCΑ·ΚΑΝ ΩΔΕ CΟΙ ΥΠΕΡCΤΗCΑ
ΚΑΙ ΕΥΚΛΑCΤΗCΩ·ΤΩ ΟΝΟΜΑΤΙ CΟΤ·ΠΑΡΙCΘΑC
ΤΗΝ ΨΥΧΗΝ·Ω ΘΕΩ·ΤΡΙΑΝΤΑ ΤΡΙΩΝ·ΕΤΩΝ ΕΞ·ΜΗΝΩΝ

ΕΥΜΕΡΙΤΩ·ΟΤΡΑΝΙΑ·
ΟΤΑΤΗΡ·ΗΡΩΔΗC

ΑΡΜΕΝΙΑ·ΦΗΛΙΚΙΤΑ·
ΑΙΔΙΑ·ΡΗΤΙΝΑ

AN 269
IANYXRA COINGIBENE
MERENI GORCONO MAGISTRO
PRIMO

AN 269
LESTINA
N DEOPAX

PLATE V.—Epitaphs from first half of Third Century.

1

2

3

4

5

6

7

8

9

10

11

12

13

14

15

16

17

18

symbols, thus furnishing evidence of its character, while its date, A. D. 234, is well ascertained by the consular indications. No. 7 also has its consular date clearly inscribed. Without such positive information, other characteristics of the inscription would suggest a somewhat earlier origin. The expression Dulcissima has generally been regarded as of a very early date—usually pertaining to the second century, yet not confined to it. The phrase de saeculo recessit is somewhat peculiar, but finds illustration in other monuments, even in some that are non-Christian. It probably is to be understood in the sense of this condition, state, or life, in contrast with that upon which the departed has entered.

In the fragment No. 9 there is little of special interest except the word dormit. It is hardly ever found in the classical epigraphy, and then in a sense radically different from that which the Christians attached to it. Much has been said about the doctrinal import of this term. It has been quoted in support of the opinion that the common teaching of the Church of the third century was that there was a slumber of the soul between death and the final resurrection. Such use of a term in epigraphic study would hardly be justifiable. It must be taken in connection with other and equally important expressions which would point to a contrary doctrine. When we consider the terms vivas, bivas, vives, etc., and the accompanying words, in Deo, in Christo, etc., we should hesitate to build on such a form as dormit a whole doctrinal fabric respecting the intermediate state of the dead. It seems more probable that by the word dormit there would be conveyed something of the same significance as by the term in pace; a condition so grateful to the toiler, watcher, and soldier after the severe labors and conflicts of life are over.

Two expressions in No. 10 arrest attention: Ο ΔΟΥΛΟΣ ΤΟΥ Θεοῦ, and ΠΑΡΕΔΩκε ΤΗΝ ΨΥΧΗΝ ΤΩ ΘΕΩ. The whole inscription is worthy of study. Nos. 13 and 14 are good examples of the inelegant and careless style of very many of the Christian inscriptions. They would indicate both great haste in the execution of the chiseling, and a great want of culture and taste on the part of the sculptors. The presence of the roll in No. 13 may have reference to the teaching work of the deceased. The reference of the urn is obscure, but the expression in Deo pax is full of rich suggestion as pertaining to a monument belonging probably to the third century.

Plate VI, which is designed to be a collection of monuments whose inscriptions are more or less dogmatic in character, is also from the Christian Museum of the Lateran palace, Rome. It has been claimed that the 20,000 Christian inscriptions preserved at Rome are not more than one seventh part of those which survive; but of this large number very few are of doctrinal significance. Generally the statement of doctrine is not direct, but the belief is left to be inferred.

The significance of dormit.

Carelessness in preparation of inscriptions.

In noticing the inscriptions of this plate we are impressed with the ardent wish that the departed may live with God, or in Christ; clearly pointing to a faith in the conscious union of the dead with the Divine in the future world. In the great variety of forms, bives, vibes, ZH, vibos, bibas, vive, is expressed the longing desire, the earnest prayer. The companionship of the new life after death, in Deo, Deo, EN ΘΕΩ, in Domino Zesu, in Christo, in X , is real, and with the source of all life and joy. There seems to be no thought of waiting for a full fruition to be realized in some far-off, indefinite future, but of a present, immediate blessedness in the enjoyment of all that is implied in being absent from the body and present with the Lord.¹

The frequent recurrence of the in pace is a further indication of the assurance which the promises of Christ have inspired, that the departed one is in a condition of repose. Moreover, the use of refrigeret implies a state of blessed activity such as is so significantly conveyed by the thought of spiritual refreshing. The various methods of indicating the immediate, active, conscious happiness of the soul after death leave no doubt with respect to the supporting power of the belief of the early Christians in the promise of Christ to his disciples: "I go to prepare a place for you, . . . that where I am ye may be also" (John xiv, 2, 3).

Again, the expressions in eternum, ΕΙΣ ΑΙΩΝΑ, indicate that this life, this peace, this refreshment with God and with Christ the Lord are to be in perpetuity. "And they shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. xxii, 5). The power of this faith in the immediateness and perpetuity of the promised fruition might well keep them steadfast, immovable, loyal to their divine Master, and ever ready to attest this loyalty by a martyr's confession.²

Damasus occupied the pontifical chair from A. D. 366 to A. D. 385. His zeal for the Church was well-nigh consuming. For the martyred heroes who had witnessed their faith by suffering he entertained a veneration akin to worship. The graves of these faithful ones were hallowed spots. His earnestness was so

¹ These monuments should be studied in connection with those bearing the expressions "dormit," "dormuit," etc.

² The qualification of these statements has already been given. u. p. 254.

VIIIVAT FENCISSIMA INDEOVIVES

PAWITV ADVUCLII TIBASTINDEO

11
ACIUA MONTAGE
MONTAGE

18
MONTAGE
MONTAGE

28
BICTORI FACE
MAIN ETINA

39
OITINH SOLUCLIA

MAX MANVS 45 SATVI

CO-OPERATION OF ITTNAVO
TYVIA DIVERA IN QUA VITIA SATVIA
CONVULSANTOY/THAUSATVIA
PRAVIA METVOKLENDVOR
CONVULSANTOY/THAUSATVIA
CONVULSANTOY/THAUSATVIA
CONVULSANTOY/THAUSATVIA

1
 DAMAREFERTSANTCTOSVDVDMRETVLISEPARENTES
 AGNENCVMIVGBRESCANTVSTVBAONCREPVISSET
 NVTTRICISCHEMIVMSVBITOMIQVISSEPVELLAM
 SPONTETRVCISCALCASSEMINASABIEMQTYRANNI
 VRERECVMFLAMMISVOLVISSETNOBILECORPVS
 VIRIBINMENSVM PARVISSVPERASSETTMOREM
 NVDAQVEPHOFVSVMCRINEMPERMEMBRADIDISE
 NEDOMINITEMPLVMFACIESPERITVRAVIDERET
 OVENERANDAMIHISANCTVMDECVSALMAPVDORIS
 VTDAMASIPRECIBFAVEASPKECORINCLYTAMARTYR

2
 OSEMELATQVEITERVMVEROIDENOMINEFELIX
 QVIINTFMERATAFIDECONTEMPTOPRINCIPEMVNDI
 CONFESSVSCHRISTVMCOELESFIAREGNAPETISTI
 OVEREPRETIOSAFIDESCOGNOSCIREFRATRES
 QVAADCAELVMVICTORPARITERPROPERAVITADAVCTVS
 PRESBYTERIIKVERVS DAMASORLCTOREIVBENTE
 COMPOSUITVMVLVMSANCTORVMLIMINAADORNANS

3
 DAMASVSEPISCOPVSFECIT
 THERACIVSVITVLABROSPECCATA DOLERE
 EVSEBIVMISEROSDOCVTSVACRIMINAFERE
 SECINDIVIRINPARTESPOPVLVSCLISCENTVRORRE
 SEDITIOCAEDIBELLVMDISCORDIALITES
 EXTREMPROMBERPVLSIFERITATEYRANNI
 INTEGRACVMRECTORSERVARETPODERANCIS
 PERTVLITXILIVMDOMINOSVIMDELAETVS
 SEDITINACRIONVDVMVITAMORELIGVIT
 EVSEBIOEPISCOPOETMARTYRI

4
 DAMASVSEPISCOPVSFECIT
 THERACIVSVITVLABROSPECCATA DOLERE
 EVSEBIVMISEROSDOCVTSVACRIMINAFERE
 SECINDIVIRINPARTESPOPVLVSCLISCENTVRORRE
 SEDITIOCAEDIBELLVMDISCORDIALITES
 EXTREMPROMBERPVLSIFERITATEYRANNI
 INTEGRACVMRECTORSERVARETPODERANCIS
 PERTVLITXILIVMDOMINOSVIMDELAETVS
 SEDITINACRIONVDVMVITAMORELIGVIT
 EVSEBIOEPISCOPOETMARTYRI

5
 DAMASVSEPISCOPVSFECIT
 THERACIVSVITVLABROSPECCATA DOLERE
 EVSEBIVMISEROSDOCVTSVACRIMINAFERE
 SECINDIVIRINPARTESPOPVLVSCLISCENTVRORRE
 SEDITIOCAEDIBELLVMDISCORDIALITES
 EXTREMPROMBERPVLSIFERITATEYRANNI
 INTEGRACVMRECTORSERVARETPODERANCIS
 PERTVLITXILIVMDOMINOSVIMDELAETVS
 SEDITINACRIONVDVMVITAMORELIGVIT
 EVSEBIOEPISCOPOETMARTYRI

6
 CVM PERITVRACETAEPVS SVLSSENTCASTRASVBVADE
 MOVERVNTSANTISDELLANEFANDAPRIVS
 ISTAQVESACRILECQVERTEVNTCORDESFPVICHMA
 MARTYRIBVSQVONDAMRITSACRATAPUS
 QVOSMONSTRANTEODAMASVSSEBIPAPA PROBATO
 AFFIKOMONVITCARMINEIVRECOLI
 SEDPERITITVLVS CONFRACTOMARMORESANCTVS
 NECTAMENHISITERVIMPOSSEPERIREPVIT
 DIRTVAVIGILIVSNAMMOXHAEC PAPACEMISCENS
 HOSTIBVSEXPVLSISOMNENOVAVITOPVS

7
 DAMASVSEPISCOPVSFECIT
 THERACIVSVITVLABROSPECCATA DOLERE
 EVSEBIVMISEROSDOCVTSVACRIMINAFERE
 SECINDIVIRINPARTESPOPVLVSCLISCENTVRORRE
 SEDITIOCAEDIBELLVMDISCORDIALITES
 EXTREMPROMBERPVLSIFERITATEYRANNI
 INTEGRACVMRECTORSERVARETPODERANCIS
 PERTVLITXILIVMDOMINOSVIMDELAETVS
 SEDITINACRIONVDVMVITAMORELIGVIT
 EVSEBIOEPISCOPOETMARTYRI

8
 CINGEBANTLATICESMONTENTENEROQVEMEATV
 CORPORAMVLTORVMCINERESATQVEOSSARIGABANT
 NONTVLITHOCDAMASVSCOMMYNILEGESEPVLTO
 POSTREQVIEMTRISTESITERVMFERSOLVEREPOENAS
 PROTINVSADGRESSVSMAGNVMSVPERARELABOREM
 AGGERISINMENSIDEIECITCVLMINAMONTIS
 INTIMASOLLICITESCRVTATVSVISCERATERRAE
 SICCAVITTOTVMQVIDQVIDMADEFECERATHVMOR
 INVENITFONTEIPRAEBETOVIDONASALVTIS
 HAECCVRAVITMERCVRIVSLEVITAFIDELIS

9
 HICONGESTAIACEIQVAERESSIVRBARTORYM
 CORPORASANCTORMREINENVENERANDASERICA
 SVBIIMESANIMASRAPVITSTIRECIA CAELI HICOMITSXYSTI PORTANQVIE XHOSTERO PAE
 HICNVMSPRO CERMSEVATQVIALTARIAE
 HICPOSTVNSLONGAVIXITQVINPACSACRDO
 HICCONFESSORESSANCTIQVOSCRAECIAMISIT
 HICVVENESSVEBIO SENESCASLIQVENEPOTS
 QVISMAGVIRGENVMPLAGITRINEREPVDORM
 HICIAEORDAMASVSVOLVIMACONOREMNBRA
 SEDCINERESTIMVIRANGLOSVEKAREPNOVRE

PLATE VII. - Inscriptions of Pope Damasus, fourth century.

great that the practice of burial in the cemeteries, which had been largely discontinued, once more became almost universal at Rome. He was careful to decorate the principal cemeteries with beautifully prepared inscriptions, in which were found high eulogiums of the martyred saints, and his restorations of the tombs of the worthies were rich and characteristic. These inscriptions have a character so marked that they are readily distinguished by the skillful epigraphist. They have great regularity, are most beautifully and sharply chiseled, and have been preserved in much of their original integrity. Often they become the means of positive dogmatic statements, from which an almost complete credo might be framed. While the panegyric is often extravagant, it is nevertheless tempered by a spirit of love and veneration that disarms criticism and awakens lively sympathy. Living at a time when the purity of the Christian faith had been greatly menaced, and when the severe morality of the pre-Constantine period had yielded to the current worldliness, it is not wonderful that this zealous leader found delight in calling the attention of a decaying age to the self-sacrificing lives of saints who had made the Church illustrious in the days of its sorest persecutions.

Plate VII gives a good idea of these inscriptions. The clearness and regularity of the incisions, as well as the metrical character of these epitaphs, are manifest. Also from No. 4 may be seen the results of the painstaking work of de Rossi in collecting the minutest fragments of marbles bearing these inscriptions, and afterward completing the slab by most careful adjustments. By this means valuable historic materials have been obtained to supply many deficiencies in the record. It will be noticed that even the remarkably clear and beautiful inscription, No. 1, omits some letters, leaving them to be easily supplied by the reader. It is addressed to St. Agnes, and is a curious commingling of faith and poetic enthusiasm. Whether we are to regard this address as an invocation to the saint, after the manner of the classical writers, or as an expression of veneration, it is plain that here is a clear indication of faith in the influence of the dead upon the fortunes of the living.

No. 2 is written in honor of the martyrs, Felix and Adauctus. Nos. 3 and 4 are from the crypt of Eusebius of the cemetery San Calisto—No. 4 being a restoration of the fifth or sixth century from numerous fragments found in this cemetery. The vertical inscription in the margin on each side the main one gives the name of him who prepared the work—Furius Dionysius Philoculus, the engraver to Damasus. The monument is of special interest in telling what is not elsewhere found; namely, that the pope Eusebius, A. D. 310, died in exile in Sicily, whither he was banished by Max-entius. It is notable that three terms are here used in connection with Eusebius and Damasus: episcopos, rector, and pappa. Much discussion has been had respecting the meaning of these words, and respecting the time when the word pappa first became the official characterization of the head of the Western Church. The word rector implies a degree of authority, but can hardly be claimed to carry with it undisputed and irresponsible authority. It was at times applied to simple curés. The word pappa seems at first to have been used to designate the spiritual relationship of those who had been especially helpful as advisers. The term was applied to numerous bishops in both West and East, and was not the exclusive title of the Bishop of Rome. De Rossi has affirmed that it was originally a title of endearment rather than of dignity. The term episcopos is the proper official designation of the chief officer of the Church, both in the time of Damasus and with his successors. This is the term whose meaning is fixed and definite, about which no doubt can be entertained.

No. 9 has given occasion for much discussion as to its teaching. Some epigraphists (Marchi notably) have claimed that reference is here made to the great multitude of victims who perished during the persecutions, and it has been cited in proof of this opinion. But it would be unwarrantable to press the teaching of this inscription too far. The manifestly panegyric character of the writing may well suggest caution in the interpretation; yet it is instructive in revealing the enthusiastic spirit of this noted bishop in caring for the memory of those who had so faithfully witnessed for Christ.

The eleven inscriptions of Plate VIII¹ are from the last half of the fourth century. They are of fixed date, this being determined by the consulates mentioned in the inscriptions themselves. They extend from A. D. 360 to the close of the century. The characteristics of the epigraphic monuments of this period have been most carefully studied, especially by de Rossi. In his exhaustive work² he has given the following as among their distinguishing marks: Frequent recurrence of the monogram of Christ in the Constantinian form, $\chi\rho$; the use of the cruciform style of this monogram, ρ ; the association with it of the A Ω ; the general absence of the symbolic anchor and fish; the continuation of the doves; and an almost exclusive use of the Latin language on

¹ Reduced from Plate lxii, vol. ii, of Roller's Les Catacombes de Rome.

² Roma Sotterranea, t. iii, p. 300.

THE OFFICE OF THE
ATTORNEY GENERAL
OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
IN SENATE
JANUARY 10, 1907

A SECVRA - QVIESQS } ATANTA }
 CVRA } VS }
 L VOCARISQ
 DEBEBIT V
 AE LOCVM FECIT
 DEP. IIII KAL - IVN DORMIT
 - SALLVSTI - CON -
 IT

IOVE DE VMISTA VMORFOVIRVM
 QVENSUPERIS
 VIEMFELICTA SOTOBRIS
 S HICGMVQVIESCT
 DSIOAAY GG

ODITE FECIT AD ASTR
 TIT HAEC MVNDO
 TRIX LEGIS FIDEIQVE
 ENTEN INDE[P]EXIMIOS PARADISI
 TVBI GRAMINA RIVIS
 A SHOC POSVIT CORPVS TVMVLO
 IV XEVA C^{ruis} IN TANS

CON

OLORIPSEFATERI
 COGNOSCEPARENTV
 TVNCTAMARITO
 TENTAPVDORE
 IETRICTSAMORE
 STFOEDERAPRIMA I'FORISABIIT
 SCENDERELVCEM
 SOLACIAFLETVS
 ERORANDEETRESATVRNINCONSE

lury.

the monuments of the West. With few exceptions the simple expressions of invocation, as vivas, refrigera, etc., are discontinued, and a style of high panegyric is frequently indulged; the day of death and even of burial is usually mentioned; and a general predominance of the expressions depositus, depositio, etc. These are to be regarded only as general marks of the inscriptions of this period; for it must be remembered that the style of the epigraphic monuments does not undergo a sudden and complete transformation, but some marks continue in permanence. No. 1 is somewhat rude of workmanship, tending to the cursive style. It is considerably abbreviated, yet the parts are easily supplied.

Warning against hasty inductions.

"His parents to their most dearly-beloved son, Dionysius, who lived five years, seven months, and nine days. Buried on the sixteenth before the Kalends of September, Constantine being for the tenth time consul. In peace."

The connection here of the Λ Ω with the monogram of Christ (said to be the first instance where these are associated on a monument of fixed date¹) certainly suggests the everlastingness of the second person of the sacred Trinity. Yet it would probably be unwarrantable to regard the presence of the symbol, Λ Ω , upon a monument as conclusive proof of the faith of those who caused its erection in the deity of Christ. We have already spoken of the use of the $D \cdot M \cdot$ upon Christian burial monuments, and have seen that this arose from the fact that it had probably become a sort of conventional heading to these inscriptions, and that little thought was probably had of the heathen significance of the symbol. So also it may be true that the placing of the Λ Ω upon the tombs of the deceased Christians may have been without thought of its deep dogmatic import on the part of the sculptor. But it certainly argues that what had once been deliberately chosen as significant of the nature and person of Christ continued, however unconsciously, to be accepted by the Christians of the fourth century as expressive of their faith in the eternity of that Lord in whose peace their departed dead now rested.

Ignorance of the significance of symbols possible.

The semper quiescis secure and dormit of No. 2, the requievit in pace of No. 3, and the hic requiescit of No. 9 recall the question whether these shall be regarded of dogmatic import, or are only expressive of the current belief of Christians in the quiet repose of the actor after the struggles of this earthly scene are passed.

In Nos. 5, 6, 7, and 8, the high eulogistic character of many of the inscriptions of this period is illustrated. The miræ sapientiæ, Eulogistic character of inscriptions. semper cœlestia quærens, optima servatrix legis, fideique magistra dedit, hic tumulus lacrimis retinet, etc., are in strong contrast with the simple and expressive in pace or the hic jacet of the second and third centuries. In No. 8 are the clear-cut workmanship, the regularity of the lettering, the equality of the lines, as well as the high panegyric of the Damasene inscriptions, to which allusion has elsewhere been made.

¹ Roller: Catacombes de Rome, T. ii, p. 81.

No. 10, of the year 397 A.D., is interesting as a genuine palimpsest; since on the back is seen another inscription, Palimpsest. Leo et Statia vivi fecerunt, while beneath the main Latin inscription is found a Greek one inverted, of good characters, and evidently of a date much earlier than the last. It reads ΕΤΤΥΧΙΑΝΩ ΔΟΥΛΩ ΘΕΟΥ ΙΟΥΔΙΑΝΗ CYN (δω). Thus on the same slab are found the purer Latin, the much earlier and almost classical Greek, and over it again the later and corrupt Latin. This monument would also suggest that the language of the early Church was the Greek.

An interesting class of objects in epigraphical science are the graffiti. They are very widely diffused both in pagan and Christian monuments. They are more numerous in those places to which pilgrims and devotees resorted for worship and meditation, where the sanctity of the persons interred, or the inspiring memories of the scenes, transform the spots into holy shrines. Marked examples of such graffiti are met in many parts of the Orient, where original inscriptions have been in a degree effaced by others of a later date, and these in turn by still others.¹ The examples on Christian monuments and in sacred spots are very numerous, but the difficulty of deciphering them becomes very great, and many valuable facts, undoubtedly concealed under the commingling of characters, still elude the ingenuity of the epigraphist.

In some portions of the Christian catacombs of Rome the graffiti have been studied with great zeal, especially by de Rossi, who has given a résumé of results in his noted work.² As in the case of pilgrimages to heathen fanes the devotee was accustomed to inscribe a vow or a prayer, or to leave a record of his visit on or near the sacred shrine, so also in visiting the burial places of saints and martyrs the pilgrims were desirous to indicate their feelings. Fig. 123 is a representation of a small wall surface in the crypt of San Sisto in the cemetery of San Calisto, at Rome. The marks seem to be mere scratches upon the mortar, or in some instances ^{In San Calisto.} are in pigment. The variety of forms in the letters, the different languages, Latin and Greek, and sometimes the almost barbarous vernacular of a later time, make a jumble of dates, of sentiments, and of experiences which, if unraveled, might doubtless furnish valuable historic truths to supply the hiatuses now so painfully felt. The portions which have been deciphered are entirely harmonious with the sentiments expressed in the well-understood inscriptions. The views of death are equally cheerful, and the joy of the soul in Christ is equally ecstatic.

¹ Notable examples are found at Dog River, in Syria, Persepolis, and in many parts of Egypt. "Those faintly cut emblems of Sesostris, those stern, cold soldiers of Chaldea, those inscriptions in Persian, Greek, Latin, and Arabic, each embodies a history of itself, or rather tells of one written elsewhere, which we long to possess." Thomson: The Land and the Book, vol. i, p. 59. For Persepolis see especially Ferguson: History of Architecture.

² Roma Sotterranea: t. ii, tav. xxxii and xxxiii.

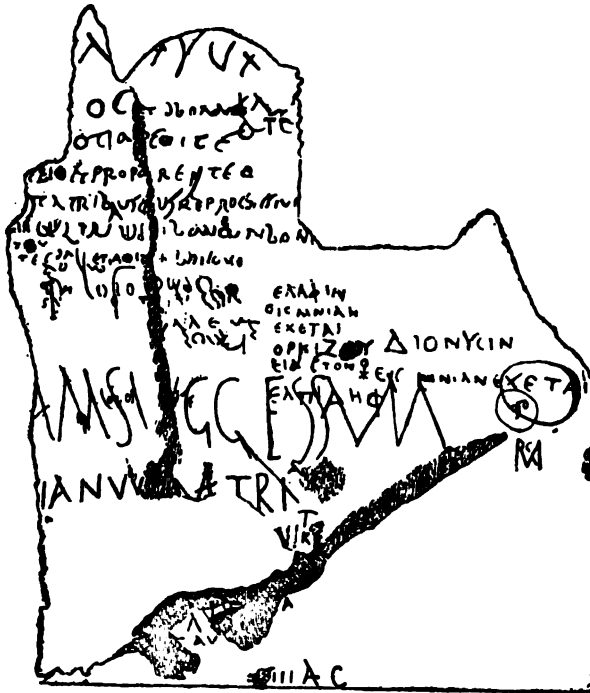

Fig. 123.—Graffiti from papal crypt, San Sisto, Rome.

Sometimes the cross appears with equal arms enclosed in a circle. It is not easy to determine how far this may be regarded as of symbolic import. The extreme school of symbolists would see in such forms the teaching of the eternity of the person symbolized, as well as the continuance in perpetuity of the doctrine and kingdom which He has established. In Fig. 124 we have an example from the first quarter of the fifth century. Probably it was part of a burial monument, and the legend in the circle was descriptive of the persons commemorated, while the two arms of the cross bear the quite common deposita in pace, and the age of the deceased. Unfortunately, the mutilated condition of the inscription prevents its satisfactory interpretation.

Fig. 124.—Cross in circle with inscriptions.

Fig. 125 furnishes an example of the value of archæological remains in the illustration of obscure points in history. It is a small column found in 1874 among the ruins of the Basilica San Petronilla, Rome.¹ This ruined basilica has already been described (see pp. 174–176) as situated above the cemetery of San Domitilla, and seems to have been built on account of the peculiar sanctity of persons interred beneath. In former times this was known as the Cemeterium Domitillæ, Nerei et Achillei, ad Petronillam Viâ Ardeatind. The reasons why Nereus, Achilleus, and Petronilla should be thus associated with this cemetery were difficult to find, until the discovery of this column and a small fragment of a like column with faint indications of the representation of a scene similar to that depicted in Fig. 125. Here is clearly a martyrdom. The pursuing soldier with the deadly weapon would slay the retreating victim, ACILLEVS. The further indication of martyrdom is the crown above the cross, the triumphus Christi, ¹ It had fallen through the pavement of the basilica into a lower gallery of the cemetery. v. Figs. 76, 77.

Fig. 125.—Column from the Basilica of Petronilla. Martyrdom of Achilles.

which is the symbol of the martyr's death and triumph. It is conjectured that the other like column, a small portion of which has been found, may have similarly depicted the martyr death of Nereus. Further excavations have given abundant proofs, also, of the connection of Petronilla with this basilica and cemetery. The most plausible explanation is that the cemetery originally took its name from Domitilla, to whom this plot of land belonged, and that its name was afterward changed on account of the interment of these martyrs in the sacred precincts.¹

¹ v. Northcote and Brownlow: Roma Sotterranea, vol. i, pp. 121, 180-183. Roller: Les Catacombes de Rome, vol. ii, plate xciv, No. 4, p. 331.

CHAPTER VIII.

EARLY CHRISTIAN POETRY AND HYMNOLOGY.

§ 1. Preliminary Considerations.

RELIGIOUS emotions have ever sought expression in poetic measure. The first poets of a people have been instinct with prophetic fire, while the prophets of religion clothe their weightiest utterances in poetic garb. Poet and prophet alike draw inspiration from a common source. Religion suggests to poetry its richest themes, while poetry furnishes to religion the vehicle for the expression of its deepest truths. The sacred song is therefore found associated with every religion. The heathen used it, the Hebrews chanted it in their temple service, the untutored savage utters it in sacred grove or consecrated wood.

Nor is the Christian religion an exception to this rule. The true Te Deum Laudamus had been chanted by the angelic choir when they announced the advent of the Prince of Peace, and the song of holy triumph of devout Simeon and Elizabeth, Nunc Dimittis, has been counted among the valued treasures of the universal Church. In imitation of the Hebrew custom the first apostles had inculcated the use of hymns in the social gatherings of the Church, and in the more public congregation. That these spiritual songs were a means of edification and profit cannot once be doubted. But we are not to suppose that a feeble and despised Church was in circumstances favourable to the development of a distinctive hymnology or to the origination of a characteristic music.¹

The first period of Christianity was, indeed, filled with an inspiration such as the world had never before known. The founding of a religion so new in spirit, which tended to break down the barriers of social life and unite all men in one holy communion; which presented so noble an array of witnesses and martyrs for the truth's sake, and furnished supporting power to triumph over every form of persecution and death, was the occasion for awakening the true poetic spirit in the minds of its disciples.¹ Such circumstances are especially prolific of themes of song. Nevertheless, a degree of leisure is requisite to set these themes to harmonious verse. While the mind is at the extremest stretch of action, or moved by a consuming passion, poetic conceptions may be richest, yet poetic versification is impossible; this comes only from quiet contemplation and conditions of peace.²

¹ "It is probable that whatever of hymnology was practised by the Jews at the time of Christ was appropriated by the new Church. All the instructions of the apostles agree with all the traditions to confirm this opinion. Since during the life of St. Paul there could have been no new literary development in the Church, his exhortations to the use of hymns and spiritual songs must have chiefly referred to what was then extant in the Jewish Church." v. Burgess: Hymns and Homilies of Ephraem Syrus, London, 1853, p. xxiv. Still it is quite probable that in the social gatherings there may have been a kind of improvisation which was the beginning of an independent hymnology.

It must likewise be recollected that circumstances of danger and persecution interfered with the growth and perfection of the Church services, and also retarded the development of the metrical hymn. Add to this the fact before referred to (pp. 52, 53), that the Church of the first two and one half centuries was somewhat hesitant to cultivate some forms of the fine arts because of their supposed contaminating influences through association with heathen practices. The threat to the purity of Christian doctrine and life seemed so grave that long after Christianity had received recognition from the state Jerome wrote: "A Christian maiden should not know what a lyre or a flute is, or what is its use." The first disciples in nearly every city were from Jewish families who in their wide dispersion had maintained the Hebrew worship in private houses or in synagogues. It would therefore be antecedently probable that many elements of the Jewish service would at first be incorporated into the religious forms of these early converts. The writings of the apostles confirm this presumption.³ The chanting of the Psalter by the priest, and the probable antiphonal singing by the congregation, would suggest like forms to the proselytes to the new faith. The extent to which the Church of the first two generations appropriated and adapted the then existing poetry and music to its own wants, is a question that has been sharply debated by archæologists. It is, however, generally conceded that intimations of a church psalmody and hymnology are found in the writings of the New Testament. Especially in the Apocalypse are met suggestions of hymns which bear a distinctively Christian stamp.

Yet not favourable to metrical forms.

The Psalter at first in general use.

Germes of a hymnology in the New Testament.

¹ "Christianity began among a people who were full of active imagination, and of keenest sensibility. They delighted to have the heart aroused and the fancy elevated through appeals to the eye and ear." Herder: Zerstreute Blätter, 5th Samml.

² Schletterer: Geschichte d. geistlichen Dichtungen u. kirchlichen Tonkunst, Hanover, 1869, s. 54.

³ Burgess: Op. cit., pp. xxiii, xxiv.

The gradual liberation of the disciples from the burdens of the Mosaic ritual would tend to eliminate Jewish elements from the public services, and lead to the preparation of a liturgy in harmony with the needs of an independent and distinctive Church.¹ The sharp contrasts between the monotheistic belief of the Christians and the prevalent polytheism, their adoration of the now risen and glorified Christ, the inspiring and supporting doctrine of the resurrection, and the quite prevalent expectation that the Lord would soon return to awaken the sleeping saints to enter upon the inheritance of a universal kingdom, turned the thought away from systems which now seemed to them obsolete, and contributed to the development of a hymnology new in form and content.

No extended description of the public Christian services of the first two centuries by contemporary writers has been preserved; we are therefore compelled to be satisfied with a somewhat imperfect induction. The early fathers and the "Apostolic Constitutions" associate prayers with the song of thanksgiving.² They were regarded as like in spirit. They also seem to avoid the use of the term "hymn" through fear that their worship of the one God and Christ might be confounded with that of the heathen, who were accustomed to sing "hymns" in praise of their divinities.³

"Psalm" and "ode" are the usual terms used to describe these writings and exercises. Although no hymns from the first or second century have been preserved to our day, and no mention of any composer of hymns is found in the records of the first two centuries,⁴ it may, nevertheless, be safely inferred from the nature of the case, as well as from the few incidental allusions to the early ritual, that hymns were composed and existed in written form at the beginning of the second century.⁵

¹ "Even if the Psalms of the Old Testament could, at the beginning, have expressed all the deep feelings of the Christian heart, the very use of these would have aroused in the worshiper a desire for new hymns which their peculiar gifts and inspiration would have created." v. Rambach: Anthologie christlicher Gesänge aus allen Jahrhunderten der Kirche, Bd. i, s. 4.

² v. Augusti: Handbuch der christlichen Archæologie, Leipzig, 1836, Bd. ii, s. 10.

³ Augusti: Op. cit., Bd. ii, s. 113. Contra, Böhmer: Christ.-kirchliche Wissenschaft, Breslau, 1836, Bd. ii, s. 335.

⁴ With the possible exception of the Pedagogus of Clement, and the Gloria in Excelsis.

⁵ Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., v, 28, where a writer from the end of the second century is represented as answering the Artemonites by appealing to a great number of Münter has given the following brief summary of his investigations:

1. The congregations of the apostolic period used hymns of thanksgiving in their public worship. 2. They also used these ^{Münter's conclusions.} hymns on the occasion of their sacred feasts, the Agapæ, etc. 3. The sacred song was set to music, and chanted by the entire congregation. 4. These hymns and psalms which the early Christians used were not all derived from the Old Testament Scriptures, but some were of their own origination and composition.¹ With regard to the meagreness of our information relative to this subject, he suggests that it should cause no surprise when it is considered that only merest fragments of the history of the early Church have been preserved, while the larger part of ^{Causes of meagreness of information.} what may have been written has been irrevocably lost; that since the hymns were kept with the other books of the Church, they may, therefore, have furnished a special reason for persecution when the sacred writings of the Christians were hunted out and destroyed.

That the number of these hymns must have been quite limited, as compared with the number in later times, seems probable from the fact that most of the early Christians were uncultured and not in circumstances to patronize, much less to cultivate, the fine arts. Moreover, at a still later date the councils of the Church were much divided in opinion relative to the introduction ^{Conciliary decisions diverse.} of hymns other than from the Psalter into the public services; therefore, the writing of them received little encouragement even by those who possessed the requisite gifts and culture.²

The hesitation of Christian councils and bishops to sanction the use of other metrical compositions than the Psalter and inspired utterances from the Old Testament Scriptures finds its partial explanation in the fact that the heretical leaders were among the earliest patrons of hymnology, and were the first to introduce into the public worship a greater regularity and pomp. By this means multitudes were attracted from the orthodox service, and the spread of the Gnostic heresy was greatly promoted.

On the propriety of using other metrical compositions than the Psalms of David synods and councils were not agreed. In most ancient hymns whose theme was the praise of Christ. "Psalmi quoque et cantica fratrum jam pridem a fidelibus conscripta Christum Verbum Dei concelebrant, divinitatem et tribuendo." Also the custom of Paul of Samosata in changing the praise hymns designed to be sung to Christ to those praising himself, is a further evidence of the existence of hymns and music.

¹ Ueber die älteste christliche Poesie, ss. 18, 19.

² Op. cit., pp. 30, 31.

instances their decisions were very cautiously expressed. By some none but the Psalter was permitted. Nevertheless, the eastern fathers, Chrysostom, Ephraem of Syria, and others had ventured to introduce hymns of their own composition, whose use had greatly added to the fervor of devotion, and had been powerful in recalling to the orthodox fold many whom the alluring service of the heretical sects had led astray. The character of most of the early sacred poetry which has reached us hardly permits it to be classified with hymnology. Even the very prolific poet of the Greek church, Gregory Nazianzen, has not contributed a single poem which deserves the name of hymn.¹ Indeed, there is a most marked contrast between the productive power of the early and the modern Church with respect to the number and character of sacred poems. It is estimated that the aggregate hymns of the Latin, Greek, and Syrian churches, prior to the sixth century, would not equal those found in the ordinary collections used by the churches of our day. Rambach² has affirmed that the total number of Latin hymns and sentences which were in use prior to the fourteenth century did not exceed four hundred. This arose, not so much from the want of proper gifts as from the ends had in view by the writers of these poetic compositions. Much of their poetry was of a dogmatic character, and was intended to advocate a doctrine or combat a heresy rather than to contribute to the edification of the worshiper.³

We must also be reminded that the general use of hymnbooks in the public service of the early Church is not once to be supposed. While the diffusion of books in the Imperial period was very considerable, and the multiplying of manuscripts was comparatively inexpensive,⁴ from the best authorities to which we have access it is inferred that in many instances large congregations had but few copies of the hymns which were in use. It is therefore probable that by frequent repetition the worshippers committed the hymns to memory, and, where permitted, also sang the tunes and chants by rote. In studying subjects of this character the investigator must, as far as possible, transfer himself to the times, and realize the peculiar circumstances of the early Christians. It must be considered how many arrangements of the service of the modern Church have sprung from the ease of

¹ Augusti: Handbuch christ. Arch., Bd. ii, p. 128.

² Anthologie, ii, 8.

³ Augusti: Op. cit., B. v, c. 4, ii.

⁴ v, Uhlhorn: Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, p. 24. Merivale: Hist. of the Romans under the Empire, vol. vi, p. 232.

multiplying Bibles, hymnbooks, catechisms, etc., by means of the art of printing. .

The partial exclusion of the private members of the early Church from participation in the singing is attributable far more to their want of training in the arts of poetry and music than to the arbitrariness of church officials. While by the fourth century the new religion had made very wide and important conquests, it nevertheless seems probable that most of the professed Christian communities enjoyed but limited means of cultivating the arts to which the grandeur and impressiveness of public worship are so largely due. Not till a later period did the singing-schools of Rome, Fulda, Metz, St. Gallen, etc., prepare the clergy to lead the congregation in portions of the singing service. By the study of the early hymnology we are impressed with its comparative poverty. The depth of devotional feeling and the perfection of rhythm which characterize the mediæval and the modern hymn are largely wanting. The dignity and high inspiration which have characterized public worship since the reformers joined the perfected hymn to appropriate music, and thus brought the singing to the entire congregation, could not have been attained even in the most imposing churches of Constantinople, Antioch, Milan, or Rome.

§2. Sacred Poetry of the Syrian Church.

Syria was the native land of Christian hymnology. To that city where the disciples were first called Christians probably belongs the honor of introducing the formal hymn into the public services of the Church. A questionable tradition contained in Socrates¹ says that Ignatius, the first Christian bishop of Antioch, used the Antioch the antiphonal hymn as early as the beginning of the second mother city. century. From this very brief reference no definite knowledge of the character of the hymn or of its relative prominence in the public service may be gained.

By other means, however, the history of Syrian hymnology can be traced with little interruption to the second or early portion of the third century. In Syria, more than elsewhere, the Gnostic heresy sought to propagate itself through the means of sacred poetry and hymns. The philosophic theologian, Bardesanes, who flourished in the last half of the second century at Edessa, in Mesopotamia, was among the earliest writers of hymns which were used by the heretical churches of the East. While with a single exception his writings have been lost, we are informed by Ephraem, the Syrian, that he composed one hundred and fifty hymns in imitation of the Psalter. By clothing his peculiar tenets in the enchanting forms of song he seriously threatened the purity of the Syrian church.¹ Multitudes were drawn away from the true faith. His skill as a composer of music was equal to his poetic gifts; for it is certain that he gave name to tunes which were afterward appropriated by the orthodox party. For nearly a century and a half the influence of these hymns was perpetuated.² The orthodox teachers became alarmed. To arrest the evil tendencies they saw that like Ephraem of means must be used. Ephraem, deacon of Edessa, a contemporary and friend of Basil the Great, entered upon this work with intensest zeal. He organized female choirs,³ taught them hymns which embodied sublimest spiritual sentiments, set to song the fundamental truths of the nativity, baptism, passion, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord, and required the deaconesses to assemble in the church on all Sabbaths and feast days. On these occasions he was present as leader to teach them musical notation and the laws of poetic rhythm. He believed that this was the surest means of gaining the goodwill and kindly aid of the people, and of breaking the power of his opponents.⁴ Sozomen⁵ informs us that from that time the Syrians sang the odes of Ephraem according to the methods indicated by Harmonius,⁶ the

¹ Hist. Eccl., lib. vi, c. 8. "Jam vero didimus, unde consuetudo hymnorum, qui in Ecclesia alternis decantantur, initium cepit, Ignatius Antiochus quæ est in Syria, tertius a Petro apostolo Episcopus, qui cum apostolis ipsis multum versatus est, visionem vidit angelorum Sanctam Trinitatem hymnis alterna vice decantatis collaudantium: et formam canendi in ea visionem expressam ecclesiæ Antiochanæ tradidit. Unde illa traditio in omnibus ecclesiis recepta est."

¹ Ephraem of Syria, in his Homilies against Heresies, bears frequent testimony to the influence of Bardesanes.

² "For these things Bardesanes Uttered in his writings—
He composed odes, And mingled them with music;
He harmonized Psalms And introduced measures."—Homily 53, Against Heretics.

"In the resorts of Bardesanes Are songs and melodies.
For seeing that young persons Loved sweet music.
By the harmony of his songs He corrupted their minds."—Homily 1.

v. Burgess's translation, Hymns and Homilies of Ephraem Syrus, pp. xxx and xxxi.

³ Burgess translates this term, "Daughters of the convent." Hymns and Homilies, p. xxxviii.

⁴ Acta St. Ephraem, c. xxii.

⁵ Hist. Eccles., lib. iii, cap. xvi, "Ex eo tempore Syri juxta numeros canticorum Harmonii scripta Ephraim psallere solent."

⁶ If the accounts of Sozomen and Theodoret can be relied upon, Harmonius, the son of Bardesanes, reduced the Syrian literature to measures and musical laws which had been suggested by the Greeks. He also adapted these to the uses of choirs, and by the beauty of his compositions allured his hearers to embrace the heretical doctrines. Sozomen: Life of Ephraem, lib. iii, cap. 16. Theodoret: Hist. Eccl., lib. iv, cap. 29.

son of Bardesanes; and Theodoret affirms that these hymns proved to be efficacious medicine to arrest the spread of heresy.

The number of Ephraem's poems is unknown.¹ It is certain, however, that they were numerous, and covered a very wide range of subjects—theology, exegesis, hymnology, etc. His poems numerous. His hymns were widely used both by the schismatic sects of the Syrian church and by the orthodox Christians of the East.

Of the metrical laws governing these Syrian poems little is known. It seems, however, that the meters were regulated by the number of the syllables, and not by the quantity, as in Greek and Latin verse. The Latin and Greek could vary the number of syllables in a verse according to their quantity, but the Syrian seems to have adhered rigidly to the syllabic order, and thus greatly hindered the beauty, flexibility, and variety of utterance which produce the greatest charm.

"The strophes vary in length from four verses to twelve, sixteen, and even twenty. Many of them are uniform in their structure, every verse containing the same number of syllables; but others are studiously varied, exhibiting great art and labor in their construction. . . . Indeed, Ephraem seems to have had a nice ear for variety, and if what has already been said respecting the dislike of his countrymen to the monotony of the psalms is correct, he must have gratified the most fastidious seeker of novelties."²

The attention given by Ephraem to antiphonal singing, by which the interest and attractiveness of the public assemblies could be promoted, compelled a careful arrangement of the liturgy. His contributions to the Church of his own time were varied and noble, and the influence of his labors in the promotion of Christian hymnology was positive and widespread.

The following will give a good idea of the character of his poetry:³

CANON LX.

NECESSITY FOR PREPARATION FOR DEATH.

1.

Pity me, O Father! in thy tender mercy,
And at thy tribunal, let thy love be with me;

¹ There has been a tendency to ascribe to him every thing extant in the metrical forms of Bardesanes and Harmonius, and which was used in the Syrian sacred offices. But this is evidently erroneous. Many metrical compositions in the Ephraemitic rhythm are plainly the work of other hands. v. Asseman: Bibliotheca Orientalis, tom. i, p. 60.

² Burgess: Op. cit., p. liv.

³ Translated by Burgess: Metrical Hymns of Ephraem Syrus, pp. 56, 57.

And make me to rise up from the dust,
 In the day when thy standard shall be revealed.
 O Father! whose lovingkindness formed me,
 And who at the first fashioned our image;
 Let thy nod raise our bodies again,
 In the day when the world is destroyed.

2.

Example of his poetry.

At the appearing of Jesus our King,
 The buried of all ages shall stand up;
 His living voice shall call loudly,
 And awaken every sleeper;
 What terror shall be to all men,
 When the thrones are set in order!
 How will the wicked be confounded,
 And all be turned into hell!

3.

The day of judgment is at hand,
 And all faults shall be disclosed;
 Who then can be pure in thy sight,
 In the hour when the books are opened?
 For there are no penitents,
 No offerers of supplications;
 For that is the day of doom
 In which no word or speech is uttered!

§ 3. The Greek Hymnology.

While no hymns in the present collections of the Greek Church, or which are used in its authorized service, are older than the eighth century, sacred poetic compositions in Greek by the fathers of that church probably date from the second.¹ The well-known work of Clement of Alexandria, Pedagogus, written primarily for the defence and propagation of the orthodox faith, closes with two hymns which were well calculated to promote the religious fervor of the worshipper. Both are clearly in the interest of the doctrine of the Trinity, in opposition to the growing and threatening heresies. These are probably the oldest Christian hymns which have been preserved to our day.² They have often been translated, yet are not easily adjusted to the wants of the modern Church.³

The Pedagogus of Clement of Alexandria.

¹ Augusti: Denkwürdigkeiten, Bd. v, s. 292.

² Daniel: Thesaurus Hymnologicus, iii, pp. 3, 4. This opinion of Daniel has been controverted. Some good archæologists regard the Gloria in Excelsis of earlier origin. Rambach: Anthologie christlicher Gesänge, Bd. i, s. 35.

³ Probably Dr. Dexter's free modernization is the happiest that has yet appeared in English—"Shepherd of Tender Youth," etc. Piper: Evangelischer Kalender, 1868, ss. 17-39, has given the text and an excellent German translation, as well as a good analysis, and a good literal translation has been given by Schaff: History of the Christian Church, vol. ii, p. 230.

Gregory Nazianzen, of true Christian parentage, was educated in the best schools of Cæsarea, Alexandria, and Athens. He had for fellow-students Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, and the future emperor, Julian the Apostate. His earnest devotion to the interests of the Church after his elevation to the see of Constantinople, and his florid, fervent eloquence, joined to a lowly humility of manner and life, were the means of restoring many churches of his diocese to the prosperity which they had enjoyed forty years before. His poems were numerous, and glowed with a true religious fervor well suited to stimulate the Christian life. Nevertheless, scarcely a trace of his poetry is preserved in the authorized office-books of the Greek Church.¹

Synesius of Ptolemais, a well-trained scholar, became bishop of his city late in life. Many notices of his poetic writings are found in the Christian fathers, but only ten poems have been preserved. While he had a reputation among his contemporaries for great poetic gifts, his poems were but poorly adapted to the public religious services, and have never been incorporated into the authorized collections of the Eastern Church. His influence as a writer of hymns seems to have been considerable, but it was greatly lessened by the introduction of the philosophic adages of the pagan schools, and by his too careful imitation of the style of the heathen poets.² In his hymns Platonic notions obscure and well-nigh supplant Christian doctrine.

While the surviving poems of Gregory, Synesius, Euthimius, and Sophronius exhibit considerable regularity, and some may be reduced to metrical order as of anapests and iambics, Greek poetry had already fallen into decay, and the Eastern Church had yielded to the prevalent artificiality and clamor for the strange and the extravagant in poetic form and content.

¹ Rambach: Op. cit., p. 48. For a translation and note of his Ποῦ δὲ λόγου πρεπόντες; ἐς ἄερα, v. Daniel: Thesaurus Hymnologicus, etc., iii, 11. Also Schaff: Christ in Song:

"Where are the winged words?
Lost in the air," etc.

² v. Christ and Paranikas: Anthologia Græca carminum Christianorum, Lipsiæ, 1871. This work has been the means of awakening new interest in the Greek hymnology. Its four prologomena are packed with learned discussion. 1. On the Greek Christian poets. 2. On the different kinds of ecclesiastical hymns. 3. On the rhythmical laws of the Byzantine hymns. 4. On the Byzantine music. This work gives the first place to Synesius, and reproduces in excellent form the Greek of his ten surviving hymns.

Anatolius, of Constantinople, about the middle of the fifth century, endeavored to drop the classic metre, and to develop a form of poetry more in harmony with the wants and spirit of the Church. In this he was but partially successful. Neale has given an English version of the hymn on Christ stilling the tempest (ζοφεῶς τρικυμίας), which ranks among the best specimens of the Greek hymnology:

1.

Fierce was the wild billow
 Dark was the night:
 Ours labored heavily;
 Foam gleamed with white;
 Mariners trembled;
 Peril was nigh;
 Then said the Son of God,
 "Peace! it is I."

2.

Ridge of the mountain wave,
 Lower thy crest!
 Wail of Euroclydon
 Be thou at rest!
 Peril can none be—
 Sorrow must fly—
 Where saith the Light of light,
 "Peace! it is I."

3.

Jesus, deliverer!
 Come thou to me;
 Soothe thou my voyaging
 Over life's sea!
 Thou, when the storm of death
 Roars, sweeping by,
 Whisper, O Truth of truth!
 "Peace! it is I."

Even less satisfactory were the attempts of Nonnus of Panopolis in Egypt, of the Empress Eudoxia, and of Paul Silentiarius.¹ Most of the Greek hymnology of the first five and one half centuries lacks the simplicity, earnestness, and depth which characterized the life of the earlier Church. A complete collection of the hymns and chants of this church during the first six centuries furnishes little that can worthily compare with the richer and more devotional spirit of the West.¹

¹ The description (ἐκφρασις) of Saint Sophia, in poetic measure, by Paul Silentiarius has helped us more fully to appreciate the grandeur of this temple, and the dedicatory services herein described illustrate the ritual of the Eastern Church in the reign of Justinian. This work has been translated and ably annotated by Dr. Kartüm in the appendix to Salzenberg's work: "Alt-christliche Baudenkmale von Constantinopel vom V bis XII Jahrhundert. Berlin, 1854.

§ 4. The Poetry and Hymnology of the Western Church.

To estimate the originality and creative power of the poets of the Western Church it is necessary to make careful discriminations. The ecclesiastical poetry of the first centuries is divided into two distinct classes; namely, the descriptive or narrative, ^{Two kinds of} frequently employing high panegyric, and the lyric, ^{sacred poetry.} which took the form of sacred hymns and songs.² The first conforms quite closely to the then prevalent type and spirit. This style only had been successfully cultivated by the later Roman poets. Both heathen and Christians alike imitated the writers of the classic period, who had made the exploits of gods and heroes the theme of their noblest verse. The descriptive and narrative poetry of the Roman world during the first three Christian centuries is, however, characterized by an extravagance of panegyric which is almost entirely wanting in the literature of the golden age. Nor are the Christian writers of the same period seem- ^{A high pane-} ingly more chaste in style or more sober in the treatment ^{lyric.} of their themes. The lives and fate of their martyred heroes and saints being the favorite subjects which they treat, their style is entirely conformable to heathen models. To make known to the world the history of those who had given their lives to attest the verity of the new religion, to exhibit the mighty supporting power and completest victory of faith, and to awaken in others a burning zeal for the truth as it was in Jesus, were the high aims of these ¹ From the splendid qualities of the Hellenic mind, and from the rich inheritance which the Greeks of the first centuries had entered into, we might antecedently expect much from the hymnology of this church. These expectations are, however, sadly disappointed. The classic age of hymnology in the Eastern Church did not begin before about A. D. 650, hence lies outside of the period of our inquiry. The iconoclastic controversy gave inspiration to the hymnology. This Greek sacred poetry is of immense volume, filling, according to Neale (v. Hymns of the Eastern Church, Introduction, p. xli), 4,000 closely printed, double-column quarto pages. This mass of material is becoming somewhat better known to the West through the devoted labors of Neale in England, Cardinal Pitra in Italy, Vormbaum (Daniel's Thesaurus, vol. iii) and Christ in Germany. Yet the judgment of Neale with regard to the Menæa (the books containing the services for each month) is generally accepted as just: "They contain a deluge of worthless compositions; tautology till it becomes almost sickening; the merest commonplace again and again decked in the tawdry shreds of tragic language, and twenty or thirty times repeating the same thought in slightly varying terms." v. Op. cit., 4th ed., p. 88.

² Bähr: Geschichte der römische Literatur, bd., iv, §1.

narrative and descriptive poems. Somewhat later is noticed a tendency to set the Christian doctrine to poetic measure, and to clothe the biblical narratives in poetic garb. To supply the lack of copies of the sacred books, their most important truths were taught to the Christian congregations in the popular hexameter verse. The chief difference between the heathen and Christian poets was that the latter adhere strictly to the truths of history, and there was in their writings a spirit which could be inspired only by a system that cared for the sufferings of humanity, and could cast light on the destiny of the race.¹

The other class of Christian poetry was wholly different. Even in the golden age of Roman literature lyric poetry seems to have been an exotic,² while during the first period of the history of the Christian Church it had become almost totally neglected: it was revived through certain noted poems which belong to its hymnology. It was animated by a spirit wholly novel, and it evinced a noteworthy richness and originality. Its introduction into the common services of the Church required that it be simple, earnest, and popular. Some of the descriptive and narrative poetry of the fourth century is in imitation of the masters of the best period of Roman literature, while the lyrics are original not only in their spirit and depth of feeling,³ but in their rhythmic forms as well. In this species of literature the Christian Church of the fourth century stands out in bold and honorable relief.⁴

The poems sometimes ascribed to Tertullian, because in some manuscripts they are associated with his name, are probably the production of a later author. Several works of this nature, as ¹ "The old hymns, from Ambrose to Gregory the Great, still bear in their earnest and powerful lineaments the portrait of the conquering martyr period of the Church. Their entire content is derived from the new and sublime view of the world which, in opposition to the scope of heathen thought, sustained and filled the souls of the Christians. Subsequently there was developed much that was more delicate and cultured, but seldom, if ever, has there been seen any thing of greater purity and simplicity." Wackernagel: Das deutsche Kirchenlied, Preface.

² Bähr: Gesch. d. röm. Lit., Bd. iv, s. 2.

³ Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv, s. 10. Augusti: Denkwürdigkeiten, Bd. v, s. 292.

⁴ "The hymnology of the Western Church may be conveniently divided into three principal eras. The first, which, borrowing a term from architecture, we may name the Romanesque period, extends to the conclusion of the pontificate of Gregory the Great, and is, as a general thing, distinguished by the absence of rhyme. . . . In this period the Church was unshackling herself from the fetters of metre; in the second she was bringing out all the capabilities of rhyme; in the third she submitted to the slavish bondage of a revived paganism." Neale: Medieval Hymns and Sequences, London, 1851, Introduction.

Marcio, de judicio Domini, Genesis, Sodoma, etc., both from internal evidence of style and content, as well as from positive testimony, must be assigned to a period considerably later than that of Tertullian. Many poems bearing his name can no more be attributed to him than to Virgil or Homer.¹

Poems attributed to Tertullian not genuine.

If this opinion is well founded, then must Commodianus, who lived about A. D. 220–250, be regarded as the earliest Latin Christian poet whose works have been preserved.² Very little is known of his personal history. According to his own testimony, he was a native of Gaza, of heathen parentage, but by the reading of the sacred Scriptures was converted to Christianity. From his use of the Latin language and his manifest acquaintance with its literature we infer his Roman descent. Even the place of his labors is not certainly known, but his zeal for Christianity, as against both Jews and heathen, is apparent in the poems which have been preserved. Only two are known to exist: the Instructiones, and the Carmen Apologeticum adversus Judæos et Gentes. The former, which appeared about A. D. 249,³ shows a careless indifference to the laws of prosody, and appeals to the tastes of the less educated classes. It is, as its name indicates, a collection of teachings, in acrostic form, addressed in part to the heathen, pointing out the vanity of their worship of the gods, and exhorting them to seek a better system. In part it is addressed to the Jews, to win them to Christianity; while the last part is prepared for the Christians themselves. The whole writing evinces strong moral conviction and Christian zeal for the truth, but contains doctrinal errors which seem to have been disavowed by the Church authorities at a later period.⁴ The Carmen Apologeticum, a later production, consisting of more than one thousand lines, is of somewhat greater value both in style and treatment. It furnishes a valuable contribution to the history of Chiliasm, and of the doctrine of the Trinity during the third century.

Commodianus.

His poems.

Their character and value.

Several poems have been attributed to the celebrated church father, Lactantius, many of whose writings have been preserved. These are often bound up with editions of his works, thus expressing the opinion of the editors respecting their Lactantius.

¹ Dupin: Bibliotheca nova Auctorum Ecclesiasticorum, i, p. 141. Translation under the title A New History of Ecclesiastical Writers, vol. i, p. 87.

² Bernhardt: Grundriss der römischen Literatur, 5te Aufg., s. 986. Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv, §§ 8, 9.

³ Teuffel, W. S.: Geschichte der römischen Literatur, 4te. aufl., Leipzig, 1882, ss. 899–902.

⁴ Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv, s. 30. Teuffel: Op. cit., s. 900.

authenticity. But it is highly probable that the poems de Phœnice, de Pascha, and de Passione Domini are the works of other writers, and belong to a later age.¹

The Spanish writer, Juvençus, who lived in the first half of the fourth century, is the first Christian poet of eminence whose works are clearly authentic. While little of his personal history has been preserved, there seems to be slight question of his authorship of the Historia Evangelica and of the Liber in Genesin.² The first is a metrical version of the Gospel history, based chiefly on Matthew, though having reference to the other evangelists as well. It consists of more than three thousand lines. It imitates the heroic verse of the heathen writers, and, for the age in which it is written, the style is flowing, easy, and pleasing. It may be called the first Christian epic.³

Juvençus.

The design of this metrical version was to bring the great facts and principles of the gospels to the attention of the heathen world.

While in the ordinary form in which they were then preserved there was a contempt for these writings on the part of the learned, an imitation of the great poets, it was believed, would be effective in awakening a wider interest in a religion too little understood. Like attempts were made in the time of Charlemagne, by the Saxon and German ecclesiastics, for the more rapid education of the common people in the doctrines of the Church. The Liber in Genesin is a similar attempt to popularize the historic writings of the Old Testament Scriptures. These are the first examples of a metric form which afterward quite frequently appeared in the poetry of the Church.

Jerome, Isidorus, and other ancient writers mention with great respect the Christian poet Hilarius of Poitiers. He was a contemporary of the great fathers Ephraem, Gregory Nazianzen, Basil, Hilarius and Damasus, and also shared their anxious labors to hold the Church steadfast to the orthodox faith. During his banishment to the East, Hilarius became convinced of the effectiveness of Church songs in the public service. On his return he, therefore, composed a number of hymns for popular use, and compiled a hymnbook for the congregations of his diocese, which has unfortunately been lost. The genuineness of several poems formerly ascribed to him has been questioned. While it is difficult to determine with accuracy the extent of his work, the beginning of a genuine Latin hymnology is usually ascribed to him.¹ The most celebrated of his hymns are the latinization of the Gloria in Excelsis, Beata nobis gaudia, and Lucis largitor splendide. He first began the Latin hymnology.

¹ Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv, s. 35. Contra, Teuffel: Op. cit., s. 932, who attributes de Phœnice to him.

² Teuffel: Op. cit., s. 943, questions the ascription of Liber in Genesin to Juvençus.

³ Jacob: Die Kunst im Dienste der Kirche, s. 371.

Through the liberty of worship guaranteed by Constantine the services of the Church assumed more regularity, and the growing splendor of the basilicas occasioned a growing demand for instructive and impressive ceremonies. The leaders of the Church now gave increasing attention to the improvement of the forms of public worship. The hymns were more carefully written and adjusted to the improved music. So rapidly had its membership multiplied, and so widely had its influence extended, that the Church no longer deemed it expedient to leave the public worship to uncertain tradition or to the mere caprice of individuals. To secure uniformity in the more public services there must be a fixed and authorized liturgy.² Also, the memory of the heroic men and women who had attested their faith by suffering a martyr's death now became more cherished. Every act was sought to be perpetuated. The monuments were adorned with inscriptions, and churches covered the spots where the sacred dust reposed. These resting-places of the holy departed became sacred shrines.³ Increasing demand for hymns.

Among the most zealous promoters of this work was Damasus, bishop of Rome, who was born about the beginning of the fourth century. His zeal for the doctrines and ritual of the Church was wellnigh consuming. To him is attributed the regulation of the morning and evening hymns. He was among the most earnest promoters of the hymnology of the Latin Church, and zealous for its orderly arrangement. The number of his poems still extant cannot be determined with certainty, but more than thirty are of unquestioned genuineness. Among these are but two of a lyric character; one to St. Andrew, the other to St. Agatha. These are constructed upon a model almost entirely unknown to the Christian poetry of that period, since the latter is in rhyme, and has, on this Damasus.
Number and character of his hymns.

¹ According to Neale he begins the second period of Latin hymnology.

² The discussion of these attempts belongs to the history of Church canons and liturgies. These subjects are ably treated in such works as Beveridge: Codex con. Eccl. Prim.; Ultzen: Constitutiones Apostolicæ; Chase: Constitutions and Canons of the Apostles; Muratori: Liturgia Romana vetus; Palmer: Origines Liturgicæ; Daniel: Codex Liturgicus, etc.; Neale: Tetralogia liturgica, etc. v. Bk. III.

³ For the influence of this sentiment on Christian architecture, etc., see pp. 206, 207.

account, been thought by some writers¹ of authority to belong to a later age. The inscriptions which he composed for the sepulchral monuments of the popes and martyrs share in the general departure from the purity and simplicity of the earlier classical Indulges in masters, and abound in the excessive panegyric which panegyric. the heathen writers of his age had adopted, and which is a marked symptom of decadence in style and taste.²

The fourth century was an age of fiercest conflict in Church and State. The means by which Constantine had come to the throne were such as only a desperate condition of society could justify. The toleration granted to the Church, its adoption as the religion of the state, and the forceful suppression of the heathen Disturbed condition of society under Constantine. worship awakened the hostility of a large and learned class of the Roman world. It was, therefore, not strange that on the death of the first Christian emperor a great revulsion of feeling ensued and heathenism attempted to reassert itself.

Upon the downfall of Licinius multitudes of the heathen had accepted Christianity. They donned the white robes of baptism, and the churches were crowded with catechumens. Through an evident Perils to the Church. want of deep intellectual and spiritual conviction on the part of many of these nominal Christians their accession became a source of weakness rather than of strength. Moreover, a majority of the Roman nobility still clung with fondness to the ancient institutions, and held the masses loyal to the ancient religion. Within the territory of the Eastern Empire the new doctrines had been more popular. While the strong influence of a civil or military aristocracy was there wanting, nevertheless the great schools at Athens, Ephesus, and Antioch were still under the direction of heathen teachers who by their zeal and ability attracted to their precincts sons of the most powerful families. Thus an aristocracy of learning was arrayed against the Church, now weakened by its fierce doctrinal struggles.³ The imperial power exerted by Constantine in the defence and promotion of the Church had become weakened through the contentions of his sons, and the cruel suspicions of rulers had wellnigh annihilated the Flavian family. But the hopes of heathenism now centered in the person of Julian. This emperor, ¹ Grimm, W.: Zur Geschichte des Reims. in the memoirs of the Berlin Academy of Sciences for year 1851, p. 683, cited by Bähr.

² Bähr: Op. cit., iv, 18. De Rossi: Inscriptiones Christianæ, i, 329, has called attention to the remarkable neatness of these sepulchral inscriptions; v. also his Roma Sotterranea, i, p. lvi. For Damasene inscriptions see Plate VII.

³ Uhlhorn: Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, bk. iii, ch. iii.

the object of the intensest hatred of his enemies, the noble advocate of philosophy and tolerance in the judgment of his apologists, certainly aimed at the restoration of the heathen religion at the expense of Christianity. His profession of impartial toleration was contradicted by his edicts against the Church. The law requiring the restoration of the heathen temples which had been destroyed under the previous reigns bore with exceptional severity upon such societies as had removed the ancient shrines, appropriated the valuable ornaments, and on the old sites had erected new and splendid Christian churches. The horrors of the grove of Daphne near Antioch¹ were by no means exceptional, and the attitude of Julian toward their promoters clearly reveals the insincerity of his professions of toleration.

But the law prohibiting the Christians from teaching the arts of grammar and rhetoric was, if possible, still more wide-reaching in its consequences, and revealed the purpose of Julian to cast upon the Christian doctrine the most withering contempt. Since the education of the Roman youth was a matter of strict legal control, the effect of the edict was to banish from the schools all Christian teachers, and to exclude from those which the Church maintained at her own expense all so called heathen classical authors. Julian firmly believed that the consequence of this prohibition would be to shut up the Christian teachers to their own sacred books, and, inasmuch as he supposed that in these was no "perennial fountain of truth," the Church would certainly be reduced to a mass of ignorant and enthusiastic devotees, whose utter extinction must speedily ensue. The effects of the publication of this edict were far other than the mystical emperor had anticipated. This was the occasion of one of the most interesting phases of Christian literary history.

In the heathen schools alone the influence of classical teaching could be enjoyed, and to these the emperor earnestly invited the youth of the realm. He supposed that this invitation would be gladly accepted, and that a new generation might thus be reared who would reverence the ancient institutions and contribute to their early and complete restoration. But the Church was unwilling to entrust her children to this heathen secular tuition. Moreover, her influence must be lost through neglect of her youth. The result of the edict was to develop a Christian poetry, to take the place of the heathen authors who had been legally excluded from the schools of the Church. Instead of the epic poems with which the professors of rhetoric and grammar

Julian and his policy.

Christians prohibited from teaching.

Effects of these edicts upon Christian culture.

¹Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., chap. xxiii.

had familiarized themselves, a class of able Christian teachers attempted to imitate the heathen epic by substituting biblical characters for those of fable and tradition. Thus the interest in Christian schools was maintained, and the charge of ignorance successfully met. The great men of the Church who were engaged in this struggle did not cease their efforts even after Julian's death. The work whose beginning he had compelled went forward, greatly to the honor and to the edification of the body of believers. Not only were important poems written in order to avert the evils threatened by the imperial edict, but theories of poetry were developed which have not become obsolete.¹

Perhaps no writer of the fourth century more clearly and beautifully expressed the principles of Christian æsthetics than Paulinus of Nola. In his poem addressed to Jovius² we find these brought together in consecutive order. He first claims that Christianity provides the truest and noblest subjects for poetry; that the fables of the gods have amused the childhood of the race; that to yield one's self to the Word of truth is worthy of the adult age of a genuine culture, and of the most conspicuous talent. "Though I may give myself to the art of poetry I will adhere to strict historical truthfulness, since it should be unworthy of a servant of Christ to indulge in the false and the deceiving. Such art may be pleasing to the heathen, but it is abhorrent to those whose master is the Truth." The subjects of Christian poetry are so vital and exalted that they give a higher dignity to language, ennoble the poet himself, and bestow upon him more abundant honor. Faith is the one perfect art, and Christ is the true music, since he first restored the shattered harmonies of the soul, and united in himself the divine and the human spirit which were before so widely separated. In such efforts the poet can confidently ask the aid of the Creator of all things. Therefore, he will not invoke the Muses, nor to them ascribe praises, but he will rely upon Christ, who for us became incarnate and redeemed the world through his own blood. He will invoke Him—"Pour thyself into my heart, O Christ, my God, and slake my thirst out of thy perennial fountains. One drop administered by thee will become in me a river of water. Graciously stoop to my relief, O thou Source of Speech, Word of God, and let my voice become melodious

¹ If we are to believe Socrates, Eccl. Hist., iii, 16, the writings which had been prepared to counteract the effects of Julian's edict were little esteemed by the Christians themselves after the death of this emperor. Nevertheless, the interest awakened by this stimulus continued.

² Poem. 22.

as that of the bird of spring!" Only such a poetry can deserve the patronage and genuine approval of rational and right-minded judges. "Then," adds Paulinus, "will I call thee a true, divine poet, and will quaff thy poems as a draught of sweet water, since they flow to me as from the fountains of heavenly nectar, because they sing of Christ the Lord of all."¹

Thus this early writer developed the theory of genuine Christian poetry which has widely governed the Church during the centuries.² Consistently with this theory, he carefully avoids all reference to the heathen mythology and to those topics in which the heathen poets were most fully interested. His themes.

While in form he imitates the classic poems of heroic and iambic measure, and sometimes even rivals these in easy rhythm and flow of verse, he adheres closely to Christian thought, and furnishes examples of poetic writing which could take the place of the heathen poetry interdicted by Julian, and after his death was measurably excluded by the power of Christian sentiment. Since Paulinus had received a liberal education in the flourishing schools of Bordeaux, and was, therefore, familiar with the classic literature of the period, he was on his conversion of great benefit to the Church in the education and guidance of the young. His literary and poetic influence upon the Church of his period was marked and permanent.³

Of even greater prominence in the history of Christian hymnology was Ambrose, bishop of Milan, born about A. D. 335. During a life of sixty years he deeply influenced the Ambrose. theology and church life of his own time, and by his intelligent reform of the ritual service made an epoch in Christian history. Among the four great Latin fathers whose works gave substantial aid, and were a bulwark of defence to the Christians, Ambrose stands preëminent. Like his noble contemporary, Hilary, he was of influential heathen parentage. His careful training under the direction of pagan masters was designed to fit him for honorable public station. Under Probus he was appointed governor and judge of Italy, and in the year His education. A. D. 370 obtained the governorship of Milan, together with the control of Bologna, Turin, and Genoa. He began his career as a mere catechumen in the Church, and not until designated by the popular judgment for bishop of Milan did he receive Christian baptism. But when once he entered upon the duties of the episcopal office all his native gifts and his acquired powers were devoted without stint to the advancement of the orthodox faith. When, after the custom of the Greek and North African churches, he had introduced the sermon into the regular services of each Sabbath, he also felt the need of reforming the music and the hymns.

¹ Poemata, 6, 10, 20, 22, 23, etc., in Migne's Patrologia.

² Jacob: Die Kunst im Dienste der Kirche, pp. 369, 370.

³ Doubtless the estimates placed upon the writings and services of Paulinus by some Catholic writers are extravagant. On the other hand, we believe that some Protestants are chargeable with almost equal errors from the low value at which they represent his labors.

Connected with his eminent services in church music were his attempts to improve its hymnology. In the midst of bitter strifes of factions he aimed to hold the Church steady to its pristine faith. As we have before seen, the reform and perfection of the service were intimately connected with the Arian controversy. The vigorous leaders of this heresy had observed that the mass of the people was more surely influenced through attractive Christian ceremonies than by formal dogmatic statements. Here, as in the East, they aimed to propagate their peculiar doctrines through the impressive means of music joined to sacred song. Numerous hymns of Arian origin had become familiar to the people of the West, and by their pleasing and insinuating influence were leading multitudes away from the orthodox faith. Both Athanasius and the Church historian Philostorgius make reference to this influence. The spiritual songs of Arius were so much in favour as to contribute powerfully to the dissemination of his doctrines. We are told by the historians Socrates and Sozomen that the public services of the Arians in Constantinople were so popular, on account of the hymns and antiphonies, that even Chrysostom felt compelled to introduce into the orthodox churches a like provision in order to retain his congregations. In A. D. 386 Ambrose had completed his important reforms, and very soon these were introduced into many churches of the West.

Some difference of opinion has existed relative to the exact character of the Ambrosian service. It is, however, pretty generally agreed that the whole body of assembled believers participated in it, and that his chant was founded on the ancient Greek music, while it also sought a more intimate union of the rhythm and metre of the hymn with the musical melody. It might be expected that Ambrose himself would become the author of hymns appropriate to the new ritual; still, it is very difficult to distinguish those of his own composition from many which the new order had called into existence, and which also went under the general name of Ambrosian. The Benedictine editors of his works¹ claim that the united testimony of the writers from the fourth to the ninth cen-

¹ Tom. ii, pp. 1219-1224.

ture is to the effect that only twelve of the so-called Ambrosian hymns can be regarded as genuine.¹ Of the form and character of these hymns it can be said, "They rank well with the best heathen poems of that age. When they are compared with the poetry of Ausonius or of Claudianus they are to be preferred both for their perfection of rhythm and earnestness of spirit."² They are of the form of iambic dimetre, which seemed best suited to this service, but avoid all attempt at rhyme. They glow with a pure devotion, and place their renowned author very high among hymnologists of the ancient Church. Both Catholics and Protestants have appropriated these hymns for the enrichment of their service.³

Very prominent as a poet, and in the discussion of the principles which should regulate poetic writing, was the Spaniard, Marcus Aurelius Clemens Prudentius, who flourished in the last half of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century. Until his fiftieth year his life was passed in public service, chiefly as an advocate. He then resolved to withdraw from the affairs of state and devote himself exclusively to the Church. In common with so many others of the teachers of the fourth and fifth centuries he clearly perceived what service poetry might render for the education and edification of the Christian assemblies, and for the defence of doctrine. His poems were of both a didactic and lyric character. Of his clearly authenticated writings there have been preserved more than ten thousand lines. Of these his Cathemerinón, a collection of twelve hymns originally designed for daily use in the worship of the Church which the poet frequented, was widely accepted by the Latin fathers, and incorporated into the early hymnology. These poems are characterized by simplicity of diction, sublimity of thought,⁴ and a ¹ Daniel: Thesaur. hymn., Bd. i, p. 12, adds largely to the number given by the Dominicans. Mone: Lateinische Hymnen, Bd. i, has ascribed to him three others. So also Rambach: Anthologie, Bd. i, s. 60, and Wackernagel: Das deutsche Kirchenlied, are inclined to increase the number of genuine Ambrosian hymns. Neale: The Ecclesiastical Latin Poetry of the Middle Ages, reduces them to ten.

² Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv.

³ Among the most valued of his hymns are the celebrated doxology, Te Deum laudamus, Veni, Redemptor gentium, and Deus Creator omnium. They have found their way through translations into many modern collections. His Veni, Redemptor gentium has been translated by Luther, "Nun komme, der Heiden Heiland;" by John Franck, "Komm, Heiden Heiland, Lösegeld;" by J. M. Neale, "Come, thou Redeemer of the earth;" by Ray Palmer, "O thou Redeemer of our race." His A solis ortus cardine has been well translated. v. Schaff: Christ in Song.

⁴ Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv, s. 77.

spirit of ardent piety; they have been cherished by the universal Church as expressive of the believer's richest experiences. His Peristephanôn is a like collection of fourteen poems in celebration of the praises of the martyrs who have won their heavenly crown. The growing honor paid to the witnesses for the truth here finds expression. The spirit animating these poems is born of a high and holy faith, but they cannot take rank among the foremost Christian writings of the first six centuries. In his Apotheosis, consisting of one thousand and eighty-five hexameter verses, he attempts to set forth and defend the orthodox doctrine of the true divinity and humanity of Christ as against the Sabellians, the Jews, the Manichæans, the other heretical sects. In his Psychomachia, of about one thousand verses, the conflict of virtue with vice in the human soul is portrayed. This poem contains some truly eloquent passages which rise almost to the intensity of the dramatic.

The attempt of Symmachus to reinstate heathen worship, by rebuilding the altar of Victory, has already been referred to (v. p. 66). The Christian apologist was temporarily successful. But the spirit of the old faith was not thus easily subdued. The too common view that heathenism was already effete is evidently erroneous. A critical examination of the teachings of the leading minds of heathen Rome from A. D. 150 to A. D. 450 will show that the number of atheistic and purely materialistic thinkers was quite insignificant. Even Lucian substantially confirms this view, though his interest is evidently against it.¹ Thus while the triumph of Ambrose seemed at the time complete, and Theodosius refused to reinstate the altar of Victory, Symmachus renewed this attempt under the reigns of Arcadius and Honorius. This was probably the occasion for Prudentius to write the Libri duo contra Symmachum, in the first book of which he most zealously defends the excellencies of the Christian faith as against the absurdities and defects of heathen philosophy, and showed that the evils which the empire was suffering were the direct effect of the corruptions and moral delinquencies of the heathen teachers. In the second he refutes the arguments of Symmachus.² The intelligent zeal of the writer appears most conspicuously in this poem. While at times indulging in extravagant statements, it must be ranked among his most vigorous writings.

The works of Prudentius mark a new period in the history of ¹ Jup. Tragœd., quoted by Friedlander: Darstellungen aus d. Sittengeschichte Roms, 5te Ausg., Bd. iii, s. 552.

² Teuffel: Op. cit., s. 1029.

Christian poetry. His influence was lasting, and the Middle Ages cherished most carefully his poems and imitated his treatment.¹ His peculiar themes initiated him into an almost unexplored department of literature. His early training put him into sympathy with classical writers, and led him to incorporate into his poems classic constructions. Yet the spirit of the new religion and the sublimity of the themes introduce into these poems a novel and, at times, almost grotesque inharmoniousness.² While his talent was so great, it was, however, insufficient to found a new school of poetry.³

Another eminent writer of the sixth century, whose poems have been preserved in the hymnology of the Church, was Venantius Fortunatus. Both from the references found in the works of Gregory of Tours and of Paul Diaconus, as well as from his own writings, we gain a fair idea of the character and works of this renowned Christian poet. The date of his birth is unknown. According to his own account he was educated in Ravenna, the seat of superior schools for training the young in the principles of the Roman law. He afterward journeyed into Austrasia, where he became the friend and adviser of King Sigibert. He wrote the Epithalamium on the occasion of the marriage of Sigibert with Brunihild, daughter of Athanagild, king of the West Goths. Soon after he was appointed superior of a cloister of nuns at Poitiers. Here he took up his residence, and became bishop of Poitiers toward the close of his life. He died in the latter part of the sixth century, and was buried in the Basilica of St. Hilarius. He was of noble character, and his name was held in highest veneration by the mediæval Church. His poems, like those of most of his contemporaries, were largely narrative and panegyric. In this respect, as well as in the form of his poetry, he was in harmony with the fashion of the time. Of the eleven books of his poems, the largest, as de vita S. Martini, de excidio Thuringiæ, etc., are descriptive and eulogistic. John of Fritenheim speaks of seventy-seven hymns composed by Fortunatus, but scarcely more than a dozen have been preserved to our time.⁴ Some have gone into the hymnology of the general Church, and are of

¹ Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv, s. 86.

² Bernhardt: Gesch. d. Rom. Lit., s. 995.

³ Schaff: Christ in Song, has pronounced the Jam mæsta quiesce querela his masterpiece. It has been very beautifully translated by Mrs. Charles—"Ah! hush now your mournful complainings," etc., and by many others.

⁴ Teuffel: Op. cit., ss. 1177-1181. Bähr: Op. cit., Bd. iv, s. 155.

great excellence and breathe the spirit of a pure devotion. The beautiful hymn on the Nativity, Agnoscat omne sæculum, and the two in celebration of the passion of the Lord, Pange lingua gloriosi, and Vexillum regis prodeunt, are still greatly prized. Their spirit of simple piety is in strong contrast with most of his descriptive poems and panegyrics.¹ In some of his works there is a close imitation of the style and metre of the earlier classic poets, while occasionally the influence of Claudianus is clearly discernible. Close attention is not always given to the measure and rhythm, while all traces of what we understand by rhyme are wanting. The Church has placed very high value on the few gems contributed by this author to her hymnology. As a theologian, scholar, and publicist he held high rank among the men of his century; while as poet he is scarcely excelled by either heathen or Christian of his time.

The genuineness of most of the hymns once attributed to Gregory the Great is now questioned. The Veni, Creator Spiritus, formerly reckoned among his noblest productions, is now believed to be the work of another; so, also, the All Saints' hymn, Christe, nostra nunc et semper, the Advent hymn, Christe, redemptor omnium, and the Baptismal hymn, Ora primum tu pro nobis. A few which are believed to be genuine are found in the hymnology of the modern Church. His morning hymn, Ecce jam tenuatur umbra, with No. 15 of the appended doxologies, has been translated by Caswell:

"Lo, fainter now lie spread the shades of night,
And upward shoot the trembling gleams of morn."

Other writers, as Augustine and Cælius Sedulius, wrote a number of hymns of considerable excellence; but the genuineness of much which was formerly attributed to them has been seriously questioned, and their influence upon the hymnology of the West has been comparatively unimportant.

We give six specimens of doxologies used in the Latin Church during the first six centuries. They are taken from Wackernagel's work, Das deutsche Kirchenlied, and are numbered as they there stand:

1.

Deo patri sit gloria,
Eius que soli filio
Cum spirito paraclito
Et nunc et in perpetuum.

¹ Some of his hymns have been frequently translated, notably by Neale, Caswell, and Mrs. Charles, and have been very widely used by the modern churches.

4.

Gloria et honor deo
usque quo altissimo,
Una patri filioque,
inclito paraclito,
Cui laus est et potestas per eterna sæcula.

6.

Gloria patri ingenito
eius que unigenito
Una cum sancto spiritu in sempiterna sæcula.

11.

Laus, honor, virtus, gloria,
deo patri cum filio,
Sancto simul paraclito
in sempiterna sæcula.

15.

Præstet hoc nobis deitas beata patris ac nati, pariter sancti Spiritus, cuius reboat in omni gloria mundo.

18.

Sit laus, perennis gloria
deo patri cum filio,
Sancto simul paraclito
in sempiterna sæcula.

CHAPTER IX.

EARLY CHRISTIAN MUSIC.

THE strict religious education received by every Jew put him in sympathy with the history, the trials, and the hopes of his people. The repetition of the synagogue service three times a day, the duty of private prayer, the ceremonial at every meal, the imposing ritual on the occasion of new moons, new years, feasts and fasts, and the great national festivals celebrated with unequaled pomp and solemnity, must have kept alive in every Jewish heart a warm affection for his nation, and thoroughly indoctrinated him in the truths which were regarded as essential to life and salvation.¹ It is not, therefore, surprising that the converts from Judaism to Christianity were sometimes slow to distinguish between the symbol and the reality, and clung with fondness to what had become so venerable from age, and had pervaded their history as the chosen people of God. Every part of the temple and synagogue service had been prescribed with the utmost minuteness, and maintained with scrupulous care. It is therefore somewhat disappointing that no records of the Hebrew music have been preserved to our time. The contrary opinion of De Sola² relative to the great antiquity of some of the Hebrew melodies, as, for example, "The Melody of the Blessing of the Priests" (No. 44 of his collection), "The Song of Moses" (No. 12 of his collection), etc., can scarcely be accepted by the best historic criticism. It is likewise true that no tune from the first two centuries of the Christian Church has come down to our time. In the absence of actual examples by which a comparison may be instituted, we must betake ourselves to other sources of information relative to the early Christian music.

¹ v. Edersheim: The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, bk. ii, chap. ix. Geikie: Life and Words of Christ, vol. i, chaps. xiii, xiv. Shürer: The Jewish Church in the Time of Christ, Clark's Foreign Theological Library, vol. ii, §§ 27, 28.

² The Ancient Melodies of the Liturgy of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, by E. Aguilar and D. A. de Sola, p. 15, et al. The attempts of Delitzsch: Physiologie u. Musik in ihren Bedeutung für die Grammatik, besonders die hebräische, Leipzig, 1868; Saalschütz: Geschichte u. Würdigung der Musik bei den Hebräern, Berlin, 1829, and many others, have failed to convince the unprejudiced that any remnant of the old temple music has been preserved. The traditions in the East and West do not at all agree, and the methods of service of the Jews in Germany, in England, and in Spain are widely different.

The first converts to Christianity were Jews. They were therefore entirely familiar with the Jewish forms of worship. The few notices of early Christian assemblies found in the New Testament indicate that the infant Church largely observed the services of the synagogue, and that little peculiar or original was at first introduced. Prayer, the reading of the Scriptures, the chanted psalm, and the exposition and exhortation by some chosen rabbi or educated member of the congregation constituted the chief features of the Jewish synagogue service. But what was the character of the music then used? The characteristic chanting or singing called cantillation, so widely practiced by oriental peoples, as well as the fixedness of the oriental type both of music and instruments, might at first sight seem to furnish a suggestion of the probable character of the Hebrew music in the time of Christ. But to suppose that the Jewish music of that period was the music practiced in the Solomonic temple service, or even in that of Zerubabel, would be misleading. By the wide conquests of Alexander Greek influence had been disseminated throughout the subject nations. For three hundred years prior to the Advent Greek thought had been powerful in modifying the Jewish philosophy and literature. Not only in Alexandria and other chief Greek cities where the Jews had congregated, but in Jerusalem, and especially in Samaria and Syria, this Greek influence was felt. The Septuagint translation of the Hebrew Scriptures is a conspicuous illustration of the mutual interpenetration of Greek and Hebrew thought.¹ Many of the Hellenistic Jews acquired such aptitude and ease in the Greek poetic art that they competed with Greek masters, and produced remarkable poems whose subjects were derived from their own history and religion. The truths of the Hebrew Scriptures were thus cast in a Greek mould. Frequently their teachers assumed the costume of the ancient Greek poets and philosophers. This syncretism of thought continued into the earlier years of Christianity, and must have seriously affected the poetic and musical art of the Jews.²

First Christians familiar with Jewish forms.

Cantillation affords no suggestion as to the ancient music.

Greek influence a powerful factor.

¹ For the extent of the Dispersion and its influence on Jewish thought, religious observances and manners, among others v. Shürer: Op. cit., § 31; Friedlander: Die Sittengeschichte Roms, 1881, ss. 570-584; Westcott: article "Dispersion," in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.

² v. Ewald: The History of Israel, translated by J. Estlin Carpenter, London, 1874, vol. v, pp. 260-262, and vol. iii, p. 283. "The music of the temple services was

The old temple service, in which the prescribed forms were observed with scrupulous inflexibility, served, indeed, as a partial breakwater to this insetting tide of Greek innovation. "The old Hebrew music must have been resumed in the new temple of Zerubbabel, and pursued with great zeal. This is plain from the superscriptions of many of the Psalms, which were then collected afresh, and from the historic representations of the Chronicles. But the Greek translators of the Psalter evince only an imperfect and obscure knowledge of the art terms of the ancient music, which clearly proves that the whole of this ancient art suffered severely through the entrance of Greek music, and by degrees entirely disappeared."¹

The purity of the temple service, including music, thus lost under the Greek conquerors, was not recovered under the Roman. The Asmonean princes sedulously cultivated the friendship of their new masters. Only by Roman protection and sufferance, indeed, was this house perpetuated. Moreover, the grand old festivals, which in the time of religious fervor had been celebrated with such pomp, had been partially displaced by others of more recent origin. The retirement from public life of the most devout sect, the Essenes, the proud holding aloof from state affairs by the Sadducees during the period immediately prior to the advent, and the obscuration of the law by the teaching of the Pharisees, tended to the neglect of the temple worship, and strengthened the desire for a Græco-Roman style of music. The magnificent temple of Herod, though reared in accordance with the requirements of the law, and by the encouragement of the priests while wearing their sacred vestments, failed to restore the purity of the service. The temple itself had originated in selfish ambition; its architecture was essentially Greek; its ritual had become contaminated.

The first converts to Christianity probably adopted the modified music then in use in the temple and synagogues. The music used in the celebration of the heathen rites could not be tolerated by doubtless conducted on a splendid scale, after Solomon's regulations, in all the subsequent centuries; and we know for certain that Solomon set a great value on musical instruments of costly workmanship (1 Kings x, 12). . . . All knowledge of it was, however, gradually lost after the Greek period, and cannot now be recovered; for even the Chronicles, from which we derive most light for understanding it, contains no more than faint reminiscences of the ancient music." Contra, Martini, G. B.: History of Music, vol. i, p. 350. Saalschütz: Geschichte u. Würdigung der Musik bei den Hebräern, § 61.

¹ Ewald: Op. cit., vol. v, p. 267.

converts who had been saved from the polluting practices of heathenism.¹

Paul probably refers to the then extant temple and synagogue music when he exhorts the churches which he had planted "to be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart unto the Lord" (Eph. v, 18, 19); "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord" (Col. iii, 16).

The first Christians adopted what was in use.

This custom of the early Christians seems to be confirmed by heathen testimony, notably by the younger Pliny in his letters to the Emperor Trajan, in which he states that they were accustomed "to sing responsively a hymn to Christ as God."² The meaning of this passage has been variously understood; but according to the comments of the Christian writers of the first four centuries its evident intent is to speak of responsive chants or songs which the Christians were accustomed to use in their early meetings.³

Confirmed by heathen testimony.

The positive testimony of Justin Martyr⁴ as to the custom of the Eastern church, of Tertullian regarding the African church, of Origen as to the church of Alexandria, of Eusebius, who quotes from earlier authorities to prove the antiquity and continuity of this custom, leaves little doubt respecting the use of music in the services of the Church from the apostolic period. An expression used by Tertullian in describing the worship will aid us to understand the growth or development of Christian music. When he says that each one of the assembly was invited to sing unto God, either from the Scriptures or something indited by himself—"de proprio ingenio"—we may well suppose that thus early was practiced a sacred improvisation which by degrees crystallized into forms which by frequent use and repetition became the common property of the Church. The original style of singing was evidently the chant. The antiphony, in its earliest form, is no more than a responsive chant conducted by the priests and the congregation.

Christian testimony.

Improvisation.

The chant.

Yet the chant bears the same relation to music, properly so called,

¹ Forkel: Geschichte der Musik, Bd. ii. ss. 91. 92. We have only to read the odes of Horace which describe the choral processions to be convinced that the music used in such associations must have been excluded from the services of the Christian assemblies.

² Epistolæ, Lib. 10, 97. "Carmen Christo quasi Deo diem secum invicem."

³ Tertullian: Apologeticus, c. 2. "Cœtus antelucanas ad canendum Christo ut Deo," etc.

⁴ Apologia, c. 13. "Rationalibus cum pompis et hymnis celebrare?"

as does speech to a developed language. Speech is spontaneous, while a grammatically constructed language is the product and property of peoples more or less advanced in culture and enlightenment. So man may sing by virtue of his nature; yet it is no more difficult to develop a literary language from primitive speech than to construct a methodical and scientific music from the rudimentary chant.¹ Nor are we to suppose that music

Music is not imitation of nature. comes from imitation of sounds in nature. There is no music in nature, neither melody nor harmony. The many expressions regarding "the harmonies of nature," "the music of the spheres," etc., are to be regarded as purely metaphorical.

From the simplest musical utterance in the chant or improvisation the musician, with almost infinite pains, must work out the complex results, also the orderly and harmonious combinations called music, which becomes the most effective means for the expression of the deeper emotions of the soul.² At what precise time the first attempt

The beginning of Christian music of uncertain date. of the Church to develop a music peculiarly its own was made we have, unfortunately, no means of determining. In this, as in many other historical inquiries, we are left to conjecture and tradition, or are compelled to reach conclusions from analogical reasoning. From the circumstances of poverty, persecution, and obscurity with which the early Church was surrounded, it might be expected that little or no effort would at first be made to develop the simple chant into a more methodical and scientific form. The Christian assemblies were generally only tolerated, sometimes they were under the severest ban. These conditions of hardship and proscription were most unfavourable to the cultivation of the fine arts. Moreover, the natural disinclination to use either Jewish or heathen forms in their own services, through fear of some misleading influence upon the worshipers, probably induced in the overseers of the Church of the first two centuries a measure of indifference to whatever of musical science might then have been extant. Doubtless, by frequent repetition of chants and antiphonies a considerable body of simple melody had come to be the common property of the Church. But it was not until a period of quiet and toleration, when the erection of buildings for the worship of God called for a more methodical arrangement of the public worship, that music could have been carefully cultivated.

¹ Fétis: Histoire générale de la Musique, Paris, 1869, p. 2. See also J. Grimm: Ueber der Ursprung der Sprache, ss. 19, 55, et al. Renan: De l'Origine du langage, Paris, 1858, chap. v. Max Müller: Science of Language, London, 1862, especially Lect. ix. Contra, Clément, Félix: Histoire de la musique depuis les temps anciens jusqu'à nos jours, Paris, 1885, pp. 3, 4, 5, etc.

² Haweis: Music and Morals, London, 1877, pp. 7, 8, et al.

The first well-authenticated account of the formal arrangement of church music is given by the historian Theodoret, ^{first recorded attempts.} where he describes the efforts of Flavianus and Diodorus, who divided the choristers of the church of Antioch into two parts, and instructed them to sing responsively the psalms of David.¹ It is probable that this did not originate a new era of musical invention so much as methodize what was already known. But the occasion of this innovation, as given by the surviving authorities, is most suggestive, and renders it probable that from this time the cultivation of music received greatly increased attention. ^{Arian influence.} The governor of the church of Antioch, Leontius, was an avowed Arian, while the monks, Flavianus and Diodorus, were zealous and saintly defenders of the orthodox faith. To draw away the people from the heretical preaching of their bishop these earnest men instituted the antiphonal service. It proved so attractive that the bishop was in turn compelled to introduce the same practice into his own church. Thus from the powerful capital of the East the practice extended to the provincial societies, and soon prevailed in many leading churches of the West.²

The growing attention to the study of church music is shown from the fact that it soon after became a subject of ^{Conciliary action.} conciliary action. The council of Laodicea (360-370), in order to the promotion of good order and the edification of believers, decreed that none but the canons, or singing men who ascend the ambo (or singing desk), should be permitted to sing in the church. Much diversity of opinion relative to the intent of this canon has been entertained by commentators. Baronius seems to regard it as a positive prohibition of the laity to engage in the public singing, thus confining this part of the service to an official class. ^{Opinion relative to this action.} Bingham³ is inclined to the same view from the fact that from the time of this council the singers were regarded as officers of the Church, being called κανονικοὶ ψαλταί, canonical singers. He, however, believes that this was only of temporary authority. Neander,⁴ on the contrary, regards this as nothing more than a prohibition of the laity to attempt the office of the

¹ Hist. Eccl., l. ii, c. xix. "Hi primi, psallentium choris in partes divisus, hymnos Davidicos alternis canere docuerunt."

² Theodoret says: "Ubique doinceps obtinuit, et ad ultimos terræ fines pervasit" (in loc. cit.).

³ Antiquities of the Church, b. iii, c. vii.

⁴ History of the Church, b. ii, p. 674, n. 4, Torrey's trans.

regularly appointed singers in conducting the church music. He believes that such prohibition of the laity to engage in the singing would have been in direct contradiction to the instruction of the most noted Church fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, etc., and the almost universal practice of the Eastern Churches. The opinion of Neander is entitled to great respect, since it seems to find confirmation in the teaching and practice of these saintly men. It is certain that

Basil, during his education at Antioch, came to entertain an ardent love for the forms of worship there prevalent, so that when he was installed bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, he introduced the Antiochian music into his own diocese, and greatly encouraged it both by practice and public teaching. From the account preserved in his own writings we may suppose that the singing in the assemblies of Cæsarea in Basil's day somewhat resembled the informal praise service, or service of song, in modern social religious gatherings, barring the harmony, which was not yet known. Nevertheless, we are not too hastily to conclude that the use of simple melody by an entire congregation was necessarily less effective to awaken religious emotions than the more involved harmonies of later times, since it has often been remarked that by the uncultivated ear the simple succession of sounds may be better appreciated than the more involved, which may be pitched above the popular comprehension.¹

The character
of the singing service.

When he became bishop of Constantinople, Chrysostom likewise cultivated the music to which he had earlier become accustomed at Antioch. In the severe contest with the Arians, he, like Basil and others, used the new music to hold the people loyal to the orthodox faith. But in those times of passionate and brutal encounters the services of the Church were frequently interrupted by exhibitions of anger and party strife entirely at variance with the spirit of Christian worship. Only with greatest difficulty could the people be restrained even by the entreaties and authority of this most eminent and spiritually minded father.

Thus it seems fairly probable that the more serious and successful attempts to improve the music of the public services originated in the Syrian churches, and that the Syrian modes were to a greater or less extent adopted by the East and West.

To St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, has usually been attributed the further reform and improvement of the music which was afterward

Conclusion.

¹ v. Wallis: Philosophical Transactions (Abridgment), vol. i, p. 618.

extensively used in the Latin churches. This attempted modification dates from the last quarter of the fourth century. The Cantus Ambrosianus has come to be applied to a style of music which Ambrose is said to have arranged for his own ^{Ambrosian} cathedral, and which, in modified form, is believed by ^{chant} some to have continued in the Western churches to the present time. The subject is beset with difficulties, and opinions are at variance with respect to the originality, nature, and extent of the reform introduced by Ambrose.

As to its originality, it must be recollected that the Church had now emerged from the catacombs, and had received the protection and patronage of the imperial government. Instead of obscure upper rooms, private houses, subterranean retreats, or humble churches, the Christians now had well-built and splendid edifices, to whose erection even emperors felt honored ^{Changed circumstances of the Church.} in making contribution. The circumstances necessitated a change in the church appointments. The ceremonial now assumed a splendor and an impressiveness before unknown. This is evident from the notices of contemporary writers both Christian and pagan. Christianity was now the state religion. Its votaries occupied the highest positions of trust in the government. Men thoroughly versed in the heathen philosophy were now high office-bearers in the Church. Prejudice against the literature and the art of heathendom had been greatly allayed.

The introduction of art forms into the churches had long ceased to be regarded as sinful or misleading. All that was truly useful and educating was now pressed into the service of Christ, and thus became sanctified. Every analogy of the other arts which we have traced is convincing that the Christians of the fourth ^{Appropriation of art.} century freely appropriated whatever might contribute to the effectiveness of public worship. If they had not been offended by the statue of Hermes, the ram-bearer, if they had pictured upon the walls of the catacombs Orpheus as a type or heathen prophecy of the subduing power of Christ, if they had adopted the Greek style in the sculpture of their sarcophagi, if from their general convenience of form the heathen basilicas furnished suggestions for church architecture, it cannot be reasonably supposed that music alone, of all the fine arts, was an exception to this general Christian appropriation and use. With respect to music and poetry, as to philosophy and the arts of form, it was but natural that the attention of the Christian fathers should be turned toward the writings of the Greeks for suggestions in their attempted development of the congregational chant, which had grown up, from long-continued repetition, into more regular, scientific, and imposing forms.¹

By his careful training prior to conversion Ambrose was prepared to successfully examine whatever of useful helps might be contained in the Greek writers on music, and to develop a system more in harmony with the conditions and needs of the Church.

It must be remembered that the term "music" had among the early Greeks a much broader significance than in modern times. It embraced poetry, the dance, and the drama, as well as the melody of sounds. It was intimately connected with moral, intellectual, and even physical training; it was not, therefore, chiefly studied as a fine art. It ranked rather among the disciplines necessary to the best and completest education, and was regarded more as a means to an end than as an independent art. Based upon certain harmonic and rhythmical proportions, it was believed to contribute to the best mental training and the highest moral development. There is an essential agreement among the best historians that during the most flourishing period of Grecian art instrumental music had no separate existence. Music, recitative, and poetry were inseparably united. Musical rhythm was governed by the poetical cadence. Musicians were the poets; and poets invented melodies to which they chanted their verse at the national games. The early music of the Greeks had no higher aim than to supply the language of the poet with melody and musical accents. They never strove to invest music with a dignity that should make it independent of poetry.² It was only in the later history that music and poetry attained to a separate existence. Yet Plato complains of this divorce, and argues that it is a departure from the original lofty ethical aim of music, and it is certain that as an independent art Greek music thus suffered a real decadence. Its close association with epic and lyric poetry in the religious life and ceremonial had dignified and inspired it. The decay of religion brought, therefore, like decay to poetry and music. The departure of the spirit left the body lifeless, as institutions do not long survive the wants and the spirit that call them into being. With the prevalent scepticism came the neglect of all which religion and devotion had devised to aid in their cultivation and expression.³

¹ Kieseewetter: Geschichte der europäisch-abendländischen oder unser heutigen Musik, Leipzig, 1846, p. 2. Ambros: Geschichte der Musik, vol. ii, pp. 9, 10.

² Naumann: History of Music, translated from the German by F. Praeger, London, 1885, p. 137.

³ Schlüter: Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik, etc., Leipzig, 1863, p. 4.

While Christianity alone has brought music to its highest perfection as a fine art, expressive of the deepest spiritual emotion, the Greeks, nevertheless, developed a most complicated and ingenious system of musical notation, whose influence was felt far into the centuries of the Christian era. Their writers on music were the mathematicians, who treated it as a mathematical science.¹ The drama was little more than a musical recitative, while the chorus was intoned. Their theatres being open, roofless areas, where thousands gathered, it was often necessary to resort to the use of metallic masks to increase the sonorousness of the voices of the actors.

The Greeks furnished a musical notation.

The systems thus developed were complex and difficult in the extreme, and were capable of being understood and practiced by only a favored few, who must give years of study to their mastery. Moreover, there was little attempt to popularize these systems and to bring them into general use. On the contrary, there seems to have been a design on the part of those who treated this subject to make it the property of the few who were initiated into the mysteries of the science as it was taught by the philosophers. Their musical notation was, therefore, most involved and perplexing. The characters invented by the Greek writers on musical harmonics have been placed as high as sixteen hundred and twenty.² Since these were no better than so many arbitrary marks or signs placed on a line over the words of the song, and had no natural or analogical signification, the system must have imposed on the memory an intolerable burden.³ Before the advent of Christianity the Greek system had somewhat fallen into disuse, and the practical spirit of the conquering Romans was unfavourable to the cultivation and patronage of the fine arts. Their great men were engaged in the affairs of state, and in developing and perfecting political policies for a now practically unified nation. They had, indeed, rejected the complex musical notation of the Greeks, which had been the product of refined speculation, and in place of the sixteen hundred and twenty characters had substituted the first fifteen letters of their own alphabet. Thus the enharmonic and even

The notation complicated.

Mere arbitrary signs.

The Romans not patrons of art.

¹ Hawkins: A General History of the Science and Practice of Music, London, 1853, vol. i, p. 103. With this view agree Dr. Wallis and many other high authorities.

² Some authorities place the number at twelve hundred and forty. It is very difficult to determine, but fortunately the question is of slight archaeological importance.

³ Hawkins: History of Music, vol. i, p. 104.

chromatic scales had fallen into disuse, and the more natural diatonic with its greater simplicity and sweetness had been accepted.

The old Greek music had virtually perished in its childhood, and the world lost little or nothing. It is highly probable that the Western Church first developed a truly Christian music, such as contributed to the highest edification of believers, when it completely broke away from Greek influences.¹ The art of Greece had no was largely objective. In music, therefore, the Greeks did not attain to those grand results which in sculpture, architecture, and poetry have been entirely incomparable. The best authorities are in substantial agreement that they were not acquainted with music in consonance, or with harmony in its modern sense. Their music was simply a succession, and not a harmony, of sounds.²

But with Christianity began an era of feeling and contemplation. From the study of government and the state it directed attention to the life, obligations, and destiny of the individual. This tendency to introspection, and to the study of the condition of the feelings, gave occasion for their expression by methods in harmony with this new view of individual life and duty. Music is the art which of all others is expressive of the feelings of the soul.³ Unlike poetry, architecture, sculpture, or painting, music can express itself freely and completely without the aid of other arts.⁴ Hence it might be supposed that each nation and each independent religious or psychical development would have its own music to express its peculiar emotional condition, just as each nation or tribe has had its own language or idiom.⁵ Since every religion has had much to do with the sentiments and emotions—Christianity most of all—this new revelation of God to man in Jesus Christ would greatly quicken the emotional nature and lead its followers to devise means for its appropriate expression.

¹ Kiesewetter: Geschichte der europäisch-abendländischen oder unser heutigen Musik, s. 2.

² This has been a subject of protracted controversy. Doubtless the lack of clear definition has been one cause of the great diversity of opinion. The preponderance of authority is in favour of the statement of the text.

³ Haweis: Music and Morals, p. 10.

⁴ "The musician has less connection with the outward world than any other artist. He must turn the thought inward to seek the inspiration of his art in the deepest recesses of his own being." Goethe: Wilhelm Meister, bk. ii, cap. ix. Brendel: Geschichte der Musik, s. 8.

⁵ P. Clément: Histoire generale de la Musique Religieuse, p. 4.

In obedience to this principle Ambrose was led to devise a more appropriate music for his churches. It is to be deeply regretted that we have such scanty materials by which to judge of the character and extent of the Ambrosian reform. From the few historic notices, and from the musical traditions of the Latin Church, it is believed that he simplified the then prevalent Ptolemaic system by reducing the seven recognised modes to four. ^{Reduced the} He deemed these sufficient for the proper conduct of the ^{modes to four.} Church service. He believed that thus the various tunes which had been hitherto in use could be reduced to systematic form, and yet be so simple that the congregation might use them to their own profit and to the common edification.

The four modes which he thus borrowed are indicated as follows:

The Antique.			Mediæval.			Ambrosian.
Phrygian	D to \bar{D}	was the	Dorian	was the	1st tone or mode.
Dorian	E to \bar{E}	" "	Phrygian	" "	2d " "
Ionian	F to \bar{F}	" "	Lydian	" "	3d " "
Hypophrygian	G to \bar{G}	" "	Mixolydian	" "	4th " "

These seem to have been distinguished from one another only by the place of the half tones in the gamut, thus:

1st mode	D. E. F. G. A. H. C. D.
2d	" E. F. G. A. H. C. D. E.	⌘Scheme.
3d	" F. G. A. H. C. D. E. F.
4th	" G. A. H. C. D. E. F. G.

In this reform the tetrachord system was abandoned, and the metric of the poetry determined the musical accent. It is believed that attention was given only to the pitch, and not to the volume or length of note. In the time of Charlemagne an attempt was made to displace the Ambrosian by the Gregorian chants. Thus the Ambrosian notation was lost. It is not even known whether Ambrose devised an independent notation, but since his system was of Greek derivation, it is conjectured that the Greek notation was retained in so far as was consistent with his ^{Fell into dis-} ^{use.} purpose. The notation found in the so-called Ambrosian singing books is certainly of later origin: of the original nothing has survived. Also, in how far the traditional Ambrosian chant resembles the original is matter of pure conjecture.¹

While the range of the Ambrosian chants must have ^{Effect upon the} ^{service.} been very narrow, the influence of the service of song upon the church of Milan was most happy. Augustine, who was accustomed to visit this then noted church, speaks of its inspiration to himself.¹ He afterward introduced the same form into the churches of his own diocese, and by personal efforts and the writing of a systematic treatise became a zealous promoter of sacred poetry and music.

¹ v. Forkel: Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik, Bd. ii, ss. 163, 164.

During the following two and one half centuries the Ambrosian chants seem to have been widely used in the Latin Church. This is evident from the fact that they are mentioned in the acts of the fourth Council of Toledo, A. D. 633, as forming a part of the service in the Spanish churches. They gave form, method, and dignity to the public singing. The adaptation of words to these modes became a matter of deep interest to the bishops, so that even in the most trying and stormy times of Roman history the impressiveness and solemnity of the public services were maintained.

The writings of Macrobius, Capella, Cassiodorus, and Boethius exerted little modifying influence on the music of the Church. They lost sight of the practical needs of the times, and returned to the study of the theory of proportions as developed by the aid of arithmetic and geometry. Even the pious Boethius, in his labored work, de Musica, does not once refer either to the use of instruments, to the voice as used in the singing of the sanctuary, or to any practical application of his abstract speculations. He was a close adherent of the Pythagorean theory, that consonances or harmonies are to be determined by mathematical ratios and not by the ear. His chief merit is that he has preserved the elements of the ancient systems of music; which fact makes it possible to compare them with what is now extant, and thus determine the originality of the modern masters of harmony.²

So far as can be inferred from either literary or monumental evidence, no further musical reform was effected until near the close of the sixth century. After his elevation to the pontificate, Gregory the Great gave much thought to the improvement of the Church ritual, and originated a style of music which has borne his name. The Gregorian chant (Cantus Gregorianus) marks a revolution no less distinct than useful. Such has been the tenacity of its life that it is still the leading form in nearly all the Catholic churches, and has modified the singing in some Protestant churches, notably the Lutheran and Anglican.

By his patrician rank, his sound learning, his wide experience of public affairs, and his thorough acquaintance with the most noted men of his age, Gregory was thoroughly qualified to exert a commanding influence on both the temporal and spiritual interests of the Western Empire. The missionary and reformatory schemes which he successfully executed give to his pontificate a prominent Gregory's place in the history of the Church. His efforts to great services mitigate the severities of slavery, and to secure a more complete recognition of the rights of the poor before the law, often brought him into conflict with the temporal authorities. He has been accused of undue ambition; but this charge is not sustained, since in all his efforts he seems to have had little thought of personal aggrandizement, but was only zealous for the honor and success of the Church. The service which he rendered Church music was great and lasting. Besides substituting the Roman letters for the Greek characters in his notation,¹ he reformed the antiphonary, and founded and endowed seminaries for the study of music. By the aid of singers herein trained, the improvements which Gregory had devised were widely introduced into the public worship of the West, and thus the influence of his reform was more lasting than otherwise had been possible.

¹ Confessiones, ix, vii.

² Hawkins: History of Music, pp. 124, 125.

"He also took time, even amid the great cares that severely taxed his frail body, to examine with what tunes the psalms, Maimbourg's hymns, orisons, verses, responses, canticles, lessons, estimate. epistles, the gospel, the prefaces, and the Lord's Prayer were to be sung; what were the tunes, measures, notes, and moods most suitable to the majesty of the Church, and most proper to inspire devotion." The accounts given by John the Deacon in his life of Gregory relative to the services of this pontiff are quite circumstantial, and awaken our admiration of his energy and tireless industry to perfect the Church service.²

The so-called Ambrosian system was the basis of the Gregorian improvement. The four modes of this system were retained. To these were added four others, so that the first note in the Gregory's reform. Ambrosian became the fourth of the Gregorian. The original Ambrosian modes were called Authentic, and the four added ones, Plagal, as follows:

1st Ambrosian or authentic mode	D.E.F.G.A.H.C.D.	gave rise to 1st Plagal	A.H.C.D.E.F.G.A.
2d " " " "	E.F.G.A.H.C.D.E.	" " 2d "	H.C.D.E.F.G.A.H.
3d " " " "	F.G.A.H.C.D.E.F.	" " 3d "	C.D.E.F.G.A.H.C.
4th " " " "	G.A.H.C.D.E.F.G.	" " 4th "	D.E.F.G.A.H.C.D.

¹ That Gregory was not the inventor of the Latin notation is shown by Fétis: Histoire générale de la Musique, t. iii. pp. 521-528.

² Maimbourg: Histoire du Pontifical de St. Grégoire, Paris, 1686. pp. 330, 331.

³ Johannes Diaconus: in Vita Greg., lib. ii, cap. vi.

The following modern notation is believed to represent these Authentic and Plagal modes:

1st Authentic.

1st Plagal.

2d Authentic.

2d Plagal.

3d Authentic.

3d Plagal.

4th Authentic.

4th Plagal.

With Ambrose, Gregory exchanged the irrational system of the Greek tetrachord for the system of the octave, which is now recognised as the only natural system. He also liberated the melody from the metric accent, thus allowing to the melody a more free and independent development according to its own laws.¹

¹ Kieseewetter: Op. cit., Bd i, p. 5. Reissmann: Gregorianischer Gesang in Musicalischen Conversations-Lexicon, Bd. iv, ss. 346, 347. In a melodic sense (Gregory being unacquainted with harmony) an authentic mode was a melody moving from Tonica to Tonica. It is thought that by such modes the ancient Christians gave expression to firmness, deep conviction, or abounding joy. Those melodies that

ANIMAM MEAM DOMINE MEUS IN TE CONFIDO
non erubescam. PSALMUS. Viae tuae domine

AD REPETENDUM Dirige me in iustitiam tuam

RESPONSORIUM GRADUALE

Veniuerunt si qui te expectant
non confundentur domine.
Veniuerunt si qui te expectant
non confundentur domine.

52

The contribution to the improvement of music by this increase of tones can be better appreciated by observing the change effected in the place and use of the Dominant and the Final note. The Ambrosian chant recognized but four modes, or eight sounds in a natural or diatonic order of progression, proceeding from D, E, F, and G to the octave of the same. ^{Nature of this} This system required the chant to begin and end on the same note. The Dominant (so called from the note which was most prominent in the rendering of the chant, "the note on which the recitative is made in each psalm or canticle tune") did not, therefore, accord with the fundamental or key note of modern music, upon which all the harmony must be based. In the Ambrosian chant the frequent return to the fundamental note was necessary in order to keep the voices of the chanters and of the congregation in unison by being sustained at the proper pitch, and holding to the mode to which the chant was set. The Gregorian chant differed from the Ambrosian also in the place of ending. While the latter must return to the note of beginning, the former permitted the final to be other than the lowest note, thereby giving a greater variety to the ending of the chants. "Each of the Plagal modes added by Gregory is a fourth below its corresponding original, and is called by the same name, with the prefix hypo (ὑπο) below, as follows: 5. Hypodorian; 6. Hypophrygian; 7. Hypolydian; 8. Hypomixolydian. Each scale here also consists of a perfect fifth and a perfect fourth, but the positions are reversed; the fourth is now below, and the fifth above. In the Plagal scales the Final is no longer the lowest note, but is the same as that in the corresponding Authentic scale. Thus the final of the Hypodorian mode is not A, but D, and a melody in that mode, though ranging from about A to A, ends regularly on D, as in the Dorian. . . . The semitones in each scale naturally vary as before. The Dominants of the new scales are in each case a third below those of the old ones, C being, however, substituted for B in the Hypomixolydian, as it had been before in the Phrygian, on account of the relations between B and the F above and below."¹

This system was subsequently developed by the ad- ^{Further devel-}dition of two other Authentic modes, called the Æolian ^{opment.} and the Ionian, and of their corresponding Plagals—the Hypoæolian moved around the Tonica were called Plagal. These are believed to have been expressive of variable emotions, or of a more pensive and subdued state of religious feeling.

¹ v. Rev. Thomas Helmore in Grave's Musical Dictionary, vol. i, p. 626, article "Gregorian Modes."

and the Hypoionian. Thus resulted a complete scheme which has powerfully influenced the ecclesiastical music of the Western Church. The Ritual Service books have been a means of preserving this improved system, so that in most churches of Western Europe the psalm and canticle tunes, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Benedictus, the Antiphones, the Nicene Creed, the Processions, etc., are based essentially on the scheme which Gregory devised, and on whose strictest observance he so strongly insisted.¹

Gregory also invented a system of notation for his improved Gregorian Antiphonarium. Tradition says that his Antiphonarium, the book containing this notation, was kept chained to the altar in the Basilica of St. Peter's at Rome, in order that it might be immediately consulted in case of any suspected innovation in the choral service. In order to conform the music in the churches of his empire to this standard it is claimed that Charlemagne, in A. D. 790, applied to Pope Adrian I. for a copy of this manuscript Antiphonarium. The copy is now one of the most valued treasures in the library of the Abbey of St. Gall in Switzerland.²

Plate IX represents the first page of Lambillotte's facsimile of this famous manuscript. It contains portions of Psalm xxv; on this page are parts of verses 1, 2, 3, 5.³ The extreme care with which this work was prepared proves the thoroughness of the Gregorian reform. The various marks connected with the words, technically called neumes, have elicited the most careful and patient study; but their meaning and use have not yet been determined. Whether they were a system of musical notation, or were indications to the singers of variation in quality and volume of tone, is still a matter of debate. Already in the time of Guido of

¹ Helmore: Op. cit., vol. i, p. 627.

² This copy at St. Gall was most faithfully facsimiled under the direction of the zealous Jesuit, Lambillotte, in 1848 (v. his work Antiphonaire de Saint Grégoire, Facsimile du Manuscrit de Saint-Gall, VIII^e Siècle, Paris, 1851, 4to.) He claims that the manuscript is authentic, and contains the system as it was instituted by Gregory. Against the objections to its authenticity urged by Danjou, Fétis, and others (who claim that it is of a later origin) Lambillotte gives what he regards abundant evidence, both external and internal, of its genuineness. The art work connected with the Antiphonarium would point to an origin not later than the tenth century, possibly considerably earlier. v. also Coussemaker: Histoire de l'harmonie au moyen âge; and Schubiger: Sängerschule St. Gallens vom achten bis zwölften Jahrhundert.

³ The text is sufficiently clear to most readers: Ad te levavi animam meam, Deus meus, in te confido non erubescam. [Psalmus.] Vias tuas, Domine [ad repetendum], dirige me in veritate tua [responsorium graduale]. Universi qui te expectant non confundentur, Domine. Vias tuas, Domine, etc.

Alleluia

Alle lu - ja
En regna ter coele sti um et

No. 1.

Gloria in excelsis dō.

refrains

Glo ria in ex cel sis de - o

No. 2.

Cō Domus mea domus orationis vocabitur

Domus me a do mus o ra ti o nis.

No. 3.

Rē Tecum principium in die virtutū

Tecum princi pi um in di - e vir tu

No. 4.

PLATE X.—Facsimiles of earliest musical manuscripts.

1890-1891

1891-1892

1892-1893

1893-1894

1894-1895

1895-1896

1896-1897

1897-1898

1898-1899

1899-1900

1900-1901

1901-1902

1902-1903

1903-1904

1904-1905

1905-1906

1906-1907

1907-1908

1908-1909

1909-1910

1910-1911

1911-1912

1912-1913

1913-1914

1914-1915

1915-1916

1916-1917

1917-1918

1918-1919

1919-1920

Arezzo (eleventh century) their signification had been lost.¹ Much learned comment upon them has appeared, and a few writers claim that the key to their meaning has been discovered.

We give examples from four most ancient and interesting codices, now preserved in the abbey libraries of St. Gall and Einsiedeln, Switzerland (v. Plate X). No. 1 is a "Hallelujah" from the tenth century,² giving the accompanying numæ and the suggested translation into modern musical notation. It is from the library of St. Gall.

Illustrations and translations.

No. 2 is a facsimile of an early Gloria in excelsis from a codex now preserved in the abbey library of Einsiedeln.³ The numæ are well defined; the manuscript is among the earliest. It is very interesting as giving this noble hymn of the early Church, and seems to justify the earnest attempts to find the key to the strange notation whose discovery would so materially aid in the appreciation of the work of Ambrose and of Gregory in the reform of ecclesiastical music.

No. 3 is from the same codex, showing a still more complicated system of numæ.⁴ In the appended scale is given the proposed equivalent in the modern notation.

No. 4 is the copy of a portion of a very early codex in the abbey library of St. Gall,⁵ in which the numæ are found in their greatest complication. As in the foregoing, the accompanying scale is a tentative translation of the same.

While names and values have been given to every distinct numæ and to their combination in these early manuscripts, it is exceedingly doubtful whether any of the interpretations have proved satisfactory; much less have they real historic foundation.

The Gregorian system contained the germs of the later advanced and perfected system of Church music; but during the stormy times following the pontificate of Gregory it fell somewhat into neglect, and even the hymns which he had so carefully prepared and arranged to music for the use of the Church were in danger of being lost. A few learned men took upon themselves the duty of saving

¹ v. Migne: Patrologia, tom. 141, pp. 413, 414. Aliae Guidonis regulæ de ignoto cantu, "Vix denique unus concordat alteri, non magistro discipulus nec discipulus condiscipulus," etc.

² From Cod. S. Galli, No. 338, sec. x. v. Schubiger: Sängerschule St. Gallen, s. iv, No. 22.

³ From Cod. Einsidlensi, No. 121. Schubiger: Op. cit., s. iii, No. 5.

⁴ Schubiger: Op. cit., s. iii, No. 12.

⁵ From Codex S. Galli, No. 359. Schubiger: Op. cit., s. iii, No. 7.

to the Church what it would have been impossible to do by means of simple tradition. Even during the lifetime of Gregory the ambition of musical leaders strove to break away from the simplicity of his prescribed methods, and so frequent and serious were the innovations which threatened the purity of the choral service after his death that the ecclesiastical court at Rome was frequently besought by the temporal princes to interpose to restore it to its simplicity and save it from utter extinction.¹

It is evident, therefore, that in the development of this new system Gregory and his helpers had a deeper insight into the essentials of an ecclesiastic music than any of their predecessors. While he betook himself without stint to the study of the music of the Greeks, his system was original in its greater simplicity, in the richness of its results, and in its practical adaptation to the wants of the Church. As in other fine arts, so here, from the materials at hand Christianity constructed a new body, and breathed into it its own new spirit of life and hope.² It is probable that the chants of the Christian liturgy had no more resemblance to the Greek melodies than the sacerdotal garments of the Christians had to those of the Levites or the priests of Zeus. In these respects this ecclesiastical music may be regarded as original, and not a derivation from the old Greek musical theory or notation.³

While it is probable that the Ambrosian chant, introduced into Milan, resembled in some respects that which was used in the churches of Basil and Chrysostom, it is nevertheless true that neither these simple modes, nor even the improved and perfected modes of the Gregorian chant, could satisfy the restless and fiery spirit of the East.

The Greek Church was then expending her energies in wrangling over dogmas often the most insignificant. The intimate relations of the temporal and ecclesiastical powers likewise subjected this Church to influences destructive of the simplicity and purity of Christian faith. The great festivals were celebrated with a pomp and splendor of ceremonial before unknown. It was not the happy alliance of religion and art to express and more powerfully to inculcate the saving truths of Christianity, but a degeneration into a semibarbarian finery and senseless extravagance indicative of spiritual bondage, and destructive alike of purity of doctrine and of nobility of art. Hence this condition of absolutism in the state, and of superstition in the Church, was most unfavorable to the development of poetry and music, as well as of painting and sculpture. Hence, too, the simple and impressive Gregorian modes were never introduced into the Greek Church. New and extravagant modes were devised, and the singing of the processions and of the Church services was intermingled with the braying of trumpets and the clangor of horns. Only eunuchs were admitted to the choirs, whose very dress was an example of degenerate finery. Thus every thing in the Greek Church, after the sixth century, took on that type which is the sure effect, as well as evidence, of a decadence of faith and manners.¹ The bondage of art to false and degenerate Church standards repressed all vigor and originality in the artists. The iconoclastic spirit declared war against sculptured images, while a subsequent degrading superstition came to attach special sanctity to the most grotesque and repulsive pictures.²

¹ Kiesenwetter: Op. cit., p. 7. Hawkins: Op. cit., vol. i, p. 131.

² Ambros: Op. cit., vol. ii, p. 11.

³ Clément: Op. cit., p. 22.

¹ Early Christian music is a subject of peculiar difficulty. The researches of the historians have been most thorough; yet with respect to some features of the subject there seems to be little promise of substantial agreement. The immense literature of the subject, down to near the end of the eighteenth century, as given by Forkel: Allgemeine Literatur der Musik, etc., Leipzig, 1792, and by other writers since his day, may well induce modesty of opinion respecting many controverted points.

² "The ruder the art the more intense the superstition. The perfection of the fine arts tends rather to diminish than promote such superstition. . . . There is more direct idolatry paid to the rough and illshapen image, or the flat, unrelieved, or staring picture—the former actually clothed in gaudy or tinsel ornaments, the latter with the crown of goldleaf on the head, and real or artificial flowers in the hand—than to the noblest ideal statue, or the Holy Family with all the magic of light and shade." Milman: Latin Christianity, ii, pp. 303, 304.

"These miraculous images were not admitted to be the work of man, but were proclaimed to have fallen from heaven, to have been dug from the bowels of the earth, or obtained in some similar mysterious manner. Others were said to be as old as the religion itself, such as the picture of Christ in Edessa, given by the Saviour himself to the messengers of King Abgarus, and the many portraits of the Madonna painted by the evangelist Luke, etc. Idolatry of this kind excited the ridicule of the unbelieving, the serious disapprobation of the Church, and, finally, the forcible interference of the temporal powers. This destruction of earlier artistic monuments, and interference with the customary pictures, resulted in a change in the traditional manner of representation, and gave to all succeeding Byzantine art a somewhat different character. The objection had not been raised against painting itself, but against the portrayal of Christ, of the Virgin, and of the saints: thus the attention of the artists was diverted from sacred subjects to other themes, and the merely decorative treatment of the ecclesiastical edifices again became of importance." Reber: History of Mediæval Art, New York, 1887, p. 92.

"Let us be thoroughly penetrated with the thought that art is also to itself a kind of religion. God manifests himself to us by the idea of the true, by the idea of the good, by the idea of the beautiful. Each one of them leads to God, because it comes from him. True beauty is ideal beauty, and ideal beauty is the reflection of the infinite. So, independently of all official alliance with religion and morals, art is by itself essentially religious and moral; for, far from wanting its own law, its own genius, it everywhere expresses in its works eternal beauty. . . . Every work of art, whatever may be its form, small or great, figured, sung, or uttered—every work of art, truly beautiful or sublime—throws the soul into a gentle reverie that exalts it toward the infinite. The infinite is the common limit after which the soul aspires upon the wings of imagination as well as reason, by the route of the sublime and beautiful as well as by that of the true and the good. The emotion that the beautiful produces turns the soul from this world; it is the beneficent emotion that art produces for humanity." Cousin: The True, the Beautiful, and the Good, p. 164.

BOOK SECOND.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF THE CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT OF THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF CHURCH CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT.

CHAPTER I.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN ITS IDEA AND ORIGIN.

§ 1. New Testament Idea of the Church.

CHRIST taught his disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come" (Matt. vi, 10). He designates his Church as "the kingdom of God," τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ (Matt. vi, 33; John iii, 3, ^{A kingdom.} et al.); "the kingdom of heaven," ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν (Matt. v, 3; xi, 11; xviii, 1, et al.); or simply "my kingdom," or "the kingdom," ἡ βασιλεία μου, τὴν βασιλείαν (Matt. xiii, 38; Luke xii, 32; Luke xxii, 30, et al.).

The term ἐκκλησία is used by Christ (Matt. xvi, 18) to describe the unified and collected body of his disciples; in Matt. xviii, 17 this term seems to be restricted and localized ^{Ἐκκλησία.} in its reference.¹ The term is applied by Luke to the company of the disciples on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii, 47); and to an ordinary town assembly (Acts xix, 41). In other passages in the New Testament it signifies the whole body of sanctified Christian believers (Eph. v, 27; Phil. iii, 6; Col. i, 18, 24, et al.); an organized church placed under pastors (1 Cor. xii, 18; Phil. iv, 15, et al.); the separate societies of a district or province (Gal. i, 2; 2 Cor. vii, 19); and sometimes the Christians gathered for worship, or the assemblies of these societies (1 Cor. iv, 17; xiv, 19-28, et al.). In all these passages the word measurably preserves its radical signification, καλεῖν, to call, to invite; κλήσις, a call, a calling, "the divine invitation to embrace salvation in the kingdom of God" (Thayer's Grimm Wilkie, s. v.); κλητοί, the called, "the invited to salvation," etc. The fundamental notion thus suggested by this word is the body or assembly of those called or "invited to obtain eternal salvation in the kingdom of God through Christ" (Thayer's Grimm Wilkie, s. v.).

¹ On the genuineness of Matt. xvi, 18, and xviii, 17, much diversity of opinion exists.

Another characterization quite frequent in the epistles is σῶμα
 The body of Χριστοῦ (1 Cor. xii, 27; Eph. iii, 6; iv, 4, et al.). "Ye Christ. are the body of Christ," and this "body is one," of which "Christ is the Saviour."

The Church is also represented under the figure of a "spiritual house," οἶκος πνευματικός (1 Pet. ii, 5), which is composed A temple. of all God's people, and which he makes his dwelling-place (1 Cor. iii, 16, 17; 2 Cor. vi, 16; Rev. xxi, 3, et al.); of "a house, a holy temple in the Lord," εἰς ναὸν ἁγίον ἐν κυρίῳ (Eph. ii, 21, 22).

It is also spoken of as the Bride, of whom Christ is the Bridegroom, τὴν γυναῖκα τὴν νύμφην τοῦ ἀρνίου (Eph. v, 31, The Bride. 32; Rev. xxi, 9); the Light of the World, τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου (Matt. v, 14), et al.

From such characterizations it is evident that the vital element of the Church is spiritual. Its inspiration is from above; its essential life comes from direct contact with its Head and Lord. It is more than the aggregated life of those who have been sanctified by the Spirit through faith in Christ; it is a living organism,
 An organism. in which each feels the inspiration of the entire body, and the whole is sustained and invigorated by the abiding holiness of the individual members.

Nevertheless, like the Holy Scriptures, it contains a divine and a human element—a spirit and a body. While the life is spiritual, it must have a medium of manifestation. The visible Church is this body of divinely called or invited men and women, organized for moral and religious ends, and which is to become the channel through which, ordinarily, redemption is brought to fallen men, and they are fitted for the companionship of the Church triumphant.¹

The Church is therefore the outward form which results
 A visible form. from the Christian life, as this is inspired and developed by the divine Spirit, and modified by providential environments (Matt. xviii, 15-18; John x, 16; 1 Cor. xii, 27; Eph. iv, 25, et al.).

§ 2. The Names applied to its Members.

The terms applied to its individual members will further illustrate the original conception of the Church. In the Disciples. evangelists they are known only as "disciples," μαθηταί, of Christ; those who are in the relation of learners to a master,

¹ This triumph and completion of the "kingdom of heaven" would be fully realized only at the reappearing of Christ on earth. The powerful influence of this expectation of the speedy second coming of the Saviour is seen in various passages of the apostolic writings.

whose doctrine they seek to understand and heartily embrace. They are believers, πιστοί, who apprehend the Messiahship of Christ through his words and works. They are brethren, ἀδελφοί, who are born of the same spirit, and are associated in most intimate fellowship with their Lord and with each other, as in a common family.

Believers.

Brethren.

In their epistles the apostles frequently speak of the members of the Church as the "holy," ἅγιοι, set apart to sacred uses; the "elect," ἐκλεκτοί, chosen for good works to the honor of his name; "a chosen generation," τὸ γένος ἐκλεκτόν; "a royal priesthood," βασιλείον ιεράτευμα; "a holy nation," ἔθνος ἅγιον (1 Pet. ii, 9). In Antioch they were first called "Christians," Χριστιανοί, that is, the dependents, the clients of their master, Christ.¹ Their Jewish enemies applied to them opprobrious epithets, as Nazarenes, Ναζωραῖοι (Acts xxiv, 5); Galileans, Γαλιλαῖοι,² expressive of the low popular estimate placed upon the city and province where was the home of Christ and his first followers (Acts ii, 7).

Opprobrious epithets.

§ 3. The Apostolate.

While the institution of a church by Christ is unquestionable, and its essential nature and design are clearly revealed, we search in vain in the acts and words of our Lord for any traces of an ecclesiastical constitution. He spoke of a kingdom; he chose and trained apostles to preach the truth pertaining to it; he prescribed the conditions of citizenship therein; in the last Supper he provided a centre of worship, and of possible future organization. The Church shall not lack an infallible Guide, for "when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth" (John xvi, 13). Nor shall the kingdom which Christ has established fail; rather must it "accomplish that which he please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto he sent it" (Isa. lv, 2). But what specific form it is to assume in fulfilling the purpose of its institution is not given by the Founder; no type of organization is anywhere revealed. The single suggestion relative to the treatment of offenders seems to recognise the body of the Church as the depository of all governing and disciplinary power (Matt. xviii, 17); and the decisions of the early church, thus guarded from error by the Holy Ghost, were to be final with respect to faith and morals (Matt. xviii, 18; John xx, 23; Gal. ii, 7-9, et al.). By virtue of their receiving divine enlightenment, of sharing the divine nature, and of the impartation of those special charisms by which they could discern the character of spirits, the apostles and the primitive church were qualified to bind or loose (δέειν, λύειν), to remit or retain (ἀφίεναι, κρατεῖν), the sins of the people.

Its triumph assured.

¹ The origin of this name is not altogether certain. Probably it was first applied to the disciples by the heathen residents of Antioch. It is only in harmony with other examples in the history of the Christian Church, where a name that was at first used derisively was afterward accepted by the parties themselves. For example, Beghards, Methodists, etc. v. Lipsius: Ueber Ursprung u. Gebrauch den Christenamen, Jena, 1873.

² The Emperor Julian "countenanced, and probably enjoined, the use of the less honourable appellation of Galileans, . . . contemptible to men and odious to the gods." v. Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., chap. xxiii.

The lack of a distinct and thorough organization is likewise manifest from the continued participation of the apostles and disciples in the temple service after the ascension of Christ. They still observed the Jewish ordinances, and acknowledged the rightful authority of those in Moses' seat. While often meeting by themselves to listen to the preaching of the apostles, to pray, and to celebrate the communion in the breaking of bread, they nevertheless regarded themselves as still within the pale of the Jewish church, fulfilled the obligations thereby imposed, and revered the temple as the sanctuary of the Most High God.

Notwithstanding the prevalence of the new spirit of brotherly love, which led them to hold all things in common, and to sell their estates and place the price in the apostles' hands; and notwithstanding the rapid increase of the number of the disciples, from about six hundred at the date of the ascension to five thousand within forty days thereafter, there is no evidence of an ecclesiastical organization. The apostles appear prominent as actors in the history, but the spirit of prophecy rests upon the body of believers as well. The pungent preaching of Peter is scarcely more effective than the exercise of the varied gifts of the Spirit bestowed upon both men and women. The statement that the multitude who were converted under the preaching of Peter "continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine" (Acts ii, 42) might at first appear to clothe the apostles with the authority of original teachers, to whom the others stood in the relation of disciples (μαθηταί). This view appears, however, untenable from the positive injunction of Christ himself, "But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your master, ὁ διδάσκαλος, even Christ; and all ye are brethren," οἱ ἀδελφοί (Matt. xxiii, 8). The apostles imposed no doctrines of their own origination; they claimed no power to found schools or make disciples;¹ rather were they, and all who should believe on Christ through their preaching, alike disciples (μαθηταί) of one common Master. This view was strongly emphasized by Paul when he rebuked the Corinthian believers for their factious attachment to different teachers, thus fostering contention and dividing the body of Christ (1 Cor. i, 12, 13; iii, 4-6). The business of the apostles was not to make law for the Church, nor to institute any exclusive form of ecclesiastical constitution; but they were to preach the Gospel as they had received it from their Master, and inspire in the hearts of men faith in the doctrines which Jesus had taught them, and in the kingdom which he had come to establish (Matt. x, 7, et seq.; Acts ii, 32; iii, 15, 16; xiii, 31; xxvi, 22, 23; 1 Cor. iv, 5; Eph. iii, et al.).

The bond existing between the early disciples was, in its essential nature and purpose, far other and much more wide-reaching than that implied in a "school," or "guild;" it was best expressed by the word "fellowship" (κοινωνία);² they being partakers of a like faith in Christ, which was the inspiration of all their activities, and having a consciousness of common citizenship in the kingdom of God. This helps us to understand the fact already hinted at; namely, that the apostles and first disciples did not wish to be considered apostates from the old faith, but because they remained Jews they regarded themselves subject to the local authorities, and recognised the Sanhedrin as the supreme court.³ A special and independent constitution was not yet thought of.

The apostolate was originally instituted as a means of extending the Church through the preaching of doctrines which had been communicated by the infallible Christ (Mark xiv, 15). Its original number corresponded to that of the twelve tribes of Israel, and was, therefore, chosen in deference to the history and prejudices of the existing Jewish church (Matt. xix, 28; Luke xxii, 30). By careful training the twelve had been fitted to become the preachers and custodians of the truth which

A fellowship.

This view further illustrated.

¹ "Jesus was no founder of a sect. He had no desire to found a school; his ministry was directed to the people as a nation." v. Weiss: Life of Christ, Clark's trans., vol. ii, pp. 259, 260. "He was conscious of being in the strictest sense the King of humanity, and of founding a kingdom." Lange: Life of Christ, Edinburgh, 1864, vol. ii, p. 188.

² Compare Acts ii, 42 with Gal. ii, 9; also Acts i, 13, sq., reveals the real bond of the first believers, and the simplicity of their assembly.

³ Weizsäcker: Das apostolische Zeitalter der christlichen Kirche, Freiburg, 1886, ss. 36-38.

was to be accepted by all who would become the disciples of their Master.¹

The term "apostles" was in familiar use among the Jews. In the various centres where the Jews of the Dispersion had settled, large sums of money were contributed for the maintenance of the temple service at Jerusalem; and after the destruction of the temple by Titus this tribute was still collected by messengers, ἀπόστολοι, sent out by the patriarch of Jerusalem for this purpose. These are referred to by the early Christian writers and were the occasion of legal enactments.² It has also been well established that there was a Jewish propaganda for the dissemination of correct religious knowledge among the heathen, as well as for the preservation of the true faith among the Jews.³ Nor can it be doubted that the Christians may have accepted the institution of apostles and their work from the then existing Jewish apostolate, and not the contrary.⁴ The account (Acts xi, 27-30) of the work of Barnabas and Saul in bringing aid to the suffering brethren at Jerusalem reminds us directly of the functions of the Jewish apostles, so that before they are called apostles (Acts xiii, 14) they are doing the identical work which fell to these officers in the Jewish church. When, therefore, Jesus used the word "apostles" to designate the disciples whom he called to a special work, the term was not new nor unfamiliar to his hearers.⁵

By the spiritual endowments vouchsafed to them in virtue of being witnesses of the resurrection, and by the promised aid of the Holy Spirit, they were to be the representatives of Christ with respect to matters of life and doctrine. They were to be overseers and guides of no single society or diocese, but were themselves to be the pillars of the whole Church, Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. Their work was peculiar, their relation was unique. They were without predecessors; they were to have no succes-

¹ The exact time and circumstances of the call of the apostles are not readily determined, since it is not easy to harmonize the statements of the Synoptists. It is very probable that they were called at different times, as Jesus found men who were judged fit to be trained to become preachers of his doctrine.

² v. Schürer: The Jewish People in the time of Jesus Christ, Edinburgh, 1885, vol. ii, pp. 269, 289. S. quotes the following authorities: Eusebius: Comment ad Jesaj., xviii, 1. Epiphanius: Haer., xxx, 4, 11. Jerome: ad Gal., i, 1. Codex Theodos., xvi, 8, 14.

³ v. Hausrath: Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, Bd. ii, ss. 95, seq., 101, seq.; Schürer: Op. cit., pp. 297-307; and the authorities cited by S., pp. 304, 305. Harnack: Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, Freiburg, 1886, bd. i, ss. 73-75.

⁴ v. Lightfoot: Com. on Galatians, p. 94, note 1.

⁵ v. Seufert: Der Ursprung u. die Bedeutung des Apostolates, etc., s. 13.

sors.¹ The preaching of the word, the care of all the churches and their grounding in the truth, the careful guarding of the doctrine which they had received from all admixture of error, the care of souls, and the relief of the pressing needs of the poorer brethren were the distinguishing features of the apostolic function.

With the apostolic age this function ceased. The term apostle was not, however, confined to the original twelve, but other ministers was extended to those who had been intimately associated with them, and with Paul and Barnabas, in the extension of the Gospel and in the care of the churches. At this time the word seems to have had a broader application. Paul calls Titus and his fellow laborers "apostles of the churches," ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν, (2 Cor. viii, 23); and he speaks of himself, Timothy, and Sylvanus, as the "apostles of Christ," ἀπόστολοι Χριστοῦ (1 Thess. ii, 6); he is associated with Barnabas under the expression, σὺν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις (Acts xiv, 4); Barnabas and himself are equal to the other apostles, the brethren of the Lord and Cephas, ὡς καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ ἀπόστολοι κ.τ.λ. in matters of Christian freedom and privilege (1 Cor. ix, 5); and James seems to be reckoned among the apostles, ἕτερον δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων κ.τ.λ. (Gal. i, 19).

From these passages, as well as from the statements in the apostolic fathers, and of the "Διδαχὴ τῶν δώδεκα Ἀποστόλων,"² it must be inferred that there was no strict limitation of the term apostle to the number of twelve. "The twelve" was applied to the twelve—the apostles of the circumcision as representative of its significance. the twelve tribes of Israel, and continued to be the leading idea in the Apocalypse, whose whole imagery is essentially Jewish.³ Paul (1 Cor. xv, 5, 7) distinguishes, however, between "the twelve" and "all the apostles," τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πᾶσιν, who had seen the Lord. His statement may help to understand the ground of the extension of the term "apostle" to the seventy whom Christ had sent forth, and to those who had seen him after his resurrection, and were therefore competent witnesses to this vital truth.

While these various persons were performing duties which might characterize them as "the sent," they were, nevertheless, in the opinion of the Jewish Christians, lacking in some of the qualifications essential to the real apostolate. As Paul here informs us, these had "seen the Lord," but had not been immediately chosen by him for their work, nor received from him special instruction in the truth, both of which were regarded by the Christians of the circumcision as among the peculiar marks of an apostle. The persons thus referred to as apostles, together with Mark, Timothy, Silas, Apollos, Trophimus, and others, were probably evangelists, itinerant preachers,¹ fellow-labourers with "the twelve," ministers of the word, or delegates entrusted with some special mission to the churches.

¹ "The twelve, as the first preachers of the Gospel trained by the Lord for that end, occupied a position in the Church that could be filled by none that came after them. They were the foundation stones on which the walls of the Church were built. They sat, so to speak, on episcopal thrones, judging, guiding, ruling the twelve tribes of the true Israel of God, the holy commonwealth embracing all who professed faith in Christ." v. Bruce: Training of the Twelve, pp. 257, 258.

² Teaching of the Twelve, ch. xi.

³ Lightfoot: Epistle to the Galatians, p. 95.

Others, as Barnabas,² Manaen, Agabus, etc., were specially endowed with prophetic gifts, and had the peculiar power of discerning the qualities and spiritual condition of those to whom important functions were to be entrusted. They thus possessed another indispensable requisite for an apostle, to which Paul appealed in his conflict with the Judaizing opposers of his own claim to be of equal rank, dignity, and authority with even the "pillar apostles," namely, success in preaching the word and in building up the kingdom of the Messiah (1 Cor. ix, 1, 2). When this important test of the apostolic office is applied to those whom Paul calls apostles, it may be safely inferred that only by the Christians of the circumcision could this term be limited to "the twelve," while in the thought of those who had embraced the universalism of the apostle to the Gentiles the apostolate was of broader scope and deeper import. This struggle between narrow and exclusive limitations on the part of the Judaizing sects and the Gentile Christians continued in the second century, long after the death of the original twelve.

¹ It is interesting to notice the use of the term "apostle," ἀπόστολος, in the "Teaching of the Twelve," which probably belongs to the last quarter of the first, or the first quarter of the second century. He is a sort of itinerant preacher, having less claim to honour than the prophet, προφήτης. "But in regard to the apostles and prophets, according to the ordinance of the gospel, so do ye. And every apostle who cometh to you, let him be received as the Lord; but he shall not remain more than one day; if however there be need, then the next day; but if he remains three days he is a false prophet. But when the apostle departeth, let him take nothing except bread enough until he lodge again; but if he ask money he is a false prophet." v. chap. xi.

² Barnabas by special ordination (Acts xiii, 3), and by intimate association with Paul (Acts xiv, 12; xv, 2; Gal. ii, 1, et al.), stands specially near the twelve in dignity and honour.

CHAPTER II.

THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH—ITS COMPOSITION AND OFFICERS.

§ 1. The Apostles and Deacons.

IN the earliest stage of the history of Christianity scarcely a trace of a distinctive organization is noticed. The Christian church, as sharply distinguished from the Jewish, did not yet exist. Of a distinctive church office, and of a formal church constitution, there is as yet no evidence. The apostles were, for the most part, the mouthpiece and representative authority of the Christian community while it was yet one and undivided at Jerusalem. To them the freewill offerings were brought, through their word the first ecclesiastical discipline was inflicted in the death of Ananias and Sapphira.¹ As helpers in the performance of mere manual labor they appear to have had some younger men, οἱ νεώτεροι, of the company (Acts v, 6-10), whose service was voluntary rather than official. This superiority and leadership, and the consequent limitations of the authority of the body of believers, seemed due rather to the personal endowments of the twelve, their authority derived from Christ, and the manifest success of their ministry, than to the prerogatives attaching to a specific office² (1 Thess. ii, 7-10; 1 Cor. ix, 2; 2 Cor. xii, 12, etc.).

The large accessions to the body of believers, however, early brought with them the necessity for a more methodical administration. The diversity of elements already found in the Christian society occasioned an unequal distribution of the charities which had been so liberally provided under the first impulse of a new faith and experience. To remove the cause of complaint, the recommendation of the twelve that "seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom" (Acts vi, 3), be appointed to this business, resulted in a division of labour most simple and salutary. The choice of the "multitude of the disciples,"

¹ Thiersch calls this punishment "the fearful act of divine ecclesiastical discipline." v. Die Kirche im apostolischen Zeitalter, 3te Aufl., 1879, s. 75.

² Among others v. Bickell: Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Frankfurt, 1849, s. 71. Neander: Planting and Training, etc., trans. by Ryland, New York, 1844, p. 33. Weizsäcker: Op. cit., s. 611. Lechler: Das apostolische u. nachapostolische Zeitalter, Leipzig, 1885, s. 91.

"the whole multitude," fell upon seven devout men "whom they set before the apostles; and when they had prayed they laid their hands upon them" (Acts vi, 6). Such was the occasion and such were the circumstances of the institution of the earliest distinct class of officers—the deacons.¹

While the terms διακονία, διακονεῖν, etc., are used both in the New Testament² and by the early Christian fathers³ in connection with any one who ministers, it is likewise applied to presbyters and bishops, and even to the apostles themselves. From the history given in the Acts of the Apostles, no conclusive evidence appears that in the apostolic Church there was more than one order of ministers, aside from the apostles.⁴ While there is a variety of terms, these are neither clearly defined nor are the duties easily determinable. This was in harmony with the existing conditions of religious activity and devotion, and is entirely analogous to other institutions in the incipient stages of their organization. Not until the second century is the term deacon used with absolute precision of reference and function.

Nevertheless, when Irenæus⁵ marks with definiteness this term, he also insists that the order instituted by the apostles was identical with that of his day. The almost uniform traditions sustain this view, while the Latin Church, in deference to the apostles' institution, long restricted the number of deacons in a single church to seven. At a later period, when the organization of the Church had become more formal, the original functions of "the seven" were more clearly limited to the deacons, until the institution of hospitals, almshouses, orphanages, etc., transferred to others the services at first assigned to them.

The qualifications for this office, as enumerated by Paul (1 Tim. iii, 8, seq.), are just of that nature to fit them for ministering with the church in most familiar relations, to ascertain and relieve the wants of the poorer members with delicacy, appropriate reticence, and freedom from temptation to avaricious greed. It is noticeable that gravity, honest words, temperance, unselfishness, probity in themselves and in their households, and an honest faith outrank "aptness to teach," which in the context is said to be an indispensable qualification of the presbyter or bishop.

¹ While Luke does not call the seven "deacons," the word was evidently derived from διακονία, the distribution of alms, which was their original function.

² Acts i, 24; 1 Cor. iii, 5; 2 Cor. vi, 4; Eph. iii, 7, et al.

³ Chrysostom: Hom. 1 in Phil. i, 1, et al.

⁴ Neander: Op. cit., p. 33.

⁵ Irenæus, i, 26, 3; iii, 12, 10.

There is abundant evidence that this office, first instituted in Jerusalem in a church composed almost exclusively of Jewish converts, was also widely adopted by churches of Gentile origin. At Corinth and Rome, likewise in the societies of Asia Minor, are met those "helps," ἀντιλήψεις (1 Cor. xii, 28), and "ministrations," εἶτε διακονίαν ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ (Rom. xii, 7), which were the peculiar duty of the deacons.¹ The office seems to have been generally recognized, although there are intimations that it was not regarded as absolutely indispensable.² A little later in the apostolic period is noticed a further provision for the more complete oversight and care of the poor. "The strict seclusion of the female sex in Greece and in some Oriental countries necessarily debarred them from the ministrations of men; and to meet the want thus felt it was found necessary at an early date to admit women to the diaconate. A woman deacon belonging to the church of Cenchræ is mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans.³ . . . Again passing over an interval of some years we find St. Paul, in the First Epistle to Timothy (1 Tim. iii, 8, seq.), about A. D. 66, giving express directions as to the qualifications of men-deacons and women-deacons alike."⁴

Thus it is seen that to the deacons and deaconesses was assigned primarily the duty of ministration to the poor, and the oversight of the temporal affairs of the Christian societies, yet the deacons retaining, as in the case of Stephen and Philip, the right to teach and baptize.⁵ "The deacons became the first preachers of Christianity; they were the first evangelists, because they were the first to find their way to the homes of the poor. They were the constructors of the most solid and durable of the institutions of Christianity, namely, the institutions of charity and beneficence."⁶ Of all the offices of the Church the diaconate seems peculiarly Christian in conception and origin. The attempts to derive it from the synagogue⁷ have proved unsatisfactory. The peculiar exigencies of the early apostolic Church com-

¹ v. Lightfoot: The Christian Ministry: in Commentary on the Epistle to the Philippians, 8th edition, London, 1885, p. 191.

² v. Titus i, 5, seq.

³ Chap. xvi, l. Φοίβην τὴν ἀδελφὴν ἡμῶν, ὅσαν διάκονον τῆς ἐκκλησίας κ.τ.λ.

⁴ Lightfoot: Op. cit., id.

⁵ Acts vii: viii, 35-40.

⁶ Stanley: Christian Institutions. New York, 1881, pp. 210, 211.

⁷ Vitrings: de Syn. Vet., p. 885. seq., especially insists that the deacon of the Christian Church finds its suggestion in the chazan of the synagogue.

pelled its institution. It was almost entirely independent of all then extant models and precedents, and in nature and function was original and unique.¹

To their humbler work of the administration of charities were united, in the case of some, at least, certain spiritual functions. Stephen, a Hellenist, "with a remarkable depth of historical perspective," shocked the narrow exclusiveness of the orthodox Jews by clear intimations that the temple might not remain the center of the national worship, but that the principle expressed by Christ to the Samaritan woman might be an accomplished fact in the history of the favored people (John iv, 21-23). His powerful preaching precipitated a crisis, and the disciples "were scattered abroad" by the persecution that followed. Another of the seven, Philip, exhibited his broad catholicity of spirit by preaching to the Samaritans and to the Ethiopian eunuch. His baptism of the latter also illustrates the nature and importance of the functions of the diaconate. Added to distribution of alms for the relief of the poor, the work of preaching the Gospel and the administration of baptism are here connected with the work of a deacon.

The dispersion which resulted from the persecution after the martyrdom of Stephen, and the large accessions of believers through preaching of the Gospel in other parts of Judea, in Samaria and in Syria, compelled a new order of supervision. Prior to this scattering abroad the distinction between a simple congregation of believers and a church had not been recognised. It was but natural that the new societies should, in their order and management, be modeled after the parent church. Moreover, in Jerusalem and the adjacent districts there seems to have been a method of supervision and government somewhat similar to that which later obtained in the cathedral churches of other great capitals, and in the suburban societies. No sooner does news come to the apostles of the acceptance of the Gospel in any part than a delegation is sent to make examination, to direct the work, and confirm the believers in the truth (Acts vii, 14, seq.; xi, 22, seq.).

This fact assists to answer the question: how far the different societies of Jewish Christians were thenceforth unified in what may properly be called "the Church." A careful study of all the circumstances attending these visitations will impress us that the various societies were, to a large degree, united in ^{There was a} spirit, life, doctrine, and government. The apostles had ^{union.} an oversight and care of these as well as of the mother church in Jerusalem. This is manifest from their sending Barnabas to confirm the disciples at Antioch (Acts xi, 22). True, no definite proof is found in the history that this union was legal, formal, or expressed through the appointment of officers, or by the adoption of a formal constitution; but the conduct of the Apostles during their visitations shows that by virtue of their own personal character, of the authority derived from Christ in their first call to be the leaders of his Church, and of a common spirit that animated all believers, there was a unity of the various societies into ^{The Church} a virtual Church.¹ It is remarkable that the historian ^{first organized.} says (Acts ix, 31): "So the Church, ἡ ἐκκλησία, throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria, had peace, being edified; and, walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, was multiplied."²

¹ In this view Neander, Baumgarten, Schaff, Baur, Renan, Lightfoot, and others substantially agree. Böhmer supposes that "the seven" had been elders; and with him Ritschl agrees: Altkath. Kirche, 2te Aufl., ss. 353, seq. Lange holds that from "the seven" the two orders of deacons and of elders were afterward differentiated. v. Apostolische Zeitalter, Bd. ii, ss. 73, 539, seq. This is also the opinion of Döllinger: The First Age of the Church, vol. ii, p. 111.

The second stage in the development of the organization of the Church is further marked through the occupancy by ^{James—his of-} James of the chief place at Jerusalem. While the ^{see.} apostles were absent upon their missionary journeys, proclaiming the Gospel of the kingdom, or visiting the new communities that had believed, he became their mouthpiece or vicar. His personal character, as brother of the Lord, gave to his leadership dignity and authority which were generally recognised by the churches of Samaria, Judea, Galilee, the Phenician coasts, and by the congregations of the Dispersion. While he is never in the Scriptures called a bishop, and while there is no evidence of his special ordination to this office, his functions seem to have been very similar ^{similar to the} to those of the bishops of the following century; he is, ^{later bishop.} therefore, sometimes recognised as the first bishop of Jerusalem.³ At other times, however, he appears as a member of a council with

¹ Compare Rothe: Op. cit., ss. 278, seq., and Lechler: Op. cit., ss. 86-91.

² The preponderance of authority is certainly in favor of ἡ ἐκκλησία rather than αἱ ἐκκλησίαι. The New Version adopts the former as the true text.

³ Rothe: Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche, s. 271. Lightfoot: The Christian Ministry, in Com. on Phil., p. 197. Cunningham: The Growth of the Church, etc., London, 1886, p. 60. "It is possible his position may have 'adumbrated' the episcopate, or even have done something toward paving the way to it." "But it is more probable that he owed this to his personal character."

the apostles and presbyters, of commanding influence, but with no official character.¹

§ 2. Presbyters and Bishops.

In the apostolic Church are found other officers called indifferently πρεσβύτεροι, presbyters, or elders, and ἐπίσκοποι, bishops, or overseers. This office pertained to local congregations, and was ex-

First pertained to local societies.

tended as the churches multiplied under the preaching of the apostles, prophets, and evangelists. In distinction from the deacons, both "presbyter" and "overseer" were terms in common use by the Jewish church, by the heathen municipalities, and by the religious clubs, which were numerous

Presbyters common to Jewish and Christian societies.

throughout the Roman Empire. While the record is silent, it is nevertheless probable that peculiar exigencies of the Church called for the institution of the presbyters, as had been the case in the choice of "the seven." They first come into prominence on the scattering abroad of the disciples, and the withdrawing of the apostles from Jerusalem, in consequence of the persecution following the death of Stephen. In the absence of apostolic advisers, a body of presbyters is associated with James to give direction to the affairs of the Church. The manner in which they are mentioned in Acts xi, 30 (τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους) indicates a class of officials well known and established, and their connection with the reception of gifts for the poor, in the opinion of some, allies their duties with those of the deacons.² They come into greater prominence in Acts xv, 2, in association with the apostles. These, with the "brethren," constitute the council to which Paul and Barnabas, and the other messengers from the society at Antioch, refer the questions respecting circumcision. They unite with the apostles and the Church (σὺν ὅλῃ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ) in sending delegates to Antioch and other churches, who should bear the decision of the council (Acts xv, 22, 23). When Paul visits Jerusalem for the last time, he betakes himself to James, the president, where he finds all the elders assembled (Acts xxi, 18, seq.).

A council.

¹ Neither Acts xii, 17, nor xv, 13-21, furnishes positive proof of the presidency of James, much less of a distinctively episcopal function. Acts xxi, 18, seq., and Gal. i, 19; ii, 9, point somewhat more clearly to an official position. Hegesippus, among the very earliest of the writers of the second century, does not call James a bishop, but represents him as sharing with the apostles the government of the Church at Jerusalem. Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., ii, 23, 24. v. Lechler: Das apostolische u. das nach-apostolische Zeitalter, 3te Aufl., s. 83. Ritschl: Op. cit., ss. 417, seq.

² This is one ground for Ritschl's opinion, already referred to, that from "the seven" and their functions both the future diaconate and elderate were differentiated. v. Die Entstehung der altkath. Kirche, s. 358.

The presbyters already appear as the representatives and directors of the society at Jerusalem. Since their original function was chiefly oversight or government, the Jewish Christian congregations found in the Jewish synagogue a model which they readily adopted, and the Gentile churches found in the ἐπίσκοπος of the religious clubs an officer very similar in authority and function. It was his duty to care for the general order and preside at public deliberations. Nevertheless, it is manifest from various passages in the Acts, as well as from the epistles, that the whole Church participated in such deliberations, and sanctioned the decisions. In the various Jewish communities of the Dispersion, to which the apostles first betook themselves in the preaching of the Gospel, "there existed a governing body of elders whose functions were partly administrative and partly disciplinary. With worship and with teaching they appear to have had no direct concern. For those purposes, so far as they required officers, another set of officers existed. In other words, the same community met, probably in the same place, in two capacities and with a double organization. On the Sabbath there was an assembly, presided over by the ἀρχισυνάγωγος or ἀρχισυνάγωγοι, for the purposes of prayer and the reading of the Scriptures and exhortation; on two other days of the week there was an assembly, presided over by the γερονσιάρχης or ἀρχοντες or πρεσβύτεροι, for the ordinary purposes of a local court. Each community, whether assembling for the one class of purposes or the other, appears to have been in most cases independent. . . . Consequently, when the majority of the members of a Jewish community were convinced that Jesus was the Christ, there was nothing to interrupt the current of their former common life. There was no need for secession, for schism, for a change in the organization. The old form of worship and the old modes of government could still go on. . . . There is no trace of a break in the continuity; and there is consequently a strong presumption, which subsequent history confirms, that the officers who continued to bear the same names in the same community exercised functions closely analogous to those which they had exercised before; in other words, that the elders of the Jewish communities which had become Christian were, like the elders of the Jewish communities which remained Jewish, officers of administration and discipline." ¹

The entire society had part in the deliberations.

A double function.

Each congregation independent.

The presbyters officers of administration.

The fact that the Jewish Christians regarded themselves as only a sect within the Jewish church cannot be too much emphasized.

¹ Hatch: The Organization of the Early Christian Churches, pp. 59-61.

They only recognised Jesus as the Messiah, and were awaiting the time when all should receive their King, and Christ should return to set up his universal reign. The more thorough examination of all the hopes and expectations of the Jewish Christian societies, prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, leads to the belief that they looked upon their provisions for a special service, the care of their own poor, and the maintenance of order and regularity in their assemblies as something merely temporary, or as a means of influencing the whole chosen people to unite themselves with the new kingdom which was soon to be established.¹

The function of this body of Christian presbyters being at first like that of the Jewish presbyters in the synagogue, they must be regarded as an advisory board, whose decisions were looked upon with respect, and whose care for the congregations was official. Nor is there evidence that each ruled over a separate congregation, or over a section of the same congregation, without associates. The monarchical type of government which appeared at a later date does not accord with the genius of the apostolic age. The elders constitute rather a free deliberative body, which more resembles the meetings of the councils in the republics of early Greece. While no evidence exists that they or any other class monopolized the right of spiritual teaching and edification, they nevertheless so far directed it that it might be saved from confusion, and not degenerate into license or into the inculcation of false doctrine. Thus, while the apostles and evangelists were doing their work for the whole Church, the deacons and the body of presbyters became the instrument for the government of local societies, and for the regulation of its teaching, its worship, and its charities. The χάρισμα διδασκαλίας being of only transient utility, the more permanent and regular provision was necessary.

Nevertheless, the teaching function is clearly recognised as pertaining to this office. Especially after the rapid spread of the Gospel subsequent to the death of Stephen, when the apostles were no longer able to superintend the work in person, nor give direct instruction, the need of special and careful teaching by the elders was felt to be of chief importance. Doubtless the customs of the synagogues had direct influence in the appointment of the presbyters in the Christian societies. Just as there was no distinct line of demarkation between the ordinary members of the synagogue court, whose chief function was oversight and watchcare, and the learned members, wise men and scribes, who, in the time of Christ, had come to form a pretty well-defined class, but each did that for which his peculiar gifts or training best fitted him, so in Christian congregations, chiefly of Jewish origin, there was no sharp distinction between the teaching and governing function, but a large liberty was recognised, only that it be exercised in obedience to that wise law of spiritual economy inculcated alike by both the foremost apostles: "According as each hath received a gift, ministering it among yourselves, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God." "But to each one is given the manifestation of the Spirit to profit withal, . . . but all these worketh the one and the same Spirit, dividing to each one severally even as he will" (1 Pet. iv, 10, seq.; 1 Cor. xii, 7, seq.).

¹ Lechler: Op. cit., s. 93. This author says with regard to the seeming contradiction of this view in the fact of the fierce opposition of the Jews to the Christians, "The sundering of the band binding them to the theocracy was at first regarded as only possible, next as desirable, and finally as necessary." ss. 93, 94.

In the later Pauline writings, especially in the pastoral epistles and Ephesians, church officers and their duties are more fully treated than elsewhere in the New Testament. The language of the instructions suggests a more advanced stage of church organization than is implied in the writings of Peter or in the earlier epistles of Paul. The simple associations of the first believers, pervaded by a common spirit, and realizing the truest idea of fellowship, are, in these later writings, instructed as to the character and endowments of their office-bearers and the use of their gifts. The elders are here represented as overseers of the Church, and combine therewith the teaching function; but the distinction between a body of so-called "ruling" elders and of "teaching" elders is not clearly made; the same persons are represented as acting in this double capacity (Eph. iv, 11; 1 Tim. v, 17-19). Nevertheless, among the special qualifications for this office, as enumerated by Paul, is "aptness to teach" (1 Tim. iii, 2; iv, 13-16; 2 Tim. ii, 2, 24; Tit. i, 9, seq.); and it cannot be doubted that this function became increasingly important after the death of the apostles had deprived the Church of authoritative living teachers, and when the prediction of Paul respecting heretical doctrines had been sadly fulfilled (Acts xx, 29, 30).

The origin of the presbyters in those churches which were composed chiefly of Gentile converts is not so manifest. It has been suggested that it was spontaneous, and at first independent of Jewish influence. In the Græco-Roman world the two elements peculiar to the Jewish system of synagogical government, namely, a council or committee, and

Presbyters
in Gentile churches.

seniority, were widely recognised. "Every municipality of the empire was managed by its curia or senate. All associations, political or religious, with which the empire abounded had their committees of officers. It was, therefore, antecedently probable, even apart from Jewish influence, that when the Gentiles who had embraced Christianity began to be sufficiently numerous in a city to require some kind of organization that organization should take the prevailing form; that it should be not wholly, if at all, monarchical, nor wholly, though essentially, democratical, but that there should be a permanent executive consisting of a plurality of persons. . . . So strong was this idea (respect for seniority) that the terms which were relative to it were often used as terms of respect without reference to age. In the philosophical schools the professor was sometimes called ὁ πρεσβύτερος."¹

It must not, however, be forgotten that, during the missionary activity of Paul and his associates in founding the churches which afterward were very largely composed of Gentile converts, the first believers, constituting the germ of these churches, were Jewish Christians, to whom the government of the synagogue was entirely familiar. When it is further considered how carefully Paul, in his extensive journeys, provides for the spiritual oversight of the churches, for the discipline, and for the general administration of their affairs; how he appoints elders in the churches of Pisidia and Lycaonia, in Ephesus, Thessalonica, Philippi, Rome, and Colossæ; how he declares to Titus that the chief reason of his being left in Crete was to "set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city" (Tit. i, 5), the conclusion is almost inevitable that the Jewish synagogue system must have had a very marked influence on the organization of the Gentile churches.

§ 3. Essential Identity of Bishops and Presbyters.

The essential identity of presbyters and bishops in the apostolic age is a matter of well-nigh absolute historic demonstration. "They appear always as a plurality or as a college in one and the same congregation, even in smaller cities, as Philippi. The same officers of the church of Ephesus are alternately called presbyters and bishops. Paul sends greetings to the bishops and deacons of Philippi, but omits the presbyters because they were included in the first term, as also the plural indicates. In the pastoral epistles, when Paul intends to give the qualifications for all church officers, he again mentions only two, bishops and deacons, but uses the term presbyters afterward for Arguments.

Schaff's summary.

¹ Hatch: Op. cit., pp. 63, 64.

bishops. Peter urges the presbyters to "tend the flock of God, and to 'fulfill the office of bishops,' with disinterested devotion and without lording it over the charge allotted to them. The interchange of terms continued in use to the close of the first century, as is evident from the epistles of Clement of Rome (about A. D. 95), and still lingered toward the close of the second."¹ This is substantially the opinion of the most thorough students of the apostolic history.²

The reason of the use of two terms for persons having the same essential functions has given rise to much discussion. Why two terms? With those who hold to the diversity of the offices the use of two terms is but natural and necessary. To those who regard these offices as identical, in the apostolic age, the reason for this double designation seems important to discover.

Two general suggestions have been made: 1. The term πρεσβύτερος, presbyter, has been claimed to be of Jewish derivation, and to have been used at first only by Jewish-Christian congregations. In communities where a Christian church had First theory. sprung from the bosom of the local synagogue, and was, therefore, chiefly under the control of Jewish tradition and thought, the term presbyter, which was the name of the governing body of the synagogue, would be naturally transferred to officers of similar function in the Christian societies.³ It is likewise true that the term 'bishop,' ἐπίσκοπος, is used to designate one of like official duty in the churches of almost exclusively Gentile origin. Nevertheless, the term presbyter was used by these same congregations, and at a somewhat later date it was applied to the members of that governing body over which the bishop presided.⁴ 2. A second theory is ¹ Schaff: History of the Christian Church, New York, 1884, vol. i, p. 493. He cites the following: Acts xx, 17 and 28; Phil. i, 1; 1 Tim. iii, 1-13; v, 17-19; Tit. i, 5-7; 1 Pet. v, 1, 2; Clem. Rom.: Ad. Cor., cc. 42, 44.

² v. Among others, Neander: Op. cit., pp. 92, 93. Rothe: Anfänge der christlichen Kirche, s. 176, et al. Lightfoot: Op. cit., pp. 95-99. Baur: Hist. First Three Centuries. Stanley: Op. cit., chap. x. Hatch: Op. cit., Lects. iii, iv. Döllinger: The First Age of the Church, vol. ii, pp. 110, 111. Kraus: Real-Encyclopædia der Christ. Alterthümer, art. "Bischof." Weizsäcker: Op. cit., ss. 637-641. W. says that they were not absolutely identical; all bishops were presbyters, but not every presbyter was a bishop. Lechler: Op. cit., p. 577, seq. "The elders, πρεσβύτεροι, are not mentioned because in the earliest Christian period 'presbyter' and 'bishop' were identical."

³ Weizsäcker: Op. cit., s. 628, regards this transference of the leadership and government by presbyters from the Jewish church to the Christian at Jerusalem as by no means self-evident, "Keineswegs eine selbstverständliche Sache;" but there is no doubt but that the Jewish Christian societies going out from Jerusalem, as well as the Jews of the Diaspora, had a presbyterial constitution. s. 629.

⁴ Lightfoot: Op. cit., 194.

that the bishop of the Christian Church was analogous in office and function to that of the president of the heathen fraternities or clubs. One chief duty of this officer was to administer the funds of the society, and to be a medium of communication between the members who might be widely separated. Christianity was established just at a time when poverty was widespread throughout the Roman world, and when government and society were in a condition of fearful strain. What the state could or would not do for its subjects must be done by themselves through association for mutual succor and relief. The fraternities were numerous and influential. Their professed objects were various; but into most of them there entered both a charitable and a religious element. To administer the funds of these organizations became a matter of primary importance, and the officer charged with this duty was termed an episcopus.¹

The peculiar environment of the first Christian believers compelled like provision for the exercise of systematic charities. Most of the early disciples were of the poorer class; and many more, upon profession of the Christian faith, became outcasts from their families and homes. The strict morality of the Christian teaching and the severity of discipline compelled the abandonment of trades which before had been highly lucrative, and thus a measure of systematic aid must be furnished by the fraternity of believers. The widow, the orphan, and the stranger journeying in foreign parts must have issued to them certificates of membership, or letters of commendation,² on whose authority they were admitted to the sacred mysteries, and received assistance and encouragement. The importance of this administration cannot be overrated, and it was therefore entrusted to those best fitted by intelligence and unquestioned integrity to superintend the work. According to this view the functions of the early Christian bishop were similar to that of the episcopus of the contemporary clubs of the heathen world, in having chiefly to care for the funds and to administer the charities.³

¹ v. Hatch: Op. cit., Lect. ii. His argument from the epigraphical evidence is original and striking, if not entirely convincing. Contra, v. Gore: The Church and the Ministry, Second Edition, London, 1882. v. also Harnack: Analekten, in his translation of Hatch. Heinrici: Erklärung der Korintherbriefe, i, Leipzig, 1879; ii, Berlin, 1887. Holtzmann: Die Pastoralbriefe, Leipzig, 1880.

² The custom of commendation by letters, ἐπιστολαὶ συστατικαί, is referred to in Acts xviii, 27, and 2 Cor. iii, 1-5. The same practice, dictated alike by affection and by common prudence, also prevailed among the ancient secular fraternities and among the powerful guilds of the Middle Ages.

³ Hatch: Op. cit., Lect. ii.

§ 4. General Conclusions.

While the distinction of offices and functions may be ascertained in a most general way, it is manifest that the character and duties of these, during the lifetime of the apostles, were not sharply defined. The peculiar functions of the deacons are at one time assumed by the presbyters, at another by the ἐπισκοποι. The cir- ^{Duties not} cumstances determine the behaviour of the different ^{sharply defined.} officers. In the apostolic church are found germs of every order of the ministry, and indications of every form of church government. From these were to come such forms as the peculiar providential environment might most fully develop. At first only those who were endowed with special charisms were entrusted with the direction and government of the Church.¹ The gift corresponding to this function was the χάρισμα τῆς κυβερνήσεως (1 Cor. xii, 28).

The elders were charged with teaching, the preservation of the purity of doctrine, the direction of the assemblies of the societies, the oversight of the general secular affairs of the ^{The charisms} churches, the care of souls, the warning and encourage- ^{at first the} ment of individual members, etc. Nevertheless, Paul ^{preparation.} in his letter to the Corinthian church, in which ecclesiastical order and the functions of rulers are discussed at length, nowhere represents these as pertaining to an office, but recognises in them a class of duties which depend upon the possession of special gifts and charisms.² With the exception of his latest epistles to the Philippians, to Titus, and to Timothy, he never mentions deacons, presbyters, or bishops. Even when he enumerates the teachers given by God to the Church, according to their gradations and peculiarities, the names of deacons, presbyters, and bishops do not occur.
In so important a church as Corinth there seems to have been no bishop,³ and it may be reasonably questioned whether in any other than the latest epistles can be found any mention of the office in connection with the Gentile church.⁴ In all of his earlier writings he speaks of gifts and not of offices. From the apostles to the humblest ministers the ruling thought is that of spiritual endowments, and not of official functions.⁵ So manifest is this in the early apos-

¹ Baur: Christenthum, s. 241; Ritschl: Op. cit., s. 362.

² Lightfoot: Op. cit., p. 195.

³ Weizsäcker: Op. cit., s. 638. Bunsen: Ignatius u. seine Zeit, s. 103. Lightfoot: Op. cit., p. 205.

⁴ Lightfoot: Op. cit., p. 198.

⁵ Döllinger: The First Age of the Church, vol. ii, pp. 104, 105. Ritschl: Op. cit., s. 347. Heinrici: Kirchengemeinde Korinths u. die religiösen Genossenschaften der Griechen in the Zeitschrift für wissenschaftl. Theologie, 1876, s. 478.

tolie Church that the function of teaching was not confined to the presbyters or bishops, but extended to the laity as well, and in cases of extreme necessity the latter could administer baptism and celebrate the eucharist.¹ Even in the writings of John the bishop is still a minister of the society and not a church official, and there is no evidence of a distinct ordination or confirmation to a distinctively episcopal office.

Aside from the statements found in the New Testament, the first epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians is about the only contemporary authority.² In this letter the distinction between bishops and presbyters is no more clear than in the canonical Scriptures, and these offices and their duties are generally noticed as synonymous.³ No priestly authority or function is delegated to them. They are in the strictest sense ministers and stewards appointed to teach, to preach, and care for the discipline and charities of the local churches. No irresponsible or sovereign authority is attached to their office, but the body of believers is the real depositary of power.⁴

Nor is there a trace of the subordination of one bishop to another, any more than in the apostolic college a primacy, aside from personal character and influence, is found. While in the pastoral epistles (v. 1 Tim. v, 17, 19, 20) there seems to be a slight tendency to centralization, and the idea of a special office is somewhat more clearly developed, it may, nevertheless, be regarded as historically certain that prior to the destruction of Jerusalem the officers of the Church and their functions were not fully differentiated, but, on the contrary, a great diversity of practice and a plastic condition of church government were prevalent throughout the empire.

¹ Hatch: Op. cit., pp. 117-119. "In regard to baptism there is no positive evidence, but there is the argument a fortiori which arises from the fact that even in later times . . . baptism by an ordinary member of the church was held to be valid," etc.

² The chronology of the Adaxh is not so satisfactorily determined as to make it a strictly original authority for the history of the apostolic church.

³ v. cc. 42-44.

⁴ Bannerman: The Scripture Doctrine of the Church, Part vi, chap. iv, seems too strongly to insist on a settled and fixed ecclesiastical system in the Corinthian church during the second period of apostolic Church history. Such condition of this church in a distinctively presbyterial form of government is demonstrable neither from the Pauline epistles nor from the letter of Clement of Rome.

CHAPTER III.

THE POST-APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION FROM THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM TO IRENÆUS.§ 1. Influence of the Death of the Apostles and of the Destruction of Jerusalem.

SUCH seems to have been the condition of the Church and of church government for the first forty years after the Ascension. The death of the apostles, and especially the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, were most momentous events in the history of Christianity.¹ They were scarcely less transforming to the Christian than to the Jewish church. If the Jewish polity was thoroughly destroyed and the hope of a temporal supremacy perished, the separation of Jewish-Christian from Gentile-Christian churches, which had before been so prominent, largely disappeared.

Importance of the destruction of Jerusalem.

During their lifetime the apostles had been the jealous guardians of the purity of Christian doctrine and the defenders of Christian discipline. There had been a general acquiescence in this apostolic authority, and the extraordinary spiritual enlightenment conferred upon the body of believers had measurably saved them from the destructive influence of the heresies which afterward threatened not only the unity but the success of the Church. The destruction of the sacred city hastened the consummation of what had been felt by all parties to be a pressing need; namely, the union of the individual societies into a firm, compact organization in the Christian Church. This event emancipated the disciples from the burdens of the Jewish ceremonial; it revealed Christianity to the pagan world as an independent religion; it completely fused the hitherto inharmonious Jewish-Christian and Gentile-Christian elements;² it scattered believers still more widely throughout the Roman world.

Scattered the apostles.

But when the original preachers and defenders of Christ's gospel had been removed, the heresies which were lying latent, or had been checked in their first beginnings by the watchful administration of the apostles, soon began to

Emancipated
the Church from Jewish prejudices.

¹ For a striking popular statement of the effects and the probabilities see Renan: Hibbert Lectures, Boston, 1880, III Conference.

² Rothe: Op. cit., ss. 340-343; Ewald: vii, 26.

assert themselves more vigorously, and to draw away multitudes from the Church. The lack of apostolic guidance was now felt to be a most serious privation. The absence of an authoritative interpretation left each teacher free to attach to the Scriptures, and especially to the instructions of the apostles, the meaning which best accorded with his own peculiar dogmas. The instinct of self-preservation compelled a readjustment of ecclesiastical supervision and government. From the closing years of the first century new principles are recognised, and influences before hardly noticeable become prominent. While during the lifetime of the apostles there had been a ministry of Christ's own institution, in the second century the distinction between clergy and laity is more manifest; the priestly function, which before had pertained to the entire body of believers, becomes circumscribed;¹ the duties of the deacons and presbyters are more clearly defined; the existence and prerogatives of the bishops as a distinct order become more generally recognised. Admission to a sacred order is now gained by the solemn rite of consecration or ordination. There are now found in the Church ordines majores and ordines minores, each having a more clearly defined function.

Thus in the brief interval between the death of the apostles and the middle of the second century the idea of the Church had undergone important transformations, and the orders and duties of its officers had become subjects of clearer definition. The believers on Christ passed from the condition of individual congregations to that of an organized Church.

§ 2. The Ignatian Episcopacy and its Effects.

Ignatius is the earliest writer who develops this new notion of church order and discipline. He defends the essential unity of the Church, to maintain which obedience to the doctrines and authority of the bishops is necessary. Look to the bishop that God may also look on thee.* Plainly we should ¹ The idea of the universal priesthood of believers did not wholly disappear. Indeed, it is rigorously asserted by Irenæus (Adv. Hæc., iv, 8, § 3). The Montanists were most strenuous in their advocacy of this doctrine, and Tertullian (De Eschort. Cast., c. 7; De Bapt., 17) affirms that it is the authority of the Church alone that has created the distinction between laity and clergy. Even the high-church Cyprian uses expressions which suggest that the body of believers is the true source of ecclesiastical authority (ep. 41, 8). The mode of the election of Athanasius, Ambrose, Augustine, and others in the fourth century illustrates the power of the laity.

* Ad Polyc., cc. 5, 6.

regard the bishop as we regard the Lord himself.¹ Be subject to the bishop and to one another, as Christ to the Father, in order that there may be unity according to God among you.² Without the bishop let no one attempt any thing in the Church. Let that sacrament be accounted valid which is under the direction of the bishop or one whom he has appointed. Without the bishop it is not permitted either to baptize or to celebrate the agape.³ Where the bishop is, there is the congregation, as where Christ is, there is the catholic Church.⁴ This strong characterization of the episcopacy is in most direct contrast with the spirit of the New Testament teaching. Yet it is likewise to be observed that the episcopacy of Ignatius is strictly congregational. The bishop has no authority outside of and beyond his individual congregation, in which alone he is the vicar of Christ, as well as an equal to every other bishop of every other congregation: no trace of subordination or primacy appears in these epistles.

Nevertheless, Ignatius distinguishes the bishops from the presbyters, inasmuch as the former are the successors of Christ, while the latter, on the contrary, are the vicars of the apostles.⁵ The institution of the bishops is, according to his view, not the work of the apostles, but a commission, ἐντολή, or grace, χάρις, of God, while the presbyters owe their origin to the decree or sanction, νόμος, of Jesus Christ.⁶ Inasmuch as the episcopacy connects the individual churches with the Church universal, at whose head Christ stands, it thereby becomes the organ of church unity.⁷ In nearly all these letters of Ignatius the threatening dangers to the Church from the current heresies are revealed. They contain warnings, exhortations to concord, and to a close affiliation with the bishops, the presbyters, and the deacons, since thus alone can the unity of the Church be best maintained.⁸ Yet Ignatius plainly teaches that while the congregation should undertake nothing without the bishop, no more should the bishop without the will of God. The ordinances of the bishop are valid only so far as they are accordant with the divine will.⁹ Nevertheless, from the very nature and

¹ ad Ephes., c. 6.

² ad Magnes., c. 13.

³ ad Smyrn., c. 8.

⁴ Ep. ad Philad., c. 3, 7; Smyrn., c. 8, 9, et al. v. also Baur: Das Christenthum, etc., 2te Ausg., Tübingen, 1860, ss. 277-279.

⁵ ad Smyrn., c. 8; ad Ephes., c. 2; ad Polyc., c. 6.

⁶ ad Magnes., c. 2.

⁷ ad Philad., c. 3; ad Smyrn., c. 8.

⁸ ad Smyrn., c. 8.

⁹ Compare especially ad Smyrn., c. 8, and Rothe: Op. cit., s. 445; Uhlhorn: Ueber die Ignatianischen Briefe, in Ilgens Zeitschrift, Bd. 21, s. 282. Ritschl: Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, Bonn, 1857, s. 455; and best of all, Lightfoot: The Apostolic Fathers: Part ii, St. Ignatius and St. Polycarp.

dignity of the episcopate, it, before all other offices, lays claim to obedience on the part of the societies.¹

§ 3. The Clementine Homilies.

As we pass from the Ignatian epistles to the pseudo-Clementine Homilies, which were probably written from fifteen to twenty years later, there is a yet stronger claim for the dignity and authority of the bishop's office. The episcopacy of these writings is of the high monarchical type. The bishop has power to bind and loose. He stands in the place of Christ;² the presbyters and deacons are subordinate to him.

Here, too, the episcopate is represented as the succession to the apostolate, and the bishops are the guardians and depositaries of the apostolic doctrine. As usual in Ebionitic writings,³ James is the bishop of bishops,

¹ The importance of the testimony of Ignatius is manifest from the protracted controversy respecting the genuineness and integrity of his writings. Scarcely less earnest than that over the genuineness and authority of the Gospel by John, the Ignatian question still remains an open one. An important literature has resulted from these scholarly researches. There are three versions of the writings of Ignatius, namely: 1. The longer Greek recension, consisting of seven epistles and eight additional ones. 2. The shorter Greek recension, referred to by Eusebius, consisting of seven epistles. 3. The Syriac version, discovered in a monastic library in the Libyan desert in 1839-1843, containing but three of the seven epistles of the shorter Greek recension, and these in very abbreviated form. Of the first it may be said that the added eight epistles are now regarded as forgeries. Respecting the second and third the scholars are divided. The Tübingen school reject the entire Ignatian literature as spurious; another class accept only what is common to the shorter Greek and to the Syriac recensions; while the tendency to-day is to hold to the genuineness of the shorter Greek recension and to regard the Syriac version as essentially an extract from the older Greek. The most satisfactory examinations and defence of the shorter Greek recension are Zahn: Ignatius von Antiochien, Gotha, 1873; also his Ignatii et Polycarpi Epistulae Martyria Fragmenta, in the Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, Fasciculus ii, Lipsiæ, 1876; Uhlhorn: Article "Ignatius," in 2d ed. of Herzog's Real-Encykl.; and Lightfoot: The Apostolic Fathers: Part ii. St. Ignatius and St. Polycarp, London, 1885. Lightfoot formerly accepted the Syriac version, but in this later work regards the shorter Greek version as defensible. The importance of this controversy appears from the different grounds of the bishop's authority in the two later recensions. In the Syriac version his exercise of leadership and discipline is derived solely from his personal worthiness; according to the shorter Greek recension, by virtue of his office alone the bishop has the power to exercise priestly teaching and ruling functions. In the Greek recension the will of the bishop has unconditional validity, while in the Syriac his will must harmonize with the divine will in order to claim obedience.

² Ep. ad Jacob., c. 14, hom. iii, 62.

³ This expression is here used, notwithstanding the opposing views of able critics. Like much of the early Patristic literature, the Clementines have given rise to much ὁ ἐπίσκοπος τῶν ἐπισκόπων,¹ to whom even Peter is subordinate, and Jerusalem is the capital of Christendom. In the pseudo-Clementines is first met the expression, "the chair or seat of the bishop," καθέδρα τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, which denotes the high dignity of the bishop and his relation to the presbyters, so changed from the New Testament idea. To the bishop specially belongs the promulgation of doctrine, while to the presbyters is assigned the preaching of ethical truths.² The duty of Church discipline is so divided that the bishop and the presbyters exercise judicial functions, while the deacons are charged with the duty of careful scrutiny of the conduct of the members. The bishop exercises rule over the society and is arbiter of doctrine, while the presbyters are his assistants in the maintenance of moral conduct. The care for the poor is shared by the bishop and the deacons. In the opinion of the writer, the purpose of the institution of the episcopate was the restoration of the unity of the Church, and the reconciliation of the conflicting parties. This reconciliation was to be effected by the triumph of the Ebionite party, whose peculiar views of the episcopacy became at last predominant in the Christian Church.³ The conception of the episcopacy common to the Ignatian epistles and pseudo-Clementines is that the bishop is the vicar of God and Christ. The same substantial unity existing between God and Christ is the relation which exists between the bishop and Christ; for as Christ is the hypostatic will of God, so should the bishop be the hypostatic will of Christ.⁴

§ 4. The Shepherd of Hermas and Polycarp.

The Shepherd of Hermas and the epistle of Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, belong to a date intermediate between that of the Ignatian epistles and the pseudo-Clementines. These are important as illustrations of the principle that not only the episcopate but the entire polity of the Christian Church was a development out of the peculiar needs of the times. In the "Shepherd" mention is made of apostles, bishops, doctors, and deacons. While the term doctors is somewhat obscure in import, the Distinction between lay and clerical.

varied controversy and the results have not proved entirely satisfactory to any parties. The candid statement of one of the most scholarly of these investigators, after a criticism of the different opinions, seems entirely truthful. "Undoubtedly the questions of the Clementines need even yet a further discussion." v. Ullhorn: Article "Clementinen," in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, Bd. iii, s. 286.

¹ Ep. ad Jacob., suprascription.

² Ep. ad Jacob., Hom. iii, 65.

³ v. especially Baur: Ursprung der Episcopate, Tübingen, 1838, ss. 122, 148, et al.

⁴ v. Baur: Das Christenthum, etc., s. 283.

bishops are no longer identical with the presbyters, and the lay function is distinct from the clerical.¹

Polycarp's letter falls in just that period when a number of Philippian churches had preserved their autonomy, and hence the development of the monarchical episcopacy was yet incomplete. There are evidences of a vigorous organization, and the officers of the Church are recognised as clothed with authority to exercise their functions; for he strongly exhorts the believers to be obedient to the presbyters and deacons as to God and Christ, ὡς θεῷ καὶ Χριστῷ.²

From the manner in which the term presbyter is here used, it has been argued that Polycarp recognised the identity of bishops and presbyters.³ By some this passage has been construed to teach "the supreme oversight of the presbyters in all matters of administration,"⁴ while others have from it inferred the absence of bishops from the Philippian church.⁵ Whatever may have been the facts, it seems certain that in the teaching respecting the exalted position which is assigned to the bishop there is not yet found the conception of a church office in that specific sense which later obtained. When, therefore, in the Ignatian epistles the expression is met,

No catholic Church yet existing.

"where the bishop is found there is the congregation, even as where Christ is there is the catholic Church," there is manifestly wanting to the idea of the catholic Church an element which was supplied in the next century, namely, that of unified doctrine. In the absence of this factor there could properly be no officer of the catholic Church, and in the writings of the first half of the second century the bishop bears only the character of a ruler of the congregation. Nevertheless, by the extension of this office over all congregations, the episcopate becomes the instrument of the unification of the Church.

This was to be effected both by correspondence between the societies, and by conferences or synods of the bishops themselves. The first was only in imitation of the custom of the apostles, and was a most natural means of fostering the spirit of unity and of conserving a common doctrine. The catholicity of the Church was further promoted by giving certificates of Church membership or commendation, γράμματα τετυπωμένα, to those who were travelling into foreign parts, by means of which the bearer was admitted to the sacraments and privileges in other societies. They were also proofs, γράμματα κοινωνικά, of the agreement and fellowship of the bishop who gave, with him who received them.

Church letters.

¹ Pastor; Vis. iii, 5, 6.

² Epist. ad Phil., c. 5.

³ v. especially Ritschl: Op. cit., s. 402; Hase: Kirchengeschichte, s. 42.

⁴ Hatch: Op. cit., p. 67.

⁵ Bunsen: Ignatius, s. 109.

Added to all this was the custom of each society to inform every other of all important affairs of its communion, and of each bishop to publish to every other bishop the fact of his election and consecration, that he might in turn receive the assurance of their approval and coöperation.

It has already been seen that the apostolic Church recognised no priestly function or authority on the part of its ministers of any kind or grade. The New Testament teaching that the whole body of believers are priests unto

No priest recognised by the apostles.

God, and that one alone, Christ, is the Highpriest, making offering of himself for the sins of the world, is clear and unquestioned (1 Tim. ii, 5; Heb. iii, 1; v, 10; ix, 11, et al.). This continued until after the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem. That epoch-making event marks the introduction into the Christian Church of two new ideas which were familiar alike to Judaism and to the Gentile-Christian churches; namely, the idea of an offering or sacrifice, and the idea of a priesthood. These correlative notions were not foreign to the Gentile-Christian congregations. They had been converted from a religious system which was thoroughly acquainted with the thought and practice of sacrifice, and of a priesthood whose functions included the care of the offerings. The smoking or garlanded altar, the procession leading the victims, and the officiating priests, were most familiar sights in every province of the Roman Empire. True, this priestly function in the Church was not that strong and complete sacerdotalism which was victorious in the following century; but the references to the priestly office of the bishop are now more frequent. While not exclusive or absolute, it is evident that even the partial and limited recognition of the priestly office of the bishop may be regarded as among the most important facts in the history of Church government and worship in the second century. The effect was to limit the spiritual authority of the presbyter. While he might baptize, yet the complete endowment of faith rested with the bishop; the bringing of the eucharistic offering was only by episcopal sanction; the institution of the clergy by ordination, and the confirmation of the baptized, were the exclusive prerogatives of the bishops. They were entrusted with the oversight of the clergy; they were the shepherds of the flock, who were to teach the ignorant, lift up the fallen, and punish the incorrigible.

Rise of sacerdotalism.

Its effects.

The presbyters were the governing body or council; teaching was at first not their necessary or even usual function. The Clementine writings make a distinction between doctrine and morals—the bishop teaching the former, the presbyters enforcing the latter. The archaic document, Διδαχὴ τῶν δώδεκα Ἀποστόλων, "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," which seems to be firmly placed in the first, or early part of the second century (95-130), speaks of a more simple condition of things. Yet the representations of the functions of Church officers are not in contradiction with those already described. The apostles and prophets are only itinerant preachers who are to tarry but a day or two in a place, to receive sustenance, but not money, except for general charities. The genuineness of the apostle's teaching function is to be judged by his conformity to his own doctrines.¹ The Church is instructed to appoint for itself² bishops and deacons worthy of the Lord, men meek and not avaricious, and sincere (ἀληθεῖς) and tried. Such are worthy of honour for their works' sake.

The view of "The Teaching."

§ 5. The Form of Government.

The ecclesiastical government which generally prevailed by the middle of the second century was that of the independent congregation, governed by a college of presbyters, whose president was the bishop, and whose servants or ministers were the deacons. Each congregation had, therefore, its separate bishop, its own governing body, its ministering servants, and its private members. At each gathering every element of this congregation was theoretically present,³ and the whole body were the depositary of power and authoritative government. The presence of a bishop in each congregation explains how at first the teaching power of the presbyter was limited, and the celebration of the sacraments of baptism and of the eucharist was practically confined to the bishops, although the presbyter had from the first the right to baptize, and probably, also, the authority to celebrate the eucharist.⁴

The change of opinion respecting the endowments required in an office-bearer is important to mention. As before said, in the apos-

¹ v. Chap. xi, "But not every one who speaketh in the spirit is a prophet, but only if he have the ways of the Lord. . . . And every prophet who teacheth the truth, if he do not that which he teacheth, is a false prophet."

² v. Chap. xv. The expression χειροτονήσατε οὖν ἑαυτοῖς ἐπισκόπους, etc., is variously translated. If this writing is earlier than the middle of the second century, the term χειροτονέω, in agreement with its general meaning in the New Testament, in Josephus, and in the Ignatian epistles, should be translated "appoint." But if it is believed to belong to the third century, the word would naturally follow the changed meaning in the "Apostolic Canons" and in the "Apostolic Constitutions," and be translated "ordain by laying on of hands."

³ v. Hatch: Op. cit., p. 79.

⁴ This certainly is the view maintained a little later by Tertullian in the Montanistic controversy.

tolie Church men held office and performed duties by virtue of certain spiritual gifts, or charisms. The body of believers honoured and obeyed them because of these gifts, which were believed to be bestowed by the Spirit for definite purposes. About the middle of the third century, however, the office is no longer tenable by virtue of these charisms alone, but rather the charism is a natural consequence of the induction into office. ^{The charism a result of the office.} Ordination comes not in consequence of the spiritual gift, but the gift is imparted in the act of ordination. This radical change in the conception of ordination was a consequence of the prevalent idea of a priesthood.¹ The clergy has assumed the prerogative of mediation between God and man, and has become the channel of salvation through the dispensation of the sacraments.²

Another important change noticed near the close of the second or the beginning of the third century is in the method of ^{The choice of} the election of bishops. Previously the bishop had been ^{bishops.} chosen by the people and approved by the presbyters;³ now the neighbouring bishops, in connection with the presbytery, nominated the candidate and the people gave their assent; but even this degenerated into a mere right of protest against those who were regarded as improper candidates.⁴ A like change is observed in the method of ordination. In the first century this was performed by the apostles or their representatives, associated with the presbyters of the congregation over which the bishop was to preside; but in the second century the episcopate, as the depositary of spiritual gifts, was summoned to the consecration of the individual bishops. The earlier participation of the presbyters in this ordination was gradually lost in all the churches except the Alexandrian.

The diocesan episcopate was certainly a matter of development. The question of its origin has been much debated. It ^{The episcopacy a development.} can with confidence be said that no other than a congregational episcopacy is met before the middle of the second century. A society embracing but a single city is the realm of the authority of the early bishop, and he was so thoroughly identified with this single congregation that his removal to another could be allowed only in rare and exceptional cases.

To the question, What was the relation of the bishops and their

¹ Ritschl: Op. cit., s. 394, et al.

² Gieseler: Kirchengeschichte, 4te Aufl., Bd. i, ss. 228-233. Hagenbach: Dogmengeschichte, 5te Aufl., s. 157.

³ Even Cyprian recognises this right. "Plebs ipsa maximam habet potestatem vel eligendi dignos sacerdotes, vel indignos recusandi."—Ep. 68. v. Rheinwald: Die kirchliche Archæologie, s. 31.

⁴ Ep. 67, cc. 4, 5.

congregations or dioceses to each other? it may be answered: In the second century these possessed and maintained a general autonomy or independence. But this could not be absolute. This has already been noticed in the case of nomination and ordination. The severe pressure of foes from without, and the threats of heretical teachers from within, compelled a closer union of the various congregations for mutual protection against both these dangers. This resulted in a kind of synodical or confederated authority, by which the purity of doctrine and life might be guarded and the heretical and incorrigible be excised. While the essential autonomy of the congregations had not been infringed, the synodical authority was justified on the ground of defence against a common danger. In this college the Bishop of Rome. Bishop of Rome had already, in the second century, assumed special prominence, so that it became a recognised principle that the individual bishops should be in harmony with the Bishop of Rome on all questions of doctrine and discipline. At the close of the century, Victor "was the first who advanced those claims to universal dominion which his successors in later ages have always consistently and often successfully maintained."¹

The changes which the presbyterate underwent during the first century are most interesting and important to notice. Change in presbyterial power. The gradual increase in the prerogatives of the bishops necessarily diminished the authority and dignity of the presbyterial body. Its former significance had been lost. Moreover, the deacons had claimed many privileges which before had belonged to the presbyters. Not until near the beginning of the third century were their prerogatives regained, when the deacons were placed in strict subordination to the presbyters. The distinction which was afterward so prominent is already beginning to assert itself. While presbyters, as well as bishops, administer the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, they do it by a different authority. The bishop acts upon an original and independent authority; the presbyter upon authority derived from the sanction or permission of the bishop. So with preaching, reconciliation of penitents, confirmation of neophytes, consecration of churches, etc. The right to ordain seems to have been very rarely, if ever, conceded to the presbyters in the second century.²

¹ Lightfoot: Op. cit., p. 224.

² Bingham: Antiquities of the Christian Church, bk. ii, chap. iii. The exceptions urged by others in the practice of the Alexandrian Church are understood by Bingham to refer to election, and not to ordination. This view, however, has been gravely questioned, and is by some regarded untenable.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CHURCH CONSTITUTION FROM IRENÆUS TO THE ACCESSION OF CONSTANTINE.§ 1. The Theory of Irenæus.

THE circumstances of the Church toward the close of the second century were peculiar. Fearful persecutions had visited some of the provinces, and some of the most prominent leaders had sealed their faith by a martyr's death. Its internal state was no more assuring. The prediction of Paul that after his departure "shall ^{Peculiar conditions of the Church.} grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock" (Acts xx, 29), had been fulfilled, and his exhortation to Timothy "to shun profane and vain babblings, for they will increase unto more ungodliness" (2 Tim. ii, 16), had already been shown to be urgently needed. Teachers had arisen who, by wrenching the Scriptures from their natural and appropriate meaning, had constructed systems no less fantastic and paradoxical than they were disturbing to Christian faith and corrupting to Christian morals. The system of allegorical interpretation which, through the school of Philo, was powerful at Alexandria, had become wide- ^{The Gnostic threats.} spread through the influence of the Gnostic teachers. Whether this phenomenal manifestation is best accounted for from the syncretism of Jewish and Christian thought with Greek speculation,¹ or whether, like the orthodox societies themselves, the Gnostics, by consulting the Greek mysteries, sought a practical end,² the danger which they brought to the very life of Christianity was real and fearful. While each party recognised the fact that Christianity had originated with Christ and was promulgated by his apostles, and also that they had left certain authoritative teachings which must be heeded, nevertheless each laid claim to personal freedom in the interpretation of this teaching, and was ^{Divisions.} ready to attach to the words of Christ and of his apostles the meaning which was most accordant with its own opinions. Thus was the Church of Christ no longer an organism, such as had been so vividly portrayed by Paul (1 Cor. xii, 12-27; Eph.

¹ v. Joel: Blicke in die Religionsgeschichte, Excursus II, Die Gnosis, Breslau, 1880.

² v. Weingarten: in Von Sybel's Historische Zeitschrift, Bd. xlv, 1881.

iv, 25), knit together by faith in one common doctrine and compacted by a common life, but the teaching of Gnosticism plainly resolved Christian doctrine into a confused conglomeration of human opinions, and Church government and ordinances into matters of individual caprice. Hegesippus vividly pictures the condition of things. From these (the various Gnostic sects) Testimony of Hegesippus. sprang the false Christs and false prophets and false apostles who divided the unity of the Church by the introduction of corrupt doctrines against God and against his Christ.¹

Irenæus, also, is powerful in his portraitures, and unsparing in his denunciation of false teachers. His apprehension Irenæus's testimony. for the safety of the Church is conspicuous throughout his entire treatise.² All the energies of his vigorous nature seem enlisted in this effort to throttle the foes who were threatening the life of the Church, and to settle its doctrine upon firm foundations.

What, then, is the principle which Irenæus recognised and maintained in the controversy with the Gnostic sects? and The principle of Irenæus. what influence did this exert upon the constitution of the Church? The answer to the first is easily found in the writings of Irenæus himself, and is so often reiterated that we cannot be in doubt respecting it. In the midst of the conflict of opinions arising from the freedom of individual interpretation of the Scriptures, he maintained that the supreme and only standard of Christian teaching was that which was given by the apostles to the churches in their day. This teaching of the different apostles was essentially harmonious, and was authoritative throughout the Christian world during their lifetime. "We have learned from none others the plan of our salvation than from those through Harmony of apostolic teaching. whom the Gospel has come down to us, which they did at one time proclaim in public, and, at a later period, by the will of God, handed down to us in the Scriptures, to be 'the ground and pillar of our faith' (1 Tim. iii, 15). . . . For, after our Lord rose from the dead, they (the apostles) were invested with power from on high, when the Holy Spirit came down, were filled from above and had perfect knowledge; they departed to the ends of the earth preaching the glad tidings of good things from God to us, and proclaiming the peace of heaven to men, who indeed do all equally and individually possess the Gospel of God.³ It is within the power of all, therefore, in every church, who may wish to see the truth, to contemplate clearly the tradition of the apostles mani-

¹ Eusebius: Hist. Eccles., iv, 22.

² Adversus Hæreses: Last edition by Harvey, Cambridge, 1857, 2 vols.

³ Adversus Hæreses, iii, 1, 1.

fested throughout the whole world.”¹ But to whom did the apostles commit this only and authoritative doctrine, and by what means has it been handed down to Irenæus’s time uncontaminated by error and in all its integrity, so that himself and his adversaries alike can rest in it as the word of Christ? To the bishops of the churches which were founded by the apostles; and by them it has been handed down in an unbroken line of succession to his day. He then appeals to Rome, the best known and most influential Church of the time, whose episcopal succession he traces with greatest care. He also mentions the well known church of Smyrna, which had had a succession of most illustrious men whose teachings had been heard by those with whom Irenæus and many of his contemporaries had conversed.²

The bishops
the depositaries of apostolic teaching.

A regular succession.

This teaching is, then, the one unchanging rule of faith, regula fidei, preserved by an infallible tradition, through an unbroken succession of bishops from the apostles. Irenæus maintains that the episcopacy is the true depositary of the apostolic tradition, and that this tradition is the sure ground of doctrinal unity and authoritative teaching in the Catholic Church.³ Hence we find that attempts were now made to construct lists of bishops in the various churches, especially in Rome, in order to establish this continuity.⁴ To confirm this historic argument was added the statement that to guard the bishops against error they were endowed with a special gift. “Wherefore it is incumbent to obey the presbyters in the Church, . . . who, together with the succession of the episcopate, have received the certain gift of truth, charisma veritatis, according to the good pleasure of the Father.”⁵ “Where, therefore, the gifts, charismata, of the Lord have been placed, there it behooves us to learn the truth, from those who possess the succession of the Church which is from the apostles,” etc.⁶ Such, then, is the principle which he defended. With him both Hegesip-

Compilation of lists.

¹ Id., iii, 3, 1.

² Id., iii, 3, 3, 4; iii, 4, 1; iii, 5, 1, et al.

³ Id., iv, 26, 1, 2; v, 20, 2.

⁴ These catalogues are divided into two general classes, characterized in a broad and general way as the Greek and the Latin. The first includes the lists which are found in the second century, largely those of Hegesippus and Irenæus; and in the fourth and following centuries, those of Eusebius and his successors. The second class embraces the lists of Augustine, Optatus of Mileve, of the Catalogus Liberianus, Catalogus Filicianus, the Liber Pontificalis, and the various early Martyrologies. These catalogues are not in agreement respecting the succession of the early Roman bishops, about which there is great uncertainty. Nor are the modern critics of these catalogues, as Duchene, Harnack, Waitz, Lipsius, and others, any more in accord on this very difficult problem.

⁵ Id., iv, 26, 2.

⁶ Id., iv, 26, 5.

pus and Tertullian are in substantial agreement.¹ The manifest effect of such a theory upon the constitution and government of the Church was to magnify the relative importance and authority of the bishops. They to whom were entrusted truths so invaluable, and upon whom were bestowed such extraordinary gifts, must be reckoned among elect ministers, whose persons were of superior sanctity and whose words were of the nature of divine messages. "The supremacy of the bishop and unity of doctrine were conceived as going hand in hand, . . . the bishop's seat was conceived as being what St. Augustine calls it, the 'cathedra unitatis;' and round the episcopal office revolved the whole vast system not only of Christian administration and Christian organization, but also of Christian doctrine."² The earlier opinion, that the Church, as such, had been the heir of the truth and doctrine of the apostles in so far as it retained the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, maintained its hold on many minds, and even Irenæus and Tertullian in their earlier writings are imbued with this thought. But in his later writings Tertullian teaches that the bishop holds his office by virtue of inheritance from the apostles, and both Calixtus and his opponent, Hippolytus, insist upon their succession from the apostles by virtue of which alone they have preserved Christianity in its original purity.³

§ 2. The Influence of Cyprian.

In the third century the constitution of the Church was further developed by the labors and writings of Cyprian, who may be regarded as the foremost exponent of the ecclesiastical and episcopal sentiment of his age. The principle of the unity of doctrine and of authoritative teaching is pushed still farther than by Irenæus, Hegesippus, and Tertullian. With Cyprian the unity of the Church is absolutely identified with that of the episcopate. The principle of the episcopacy is not only the apostolic succession, but much more the bestowment upon the bishops of the Holy Ghost; so that the unity of the Church is secured by a double means, namely, a direct and unbroken succession from the apostles and the communication to all bishops alike of a common spirit. Where this spirit is vouchsafed, there the unity of the Church must necessarily be secured, for in its presence diverse opinions and teachings must be impossible. "There is one God, and Christ is one, and there is one Church, and one chair founded upon the rock by the word of the Lord. Another altar cannot be constituted, or a new priesthood made except the one altar and the one priesthood."¹ Each bishop must be of the same mind as every other bishop; in the episcopate no individual exists for himself, but is only a member of a wider organic whole. "And this unity we ought firmly to hold and assert, especially those of us who are bishops who preside in the Church, that we may also prove the episcopate itself to be one and undivided. . . . The episcopate is one, each part of which is held by each one for the whole."² But in the development of the idea of unity Cyprian passes beyond his predecessors in that he regards this unity as proceeding from one determinate point—the chair of St. Peter. While the other apostles were of like honor and authority with Peter himself, nevertheless to Peter Christ first gave power to institute and show forth this unity to the world.³ The chair of St. Peter is the foremost Church whence priestly unity is derived,⁴ and the same unifying power must be recognised as in every one who has occupied the same chair. Outside the one Church the sacraments are unavailing, although administered by the regular formula and in proper mode. "For as, in that baptism of the world, in which its ancient iniquity was purged away, he who was not in the ark of Noah could not be saved by water, so can he neither appear to be saved by baptism who has not been baptized in the Church which is established in the unity of the Lord according to the sacrament of the one ark."⁵

¹ Tertullian: de præscr. Hær., c. 21. Communicamus cum ecclesiis apostolicis, quod nulla doctrina diversa, hoc est testimonium veritatis.

² Hatch: Op. cit., pp 98, 99. Baur: Christenthum, etc., ss. 284, 285.

³ v. Harnack: Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, Freiburg, 1886, Bd. i, ss. 295-97.

With the idea of apostolic succession is connected the rule of faith as a mark and proof of the Catholic Church. To the doctrine of an authoritative subjective knowledge, Gnosis, enjoined by a chosen few, Cyprian stoutly opposes the objective norm of faith. Tradition is now elevated to a place of absolute authority. The bishops are the guardians of Church unity. Although the term Catholic Church, ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, had been first used by Ignatius,⁶ and is found in Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria, yet it was used in a sense quite different from that found in Cyprian. Not until his time can we properly speak of a Catholic Church; since now for the first time is seen the distinction between the acts of a minister of the congregation and the duties of

¹ Ep. 39, c. 5.

² De unitate ecclesiae, c. 5.

³ De unit. eccles., c. 4; Ep. 73, c. 11. Unde unitatis originem instituit et ostendit.

⁴ Ep. 54, c. 14. Cathedra Petri est ecclesia principalis unde unitas sacerdotalis exorta est.

⁵ Ep. 73, c. 11.

⁶ ad Smyrn., c. 8.

an officer of the Church Catholic. The society or congregation is properly the logical antecedent, the necessary condition of an office therein. But, contrariwise, when the office and the officer are held to be the logical antecedent, and the congregation can only there be found where the office and the officer are already existent, then first can there strictly be said to be an office and an officer of the Church Universal. So that in the third century the bishop is no longer, as before, regarded as the representative of a specific congregation or society, but of the universal Church; this last term being inclusive of all the congregations, as the genus includes under it all its species. According to this view the congregation and its entire officary would have ecclesiastical validity only through the bishop. Nevertheless, since there now exists a complete harmony of the mind and will of Christ with the collected body of bishops, every expression of the will of every bishop in this totality of the episcopate must harmonize with the divine will. Only thus can any bishop assume to exercise direction or authority in the Church of Christ. For the assumption of a prerogative so arrogant, a special charism is imparted in the rite of ordination. To the Montanistic view, that the Holy Spirit reveals added truth to each individual, was opposed the teaching that the Spirit and the Church are inseparably connected. The Church finds the fact of its existence and unfolding in the Spirit, and the Spirit finds the organ and means of his manifestation in the Church. To the vague and arbitrary claim that each man was specially enlightened, and was, therefore, prepared to teach new truth, was opposed the consensus of teaching of the one holy Catholic Church which had been saved from error by the Holy Spirit.¹

By the gift of the Holy Spirit in ordination the mind and will of the bishop are brought into harmony with the mind and will of Christ, and he receives thereby authority not only to teach but to bind and loose;² thus becoming the source of all valid Church discipline and government. The bishops are the successors of the apostles, and, therefore, by virtue of a vicarious ordination, have the power to remit sins.³ Every truly ecclesiastical act is of the nature of a divine law, since it is suggested and dictated by the Spirit vouchsafed to the bishop in the rite of ordination. "No bishop, no Church," is the real teaching of this father.⁴

¹ Baur: Das Christenthum, etc., ss. 296, 297.

² v. Ritschl: Op. cit., s. 582; Baur: Op. cit., ss. 296-300.

³ Ep. 74 (75), c. 16. With Cyprian schism and heresy are absolutely identical.

⁴ v. Ep. 66, c. 8. Scire debes, episcopam in ecclesia et ecclesium in episcopo, et si qui cum episcopo non sit, in ecclesia non esse.

The various bishops exercise but one office in common; notwithstanding the division into dioceses, they represent the unity and totality of the Church.¹

§ 3. The Sacerdotal Principle.

The sacerdotal character of the episcopacy, as we have before intimated, had been mildly asserted prior to the third century. Yet probably not even Irenæus can be claimed as teaching more than a moral priesthood, and this not limited to any single order in the Church. Nor can the frequent references of Tertullian² to a sacerdotal office be understood as pertaining to the clergy alone, much less to the bishops. Indeed, this able presbyter is positive in his assertions that a Church may exist without the presence of the clergy, and that in their absence laymen may baptize and celebrate the eucharist by virtue of their being members of Christ's universal Church, all of whose members have become "kings and priests unto the Lord."³ Quite similar views are held by Origen. At most his sacerdotalism goes no further than in supposing that the priestly character and function of the clergy are not an original and necessary endowment of this order, but rather it is derived from the congregation, which, for the time being and for purposes of ecclesiastical order, has delegated to the bishops its own indefeasible right. The office-bearers of the Church represent in themselves the character and religious privileges of the entire body of believers; "the priesthood of the ministry is regarded as springing from the priesthood of the whole body."⁴

Growth of sacerdotalism.

At first the priesthood of the clergy comes from the priesthood of the entire Church.

But by Cyprian a new and most important phase of the sacerdotal question is developed. From his time the bishop is truly the priest, and the separation between clergy and laity is real and significant. All the duties and prerogatives that pertained to Cyprian's view.

¹ v. de unitate ecclesiæ, c. 5. Episcopatus unus est cuius a singulis in solidum pars tenetur.

² De Exhort. Cast., c. 7; de Baptismo, c. 17; de Præscr. Hæres., c. 41, et al.

³ "The sacerdotal conception of the ministry is not found in Ignatius, in Clement of Rome, or Clement of Alexandria, in Justin, or in Irenæus, or in any other ecclesiastical writer prior to Tertullian." v. Fisher: The Beginnings of Christianity, p. 553.

⁴ In this there was a very close parallelism to the priestly notion (compare Exod. xix, 6; Lev. xx, 26; Deut. xxxi, 19, with 1 Pet. ii, 5 and 9; Rev. i, 6; v, 10) as it was originally conceived in the Jewish Church. v. Bähr: Symbolik d. mosaischen Cultus, Bd. ii, ss. 11-22. "Was das Volk im weiten, grossen Kreise, das ist der Priesterstand im kleinern, engern, besonderern Kreise; in ihm concentrirt sich demnach die religiöse Würde des gesammten Volkes; alles was dieses zukommt ist ihm in höherem Grade und darum auch in vollere Masse eigen." s. 13.

the Aaronic priesthood he devolves upon the Christian ministry, and all the threats of punishment and disaster uttered against the Jews for their disobedience to their priests Cyprian likewise makes to apply to all who are disobedient to the ministers of the Christian Church.¹ The effect of this triumph of the sacerdotal principle will appear when we come to treat of the sacraments, their nature and import.

Whether this result was due to the influence of Jewish-Christian or of Gentile churches is still a matter of debate. Lightfoot decides for the latter: "Indeed, the hold of the Levitical priesthood on the mind of the pious Jew must have been materially weakened at the Christian era by the development of the synagogue organization on the one hand and by the ever-growing influence of the learned and literary classes, the scribes and rabbis, on the other. The points on which the Judaizers of the apostolic age insist are the rite of circumcision, the distinction of meats, the observance of the Sabbaths, and the like. The necessity of a priesthood was not, or at least is not, known to have been a part of their programme. . . . But, indeed, the overwhelming argument against ascribing the growth of sacerdotal views to Jewish influence lies in the fact that there is a singular absence of distinct sacerdotalism during the first century and a half, where alone on any showing Judaism was powerful enough to impress itself on the belief of the Church at large.

"It is therefore to Gentile feeling that this development must be ascribed. For the heathen, familiar with the auguries, lustrations, sacrifices, and depending on the intervention of some priest for all the manifold religious rites of the state, the club, and the family, the sacerdotal functions must have occupied a far larger space in the affairs of every-day life than for the Jew of the dispersion, who, of necessity, dispensed and had no scruple in dispensing with priestly ministrations from one year's end to the other. With this presumption drawn from probability the evidence of fact accords."²

We have before said (v. p. 343) that the destruction of Jerusalem was powerful in modifying the prevailing Jewish sacerdotal notion; yet Lightfoot's reasons are very important. It is probably true that neither branch of the early Church was unfavourable to this thought, after the warm religious feeling of the apostolic Church had somewhat subsided. One sure result of a spiritual declension is to diminish the feeling of individual worth and responsibility, to magnify forms, and delegate to others duties which were before regarded as personal.

Moreover, the reasons already given for a more thorough and

¹ Ep. 54, 64, 68.

² Op. cit., p. 260.

Was it of Jewish or pagan origin?

Lightfoot's opinion.

compact ecclesiastical organization after the middle of the second century would apply with equal force to the question of the origin of sacerdotalism in the Christian Church. A centre of organization would soon carry with it peculiar prerogatives, and unity of doctrine and government would imply an authority to interpret and enforce this unity. This official class would naturally seek for all possible sanctions for the exercise of such extraordinary powers, and to regard these as divinely bestowed was entirely consonant with the historical development of Judaism and of the heathen religions.

In answering the question of the source of this principle, it is however, of first importance to study the opinions of the Christian fathers themselves. It might be expected that in the varied and extensive writings of men by whom the sacerdotal notion was first sanctioned and defended the references to a Gentile origin might be frequent. Thoroughly conversant with heathen customs and religious rites, as well as with profane literature and civil law, and converted to Christianity in mature life, Tertullian and Cyprian were the men best acquainted with the origin of the priestly notion, and with the source of the change which passed upon the ecclesiastical polity from the close of the second to the middle of the third century. Yet in the writings of neither of these eminent fathers is there an intimation that the sacerdotal principle was suggested by Gentile customs. On the contrary, they uniformly derive their notions of the character, and enforce the authority, of the clergy by examples from the Jewish Church and from the prerogatives of the Aaronic priesthood.¹ From these considerations it may be fairly inferred that in the Jewish economy, as well as in the religious customs with which the Gentile converts were entirely familiar, the sacerdotal principle in the Church of the third century found its origin and sanction.

§ 4. The Apostolic Constitutions.

Another class of writings illustrating the nature and development of the early Church government are the "Apostolic Constitutions."² The first six books, probably belonging to the latter half of the third century, are plainly Jewish-Christian in their spirit and teaching. A strong likeness to the pseudo-Clementine homilies is everywhere noticeable. The episcopate is very strongly emphasized. The bishop is the vicar of the unseen Lord Christ, and is to exercise leadership and watch-care until the Lord shall come again.¹

¹ v. for Cyprian, ep. 61, c. 4; ep. 67, c. 3; ep. 72, c. 8, et al.

² v. edition of P. A. Lagarde, Leipzig, 1832; also the critical discussions and estimates of Drey: Neue Untersuchungen über die Constitut. u. Kanones d. Aposteln, Tübingen, 1832; and Bickell: Geschichte d. Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843.

A divine state. The Church is regarded as a divine state, in which the bishop exercises the highest functions of judge, prophet, and priest. His judicial power in civil matters is supreme.² By virtue of complete knowledge conferred by the Holy Spirit he becomes the infallible prophet and teacher; to him, as high-priest, exclusively belongs the right to arrange the services of divine worship, and to be the spiritual director of the flock.³ With him rests the original authoritative rule of faith as given by the apostles. These writings give minutest directions respecting ordination. This must Ordination, how effected. be conferred by three bishops at least; only in case of extreme need is the work of two regarded as canonical. The act of ordination does not, however, as in the opinion of Cyprian, confer upon the candidate special spiritual gifts.⁴ The sacerdotal character of the episcopacy is even more pronounced than in the writings of Cyprian. In these writings the constitution of the Church and the character of its government are those of a thoroughly unified, closely compacted, and widely recognised organization, in which are found nearly all the germs of the powerful hierarchy whose influence was so controlling for nearly a thousand years.

Thus in the process of two and a half centuries the constitution of the Church underwent several important changes. The origin and cause of these are at times veiled in deep obscurity. The great paucity of evidence, both documentary and monumental, the doubt attaching to the genuineness and integrity of some of the writings which have survived, and the great difficulties of their interpretation give occasion for the honest maintenance of different theories.

Affected by its environment. But a careful examination of the history justifies the conclusion that these changes were effected more by the peculiar influences incident to the propagation of a new religion than to either a directly divine institution or to a set purpose on the part of the Church leaders. The ecclesiastical organization which we find at the beginning of the fourth century is but a natural outcome of the peculiar forces which pressed upon the Church

Church government a development. from within and from without. A compact unity of both doctrine and discipline for self-defence comported with the idea of an office and officer who should thoroughly embody that unity in himself, and who should be prepared for the high responsibility of maintaining this unity through direct inspiration of knowledge and purity by the Holy Spirit.

¹ Const., ii, 20.

² Id., ii, 11, 45 53.

³ Id., ii, 27, 33; iii, 10.

⁴ Id., viii, 4, 5.

CHAPTER V.

THE OFFICES AND OFFICERS OF THE POST-APOSTOLIC CHURCH.

§ 1. Origin of Episcopacy.

FROM this examination it will appear less surprising that different opinions have been entertained respecting the origin of the episcopacy. Three general theories Its origin. have been urged with great ability by their respective advocates:

1. Episcopacy is of apostolic origin. The apostles chose and ordained men to be their true and lawful successors as teachers and governors of the Christian Church. These First theory. men were clothed with like authority and endowed with like spiritual gifts as the apostles themselves in order to preserve intact the teachings and spirit of Christ, who instituted the apostolate. The advocates¹ of this theory urge the following considerations: 1.) The position of James, who stood at the head of the Church of Jerusalem. 2.) The office of the assistants and delegates of the apostles, as Timothy, Titus, Silas, Epaphroditus, Luke, etc., who in a measure represented the apostles in specific cases. 3.) The angels of the seven Asiatic churches, who, it is claimed, were of the rank of bishop. 4.) The testimony of Ignatius presupposes the episcopate as already in existence. 5.) The statement of Clement of Alexandria that John instituted bishops after his return from Patmos; also the accounts of Irenæus, Tertullian, Eusebius, and Jerome that the same apostle nominated and ordained Polycarp as bishop of Smyrna. 6.) The traditions of the churches of Antioch and Rome, which trace their line of bishops back to apostolic institution and keep the record of an unbroken succession. 7.) The almost universal and uncontested spread of the episcopate in the second century, which it is conceded by all cannot be satisfactorily explained without the presumption of at least the indirect sanction of the apostles.²

2. It originated in the so called household societies or congrega-

¹ This is the view of the Greek Church, and is embraced by most of the Roman Catholics and the High Anglicans. It is also advocated by Bunsen, Rothe, Thiersch, and a few other Protestant scholars.

² Abridged from Schaff: Op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 135-139. Rothe is the most able modern defender of this theory.

tions. The following considerations are urged by this school: 1.) It is well known that in the more important cities single families gathered in the house of a well known disciple, and thus were formed the so called family societies or churches (ἐκκλησία κατ' οἶκον). 2.) The foremost person among the disciples thus banded together was called to extend his patronage or protection to the society thus formed. This family patronage is mentioned in the Scriptures,¹ as well as in the letters of Ignatius.² It seems to have been quite generally recognised at Rome, and there are clear intimations of its prevalence at Corinth.³ Afterward, when these family churches, over each of which such patron presided, were united into one congregation, a college of presbyters or patrons would thus be formed, to whose president was given the title of bishop, ἐπίσκοπος. In this manner the episcopate originated.⁴

3. A third theory has been well formulated as follows: "The episcopate was formed not out of the apostolic order by localization, but out of the presbyterial by elevation; and the title, which originally was common to all, came at length to be appropriated to the chief among them."⁵ In other words, the episcopate, as a distinct office, was of post-apostolic origin, was not a distinctively divine institution, and therefore not an office necessary to the existence of the Christian Church. It was the result of peculiar circumstances, a development from the needs which the early Church felt for unification of government and doctrine, and for the more careful oversight and administration of its charities. The facts urged by the advocates of this theory are: 1.) The almost universally conceded identity of bishops and presbyters in the writings of the New Testament. 2.) This identity of terms continues to the close of the first century, and even into the second; at least there is no clearly conceived difference, and they seem to be used interchangeably or very loosely. 3.) From the first century down to the beginning of the third it was the custom of the influential Church of Alexandria to recognise twelve presbyters. From this number the body elected and consecrated a president, to whom they gave the title of bishop. They then elected one to take his place in the presbyterial body. It is also probable that to the

¹ Rom. xvi, 14, 15; 1 Cor. xvi, 19.

² Ad Ephes., c. 6, 8, 13, 20; ad Smyrn., c. 1, 2, 7, 8, et al.

³ 1 Cor. i, 16; xvi, 15, 19.

⁴ For the influence of these house or family societies upon the development of ecclesiastical architecture, v. bk. i, ch. vi. This is substantially the theory of Baur, Kist, Weingarten, Heinrici, Hase, and others. v. especially Baur: Über den Ursprung des Episcopats, ss. 85, 90, 107, et al.

⁵ Lightfoot: Op. cit., p. 196.

end of the second century the bishop of Alexandria was the only bishop in all Egypt.¹ 4.) Jerome distinctly affirms that the Church was originally governed by a body of presbyters, and that the bishop was elected at a later period to secure unity of doctrine and government. In other words, it was a prudential measure and not a divine institution.

§ 2. The Presbyters, Deacons, Deaconesses, etc.

The effect of the efforts of Irenæus and Tertullian to secure a unified and authoritative doctrine, regula fidei, and of Cyprian, Calixtus, and Hegesippus to realize the idea of "a holy Catholic Church," through the supervision of bishops who should exercise their prerogatives by virtue of an unbroken succession from the apostles, necessarily conferred upon the episcopal office a dignity ^{Duties and prerogatives.} and an importance before unknown. The difference between them and the body of presbyters and the deacons became more distinct, and the duties and prerogatives of each were more sharply defined and carefully guarded. The division of the Church into clergy and laity became more positive than before. The clergy are now priests to serve at the altar, to minister for the people. But both clergy and laity are alike subject to the authority of the bishop. Cyprian had also the energy to enforce these provisions.

The rights which all members of the Church had enjoyed in the first and early part of the second century were, under Irenæus and Cyprian, largely ignored, and in the times after Cyprian the constitution of the Church more and more disallowed the claims of the laity to a participation in government. These ^{Limitation of rights of the laity.} privileges of private members were curtailed to almost the same degree as the influence of the bishops increased.² The laity could be present at the assemblies of the church, and could approve any decision which had been reached by the presbyterial council. But this was only a matter of form, and their failure to approve was not of the nature of a veto, since the prevailing theory was that the presbyterial council was under the special guidance of the Holy Spirit, and hence that its conclusions were not to be set aside. The presbyters now perform their duties by virtue of being a constituent part of the presbytery. In this association with the bishop they are sometimes called co-presbyters. In one of Cyprian's letters³ they are represented as united with the bishop in priestly honor. This has been cited by some to show his belief in the equality of bishops and presbyters. But this view does not comport with the general teaching and conduct of Cyprian, nor is it in accord with the spirit of the "Apostolic Constitutions." Rather must this and other somewhat similar expressions indicate the priestly character of the presbyters by virtue of their prerogative to bring the offering in the eucharist. This is made more clear from the advice given in case of lapsed or heretical presbyters Functions of presbyters. of who sought readmission into the Church. They were to be received as private members.¹ The presbyters were to officiate at the altar in the absence of the bishop, and they with the deacons were to care for the interests of the Church.²

¹ The rapid growth of the diocesan principle is, however, seen in the fact that by the middle of the third century Egypt had more than a score of bishops.

² Otto Ritschl: Cyprian von Carthago, etc., Göttingen, 1885, ss. 211, 212.

³ Ep. 61, 3. Episcopo sacerdotale honore conjuncti.

In case the Church was so widely scattered that its members could not assemble in one place, the presbyters were accustomed to celebrate the eucharist in the distant districts. The priestly power was not held by virtue of their office as presbyters, but because they were the agents and representatives of the bishops. The original functions of the presbyters as rulers were now enlarged, and what had at first been regarded with a degree of jealousy became at the close of the third century ordinary and unquestioned.³ In Cyprian's day the presbyters had an advisory voice in the council. The preliminary examinations and the first bringing of causes before the council were left to their decision. In the third century a special class of presbyters, presbyteri doctores, is met, whose duties have given rise to considerable debate. It seems most probable, however, that they were merely teachers of the catechumens and of those who returned from the heretical sects, as at an earlier period they instructed those who passed from heathendom to Christianity.

The office and duties of the deacons underwent like transformations. From ministers for the relief of the poor, and Changes in the functions of deacons. the companions and advisers of the bishop in the administration of public charities, by the growth of the sacerdotal notion they came to be regarded as subordinate to bishops and presbyters, sustaining in the Christian economy the same relation as did the Levites to the priests under the Mosaic.

The rapid growth of the Church in numbers and the multiplication of its charities made direct oversight by the deacons impracticable. They could no longer personally No longer overseers of charities. inspect the individual cases of want and report them to the bishop. Moreover, the founding of asylums, orphanages, guest-houses, etc., each managed by its appropriate board, materially modified the original functions of the deacons, and reduced them for the most part to the position of subordinate ministers of public worship. Nevertheless, they were conceived as sustaining even closer relations to the bishops than the presbyters themselves. When, therefore, they were constituted a college under a president, known as the archdeacon, this officer became intimately associated with the bishop in the administration of affairs.¹

¹ Ep. 72, 2.² Ep. 5, 2.³ Hatch: Op. cit., pp. 77, 78; O. Ritschl: Op. cit., s. 232.

In the time of Cyprian the deacons manifestly bore the consecrated elements to the confessors who were languishing in prisons, and also aided the bishop in the administration of baptism and of the eucharist. In fine, they seem now to have come to be ministrants to the other orders in the Church.² Thus they are permitted to read the Gospel lesson at the communion service;³ they care for the furniture of the altar in those churches where the inferior officers were forbidden by the canons of the councils to come into the sanctuary; they receive the offerings of the people and present them to the minister at the altar. They are allowed to baptize by the permission and authority of the bishop, but it is evident that this was differently regarded in different churches, some granting and others denying this function to the deacons.⁴

May baptize.

After the Church had accepted the sacerdotal idea of the ministry the right of the deacons to consecrate the eucharist was for the most part denied. Since the eucharist was of the nature of a sacrifice, none but a priest could lawfully offer it; and the priestly character of the deacons was not generally recognised.⁵ By the authority of the bishop they were permitted to preach, and in some instances to read homilies or sermons which had been prepared by distinguished ministers. They were the especial servants of the bishops, often accompanying them as secretaries in their diocesan visits, and on extraordinary occasions became their representatives in the general councils, where, as deputies or proxies, they were permitted to vote on all questions there determined. The disciplinary function of these officers is referred to elsewhere. The age at which candidates were eligible to the office was usually twenty-five. This was afterward fixed by the decisions of councils and by the edicts of emperors. Their number greatly varied in different prov-

Could not celebrate the eucharist.

Special servants of the bishops.

When eligible.

¹ Hatch: Op. cit., pp. 53, 54.

² v. Ritschl: Op. cit., s. 235.

³ Constit. Apost., l. 2, c. 57.

⁴ Tertullian, Jerome, and Cyprian clearly recognise this right; the Apostolic Constitutions and Epiphanius as clearly deny it.

⁵ Constit. Apost., l. 8, c. 28.

inces of the empire, and in different periods of the history of the Church. In some instances there is a very strict adherence to the

The number seven continued. original number seven. In the influential Church of Rome this number long continued; in other important churches their number seems to have increased as the necessities of worship and administration required; in St. Sophia and three other churches of Constantinople Justinian allowed one hundred.

The archdeacon was president of the body or college of deacons. The method of his appointment is not always clear. The archdeacon. Probably it was not uniform. He appears to have been nominated by the bishop and elected by his fellow deacons. While the language of some canons clearly makes it the duty of

How elected. the bishop to appoint his own archdeacon, the manner of such appointment is not indicated. Since this officer was most intimately connected with the bishop, and was, next to him, the most important in the Church, it is not strange that the councils should jealously guard the selection. In all the distinctive functions of his office the bishop relied directly and immediately upon the archdeacon. Hence, in case of the death of a bishop the archdeacon, rather than one

His importance. of the presbyters, was usually appointed his successor.¹ There has been much controversy respecting the character, office, and functions of the deaconesses in the ancient Church.

The deaconesses. That an order of women whose duties somewhat corresponded to those of the deacons existed in the early Church is unquestioned. But as to the grounds of eligibility, the question of ordination, the scope of duties, etc., widely different opinions have obtained. It is probable that women of somewhat advanced years, widows who had borne children, were usually chosen; yet it is as certain that young unmarried women were sometimes appointed. Piety, discretion, and experience Qualifications. were in any case the indispensable prerequisites in candidates. During the first two centuries the Church more carefully heeded the advice of Paul that the deaconess should have been the wife of one husband,² also that the Church should admit to this office only those who had been thoroughly tested by previous trusts, having used hospitality to strangers, washed the saints' feet, relieved the afflicted, diligently followed every good work, etc. (1 Tim.

¹ v. Bingham: Antiquities of the Christian Church, bk. ii, chap. xxi.

² The teaching of Paul in this passage is not plain. Whether it is to be taken in its literal meaning, or whether he meant to exclude only those who, after divorce from the first husband, married a second time, is not clear. The latter interpretation best accords with the spirit of the New Testament teaching.

v, 10); but at a later period there was more laxity, and younger and inexperienced women were admitted. The question of their ordination has been much debated. They were inducted ^{Their ordina-} into their office by the imposition of hands; of this ^{tion.} there is abundant proof. This would not necessarily imply the right to fulfill the sacred functions of the ministry. While some of the Montanists allowed women to be bishops and presbyters, their practice was strongly opposed as unscriptural, and Tertullian¹ condemns the allowing of women to baptize as contrary to ^{Did not bap-} the apostolic teaching. Yet it may well be doubted ^{tize.} whether this was the earlier view of the Church, before the sacerdotal character of the ministry had come to be generally recognised.²

The need of such helpers arose from the customs and usages of the ancient world, which forbade the intimate association ^{Their duties.} of the sexes in public assemblies. They were to instruct the female catechumens, to assist in the baptism of women, to anoint with holy oil,³ to minister to the confessors who were languishing in prison, to care for the women who were in sickness or distress, and sometimes were doorkeepers in the churches.⁴

§ 3. Chorepiscopi, Metropolitans, or Primates, and Patriarchs.

The centralization of power and the unification of the government under the Roman emperors exerted a very marked influence upon the administration of the Christian Church. The facts that Italy thereby lost its peculiar privileges, and that the freemen throughout the vast empire had equal rights as Roman citizens, were the necessary antecedents to the complete unification of church administration when Christianity was adopted as the state religion. To secure a vigorous government in Italy, Augustus had divided it into eleven regions; and Constantine extended this principle to the entire empire, by forming four pretorian prefectures; namely, of Gaul, of Italy, of Illyricum, and of the East. Each of these was divided into dioceses, and these again into provinces.

In the fourth century the Christian Church accepted these divisions of the empire as useful in its own government; and it is noteworthy that sometimes the ecclesiastical divisions long outlived the political, and became of extreme importance in tracing the civil

¹ De Baptismo, c. 17.

² The Montanists were the Puritans of their age. Their protests against hurtful innovations of doctrine and government were vigorous and often just; hence their recognition of the rights of women to minister in sacred things must have been believed to be in accordance with apostolic usage.

³ Const. Apost., l. 3, c. 15.

⁴ Const. Apost., l. 2, c. 57.

history.¹ The patriarchates of the Church corresponded quite closely to the political prefectures, only departing from them territorially to the degree that they might group together peoples of like race and language. In the course of the fourth and fifth centuries the patriarchal system became quite clearly defined; giving the patriarchate of Rome, of Constantinople, of Antioch, of Alexandria, and, a little later, of Jerusalem—the last being taken from that of Antioch. The name patriarch was at first confined to the ecclesiastic having jurisdiction over one of these patriarchates; but at a later period this title was more loosely used, sometimes, as in the case of Rome, being extended to embrace all Italy, Gaul, Britain, and most of the Teutonic peoples, while in other cases it was applied to such as had under their supervision a simple see.

Under the patriarchs were metropolitans, each of whom had jurisdiction in a diocese, whose capital city was also the ecclesiastical metropolis. These provinces were in turn divided into episcopal sees or districts, over which bishops had jurisdiction. The extent and importance of these dioceses and districts greatly fluctuated—in southern Europe and in the lands adjacent to the Mediterranean being small in area, while in northern Europe, and in the outlying lands where missionary labours had resulted in founding churches, a district often included an entire tribe or principality.

Thus the ecclesiastical divisions of the empire were suggested by, and corresponded quite closely to, the political. "As in every metropolis or chief city of each province there was a superior magistrate above the magistrates of every single city, so, likewise, in the same metropolis there was a bishop, whose power extended over the whole province, where he was called the metropolitan, or primate, as being the principal bishop of the province. . . . In like manner, as the state had a vicarius in every capital city of each civil diocese, so the Church in process of time came to have exarchs, or patriarchs, in many, if not in all, the capital cities of the empire."² This dependence of the ecclesiastical divisions upon the political is further shown from the fact that as the latter were changed the former experienced like change; and when the question of primacy between two churches in the same province or district arose, it was settled by ascertaining which the state regarded as the metropolis, and conforming the Church thereto. Thus, cities which at one period were no more than single sees afterward became seats of metropolitans and patriarchs, while a former metropolis sank to the condition of a mere sec.¹ The relations and duties of these several ecclesiastical officers will now more clearly appear.

¹ v. Freeman: The Historical Geography of Europe, second edition, London, 1882, chap. vii.

² v. Bingham: Antiquities of the Church, bk. ix, chap. i, p. 342.

The existence of Christian societies in the villages and rural districts more or less remote from the city, which was the special diocese of the bishop, rendered it necessary that a special officer should be appointed for their immediate oversight. These were called chorepiscopi, τῆς χώρας ἐπίσκοποι,² or bishops of the country. They were the assistants of the bishops in administration. Whether they were simple presbyters or received episcopal ordination has divided the opinion of archæologists. Probably both at times officiated in this capacity; either presbyters directly appointed, or bishops who had been rejected by their dioceses, or had been received again from the number of those who had belonged to a schismatic party.³ They first appear toward the close of the third century in Asia Minor, and are first recognised by the Councils of Ancyra and Neo-Cæsarea in A. D. 314, and by the Council of Nice in A. D. 325. They continued in the Eastern Church until about the ninth century, and in the Latin Church until the tenth or eleventh century. They exercised, at times, most of the functions of the bishops themselves. We find some councils clothing them with authority to ordain all inferior officers in their churches, sometimes even without the permission of the city bishop; but in most instances consultation with the bishop of the city church was expected, and special leave obtained. They had authority to confirm; to give letters of dismissal and commendation to the clergy who were about to remove to other parts; to conduct public divine service in the chief church in the presence of the bishop, or by his permission or request. They are found in the councils, casting their votes on all questions there decided,¹ and exercising every right pertaining to the episcopal members of the synods or councils.

¹ Bingham gives the approximate notitia of the Church at the close of the fourth century. In the patriarchate of Antioch, corresponding closely with the civil notitia, were fifteen provinces, with the same number of metropolitans. In the patriarchate of Alexandria (diocese of Egypt) there were six metropolitans; in the exarchate of Ephesus, ten metropolitans; in the exarchate of Cæsarea, eleven; in the exarchate of Heraclea (afterward Constantinople), six; in the exarchate of Thessalonica, six; in the exarchate of Milan, seven; in the patriarchate of Rome, ten; in the exarchate of Sirmium, six; in the exarchate of Carthage, six; in the diocese of Spain, seven; in the diocese of Gaul, seventeen; in the diocese of Britain, five provinces, with capitals at York, London, and Caerleon. In his final index he gives a list of 185 provinces or metropolitan districts, and 1,560 episcopal sees. Yet it is probable that such lists are far from perfect.

² This seems the more probable derivation.

³ Such instances are mentioned by Socrates: Hist. Eccl., l. 4, c. 7; and were distinctly provided for by conciliary action. v. Canon 8 of the Council of Nice.

The primate, or metropolitan,² sustained a like relation to the bishops of a province as did the bishop of a city to the chorepiscopi of his country churches. The time of the Primates.

introduction of this office is not certain. Like most other ecclesiastical provisions it was probably created to meet a felt need in the government and oversight of the churches. While some find its beginning in the prerogatives exercised by Titus and Timothy in the early Church, others as strenuously deny its apostolic origin, and place its beginning as late as the third century. The Council of Nicæa clearly recognises the office as of long standing, and treated it as a venerable institution. Cyprian mentions³ that the bishop of Carthage presided over all the other African bishops, and issued to them mandates. Whether this was indeed the exercise of metropolitan power, or simply has reference to the fact of presidency in the councils, is not very clear. Nevertheless, by the fourth century the metropolitan office is fully recognised, and is regulated in its functions and privileges by the canons of councils.

Time of origin uncertain.

They were elected and ordained by the bishops of their province.

How appointed.

Their functions were different at different stages of the history of the Church. Their most important duties and prerogatives were to preside at the provincial councils; to provide for and ordain the bishop to a vacant see; to decide questions between the various bishops, or between individual bishops and their flocks; to assemble synods for the examination of doctrine and the enforcement of discipline; to publish to the churches of their provinces the conciliary decrees, or the edicts of the emperor, by which doctrine and discipline were to be inculcated; to issue letters of commendation to the bishops of their districts, since these were not permitted to journey abroad without such letters; to hear appeals of presbyters or deacons who had been deposed by the bishop of a diocese.⁴

Their duties.

The patriarchs were evidently a class of highest dignity and au-

¹ The subscriptions of the Council of Nicæa clearly prove the presence of chorepiscopi from several provinces, also the subscriptions of the councils of Neocæsarea and Ephesus.

² The distinction between the metropolitan and archbishop is not easy to describe. That they were synonymous has been held by some high authorities, and denied by others. Sometimes they seem to be almost identical, at other periods of the history a plain distinction is made. v. Augusti: Op. cit., bd. i, ss. 201, 202.

³ Ep. 42, ad Cornelian; Ep. 40 and 45.

⁴ v. Bingham: Antiquities of the Church, bk. ii, c. l. xiv.

thority. During the fourth century the office became quite widely recognised, and was confirmed by the general councils of Constantinople A. D. 381, Ephesus A. D. 431, and Chalcedon A. D. 551. The patriarch sustained to the metropolitans relations similar to those which the latter held to the bishops of sees; hence he was ordained by his metropolitans, and in turn ordained them. He presided at diocesan councils, heard appeals of bishops from the decisions of the metropolitans, communicated to them the imperial edicts or conciliary decrees, censured the metropolitans in case of remissness, etc. Each patriarch was regarded as supreme in his own patriarchate until Rome and Constantinople rose to superior dignity and laid claim to superior authority.

Patriarchs.

Arose gradually.

Duties.

§ 4. The Sub-orders of the Clergy.

The shifting conditions of the post-apostolic Church necessitated changes in its constitution and discipline. Whenever the needs were urgent, the Church exerted herself to satisfy them. The principles of Christian prudence and reasonable adjustment, rather than that of divine institution, here governed. As the functions of the chief officers varied according to providential indications, so the wants of the societies led to the institution of inferior offices which were believed to contribute to the convenience or effectiveness of church activities, discipline, or life. The theory that the ordines minores, especially the lectores, originated by a differentiation of the duties of the diaconate¹ cannot be regarded as resting on firm historical foundations. This prudential principle is seen in the fact that sub-officers are not met with until the third century, when the organization of the churches had become more complete, and then only in local societies whose circumstances are peculiar. It is doubtful whether they appear in the Greek Church before the fourth century. The most important of these inferior officers are:

Providential indications.

1. The sub-deacons,² whose duty it was to assist the deacons, especially in those important churches where the original number seven had been continued. The province of these sub-officers was jealously guarded, so that many of the duties of the deacons were not permitted to them. While ordained,³ they

Sub-deacons.

¹ v. Scherer: Handbuch des Kirchenrechts, Grätz, 1886, bd. i, s. 317. Contra, v. Harnack: Über den Ursprung des Lectorates und der anderen niederen Weihen, Giessen, 1886.

² It is believed that Athanasius is the first Greek writer who mentions them.

³ They are supposed to be first distinctly referred to by Cyprian, Epist. 8, 20, 23, 29, etc.

were not clothed with authority to aid in administering the sacraments, nor in any case to preach, but their functions were largely manual, sometimes menial.

2. The acolyths, ἀκόλουθοι, were at first confined to the Latin Church; no Greek writer earlier than Justinian makes mention of them. The meaning of the term would suggest that they were general servants, but the reception of a candlestick with a taper in it, and an empty pitcher in which to bring wine, on the occasion of their installation, point to the lighting of the churches and the care of the wine for the eucharist as their chief duties.

3. The casting out of devils by prayer and by special gift of the Holy Spirit is mentioned in the apostolic age. Christ says the devils shall be subject to his apostles; yet a wider circle of exorcists is implied in the references which are met in the first and second centuries. As a distinct class of officers they first appear in the third century. From the Apostolic Constitutions¹ we should infer that their origin must have been of a later date; yet the more just opinion is that in the third century they were recognised as having a distinct function in the Church. This function was to offer special prayer over the demoniacs, who were kept for the most part in the church, to minister to their physical needs and to effect a restoration.

Other inferior officers who appeared from the third century are the readers, lectores, who read the Scriptures from the reading desk, not the altar; the door-keepers, ostiarii, who had charge of the entrances, in order to permit no unworthy person to come into the place of worship; the singers, psalmistæ,² who cared for the singing of the Church and the training of the choirs for the antiphonal service; the catechists, who were to instruct the catechumens in the first principles of religion, thus fitting them for baptism. This instruction could not, however, be conducted in the public congregation.

¹ l. viii, c. 26.

² It is doubtful whether these appear as a distinct class before the fourth century.

CHAPTER VI.

SYNODS AND COUNCILS, AND THEIR AUTHORITY.

THE council at Jerusalem was the first assembly of the "apostles, elders, and brethren," to decide upon doctrines and polity which were to be accepted by the Christian societies. It is an instructive fact that in this first council are the apostles and elders with the whole Church, and that the decisions are sanctioned by the entire body. This is in perfect accord with the general spirit of the apostolic age. The entire body of believers were to be guided by the Holy Spirit into all truth, and they were the depositary of ecclesiastical power. Nevertheless, the meetings for consultation upon matters of general interest were in harmony with what was well understood, not only by the citizens of the Roman Empire, but by all the ancient world. The Achaian, Thessalian, Ætolian, Amphictyonic, and other councils and leagues are only familiar examples of the custom of the ancient cities and peoples to meet for consultation on interests common to all. We find almost precisely the same terms—provinces, dioceses, metropolitans, synods, councils, etc.—used to characterize these assemblies and their members.

The synod of Jerusalem.

After the analogy of civil leagues.

The assertion of the unity of the Holy Catholic Church necessarily carried with it unity of doctrine and government. Reference has already been made to the intimate relations which existed between the different bishops, and the means used to maintain these relations for purposes of preserving the unity of the Church.

Necessary to preserve the unity of the Church.

Hence, after the middle of the second century the assembly of delegates from the societies of a province, for the determination and maintenance of the most important questions, is quite common. They appear in Asia Minor and Gaul. These gatherings, called provincial synods, became quite general in the beginning of the third century, and were generally held at stated times. With respect to these, as to other matters of Church government, there was a gradual decline of the influence and rights of the laity, and a growing power of the clergy. The laity, who were at first important factors of the synodical assemblies, were of little influence after the middle of the Provincial synods.

Decline of lay influence.

third century; and by the beginning of the fourth, the composition of the councils was restricted to the three orders of the clergy. Among these the influence of the presbyters declined more and more, and the authority of the bishops soon became exclusive and supreme.

A further attempt at preserving the unity of the Church is the extension of the council to include the ecclesiastical authorities of a diocese or a patriarchate. Usually these were convoked by the metropolitan or patriarch, and had reference to interests touching a wider district or territory.¹ In these councils the principle of representation seems to have been recognised to a considerable extent, since the third Council of Carthage, A. D. 398, by its canons provided for the presence of three bishops from every African province excepting Tripoli, which could send but one on account of its small number of bishops.

Of still greater significance were the œcumenical or general councils, which purposed to include in their numbers representatives from the widest possible areas of Christendom. An extraordinary exigency only could lead to the assembly of such body; a widespread agitation as, for example, that resulting from the Arian controversy, or some general interest, was the occasion of its meeting.

The authority to convoke the councils varied with the times and the character of the council itself. When it was of a district, the bishop assembled the elders, deacons, and people; when of a diocese or province, the metropolitan or patriarch; when œcumenical, it was usually by imperial edict, with the advice and approval of the chief bishops.² The bishops' or metropolitans' circular letters for summoning the council went under the name synodicæ or tractoriæ; those of the emperors, sacræ. The bishop presided in the district council, the metropolitan or patriarch in the provincial, while the general councils were under the nominal control of the emperor or his representative; but the presidents proper, πρόεδροι, were usually chosen from the most influential and venerable members.³ The council deliberated and decided respecting matters of Church government, discipline, doctrine, and worship. At the same time it constituted a court before which the clergy or the laity could bring charges against the bishops or others. In the provincial councils such complaints were usually lodged with the archdeacon of the metropolitan church, who, in turn, brought them to the knowledge of the council.

¹ v. Bickell: Op. cit., 2^o Lief., cap. 14.

² The delegates to an œcumenical council sometimes journeyed at the public expense. v. Eusebius: De Vita Const., iii, 6, for an account of this in case of the Council of Nicæa.

³ Eusebius, Sozomen, and Socrates agree in saying, that in the Council of Nicæa Hosius of Cordova, Alexander of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch, Macarius of Jerusalem, and Vitus and Vincentius, the vicars of the Bishop of Rome, were the chief presidents.

The early method of balloting was by heads, the method of motions not having been introduced until late in the Middle Ages. The latter was regarded as justifiable only in extraordinary emergencies.

In case of œcumenical councils the decrees were of the nature of laws, which the emperors enforced. Thus Constantine regarded the decisions of the Council of Nice as obligatory on the subjects of the empire, and hence punished non-subscription by exile. Like action was taken by Theodosius the Great respecting the decrees of the Constantinopolitan council, by Theodosius II. respecting the decisions of the Council of Ephesus, and by Marcian regarding those of the Council of Chalcedon, in A. D. 451.

In matters of discipline, it seems that the decisions of the councils were not unalterable. In respect to articles of faith, the principle holding seemed to be that it was not the prerogative of a council to enlarge or extend the boundaries of faith, but to confirm, establish, and make more clear by definition what had been the doctrine of the general Church. The decisions might be abrogated, even with regard to doctrines. Not until near the close of the period of which we treat did conciliary decisions assume an authority almost equal to Scripture. Augustine, Gregory the Great, and other champions of the Church, while not yielding the supreme authority of the Scriptures, nevertheless placed much stress upon the decrees of councils as expressive of the opinion of good men whom God had promised to "lead into all truth." So that in early times the provincial councils imposed their decisions upon those within their jurisdiction as of the highest prudential worth, and the general councils were believed to have formulated doctrine under such favorable circumstances that the decisions were looked upon as of great moral and religious value. Hence we find that the Church generally accepted the decisions of the first six œcumenical councils, and was at times inclined to regard them as of almost equal authority with the Scriptures themselves.

Subjects considered.

Method of voting.

Enforcement of conciliary decisions.

Was their decision binding?

Growing authority of conciliary decisions.

CHAPTER VII.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

§ 1. Reasons and Degrees of Punishment.

THE Church was regarded as a body of believers on Jesus Christ, bound together by a fellowship most sacred, for the promotion of holiness and the perfection of character (1 Pet. ii, 9, 10). Its relations and duties were voluntarily assumed; its obligations were enforced by moral, not by physical, sanctions.

The object of Church discipline, exercised as it was only upon members of its own communion, was to preserve purity of doctrine and life.¹ The apostolic Church imposed but one condition of membership—faith in Jesus as the risen Lord, and baptism into the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Nevertheless, this Church had the clear sanction of an apostle for maintaining sound discipline (1 Cor. v; 2 Cor. ii; Col. ii, 5; Clement. Rom., Ep. i, ad Cor., c. 44); and the apostolic fathers are explicit in the inculcation of ecclesiastical order. From the earliest years of Christianity two parties existed in the Church, whose views of discipline were oppugnant and wellnigh irreconcilable. One looked upon a fixed and definite ecclesiastical order as the necessary condition of the successful extension of Christianity; the other regarded these outward institutions as limitations of the free spirit of the Gospel, and emphasized the fact that the power of the invisible Church is her spiritual life, and not her formal organization. These two parties continued in the Church. They were in conflict through the first six centuries.²

Catechumenical training, which was judged to be a necessary condition of the admission of Gentile converts, must be regarded as a provision of the Church after she had lost the glow of love felt by the first disciples, and had experienced the contaminating influences of association with a depraved heathenism. Such preparatory training was deemed a wisely prudential measure to guard the Church against the influx of the worldly and unsaved.

¹ v. Bickell: Geschichte des Kirchenrechtes, 2^{te} Lief., ss. 62–71.

² v. Neander: Antignosticus, ss. 340, 341.

But by as much more as the conditions of membership were more stringent, by so much more did the guardians of the Church feel the necessity of a rigorous discipline. The subscription to and observance of the one rule of faith, regula fidei, which was The regula fidei. common to all the churches, was the sole test of orthodoxy. This one rule was expressed in the articles of faith, or the creeds, which the early Church had formulated. He who held these in an honest mind and pure heart was a worthy member of the Church; he who denied them, or whose life was not The one standard. regulated by them, was heretical or unworthy. The latter were to be excinded from the body of the Church in order to preserve its purity and peace.

It is not possible to determine the exact time when the right and prerogative of discipline came to be almost exclusively exercised by the bishops, nor can the precise behavior of the Church respecting the punishment of offenders during the first one hundred and fifty years be clearly determined. It is, however, certain that the Church discipline incurred no loss of civil rights. deprivation of privileges in the Church had no reference to the rights of an offender as a subject of the state. Only at a later period, in cases where the holding and use of the property of the Church was in question, or in cases of pertinacious disturbers, was the authority of the civil law invoked.¹

Church discipline proper had respect to several degrees of offence and punishment. The Church was, therefore, compelled to discriminate between the characters of violators of its laws. Sins venial and mortal. This led to the classification of sins as venial and mortal.² The penalty of the former consisted in either admonition and temporary suspension, or the lesser excommunication Admonition and lesser excommunication. (ἀφορισμός). The latter consisted in withholding from those under the ban of the Church its special privileges, as partaking of the eucharist, etc. Such were not, however, excluded from the ordinary ministrations and public services.

The greater excommunication was visited upon more heinous offenders, or those, generally, who were guilty of mortal The greater excommunication. sins. It consisted in a complete excinding of members from the body of the Church, and, therefore, from all its privileges and associations. When the anathema was uttered, the offender was regarded as one to be shunned by all the faithful, and absolutely deprived of all that was distinctive of the Christian Church, including the rites of Christian burial. This penalty was executed against both sexes, the rich and poor, the subject and the ruler,¹ alike; in this regard the Christian discipline was characteristically rigid. Notice of such greater excommunication Notice given to other churches. was generally given to other churches, and they were expected to concur in the decision, on the theory of the unity of the Church, and, therefore, for the sake of the general good.² All were forbidden to receive such excommunicate persons; and, by frequent conciliary enactment, any bishop thus receiving and harboring the excinded should himself be regarded as cut off from the Church.³

¹ Reference is not here had to later civil enactments for the punishment of heresy and sedition. Conciliary action was taken against such presbyters, or bishops, as were disturbers of the peace by setting up new churches in opposition to the regular authorities. Later, the civil power was invoked to suppress such agitators. This does not, however, strictly pertain to Church discipline.

² v. Tertullian: de pudicitia, c. 19. Peccata mortalia and Peccata venialia. Hereticks seven mortal sins: heresy and schism, idolatry, fraud, denial of Christ, blasphemy, homicide, and fornication.

The general Church did not however regard the effect of even the greater excommunication as annulling the benefits Did not annul the benefits of baptism. of baptism; so that when the most heinous offenders sought readmission into the Church they were not required to be rebaptized. This was contrary to the method of the Donatists, who often received excommunicate persons into their fellowship by declaring them purified by a rebaptism, which this sect freely practised.

No one was excommunicated without a hearing and a formal conviction; any hasty or unwarranted action of a bishop Right of appeal. was liable to review before a provincial synod, to which the aggrieved party had the right of appeal. This was judged of such importance that canons to this effect were enacted by various councils.⁴

§ 2. Penitential Discipline.

While the persecutions of the Church were not continuous, and never absolutely universal, and while some emperors, as Gallienus, showed many favors to the Christians, going so far as to declare to the bishops that it was his will that they should be undisturbed in ¹ The well known example of the action of Ambrose toward Theodosius the Great, as related by Theodoret, is very instructive, not only as illustrating the firmness of a Christian bishop, but also the feelings of a great emperor respecting the fearfulness of the ban of the Church.

² v. Probst: Kirchliche Disciplin in den drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten, Tübingen, 1873, s. 402.

³ v. Canons 2, 4, and 5 of the Council of Antioch; Canon 2, of the second Council of Carthage; also Canon 13 of the Canon. Apost.

⁴ v. Canon 5, Council of Nice; Canons 8 and 10 of the second Council of Carthage; Canon 6 of the Council of Antioch, et al.

their ministrations, the ban, under which Christianity as a religio illicita rested, was not lifted. It was still a penal offence to be a Christian; and all the dangers and hardships which such legal disability implied constantly impended over the Church. It is not, therefore, strange that during the sharp visitations of persecution temptations to deny Christ and to offer to idols were most powerful. This strain was especially severe during the Decian persecutions, when multitudes fell away from the Church through the malignity and subtle devices of this emperor and his successors to Gallienus. The provisions of the early Church for the return of the lapsed gave rise to a complicated system of penitential discipline. The lapsed.

The rigorous discipline of the Novatians had refused readmission to those who were guilty of mortal sins. Only in the hour and article of death could they hope that the ban of the Church might be removed. Also Cyprian, in the earlier portion of his administration, had been inclined to use great severity in dealing with those who had lapsed from the faith (lapsi) during the Decian persecutions. But in Rome and elsewhere more lenient provisions were made for their return to the Church through a system of penance which must be heartily accepted and practised by the offender. The reason of this imposition was that the Church might be assured of the sincere penitence and reform of the lapsed who was seeking admission.

A further necessity for this was felt by the Church from the fact that many attempts to interfere with the regular discipline of the Church had been made. Especially those who had gained peculiar sanctity by suffering for the truth's sake abused their influence by granting certificates of peace or reconciliation without confession or the assurance of penitence. This caused great discontent on the part of such as had remained steadfast, and discipline was thus seriously threatened. To save the Church from disorder and to maintain her purity four orders of penitents were recognised as early, probably, as the middle of the third century. These Four orders of penitents. were known among the Latins as flentes, or weepers; audientes, or hearers; substrati, or kneelers; and consistentes, or co-standers.¹ The first fell upon their faces, imploring the prayers of the Church in their behalf, and that they might be admitted to the first apartment of the church. Then properly their penance began. When they were thus admitted to become hearers, permission was granted them to listen to the Scriptures and the sermon, but they were excluded from the more private and sacred portions of the service.¹ The length of time they were to continue in this order was made the subject of repeated conciliary action.² This depended upon the nature of the offence, and the character of the offender. The third order, substrati, or genu-flectentes, were so named from the fact that they were permitted to fall on their knees, and remain as participants in the common prayers, and to hear the prayers offered for them by the congregation and the bishop. While the hearers were restricted to the narthex or vestibule of the church building, the third order were admitted to the interior, near the ambo, or reading-desk. The fourth order of penitents, the consistentes, or co-standers, were allowed "to stand with the faithful at the altar, and join in the common prayers, and see the oblation offered; but yet might neither make their own oblations, nor partake of the eucharist with them."³

¹ v. St. Basil: Can. 22, et al. The first year they are to weep before the gate of the church; the second year, to be admitted to hearing; the third year, to bending the knee, or repentance; the third year, to stand with the faithful at prayers, but not partake of the oblation. To the same effect are the teachings of Ambrose and other fathers.

At the beginning of the fourth century the Oriental churches appointed a special presbyter to regulate the conduct of penitential discipline (presbyter pœnitentiarius). But on account of the continuous restiveness felt by the private members, in their more public life, and through the interference of the state, this special office was abrogated near the close of the fourth century. Likewise, on the cessation of persecutions, the practice of orderly penitential discipline fell into disuse, and Church life became more free and unconstrained.

Also in the West, under like general conditions and at about the same time, the system was so modified that only for more open and public crimes was public penance imposed, while for other offences a private confession to the clergy was judged sufficient.⁴ From this came gross abuses in practice (auricular confession, indulgences, etc.) and dangerous innovations in Christian doctrine (work righteousness, etc.).

The readmission to the Church, after the period of penance, was often accompanied with much imposing ceremonial. The absolution pronounced by the early Church was not, however, judicial. The prerogative of pardon belonged to God alone.

¹ Note the proclamation of the deacon, "Ne quis audientium, ne quis infidelium," etc. Apost. Constit., l. 8, c. 5.

² v. Council of Nice, Can. 11, 12, and canons of various other councils.

³ v. Bingham: Antiquities of the Christian Church, bk. xviii, chap. i.

⁴ v. Guericke: Lehrbuch d. ch. kirch. Archæologie, Berlin, 1859, s. 109.

As there were stages of penitential discipline, so were there varieties or stages of absolution. Bingham¹ has arranged Five stages of these as follows: "1.) The absolution or great indulgence of baptism. 2.) The absolution of the eucharist. 3.) The absolution of the word and doctrine. 4.) The absolution of imposition of hands and prayer. 5.) The absolution of reconciliation to the Church and her communion by a relaxation of her censures. The two first may be called sacramental absolution; the third, declaratory absolution; the fourth, precatory absolution; the fifth, judicial absolution; and all of them authoritative, so far as they are done by the ministerial authority and commission which Christ has given to his Church, to reconcile men to God by the exercise of such acts and means as conduce to that end in a subordinate and ministerial way, according to his appointment."

The early Church was careful in its treatment of the excommunicate. It never claimed the absolute prerogative of pardon, nor arrogated the power to exclude the offender Care of the early Church. from final salvation, nor to limit the forgiving mercy of God. The acts of the Church were purely ministerial, exercised to guard its purity of doctrine and life. The original system of penance had no respect to merit, but was purely penal, Respecting pardon. disciplinary, and reformatory.² Auricular confession, merit of good works, and indulgences were abuses which appeared during a subsequent period of the history of the Church.

§ 3. Discipline of the Clergy.

If the early Church was stringent in its discipline of the laity, its treatment of clerical offences was still more severe.³ A distinction was made between the discipline of the clergy and that of the laity. A clergyman might be excommunicated from his office, with its honours and emoluments, and yet be permitted to enjoy the privileges of the Church conceded to the laity. In case of flagrant crimes the excision was, however, absolute. The penalties suffered by the clergy More stringent than lay discipline. generally had respect to their means of support, their office, or to their persons, in case of corporal punishment; so that the deprivation of their incomes was for lesser offences, the degradation from office to the condition of laymen for more heinous crimes. In the latter case the deposed clergy were rarely Penalties inflicted. reinstated; hence the indelible character of ordination Deposed clergy rarely reinstated. could not have been the governing doctrine.⁴ The infrequent

¹ Op. cit. : bk. xix, pp. 1085, seq.

² Probst. : Op. cit., s. 403.

³ Probst. : Op. cit., s. 401.

⁴ Probst. : Op. cit., ss. 407, 408.

infliction of corporal punishment was generally confined to the inferior clergy; but in criminal causes the superior clergy, after degradation from their office, were also liable to the same.¹

The ancient Church, through its conciliary canons, exercised a most vigilant oversight over its clergy, and defined with great clearness the offences which should be shunned, and the punishment to be inflicted upon wilful violators of the law. Usually these provisions were eminently wholesome and just.

Ancient discipline whole-some.

¹ Justin. Novel, 123, cap. 20. Corporal punishment seems to have been a later infliction.

BOOK THIRD

THE SACRAMENTS AND WORSHIP OF THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

THE SACRAMENTS

AND

WORSHIP OF THE EARLY CHURCH.

INTRODUCTION.

THE apostles recognised two sacraments as instituted by Christ; they celebrated these with joy, and imposed them as obligatory upon all who would be disciples of the new faith. The deeper significance of the Christian sacraments is manifest, although existing forms were employed for teaching their profounder truths. What under the former dispensation was a type, found in Christ and the sacraments which he instituted its true antitype; the prophecy of good things to come was herein fulfilled; the circumcision which was outward in the flesh was to yield to the true circumcision of the heart, in the spirit and not in the letter (Rom. ii, 28, 29). Christ, the true Passover, was to be sacrificed once for all for men, and henceforth the feast was to be kept not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth (1 Cor. v, 7, 8).

The Eastern Church characterized all holy or incomprehensible truths or offices as mysteries, μυστήρια, and the Latins, in their translations of the Scriptures, generally used the term sacrament, sacramentum, as the appropriate synonym. Hence the Christian fathers of the second and third centuries confound the sacraments proper with all sacred rites connected with the institutions of the Church. At other times they designate each step or stage in the celebration of baptism, or the Lord's Supper, as a sacrament. Hence the anointing with oil in baptism, and the act of confirmation, are often called sacraments. Cyprian insists upon both sacraments, washing of water and the imposition of hands, as necessary to the complete sanctification of the believer;¹ and Optatus speaks in similar manner of washing, anointing, and confirmation as three sacraments. Probably, however, by this term they include no more than was implied in the Greek μυστήριον, mystery.¹

¹ Ep. ad Steph.

The Christian writers of the fourth century continue to attach to the term a very vague and indefinite meaning. The works of the great theologians, Ambrose, Hilary, and Leo, fail to define with clearness, to agree in the number of the sacraments, or to give the rationale of their operation; in Augustine is first met an attempt to thus define, and to explain. His definition would allow of the recognition of an indefinite number, since he did not limit the term to that which had the express sanction and command of Christ.

Thus the number of sacraments remained undetermined during the fifth and sixth centuries, but baptism and the Lord's Supper were by all parties considered the chief and indispensable. It was the almost universal opinion in both East and West that these were necessary to salvation, inasmuch as they were the appointed means of grace; nevertheless, the Church did not deny salvation to those who by extraordinary devotion, or by a martyr's death witnessed for Christ. In such cases the "baptism of blood" took the place of water baptism. The order of the succession of the sacraments was generally recognised. Baptism preceded the Lord's Supper, and was regarded the necessary preparation for it.

¹ The ante-Nicene fathers apply the term mystery to all which is in any way related to the Godhead, or to the revelation of the same. They include in this the doctrine of revelation, and even the subject of symbolism, which is considered mysterious and sacred. This appears especially in a number of passages of Tertullian and Irenæus. The following from Irenæus may illustrate their views: "But it is more suitable that we, directing our inquiries after this fashion, should exercise ourselves in the investigation of the mystery and administration of the living God, and should increase in the love of him who has done, and still does, so great things for us. . . . We should leave things of that nature to God, who created us, being most properly assured that the Scriptures are indeed perfect, since they were spoken by the Word of God and his Spirit; but we, inasmuch as we are inferior to, and later in existence than, the Word of God and his Spirit, are on that very account destitute of the knowledge of his mysteries. . . . If, therefore, even with respect to creation, there are some things which belong only to God, . . . what ground is there for complaint, if in regard to those things which we investigate in the Scriptures (which are throughout spiritual), we are able by the grace of God to explain some of them, while we must leave others in the hands of God," etc. Advers. Hæres., ii, 28, 1-3.

CHAPTER I.

THE SACRAMENT OF BAPTISM.

§ 1. The Idea.

THE acknowledgment of Jesus as the Messiah—the sent of God—was the sole article of belief uniting the first believers in a distinct community. Baptism was a sign and seal of this belief, and was, therefore, into the name of Jesus, thus ratifying the union of the believer with him as the Messiah.¹ Probably no other formula was at first used, since this name was believed ^{The formula.} to imply a complete divinity, and these words to comprehend all things necessary to citizenship in the kingdom which Christ was to establish. But the full formula contained in the commission of Christ was soon used, and afterward was regarded as essential in the administration of the rite.²

The baptism which Christ instituted was different in spirit and import from that of John the Baptist; this is clearly ^{Christ's baptism peculiar.} recognised by John himself (Matt. iii, 11; Mark i, 8; Luke iii, 16; John i, 33); and is also evident from the fact that John's disciples had “not even heard whether there be a Holy Ghost” (Acts xix, 2). The formula “into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” could have been understood only by those who were assured of the resurrection of Christ, after the full work of atonement had been completed, the presence of the Holy Spirit had been felt, and the fulfillment of Jesus's promise had been witnessed upon the day of Pentecost. So that while the baptism of John was complete in water, ἐν ὕδατι, the baptism instituted by Christ was not only in water, but in the Holy Spirit and in fire, πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ πυρὶ. Moreover, the baptism instituted by Christ was to be a permanent institution, and was of the nature of an indispensable sacrament.³

¹ v. Neander: Planting and Training, etc. Ryland's trans., p. 27.

² v. Harnack: Dogmengeschichte, Bd. i. H. claims that this baptismal confession was first recognised as an apostolic article of faith about A. D. 150, and that it originated in Rome, and not in the East.

³ Acts ii, 38, 39: ὑμῖν γὰρ ἐστὶν ἡ ἐπαγγελία καὶ τοῖς τέκνοις ὑμῶν καὶ πᾶσιν τοῖς εἰς μακρὰν κ.τ.λ.

The submission to the rite implied, on the part of the subject, a turning away from his former life, an acceptance of the Messiah, and a renewal and purification of the spirit.

The dying of the old man and the life of the new, the birth to righteousness and holiness through the Holy Spirit, the burial with Christ, and the resurrection to a life of perpetual devotion, are prominent thoughts of the New Testament writers.

The Christian fathers of the second and following centuries incline more to the thought of a magical power of the water in baptism. Justin Martyr¹ calls it the water of What was implied in the rite?

Opinions respecting its nature.

life, ὕδωρ ζωῆς; Tertullian² conveys the thought that in the water of baptism the new birth takes place; Gregory of Nazianzen³ speaks of it as "the garment of immortality, the laver of regeneration," etc. By some of the fathers the necessity of baptism to salvation is clearly taught; hence the characterization of the rite as salus.⁴ Others⁵ emphasize the enlightening effects of baptism; hence call it φωτισμός, illuminatio, sacramentum illuminationis, lux mentis, etc. These, together with other terms for baptism and its effects, as χρίσμα, unctio, σφραγίς, sigillum, indulgentia, absolutio, gratia, mors peccatorum, etc., clearly indicate the high worth placed upon baptism by the Christian fathers, as well as their opinion of its magical effects.

The post-Nicene fathers, no less than their predecessors, are positive in their opinions relative to the necessity of baptism to salvation, and to its power to regenerate the subject. Separate treatises upon its nature, efficacy, and necessity were prepared by Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, and Augustine. It occupies a prominent place in the theology of Augustine, who attempts to harmonize it with his peculiar views of original sin and the enslavement of the human will. With other prominent fathers, he plainly teaches the necessity of baptism to salvation; consequently, that all the unbaptized are lost, including young children.⁶ He also regards baptism as a sacrament of regeneration, through which forgiveness of sin is attained, and as the channel for the communication of efficient and coöperating grace. Yet with most of these great theologians the exercise of faith is regarded as the necessary condition of the efficient operation of the sacrament. In opposition to Cyprian and some of the Eastern fathers, Augustine

¹ Dialog. c. Tryp.

² de Bapt., c. 1.

³ Orat. 40, de Bap.

⁴ Augustine, Basil, Greg. Nazianzen, and others.

⁵ Just. Mar.: Apol., 2; Clem. Alex.: Pædag., i, 6; Greg. Naz.: Orat. 40, de Bap.; Chrys.: Hom. 13, in Heb.

⁶ v. Ep. 186, c. 27; and de Nupt. et Concup., i, c. 28.

recognised the validity of heretical baptism.¹ This remained the prevalent view during the period which we are to examine.

§ 2. Subjects of Baptism.

The command of Christ in the great commission (Matt. xxvii, 19, 20; Mark xv, 15, 16) had reference to an indispensable ordinance—baptism. This is generally accepted. The discipling of all men implied a missionary activity and missionary modes, used originally in behalf of such as could comprehend the conditions of the Gospel message. Thus the first converts, whose first subjects names and the circumstances of whose baptism are re-adults. corded in the Scriptures, were of adult age. That infants and young children were baptized during the apostolic age is nowhere positively affirmed in the New Testament. The mention of the baptism of entire households furnishes a strong pre-Presumptions. sumptive argument, but is not decisive. So the relation of circumcision to Christian baptism, the universality of the benefits of Christ's kingdom, the recognition of young children as objects of his special favour, the comprehensiveness of the apostolic commission, and various other considerations, are, to many, proofs that the children of Christian believers were regarded by the apostolic Church as fit subjects for baptism. But these, in the absence of clear, unequivocal Scripture statement, cannot produce universal conviction. "Christ left no command about it; it was No command. one of those many things his Church was to learn in her gradual development through the Paraclete whom he had given."²

The apostolic fathers contain no positive information relative to the practice of the Church of their time respecting infant baptism. The most explicit state-Apostolic fathers silent about infant
baptism. ment is found in Justin Martyr, who says: "There are among the Christians of this day many of both sexes, sixty and Justin's statement. seventy years old, who have been made disciples of Christ from their infancy."³ Here nothing is said of baptism; it is only inferred. Nor does Irenæus positively affirm the practice of infant baptism in his day. In common with the Christian writers⁴ of the second century, he connects the necessity of bap-Irenæus's view. tism with the taint of human nature. He argues the universal guilt of sin and the need of a universal Saviour. Christ is

¹ de Baptismo contra Donat., l. vii.

² Döllinger: The First Age of the Church, vol. ii, p. 163.

³ Apol., i, 15.

⁴ v. Clem. Rom.: Ep. i, ad Cor., n. 17. Hermas: Pastor, lib. 3, simil. 9. Just. Mar.: Dial. cum Tryph., c. 43.

the Saviour who came to save all¹ who are regenerated by God. But this regeneration ordinarily comes through baptism. He thus implies that baptism was administered to infants.² So also with Tertullian. While no positive assertion is made by the African presbyter that the Church practised infant baptism, the entire force of his argument presupposes such practice.³ For if he labours to show that the rite should be postponed to adult age, it is evident that the custom of the baptism of young children was prevalent. Moreover, in his opposition he does not cite apostolic custom against infant baptism, which is almost inconceivable if the apostolic Church had been averse to it. Thus, while no positive statement relative to infant baptism is met in the Scriptures, or in the writings of any fathers earlier than Irenæus and Tertullian, by the end of the second century mention is made of the baptism of children, and in the third, of infants. But even in the fourth the practice of infant baptism is not general, since eminent fathers, whose parents were Christians, did not receive baptism till adult age. It was then generally based upon the teaching of Christ (Matt. xix, 14). That during the third century the children of Christian parents were frequently baptized is established by much unquestioned testimony. Origen is especially clear in his statement of the prevailing practice, and insists that the Church inherited it from the apostles themselves.⁴ From the middle of the third century the custom of the Church is attested by the unequivocal testi-

¹ Adver. Hæres., l. ii, c. 22.

² v. Adver. Hæres., lib. ii, cc. 22, 39. v. Powers: Irenæus and Infant Baptism, in the Am. Pres. and Theol. Review, 1857, pp. 239-267. This writer examines the teachings of Irenæus with much thoroughness, and concludes that wherever he uses the expression "regeneration by God," he means baptism. This was also the opinion of the earlier defenders of infant baptism. v. Wall: Hist. of Infant Baptism, Oxford, 1872, vol. i, pp. 44, seq.

³ de Bapt., c. 18. v. Höfling: Das Sacrament der Taufe, Erlangen, 1846, Bd. i, ss. 104, seq.

⁴ "The introduction of the practice of paedobaptism into the Church is hidden in Harnack's obscurity. If it owes its origin to the indispensableness of the same statement to salvation, this is an argument that the superstitious view of baptism had become greatly strengthened. At the time of Irenæus (ii, 22, 4) and Tertullian (de Bapt., 18) it was already widely practised, being defended from the command of Christ (Matt. xix, 14). We have no witness for this practice from an earlier date. Tertullian opposed it on the ground that a conscious faith was the necessary condition of receiving the rite, but more especially because of its tremendous import. . . . In the course of the third century the custom was prevalent to baptize the children of Christian families." Harnack: Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, Freiburg, 1886, Bd. i, ss. 358, 359.

⁵ v. in Luc., Hom. 14, t. 2; and in Rom., l. 5, c. 6, v. 9.

mony of competent witnesses; it is made the subject of conciliary action,¹ and is defended by most orthodox writers against the contrary teachings of some heretical sects. While the opinions of the Christian teachers of the third and fourth centuries varied with regard to the expediency of baptizing infants in case of no impending danger, they were in accord on the question of its rightfulness and lawfulness when threatened with death. Gregory Nazianzen thought it advisable, if in good health, to defer the baptism of children until they were about three years old; he was, however, positive in maintaining the right and duty of the baptism of infants in case of danger of death.² The inscriptions which contain distinct dogmatic teaching have already been found to be few. Yet a number have been preserved which confirm the recorded testimony, already referred to, as to the relation of children to baptism and church membership. Children of tender age are spoken of as having been baptized, and as faithful members of Christ's Church.³ The practice of infant baptism was usually limited to the case of children born of Christian parents; nevertheless, the early Church was generally liberal in the treatment of children when one parent was a Christian, or when they had been born while the parents were under ban of excommunication, or when the religious status of the parents was not known. In all these cases the children were held to be fit subjects of baptism.⁴ From the fourth century the propriety of the baptism of infants was unquestioned, and the practice was not unusual; nevertheless, adult baptism was the more common practice for the first six centuries.⁵

Infant baptism common in the third century.

Postponed to the third year.

Liberal practice of the Church.

Baptism of adults more common in the fourth century.

§ 8. Catechumenical Training of Adults for Baptism and Admission to the Church.

During the warmth of zeal in the apostolic Church, professed believers in Jesus and his resurrection were almost immediately

¹ v. Cyprian, Ep. 59 and 64, where the bishop, Fidus, had inquired whether infants could be baptized before they were eight days old. The Council of Carthage, A. D. 252, decided that infants could be baptized even earlier than the eighth day.

² v. Orat. 40, de Baptismo.

³ The following is an example: ΠΙCΤΟC ΕΚ ΠΙCΤΩΝ ΖΩCΙΜΟC ΕΝΘΑΔΕ ΚΕΙΜΕ ΖΗCΑC· ΕΤΕCΙΝ Β· ΜΗ· Α· ΗΜΕ· ΚΕ. "Faithful, of the faithful, I, Zosimus, lie here, having lived two years one month and twenty five days."

⁴ v. Bingham: Op. cit., bk. x, secs. 15-19, and authorities there given.

⁵ "Baptism of infants is allowed no less by present custom than by the ancient canons" (of the Coptic Church). v. Butler: Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt, vol. ii, p. 162.

admitted to baptism. This is evident from the history of Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii, 30-40), Cornelius (Acts x, 47, 48), Lydia (Acts xvi, 14, 15), and the Philippian jailer (Acts xvi, 32, 33). It seems to have been the method of John Baptist in his ministry (Matt. iii, 5, 6; John iii, 23, et al.); nevertheless, even his baptism was conditioned on repentance and reformation of life (Matt. iii, 7-10; Luke iii, 7-10). So also in the later history of the Church, during the attempts to Christianize the pagan peoples, whole tribes were sometimes baptized almost immediately, at their own request or that of their chiefs.¹ But from the second century the general practice of the Church was essentially modified, especially in the case of converts from heathenism. In order to preserve the purity of the Church and save it from scandal, Special training necessary in the case of Gentile converts.

Baptism immediate on profession of faith.

it was believed necessary to use greater caution in receiving members, and by a course of careful preliminary training to become assured of their sincerity, and of their acceptance of the Christian doctrine; thus men were appointed to the special duty of preparing candidates for baptism. The nature and duration of the instruction varied with circumstances, from a few days to two or three years. It is believed that this had chief reference to persons of Gentile origin.

The gradual admission of the candidate to the Church services, his instruction in the exoteric doctrines of Christianity, and his advancement through successive stages of discipline, were regarded as preparatory to his initiation into the mysteries of the society.² Baptism was this initiatory rite; and to reveal its process and effects to those who were still in catechumenical training was regarded a deep impiety.

§ 4. The Ministrants.

It is certain that the words of Christ's last commission were more especially addressed to the eleven apostles. But that the rite of baptism was performed by others than the apostles.

The right to baptize not confined to the apostles.

twelve and Paul is plain from the example of Philip, one of the first deacons (Acts viii, 12, 38). Nevertheless, during the second century, when the episcopal authority had come to be widely recognised, baptism was regarded as an especial function of the bishop.

A function of the bishop. The presbyters and deacons performed the rite, but with express permission of the bishop.

¹ n. Socrates: Eccles. Hist., bk. vii, c. xxx, where the baptism of the Burgundians is described as taking place on the eighth day, after a fast and instruction of seven days. This was early in the fifth century.

² It is easy to trace parallelisms between the practice of the Christian Church and that of the contemporary social, political, and religious clubs.

The duty pertained to the episcopal office, and could be discharged by the bishop and by those only to whom his right was delegated. This was the theory prevalent in the orthodox churches, both East and West, during the first six centuries. However, in cases of extreme necessity, not only presbyters and deacons, but also laymen and even heretics,¹ performed the rite, and such baptism was regarded valid by most ecclesiastical authorities. It was so recognised on account of the prevalent view that baptism was necessary to admission to the Church and to salvation. The service of an irregular administrator was justified only on the ground of extreme exigency, as in the case of impending death or the compelled absence of the bishop.²

In cases of extreme necessity others could administer the rite.

§ 5. The Mode of Baptism.

In the various instances of baptism mentioned in the New Testament, the mode of its administration is in no case described. It is manifest, however, that Christ, in so far as possible, made use of ordinances and methods with which the men of his time were already familiar. The genuine spirit of the old religion was not to be superseded by that of the new, since it was essentially the same under both, but it was to be revived, quickened, and perfected. When, therefore, in the great commission to his apostles Christ used the words "disciple," or "make disciples," μαθητεύσατε, these conveyed no new notion; but one with which they were entirely familiar. The great rabbis of the rival sects were ever zealous to make disciples, μαθηταί, and the thought of gaining adherents to the doctrines of their own Master and Lord was consonant with the feelings of the apostles, and in harmony with prevalent methods. So also with baptism. The command to baptize, βαπτίζεν, βαπτίσαντες, was well understood. No explanation was added; no description of some strange ceremony followed; the notion was clear; the method of obeying the command, manifest. What was at hand and well known was used; the mode of the administration was that which was then extant among the Jewish people, of which Christ, the Master, and Christ made use of known modes.

Analogy.

¹ The validity of baptism, when performed by heretics or schismatics, was stoutly opposed by Cyprian in his conflict with Novatian. In case of heretics and schismatics as ministrants he denied that there was any real baptism, since no one outside the Holy Catholic Church had the character requisite to make the baptism effective to the washing away of sins, even though their professed faith and all the formulas used were in exact harmony with those of the Church. This arose from his extreme theory of the unity of the Church. v. Ep. ad Magnum.

² For authorities v. bk. ii, chap. iv, where the growth of the episcopate is traced.

the apostles, the disciples, were a part. That the rite was to have a deeper significance to those who accepted it is manifest. The rite had a deeper import. This was only in accordance with a law holding in the entire cycle of art and philosophy, as well as religion. It was to be no mere washing by water, but a purification by the Holy Ghost and by fire. The decision of the Council at Jerusalem (Acts xv, 29), whereby the obligation of circumcision was no longer imposed upon the Gentile converts, substituted a pleasant for a painful initiatory rite, and gave to baptism a foremost place, rather than a secondary, as under the Jewish economy; but there is not the slightest evidence that, during the apostolic period, the mere mode of administration underwent any change. The customary mode was used by the apostles in the baptism of the first converts. Immersion the usual mode among the Jews. They were familiar with the baptism of John's disciples and of the Jewish proselytes. This was ordinarily by dipping or immersion. This is indicated not only by the general signification of the words used in describing the rite, but the earliest testimony of the documents which have been preserved gives preference to this mode.¹ While, however, the mode of the Jewish proselyte baptism is generally accepted, the date of its institution is still in question. A large class of scholars look upon it as of immemorial antiquity, while others find little evidence that Jewish proselyte baptism was practised before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, after the possibility of special offerings in the temple had ceased. The chronology is difficult, but the opinion² that proselyte baptism among the Jews, as an independent rite of initiation, could not have been introduced earlier than the end of the first century is entitled to much respect. But that it was before practised as a token of purification, if not as an initiatory rite, is fully established.³

It is manifest that the administration by the apostles involved little delay. The cases of baptism recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, both in the earlier and later sections, indicate that the rite was administered to the converts near the time and place of their acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah. No evidence, however, is furnished from the record that Peter himself baptized the three thousand believers on the day of Pentecost. This may have been done by different apostles, at different places, by different modes, during the entire day,¹ or on subsequent days.² The terms of Scripture describing the rite, most of the figures used by the writers of the New Testament to indicate its significance (Rom. vi, 4; Col. ii, 12, et al.), ^{Immersion the more usual mode.} the explanations in the Apostolic Constitutions,³ the comments of the foremost Christian fathers for the first six centuries, and the express instructions of ecclesiastical councils indicate that immersion was the more usual mode of baptism.⁴

¹ v. Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, chap. vii.

² n. Leyrer: article "Proselyten," in Herzog's Cyclopædia, 2te Ausg. Plumptre: Smith's Bible Dictionary, article "Proselytes," claims that the rabbis were stimulated to making baptism a foremost rite of initiation by the great success of Christianity among the Gentiles, whose only initiatory rite was baptism; but Leyrer is of the opinion that a formal borrowing of Christian usages is extremely improbable.

³ Among others v. Edersheim: Life and Times of the Messiah. Schürer: History of the Jewish People, vol. ii, pp. 319-324.

Nevertheless, it is difficult to reconcile the peculiar circumstances of the baptism of certain persons with ready and available means for their immediate immersion, as in the case of Paul (Acts ix, 18), the Philippian jailer (Acts xvi, 33), and others. These facts make it highly probable that a degree of liberty was allowed in the mode of administration, so that in case of exigency ^{A measure of liberty permitted.} aspersion was practiced. This antecedent probability has now been changed to well-nigh absolute certainty by the testimony of "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles." This invaluable document, which belongs to the first quarter of the second century,⁵ supplies a long-missing link in the chain of evidence between the close of the apostolic age and Justin Martyr, "The Teaching respecting the rites, polity, and life of the Church. It ^{of the Twelve.}" also furnishes valuable aid in understanding some obscure points in the writings of Clement, Polycarp, Barnabas, and Ignatius. This writing is believed to have originated in either Syria or Egypt, and to have been prepared as a sort of Church manual, as well as a catechism, for Jewish catechumens.⁶ In connection with valuable teaching respecting Christian life, it speaks of the appropriate

¹ Zöckler: Apostelgeschichte, Nördlingen, 1886, s. 164

² Döllinger: Op. cit., vol. ii, p. 160. "It is not said that the 3,000 converts of Pentecost were all baptized the same day, but only that on that day were added 3 000 souls (Acts ii, 41)."

³ Cons. Apost., lib. 3, c. 17.

⁴ v. Tertullian: de Bapt., c. 2. Chrysostom: Hom. 40, on 1 Cor.; Hom. 25, on John iii, 5. Cyril: Catech., 17, 8. Ambrosius: de Sacram., l. 2, c. 6. Coun. Toledo: 4, can. 6, and many other testimonies.

⁵ Sabatier: La Didaché, Paris, 1885, places the composition after A. D. 50. Bryennios, Harnack, and others place it between A. D. 120 and A. D. 165. Lechler, Funk, Zahn, and others are inclined to regard it as a production of the first century. The English and American critics also generally place it in the first century.

⁶ Lechler holds that this is true only of the second part. Funk: Doctrina Duodecem Apostolorum, Tübingæ, 1887, "denies the Egyptian and maintains the Syrian or Palestinian origin."—Schaff.

preparation for baptism, and its mode of administration, as follows:

"Now concerning baptism, thus baptize ye: having first uttered its baptismal all these things, baptize into the name of the Father, teaching. and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, in living water (ἐν ὕδατι ζῶντι).¹ But if thou hast not running water, baptize into other water (εἰς ἄλλο ὕδωρ), and if thou canst not in cold, in warm.
 And if thou hast neither, pour out water upon the head thrice, into the name of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. And before the baptism let the baptizer fast and the baptized, and whatever others are able;
 but the baptized thou shalt command to fast for one or two days before."²

This document, only a generation removed from the death of the apostles, if not written during the lifetime of some, plainly teaches a degree of liberty in the mode of the administration of baptism.
 The character of the writing, as a book for catechumens of Jewish Conclusion. origin, would certainly exclude the supposition that this alternative mode of baptism was of the nature of an innovation; besides, it is easy to believe that at the time of its writing there were still living in Syria or Egypt persons who were entirely familiar with the apostolic practice. The testimony of the Monumental monuments is in entire harmony with the "Teaching."

 testimony.

The chronology of the earliest frescos has been elsewhere examined.³
 Among the very earliest frescos is that found on the wall in the Fresco from crypt of Santa Lucina, in the catacomb of San Calisto, Santa Lucina. Rome (Fig. 126).⁴ The lower central fresco has almost without exception been regarded as a representation of the close of the baptism of Christ as described in Matt. iii, 16. A nude male Baptism of figure is stepping from the water, which reaches a little Christ. above the knees. A man clad in a tunic is standing on the shore and extending his hand in helpfulness toward the one

¹ Bryennios remarks that ὕδωρ ζῶν is not exclusively running water, but that which is brought fresh from rivers and springs, where in earliest times the Christians were wont to baptize.

² Περὶ δὲ τοῦ βαπτίσματος οὕτω βαπτίσατε ταῦτα πάντα προεπιόντες, βαπτίσατε εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος ἐν ὕδατι ζῶντι. Ἐὰν δὲ μὴ ἔχῃς ὕδωρ ζῶν, εἰς ἄλλο ὕδωρ βάπτισον· εἰ δ' οὐ δύνασαι ἐν ψυχρῷ, ἐν θερμῷ. Ἐὰν δὲ ἀμφότερα μὴ ἔχῃς, ἔκχεον εἰς τὴν κεφαλὴν τρίς ὕδωρ εἰς ὄνομα Πατρὸς καὶ Υἱοῦ καὶ ἁγίου Πνεύματος. Πρὸ δὲ τοῦ βαπτίσματος προνηστευσάτω ὁ βαπτίζων καὶ ὁ βαπτιζόμενος καὶ εἰ τινας ἄλλοι δύνανται· νελεύσεις δὲ νηστεῦσαι τὸν βαπτιζόμενον πρὸ μιᾶς ἢ δύο.—Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, chap. vii.

³ v. pp. 29, 30, 97, 98.

⁴ It is impossible to represent in photograph the color effects in the fresco. They are pronounced in the original, showing by the green the water boundary line who has received baptism. Above is the dove, bearing in its beak what seems to be an olive branch, symbolizing the Holy Ghost, who attests the act. There is no suggestion of an immersion, but rather of aspersion by the ministrant, who stands upon the shore.¹ Other interpretations of this scene, as that it is the rescue of Peter from the waves,² or the saving of the hunted, persecuted saints from the waters of affliction,³ seem to harmonize only a portion of the elements of the fresco. The interpretation as the baptism has generally been accepted by the best archæologists.

Fig. 126.—Fresco from Santa Lucina, Rome. Baptism of Christ.

Fig. 127 is the representation of a fresco from another cubiculum of the crypt of Santa Lucina.⁴ It is the same age as Fig. 126, and the subject is evidently the same. The attitude of the figures in the two frescos is very similar. The symbolic dove has here the same significance as in the other. The figure leaving the water is partially draped, while in Fig. 126 it is nude. The ministrant is represented with the added pallium, instead of the simple tunic, as in Fig. 126. The subject of the Other interpretations not tenable.

The interpretation.

¹ v. de Rossi: Rom. Sotter. t. i, lib. 3. c. 3. Schnlze: Die Katakomben, ss. 313, 314. Roller: Les Catacombes de Rome, Tom. i, p. 97. Kraus: Real-Encyclopædie, Freiburg, 1886, art. "Taufe."

² Martigny: Dict., art. "Pierre."

³ Garrucci: Storia, etc., i, Teorica, 203.

⁴ The construction, history, chronology, and frescos of this crypt have been studied with great thoroughness by the brothers de Rossi, and admirably described in their monumental work, Rom. Sotter.

fresco can hardly be questioned.' The scene can only by an unwarrantable stretch of the imagination be regarded as the last stage of an immersion. The simpler and more obvious act is that of an aspersion, since there is no suggestion whatever that the ministrant has before been standing in the water.

Fig. 127.—A baptism of Christ. From the crypt of Santa Lucina, Rome.

Fig. 128 is the representation of a fresco from the cemetery of San Pretestato, Rome. This is believed by the highest authorities to belong to the second century. The three figures have been interpreted differently. Those who see in it a baptism of Christ regard the sprays around the head of the right hand figure as representing the water used in sprinkling; John and the other figure as representative of the people, standing on the bank of the river. The presence of the dove seems also to suggest a baptismal scene.¹ Garrucci also regards the green band around the head of the Saviour as analogous to that in Fig. 126. De Rossi and others look upon the picture as representing the crowning of Christ with thorns.² Against this view Garrucci strongly urges the fact of the general absence Supposed baptism from San Pretestato.

Suggests baptism by sprinkling.

¹ v. Roller: Op. cit., Tom. i, pp. 95, seq., pl. xvii.

² v. Perret: t. i, pl. lxxx. Garrucci: Op. cit., i, p. 368; ii, 46; Op. cit., t. i, pp. 101, seq., pl. xviii.

³ v. Bull. Arch. crist., 1872. Also Strzygowski: Iconographie der Taufe Christi, München, 1885, Taf. i, un. 4, 5.

of representations of Christ's sufferings and passion in early Christian art, as well as the presence in the fresco of the water and the dove. The subject of this early fresco is regarded as questionable; its evidential value is not, therefore, of the first order.

Fig. 128.—Supposed baptism. Fresco from San Pretestato, Rome.

Competent authorities have referred the fresco (Fig. 129) to the latter part of the second, or early part of the third century. It is part of the decorations in one of the "cham-

Baptism from San Calisto.

Fig. 129.—A baptism. From San Calisto, Rome.

bers of the sacraments," in the catacomb of San Calisto. A boy, standing in water reaching a little more than half way to the knees, is receiving baptism from a man who is standing upon the shore. The water is broken into spray, indicating a pouring or sprinkling.¹

Fig. 130 is from a fresco found in another of the chambers of the same catacomb, and is plainly contemporary with Fig. 129.

The position of the figures is quite similar. In Fig. 130 the boy stands in water hardly more than ankle deep, while the ministrant, clad in the toga and bearing in his hand a roll, the usual sign of authoritative teaching, stands upon the shore, and places his hand upon the head of the candidate in the act of baptism.

Fig. 130.—A baptism. From San Calisto, Rome.

Respecting the age of Figs. 126, 127, 128, 129, and 130 there is scarcely any diversity of opinion among competent authorities. All are certainly of pre-Constantine origin.

Figs. 126, 127, 129, and 130 reaching back, in all probability, to the second century. As to the interpretation of Nos. 126, 127, 129, and 130, very general agreement is found among the best archæologists. They are baptismal scenes.

In the post-Constantine period more frequent representations of ¹ It is to be regretted that the plate does not reproduce these sprays, which are very manifest in the fresco. v. de Rossi: Rom. Sotter., T. ii, p. 333. Roller: Les Catacombes de Rome, T. i, p. 131.

the baptismal rite are preserved, and they are wrought out in much greater detail. The erection of distinct baptisteries gave occasion for their ornamentation with frescos and mosaics, some of which were elaborate and beautiful. Also the rite is found depicted on the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (v. Plate II) in symbolic form (v. Plate II^a), where the baptismal waters are represented as flowing from the uplifted foot of one lamb upon the head of another, while rays stream down from the beak of the symbolic dove.¹

Post-Constantine portraits more full.

On sarcophagus of Junius Bassus.

A fragment of a glass cup, found on the Esquiline, Rome, in 1876, also contains the representation of a baptism.² It probably belongs to the beginning of the fifth century. Fig. 131 is two thirds the size of the original. The scene is an interesting one. A young girl, Alba (possibly Albana), is the Baptism by aspersion on glass cup.

Fig. 131.—Fragment of a glass cup, Rome. A baptism.

central figure. She is clad in the white robe usually worn on the day of baptism. The priest, Mirax, whose head is encircled by the simple nimbus, extends the hand in the manner of address, while the hand of a person not represented on the fragment, probably the sponsor, is laid upon the head of the candidate. The chief significance of the scene for our purpose is in the water flowing from an inverted urn, and the descent of the dove, bearing in its beak the olive branch. The representation of baptism by aspersion is evident.

Explanation.

¹ v. Plate II^a, in the spandrel between "Daniel in the den of lions" and "Christ's triumphal entry."

² v. de Rossi: Bull. Arch. Crist., 1876, Fasc. i, T. i. Garrucci: Storia, etc., T. cccclxiv.

Several mosaics and frescos of a somewhat later date represent the baptism of Christ in an almost purely realistic manner, and generally the manifest mode is aspersion. One of the best preserved and most interesting is found in San Giovanni in fonte, Ravenna (Fig. 132).¹ The mosaics were originally executed A. D. 449-452. While they have probably suffered restoration in certain parts, there is no evidence that the original design has been departed from. The baptismal scene is found in the crown of the dome. Christ stands in the Jordan, whose waters reach to about the middle of the body, while John, standing on the land, and holding in his left hand a jewelled cross, is pouring water upon the head of Christ from a shell held in the Baptist's right hand. The symbolic dove, descending directly upon the head of Jesus, completes the baptismal representation. The Jordan, IORD, symbolized by a river-god bearing a reed, introduces into the scene a heathen element.

Fig. 132.—Baptism of Christ. Mosaic from San Giovanni in fonte, Ravenna.

¹ v. Quast: Die alt-christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna, Berlin, 1842, ss. 4, 5, and Taf. i. Richter: Mosaiken von Ravenna, Wien, 1878. Garrucci: Op. cit., Tom. iv, tav. ccxxvi and ccxxvii, pp. 34-36.

A very similar mosaic representation, from about the middle of the sixth century, is preserved in Santa Maria in Cos- Another mosaic-medin, Ravenna (Fig. 133). The appearance of Christ is is more youthful, the river-god symbolizing the Jordan is more striking, and the rough garment of camel's hair worn by the Baptist is clearly shown.

Fig. 133.—Baptism of Christ. Mosaic from Santa Maria in Cosmedin, Ravenna.

Fig. 134.—A baptism. From a fresco in Santa Pudenziana, Rome.

Fig. 134 is from a picture found in Santa Pudenziana, Rome. Here the complete act of baptism is depicted. The font, too small for immersion, contains two nude figures, upon the head of one of whom the ministrant lays the hand. Behind him is the sponsor, while on the other side of the font are attendants bearing appropriate garments for covering the candidates at the close of the ceremony. The suggestion here is certainly that of sprinkling or pouring.

The fresco, Fig. 135, is from the cemetery of San Ponziano, Rome; it is from the eighth or ninth century.¹ Here the baptismal scene is repeated as to mode, and very similar in spirit to the mosaics of the fifth and sixth centuries, already described. Christ here stands in water reaching about to the waist. The Baptist, clad in his rough garment of camel's hair, places the right hand on the head of Jesus in the performance of the rite, while the ratifying of the act by the Holy Spirit is here, as usual, symbolized by the descending dove. On the opposite bank, in the background, an angel, descending from the clouds, bears a basin and the clothing for the Saviour, while in the foreground the hart seeks the refreshing waters.

Fig. 135.—A baptism of Christ. From a fresco in San Ponziano, Rome.

Other representations of baptism, extending from the fourth to the tenth century, found upon a great variety of objects and in various relations, substantially agree with those already given.² It is most noteworthy that from the second to the

¹ We have given two representations of baptisms, which lie outside the period to which our examinations have been more specially confined, in order to show the persistence of the art representations of this rite as aspersion or sprinkling.

² For a complete representation and description of these v. Strzygowski: Ikonographie der Taufe Christi, München, 1885.

ninth century there is found scarcely one pictorial representation of baptism by immersion; but the suggestion is almost uniformly either of sprinkling or pouring. When we consider the fact that monumental evidence is invaluable because of its unconscious character (v. p. 21), and also when it is remembered that the testimony of the archaic document, "The Teaching of the Twelve," is a complete commentary on the art monuments, and, contrariwise, that the monuments are a continuous illustration of the doctrines of the "Teaching," we are compelled to believe that while immersion was the usual mode of administering baptism from the first to the twelfth century, there was very early a large measure of Christian liberty allowed in the Church, by which the mode of baptism could be readily adjusted to the peculiar circumstances. To this conclusion we are led by the combined testimony of the "Teaching," of the decisions of the Church fathers and the councils, and of the uniform art representations.¹

Liberty of mode.

That baptism by sprinkling or aspersion was practised in case of the sick and the infirm is generally conceded. This seems to be a further indication of a degree of freedom in the mode.

This clinical baptism was not regarded with favor by a large portion of the Church; in some instances its validity was seriously questioned. Yet the high-church Cyprian, by whom the preservation of the unity of the Church and of apostolic traditions was regarded of utmost importance, clearly decided in a test case for the validity of clinic baptism: "I think the divine benefits can in no respect be mutilated and weakened; nor can any thing less occur in that case, where, with full and entire faith both of the giver and receiver, is accepted what is drawn from the divine gifts. For in the sacraments of salvation the contagion of sins is not in such wise washed away, as the filth of the skin and of the body is washed away in the carnal and ordinary," etc. . . . "In the sacraments of salvation, when necessity compels, and God bestows his mercy, the divine methods confer the whole benefit on believers; nor ought it to trouble any one that sick people seem to be sprinkled or affused, when they obtain the Lord's grace," etc. . . . "Whence it appears that the sprinkling also of water prevails equally with the washing of salvation," etc.²

Clinic baptism.

Cyprian's opinion.

¹ The argument from monumental evidence was presented by the author of this hand-book in a series of lectures on "Monumental Theology," given before the School of Theology of Boston University in the winter of 1870-71. For a very able and interesting statement of the bearing of the argument upon the question of Christian union and missionary effort, v. Prof. Egbert C. Smyth, in Andover Review April and May, 1884.

² Ep. 75 (79) ad Magnum, c. 12. v. also cc. 13-17.

From the question of Magnus, as well as from the answer of Cyprian, it is plain that clinic baptism was not generally regarded with favor by the Church of the first three centuries. Nevertheless, the opposition to it did not appear to come so much from a disbelief in the efficacy of the mode itself as from the doubt entertained with respect to the soundness of the faith of the recipient, since the delay of baptism till the time of infirmity or of threatened death seemed to imply a contempt for the ordinance and a neglect of the duties which its acceptance imposed. For Cyprian clearly affirms that the mode is of little importance, provided the faith of the recipient and of the ministrant is genuine.¹ This, and not the simple mode, is the reason why the person receiving clinical baptism was generally ineligible to the clerical office. The suspicion of dishonesty and the disqualification could be removed only by an unwonted proof of zeal and devotion.²

This liberty respecting the mode of administration becomes more manifest as missionary enterprise planted churches in regions remote from the countries immediately adjacent to the Mediterranean, where the rigors of the climate made trine immersion at times perilous or impracticable. Hence baptism by aspersion is made alternative with trine immersion in the earliest extant Irish baptismal office.³ While the Greek Church adhered to trine immersion with great tenacity, and to-day practises this mode in all its chief churches, the Coptic and Armenian Churches have recognised the validity of trine aspersion from the earliest period of their history.⁴ The Syriac churches of the seventh century also admitted the propriety of infant baptism and the validity of aspersion.⁵

§ 6. Times and Places of Baptism.

In the apostolic Church the time and place of baptism were matters of indifference. In accordance with the general methods of missionary propagandism, the circumstances and the proprieties of the various occasions determined. As elsewhere stated, the time seems to have been almost immediately on the profession of faith in Jesus as the Messiah. This liberty con-

¹ Ep. ad Magnum, cc. 11, 12, 13.

² This is seen in the decisions of the Council of Neo-Cæsarea, Can. 12.

³ Warren: The Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church, Oxford, 1881, p. 65.

⁴ v. Butler: Op. cit., vol. ii, p. 264, 265.

⁵ v. Kayser: Die Canones Jacob von Edessa, Leipzig, 1887, Question and Answer 31. v. Presbyterian Review, January, 1888, pp. 150, 151.

tinued into the second century,¹ and was, indeed, never wholly lost.²

The opinion entertained by many early Christian fathers relative to the magical power of the water in baptism, as well as the doctrine that baptism purged away the sins of the past, but did not avail for future offences, caused many to delay their baptism as long as possible. In case of great offenders this was sometimes done upon the advice of the Church. But this delay was often the occasion of administering severe rebukes to those who were influenced by selfish considerations to continue in sin, or neglected the ordinance through carelessness or indifference.

There was no fixed and unalterable time for performing the rite. In cases of peril neither place, time, mode, nor ministrant was absolutely prescribed; the general belief that baptism was essential to salvation allowed nothing to prevent its administration. Nevertheless, the Church was accustomed to appoint stated times when baptism would be administered to those who had been prepared by careful preliminary instruction. The times considered most appropriate and sacred were Easter, Pentecost, and Epiphany. From the second century these were observed as fit seasons by the Eastern and Western as well as the Coptic churches.³ At a later period, when the martyrs became objects of peculiar veneration, and the anniversaries of their martyrdom were observed with special care, these were favourite times for the administration of baptism.

Nevertheless, these seasons were not absolutely obligatory, since Tertullian says, "Every day is the Lord's day; every hour and every time is appropriate for baptism, if men are fit and prepared for it. All places, too, are equally available."⁴

In accordance with this principle of freedom baptism was sometimes administered in private houses, and doubtless, in times of persecution, the chapels in the catacombs of Rome were likewise used for this purpose. The monumental evidence of this practice is entirely conclusive. The private

¹ v. The Teaching of the Twelve, chap. vii.

² Baptism in a private house was first inhibited by conciliary action in the sixth century. v. Hefele: Conciliengeschichte, Bd. ii, s. 698.

³ Numerous passages in the writings of Tertullian, Gregory Nazianzen, Jerome, Chrysostom, etc., as well as the "Constitutions" and conciliary canons, attest this practice. Tertullian: de Coron. Milit., c. 3, says that the whole fifty days between Easter and Pentecost were kept as a continuous festival, during which baptisms were more frequent. v. Butler: The Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt, Oxford, 1884. "From the remotest antiquity to the present day the season most commended for baptism is the feast of Epiphany." Vol. ii, pp. 262, 263.

⁴ de Bapt., c. 4.

oratory, discovered in the vicinity of the baths of Diocletian,¹ whose walls were decorated with the symbols of baptism, was probably used to baptize the members of the household. Likewise there are several instances of chapels and fonts in the catacombs.

After the recognition of Christianity by the state, baptism, like other Church sacraments, was celebrated with greater pomp and ceremony. Separate buildings (baptisteries) were erected, in which conveniences were provided for the observance of a more carefully prescribed ritual. They constitute an interesting class of architectural forms which have survived from the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, and furnish valuable suggestions relative to the state of art during this period (v. pp. 222–224). Their arrangement, the position and relation of the font, the frescos and mosaics, give hints respecting the rite of baptism, and the importance attaching to the accompanying ceremonies. These baptisteries, οἶκοι τοῦ βαπτιστηρίου, were sometimes of considerable dimensions, to accommodate the thousands seeking baptism on the great feast days in the cathedral churches of the large towns, and were occasionally used as the places of assembly of the councils. They belong to the regular central style of architecture, having their outline circular or polygonal.

Fig. 136.—A baptistery. From a sarcophagus, Rome.

Fig. 136 is from the representation of a baptistery sculptured on a sarcophagus at Rome.² It is circular in outline, covered with a flat dome, surmounted by the favourite Constantinian monogram, $\chi\rho$.

Fig. 137 is the groundplan of a baptistery at Deir-Seta in Central Syria, described by de Vogüé.³ It is hexagonal, the central dome resting upon six columns which surround the font itself. This was the usual form of the baptisteries in the Orient.

Fig. 137.—Groundplan of a baptistery at Deir-Seta, Central Syria.

¹ v. Bullettino di Arch. crist., 1876.

² de Vogüé: Syrie Centrale, pl. cxvii.

³ Garrucci: Storia, etc., t. cccxxiii.

Fig. 138 is a vertical section of the noted baptistery of St. John in Lateran, Rome. Only the central portion, which is covered by the dome, is here given, in order to show the position of the font and to illustrate the rich and suggestive mosaic decoration which is frequently found in this class of buildings. The central mosaic of the first zone represents a baptismal scene, in which the same mode of administration is suggested as in the monuments which have already been described (v. pp. 404-406).

Fig. 138.—Vertical section of the central portion of the baptistery of San Giovanni in Lateran, Rome.

Fig. 139 is a vertical section of the baptistery of Albegna,¹ Italy.

¹ v. Dehio u. Bezold: Op. cit., taf. 3, Figs. 5, 6.

It is probably of the seventh or eighth century. It gives the arrangement of the steps leading to the font, and of the chapels which are contained in the space covered by the lean-to roof. This and Fig. 138 are octagonal in ground-plan. Both will illustrate the manner in which adjacent parts were added to the original baptistery, until an imposing structure, convenient for purposes of assembly and worship, was the result.

Fig. 139.—Vertical section of the baptistery in Albegna, Italy.

§ 7. Immediate Preliminaries to Baptism.

Prior to the administration of the rite the candidates were required to renounce the devil and all his works, to profess faith in a prescribed creed, and to promise to live in obedience to Christ and his precepts. The form and content of the creed varied from the simple profession of faith in Jesus as the risen Messiah, to the more lengthy and imposing creeds formulated from time to time by the Church.¹ The promise of obedience to the Church was often made three times. In the turning toward the west, as the place of darkness, when solemn renunciation of Satan was made, in the turning to the east, as the source of light, when promise of obedience was enjoined, and in the triple renunciation, promise, and confession of faith, there faith required.

Profession of

Renunciation of the devil and his works.

¹ v. Const. Apostol., l. vii, c. 41.

is noticed a system of significant symbolism, which was early introduced into ecclesiastical art (v. book i, chap. iii).

As early as the latter part of the second century sponsorship was recognised as an important, if not a necessary, accompaniment of baptism. Its origin is not known. It probably Sponsors. arose out of the circumstances of peculiar peril to which the Church was exposed, whereby the children would be left in orphanage, or adults be liable to lapse into paganism. In either case the sponsors were regarded as sureties: in case of children for their care and religious training, in case of adults for their sound conversion and genuine Christian character at the time of their presentation for baptism.¹ The caution used by the early Church in the Philosophy of sponsorship. choice of sponsors clearly reveals the nature of this relation; it was that of a guarantor of the moral life of those about to be baptized. Hence, when parents were permitted to be sponsors for their children it was not because of this natural relationship, but rather that they might afford guarantees for their moral and spiritual character. In nearly all the earlier expositions of the philosophy of sponsorship there is a positive denial that regeneration of the child is effected by the faith of either the sponsor or the ministrant.² Nevertheless, it was held by Au- The faith of the sponsor not availing. gustine that the faith of the sponsors may inure to the advantage of the child, by stimulating to greater fidelity in education and watchcare;³ "the promises of the sponsors were understood to be made not in their own name, but in the name of the baptized, and that the latter became subsequently responsible."

§ 8. Accompanying Ceremonies.

Early baptism was probably by trine immersion, pouring, or sprinkling of the nude figure. The Teaching of the Twelve contains the oldest distinct precept as to trine Trine baptism of the nude figure. baptism: "But if thou hast neither, pour water upon the head thrice, into the name of the Father, and the Son, and Holy Spirit."⁴ By the close of the second century this was the common practice. "We dip not once, but three times, at the Tertullian's testimony. naming of every person of the Trinity."⁵ With this statement of Tertullian the teachings of Basil and Jerome are in exact accord. So also Ambrose is minute in his descrip- Ambrose's account. tion of the rite. "Thou wast asked, Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty? And thou repliedst, I believe, and

¹ Const. Apost., l. viii, c. 32.

² Augustine: Ep. ad Bonif., 98.

³ v. de Baptismo; c. Donatist, iv, 31; de Lib. Arbitr., iii, 23.

⁴ v. chap. vii.

⁵ Tertullian: cont. Prax., c. 26.

wast dipped, that is, buried. A second demand was made, Dost thou believe in Jesus Christ our Lord, and in his cross? Thou answeredst again, I believe, and wast dipped. Thereupon thou wast buried with Christ. For he that is buried with Christ rises again with Christ. A third time thou wast asked, Dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost? And thy answer was, I believe. Then thou wast dipped a third time, that thy triple confession might absolve thee from the various offences of thy former life."¹

Different reasons for this practice are found in the writings of the Christian fathers. Gregory of Nyssa and others, both in the Greek and Latin Church, say that it represents Christ's three days' burial, and his resurrection on the third day. Others explain it as symbolic of our faith in the Trinity, into whose name we are baptized. Augustine² unites these reasons, in that by trine immersion the Trinity is symbolized, as well as the Lord's burial, and resurrection on the third day.

Most of the Christian fathers from Tertullian taught that this method of baptism was instituted by the apostles. The "Apostolic Canons" regard it as of imperative obligation, and order the deposition of any bishop or presbyter who shall administer the rite in any other way.³ The Arians in Spain continued this practice. To protest against this heretical sect the orthodox party was led to abandon trine immersion; and the fourth Council of Toledo (A. D. 633) decreed⁴ that a single immersion should be regarded as valid baptism. It was led to this decision by the advice of Gregory the Great, who held that both ways were "just and unblamable in themselves; nevertheless, to avoid a seeming approval of the Arian heresy, it may be advisable to drop trine, and practise single immersion."⁵

As further accompaniments of baptism must be noted unction, which was performed by oil consecrated by the bishop, the imposition of hands, and the sign of the cross. The anointing of the body of the baptized person after leaving the water, called the unction of chrism, was of early institution. It is mentioned by Tertullian as usual in his day. At a later period the practice of anointing the body before baptism was introduced,⁶ and forms of consecration of the oil were prescribed. Various interpretations of the significance of these two unctions are met in the writings of the fathers. In the Constitutions is found the injunction.

¹ De Sacram., lib. 2, c. 7, as quoted by Bingham: Antiquities, etc., bk. xi, chap. xi.

² De Consecrat., Dist. 4, c. 78.

³ v. Canons 49, 50.

⁴ Can. 5.

⁵ Lib. i, Ep. 41.

⁶ v. Ambrose: De Sacramentis, l. i, c. 2. Constit. Apost., l. 7, c. 42.

tion: "Thou shalt first of all anoint him with the holy oil, and then baptize him with water, and afterward sign him with the ointment; that the anointing with the oil may be the participation of the Holy Spirit, and the water may be the symbol of death, and the signing with ointment may be the seal of the compact made with God,"¹ etc.

The imposition of hands was to symbolize the reception of the Holy Ghost. It was used in confirmation, which generally was an accompaniment of baptism, and completed the admission of the candidate to the Church and to a participation in the holy eucharist. The sign of the cross was used by the early Christians in the most common affairs of life. It was the symbol of conquering power, by which Satan and all the angels of darkness were driven out and finally subdued; its rich and varied symbolism in connection with the rite of baptism is the theme of many noble passages in early Christian literature.²

¹ Const. Apost., lib. 7, c. 22, quoted by Bingham: Op. cit., bk. xi, chap. ix, sec. 3.

² v. pp. 83-89.

CHAPTER II.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

§ 1. Idea and Mode of Celebration.

THE original eucharistic meal was symbolic. The broken bread and the consecrated cup were also prophetic of the work which Christ was to accomplish for his disciples and for the world. The real sacrifice, of which this sacrament was to be a remembrance, was yet to be accomplished; hence the supper was so far prophetic. The bread was to symbolize the broken body, and the cup the blood, which was the pledge of the covenant between God and man. Every disciple who, in after time, should worthily celebrate this supper, in obedience to the words used by Christ in its institution, was to break this bread and drink this wine in order to recall the memory of the Founder, the Great Sacrifice for the world, until he should come again.

It is probable that the celebration of the Lord's Supper by the first disciples occurred daily in private houses,¹ in connection with the agape, or lovefeast. It was of a somewhat festive character, as may be inferred from the excesses which Paul reproves in the Corinthian church,² and was associated with an ordinary meal, at whose close the bread and wine were distributed to those present, as a memorial of Christ's similar distribution to the disciples. The association of a meal with religious rites had been most familiar with the Jews during all their history, and was widely recognised by the heathen world, both in conducting their common festivities around an altar with sacrifices, and in the funeral feasts held annually in the cellæ in memory of the deceased members of the family or club.³ Nearly all the early frescos confirm this view of the social character of the Supper. A table, around which are couches on which sit or recline the participants, is the ordinary method of representing the celebration of the Lord's Supper (see ¹ Acts ii, 46. The reference of καθ' ἡμέραν is uncertain; it may include "the breaking of bread" as well as the daily visits to the temple.

² 1 Cor. xi, 20.

³ v. Renan: Les Apôtres, pp. 351-354.

Figs. 13, 14). From the accounts in the Acts of the Apostles (Acts ii, 42, 46), as well as from Paul's letter to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. xi, 20, 21), it is safely inferred that the disciples contributed each a share of the food necessary A communal meal.

for the meal; the community of love and fellowship being herein shown, as at first in the gifts to a common fund for the relief of the poor saints at Jerusalem. To this unifying power of the eucharist Paul evidently refers (1 Cor. x, 16, 17). From the account given of the practices of the Corinthian church (1 Cor. xi, 17-34), it is plain that private members appropriated to themselves the bread and wine which were designed for the common benefit, and did not wait for the distribution of the elements at the hands of a church officer. From the whole history, as given by Paul, we look in vain for any evidence that a priestly consecration and distribution of the bread and wine were regarded as necessary to the validity of the sacrament. Neither in Christ's original institution of the supper, nor in this fullest account by Paul, when, if at all, such authority would have been asserted, nor elsewhere in the New Testament, is found any evidence that the Lord's Supper was to be consecrated only by a chosen or appointed class. Its administration not confined to a class. "Consequently the limitation of its administration to the officers of the church cannot claim undoubted apostolic authority."¹ This was in accordance with other features of the Church while in its plastic period. That the distinctive functions of the officers of the apostolic period had not yet been fully differentiated is thus manifest in connection with the administration of both the great sacraments instituted by Christ.

Moreover, this lack of an official character was in perfect harmony with the idea of a universal priesthood, which was prevalent in the early years of the In harmony with the idea of the universal priesthood.

history of the Church. Each householder was the highpriest of his own family, competent to do all things necessary to their spiritual upbuilding, including the celebration of the sacred meal in memory of his Lord. But, in accordance with the unifying principle already referred to, it is probable that this sacrament was usually observed in a congregation of believers. It seems that during the early apostolic period the method of keeping the Supper How celebrated. recalled the last meeting of Christ with his disciples.

It was accompanied by prayer (Matt. xxvi, 27; Mark xiv, 22, 23; Luke xxii, 17) and singing of hymns (Matt. xxvi, 30), and was connected with a social meal, the agape, to indicate that its purpose was the expression of brotherly love. The offering of thanks and praise (εὐχαρίστια, εὐλογία, 1 Cor. xi, 24; 1 Cor. x, 16) was probably followed with the holy kiss (φίλημα ἁγιον, Rom. xvi, 16; 1 Cor. xvi, 20).

¹ v. Beet: Commentary on 1 Cor., in loco.

Under Trajan the strict edicts against secret societies compelled the separation of the agape from the Lord's Supper. The agape discontinued. The former, being adjudged by the emperor to pertain to the secret clubs, ἐταιρείαι, which had awakened the suspicion of the government by being held in the evening, was discontinued, and the Lord's Supper was connected with the public worship. The necessity for observing this sacrament in connection with the open and more public services, and the institution of the catechumenate and other forms of training and discipline,

The two parts of worship. gradually led to the division of worship into the missa catechumenorum and the missa fidelium. From the circumstance that unbaptized persons, and such as were under church discipline, as well as all others not in full communion with the Church, were excluded from the assembly before the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the idea of a mystery (μυστήριον) soon attached to this rite, and gave rise to the so called disciplina arcani. This was, however, of later institution; probably not earlier than the time of Tertullian. In the earliest notices of the Lord's Supper a simple and almost literal imitation of the meal as instituted by Christ is prevalent. In the "Teaching of the Twelve" the instructions for celebrating the eucharist are as simple and archaic as those respecting baptism. There is a marked absence of involved ritual and mystery; it is truly a eucharistic meal. "Now concerning the eucharist, thus give thanks; first concerning the cup: We

The "Teaching of the Twelve." thank thee, our Father, for the holy vine of David thy servant, which thou hast made known to us through Jesus thy servant; to thee be the glory forever. And concerning the broken bread: We thank thee, our Father, for the life and the knowledge which thou hast made known to us through Jesus thy servant; to thee be the glory forever. Just as this broken bread was scattered over the hills and having been gathered together became one, so let thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into thy kingdom; for thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ forever. But let no one eat or drink of your eucharist, except those baptized into the Lord's name; for in regard to this the Lord hath said: Give not that which is holy to the dogs."¹

After the feast (μετὰ δὲ τὸ ἐμπλησθῆναι), thanksgiving shall be offered for "the knowledge and faith and immortality" made known through Jesus, and "for spiritual food and drink and eternal life through thy servant." Also supplication for the Church, that it may be saved from evil and made perfect in love.¹

¹ Διδαχὴ τῶν δώδεκα Ἀποστόλων, chap. ix.

In Justin Martyr's account of the Lord's Supper is noticed an almost like simplicity as in the "Teaching." There is hardly a trace of a secret discipline, since this father, in his first Apology, is frank in his account of both the Christian sacraments.² Nevertheless, a change from the apostolic custom is noticed in the fact that special celebrants or officers are now recognised. "There is brought to the president of the brethren bread and a cup of wine mixed with water."³ The deacons distribute the consecrated elements, and to those who are absent they carry away a portion; none but the believers or the baptized are admitted to the meal—"to feast on the flesh and blood of that Jesus who was made flesh."⁴

In Tertullian's account there is scarcely more formality. His object in giving the statement is to refute the vile calumnies made against the Christians, that in their private dwellings they were guilty of practices more shameless than attached to the heathen mysteries. The central thought of the feast is love. "The Greeks call it ἀγάπη, that is, love." "As it is an act of religious service it permits no vileness or immorality." "As the feast commenced with prayer, so with prayer it is closed. We go from it . . . to have as much care of our modesty and chastity as if we had been at a school of virtue rather than a banquet."⁵

The order of the service of the Lord's Supper in ante-Nicene times was nearly as follows: First, after the prayers, the kiss of peace was given between man and man, and woman and woman—this having apostolic sanction.⁶ Second, the two parts of the service proper, namely, the oblation, which was the presentation of the offerings for the feast, and for the poor and the clergy; and the communion, or the partaking of the consecrated elements. Both parts of the service were accompanied with prayer and praise. It is not easy to determine whether the service was in regular ritualistic form, or was extemporaneous. Probably with a perfect freedom the uttered prayers became fixed through repetition, and a regular liturgy was here, as elsewhere, the result of influences exerted through many decades of history. At first the

¹ Ibid.: chap. x.

² Apol. i, cc. 61, 65.

³ Apol. i, c. 65.

⁴ Apol. i, c. 66.

⁵ Apol., c. 39.

⁶ Rom. xvi, 16; 2 Cor. xiii, 12; 1 Thess. v, 26. The kiss of peace was continued into the post-Nicene period, and was sanctioned by conciliary action. v. Conc. Laodic., can. 19.

bread was the common bread of the various countries, though in later centuries the Latin church insisted on unleavened bread. The wine was mingled with water, and the communicants, standing, received both elements in the hands from the officiating deacons. Portions of the sanctified bread were sometimes borne to their homes by the members, where the family communion was repeated in one kind. This practice was especially frequent in the North African church in Cyprian's day, where the practice of infant communion with wine alone was in vogue. The custom of the apostolic Church, for all communicants to make oblations of bread and wine and other things to supply the elements of the holy eucharist, and gifts to the poor, was continued through all the early history of Christianity, and, in a modified form, until the twelfth century. The writings of the fathers, from Justin Martyr to Augustine, recognise this oblation as made by the entire company of believers. They upbraid those who from neglect or penuriousness fail to bring their appropriate contributions to the general fund, and carefully distinguish as to the character of the gifts which will be accepted.

Offerings made by extortioners, usurers, corrupt persons, or obtained by fraudulent means, were rejected; and Ambrose used the threat that the offerings of Valentinian would not be accepted by the Church, to induce his refusal of the prayer of Symmachus to restore the heathen altars.¹

In accordance with a law of development in church government and discipline, the ceremonies connected with the consecration of the elements became more and more formal and involved, as they were further removed from the plastic condition of the apostolic age. From the simple prayer of thanksgiving and consecration, used by Christ and by the Church of the first and second centuries, extended and carefully prescribed liturgical forms appear, the work of great churchmen, or the result of conciliary discussion and decision. Such forms of the consecration of the eucharist are met in the Apostolic Constitutions of the fourth century,² and in all the great liturgies of both the Eastern and Western churches. It is believed that no regularly prescribed liturgies were used in the ante-Nicene period. The earlier recognition of a disciplina arcani partially accounts for this; for when Christianity became the religion of the state, and the celebration of the eucharist was made a public act, a great number of written liturgies were prepared, both in the orthodox and heretical churches. While greatly differing in minor particulars, these great liturgies are based Infant communion.

The oblation by the whole Church.
What offerings excluded.
Liturgical forms gradually developed.

¹ v. Ep. 30, ad Valent.

² Const. Apost., lib. viii, c. 13.

upon the earlier and simpler order of consecration and communion. Nevertheless they were often of great length, and were accompanied with many impressive ceremonies, especially frequent musical recitations by the choirs and responses by the people. As a rule, the Oriental churches accepted the most extensive and involved liturgies in the celebration of the eucharist, while the Western centered on a single feature of the divine manifestation—Christ's redeeming work.¹

As with respect to the constitution of the Church and the functions of church officers, so also with respect to the eucharist, the apostolic Church had no clearly defined doctrine as to the mode of its operation. The first Christians received the bread and wine with thanksgiving and gladness of heart, without inquiring into the manner of Christ's presence in the elements. There is no evidence whatever that it was regarded as a sin-offering or sacrifice.² The only sacrifice recognised is that of the person of the believer with all his powers (Rom. xii, 1; Phil. ii, 15-17, et al.). The most that can be stated is that those who had worthily participated in the Supper were thus brought into conscious union with their Lord, as in other religions the worshipper was conceived to be brought near the divinity through the medium of an offering by the priest.

The "Teaching of the Apostles" speaks of a sacrifice: "But on the Lord's day do ye assemble and break bread, and give thanks, after confessing your transgressions, in order that your sacrifice, ἡ θυσία ὑμῶν, may be pure. But every one that hath controversy with his friend, let him not come together with you, until they be reconciled, that your sacrifice, ἡ θυσία ὑμῶν, may not be profaned."³ Yet it is manifest that the term sacrifice is here used in a very different sense from that of a levitical or priestly oblation, since the offering here made is by the entire community of disciples, thus preserving the thought of the universal priesthood of believers. In arguing against the Docetists, Ignatius calls the eucharist "the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which

Character of the liturgies.

No early theory of the mode of its operation.

No recognition of a sin-offering.

In what sense "sacrifice" was understood.

¹ This is in harmony with the theory of worship in these churches. The Greek includes the entire circle of the divine manifestation, from the creation to the final triumph of the glorified Church. The Latin, on the contrary, proposes a narrower sphere in its theory of worship, to which its liturgy strictly corresponds. It is the manifestation of the history of redemption, as this culminates in the passion and atoning death of Jesus Christ. Its liturgy must be correspondingly abbreviated.

² Häfling: Die Lehre der ältesten Kirche vom Opfer im Leben und Cultus der Christen, Erlangen, 1851, pp. 45. seq.

³ Διδαχὴ τῶν δώδεκα Ἀποστόλων, chap. xiv.

suffered for our sins, and which the Father, of his goodness, raised up again;"¹ and again he speaks of the Church "breaking one and the same bread, which is the medicine of immortality, and the antidote to prevent us from dying, but that we should live forever in Jesus Christ."² Such language appears to express a belief in the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, yet is not absolutely determining. A very similar view would be inferred from the language of Justin Martyr³ and Irenæus.⁴ The latter, however, elsewhere implies that the bread and wine are the archetypes of the body and blood of Christ. This is also the view which is met in the Apostolic Constitutions⁵ and in many of the Greek fathers of the first four centuries.

The African church seemed to fluctuate between the symbolical interpretation of the words of the institution of the Supper and the idea of the real presence in the elements. The strong development of the priestly character of the clergy by Cyprian led him to view the eucharist as a sacrifice.

The Alexandrian church were generally inclined to regard the bread and wine as symbols of the body and blood of Christ, and the feast as spiritual in its nature and office.

The idea of a sacrifice is expressed in the language of nearly all the ante-Nicene fathers, but it is more a commemoration of the one sacrifice for sin made by the offering of Christ, "once for all," upon the cross, with the added thought of thanksgiving for the plan of redemption. As late as the twelfth century this thought was perpetuated by the custom of the presentation of the eucharistic elements by the entire congregation, the universal priesthood of believers being thus exhibited.

The notion of a thank offering is prominent in most of the writers of the first and second centuries; but in the third century the later doctrine of a sin offering is found, especially in the writings of Cyprian, whose theory of the priesthood of the ministry logically demanded an offering for the sins of the people. His language is remarkable, and expresses the extreme view of the age relative to a genuine offering of sacrifice made by the priest. "For if Jesus Christ, our Lord and God, is himself the chief priest of God the Father, and has first offered himself a sacrifice to the Father, and has commanded this to be done in commemoration of himself, certainly that priest truly discharges the office of

¹ Ad Smyrn., c. 7.

² Ad Ephes., c. 20.

³ Apol., c. 66.

⁴ Advers. Hær., iv, c. 18, seq.

⁵ Const. Apost., v, c. 14; vi, c. 30; vii, c. 36.

The bread and wine are archetypes.

The view of the African Church.

The Alexandrian view.

The commemoration of a sacrifice.

Cyprian's sacerdotal view.

Christ who imitates that which Christ did; and he then offers a true and full sacrifice in the Church to God the Father, when he proceeds to offer it according to what he sees Christ himself to have offered."¹

The three views of the Lord's Supper, the mystical, the symbolic, and the extreme materialistic, traces of each of which are found in the first three centuries, were perpetuated in the post-Nicene church. Among some of the prominent Greek writers there is a tendency to rhetorical declamation in describing the benefits of the eucharist, and to the recognition of some mysterious change which the elements undergo in the act of consecration, by virtue of which the believer truly partakes of the body and blood of Christ. It is difficult to find those exact definitions which enable us to classify these writers as advocates of a mere spiritual participation in Christ's nature, or of the doctrine of the real presence in the bread and wine, or of a veritable change of substance in the elements. The same writer fluctuates in his expressions, at one time seemingly representing the elements as changed into the veritable body and blood of Christ,² and at another as symbols of his body and blood. Other fathers, as Gregory of Nyssa and Chrysostom in the East, and Hilary and Ambrose among the Latins, are quite pronounced in regard to a complete change of the elements in the act of consecration, and, therefore, incline to the later view of the Latin Church. Nevertheless, in these same writers are found expressions which, if studied in their isolation, would lead us to rank them among the advocates of the mere symbolic relation of the elements to the body and blood of Christ, and of a purely spiritual communion with him. With all of them it is a deep mystery. In the symbolic school may be reckoned Basil, Eusebius, Gregory Nazianzen, and Augustine; although these, too, at times use expressions which favour another theory.

What is true of the teachings of the great church fathers is likewise true of the language of the ancient liturgies. Some represent a veritable change in the elements as occurring in the act of consecration, while others recognise only the spiritual presence of Christ in the supper. The Greek liturgies are generally more clear in the representation of the real

¹ Ep. 62 (63), ad Cæcil., c. 14.

² v. especially Cyril of Jerusalem as cited by Neander: Christliche Dogmengeschichte, Berlin, 1857, Bd. i, ss. 425, 426. "Regard not, therefore, the bread and the wine as elements simply, for, according to the declaration of the Lord, they are the body and blood of Christ."

Opinions various.

Classifications difficult.

The symbolic school.

The liturgies not uniform in teaching.

presence of Christ with the elements. Generally throughout the eucharistic portions of the liturgies there is the recognition of an awful, yet glorious, mystery.¹

From the ancient canons it is evident that full members of the Church, or those who had passed through their catechumenical discipline and had been baptized, and who were free from ecclesiastical censure, were under obligation to partake of the eucharist. Some of the canons are very explicit, going so far as to declare that such as refuse to partake of the eucharist ought to be excluded from the Church;² and with this opinion harmonized the teachings of the Apostolic Constitutions, and of some of the most eminent Christian fathers.³ Nor did a plea of unworthiness excuse from this solemn duty. The reservation of some of the elements for the use of such as were not prepared or willing to commune, called eulogia, εὐλογία, was unknown to the Church of the first four centuries, and probably was not recognised before the eighth or ninth century. Nor was the mediæval and modern practice of private mass, where the priest alone receives the elements, known to the early Church.

Since the Church from the beginning of the third century accounted infants as proper subjects of baptism, and regarded this as the proper initiatory rite into the Church—ratifying the membership by the holy unction and confirmation—she consistently admitted infants to the Lord's Supper. Of this there is abundant proof as early as the third century. Cyprian is very clear in his recognition of the propriety of infant communion,⁴ and he mentions it in such terms as to give the impression of ¹ This subject is discussed at great length, with abundant references to original authorities, by Kahn: Die Lehre vom heiligen Abendmahl, Leipzig, 1851. Rückert: Das Abendmahl, sein Wesen, und seine Geschichte in der alten Kirche, Leipzig, 1856. Freeman: Principles of Divine Service, London, 1855–1862. Harrison: An Answer to Dr. Pusey's Challenge respecting the Doctrine of the Real Presence, London, 1871. Ebrard: Das Dogma vom heiligen Abendmahl und seine Geschichte, Frankfurt, 1845. "No other hypothesis is backed up by such a subtle philosophy; no other can so shelter itself from both reason and ridicule in the sanctuary which has been provided for it. . . . His (the believer in transubstantiation) Christ in the sacrament is removed from the region of sense to the region of the unthinkable and non-existent. The Roman Catholic's sacramental Christ is the God of Spinoza." v. Cunningham: The Growth of the Church, pp. 242, 243.

² Conc. Antioch., can. 2, quoted by Bingham, vol. ii, p. 791. Augusti: Handbuch d. Christ. Archæologie, Bd. ii, ss. 637, 638.

³ For declarations of such as were entitled to commune and their duty v. Const. Apostol., lib. viii; for the obligation, among others, v. Chrysostom: Hom. iii, ad Ephes.

⁴ de Lapsis, c. 25.

its commonness. In the Apostolic Constitutions,¹ where the order in which persons are to receive the communion is treated, children are mentioned; and Augustine in many passages of his writings recognises its practice and propriety. It was also customary for the early Church to send the elements to absent members, to bishops and officers of other churches, to the sick and infirm, and to captives languishing in prison. Elements sent to sick and prisoners.

The Lord's Supper was early celebrated in private houses; but in later and more settled periods it was usually celebrated where celebrated. in the church. The people received into their hands of both kinds, sometimes kneeling, sometimes standing, but rarely, if ever, sitting.² The Constitutions prescribe an order in which persons shall commune: "First, let the bishop receive, then the presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, readers, singers, Order of communion. and ascetics; among the women the deaconesses, virgins, and widows, after that the children, then all the people in order."³ In Justin Martyr's description⁴ of the rite, the president consecrates, and the deacons distribute both elements to the communicants; but in the more formal order of government it is seen that the deacon is forbidden to officiate if a presbyter be present.

The practice of communing in one kind, except in case of urgent necessity, was unknown to the ancient Church; of this the proof is too abundant to need specification. It was sometimes the case that the bread was mingled with the wine, and thus both elements were given at the same time. Bread mingled with wine. Hence the use of eucharistic spoons in the Greek church, and also in the Coptic church of to-day.

The frequency of celebrating the supper varied in different ages of the Church. The apostolic Church at first had daily Frequency of celebration. assemblies for observing the sacred meal, but afterward, apparently, met "on the first day of the week" for its celebration.⁵ The testimony of Tertullian, Cyprian, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and others is to the same custom in their day. But besides the Lord's day the eucharist was celebrated on all great feasts and festivals, and in some churches there was Celebrated on feast days. a return to its daily observance. But after the sixth century the

¹ l. viii, c. 13.

² This was a much later practice, originating in peculiar circumstances.

³ l. viii, c. 13, as quoted by Bingham, bk. xv, chap. iv.

⁴ Apol. i, c. 65.

⁵ v. Pliny: Epistolæ, lib. x, ep. 97, in his celebrated letter to Trajan on the lives and customs of the Christians of the Province of Bithynia. Also Justin Martyr: Apol. i, 67.

celebration became less frequent, until in some churches communion was insisted on but once a year.

There is no evidence in the writings or monuments of the first six centuries of the elevation of the host or of its adoration. The entire accompaniments of the eucharist were calculated to impress the mind of the communicant with the solemnity of the act, as well as with the high privilege of the sacrament. The discourses of the great preachers, as the Gregories, Basil, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, Hilary, etc., abound in most eloquent passages, inculcating the necessity of a preparation of spirit in order to communicate worthily, and showing the immense benefits which Christ intended to confer upon the Church by the institution of the Supper.

§ 2. The Altar and its Furniture.

As the central act of public worship was the eucharistic supper, so the central point in the house of assembly was the table of the Lord, or the altar. Paul calls it τράπεζα κυρίου. It received different designations at different periods and in different countries. As the idea of a sacrificial offering became more and more prominent, the terms ara, altare, θυσιαστήριον, etc., were applied to the place of consecrating the elements in the eucharist. The forms of the altar varied from the simple table (τράπεζα, mensa) to the more elaborate altars in wood, stone, and precious metals. Even in Tertullian's day the ara is frequently mentioned, and seems to have been of wood. Generally the term is qualified by some word indicating to whom the altar is chiefly dedicated, or whose relics lie beneath it. There are sufficient reasons for believing that for the first two and a half centuries the table, or altar, was often portable, and that in times of great public agitation, or persecution of the Church, it was carried from place to place as safety or prudence might dictate.

After commodious basilicas were erected and were under the protection of government, the regular place of the altar was at the middle of the chord of the apse (v. Fig. 82). It is believed that in the fourth century the altar began to assume the form of a tomb, from the practice of placing beneath it the relics of martyrs or saints. The change of the altar from wood to stone can be better accounted for in this way than by deriving the suggestion from the arcosolia of the catacombs, which some affirm were used for altars during times of persecution, and from excessive veneration of the martyred dead. Several of these tomblike altars, from the fifth century, still survive in Rome, Ravenna, and elsewhere; the one discovered in the Basilica San Alessandro, seven miles from Rome, on the Via Nomentana, and that of SS. Nazza-ro e Celso in Ravenna are good examples. From these well-preserved altars of the fifth century, as well as from mosaic representations found in several churches of the East and West, a good idea of their form, material, and accessories may be gained. Fig. 140 represents a table or altar from about the fifth century, restored partially from divers fragments. It is sketched as a large table of marble, supported by pillars upon which is sculptured a branch of the vine with its fruit. One frieze contains sculptured doves, which turn towards the monogram of Christ; the other (not shown) has a like number of lambs turning towards the mystic Lamb in the centre. It is nearly six feet long and about three and a half wide. It gives a good idea of the altar in the form of the mensa.¹ The altar was often placed upon a platform raised two or three steps high, beneath which was a space, called confessio, where was the grave of the saint, afterward the depository of the sarcophagus containing the sacred remains. From literary notices, as well as from mosaics yet preserved, it is plain that from the fourth or fifth century the altar was covered by a canopy, ciborium, supported by columns, between which stretched rods bearing the veils, or curtains, which hid the sacred elements from the vulgar gaze. The ciboria were often of great costliness, wrought out in elaborate patterns, and formed a most striking part of the furniture of the sanctuary (βήμα, sanctuarium). The custom of multiplying altars along the sides of the church is of later origin.

Fig. 140.—An altar (mensa) of the fifth century.

Elevated above the general level.

The ciborium.

The chalice (calix) was at first but one of the ordinary drinking vessels used at the social feasts. By degrees, as the public worship became more regular and orderly, as the congregations had their stated places of assembly, and the societies cared for the furniture of the churches, the chalice for the wine and the paten.

¹ v. Roller: Catacombes de Rome, tom. ii, p. 90, pl. lxiii.

the paten for the consecrated bread were doubtless of regular pattern, and often of appropriate decoration. To what extent the forms met upon sarcophagi, on slabs of marble, or in mosaics, are representations of the chalice and paten it is difficult to say. From their age and their connection with inscriptions, a few may, without violence to any laws of sound interpretation, be regarded as forms of sacramental vessels. Such evidence must, however, be received with caution, since some of these forms are plainly for purposes of ornament. The number of chalices and patens still surviving from the first six centuries Earliest examples.

is very small. Probably the earliest are those found at Gourdon, in France, now preserved in the Royal Library of Paris. They are of gold, ornamented with scales of garnet, and beautifully chased. From the fact that they were found in connection with gold coins of the time of Justin I., they are believed to be as early as the sixth century. From the descriptions of Paul Silentarius we can safely infer that the vessels which Rich altar furniture.

decorated the altars in St. Sophia must have been of wonderful richness and beauty. Numerous notices of other Christian writers of the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries clearly indicate that the altar furniture was carefully studied and was often of most costly material.

Likewise the accounts of the pillage of churches in the times of persecution, or during popular uprisings, clearly prove that the churches were in possession of many valuable rolls of the sacred Scriptures, as well as manuscript liturgies and hymns.

Eusebius's testimony.

Eusebius assures us that he has seen with his own eyes the sacred Scriptures committed to the flames upon the market-places, and the houses of worship thrown down from their foundations;¹ and Optatus speaks of the Donatists burning the altars of their rivals, and destroying the beautiful altar vessels of gold, or melting them down and selling them as profane.² After the recognition of Imperial gifts.

Christianity as the religion of the empire, the imperial gifts, not only of churches, but of richest furniture, were frequent, and added immensely to the impressiveness of the public

¹ Hist. Eccles., l. viii, c. 2. v. Lactantius's account (de Mort. Persee, c. 12) of the burning of the splendid church at Nicomedia with the volumes of the sacred Scriptures.

² The edict of Diocletian contemplated the destruction of the sacred vessels and books as well as the churches. The guardians of the churches frequently refused to produce the books or reveal their place of concealment.

worship.¹ The growing splendour of church decoration and furniture is sometimes rebuked by the bishops as robbery of widows and orphans,² and is contrasted with the simplicity of the first and second centuries, when the warm glow of brotherly love was prevalent, and when the body of the Lord could be borne in a basket of wicker work, and his blood in a vessel of glass.³

¹ Justinian's intolerant zeal, in building ninety-six churches for the yielding Greeks of Asia Minor, and supplying them with linen vestments, Bibles, liturgies, and vases of gold and silver, may be quoted as an example.

² Chrysostom: Hom. 50 in Matt.

³ Hieron.: Ep. 125.

CHAPTER III.

EARLY CHRISTIAN WORSHIP.

§ 1. The Apostolic Age.

THE worship of the apostolic Church was simple, and without liturgical character. True, Christ left a form of prayer which, by its spirit and comprehensiveness, was to remain a model for the Church in all the future. So also in the New Testament, from time to time, recur formulas which were probably the germs of the stately liturgies so widely accepted during the following centuries. Doubtless in this, as in other respects, the influence of the Jewish temple and synagogue service was powerful and lasting. Prior to the destruction of Jerusalem it is evident that the distinction between Christian and Jew was not sharply made, and many of the Jewish converts continued to attend upon a worship which had become venerable from age, and impressive by its stately ceremonial. Moreover, the doxology and the psalmody of the Old Testament Scriptures were accepted and incorporated into the worship of the new religion, and they were found to be consonant with that spirit of universalism which characterized the teachings of Christ and of his first apostles.¹ In accordance with the precepts and example of its Master, the early Church was accustomed to offer prayer for all men, even for enemies, and in this respect it was distinguished sharply from the practice of Judaism on the one hand, and the spirit of heathenism on the other. The bigoted exclusiveness of some Jewish sects, and the narrower limitations occasioned by nationality, birth, etc., recognised by the heathen world, could not harmonize with the truth which had been communicated to Peter through a special divine manifestation (Acts x, 34, 35).

Associated with the prayers, often mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles and elsewhere, is found the recommendation to "speak in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord" (Eph. v, 19); "teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs (ψαλμοῖς, ὕμνοις, ᾠδαῖς πνευματικαῖς), singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord" (Col. iii, 17). Another part of the worship consisted in the reading and expounding of the Scriptures (Acts i, 15, seq.; ii, 14; iv, 33, et al.). Doubtless in this there was a close imitation of the form of the Jewish worship, for it is inconceivable that men who had all their lives been accustomed to the free and stimulating services of the synagogue should suddenly sunder themselves from these associations, and devise an entirely new order of worship.

¹ Augusti: Handbuch der ch. Archæologie, Bd. ii, s. 7.

Forms of worship in apostolic Church.

The first Jewish converts, accustomed as they had been to hear the law read and expounded by some priest or reader, and to listen to the impressive utterances of the Prophets and of the Psalms in their frequent gatherings, cherished more fully the grand and solemn lessons of their sacred writings as they now saw their fulfillment and culmination in the Messiah whose kingdom they were labouring to establish. Doubtless the prevalent custom among the Jews, to invite any well-informed man to explain the Scripture lesson, was entirely consonant with the feelings of the early disciples, when the right to teach was not of official sanction, but of spiritual endowments, or of a special charism, χάρισμα διδασκαλικόν. The custom of Paul on his missionary tours also illustrates the easy and natural connection of the early converts with their former religion, as it was celebrated in the synagogues of the dispersion. His method was to attach himself to the Jewish synagogue, and, in a spirit of generous universalism, use the existing forms to convey the higher lesson of salvation through Jesus Christ.

Jewish converts loved the synagogue service.

Paul's method of evangelization.

The question of the composition of the churches founded by Paul still remains an open one, especially whether the Jewish or the heathen element at first preponderated. Doubtless in nearly every case there was a mixture of converts from both. Inasmuch as the theism of the Jews was the substantial foundation on which the Christian system must be reared, their forms had, presumably, large influence in all the churches established by Paul and his co-workers during their wide missionary journeyings, and the simple synagogue worship probably had very considerable effect upon most of these churches for a century after the death of the apostles.¹ If these are to be regarded as, in a measure, colonies of the mother church at Antioch,¹ then must the preponderating influence of the heathen element be presumed. Moreover, the opposition which Paul often encountered from the Jews, compelling him to leave the synagogue, and establish an independent society (Acts xiii, 45, seq.; xviii, 5-7; xix, 8, seq.), would suggest a larger number of Gentile converts in the churches of Antioch of Pisidia, of Corinth, and of Ephesus, just as the history would lead us to suppose that in the church at Berea the majority of converts were sincere Jews, who had diligently searched their Scriptures to discover the fulfillment of the promise of the Messiah. While the records of the first century after the destruction of Jerusalem respecting the forms of Christian worship are exceedingly meager, it cannot be doubted that the character of the services of the churches would be somewhat affected as the majority of the members were of Jewish or Gentile origin; in the former case perpetuating the forms of the synagogue, and in the latter modified by the peculiar thought of the heathen converts.

Composition of the churches founded by Paul.

¹ With respect to the composition of the Church at Rome, Baur and Schwegler, as well as Thiersch and others not of the Tübingen school, have sought to prove the preponderance of Jewish influence. But many others, as Neander, Schaff, Lange, have controverted this claim.

A more distinctive service might be supposed to be developed in the latter societies, since the liberty of the Gospel would experience little hinderance from former customs, and be untrammelled by a venerable ritual. Yet we are checked from making too hasty inferences, since the letters of Paul to the churches which are most distinctively of Gentile converts abound in references to the Old Testament Scriptures, and some of the elements of the worship to which reference is therein made clearly point to a Jewish origin. Nevertheless, there is evidence that in some of the churches the letters of the apostles were read in the assemblies, and constituted a part of their service for edification and instruction (1 Thess. v, 27; Col. iv, 16). By degrees these letters, with other New Testament documents, came to be regarded as of equal and even superior importance to the Old Testament, and their authoritative character was recognised earlier by the churches of Gentile than by those of Jewish character.²

When all the circumstances are considered, we cannot speak of a contradiction between the spirit and worship of Jewish and Gentile societies, but rather of a variety in unity. The unity consisted partly in their communion with God in Christ, on the basis of the doctrine of the apostles, which was by both considered the reason and end of divine worship; partly in the fraternal association of believers with one another, which was stimulated and promoted by their religious services. Furthermore, both parties had their smaller and more exclusive society gatherings, as well as their more public assemblies to which the non-Christian public had access. The difference between the Jewish-Christian and Gentile-Christian churches in its real essence consisted in the fact that with those societies which were formed out of the converted in heathen countries, their worship by virtue of their entire isolation from the Jewish temple and synagogue service, was more freely and independently developed by the pure spirit of the Gospel, while in Palestine the connection with the Old Testament ritual was more persistent and protracted. In fine, the worship of the Gentile-Christian churches shares in the liberty, independence, and novelty of Christianity, but in such manner that this independence of the New neither excludes a leaning toward the forms of the Old Testament worship, nor does its freedom ignore a law of orderly arrangement which is developed from within.¹

¹ v. Lechler: Op. cit., s. 110.

² v. Lechler: Op. cit., s. 120.

Greater independence among the heathen converts.

§ 2. Worship in the Time of the Apostolic Fathers.

It is quite remarkable that the apostolic fathers give us very few hints relative to the nature and order of public worship. Scarcely a paragraph is met in Clement, Polycarp, Hermas, or Barnabas. The archaic document, "The Teaching of the Twelve," if it can be firmly placed near the end of the first or at the beginning of the second century, becomes valuable as giving statements relative to the manner of celebrating the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper (v. book iii, chaps. 1, 2), as well as the character of the assemblies upon the Lord's day. We are impressed by the simplicity of the service, and by its almost absolute lack of ritualistic forms. The command to meet together is coupled with a description of the spirit which should be cherished by the participants, being largely a repetition of the injunction of Christ² (Matt. v, 23, 24). Frequent assembly is earnestly enjoined—"But ye shall come together often, and seek the things which befit your souls; for the whole time of your faith thus far will not profit you, if you do not become perfect in the last time."³

The "Teaching."

The references to public worship in the Ignatian writings are very few, and furnish little aid in constructing the form of public service in the first quarter of the second century. The duty of frequent meetings is inculcated: "Take heed, then, often to come together to give thanks to God, and show forth his praise. For when ye assemble frequently in the same place, the powers of Satan are destroyed, and the destruction at which he aims is prevented by the unity of your faith."¹ He agrees with the "Teaching" respecting the propriety and custom of observing the first day of the week, rather than the Jewish Sabbath; "no longer observing the Sabbath, but living in the observance of the Lord's day, on which also our life has sprung up again by him and by his death,"² etc.

¹ Lechler: Op. cit., ss. 120, 121.

² Διδαχὴ τῶν Αποστόλων, chap. xiv, "But on the Lord's day do ye assemble and break bread, and give thanks," etc.

³ Id., chap. xvi.

The few heathen notices of the worship of the Christians in the first half of the second century are important in themselves, and instructive respecting the simplicity of services which continued in the Church after the death of the apostles. The testimony is also important as coming from enemies. In his well known letter to Trajan, about A. D. 102, Pliny describes the simplicity of the worship, and bears witness to the high moral character of the Christian fellowship. "They are accustomed to assemble before dawn on a certain day, and sing responsively a hymn to Christ as God,"³ etc. The celebration of the sacred meal, and the pledge to abstain from all wickedness while absent from each other, are likewise attested. Lucian, the universal scoffer, saw in Christianity only one of the numberless follies of his time. His mocking spirit, while contemning all religions, sobers into candor by acknowledging the benevolence of the Christians, and he testifies to the power of their belief in immortality to keep them steadfast, and cause them to abound in all helpfulness and kindness.⁴ He likewise speaks of their worship of Christ, of the reading of their sacred writings, and the celebration of the sacred meal.

§ 8. Public Worship in the Second and Third Centuries.

It is not till the middle of the second century that we meet with a somewhat formal and complete description of Christian public worship. Justin Martyr, in his first Apology to the emperor, senate, etc., says: "On the day called Sunday (ἡ τοῦ Ἑλίου λεγομένη ἡμέρα) all who live in cities or in the country

¹ Ad Ephes., c. xiii; v. also ad Magnes., c. vii; ad Polyc., c. iv.

² Ad Magnes., c. 9.

³ Epistola, l. x, ep. 96.

⁴ de Peregrino, 11-13. v. Friedlander: Sittengeschichte Roms, Bd. iii, 589-590. Uhlhorn: Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, pp. 325, 326.

gather together to one place, and the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read as long as time permits; then, when the reader has ceased, the president verbally instructs, and exhorts to the imitation of these good things. Then we all rise together and pray, and as we before said, when our prayers are ended, bread and wine and water are brought, and the president in like manner offers prayers and thanksgivings, according to his ability, and the people assent, saying, Amen; and there is distribution to each, and a participation in that over which thanks have been given, and to those who are absent a portion is sent by the deacons. And they who are well to do, and willing, give what each thinks fit; and what is collected is deposited with the president, who succors the orphans and the widows, and those who, through sickness or any other cause, are in want, and those who are in bonds, and the strangers sojourning among us, and, in a word, takes care of all who are in need. But Sunday is the day on which we all hold our common assembly, because it is the first day on which God, having wrought a change in the darkness and matter, made the world; and Jesus Christ on the same day rose from the dead."¹

In this brief passage a very lively sketch of the form and spirit of Christian worship in the middle of the second century is given.

1.) The day on which the assembly gathers and the reason of selecting this day. It is Sunday, and not the Jewish Sabbath; it is because on that day God finished his creation, and Jesus Christ rose from the dead. 2.) The gathering is from city and adjacent country into one place; the place is not characterized; but it is a society under president and helpers. 3.) The order of the service is like that in apostolic times, with the exception of singing, which is not here mentioned. The lector reads selections from the Gospels,² and from the prophetic Scriptures; next the president expounds and exhorts to an imitation of the examples furnished in the sacred lessons. Then follows prayer, led by the president, during which all stand; next the consecration of the elements for the Lord's Supper, their distribution by the deacons,³ a participation in both kinds by all who are present, and the care for those who are absent, by the deacons. After the communion is the collection for the poor and needy, which is deposited with the president for disbursement to all who may be in want, or in bonds, as well as to the stranger sojourning among the brethren. From this account by Justin it might be fairly inferred that there existed a regular and recognised order of worship, and to proper officers, president, lector, and deacons, specific duties were now assigned. Here is noticed a regular and orderly procedure in the service, but it is still characterized by earnestness and simplicity, no intimation of an involved liturgy appearing, except possibly in the response of the people.¹

¹ Apol. i. c. 67.

² Apol. i. c. 66, "For the apostles, in the memoirs composed by them, which are called Gospels," etc.

³ v. c. 65.

Other writers of the second century add very little to our knowledge of public worship. Origen, Irenæus, and Tertullian in their quite extensive writings dwell but slightly upon this subject. In his reply to Celsus, Origen uses a few expressions which indicate a fixed order of service in the churches of Alexandria, but it is not easy to construct from these the complete form of worship. Tertullian's account of the services in the North African church agrees quite closely with the statement of Justin Martyr. He adds a few particulars, as, "We also give admonitions, institute examinations, and administer the divine censure." From the last expression we are to infer that the discipline of the Church was also considered in the public assemblies. He also informs us that in prayer they turned toward the east;² that they lifted their hands to God the Father;³ and that in the missa fidelium the Lord's Prayer was used, and the kiss of peace was given.⁴

When the sacerdotal principle was greatly strengthened, during the first half of the third century, the public services assumed a more fixed and ceremonial character. The sharp distinction between laity and clergy brought corresponding changes in the conduct of worship. From this time the ministering priest appears more prominently in both the missa catechumenorum and in the missa fidelium. The bishop or presbyter is the offerer in the eucharist, "who offers the sacrifices to God." The sacrifice is now celebrated daily; the lessons are read from a pulpitum. It is evident that there is a kind of responsive service, for the Sursum Corda and the Habemus ad Dominum are expressly mentioned in Cyprian's treatise on the Lord's Prayer.⁵ Also he speaks of the attitude in prayer as standing: "Moreover, when we stand praying, beloved brethren,

¹ Notwithstanding Justin's Apology is addressed to the emperor, who might be supposed to be more interested in affairs pertaining to his capital, it is believed that he describes the order of worship which was extant in the patriarchate of Antioch, within which he resided.

² Apol., c. 16.

³ Idolat., c. vii.

⁴ de Oratione, c. 14.

⁵ de Oratione dominica, c. 31.

we ought to be watchful and earnest with our whole heart, intent on our prayers."¹

The character of public worship in the African churches during the fourth century can be pretty well ascertained from the writings of Augustine. The following is the order as therein revealed. The Scripture reading was from the prophets, epistles, and gospels—a psalm being sung between the epistle and gospel lesson. We infer that the address or sermon made to the people was early in the public service. In the missa fidelium the worship began with the Sursum Corda ("Lift up your hearts") and the Habemus ad Dominum ("We lift them up unto the Lord"). The first priest then responded, "Let us give thanks to our Lord God," and the people said, "It is meet and right so to do." The prayer of consecration of the elements (sanctification) is made only by the priest; since, from the language of Augustine, this is regarded as of the nature of a sacrifice. After the consecration, the Lord's Prayer was repeated by the clergy only. Then the Pax vobiscum ("Peace be with you"), and the kiss of peace. Next followed the communion and the dismissal by the benediction, which Augustine mentions in his private letters. In these letters is found also the statement that in the public service prayers were offered for the conversion of unbelievers, for the catechumens, that they might be earnest in the preparation for baptism, for all believers, for bishops and priests, for all rulers, the suffering and persecuted, for absent members of the congregation, and for enemies.²

The notices contained in the writings of the first three and a half centuries represent the Lord's Supper as the central act of public worship, around which revolves every minor part, and which gave significance to the whole. The celebrating of this sacrament is the supreme object of all public assemblies of the saints.

¹ de Oratione dominica, c. 31.

² v. Mone: Lateinische und griechische Messen aus dem 2ten bis 6ten Jahrhundert, Frankfort, 1850.

CHAPTER IV.

THE EARLIEST LITURGIES.

§ 1. Origin.

THE almost unbroken peace which the Church had enjoyed between the reigns of Marcus Aurelius and Decius had added greatly to the number of her adherents, but had brought serious moral enervation even upon some of her high officials. Freedom from opposition, and a strong reaction against the rigors of the Montanistic discipline, prepared the way for the lapse of a majority of North African Christians during the terrible persecution under Decius and his successors.¹ The most marked symptom and proof of a decaying piety were the relegation of personal duties to a class of church officials, and a growing formalism in public worship. It was during this interval of peace that the sacerdotal notion had greatly strengthened, and the influence of the laity had correspondingly declined.

The forty years between the death of Valerian and the Diocletian persecution were most important for the discipline, doctrine, and worship of the Church. The readmission of the lapsed, after the Decian persecution, had originated the sacrament of penance, which became so powerful a factor in the doctrine of the Latin Church.² The more lenient treatment of those who had denied Christ under Valerian tended to the relaxation of ecclesiastical discipline, and the general freedom from legal disabilities gave opportunity for the erection of spacious churches, where worship was conducted with ever-increasing pomp. Just then, when piety was feeble and heresy was rank, the Church felt the necessity of guarding its orthodoxy by the clearer formulation of doctrine, and fixing the order of its worship by the construction of stately liturgies.

It was probably under these circumstances that the great liturgies³ were rapidly developed. From the liturgical germs found in the New Testament, and in the writings of the ante-Nicene fathers, were steadily perfected the imposing forms whose long-continued use gave character to the public worship of the East and West. They have undergone numerous important changes, according to the varying fortunes and doctrinal developments of the Church, or as they have been amended by conciliary decisions. None are probably older than the fourth century; since till the Church was relieved of its legal disabilities, and placed under state protection, the celebration of the eucharist, especially, belonged to the Disciplina arcani. The period for the full development of the great liturgies begins, therefore, with the complete triumph of Christianity over heathenism. This is evident from their frequent use of terms which originated in the General Councils, where fundamental doctrines were first formulated. Nevertheless, they have certain striking resemblances which suggest a common underlying tradition, and marked differences that could result only from diverse environments.

¹ Aubé: L'Église et l'État dans la seconde Moitié du III^e Siècle, 4 vols., Paris, 1876-1885, vol. iv, pp. 70, seq.

² v. Aubé: Op. cit., vol. iv, pp. 30, seq. Lecky: History of European Morals, London, 1884, vol. i, pp. 457, seq.

³ The term liturgy, λετουργία, has come to mean the order and method of public worship; more especially the manner of celebrating the eucharist. The term mass

Have undergone great modifications.

§ 2. Classification and Description.

The classification of the early liturgies according to their origin, points of likeness, and influence has been attempted by several learned liturgists;¹ but the results are by no means harmonious.

Neale arranges them under five classes, namely: 1. That of St. James, or of Jerusalem. 2. That of St. Mark, or of Alexandria. 3. That of Thaddæus, or of Edessa. 4. That of St. Peter, or of Rome. 5. That of St. John, or of Ephesus. While tradition ascribes the origin of each of these to the person whose name it bears, it is evident that they were the result of long-repeated services at the great centers of ecclesiastical power, were modified with the shifting fortunes of the Church, and were in use in different districts as the influence of the patriarchal capitals was augmented or declined. Moreover, the growth of a multitude is applied to the public eucharistic service by the Latin Church. The liturgical books were generally called by the heathen libelli, by the Church sacramentaria, libri mysteriorum, etc.

Neale's classification.

¹ The following are among the most learned writers upon the liturgies of the Church: L. A. Muratori (R. C.): Liturgia Romana vetus, 2 vols., Venet., 1748. Palmer (Anglican): Origines Liturgice, 2 vols., London, 1845. Daniel (Lutheran): Codex liturgicus ecclesie universae in epitomen redactus, 4 vols., Lipsiæ, 1847-1851. Mone (R. C.): Latéinische und griechische Messen aus dem 2ten bis 6ten Jahrhundert, Frankfort, 1850. Neale (Anglican): The Liturgies of S. Mark, S. James, S. Clement, S. Chrysostom, S. Basil, or according to the uses of the churches of Alexandria, Jerusalem, Constantinople, London, 1859.

of lesser liturgies from these argues a great variety of opinion, and a large degree of liberty in the different districts and churches.

The Eastern liturgies are divided into two parts: 1. That preceding, and, 2. That following the Sursum Corda. They generally go under the names of the proanaphora and the anaphora. It has been discovered that usually one liturgy in every class or family of liturgies supplies the proanaphora to all the others. Of some sixty Oriental liturgies there are not a dozen exceptions to a common proanaphora. This would seem to point to a common source of one branch of the public service; while the great variety found in the anaphora would only be in harmony with the spirit of the East, which allowed greater variety in the language and order of public worship.

1. The oldest liturgy is probably that of St. Clement,¹ which dates from about the first half of the fourth century. While it has fallen entirely into disuse, it is of interest in revealing the character of the early rituals, and in assisting to determine the changes which were introduced into the worship in the post-Nicene period. In it the missa catechumenorum is strictly separated from the missa fidelium; the forms are simple; as from very early times the sainted dead are commemorated, there is no reference to individual names; Mary is not once mentioned: all of which circumstances point to an early origin. In these respects, as well as with reference to the reading of the Scriptures and the homily, the formula of consecration, the petition for the excommunicate, and the prayer for enemies and persecutors, this liturgy agrees in sentiment and spirit with what is given by Justin Martyr and Tertullian, and would, therefore, justify the opinion that the eighth book of the "Apostolic Constitutions" might be a product of the third century. Drey has, however, pointed out two circumstances which forbid so early an origin: First, the mention of the ascetics, for whom prayer is offered, and to whom a place of honor next to the clergy is assigned in the missa fidelium; secondly, the mention of subdeacons in the liturgy. Both these classes received official recognition after the third century; hence the origin, or at least the present form, of the eighth book of the Constitutions, containing the Clementine liturgy, must be later than the third century.²

¹ This liturgy is found in the eighth book of the "Apostolic Constitutions." v. Cotelierius's edition of the Apostolic Fathers. For a critical examination and estimate, v. especially Drey and Bickell, elsewhere cited.

² v. Drey: Neue Untersuchungen über die Constitutionen und Kanones der Apostel. s. 139, seq. v. Const. Apos., l. viii, c. 11.

2. Another very ancient liturgy, belonging to the very large class called by Neale the Hierosolymitan (or of Jerusalem), is ^{Liturgy of S. James.} that of S. James. "From this Greek liturgy there are three sets of offshoots. The first of these is the Cesarean branch. St. Basil's liturgy is a recast of that of S. James, as St. Chrysostom's is an abbreviation of and new addition to that of St. Basil. From St. Basil's sprang the Armeno-Gregorian rite, as at present ^{its three branches.} used; while St. Chrysostom's exercised an influence on the later forms of the Nestorians. Circumstances have rendered the Constantinopolitan rites, as I have already said, sole possessors of the orthodox East. The liturgy of St. Basil is said on all Sundays in Lent except Palm Sunday, on Maundy Thursday, Easter eve, the vigil of Christmas and the Epiphany, and the Feast of St. Basil (January 1). That of Chrysostom is appropriated to every other day in the year. . . . The second offshoot of S. James is of far less importance. It embraces but two offices, the Sicilian liturgy, . . . the other named from St. Cyril, which was never widely used, and of which it is impossible to say where it was employed. The Sicilian liturgy differs principally from that of S. James in amplification. . . . The third offshoot of the Hierosolymitan office is the Syriac liturgy of S. James, and its dependents. It differs verbally from the Greek office of the same name, from which it is derived. The prayers, generally speaking, are rather shorter, though the Invocation to the Holy Ghost is much amplified."¹ This Syriac liturgy is believed to be the source of no less than thirty-nine distinct liturgies, all of which were in use among the Monophysites.

3. The liturgy of S. Mark was influential in Alexandria, and in the churches which were regarded as dependent upon, or subject to, the Alexandrian patriarch. In its present form it is ^{Liturgy of St. Mark.} usually ascribed to Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, about the first quarter of the fifth century. Offshoots from this were used in the Coptic and Ethiopian churches.²

Many other liturgical forms originated in the East which had a wider or narrower influence, whose shades of difference are numerous and interesting to notice. As before said, it is probable that the more unbridled spirit of the Eastern churches helped to modify and adjust the liturgies to the varying conditions; while the centralizing forces of the West secured for the churches greater uniformity in public worship.

The Western liturgies may be studied under four classes: 1. The

¹ Abridged from Neale.

² v. Daniel: Codex Liturgicus ecclesiæ universæ, Lipsia, 1853, lib. iv, p. 135.

Gallican, which has been traced by Mone and others¹ to Ephesus as the place of its origin, but which was amended from time to time by Hilary and others. 2. The other member of this family is the old Spanish, Gothic, or Mozarabic, which was probably an imported liturgy, but was largely modified by Isidore of Seville in the seventh century. 3. The Roman liturgy, which can hardly be older than the fifth century. It seems very probable that the vigorous bishops of Rome, during the fifth and sixth centuries, gradually brought this liturgy into form; especially Gregory the Great, who was active in effecting reforms in ecclesiastical hymns and music, prepared a sacramentarium which was largely accepted by the Latin Church. 4. The Ambrosian, named after the bishop of Milan, like all other liturgies, was a work of gradual and long-continued development. It is more nearly related to the Roman, although in some features departing widely from it.² It is still in use in the diocese of Milan.

All the great liturgies have aimed to unify the thought and feeling of the congregation in acts of solemn worship. They have varied according to the views of their compilers respecting the supreme thought which should dominate the public service. Hence the Greek and the Latin liturgies may be regarded as an attempt to express in the great assembly, or by the community of believers, for purposes of instruction or edification, what each esteems the central doctrine of Christianity. The modifications which these have undergone are indices of the shifting of the center of a doctrinal system, or of a modified view of the best means of expressing the dominant truth to the assembled Church.

The thought of the liturgy of the Greek Church is the divine manifestation in effecting the work of human redemption; extending from the act of creation, through all the intervening dispensations, to the life of Christ from his birth to his glorification. Every prayer, lesson, antiphonal, or chant; every posture, action, change of vestments, shifting of colors, etc., are so many symbols to illustrate the unfolding history of redemption.

¹ Mone: Lateinische und griechische Messen aus dem 2ten bis 6ten Jahrhundert, Frankfurt. 1850. Neale: Essays on Liturgiology.

² Daniel: Op. cit., vol. i, pp. 48-113, has arranged the four great Western liturgies in parallel columns, so that their harmonies and variations can be conveniently studied. This learned liturgist has in this work given us a mass of curious and valuable information, and his researches have greatly aided in tracing these liturgies to their origins. The subject is beset with peculiar difficulties, and the scholars are by no means in harmony respecting the chronology and relative influence of these forms of public worship.

In the Latin Church the entire liturgy centers in one thought of supreme interest, namely, the atoning sacrifice of Christ, veritably repeated at every mass. With variety in secondary parts, during the changing festivals of the year, the point around which the whole system revolves, and toward which every member points, is the sacrificial offering of Christ in the mass by the officiating priest, and the appropriation of its benefits by the worshipping Church. Hence the wider range of thought to be expressed by the Greek liturgies gave occasion for a more involved and imposing symbolism; while the Latin liturgies, by a concentration of attention on one act in the scheme of redemption, would give less opportunity for spectacular display, yet would produce a deeper and more lasting impression.¹

¹ In the liturgies of the Protestant Churches the thoughts of the priesthood of all believers, salvation through personal faith, individual privilege and responsibility, and instruction of the people in doctrine and duty are very prominent. Hence the eucharist is not celebrated on every occasion of public worship, but the sermon assumes a place of greater relative prominence than in other liturgies.

CHAPTER V.

THE LORD'S DAY, OR SUNDAY.

§ 1. Historic Statement.

THE daily assembly of the disciples for worship and for the celebration of the Lord's Supper largely ceased with the apostolic age. Soon the eucharist was consecrated weekly and on the occasion of great festivals, till at length a methodical and stated observance of weekly and yearly feasts was instituted. Daily assemblies were, however, recommended by some teachers during the first six centuries, and explicit injunctions for such gatherings are found in the Apostolic Constitutions.¹

As before observed, the Jewish Christians at first continued to frequent the temple and synagogue services, but at a very early date "the first day of the week" took the place of the Jewish Sabbath as the chief time of public worship (Acts xx, 7; 1 Cor. xvi, 2) in many of the churches of Jewish Christians. It was the day of the resurrection of Christ, of most of his appearances to the disciples after the resurrection, and on this day the Holy Spirit was poured out on the day of Pentecost.² For these reasons, and especially after the destruction of the sacred city had rendered the sacrificial service of the temple impossible, Sunday became the recognised day of assembly for fellowship and for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. It is called in "The Teaching of the Twelve"³ the "Lord's day of the Lord" (Κυριακήν δε Κυρίου). The Jewish Christians at first observed both the seventh and the first day of the week; but the Gentile Christians kept the "Lord's day" from the beginning. It is difficult to doubt that it had apostolic sanction. The relation of the seventh to the first, as understood by the Jewish Christians, may not be easy to determine; yet there seem to be indications that the seventh was regarded as a day of preparation for the first.

Eucharist celebrated on the first day of the week.
The Jewish Christians attended the Jewish worship.
Reason for observing the first day.
Relation of the seventh to the first.

¹ v. l. viii, cc. 35-41.

² Barry: art. "Lord's Day," in Dict. of Christ. Antiq., vol. ii, p. 1043; and Hessey: "Lord's Day," in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii, p. 1677; Schaff: Hist. of the Ch. Church, vol. ii, p. 205.

³ Chap. xiv, l. The seventh day is not mentioned in this archaic document.

"The idea of Christian worship would attach mainly to the one; the obligation of rest would continue attached to the other; although a certain interchange of characteristics would grow up, as worship necessitated rest, and rest naturally suggested worship."¹

In his letter to the Magnesians,² Ignatius evidently addressed a Church of mixed character, since he speaks of some Ignatius's testimony. "who were brought up in the ancient order of things," who "have come to the possession of a new hope, no longer observing the Sabbath, but living in the observance of the Lord's day,"³ etc.

There is neither in this writer nor in the Barnabas epistle an intimation that Sunday was regarded as in any way a substitute for the Jewish Sabbath, nor yet a continuation of it; rather it was a new institution. It is, however, impossible to determine the time of its beginning; no impressive enactment, like that in the case of the Decalogue, The Lord's day not a substitute for the Jewish Sabbath. was needed. No enactment necessary. The recollection of the joyous events on the first day of the week led the early Christians to meet together and to celebrate them with gladness. Not until the fourth century do we find a statement intimating that the Jewish Sabbath, with its sanctions and duties, was transferred to the first, or the "Lord's day." Eusebius says: "On this day, which is the first of the Light and of the true Sun, we assemble after an interval of six days, and celebrate holy and spiritual Sabbath. . . . All things which it was duty to do on the Sabbath, these we have transferred to the Lord's day."⁴ The observance of the Jewish Sabbath in the churches of Jewish Christians continued for the first five centuries. In the East both days were celebrated with rejoicing; in the West the Jewish Sabbath was observed as a fast.

The reign of Constantine marks a change in the relations of the people to the Lord's day. The rescript of this emperor, Constantine's rescript. commanding the observance of Sunday, seems to have had little regard for its sanctity as a Christian institution; but the day of the Sun is to be generally regarded with veneration. "But the believer in the new paganism, of which the solar worship was characteristic, might acquiesce without scruple in the sanctity of the first day of the week."⁵

His successors not only sanctioned the legislation of Constantine,

¹ Barry: in loco cit.

² Ep., c. 15.

³ v. Lightfoot: Ignatius, ii, p. 129. His remarks on this passage are important. "Not merely in the observance of it, but in the appropriation of all those ideas and associations which are involved in its observance," etc.

⁴ Com., Psalm xcii.

⁵ Milman: Hist. of Christianity, vol. ii, p. 296.

but enlarged it, by multiplying the number of sacred days, and legally prohibiting the transaction of branches of public and private business, as well as the more debasing public amusements. "Thus Further provisions of the emperors. Theodosius I. increased the number of judicial holidays to one hundred and twenty-four. The Valentinians, I.

and II., prohibited the exaction of taxes and the collection of moneys on Sunday, and enforced the previously enacted prohibition of lawsuits. Theodosius the Great, in A. D. 386, and still more stringently the younger Theodosius, in A. D. 425, forbade theatrical performances; and Leo and Anthemius, in A. D. 460, prohibited other secular amusements on the Lord's day."¹ While, by an early law, Honorius had respected the public amusements, and provision had been made for their maintenance from the public treasury, by a later rescript the sanctity of the Lord's day was guarded, and a humane provision made for the judges Humane provisions. to visit the prisons on Sunday, and inquire into the treatment of prisoners, and alleviate, as far as possible, the hardships of their condition.

Various other imperial enactments make plain the duties of civil and ecclesiastical officers respecting the observance of Sunday, until it takes its place as an institution to be guarded and regulated by the government.

§ 2. Sanctity and Ground of Observance.

It is indisputable that the resurrection of Christ was the one all-sufficient fact which accounts for the rise and growth of the Christian Church. "Jesus and the resurrection" was the burden of apostolic preaching. Hence the recollection of the day of the resurrection was so indelibly impressed upon the hearts of the first disciples that on its return they came together to pray, and to recall the memory of the Lord, by the breaking of bread and the celebration of the eucharist. It was the dictate of the glowing love for Christ, whose followers they delighted to be reckoned.

We fail to find the slightest trace of a law or apostolic edict instituting the observance of the "day of the Lord;" nor is there in the Scriptures an intimation of a substitution of this for the Jewish Sabbath. The primal idea of the Jewish Sabbath was cessation of labor, rest; the transference of this idea to the first day of the week does not appear in the teachings of Christ nor of his apostles. Nor in the Council of Jerusalem, when the most important decisions are reached relative to the ground of union of Jewish and Gentile Christians, is one word found respecting the observance of the Sabbath. Contrariwise, Paul distinctly warns against the imposition of burdens upon the Church respecting days, but declares for a conscientious freedom in these observances. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. xiv, 5, 6). Still more strongly does he upbraid the Galatian Church for putting itself again in bondage to the weak and beggarly elements, ἐπὶ τὰ ἀσθενῆ καὶ πτωχὰ στοιχεῖα, as days, months, times, and years; while in his letter to the Colossians (Col. ii, 16, 17) he speaks of the entire abolition of the Jewish Sabbath.

¹ Schaff: Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. iii, p. 381. Cod. Theod., xv, 5, 2, a. 386: "Nullus Solis die populo spectaculum præbat."

From all the passages of the New Testament touching this question, it is plain that there is no intimation of the transference of the Sabbath to the first day of the week, nor of imposing upon Christians the obligation to observe it after the manner of the Jewish Sabbath. Rest was the chief thought connected with the one; joyous activity and glad worship with the other. Both days continued to be observed by the Jewish Christians, but the associations of the two were entirely dissimilar. Like all Christian institutions which have been examined, the first day of the week, or Sunday, came to be hallowed "from a natural fitness of things," and not by formal apostolic or ecclesiastical enactment.¹

The distinction between the Jewish Sabbath and the Lord's day is repeatedly set forth by the apostolic fathers, and the difference in the mode of observance. In the Barnabas letter it is argued that the six days mentioned in Gen. ii, 2, signify a thousand years each. After this time Christ, by the overthrow of Antichrist, will reign the seventh thousand years, which is the day of rest mentioned in Genesis. The rest and the sanctification of the real Sabbath will be the perfect sanctification of believers, and the working of righteousness. "Wherefore," he concludes, "we keep the eighth day with joyfulness, the day, also, in which Jesus rose again from the dead."²

Justin Martyr is very clear in his statements relative to the obligation and observance of the Jewish Sabbath and of the Lord's day. In his dialogue with the Jew Tryphon, ^{Justin's opinion.} who taunts the Christians with having no festivals nor Sabbaths, Justin clearly claims that Sunday is to them a new Sabbath, and that the entire Mosaic law has been abrogated.³ The ^{The Mosaic law} new law binding upon Christians regards every day as ^{abrogated.} a Sabbath, instead of passing one day in rest or absolute idleness. He further claims that the Sabbath was given to Israel under peculiar circumstances, and hence could not be of perpetual, but must be of only temporary obligation.¹ This temporary character of the commandment is further argued from the fact that the Sabbath had not been instituted at the beginning, but was first given to the Jews in the wilderness. As prior to Abraham circumcision had been unnecessary, and before Moses the Sabbath had not been enjoined, so since the coming of the Son of man the obligation to hallow the Sabbath no longer exists.

¹ v. Barry: art. "Lord's Day," in Smith and Cheetham's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, p. 1043.

² c. xv.

³ Om. Tryph., cc. 10, 11.

Tertullian claims that Adam, Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and Melchizedek knew nothing of a Sabbath day,² and that the law of Moses is not in perpetuity, but only of temporary obligation. The cessation from labor did not have its ground in the law of Moses, but came from the consideration that the joyous festival of the Lord's day should not be marred by any thing which would disturb or turn the thought away from God, and give place to the devil.³ That on Sunday the Christians stood while praying, and did not fast, find their explanation in the fact that the day of the resurrection of the Lord was looked upon as a day of rejoicing and triumph,⁴ and that such practice had apostolic sanction.

With respect to the strictness with which the first day of the week was observed during the first three centuries, the following facts are important to notice. Between the death of the apostles and the edict of Milan, the Lord's day was sanctified by a Church unrecognised by the state, and exposed to opposition and sometimes to bitter persecution. The motive for its observance was, therefore, purely moral and religious. The social position of the early Church, drawing its members, for the most part, from the poorer artisans, traders, and slaves, forbade the strict and general keeping of the Lord's day, much more of both the Sabbath and Sunday. Thus the universal hallowing of the day of the resurrection was impossible.

True, Tertullian advised Christians to postpone all business until Sunday was over,⁵ and the Apostolic Constitutions enjoin that the Sabbath and the Lord's day shall be observed as festivals,⁶ "because the former is the memorial of the creation, the latter of the resurrection;" that the slaves work five days; that on the Sabbath day and the Lord's day they are to have leisure to go to church for instruction in religious truth.⁷ But it is quite

¹ Id., cc. 18, 19.

² Con. Judæos, c. 4.

³ De Oratore, c. 23.

⁴ De Corona Mil., c. 3. Irenæus: Frag., c. 7. ⁵ de Orat., c. 23. ⁶ l. vii, c. 23.

⁷ l. viii, c. 33. The last book may have been composed after the publication of the edict of toleration. The mention of both the Sabbath and the Lord's day is evidence of the Jewish-Christian thought which characterizes most of this collection.

incredible that the large body of Christians could absolutely cease from toil during two days of the week, besides attending other festivals which had been instituted; or that masters would permit slaves and dependents to desist from labor for so large a proportion of the time, especially since the Christian Church had little favor with the heathen world. The Christians in the the third century being very largely in the minority, especially outside the great marts of trade, it is not to be supposed that all could secure even a single day of the seven for positive and continuous cessation from toil. It is well known that Christian gatherings took place at night, and it is probable that many converts of the servile or artisan classes laboured hard on the seventh and first days in order to be present at the evening assemblies and the sacred meal.¹ While the Jewish Christians still adhered with great tenacity to the observance of the seventh day, in the estimate of the Gentile converts this, at first, could have had no such sanctity or authoritative sanction. Converts from heathenism, who had had little previous acquaintance with the Jewish Scriptures, were probably, for a time, not in a position to appreciate the form and obligation of the fourth commandment as in its spirit applying to the Lord's day.²

Impossibility of literal observance.

The Gentile churches unacquainted with the obligation to keep the Lord's day.

Thus the recognition of two days was found in the churches composed chiefly of Jewish Christians, while in the Gentile-Christian churches the first day of the week would be more exclusively celebrated. When Tertullian says, "On the Lord's day every one of us Christians keeps the Sabbath, meditating in the law, and rejoicing in the works of God," there is noticed that adherence to a practical rule which was characteristic of the Western mind, but no inclination to sabbatize the Lord's day by deriving the obligation for its observance from the fourth commandment.³ Notwithstanding the beginnings of the

The fourth commandment not the basis of Lord's day observance.

¹ Cunningham: The Growth of the Church, p. 281.

² v. Rigg: The Sabbath and the Sabbath Law before and after Christ, London, 1869, p. 45.

³ "It is very suggestive that in the Scriptures the repose of God after creation is made the prototype and basis for the celebration of the Sabbath (Gen. ii, 3; Exod. xx, 8, seq.). It is therefore implied that it is our innermost Godlikeness that calls for the rest of the Sabbath—the truly rational, religiously moral essence of man, and not the mere natural need of repose and enjoyment. . . . God blessed the Sabbath day; there rests upon its observance a special, an extraordinary benediction, an impartation of heavenly goods, even as the blessing upon labour is primarily only an impartation of temporal goods. The Sabbath has not merely a negative significance, is not a mere interruption of labour, but it has a very rich positive significance—it is sacerdotal principle are found in Tertullian's writings, and its complete triumph was realized under Cyprian, there is by neither of these fathers any distinct recognition of the fourth commandment as the ground and reason of hallowing the day of the Lord's resurrection.

The Alexandrian school, as represented by Clement of Alexandria and Origen, more strongly presents the spiritual view of the Lord's day. In his argument with Celsus, Origen claims that true Christians make all days Lord's days; yet in other writings he exalts the first day over the seventh, as symbolic of a continuous Sabbath of rest.

In the midst of the corrupting influences of heathenism, and on account of the widespread indifference of the Church of the third century, after the ardor of her first love had cooled, the Christian teachers felt the necessity of bringing some stress of authority upon the Christian conscience to hold it to the faithful observance of the first day, as the Jews had known the power of a positive enactment in keeping them steadfast in the hallowing of their Sabbath. The constant temptation of the Christians to attend upon the heathen spectacles and festivities could, in the case of such whose type of piety was low, no longer, as at first, be broken by considerations of the high privileges of Christian worship, and of the commemoration of the resurrection of Christ, but the restraints coming from a quasi-legal enactment were found to be more and more necessary. Thus while the Christian fathers of the second and third centuries are in entire accord in teaching that the first day of the week, the Lord's day, is that which Christians should celebrate, there is, nevertheless, noticed during the unfortunate times of Tertullian and Cyprian a growing tendency to enforce the observance of Sunday by considerations somewhat similar to those recognised under the Mosaic dispensation and by the Jewish Christians; yet the obligation comes not from the fourth commandment, but from the apostolic institution of the Lord's day. Nor is there any evidence that the Christian emperors, from Constantine to Justinian, in their edicts for the observance and regulation of Sunday, were influenced by the Jewish law. During

The giving free scope to the higher, time-transcending nature of the rational, Godlike spirit, the reattaching of the spirit that had been immersed by labour into the temporal to the imperishable and to the divine. . . . The celebration of the Sabbath belongs to morality, per se, and does not depend on the fact of the state of redemption from sinfulness; but where sin is yet a dominant power, there its observance is less free, legally more strict than where the freedom of the children of God prevails." Wutke: Christian Ethics, trans. by Lacroix, New York, 1873, vol. ii, pp. 213, 214.

the first six centuries there are few if any instances of their direct appeal to the fourth commandment. Neither can many passages in the Christian writers, nor any conciliary decision, be quoted in which the authority for keeping the first day of the week is derived from the Mosaic law.

Nevertheless, from the time of the attempts of the emperors to adjust the civil conditions to the recognition of Sunday as the chief religious holiday, the sense of obligation to keep sacred the first day of the week, coming from legal enactment, more and more supplanted the consideration of the high and joyful privilege which had animated the Christian Church during the first years of its activity. From the last part of the sixth century the strict legalistic view becomes more and more prominent, and the rulers in State and Church incline to strengthen the civil and conciliary enactments respecting the Lord's day by divine authority as contained in the fourth commandment.¹

Yet the legal view supplanted
the moral.

¹ The sabbath literature is of immense volume. Since the Reformation the discussions upon the nature and obligation of the Sabbath have been many and exhaustive. The following are thorough and scholarly: Bingham: Antiquities of the Christian Church, bk. xx, chap. ii. Binterim: Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v, l, c. 1. Heylin: History of the Sabbath. Hessey: Sunday: Its Origin, History, and Present Obligation, Bampton Lectures, London, 1860. Gillilan: The Sabbath Viewed in the Light of Reason, Revelation, and History, New York, 1862. Probst: Kirchliche Disciplin der drei ersten Jahrhunderte, Bd. iii, 1. Cox: The Literature on the Sabbath Question, Edinburgh, 1865. Barry: "The Lord's Day," in Smith and Cheetham's Dictionary of Ch. Antiquities, vol. ii, pp. 1042-1053. Zöckler: "Sonntagsfeier," in Herzog u. Plitt's Real-Encyclopädie, Bd. xiv, ss. 428-436.

CHAPTER VI.

EASTER AND OTHER FESTIVALS.

§ 1. Idea and Time of Observance.

BESIDES the weekly observance of Sabbath and the Lord's day, the Passover, with which the passion and resurrection of Christ were so intimately associated, continued to exert a very considerable influence upon Christians of Jewish origin. This great festival, however, soon obtained an exclusively Christian significance, and became a proper Christian Passover, especially in churches composed of converts from heathenism, to whom Jewish institutions were largely matters of indifference. All Christians alike agreed in the propriety of the yearly celebration of the great events which were regarded as the most important in the history of redemption. Respecting the significance of these facts there was no difference of opinion; to keep alive the remembrance of the passion, death, and resurrection of the Lord was regarded by all alike as a high privilege and an imperative duty. The commemoration of the resurrection soon became the most important event of Holy Week, and is now known as Easter.

At an early date, probably in the first half of the second century, a difference of opinion arose as to the proper time of commemorating the resurrection of Christ, consequently respecting the time of observing the related events of the institution of the eucharist and of the crucifixion. Probably this controversy may be ultimately traced to the diversity of opinion in the churches of Jewish and Gentile origin respecting the obligations of the Mosaic institutions.¹ One party, the Christians of Asia Minor and a few others, adhered strictly to the tradition respecting the time of celebrating the passover by Christ and his apostles just before the crucifixion. Hence they uniformly observed the Christian passover on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, which was the first month of the sacred year of the Jews. This was observed as a fast. In the evening of the same day, Roman time, but at the beginning of the fifteenth

The influence of the Jewish passover.

Controversy about the time of observing Easter.

The Judaizing party.

¹ v. Renan : Marc-Aurèle, pp. 194, 195.

Nisan, Jewish time, they partook of the communion, to commemorate the last paschal supper of Christ. The beginning of the festival might fall upon any day of the week; only it had a fixed date, the fourteenth Nisan,¹ and this day regulated the entire Easter festival.

A second party, of which the Roman Church was the leader, celebrated the crucifixion of Christ on Friday, the day of ^{The Western} the week on which it actually occurred. ^{The Sunday party.} The following was observed as Easter, or the day of the resurrection. They extended the fast from Friday till Easter day, and did not celebrate the eucharist before the festival of the resurrection. By this arrangement the anniversary of the death of Christ always fell upon Friday, and that of the resurrection on Sunday; yet the feast was not fixed, as in the other case, but movable. Hence the Christian Sunday, or the day of resurrection, and not the Jewish paschal day, regulated the Easter festival.

§ 2. Attempts to Reconcile Differences.

The controversy respecting Easter had no reference to its doctrinal import; herein all Christians were essentially agreed. ^{The import of the question.} It was rather, as before said, a question of adherence to, or independence of Judaism, and of harmonizing the practice of the Christian world in the commemoration of the most important events in the Saviour's earthly mission. The fierceness of the controversy threatened the peace and unity of the Church. Near the middle of the second century Polycarp, the venerable Bishop of Smyrna, visited Rome in the interests of peace, and had an inter- ^{Attempts at} view with its bishop, Anicetus.² ^{reconciliation.} The attempt to unify the churches was unsuccessful, although a spirit of mutual charity was promoted. About twenty years later the question was again debated in Laodicea between the Quarto-decimanians and their opponents. No rupture occurred because of the mutual forbearance of the parties. But the controversy continued. Toward the close of the second century the Roman bishop, Victor, ^{The demand of Victor.} attempted to interfere with the churches of Asia Minor, by commanding them to desist from their mode of celebrating Easter. To this demand the synod of Asia Minor, which met at Ephesus, made a most spirited reply through Polycrates, bishop of that city, appealing in defense of their rule to the traditions which had come down to them from the apostles John and Philip, as well as from the venerable Polycarp. To sustain their practice, the church of Rome and its adherents among the Eastern churches quoted the traditions received from the apostles Peter and Paul. The schism, which seemed imminent on the threat of Victor to excommunicate the Quarto-decimans, was happily prevented by the good offices of the other bishops, especially of Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons. While of the party of Victor, he claimed that no difference of opinion, where an essential dogma of Christianity was not involved, could justify the jeoparding of the peace of the Church and the extreme penalty of excommunication.

¹ Eusebius: Hist. Eccles., v, c. 23. "It was incumbent on them, at all times, to make an end of the fast on this day, on whatever day of the week it should happen to fall." Also Hippolytus: Philosophumena, viii, c. 18.

² a. Eusebius: Hist. Eccles., v, c. 24.

The Council of Arles, A. D. 314, and the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, decided in favor of the Roman rule, and those who refused to accede to this decision were regarded as heretics. The rule promulgated by the latter council was that Easter should be celebrated on the first Sunday following the first full moon after the vernal equinox, and must always come after the Jewish passover. If, however, the full moon occurs on a Sunday, Easter falls on the Sunday after. Thus the time of this festival may vary from March 21 to April 25. This was probably the substance of the Nicene decisions.¹

This conciliary decision did not, however, settle the differences in the Eastern and Western churches, owing to the different astronomical cycles employed for the calculation of Easter. The cycles aimed to discover a period which should contain an exact number of lunar months and of tropical years. Many cycles were proposed, as one of eight years, of nineteen years (the Metonic), of seventy-six years (the Calippic), one of one hundred and twelve years, engraved on the side of the chair in the statue of Hippolytus (v. Fig. 50), one of eighty-four years, which was a modification of the Calippic, etc. The diversity of cycles resulted in a corresponding difference in reckoning the Easter Sunday.² Since the ¹ The decisions of the Nicene Council are not quite clearly stated in any single authority; they must be gathered from several sources, and have not been entirely unquestioned.

² The recent works occasioned by the bearing of the Easter controversy upon the criticism of the gospels, especially John, are quite numerous and important. Among the ablest may be mentioned Hilgenfeld: Der Paschastreit der alten Kirche nach seiner Bedeutung für die Kirchengeschichte, etc., Halle, 1860. Steitz: In the Studien u. Kritiken, 1856, 1857, 1859. Schürer: Die Paschastreiten des 2ten Jahrhunderts, 1870. For mathematical computations see especially Ideler: Handbuch der Math. und tech. Chronologie, Breslau, 1825. De Rossi: Inscriptiones Christ. urbis Romæ, Introduction, gives valuable discussions.

Alexandrian Church fixed the vernal equinox on the 21st of March, while with the Romans it fell on March 18, it is evident that there must have been a diversity in the observance of Easter Sunday. This diversity has not yet disappeared, since the Eastern Church has never adopted the improved Gregorian calendar.¹

§ 8. The Ceremonies of Easter.

To understand these it is necessary to remember that Easter was the central point of the paschal season, which very early extended over a period of fifteen days. The first week was designated πάσχα σταυρώσιμον, or the passover of the cross; the second week, πάσχα ἀναστάσιμον, or the passover of the resurrection. While not of apostolic institution, this observance of Easter was early introduced into the Church. Tertullian seems to recognise its celebration,² and the Apostolic Constitutions represent it as quite general. The πάσχα σταυρώσιμον was usually kept as a strict fast, from midnight of the previous Sunday (Palm Sunday) till cock-crowing on Easter morn. On Good Friday, the day of crucifixion, the fast was continued beyond midnight of the following day; the kiss of peace was prohibited, the ornaments of the altar were removed; the lights were extinguished; no chanting was allowed in the processions; there was no consecration of the eucharist; the collects were mostly intercessory.

As the Easter morn drew near, the signs of sorrow and mourning were laid aside, the lamps and tapers were lighted, and a scene of darkness and mourning was succeeded by one of splendour and gladness. Prayer, supplication, the singing of psalms and hymns, the reading of appropriate Scripture lessons, and homilies from the clergy occupied the hours of the evening and night. The Easter Sunday, from Easter eve to the evening of Easter day, was one continuous celebration of the resurrection. The Scripture readings included the entire resurrection history; the joy of the people was unrestrained; all labour was suspended. After the recognition of Christianity by the empire, prisoners were often released, debtors forgiven, and slaves manumitted. The entire week was thus considered a season of uninterrupted rejoicing.

¹ Kulenbrunner: Real-Encyclopädie der Christlichen Alterthümer, article "Ostern," Bd. i, s. 565, seq., divides the Easter controversies into three periods: 1st. The theologico-dogmatic, reaching to the Council of Nice, A. D. 325. 2d. The astronomical-chronologic, from A. D. 325 to the time of Dionysius Exiguus, A. D. 525. 3d. From A. D. 525 to the time of the Venerable Bede, about the middle of the eighth century, during which the rule accepted by the Catholic Church was in conflict with the various peculiarities of the provinces. For the theologian the first is of especial interest, on account of the connection of these controversies with the criticism of the evangelists. The second and third are more important to the historian, because they are indispensable to the solution of chronological questions.

² ad Uxor., ii, c. 4.

By degrees the fast preparatory to Easter Sunday was lengthened, until, probably about the time of Constantine, it reached forty days (Quadragesima, Lent). The rejoicings were also continued through the whole period of fifty days (Quinquagesima) from Easter to the day of Pentecost (Whitsunday).¹

§ 4. The Festival of Pentecost.

The term Pentecost was used by the ancient Church in two senses: one had reference to the fiftieth day after the resurrection of Christ, when the Holy Spirit was poured out upon the infant Church; the other included the whole period between Easter and Whitsuntide, which was considered as belonging to the rejoicings of Easter. Used in the latter sense it was called Quinquagesima. During the fifty days the eucharist was celebrated daily, fasting was forbidden, and the congregation stood while praying. Also from the fifth century the Lord's ascension was observed on the fortieth day, his various manifestations to his disciples after the resurrection were recalled, and, as a crowning glory, the baptism of the Holy Spirit was commemorated on Whitsunday, the final day of the Easter period. This being the last great festival of the year, the Sundays following until Advent were reckoned therefrom.

§ 5. The Feasts of Epiphany, Christmas, etc.

After the union of Church and State feasts and festivals were greatly multiplied, and occupied a large place in the religious services. This was in obedience to a law of the spiritual life, that when piety is waning forms and ceremonies are substituted, and become more highly valued.

The feast of the Epiphany was usually observed on the 6th of January, to commemorate Christ's manifestation in the flesh. At first this included his advent and baptism, but later, when Christmas became a regularly observed festival, it was confined to his baptism. The date of the birth of ¹ Probably so called from the custom of newly baptized persons appearing in white clothing from Easter day to Whitsunday.

Christ it is impossible to determine. Neither in the Scripture record nor in the patristic literature are found sufficient data for solving this problem. The birth of Christ had been placed on the 25th of December by the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries; but the reasons for this decision cannot be satisfactorily determined.

Date of Christ's birth unknown.

There is equal uncertainty respecting the origin of the Christmas festival. Numerous theories have been advocated, but none are universally accepted. Many circumstances point to its origin in the attempted christianization of various heathen festivals which were celebrated on or near the 25th of December.

Supposed origin of the festival.

If this supposition is well founded, its origin must have been subsequent to the recognition of Christianity by the State; since the well known hostility of the ante-Nicene fathers to the heathen festivals would have absolutely forbidden a syncretism of rites so abhorrent. But the general decline of spiritual life during the fourth and fifth centuries, and the reception of multitudes into the Church who were moved by no higher motives than popularity or worldly interest, prepared the Christian Church to connect with her own festivals those derived from the heathen cultus which might appear to have symbolic reference to the life and work of Christ. Such were the Saturnalia, Sigillaria, Juvenalia, and Brumalia, which were celebrated in the month of December to commemorate the golden age of freedom and equality, also in honour of the unconquered sun, which renewed its strength at the winter solstice.

Low type of spirituality.

The laboured investigations given to this subject have quite firmly established the following conclusions:

1. Until near the close of the fourth century the Nativity was celebrated in the Oriental churches in connection with the Epiphany, or on January 6—this custom continuing in many parts of the East for a century or more later.

Conclusions reached.

2. From a much earlier date the Nativity was celebrated in the Western churches on December 25, and it occupies an important place in the most ancient liturgies. It is, however, impossible to fix the date when the change from January 6 to December 25 was made.

3. Since the beginning of the fifth century, December 25 was quite generally recognised as the day for the celebration of the Nativity, and was counted among the most important festivals of the Christian year.

4. There was a growing tendency to recognise days of preparation for its celebration, as Christmas vigils, and, later, four advent Sundays in the West, and six advent Sundays in the East, as means for awakening a desire for the coming Redeemer. Likewise, the season between Christmas and Epiphany was afterward filled up with feast days, each designed to recall the memory of some person or event connected with the Nativity, as St. Stephen's day, December 26; St. John's day (the evangelist), December 27; and the Innocents, December 28.

When Mariolatry came to be practised by the Church of the fifth century and following centuries, there gathered round this cultus a great number of festivals in honour of the Virgin, commemorating many real or apocryphal events in her life. This worship assumed such prominence in the Middle Ages as almost to supersede that paid to Christ himself. Also the multiplication of saints, and especially the canonization of those who had suffered martyrdom during the trying periods of the history of the Church, greatly multiplied the number of feasts and festivals, until almost the entire year was devoted to some event in the lives of these who received the homage of a Church from which the earnest spirit of piety had largely departed.

BOOK FOURTH.

THE

ARCHÆOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN LIFE.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF CHRISTIAN LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

THE CHRISTIAN FAMILY.

"God setteth the solitary in families" (Psa. lxxviii, 6). The family is the initial state, or contains it in germ. It is often made the Scripture type of the Church. The Church begins with the first true worship in the household. The family a type of the Church. The love, the confidence, the tender care of each for the other, which should characterize the family, are often used to illustrate the community of interest felt by the individual members of the Church, and the intimacy of the relations of Christ to his Church (Rev. xix, 6-10; xxi, 9).

The stability and purity of the Church and State have been proportionate to the popular and legal estimate of the sanctity and stability of the marriage relationship. The presence of Christ at the wedding in Cana of Galilee, where he performed his first miracle to contribute to the rejoicings of the occasion. Christ's sanction. (John ii, 7, seq.), happily illustrates the feeling and teaching of Christianity with respect to marriage. Christ is explicit in his inculcation of the divine origin and sacredness of this institution. It is more than filial duty; it is unifying; the twain become one through the purity and intensity of a mutual love; common interests are necessitated by common affection (Matt. xix, 5, 6; Eph. v, 31). The teaching of the founder of the new religion, that only one single ground of divorce is lawful, One ground of divorce. alike distinguished his followers from both Jews and heathen of his day. He revolutionized society by giving to the family a sure foundation, and by the elevation of woman to be the true companion and equal of man.

The example of Peter (Matt. viii, 14; Mark i, 30; Luke iv, 38), and the express teaching of New Testament writers (1 Tim. v, 14; Heb. xiii, 4; 1 Tim. iv, 3), are in harmony with the conduct of Christ respecting the sanctity of the marriage relation. Moreover, Paul's teaching harmonious with that of Christ. the counsel of Paul to the Corinthian Church, evidently in reply to their request, is entirely consistent with the general doctrine of the New Testament. He guards marriage so carefully that even to those who are joined to unbelievers the advice is given not to disturb their relationships except by mutual consent and for mutual good.¹

This remained the teaching of the Church for two hundred and fifty years. The Pauline doctrine of expediency as to marriage, and of the sacred duty of parties who have entered into the marriage union to remain faithful to each other, is clearly recognised by the apostolic fathers and their immediate followers. In the epistle to Diognetus the author speaks of the manners of the Christians, and institutes comparisons and contrasts between these and the heathen customs. "For they neither inhabit cities of their own, nor employ a peculiar kind of speech, nor lead a life which is marked out by any singularity. . . . They dwell in their own countries, but simply as sojourners. As citizens they share in all things with others, and yet endure all things as if foreigners. Every foreign land is to them as their native country, and every land of their birth as a land of strangers. They marry as do all; they beget children; but they do not destroy their offspring. They have a common table, but not a common bed. They are in the flesh, but they do not live after the flesh."²

Likewise in the epistle to Polycarp, Ignatius retains the Pauline spirit in recognising the doctrine of expediency with respect to marriage, but is very rigid with regard to the sacredness of this relationship when once entered into, and with respect to the duty of mutual helpfulness. "Speak to my sisters, that they love the Lord, and be satisfied with their husbands both in the flesh and spirit. In like manner, also, exhort my brethren, in the name of Jesus Christ, that they love their wives, even as the Lord the Church. . . . Let all things be done to the honour of God."³

¹ There is no real contradiction in the teachings of 1 Cor. vii. No rigid law can be imposed. "I have no commandment of the Lord" (ver. 25); the circumstances of each must govern each; "the present distress" is the key to the whole teaching; if one has power of self-control, then, in the present circumstances of peril, celibacy may be best; but if not, owing to the fearful temptations of Corinthian society, marriage is advisable. But when marriage has been entered into, duty is plain; no separation, even for a season, is permitted except by mutual consent. The rights of husband and wife are reciprocal.

² Ad Diognet., c. v.

³ Ad Polyc., c. v.

In his apology to the emperor and senate, Justin Martyr is no less explicit in his interpretation and enforcement of Christ's teachings. He especially dwells upon the law of adultery and divorce, as given by Christ, to show the opinion and practice of the Christians. This is so opposed to the law of the heathen government that the apologist claims that he knew of men and women of sixty or seventy years of age who have continued pure during all their lives; "and I boast that I could produce such from every race of men."¹ He also adds, what is consonant with the Pauline teaching, "But whether we marry, it is only that we may bring up children; or whether we decline marriage, we live continently."

Justin Martyr.

The early Romans far excelled the Greeks in their respect for and honour of woman. Yet among the former she was absolutely destitute of rights apart from her husband, while with the latter she was usually the veriest slave.

Position of woman among the Romans.

Even in the earliest and purest period of Roman history, when monogamy was enjoined on the husband, and the infidelity of the wife was visited with heavy penalties, the marital authority disregarded the law of nature, and changed moral subjection into legal slavery.² The family being absolutely guided by the single will of the head of the household (paterfamilias), the wife and child, equally with the bullock and the slave, were destitute of legal rights. To rear or not to rear the child which the wife

Without legal rights.

had borne him rested with the free will of the householder. In the family woman necessarily held a position of domestic subjection.³

In the later years of the republic, after the emancipation of woman from the rigor of the earlier laws had Evils under the later republic.

been partially effected, the weakness of heathen morality was shown in the fearful relaxation of the ties of domestic life, and in the bitter complaints of the sterner moralists against the evils of celibacy, the shameless extravagance of women, the prostitution of marriage to a matter of mercantile speculation, and the consequent ease and frequency of divorce. Celibacy, childlessness, and infanticide had become so common among the upper classes during the closing period of the republic that the Latin stock had been largely diminished, and final extinction was threatened. So alarming was the situation that the first emperor, in order to save the nation, regarded it as necessary to set legal bounds to luxury, to curtail the practice of adultery and divorce by measures of the utmost sever-

Legal restraints.

¹ Apol., c. xv.

² v. Mommsen: History of Rome, New York, 1870, vol. i, pp. 49, 89.

³ Ibid., pp. 89, 90.

ity, and to offer extraordinary rewards to fathers¹ who should rear large families. But the disease was too deepseated for radical cure; it could only be held in check by the vigorous treatment of a master mind like Julius Cæsar. It broke out anew with increased

The conflict. virulence under his successors. It was this Roman social world, emasculated of its earlier and robuster virtues, inoculated with the vices of Oriental luxury, and weakened by long indulgence, which was opposed to the simple teachings of Jesus and his apostles respecting the sacredness of the marital relationship, the equality of man and wife, the high sanctity of maternity, and the solemn duty of child nurture.

The Christian fathers are earnest in their defence of the purity of Christian morals, in contrast with this abounding corruption of heathenism. Tertullian boldly challenges an examination Tertullian's teaching. of the life and practices of the Christians, and plainly upbraids the heathen for their wicked practice of infanticide.² He as ardently defends the sanctity of marriage against the opinions of some schools of the Gnostics, especially Marcion.³ His is strictly the Pauline view. He neither prescribes abstinence from marriage, nor does he insist upon it. He says that the Creator bestowed his blessing upon the institution as on an honourable estate, as he did upon the whole of his creatures for good and wholesome uses.⁴ The limitations of desire, and the duty of fidelity to vows, are not imposed upon woman alone, but upon both man and wife alike.

A like contrast is seen in the care and rights of childhood under the heathen and Christian systems. The difference of teaching and Heathen and Christian view of abortion. practice is here world-wide. Scarcely a statute condemnatory of abortion is found in all the range of Grecian or Roman jurisprudence. If regretted and condemned at all, no check was given to an almost universal practice which was sapping the energies of the heathen world. While recognised as wrong by many of the heathen moralists, it scarcely received a severe cen-

Opinions respecting infanticide. sure in all their writings. So also with infanticide. The practice was almost universal among the Greeks. It finds a place in the ideal systems of the best philosophers and thinkers; it is permitted by the statutes of Lycurgus and Solon. The position of the Greek mother encouraged it. The Roman view was better, although its practice was scarcely improved. Tertullian retorts the charges of immorality upon the heathen with withering sarcasm.⁵ Probably the opposite policies of Greece and

¹ v. Friedländer: Sittengeschichte Roms, Bd. i, s. 54.

² Ad Nationes, l. i, c. 15; Apol., c. ix.

³ Contra Mar., c. 29.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Ad Nat., i, 13; Apol., c. ix.

Rome—the one discouraging and the other encouraging population—had much to do with the practice of exposure and infanticide.¹ So deep was the conviction of the Roman ^{ineffectual leg-} legislators that these evils were threatening the life ^{isolation.} of the state, that the absolute right of the father over his offspring had early been so far limited as to forbid him to expose or destroy any well formed child until it had completed its third year.² Yet Tertullian plainly intimates that these laws were easily evaded, and had little power to correct these widely prevalent practices.³

From its view of the sanctity of human life, Christianity placed a guard at its fountain-head. In contrast with the widespread indifference of the heathen moralists respecting abortion, the Church branded it as a crime of peculiar enormity, scarcely inferior to murder itself. Abortion, infanticide, and the exposure of children were usually placed in the same class of crimes; they were ^{Abortion and} constructive murder. By conciliary decree the guilty ^{infanticide.} mother was excluded from the sacraments, at first till the day of death, but this was afterward relaxed to ten and seven years of penance. As we examine the treatment of children in the household, the same contrast between heathen and Christian methods is manifest. The blessing pronounced by Christ upon young children, as subjects of his kingdom (Matt. xviii, 2-5; Mark x, 15; Luke ix, 47), continued to be recognised in the early Church. ^{Biblical teaching relative to training of children.} The apostolic injunction, "Fathers, provoke not your children unto anger lest they be discouraged" (Col. iii, 21), "but bring them up in the fear and admonition of the Lord" (Eph. vi, 4), implied a sacred obligation to properly train the child, and on the part of the child certain rights as against the parents. This was in direct contrast with the provisions of the early Roman law, which recognised the absolute power ^{Contrary to the} of the father to dispose of his child; even to sell it into ^{Roman law.} slavery or to deprive it of life. The mitigation of the severity of the earlier law by the more humane feelings of later times, and by the wisdom of the great Roman jurists,⁴ had moderated, not removed, this contrast. The Christian father enjoined obedience, but his power over his offspring was limited by the consideration that both alike belonged to God. The few pictures of the Christian household drawn by the ante-Nicene writers of the Church are beau-

¹ v. Lecky: Op. cit., vol. ii, p. 27.

² Ibid., pp. 22, 27. v. also Minutius Felix, Athanagoras, and Lactantius.

³ Ad Nat., i, 15.

⁴ Milman: Latin Christianity, vol. i, pp. 496, 497.

tiful, and clearly show the vast superiority of the Christian over the heathen family. Tertullian exclaims, "What a union is that of two believers who have one hope, one rule of life, and one service! . . . In alternate song echo psalms and hymns; they vie with each other who best shall praise their God. When Christ sees such things, he rejoices. To these he sends his own peace. Where two are, there also is he. Where he is, there the evil one is not."¹ And Clement of Alexandria affirms, "The children glory in their mother, the husband in his wife, and she in them, and all in God."

Since the opinion of the Church of the first three centuries was so pronounced respecting the sanctity of marriage and of the family, it might be presumed that it had careful oversight of the parties proposing marriage, and prescribed the rules of its celebration. While the Church had no legal jurisdiction over marriage until the time of Justinian, the Christians had nevertheless accompanied it with solemn religious ceremonies, and hallowed it by the benediction of the community of believers. The Pauline doctrine, not to be "unequally yoked together with unbelievers" (2 Cor. vi, 14), was long regarded as of binding force. Tertullian is clear in his teachings on this point. Cyprian regards the directions of Paul as wise and obligatory. The post-Nicene theologians, as Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, and others, are positive and earnest in warning against these entangling alliances, while the conciliary decisions are firm and unyielding. The Church also prescribed the limits of affinity or consanguinity within which lawful wedlock was forbidden. The decisions of some of the councils are full and explicit, and persons who violate these rules are declared guilty of incest, and liable to severe ecclesiastical penalties. Likewise clandestine marriages are forbidden. Ignatius says, "But it becomes both men and women who marry to form their union with the approval of the bishop, that their marriage may be according to God, and not after their own lusts."² Those were days of trial and danger, and the propriety and duty of taking advice of the church officers respecting this most sacred relation are frequently urged by the Christian writers both before and after Constantine.³ The necessity of obtaining the consent of parents to the marriage of children under lawful age is another evidence of the care with which the relationship was guarded, and the purity of the Church maintained.

¹ Ad Uxor., xi, 8, 9.

² Ad Polyc., c. v.

³ v. Tertullian: Ad Uxor., l. xi, c. 2.

The plain and wholesome teaching of the New Testament, and of most of the Christian fathers of the first three centuries respecting marriage and the family relation, was afterwards weakened by two principles whose baneful influence was long felt in both East and West: asceticism and monasticism. Family relationship weakened by two principles.

Asceticism has pertained to every religion, and to every stage of society. It was found in heathen Rome. Whether this practice among the Romans is to be attributed to a feeling of disgust, on the part of a few nobler minds, with the prevailing impurity, to the rise of Neoplatonism and the revival of the Pythagorean philosophy, to the Oriental religions, or to the unconscious yet powerful influence of Christianity, may not be fully determined. Possible origin of Asceticism. Probably each and all these forces were in operation to produce the effect. Certainly the doctrine of both Neoplatonism and Pythagoreanism, that matter was essentially evil, when carried to its logical result would lead its votaries to regard the human body, with its appetites and passions, as a source of evil, and the indulgence of sensuous desires as incompatible with loftiest virtue. The practical effect of the theory upon the heathen world in correcting the prevalent impurity was, however, but slight. Nevertheless, if the records are to be trusted, it is noteworthy that some most conspicuous public characters were plainly influenced by this philosophy. The celibate life of Apollonius of Tyana, the abstemiousness of Zenobia, the maintenance of her virginity by the pagan wife, Hypatia, the continence of Julian after the early loss of his wife, are clear indications of the influence of the Neoplatonic teaching, as well as of a desire for the reformation of paganism, which the superior morality of Christianity had provoked. Heathen examples. To what degree the severe asceticism of the Indian religions affected the western mind, and how far the Buddhist monasticism was the suggestion and furnished the type of the Christian orders of monks, are debated questions. It can, however, hardly be doubted that this ancient and widely prevalent religion was known to the West, while the striking similarity of the discipline of the Buddhistic and Christian monks suggests a common origin, or at least similar conditions.

But the perversion of the teachings of Christianity, which inculcated the prime duty of purity, was most powerful to effect the change of opinion with reference to the married state. The conflict of the Church with the social evil which was threatening the life of the empire had been stubborn and persistent. From the first the words of Paul as to the lawfulness of a celibate life had been influential, and a condition of continence had received high praise from the Christian fathers. The declining piety of the third century, and the doctrine of the merit of good works, which had its origin in the penitential system of the age of Cyprian, greatly strengthened the tendency to asceticism. An unnatural and unscriptural view of chastity induced the opinion that the married state was unfavorable to the realization of the highest perfection, and that immaculate purity could be attained only in the condition of celibacy or virginity, or by the practice of the most rigid abstinence.

Nevertheless, the frequent legislation, both civil and ecclesiastical, shows how difficult it was to enforce the condition of celibacy and chastity, even in case of those who had taken upon themselves the most solemn vows. The law of Jovian, A. D. 364, denouncing the attempt to marry a nun as a capital crime, was wholly ineffectual to prevent the scandal. Yet the opinion of the Church respecting the sacredness of the marriage relation is shown from the fact that while the synod of Rome, A. D. 384, declares the union of men with nuns who have taken vows of celibacy to be adultery, it did not venture to order their separation from their husbands. In spite of Augustine's commendation of virginity, and his favorable opinion of celibacy, he regards the marriage of nuns as binding, and deprecates the evil results of separating man and wife under such circumstances. A careful examination of this legislation will show that the efforts to declare such marriages invalid completely failed; and that in the fifth century there was a tendency to judge these marriages more tenderly, and not to interfere with them.¹

As asceticism made war against one of the three great foes of the human soul, the flesh, so monasticism proposed to flee from another, the world. Men withdrew from society in order to concentrate their entire energies upon the purification of the spirit through watching, fasting, and prayer. Monasticism ignored the social duties and the holy work of elevating mankind by personal contact and influence, and was at heart a system of absolute spiritual selfishness.

The two principles lying at the foundation of monasticism, celibacy and asceticism, were alike hostile to the married state, pernicious to the family, and consequently hurtful to the truest interests of society. The fuller discussion of their influence upon Christian morality does not fall within the plan of our inquiry. It need only be added that by many of the post-Nicene writers celibacy and absolute abstinence from carnal pleasures are regarded as the highest virtues; marriage is a necessary evil entailed by the fall, which must be endured by those content with low attainments in moral purity; the family is no longer the most sacred institution of God; the position of the wife and mother is almost infinitely below that of her upon whom rest the vows of perpetual virginity.¹

¹ Lea: Hist. of Sacerdotal Celibacy, Boston, 1884, pp. 103-105.

Celibacy and virginity the highest virtues.

Thus the powerful protest against the abounding impurity led the Church to the other extreme of severity. What was at first regarded in the light of a duty, plainly flowing from principles enunciated by Christ and his apostles, was exalted to the position of the most meritorious work for the attainment of salvation. The low standard of piety, and the perturbed state of society consequent upon the rivalries of the East and West, and upon the tribal migrations, contributed still further to these unhappy results. But amid all the influences unfavourable to the family life the Church was careful to guard its sanctity; it placed the family on a lower plane only by attributing to a celibate and virgin state a loftier dignity.

Sad consequences.

¹ See especially the treatises on virginity by several of the most influential and able post-Nicene theologians—Basil, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Augustine, and others. The language of Jerome, the great promoter of monasticism in the West, is often most extravagant in praise of virginity and a recluse life, and contemptuous when he refers to the married state.

CHAPTER II.

THE CHURCH AND SLAVERY.

"RENDER therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's" (Matt. xxii, 21). "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. . . . For he is the minister of God to thee for good" (Rom. xiii, 1-4). In these passages are expressed the relations of the early Church to the government under which its members then lived. The duty of obedience to civil authority is here plainly inculcated. The qualifying teaching of Peter has reference to those cases where men are unable to submit to civil injunctions, and prefer to suffer for conscience' sake, or where government has so far forgotten the reason of its institution as to be no longer a terror to evil doers or a praise to the good. The Christian Church proposed no revolution in the civil order, but aimed to permeate society with a new principle which would effect all needed reforms.

Relations of the Church to civil government.

A new law. The declaration of Christ, "My kingdom is not of this world" (John xviii, 36), embodied the true spirit of the Church in relation to secular authority. The existing forms were accepted; the realm where Christ was to reign was the human spirit; the law of his government was the law of love. This law being supreme over all alike who should become subjects of his kingdom, an equality of privilege was recognised in the midst of the most diverse social conditions. It is the silent yet powerful operation of this law which is to be considered in estimating the influence of Christianity upon Roman institutions and life.

At the time of the Advent slavery was an institution recognised and regulated by the Roman law; slaves were found in every province of the vast empire. This unfortunate class had at first been chiefly captives taken in war; at a later period, when the original source of supply had largely ceased, they were propagated by means of numerous marriages encouraged by the owners. They were the property of the masters; the children could be sold or alienated like other property.

Slavery a fixed institution.

Condition of the slave.

While policy or feelings of humanity might lead masters to mitigate the severities of bondage, and political or social considerations frequently induced the manumission of slaves, they were, nevertheless, at the mercy of every caprice and passion of the owner. Nor does the fact that self-interest often led the great families to encourage in their slaves the cultivation of the practical and fine arts,¹ and even to assist some to rise to the position of teachers, counselors, and companions, change the essential features of the system. A freedman could not be the equal of the freeborn; by him no civil or military honor was attainable; his sons were excluded from the senate; they were tainted with servility to the third and fourth generations.² While it is impossible to determine the number of slaves in the empire, or even their proportion to the entire population, it is universally conceded that their condition was fearfully degraded, and that they were a constant threat to the peace and prosperity of the state.

Christianity recognised this, as it did other institutions of the empire. No attempt was made for its immediate abolition. A new and despised religion, gathering its votaries at first, for the most part, from the humble, and often from the servile class, was not in position to make open war upon an institution hoary with age and of well nigh universal prevalence. The Scripture teaching is that liberty is of the Spirit; that the relations of master and slave are only accidental, not essential; that a slave can be the truest freeman through the liberty wherewith Christ shall make him free. The teaching of Scripture and of the early Christian fathers is usually that of submission and obedience to the existing laws. The expectation of the early reappearing of Christ to establish his kingdom among men, which from time to time finds expression in the writings of the apostles and early fathers, probably led the early Church to regard social distinctions as of slight importance. Since every disciple of Christ was a citizen of the kingdom of heaven, a kingdom different from, and exalted far above, all earthly governments, the Church renounced all claim to earthly rulership, and could remain indifferent toward existing social distinctions. The care of the Church was for the relief of the immediate wants of its members. The motive to the alleviation of hardships did not seem to be like that of the philosophers of the Stoic schools, namely, to introduce into society a more humane feeling; but the conviction of the supernatural freedom and equality to which men were invited found expression among the early Churches only in the religious life and intercourse. This spiritual freedom and equality pertained to the life of fellowship which Christianity did not attempt direct abolition.

¹ v. Friedländer: Sittengeschichte Roms, Bd. iii, ss. 258, 259.

² Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., Harper's edition, New York, 1880, vol. i, p. 51.

was experienced by Christians themselves, without directly influencing political action or instituting means for the early abolition of slavery. Yet this was by no means the whole work of the Christian Church.

"The treatment of slaves by their Christian masters, and the relation of Christian slaves to their masters, underwent an immediate change. . . . As members of the Church there was no difference between them. They came to the same house of God, acknowledged one Lord, prayed and sang together, ate of the same bread, and drank from the same cup. . . . The Church, it is true, would not receive a slave without a certificate of good conduct from his Christian master, but when this condition was complied with he became a full member without any limitations. He was even eligible to its offices, not excepting that of bishop. Not infrequently it occurred that a slave was an elder in the same church of which his master was only a member.

"The Church bestowed labor on both slaves and masters. . . . According to pagan conceptions slaves were incapable of morality. The Church trained them for virtue, and not unsuccessfully. There were many slaves who, in extremely difficult circumstances, attested the reality of their Christian life with fidelity and great endurance. Even among the martyrs there was an unbroken line of slaves. The fairest crown fell on them, as well as to the free. . . . Harsh treatment of slaves was regarded a sufficient ground for excommunication. . . . The Church would not minister to the merely natural desires of the slaves for liberty. Yet it deemed it a praiseworthy act for a master to emancipate a slave.

It gladly recognised emancipation as a work of Christian love, and manumissions often occurred. . . . After the third century, it was customary to perform the act of manumission in the Church, before the priest and the congregation. The master led his slave by the hand to the altar; there the deed of emancipation was read aloud, and at the close the priest pronounced the benediction. . . . Their former masters esteemed it a duty to help and counsel them as Christian brethren, and thus they did not find themselves isolated, but in the midst of a communion which instructed them to be active and useful men."¹

Yet it is unhistoric to attribute the abolition of slavery and the rehabilitation of manual labour exclusively to Christianity. The Roman Stoics, like other philosophers before them, had taught the duty of humanity to slaves, and had announced with clearness the principle that bondage and freedom were only accidents of society, that the master may be a bondman to his vices, while the slave may be the noblest freeman through his virtues. In this respect the teaching of Stoicism was very like that of Christianity. Some emperors, too—notably Hadrian, the Antonines, and Alexander Severus—through a sentiment of sympathy, or moved by fear, promulgated laws restricting the power of the master, and protecting the slaves from many cruel and harmful practices which had long disgraced Roman civilization. Moreover, these maxims of the Stoics, relative to the essential equality of man, had powerfully influenced the Roman jurisprudence, and led to a consequent amelioration of the condition of the servile classes.¹

¹ Uhlhorn: Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, pp. 184-188.

Nor can it be claimed that the legislation of the Christian emperors of the fourth century, respecting the condition and rights of slaves, was a very great advance upon that of the heathen emperors of the third. By the abolition of the punishment of crucifixion the slaves had gained, since they had been chiefly exposed to this dreadful penalty; but still more humane and wide-reaching was the enactment of the statute forbidding the separation of their families.² The legislation of Justinian was, however, almost revolutionary. The two great disabilities under which the slave population had suffered for so many centuries, namely, the power of the master to subject the slave to torture, and the non-recognition of the legality of slave marriage, were entirely removed. This may be regarded as the most important legislative contribution to the abolition of slavery which was made by the Christian emperors prior to the seventh century. To this may be added the removal of all restrictions to the manumission of slaves, which had hitherto prevented the action prompted by the humane impulses of noble men, both pagan and Christian.

The influence of the moral type, which Christianity encouraged, has been strongly emphasized by some writers on the relations of Christianity to slavery.³ The qualities neglected or despised by the heathen world were, under the Christian system, crowned as royal virtues. Humility is often commanded by Christ, and he who would be great in his kingdom is instructed to become the servant of all. Service, helpfulness, charity, long-suffering, gentleness, patience, goodness, forgiveness, non-resistance, are the graces which especially adorn the Christian character. To what extent this view of the perfection of human character brought the Christian Church into closer relationships to the large class of Roman slaves is worthy of most thoughtful consideration; doubtless it was one important motive to their care, and to the amelioration of their condition.

¹ Tertullian, in Apologeticus, speaks of these changes, and attributes them to a secret working of nature, tending toward Christianity, not by Christianity.

² v. Lecky: Op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 63, 64.

³ Lecky: Op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 63, 69.

Another notable service rendered by the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries was her strong and persistent opposition to the prevalent luxury. The discourses of the great preachers and monks abound in warnings against the destroying vices, against excess in dress, food, and equipage, and also very especially against immoral and lustful callings, as those of actors, gladiators, panders, etc. This check placed upon luxury and extravagance had the direct effect to decrease the demand for the labour of slaves, and thereby to contribute to their more rapid manumission.¹

While the relation of Christianity to Roman slavery has been vigorously discussed,² and the opinions of investigators have by no means been accordant, we see from the spirit of Christ's teaching, as well as from abundant testimony gathered from the writings of the Christian fathers, that in the early Church no distinction of privilege between master and slave was recognised.

Slaves eligible to office in the Church. Slaves were freely admitted to the sacraments, and were eligible to all the ecclesiastical offices. Calixtus was a Roman slave. The Council of Orleans, in 549 A. D., was compelled to somewhat modify the earlier requirements that the Christian master must liberate his slaves, by allowing the master to obey the laws³ respecting the slave, but forbade him to exact of the slave any service incompatible with his new dignity as a member of the Church. Female slaves often exercised the office of deaconesses.¹

¹ Allard: Op. cit., pp. 409-473.

² The treatise of Wallon: Histoire de l'esclavage, 2d ed., Paris, 1879; and of Allard: Les esclaves Chrét., Paris, 1876, have used the monumental evidence but very sparingly. The same want is felt in Zahn: Slaverei u. Christenthum, Heidelb. 1879; Lechler: Slaverei u. Christenthum, Leipzig, 1877-78, and in nearly every other discussion. Allard is most in sympathy with the spirit of the epigraphic teaching, and gives some valuable suggestions.

³ The history of slavery in the United States of America furnishes some parallels to illustrate the difficulty of making the teaching of the Church respecting this institution effective and practical under the Roman government. The American Churches frequently protested against slavery, but the laws enacted by the different slave States made this protest nugatory. The desired instruction was forbidden to slaves by penal statutes. May not this be a sufficient answer to the excessive statements of that school of critics to which M. Havet belongs? "There is no more stupendous example of frauds, which, nevertheless, can make for themselves believers, than the persistent attempt to give to Christianity and the Church the honour of the abolition of slavery" (in the Roman Empire). v. Le Christianisme et les origines, t. i, Introduction, p. xxi. This judgment respecting the early Church, in effecting the emancipation of slaves under the Roman Empire, is paralleled by the statements of a class of writers in our day respecting the attitude of the American Churches toward the abolition of slavery in the United States. Both alike are defective and unhistoric. The wiser and more humane policy of Hadrian and the Antonines was probably largely independent of Christianity. The influence of Christianity was exerted without ostentation. Even Gibbon recognises its later power.

The study of monuments, in all parts of the Roman Empire, furnishes the most emphatic comment and completest corroboration of the statements of the Christian fathers. These help more fully to comprehend the grandeur of that revolution already achieved in the minds of the Christians, long before its effects became visible in the society of the state.² If we enter a pagan columbarium, where the rich families deposited the ashes of their slaves and freedmen, all the distinctions of society and class are here continued. It would seem that even the grave did not erase the stigma attaching to the servile classes. The name, employment, relation, etc., of the slave is perpetuated upon the cinerary urns. Only the absence of the master distinguishes this house of the dead from the palace of the living.

Monuments substantiate written records.

A pagan columbarium.

How marked the contrast in a Christian catacomb! The claim of Lactantius is fully justified—"With us there is no distinction between rich and poor, between bond and free."³ Nothing tells us whether a tomb contains the remains of the servile or of the free. Every thing is commingled.⁴ Upon one is seen the evidence of noble birth, upon another the indication of the labourer's avocation; here is the tomb of the maiden, there of the widow, and in the midst of all is the faithful pastor and bishop of their souls.

No distinction among the Christian dead.

"During the thirty years in which I have studied their cemeteries I have found no more than a solitary inscription from which the condition of a freedman could be inferred."⁵ "In the very considerable number of Christian inscriptions which we examined, I have not met more than two tituli bearing the mention of servus or libertus, except as an appellation of fidelity toward God."⁶ "In the new Christian community freedmen and slaves were brethren, and together served the same God. Among the faithful of the Roman Church the spirit of fraternity triumphed over the proud arrogance with which the institutions of the republic and of the empire were infected. Of this most eloquent testimony is found in the silence which is observed

Testimony of epigraphists.

de Rossi's opinion.

¹ Ancilla Dei is the title frequently met on the tombs of Christian women.

² Allard: Les esclaves Chrétiens, p. 235.

³ Div. Inst., v, 17.

⁴ Allard: op. cit., pp. 236, 237.

⁵ Marangoni: Acta S. Victorini, p. 130.

⁶ Le Blant: Inscript. chrét. de la Gaul., t. i, p. 119. The word titulus was applied to an ecclesiastical division or district of the city. Each one of the tituli seems to have had an extra-mural cemetery under its care, where its dead were interred.

respecting the social condition of the deceased in the so many thousands of epitaphs discovered in the catacombs. Were they slaves? Freedmen? These say nothing about it. I have never met the mention, as an undoubted fact, of one servus; very rarely, and this exceptional, of a freedman; while we could not read ten pagan epitaphs of the same period without finding these designations of slaves and freedmen."¹ The silence of the monuments is the most powerful comment on the statement of Lucian with respect to the belief of the Christians: "Their lawgiver has persuaded the Christians that they are all brothers."² "This law was nowhere written or traditional; it was the spontaneous effect of the religious doctrines of the new society, which are reflected in its early epigraphy as in a mirror."³

The whole number of ancient Christian inscriptions in which slaves are mentioned is only about thirty, and about the same number in which the title of libertus is met.⁴ This wonderful disparity between the number of Christian and heathen monuments bearing these marks of the servitude of the interred cannot be explained by the inferior social condition to which it has been claimed the converts to Christianity largely belonged; since this would naturally tend to increase rather than diminish the number mentioned among the servile class. Moreover, the great majority of these Christian inscriptions belong to a period later than the second century, when the new religion had become widely professed, and had adherents among the government officials, and even in the imperial household. By a careful comparative study of these monuments, the following conclusions are reached:

1. That in the Christian Church the number held as slaves was reduced to a minimum.
2. That in Church relations and in Christian burial there was recognised absolute equality of right and privilege, and that all regarded themselves as members of a common household.

Another interesting class of epigraphical objects are the bullæ. These were little tablets or bands of metal, which were accustomed to be fastened to the neck of fugitive or untrustworthy slaves. Scarcely more than twenty of these of a clearly Christian origin have been discovered. They tell an interesting story of the efforts of the Christian Church to soften the hardships of this condition. They likewise clearly testify to the

¹ de Rossi: Bull. di arch. crist., 1866, p. 24.

² de morte Peregrini, 13.

³ de Rossi: Roma Sotterranea, t. i, p. 343.

⁴ Schultze: Die altchristlichen Grabstätten, Leipzig, 1882, s. 258.

existence of slavery within the Church, as connected with Christian basilicas. It was claimed by Pignoris¹ that the cruel custom of branding in the forehead fugitive and perverse slaves was supplanted by this milder characterization through a special edict of Constantine. Only three of these chains for the neck have been certainly traced to the pre-Constantine period. The greater part of these bullæ are clearly contemporaneous with Constantine, or belong to the fourth century."

Again, the monuments accord with the written records, and confirm the claim that Christianity elevated labour and the labourer to a state of respectability. Christianity elevated labour.

The condition of the free labourer under a government where slavery is the legal condition of a large portion of the population must be one of great hardship and humiliation. It has been so in all lands. That it was emphatically true of the Roman labourer all historians and moralists alike affirm. But Christianity was to teach another law than that which was then observed by paganism. The awakening of a spirit of industry, and the affirmation of the dignity of labour, were two important services rendered by the early Church. The literature of the fathers is full and explicit on this point; the monumental and epigraphical lesson is plainly confirmatory of the documentary. Such inscriptions as the following would illustrative inscriptions. not be tolerated on a pagan monument: ΜΗΤΡΙ ΚΑΤΙ-ΑΝΙΑΑΗ ΕΡΓΟΠΟΙΩ. This belongs to the third century. De Rossi² also describes a tomb on which the husband had engraved the picture of a loom and shuttle,⁴ emblems of domestic industry, recalling the customs of the ancient Roman days. Still another is where the wife has erected a rich tomb to her husband, upon which stands an inscription that would be regarded a cause of humiliation to the

¹ De servis eorumque ministeriis, Padova, 1613.

² de Rossi: Bull. di arch. crist., 1874, pp. 60, seq. The following may be given as an example of these bullæ: Tene me quia figi et revoca me Publio Rubrio Latino domino meo. "Seize me because I have fled, and return me to Publius Rubrius Latinus, my master!"

³ De Rossi: Bullettino di arch. crist., 1865, p. 52. The full form of the last word, as found in the inscription, is ΕΡΓΟΠΟΠΟΙΩ. On this de Rossi comments: "It is evident to me that the stone-cutter has, by mistake, repeated the syllable ΠΟ, as if he would amend ἐργονόω, as in so many other syllables which we find carelessly reduplicated in both Greek and Latin inscriptions, although no such word is found in the classical lexicons, it is plain that it signifies operosa, laboriosa. . . . It shows the Christian glorying in labor—a thing unknown to the pagan world; that labour was not disgraceful, but honourable; that disgrace and sin came from indolence and laziness."

⁴ De Rossi: Inscrip. Christ. urbis Roma, No. 14 (A. D. 279), p. 21.

proud Roman: AMATRIX PAUPERORVM ET OPERARIA.¹ The companionship in labour is not now regarded disgraceful, but worthy of commendation. See the following, from Garrucci, found in the catacomb of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus upon a tomb erected by a humble saint named Primus to Leontia: LEONTIÆ CVM LABARONÆ SVÆ.²

Thus the testimony of the Christian fathers and of the monuments are in accord with reference to the influence of Christianity in ameliorating the condition of slaves under the Roman Empire, and in effecting their gradual emancipation. It was by the operation of the law of love which was promulgated by the Founder.

¹ De Rossi: Inscrip. Christ., No. 62 (A. D. 341), p. 49.

² Garrucci: Nuove epigrafe giudaiche di vigna Randanini, p. 9.

CHAPTER III.

RELATION OF THE EARLY CHURCH TO CIVIL AND MILITARY LIFE.

THE changes in Roman opinion relative to the family, to slavery, and to manual labour, had not been effected by Christianity alone. We have noted the influence of the Stoical philosophy in causing the revolution. To what extent these modifications of thought and practice may be attributable to this or that force which was silently at work in the Roman world during the second and third centuries may not be determined. The change is indubitable. From the first Christianity had insisted upon honourable labour as a duty. The example of Christ and his apostles is positive; the teachings of the Scriptures are clear and explicit. The slothful servant is pictured as deserving condemnation; Paul, the tent-maker, glories in his ability to gain a livelihood, and will not consent to be a burden to his brethren. The man who will not toil may not eat his bread in peace. "Diligent in business" was associated with "serving the Lord."

Christianity
encouraged labour.

But it is important to notice the relation of the Church to certain trades and industries. They had direct influence upon the type of Christian morality, and brought the teaching of the Christians and of the heathen into sharpest contrast. The early Church was beset by adverse influences arising from the prevalent idolatry, from the abounding impurity, and from the corrupting exhibitions connected with the popular amusements. The statues, temples, and altars dedicated to an innumerable multitude of gods; the reverence in which some of these were held by the people; their almost continuous worship, conducted in all the great centers of population, enveloped the Christians in an atmosphere laden with impurity. The failure or blank refusal to participate in the public worship of what were reputed to be the guardian divinities of the State made the Christians an object of hate and suspicion, and subjected them to the charge of atheism. The position of a monotheistic faith and of an absolute religion was often delicate in the extreme. To show themselves loyal subjects of the empire, and yet uncompromising in their allegiance to Christ, brought daily embarrassments to Christians. Those Adverse influences.

Trying position of the Christians.

engaged in the service of the temples, or in trades connected directly with idolatrous worship, as image makers, incense dealers, etc., were adjudged by the Church as contributing to the corruption of the people, and were ineligible to membership.

The testimony of the fathers on this point is clear. Tertullian says: "I take it that that trade which pertains to the very soul and spirit of idols, which pampers every demon, falls under the charge of idolatry. . . . The dealer in frankincense is a something even more serviceable toward demons, for idolatry is more easily carried on without the idol than without the ware of the frankincense seller. . . . No art, then, no profession, no trade which administers either to the equipping or making of idols, can be free from the name of idolatry."¹ "Again, can you have denied with the tongue what you confess with the hand? Can you unmake by word what you make by your deed? Can you, who make so many, preach one God? Can you, who make false ones, preach the true God?"² "For it matters not whether you erect or equip; if you have embellished his temple, altar, or niche; if you have pressed out gold-leaf, or have wrought his insignia, or even his house; work of that kind, which confers not shape, but authority, is more important."³ "Whatever guilt idolatry incurs must necessarily be imparted to every artificer of every idol."⁴ With this teaching the Apostolic Constitutions are in harmony. "If a maker of idols come, let him either leave off his employment or let him be rejected."⁵ Such is the consistent and uniform teaching of the early Church. The sin of idolatry was a constant threat, and warnings against the evil by the leaders of the Church, both before and after Constantine, are positive and frequent. The Christians were forbidden to do any thing which could directly or remotely abet or compromise with this besetting sin of the Roman world. Like teaching is found with respect to those employments which were connected with the corrupting practices and amusements of heathen society. It included stage actors, teachers of the art, procurers and panderers, gladiators, those employed in the public shows, soothsayers, minstrels, dancers, etc.

Tertullian's opinion.

The Apostolic Constitutions.

Public amusements interdicted.

The Roman drama had become fearfully corrupt. While noble sentiments are occasionally found in the plays represented before

¹ de Idolat., c. 2.

² Ibid., c. 6.

³ Ibid., c. 8.

⁴ Ibid., c. 4. "Quicquid idolatria committit, in artificem quemcumque et cuiuscumque idoli deputetur necesse est."

⁵ Cons. Apos., l. viii, c. 32.

an average audience, the resultant influence was debasing, and actors were held in low esteem. Under the later republic, the utterances of the stage were often laden with ridicule of the gods, and had in no small degree encouraged the growing scepticism. But under the empire the theatre had been greatly degraded by the public shows and popular exhibitions. While the enormous amphitheatres were crowded for many successive days to witness the gladiatorial contests, the races and games, the entire seating capacity of the great theatres was less than 50,000; and in ordinary times the theatre of Pompey, with a capacity of 17,580, could accommodate all visitors. So depraved had become the Roman taste that even this small number could be gathered only by exhibitions of the lowest species of the drama, light comedy and mime. The indecencies of these representations were shocking in the extreme. The boldest impiety, the most shameless immodesty, the grossest vulgarity awakened deafening applause from the debauched populace.¹ Nor was the character of these representations much improved in the Eastern Empire, even in the time of Justinian. The lowest forms of social life were there presented. The most sacred relations were travestied. The unfaithfulness of husband or wife was the frequent subject of representation, in which the escapades of the panderer or adulterer were occasions of unlimited mirth. Snatches from the indecorous songs heard in the theatre were repeated upon the streets to poison the imagination and break down all moral restraint.²

True, a few nobler characters of heathendom felt the degrading influence of these forms of dramatic representation, and struggled to improve the public taste. But they were entirely impotent to arrest the sweeping tide of corruption. Moreover high tragedy was never popular with even the better classes of the Roman world. They preferred the lighter works. The degeneracy of the later plays was manifest. The introduction of music and the dance soon caused the representations to assume the form of the pantomime, which became, in turn, the most corrupting form of theatrical representation. So generally was the immoral influence of the drama recognised that actors were generally under social and legal disability. Often they had no greater rights than slaves or freedmen. Hence it came to pass that the great mass of players were from these classes, sunken into the deepest degradation, with few if any legal privileges.³

¹ Friedländer: Sittengeschichte Roms, Bd. ii, ss. 391-395.

² Ibid., ss. 396, 397.

³ Ibid., ss. 424, seq.

As might be expected, the purity of the Church was constantly threatened by these exhibitions, and stringent rules were enacted respecting the classes who were connected with theatrical representations, and the frequenting of the plays. Tertullian finds in all the shows and spectacles alike a taint of idolatry, and is vigorous in warning against their contaminating influence. "It may be grand or mean, no matter, any circus procession whatever is offensive to God. Though there be few images to grace it, there is idolatry in one; though there be no more than a single sacred car, it is a chariot of Jupiter; any thing of idolatry whatever, whether meanly arranged or modestly rich and gorgeous, taints it in its origin."¹ So also in the dramatic representations and the combats generally. Moreover he urges the Church to refrain from these on the ground of their immodesty and impurity; also because the Christian faith and life are there travestied and brought into public ridicule. "We ought to detest these heathen meetings and assemblies, if on no other account than that there God's name is blasphemed. . . . Shall you not, then, shun those tiers where the enemies of Christ assemble, that seat of all that is pestilential, and the very superincumbent atmosphere all impure with wicked cries?"²

Like representations of the character of the public shows are made by Cyprian. In his epistle to Donatus he draws a fearful sketch of the immoralities of his time. "The whole world is wet with mutual blood. . . . Crime is not only committed, but taught. . . . It is the tragic buskin which relates in verse the crimes of ancient days. . . . In the mimes . . . adultery is learned while it is seen; . . . the matron who perchance has gone to the spectacle a modest woman returns from it immodest. . . . Men grow into praise by virtue of their crimes; and the more he is degraded, the more skilful is he regarded. . . . The judge sells his sentence; . . . there is no fear about the laws when the sentence can be bought off for money; . . . it is a crime now among the guilty to be innocent."³ Equally with Tertullian he finds in all the public shows a gross idolatry, and is faithful in warning against their contaminating influences. The spirit of his teaching is that of his master. "Idolatry is the mother of all the public amusements. . . . Thus the devil, who is their original contriver, because he knew that naked idolatry would by itself excite repugnance, associated it with public exhibitions, that for the sake of their attraction it might be loved."¹ He positively forbids not only actors but teachers of the histrionic art from communicating with the Church.

¹ de Spectac., c. 7.

² Ibid., c. 22.

³ ad Donat., cc. 6, 7, 10.

"For he cannot appear to have given it (the actor's ^{Actors excluded from the Church.} art) up who substitutes others in his place, and who, instead of himself alone, supplies many in his stead."² Cyprian recognises the hardness of the condition of such as have left lucrative callings to accept the faith of Christ; but the earnestness and wise provisions of the Church for such are clearly illustrated in the same connection: "But if such a one ^{Belief of hardship.} alleges poverty and the necessity of small means, his necessity also can be assisted among the rest who are maintained by the support of the Church; if he be content, that is, with very frugal but innocent food."³

The Apostolic Constitutions contain like teaching. "If one belonging to the theater come, whether it be man or woman, . . . either let him leave off his employments, or let him be rejected."⁴

The decisions of the Councils are entirely harmonious ^{Conciliary action.} with this general teaching of the pre-Constantine fathers and of the Constitutions. The Council of Elvira (probably in A. D. 305 or 306) enacted that actors and soothsayers should be received to baptism only on condition that they leave their arts, and do not return to them. In case of return they are to be rejected from the Church.⁵ Like action was taken by the third Council of Carthage, A. D. 397.

The unparalleled greed of the Roman populace for shows had been strengthened by the enormous expenditures of ^{Love of spectacles.} some of the emperors, whose usurpation or vileness of character must be hidden under a show of public munificence. Probably no period of human history presents an array of trades and callings to prop up a failing faith, and to pander to a vitiated taste, equal to that of the empire during the first three and a half centuries of the Christian era. By a law of spiritual life, as the purity and strength of faith declined the machinery of religion became more complicated. The failure of the religions indigenous to Italy led the people to look to the distant and the unknown for help; the wild influx of worships and rites from the ^{Superstition multiplies the rites.} most distant regions multiplied the numbers devoted to trades necessary to supply the demands of every cultus, and

¹ de Spectac., c. 4. While this treatise is usually regarded as of doubtful genuineness, it is animated by the general spirit of Cyprian's works.

² ad Euchrat., c. 2.

³ Ibid.

⁴ Const. Apostol., l. viii, c. 32.

⁵ Canon 62: "Quod si facere contra interdictum tentaverint, projiciantur ab ecclesia."

greatly added to the embarrassments of the early Church. Practicers of curious arts, magicians, diviners, enchanter, astrologers; minstrels, harpers, dancers; charioteers, racers, gladiators, curators of the games; makers of amulets, fortune-tellers, wandering beggars—against this untold multitude who directly or indirectly were connected with the prevalent polytheism, or sought a livelihood by ministering to vitiated tastes, the Church set its face as a flint. Eligibility to baptism required the absolute relinquishment of them all, and indulgence in them by a member of the Church was visited by severe penalties. The discipline of the Church was strict, but oftentimes it was unable to stem the fearful tide of corruption.

Severe discipline.

Another source of temptation was the military life. The relation of the Church to the bearing of arms was not easy to be determined. Here also, as with respect to public or official business, the prevalent expectation of the speedy coming of Christ exerted wide influence. So evanescent and trivial did the affairs of earthly governments appear, when contrasted with the glories of the kingdom which Christ was to set up, that the Christians of the second and third centuries regarded the policies and activities of the state as unworthy of their serious thought. Patriotism and loyalty, the usual motives inducing subjects to bear arms, were felt to a less degree by men whose first allegiance was due to an invisible kingdom, whose sway would soon be universal. Doubtless also the teaching of Christ to avoid strife, to forgive injuries, to bless and curse not, to do good unto all men, to resist not evil, cultivated in his followers aversion to arms and to the military life. It is evident that Tertullian was affected by this Aversion to military service.

Tainted with idolatry.

view, but still more by his abhorrence of idolatry. In the military life, as in all the various employments connected with the numberless religions of his day, he sees the taint of idolatry. The well known picture of a Christian soldier taking off the laurel chaplet which had been bestowed by imperial favour, the jeering of the multitude, the murmur arresting the attention of the tribune, the confession, "I am a Christian," the appeal to higher authority, the disrobing of the soldier, the thrusting into prison to await martyrdom, Tertullian sketches with loving interest, and the course of the soldier meets his thorough approval.¹ This particular case leads him to the discussion of the general question of the propriety or right of a Christian to engage in the military life. "Shall it be held lawful to make an occupation of the sword, when the Lord proclaims that he who uses the sword shall perish

¹ de Corona Mil.: c. 7.

by the sword? And shall the son of peace take part in the battle when it does not become him even to sue at law? And shall he apply the chain, and the prison, and the torture, and the punishment, who is not the avenger even of his own wrongs? Shall he, forsooth, either keep watch-service for others more than for Christ, or shall he do it on the Lord's day when he does not even do it for Christ himself? And shall he keep guard before the temples which he has renounced? Touching this primary aspect of the question, as to the lawfulness even of a military life itself, I shall not add more."¹

Strife contrary to Christ's teaching.

But plainly this Montanistic principle could not be made practical in the Roman Empire. While the military spirit had greatly declined during the closing decades of the republic, and in the first century of the empire scarcely a remnant of the better classes could be found among the soldiery,² there was, nevertheless, a general legal obligation to bear arms. In this state of unpopularity of the military calling it is evident that an irregular and unjust levy would tend to pass by the higher classes and fall with unequal severity upon the burgess population, from which a large proportion of Christians had been gathered. That many were thus pressed into the army is evident from the testimony of Tertullian himself.³ The continuance of these in the service was a matter of necessity, since their desertion must have brought upon the Church still greater suspicion and persecution. Even Tertullian regards the case of those who embraced Christianity after they had entered the military life as very delicate, yet appears to advise the abandonment of the calling, and the acceptance of the consequences.⁴ Origen was early inclined to speak with great severity respecting the propriety of bearing arms, but afterward admitted that it might be possible and even honourable. Also the evidence is convincing that in the reign of M. Aurelius many Christian soldiers were in the Roman army, and under Diocletian high offices were filled by members of the Church.

Decadence of military spirit.

Unfair levy.

Milder views.

The Apostolic Constitutions also certainly provide for the reception of soldiers by baptism. They were to be examined, and taught to do no injustice, to accuse no man falsely, and to be content with their wages.⁵ The Nicene decision has

Provision for baptism.

¹ de Corona Mil.: c. 11. de Idol., c. 19.

² Mommsen: Hist. of Rome, New York, 1872, vol. iv, p. 581. ³ Apolog., cc. 37, 42.

⁴ It has been charged by Gibbon, and some others, that Tertullian teaches the duty of desertion. The passage usually cited (de Corona Mil., c. 11) can hardly be so interpreted.

⁵ Const. Apost., l. viii, c. 32.

occasioned some difference of opinion as to its purport. It is believed, however, by the ablest commentators that the twelfth canon was not aimed at the military calling, but rather against those who had forsaken it, and were attempting to reenter it by means of bribery or corruption. The whole conduct of Constantine toward the soldiery implies that military life was no longer under the ban of the Church, but was regarded as permissible.

The changed relations of the Church to the government, during and after the fourth century, brought corresponding changes in the opinion of the Church fathers respecting the lawfulness of accepting offices both civil and military. The union of Church and State brought laxity of discipline and life. Zeal which should have been manifested to maintain the high moral and religious purity of the Church was shown only in the defence of its orthodoxy. The masses of the heathen world, which became nominally Christian with little change in belief or life, caused discipline to decay and the tone of piety to decline. The subsequent action, both civil and ecclesiastical, seems to be inspired by a new spirit. The popularity of the ecclesiastical life, exempt as it was from many services and disabilities, and the increasing passion for monastic retirement, compelled the government to guard itself against these incentives to the desertion of public trusts, especially to prevent the disintegration of the army through withdrawal of its members in order to enter the less dangerous and toilsome avocations of the Church. Hence the edict of Honorius forbade any one who was bound to the military life to take upon himself any clerical calling, or think to excuse himself from the public service under pretence of entering upon the ecclesiastical life. With this principle the canons of the councils generally agreed, since they generally refused ordination to any who had entered a military life after baptism, and in most cases none who had been soldiers were admitted to the superior offices of the Church.

The monumental evidence is entirely confirmatory of the documentary, and furnishes a very interesting comment on the relation of the Church to military life and on the proportion of Christians enlisted in this service. Collections of inscriptions, made at different and widely separated parts of the empire, show a great disparity in the number of pagan and Christian soldiers. Twenty years ago the studies of Le Blant on the collections of three epigraphists, Reinesius, Steiner, and Mommsen, which were made in a region reaching from lower Italy north to the Rhine border, resulted as follows: Of 10,500 pagan inscriptions, 545, or 5.42 per cent., contained epitaphs of soldiers; while of 4,734 Christian inscriptions only 26, or .55 of one per cent., contained any reference to the military life.¹ In Gaul, as in Italy, Spain, and Africa, the title of soldier is rarely found inscribed on the tombs of the Christian dead. While this may be partially attributable to the aversion of the early Christians to indulge in fulsome descriptions of the business of the departed dead, no reasonable doubt can be entertained that the fewness of such inscriptions is largely due to the influence of a religion whose Founder taught submission rather than resistance, and the fundamental law of whose kingdom was love.

¹ Le Blant: Manuel d'Épigraphie chrétienne, etc., Paris, 1869, pp. 15, 16.

CHAPTER IV.

CHARITIES IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

THE ancient heathen world presented a sharp contrast in the social and civil conditions of its peoples. The many slaves and clients, dependent upon masters and lords for their support, tended to diminish the number of paupers who must receive aid at the hands of the government. While the system of slavery and clientage thus lessened the demands for the practice of active charity, large numbers of the indigent were assisted at the public expense, and many instances of noble private gifts for the relief of the unfortunate are recorded by the historians, and are fully attested by the surviving monuments. In Attica Solon and his successors had incorporated into their legislation the principle that it is the duty of the state to provide for its poor and unfortunate; and very early in the history of the Roman Republic the sums expended in the gratuitous distribution of corn to the people constituted an important item in the public budget. The number thus receiving relief at Rome alone, at the beginning of the empire, was 320,000, or more than one fourth of the entire population of the city. Under the vigorous policy of Julius Cæsar this had been reduced to 150,000, but under Augustus it had risen to 200,000, and under the Antonines had increased to the enormous number of 500,000. This gratuitous distribution of corn, bread, oil, and salt, which began at Rome, extended to many of the great cities and was probably practised even in many of the smaller towns of the empire.¹

The writings of the Stoics had inculcated charity. In some of these are found noble precepts which seem to rival the most exalted teachings of the New Testament. The fraternity of the race, and the corresponding duty of relieving the woes of all, are sometimes taught with great distinctness and enforced with much eloquence. When Cicero says, "Nature ordains that a man should wish the good of every man, whoever he may be, for this very reason, that he is a man;"² and Seneca affirms, "I know that my country is the world, and my guardians are the Teachings of the Stoics. these are found noble precepts which seem to rival the most exalted teachings of the New Testament. The fraternity of the race, and the corresponding duty of relieving the woes of all, are sometimes taught with great distinctness and enforced with much eloquence. When Cicero says, "Nature ordains that a man should wish the good of every man, whoever he may be, for this very reason, that he is a man;"² and Seneca affirms, "I know that my country is the world, and my guardians are the gods;"¹ and Lucian sings of a time when "the human race will cast aside its weapons, and when all nations will learn to love,"² we seem to have in this philosophy a basis for broadest benevolence and universal charity. Nor can it be denied that some of the purest and best men of heathenism belonged to the Stoic school, and were at times loud in their protests against injustice and cruelty. Yet in this system was recognised a principle which must be fatal to high and continuous charity. The duty of suppressing all emotion would result in the extinction of the very ^{Its defects.} sources of true benevolent activity. Indifference in the presence of suffering, or the reckoning of every condition of human experience as unworthy the thought of the true man, necessarily carried with it indifference to the alleviation of woes, and produced the strange contradictions presented in the teachings, life, and death of some of the great masters of this philosophy.

¹ Mommsen: Hist. of Rome, vol. iv, p. 591. Leckey: Op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 74, 75.

² de officiis, iii, 6.

The stress of poverty, as well as the desire for the promotion of favourite schemes, had resulted in the organization of ^{The clubs and numerous clubs and associations throughout the Roman guilds.} Empire. They were in great variety—social, political, industrial, and religious; yet in each was found an element of mutual aid in case of distress. By weekly or monthly contributions of the members, and by liberal gifts from the wealthy whom they counted among their patrons, a fund was secured which was placed in charge of curators to be used for the common benefit. These collegia also cared for the burial of their members by the appropriation of a given sum, usually dependent upon the rank of the deceased, a portion of which was spent at the funeral banquet, and for the distribution of bread and wine among the poorer members of the guild. Such was the Roman care for the dead, and for keeping alive their memory, that the rich often made large donations to ^{An element of selfishness.} the collegia upon the special condition that the anniversary of their death should be celebrated in a worthy manner by sacrifices, assemblies at the tomb, libations, and distribution of money, bread, and wine among those who might be present at the ceremonies. So common was it to provide for the burial, and for celebrating the anniversary of the death by appropriate observances, that it may be called a Roman custom. It furnishes an explanation of the building of magnificent tombs along the Appian Way, and of the erection of convenient cellæ, upon sites sometimes of great extent and costliness, connected with which were altars and banqueting halls for holding the burial feasts.

The collegia, especially the burial clubs, had a most important

¹ de vita beata, xx.

² Pharsalia, vi.

influence upon the early Christian societies, and are intimately connected with the history of Christian charities. The Influence of the collegia on Christian charities. heathen inscriptions plainly use language which has sometimes been supposed to be peculiar to the Church, as brother and sister, futher and mother, as applied to members of the guild, or to founders, liberal patrons, or chief officers of the same. Doubtless it was within the walls of the schola, or at the gatherings in the hired room of some humble Roman tavern, that the vast body of artisans, excluded as they were from all hope of political trust or preferment, felt the importance of individual life and experienced the quickening power of a common interest. This liberalizing influence was doubtless one source of the jealousy of the emperors, and led to the partial suppression of the meetings of the guilds. In these, vastly more than in any form of heathen worship, is found a measurable resemblance to the methods and spirit of the Christian Church. It has often been remarked by students of early Christianity that in the Christian societies alone, of all the Roman world, a true community was realized. Both The Church a true community. in the religious and political life of that period this was totally unknown. The mass of the citizens were valuable only as they contributed to the welfare of the state; and the religious worship, supported by the government, had less interest for the masses of the people than had the daily shows in the amphitheatre. The thought of the personal duty of charity, or of communal benefits, was foreign to the pagan mind. It was, therefore, impossible that either the relief afforded to the needy by monthly distribution of corn, or the largesses of the emperors, or the support given by masters to slaves, or by patrons to clients, or by the numerous guilds to their members could be of the nature of a pure and genuine charity. Through each and all was diffused the taint of selfishness. The Heathen charity tainted with selfishness. largesses were at times bestowed to allay popular clamour, or to hide the crimes of an ambitious usurper; the distribution of corn was often made in order to relieve the hunger of a rabble which might otherwise precipitate a bloody revolution; the monthly contributions and intimate association of the clubs were for the benefit of members of the guild alone. The Stoic philosophy failed when tested by the adverse condition of the Roman world, and its teachings, however noble in themselves, were inadequate to purify the awful corruptions of society or alleviate the sore distress and poverty. In its ultimate analysis this philosophy was an education of pride, and tended to a sublime egotism.¹ Its pantheistic principles also detracted from the dignity and sacredness of individual being, and could therefore furnish no solid ground for genuine charity.

¹ Conybeare and Howson: Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 6th ed., New York, 1858, vol. i, p. 368.

Christian charity was a necessary outflow from the idea which lay at the very source of the system, namely, the kingdom of God, which is a community of men who have been reconciled to God in Christ, whose law is a law of love.¹ This law is the supreme rule of action in this community; hence the selfish element, which tainted nearly every system of relief in the heathen world, is eliminated, and the charity is practiced in the name of Christ who came to realize the kingdom of heaven among men. It is, therefore, done unto men not simply to relieve from present poverty and need, but much more because of their relations to the new kingdom, which is also to be an everlasting kingdom, of which each, however lowly, may be a subject. The selling of all that he had and giving to the poor was the condition imposed by Christ upon the young rich man in order that he might become a member of this community, and thus feel that he had richer possessions in sharing in the experiences of the whole body of believers. Christ's own example is that which he would have his followers imitate. It is the Samaritan's catholicity of spirit which receives his special approval. He leaves the society of his immediate family to become the friend of publicans and sinners. He violates the artificial proprieties of his nation to instruct the woman of Samaria at the well, or to heal the afflicted Syrophenician.

This broader spirit and deeper significance of charity found exemplification from the very beginning of Christ's public ministry. Germs of the beneficent institutions which have been to the great honour of the Church are found in the lifetime of Christ in the circle of serving women surrounding the Lord, a type of the deaconesses and of all charitable women, in whom the history of the Church is so rich.²

What has been said elsewhere (v. pp. 465 sq.) respecting the Church as a family is specially applicable to her charities. The apostolic Church continued the family idea which had been so prominent during the ministry of Christ. The spirit of communion, first realized by the Church, explains the exceptional provisions made for the early relief of the poor and needy disciples. We have already found that the Lord's Supper and the associated lovefeasts were occasions for the most beautiful manifestations of the common interest and care. Moreover, the institution of a class of officers whose special business was to have the oversight of funds which had come from a common offering, shows the prominence which the work of charity had assumed in the apostolic Church. This is in no way changed, whatever theory of the diaconate may be accepted; not even if the management of the charitable funds was never entrusted to the deacons, but was under the control and direction of the elders or bishops. The emphasis put upon the idea of aid to the poor saints, as members of a community, is in no sense lessened. As in every other department of activity, so here, the spirit, at first prompting the early Christians to a spontaneous relief of distress, later accomplished its work through a formal organization. The old Jewish law of tithing the income is nowhere insisted upon; but the exhortation is to imitate Christ's example, who "though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich" (2 Cor. viii, 9). The readiness and hearty willingness of the offerings is the test of the religious character of the charity, and of its acceptance with God; he who gives grudgingly is not a Christian giver at all; and the essence and proof of religion is ministration to the distressed (2 Cor. ix, 7; viii, 2, 3; James i, 27, et al.). The same spirit is shown in the repeated exhortations to hospitality which are found in the New Testament writings. The frequent passing of members of the Church from one part of the empire to another, usually in the work of evangelism, rendered this duty most pressing. Doubtless in this respect there was great likeness between the conduct of the Christians and that of the numerous heathen clubs, since these likewise inculcated the duty of helpfulness and hospitality; but, as before stated, their aid was wholly confined to the members of the guild.

¹ Uhlhorn: Christian Charity in the Ancient Church, New York, 1883, p. 57.

² Uhlhorn: Op. cit., p. 70.

When the charities of the Church are estimated in their wider range, it becomes important to study the business and financial condition of the empire during the first two centuries of its history. It has been customary to represent this as prosperous to an unusual degree. The evidence is convincing that, outside of Rome, the proportion of citizens who were liable to pinching poverty was less than at the present time in northern Europe. For the most part the taxes were not excessive, food was generally abundant, the relation of labour to the necessities of life was more advantageous than in modern Europe, the prices of provisions were carefully regulated by law, so that no such rapid and disturbing fluctuations were possible as now result from speculation and from a system of extended credits. Friedländer claims that property was less concentrated than at present; that the value of the largest estates in the time of the early empire, even when slaves are included in the reckoning, falls far below that of many private individuals in Europe and America to-day. Great fortunes less than now. Only two persons of Rome are represented as having a property worth more than $20,000,000, and the incomes of the most wealthy Romans during the first four and a half centuries of the empire are greatly excelled by those of the families of Rothschild, Bedford, Demidoff, Astor, and Vanderbilt.¹

This social and financial condition of the empire during the first century and a half of our era must have vitally affected the question of the nature and extent of Christian beneficence. Powerful influence on charities. Times of general prosperity call for the establishment of no wide-reaching charities; the spirit of the Church could find expression only in the relief of isolated cases of need, while its almsgiving would also be of a strongly individual character.²

But the seeds of dissolution had already been planted in the empire. Before the middle of the second century the evils of slavery, the corresponding contempt for labour, Adverse influences. the fearful extravagance of the nobility, the vast sums squandered on the public games and shows, the absence of moral restraint exhibited in the case of divorce, the indifference to abortion, infanticide, and exposure of children, and the fearfully expensive and wasting wars, had seriously weakened the empire. From these causes population was seriously decreasing, and poverty set in where a half century before had been comparative comfort. To pay the largely increased taxes many fine estates had been forfeited, thus concentrating property into fewer hands, and bringing as necessary consequences extravagant luxury and the oppression of the smaller traders through excessive usury. The only means of defence was in the organization of guilds, which were recognised by the state, and became, in a sense, the servants of the government. In these more trying times greater demands were manifestly made upon the charities of the Church. The teachings of the Christian fathers prior to Cyprian plainly reveal the nature and extent of these good works.

We have already spoken of the collegia, and of the spirit which animated them. It is important to notice wherein the Christian Church, in some respects so closely resembling a heathen religious guild, differed from it in its method of relief of the unfortunate. Certainly the uniform teaching of the first two hundred years is to give to those who are in need, without careful discrimination Christian charity broad and general. as to whether the recipient was a member of the Church or a heathen. Justin Martyr and Clement of Alexandria are in entire accord touching the duty of a common charity. Many passages from these and other writers are plain and positive. In the Shepherd of Hermas occurs this characteristic teaching: "Practice goodness; and from the rewards of your labours, which God gives you, give to all the needy in simplicity, not hesitating as to whom you are to give or not to give. Give to all, for God wishes his gifts to be shared amongst all. They who receive will render an account to God why and for what they have received. For the afflicted who receive will not be condemned, but they who receive on false pretences will suffer punishment. He, then, who gives is blameless."¹ This injunction plainly has reference to private almsgiving, and seems to have no application to that more systematic beneficence which was bestowed upon the needy members of the Church through organized channels. The giving was spontaneous, free, not of their abundance, but from their scanty earnings.

¹ Sittengeschichte Roms, Bd. iii, ss. 11-14.

² Uhlhorn: Op. cit., p. 105.

The peculiar organization of the Churches also provided for systematic and widereaching charities. Not only were the needy of individual congregations relieved by the oblations offered at the Lord's Supper, but special collections were made for the relief of distress in distant provinces. Already in the apostolic age community of interest was shown by forwarding considerable sums of money, gathered from wide districts of country, to relieve the poor saints at Jerusalem (Rom. xv, 25, 26; 1 Cor. xv, 1-4). The expression "them of Macedonia and Achaia" seems to include many of the most prosperous churches which had been established through Paul's instrumentality, and indicates the nature and extent of these offerings. The churches of the first two and a half centuries may be regarded as so many compact organizations for charitable work. Its oversight being entrusted to the bishops, there was an immediateness and directness of relief which otherwise were not possible. The close affiliations of the bishops with each other, and the system of circular letters which had been adopted, enabled the entire Church to concentrate its gifts upon a single locality which had been visited with sudden or peculiar distress. Moreover, the association of the bishop with sub-helpers, as elders, deacons, the widows and the deaconesses, allowed of faithful and minute supervision, and of a consequent wise and economical administration of the charities. It is plain that the deaconesses had other duties than those of keepers of the entrances of the church appointed for women, or even as assistants in baptism, or instructors of candidates; they were employed in those works of charity and relief where hea-

Also wide-extended through organization.

Gifts easily concentrated for relief of distress.

Deaconesses.

¹ Book ii, Mandata, ii.

then public opinion would not permit the presence of the deacons. "Ordain also a deaconess who is faithful and holy, for the ministrations toward women. For sometimes he cannot send a deacon, who is a man, to the women, on account of unbelievers. Thou shalt therefore send a woman, a deaconess, on account of the imaginations of the bad."¹ Thus the number and variety of officers enabled the early Church to reach all classes, and to have complete knowledge of the personal needs of its members.

Another question which has been earnestly discussed is the influence of the early Christian system of charities upon pauperism and self-help. It has been charged that it fostered dependence, and that its ultimate result was to add to the pauper population. The question is beset with difficulties, because of insufficient data from which to form a judgment. The lack of official statistics, with reference both to the Roman government and to ecclesiastical activities, renders the question wellnigh insoluble. That promiscuous relief of the poor, disconnected from a thorough knowledge of the needs of the beneficiary, tends to helplessness and increasing poverty is everywhere confessed. The presumption is certainly very strong that this defect could not, however, attach to the early Christian charities. While, as has been noted, a generous and helpful spirit toward all was clearly taught, the thoroughness of organization and administration afforded the best possible guarantee of worthy bestowment of aid. First, accurate lists were kept of those who received stated assistance, so that immediate and thorough inspection was possible. Second, the aid afforded was usually of the necessities of life. Third, the support of such as had abandoned a trade, or otherwise suffered peculiar hardship for the sake of Christ, was of a simple and inexpensive nature, thus reducing to a minimum the temptation to deception and fraud. Fourth, the special pains to have orphans of Christian parents adopted by childless couples, and trained in habits of industry,² was a most beneficent provision which kept alive the spirit of purest charity, and most effectually guarded against the increase of pauperism. Fifth, the solemn charge to bishops that they be solicitous to aid the truly needy, but at the same time do all in their power to place every body, so far as possible, in a condition of self-help. The language of the Constitutions is noteworthy: "O bishops, be solicitous about their maintenance, being in nothing wanting to them; exhibiting to orphans the care of parents; to the widows the care of husbands; to those of suitable age, marriage; to the artificer, work; to

Influence of Christian charity on pauperism.

Guards against the weakening of self-dependence.

Charge to the bishops.

¹ Const. Apost., l. iii, c. 15.

² Const. Apost., l. iv, c. 1.

the disabled, commiseration; to the strangers, a house; to the hungry, food; to the thirsty, drink; to the naked, clothing; to the sick, visitation; to the prisoners, assistance; . . . to the young man, assistance that he may learn a trade, and may be maintained by the advantage arising from it, . . . that so he may no longer burden any of the brethren; . . . for certainly he is a happy man who is able to support himself, and does not take up the place of the orphan, the stranger, and the widow."¹ These considerations, among many others, would seem to show that the methods of the Christian Church, prior to the rise and prevalence of monasticism, were well calculated to keep alive a genuine charity, and foster a spirit of independence and self-help.

Probably the times of persecution and of public misfortune afforded the occasions for the most impressive exemplification of the Christian law of love. While the persecutions of the Church were for the most part local, and grew out of a peculiar combination of circumstances, they were often sharp and peculiarly afflictive. The suffering arose from the confiscation of property, from its ruthless destruction through popular outbreaks, from loss of business, and often from exile, imprisonment, or death of those who were the natural guardians of families. The records and the inscriptions alike tell a story honourable to the heroism and to the patient sacrifice of the Church. In the Decian persecution, which proved so disastrous, those who were banished to the mines, or immured in prisons in Carthage, were tenderly cared for by the whole body of believers. Cyprian is most earnest in his words and labours to relieve the wants of such as were under special temptation to apostasy. Persons cast into prison on account of their faith were visited, and supplied with necessary provisions. The unfortunate men who were condemned to the mines, and who were compelled to submit to the cruelty of harsh, unfeeling masters, were not forgotten by the sympathizing Church. The deeper the misery and the greater the peril the more brightly shone the light of charity, and extraordinary care was bestowed upon those whose lot was peculiarly trying. The charities at such times were generous and methodical.²

So, too, in times of great public misfortune. During the third century the empire was visited by a series of fearful calamities, in which the contrast between Christian and heathen charity was made most conspicuous. The fatal pestilence which appeared in different districts dissolved all natural ties. In Carthage there was a general panic. "All were shuddering, fleeing, shunning the contagion, impiously ex-

Opportunities for Christian charities.

In persecutions.

In times of public misfortune.

In Carthage.

¹ Const. Apost., l. iv, c. 2.

² Cyprian: Epist. xxxvi, ad Clerum.

posing their own friends, as if with exclusion of the person who was sure to die of the plague one could exclude death also. . . . No one regarded any thing besides his cruel gains. . . . No one did for another what he himself wished to experience."¹ The biographer of Cyprian speaks of his exhortations in the midst of the pestilence: that the Christians should not succour their own brethren alone, but all alike; that this was the Father's method, and the children must be like the Father.² In conformity to this spirit the Christians rallied to assist, some by their money, many more by their labours, in caring for the sick and burying the dead, until the calamity was stayed. Like scenes were witnessed in the midst of the pestilence at Alexandria. The letter of Dionysius, then ^{In Alexandria.} bishop, as found in Eusebius, gives a most graphic picture of the difference of the behaviour of Christians and heathen in the midst of this awful visitation. "They (the Christians) took up the bodies of the saints with their open hands, and on their bosoms, cleansed their eyes and closed their mouths, carried them on their shoulders, and composed their limbs, embraced, clung to them, and prepared them decently with washing and garments; and ere long they themselves shared in the same offices. Those that survived always followed those before them. Among the heathen it was just the reverse. They both repelled those who began to be sick and avoided their nearest friends. They would cast them out into the roads half dead, or throw them, when dead, without burial," etc.³ These deeds of mercy and of charitable relief were found in all departments of activity, and the teachings and practice of the Church were such as to profoundly impress the most stubborn opponents.

Few can doubt that the nature of Christian charities was changed both by the conflict with Montanism, and by the growth of the principle of the merit of good works which had ^{Principles adverse to Christian charity.} taken firm root in the Church by the middle of the third century. With all its wild extravagance, Montanism was also a protest against the prevailing laxity of discipline, and the easy morals which had begun to rob the Church of her greatest efficiency. In so far Montanism contained a valuable element. But in the attempt to purify the Church by simple discipline lay a radical error. In merely withdrawing from the world, in forbidding any commingling with sinful humanity, in regarding all things forbidden which are not expressly allowed, Montanism was introducing into the ^{Montanism.} Church what is contradictory to the principles which Christ had most clearly inculcated. The lofty exclusiveness of this heresy savoured of a spiritual pride, and would separate its votaries from a fallen world which it was the real mission of Christianity to restore. In its conflict with this stubborn heresy the Church passed beyond the sober mean into the opposite extreme. In the attempt to meet the social and intellectual forces of the empire, and bring them into subjection, the strictness of discipline was relaxed, and the Church became more and more conformed to the prevalent spirit, until she was too often content with the mere ceremonial without the inspiring spirit of worship. The growing strength of the doctrine of good works, which finds expression in Origen and Cyprian, and the substitution of a special priesthood, whose functions were of peculiar sanctity, for the doctrine of the priesthood of all believers who were each and all called to a high and holy calling, tended to tarnish the charities of the Church. No longer was the simple love of Christ the inspiration of Christian beneficence; but the motive of personal advantage to the giver introduced into the work of the Church that selfish element which had tainted the charities of the heathen guilds. Thus the gifts which had before been so bountifully bestowed by individuals were now left to the care of the Church officary, and almsgiving was now practised for the benefit which might inure to the donor. Also the transition from the simple congregational episcopacy to the more formal and stately diocesan government, tended to confound pure charity with a kind of perfunctory service which was delegated to chosen officials who must deal with masses rather than with individual sufferers.

¹ Vita Cypriani, c. 9.² Ibid., c. 10.³ Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., l. 7, c. 22.

The recognition of the Church by the State was a most important fact in the history of Christian charities. Constantine had become convinced of the superiority of the work of the Church, and had largely added to her available resources. As the churches became more magnificent, and public worship more stately through the use of imposing liturgies, so the means for beneficent work were greatly multiplied. But this increase of the wealth of the Church was at the expense of the State. The financial condition of the empire was deplorable. Industries were in a state of decline. The later retirement of multitudes to the monastic life withdrew an immense productive force from society, and the further exemption of the Church properties from taxation added to the burdens of the remaining citizens. Resistance to the inroads of the barbarian tribes brought a further strain upon the tottering empire, while in the track of these invading hordes were ruin and appalling want. The opportunities for the charitable work of the Church thus multiplied on every hand. Nor were the means wanting. Immense sums were poured into her treasuries, but these were largely in the form of alms, and did not come, as before, from the free oblations made at the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Decay of pure charities.

Influence of union of Church and State.

The decay of spiritual life caused the churches to be unvisited by the masses of the people, so that in the writings of the great leaders and preachers are found bitter complaints that the eucharist was neglected for the sake of the circus or the theatre, and that the oblations were greatly diminished.

The theory that the property of the Church is for the good of the poor was still recognised, and many of the high officials gave all their private fortunes into her coffers. The constantly strengthening doctrine that almsgiving ranked with fasting and prayer as a means of salvation, and had, therefore, a highly meritorious power, further added to the resources available for Church charities. Nor was the Church an unfaithful steward. A new species of charities, in the form of hospitals, appeared during the reign of Constantine. Rise of hospitals. The exact time of their origin is not known; but the presumption is strong that the establishments ordered by Julian, during his attempt to restore heathenism, were in imitation of what had already become familiar to the Christians. It is certain, however, that from the last half of the fourth to the sixth century great numbers of these charities were founded, and were the means of alleviating the distresses of multitudes of the poor and impotent. They spread from the east to the west, where they at first seem to have been much fewer, and to have been held in lower esteem. So numerous and varied were the hospitals in the Eastern Empire that special legislation was required for their regulation and control. Though sometimes the centres of fearful immoralities, they often furnished opportunities of labor for worthy men and women, and were places of refuge for the unfortunate in the chaotic times succeeding the downfall of the Empire.

CHAPTER V.

THE RELATIONS OF THE EARLY CHURCH TO EDUCATION AND GENERAL CULTURE.

WHAT were the intellectual training and attainments of "the Twelve," and of Christ's immediate disciples, it is difficult to determine. It has been quite common to represent them as obscure and unlettered fishermen, or common toilers who belonged to a despised province, were unacquainted with human philosophy, and were untouched by the current discussions. Some facts of the gospel history, and some expressions of Christ and of Paul, seem to justify this view. "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, οὐ πολλοὶ σοφοὶ κατὰ σάρκα, not many mighty, not many noble, εὐγενεῖς, are called. But God has chosen the foolish, τὰ μωρὰ, things of the world to confound the wise, τοὺς σοφοὺς," etc. (1 Cor. i, 26-28). This expression would, however, imply that some of "the called" were of another type; and in the history of the apostolic Church are mentioned a few men of high position, both in the empire and in the Jewish Church, who had accepted Christianity (Acts xiii, 12; xviii, 8; xxii, 3; Rom. xvi, 23). While the Gospel was indeed "good news" to the uneducated, the low-born, and the obscure, who felt the need of a deliverer, it should not be too hastily inferred that the first called apostles were necessarily illiterate. The frequent appeals of Christ to the law show that his apostles were familiar with and able to read it. Josephus and Philo agree in saying that great importance was attached to the reading of the law. The noted expression of Josephus, "If any one should question one of us concerning the laws, he would more easily repeat all than his own name," shows that his further statement must be true, that "from our first consciousness we have them, as it were, engraven on our souls."¹ He frequently mentions the zeal manifested by the Jews in the instruction of their children in the law, and claims that Moses commanded to teach them in the elements of knowledge, that they might walk according to the holy statutes, and not transgress them. At the

The culture of the apostles.

Some officials were Christians.

Could read the law.

¹ Apion, ii, 18

advent of Christ, schools had been founded by the Jewish communities for the instruction of the children in the elements of knowledge; but the ultimate object of these was to teach the law. The purpose of the elementary school was, therefore, to prepare the pupils to read it, since great stress was laid upon the reading in contradistinction from mere oral instruction.¹ The further duty of children to keep the Sabbath, to observe the great fasts, to join in the prayers in the family worship and at the table, and to attend the national festivals, necessarily furnished invaluable opportunities for a knowledge of the law, and for familiarity with the national history.

The education thus carefully begun was continued by means of the services of the synagogue. This becomes more important from the fact that the synagogues were primarily places for religious instruction, and not, in the strict sense of the term, for worship. Hence Philo calls them "houses of instruction," where the law and its sacred observance were inculcated. The further fact that in the smaller towns, where the Jewish element was largely in excess, the town senate probably united in themselves both religious and civil authority, would add to the importance of the synagogues as educational institutions. Moreover, the free method of conducting the services in these places of meeting must have been a further means of stimulating thought and of disseminating knowledge. While there was a chief officer, ἀρχισυνάγωγος, who cared for the general order of services, preaching, and prayer, no officials were appointed; any one, even minors, might read the Scriptures, and every adult member of the congregation was competent to lead in prayer and expound the lessons. On Sabbath days the ruler of the synagogue was accustomed to invite several, generally not less than seven, to take part in the reading, thus increasing the number of interested partakers in the service, and of persons who were able to pronounce the sacred text; while either the readers themselves, or some competent members of the congregation, accompanied the reading with a continued translation into the Aramaic, which was the dialect understood by the bulk of the common people.

The importance which is attached to teaching in the writings of Paul is pertinent to an inquiry respecting the degree of intelligence among the early Christians. It is interesting to notice the emphasis which is laid upon this function, διδάσκειν, διδασκαλία, in the writings of the New Testament. By Paul it is mentioned with prophecy, ministering, exhortation, giving, and ruling (Rom. xii, 6-8). Teaching, διδασκαλία, is elsewhere (1 Cor. xii, 28) third in the enumeration of special charisms, outranking even miracles, δυνάμεις, gifts of healing, helps, governments, and diversities of tongues. This is not to be accounted as merely the opinion of an apostle whose opportunities for understanding contemporary thought, both Jewish and pagan, had been exceptional, but rather it is in accord with the method of Christ himself, whose ministry was largely a ministry of teaching. Whether going about all Galilee (Matt. iv, 23; Luke xiii, 10), or through all Jewry (Luke xxiii, 5), or sitting daily in the temple (Matt. xxvi, 5; John vii, 14), or addressing his more immediate disciples on the deeper meaning of the law (Matt. v, 2), or in the more astounding miracles which he wrought, or in the foremost place given to teaching in the great commission, Jesus everywhere recognises the prime importance of instructing men in regard to the truths pertaining to his kingdom.

¹ v. Shürer: The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, vol. ii, div. ii, p. 50.

Closely connected with this is the character of the epistles which the apostles addressed to the various churches respecting doctrines and duties. It must be recollected that most of these letters were written to infant societies within a generation from the crucifixion of Christ, that they were addressed to men and women who may represent the average culture of the Church, before it was compelled to adjust itself to the new conditions which persecutions or imperial patronage afterward created. It is true that the great body of the matter of these epistles is truth of an eminently practical character, easily understood, and well suited to establish the community of believers in faith and all holy living. But when we study some portions of Paul's letters to the Romans, to the Galatians, and to the Corinthians, or the epistle to the Hebrews, we are confronted with discussions of some of the most abstruse problems of religious philosophy, to whose interpretation the best minds of the Christian centuries have been devoted. The profound teachings of this apostle respecting the relation of the Jewish economy to the kingdom of heaven among men, the failure of natural religion to bring salvation, the bondage of the fallen man to sin, the relations of law to grace, the justification of the soul by faith, the subtle truths pertaining to the resurrection body, and the final triumph of the redeemed man, must be accounted among the most important and difficult themes which can engage human thought. Peter speaks of some things in these letters as "hard to be understood, δυσνόητα, which they that are unlearned, οἱ ἀμαθεῖς, and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction" (2 Pet. iii, 16). But it is not presumable that al-apostle would write in language not capable of being appreciated either by the mass of the disciples, or by those who had special direction of their religious education, thus defeating the very purpose of the epistles. Hence we are led to believe that in the apostolic Church there must have been a fair proportion of men and women to whom the deeper and more abstruse discussions of Paul were not only intelligible, but were the means of moral and religious edification.

Exalted character of the apostolic writings.

In the examination of a question respecting which so little evidence survives, the Christian idea of the family, and the sacred duty of care for children, to which reference has elsewhere been made (Book IV, chap. i), must not be omitted. The effect of Christianity was the awakening and quickening of the intellectual and moral powers. With new views of duty and destiny came new motives to care for the young. The very atmosphere of the Christian household was redolent of influences most truly stimulating and ennobling. The mother nourished the child, the community cared for the orphaned. The simplicity of tastes, so uniformly inculcated by the Christian fathers, turned the thoughts from the merely outward and accidental to the spiritual and essential. The family education must, therefore, have been of extreme importance, and had its root in the very genius of the Christian system. The duty to behave toward each other in a manner mutually helpful and saving, because each belonged to a family with God as father, was solemn and imperative, thus furnishing the necessary conditions of the truest and fullest education.

The Christian duty to the family.

For merely secular education the Christians of the first and second centuries depended upon heathen schools. These were accessible to those who could pay a moderate price for instruction, since the calling of a common teacher in the second century was regarded as one of great toil and of very limited income. Liberal emperors had encouraged education, and numerous schools had been established under their auspices. Julius Cæsar had attracted many Greek teachers to Rome, where instruction in the language was greatly coveted, and Augustus became a liberal patron of polite learning. In the second century Antoninus Pius had provided for the establishment of schools in all parts of the empire, sustaining at the public expense ten teachers of medicine, five rhetoricians, and five grammarians in the largest cities; seven teachers of medicine, four rhetoricians, and four grammarians in those of medium population; and five teachers of medicine, three rhetoricians, and three grammarians in the smaller towns.¹ While these provisions were entirely inadequate to satisfy the public needs, they nevertheless encouraged the citizens of the empire to greater efforts for the care of their children. But the interest in education was already declining. There had been a marked decadence since the beginning of the first century. The military and civil service had fallen more and more into the hands of the low-born, and thus the need of culture as a preparation for public life was felt to be less urgent. In the West a vicious pronunciation became increasingly prevalent, and many proofs of growing illiteracy and vulgarity are still preserved in the literature and in the inscriptions. It is said that while quæstor, Hadrian, during the reading of an address, was derided by the senators on account of his blunders in the use of the language, and that M. Aurelius was not understood when he gave commands in Latin, because his elegant pronunciation was entirely foreign to his officers.¹

The secular schools.

¹ Friedländer: Bd. i, s. 281.

The feelings of the Christians respecting the attendance upon the pagan schools were various. It was impossible for their children to gain the elements of a secular education elsewhere, since the condition of the first Christians forbade the establishment of separate schools. The slender testimony extant leads to the conclusion that Christian parents were accustomed to patronize the heathen teachers. Yet the early fathers are perplexed with the problem. Especially Tertullian recognises the serious embarrassments felt by both pupils and schoolmasters. He sees in the teaching of the schools, as in other kinds of business, the taint of idolatry. He discriminates, however, between teaching and learning the heathen literature. "Learning literature is allowable for believers, rather than teaching, for the principle of learning and of teaching is different. If a believer teach literature, while he is teaching doubtless he commends, while he delivers he affirms, while he recalls he bears testimony to, the praises of idols interspersed therein. . . . But when a believer learns these things, if he is already capable of understanding what idolatry is, he neither receives nor allows them; much more if he is not yet capable."² He therefore hesitates to condemn the patronizing of the heathen schools by the Christian, because "to him necessity is attributed as an excuse, because he has no other way to learn."³ Cyprian is firm in enforcing the differences between Christian and heathen morality;⁴ and it is clear from the taunts of Celsus that in his day there was a wide-spread inattention and even repugnance to heathen learning among the Christians.

¹ Friedländer: Op. cit., Bd. iii, ss. 352 353.

² de Idol., c. 10.

³ Ibid.

⁴ ad Anton. c. 16.

The earliest educational institution in the Church was the catechumenate. This was not intended for children only, but for all who would be admitted to full membership, and to a complete enjoyment of Church privileges. Primarily this had reference to instruction in the principles of the Christian faith, and it is probable that little, if any, strictly secular education was at first connected with it. The bishops regarded it as incumbent upon them to care for the training of their flocks in the principles of their religion; yet, from some of the works which have been preserved, it is evident that the discussions sometimes involved the highest problems which can engage human attention,—the doctrines of the Holy Spirit, the Incarnation, Divine Providence, the last Things, etc. From this it may be safely inferred that the hearers must have passed far beyond the stage of elementary training, and were able to discuss and master these high themes. The acceptance of Christianity by some men well versed in the pagan philosophy led the earliest apologists to employ Greek learning in the defence of the peculiarities of the Christian system. Such was Justin Martyr, who, after conversion, devoted his powers to the preparation of Apologies for Christianity, addressing both, as now appears, to Antoninus Pius, one of the most cultivated emperors of the century. His thought and method are distinctively Greek. Christianity is the highest reason, and he who lives in conformity to reason is a Christian. Whatever, therefore, is rational is Christian, and whatever is Christian is in accordance with the best reason. He even goes so far as to declare that all, in every dispensation, who have thus lived in conformity to the deepest reason, are Christians in every thing but name. Justin thus endeavours to reconcile the Christian system with the best teaching of the Platonic philosophy, and is the first one of the fathers to suggest the method for the harmony of reason and revelation, and for the use of Greek learning in the Christian schools.

The use of Greek learning.

The most famous catechetical school was that of Alexandria, which had a succession of noted teachers who deeply influenced the theology of the Church. While tradition ascribes its founding to St. Mark, its first authentic teacher was Pantænus, who flourished about A. D. 180. He was succeeded by a long line of instructors, of whom Clement and Origen were the most conspicuous. This school was not for children; rather it was after the type of the schools of the Jewish rabbis and of the Greek philosophers. It was a place of inquiry and discussion. The room or hall stood open from morning to night, and probably all who wished had free access to the master. In addition to conversations,

The school of Alexandria.

and free question and answer to any who might come, its method. there appears to have been a progressive course for those who desired more systematic training in the doctrines of the Christian religion. This is suggested by the treatises of Clement and Origen. They seem to have been arranged on the plan of a progressive unfolding of the truth, and a growing experience of its saving power.¹ Since this school was free of charge for tuition, it was visited by multitudes of both men and women, and became the means of instructing many thoughtful pagans in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. Especially under the direction of Origen, who at a later period devoted his entire attention to advanced instruction, were eminent heathen persuaded of the truth of Christianity, who also made valuable gifts to the school. Prominent among these was Ambrosius, a Gnostic, who contributed a valuable library, and promoted the exegetical studies of Origen by the aid of copyists, readers, and secretaries. In connection with theology and philosophy, rhetoric and mathematics, physics and astronomy, and even grammar and music, were taught.

But the attempt of the Alexandrian theologians to reconcile the supernaturalism of the Gospel with the pagan philosophy was attended with peculiar dangers. Not only did the Christian teachers encounter the purer and nobler principles of Platonism, but the eclecticism of the Neo-Platonic school, and the bewildering syncretism of the Jewish and Christian Gnosticism. The earnest desire of Origen to reconcile these conflicting elements, within and without the Church, led him to embrace some extravagant doctrines which had but slender scriptural authority, and to originate an allegorical method of interpretation of the Scriptures whose threefold sense, literal, moral, and spiritual, might lead to conclusions as untenable as the wildest vagaries of Gnosticism.

At a very early date an important institution was established at Antioch. This differed somewhat from the catechetical school of Alexandria, inasmuch as it was not under the direction and official oversight of the bishop, but was rather a collection of cloister schools, inside and outside the city, for the special training of the monks and clergy. Their curriculum of studies was much narrower. Instead of philosophy and nearly the whole round of human knowledge, as taught at Alexandria, the schools of Antioch were almost exclusively engaged in the study of the Scriptures. The eminent teachers, Dorotheus and Lucian of Samosata, introduced a more just and rational interpretation, and became the instructors of some of the ablest bishops of the Church. Also at Edessa, Cæsarea, Nisibis, etc., were flourishing schools, whose influence upon the thought and doctrines of the Church was most important.

¹ Notice especially the difference of teaching in Clement's Cohortatio ad Græcos, Pædagogus, and Stromata. These progress from the elements of a Christian life to the more advanced stages of thought and experience.

The recognition of the Church by Constantine brought no immediate change in the feeling of the leading fathers respecting heathen philosophy, or in relation to the propriety of patronizing heathen schools. There is abundant evidence More favourable opinion of pagan culture. that some of the most distinguished Christian theologians of the fourth and fifth centuries received much of their training under pagan masters. The education of Jerome, Augustine, and Chrysostom, as well as that of Gregory Nazianzen and Basil with Julian in the schools of Athens, is illustrative of the opinion of the best Christian families respecting the excellent discipline of the heathen teachers. Nevertheless, there is noticed a feeling of the importance of a distinctively Christian education under the direction of the Church. By the middle of the fourth century this conviction had greatly strengthened, and the Christian teachers had become so numerous and influential as to direct the attention of the Emperor Julian to these schools, which were regarded by him as most serious hinderances to his efforts to restore the pagan religion. The attempt to remove these teachers from the public schools, and its influence on the development of a distinctive Christian poetry, have been elsewhere traced.¹

The further effect was to develop a theory of education which may be properly denominated Christian. Its chief elements are found in the writings of Chrysostom, but it is A Christian theory of education. more completely systematized by Basil. Both these fathers placed a very high value upon education. "Do not attempt to make your son a mere orator, but train him in Christian wisdom. Every thing depends upon character, not upon words; this alone will make him strong in the kingdom of God, and secure for him the true riches. Do not be over careful respecting his language, but purify his heart. I do not say this to hinder you from giving your son a literary training, but to guard against expending all energy and thought on this alone." Such is the wise advice of Chrysostom to Christian parents. Placing a high estimate upon the Power of example. influence of example, he exhorts parents and guardians to see to it that their children and wards are placed under teachers whose pure lives will in themselves be the best educating power. "Much of the evil in children comes from our neglect, from the fact that we have not from the first inculcated the fear and love of God.

¹ v. Book I, chap. viii.

We interpose no objection to the son's attending the theatre, and make no effort that he visit the church; if one now and then is found at the public services it is more as an amusement than for purposes of worship." By Chrysostom the mother is regarded as the best teacher, and, next to her, the cloister schools are the most important means of Christian education.

Basil shows about an equal enthusiasm for Greek culture and for the monastic life. "The Christian must seek the treasures of the life to come. To this life the Scriptures are designed to lead by instructing us in the deep mysteries of the faith. But in order to understand these our powers must be cultivated by every possible means—by intercourse with the poets, the orators, the grammarians, and with every one who may give us insight into the deeper truths pertaining to the kingdom of God." The principles which Basil formulated for the government of the monks in their schools contain much of permanent value.

The teachings of Jerome respecting the value of pagan writings were still more influential. Notwithstanding his extreme asceticism, the influence of his early training is manifest in his own studies, and in the high value which he places upon the literature of pagan antiquity. His severe strictures on the ecclesiastics of his day for neglecting the study of the Scriptures, and for passing their time in reading low comedies and love-songs, cannot be construed as condemning the study of the best heathen classics, since even after his retirement to Bethlehem he established a school in connection with the monastery, and gave instruction in grammar and in the Roman poets.¹ The later views of Jerome were influenced by his ardent devotion to the monastic life, and probably by his alarm at the fearful decadence of faith and morals throughout the empire. His views respecting the education of daughters are characterized by excessive severity,² and his condemnation of high Church officials, who instruct their sons in the heathen authors and in low comedy at the neglect of the teachings of the Church, is most unsparing.³

The contributions of Augustine to the work of education were many and valuable. His own training had been most thorough; and while in some of his writings he regrets the time wasted in reading the trivial and debauching works of pagan authors, he elsewhere recommends the classics for the valuable Basil's teaching.

Jerome's partiality for classic writings.

His later severity.

Augustine's views.

¹ v. Ebert: Geschichte der Christlich-lateinischen Literatur, s. 182.

² v. Schmidt: Die Geschichte der Erziehung und des Unterrichts, Götten, 1863, ss. 136, 137.

³ v. Com. in Ephes. vi, 4.

truths therein found, which are in accord with the Christian system, and the study of the rhetoricians for the benefits experienced in fitting the preacher for his work.

In the West the destructive barbarian invasions had almost completely annihilated the public institutions which had been maintained by the government; hence the standard of education became low in the extreme. Instead of the imperial schools, the cathedral schools, under the direction of the bishops, then undertook the training of the youth. The general result was a further inattention to the works of pagan authors, a growing distrust of secular learning, and a narrow and inadequate training in most of the monastic institutions of the West. "Science became the servant of theology, and thereby lost its freedom and independent activity."¹ The inscriptions of the fifth and sixth centuries reveal the growing illiteracy. Their wide departure from classic forms, the many gross errors in orthography, the interchange of labials, etc., the inattention to grammatical laws, the barbarous commingling of Greek and Latin characters and words, furnish painful evidence of educational and literary decadence.²

Effects of the barbarian invasions.

In the Byzantine Empire and in the Oriental Church the culture and training were largely influenced by theological thought, while the education of the masses was far below what the liberal provisions of the emperors should have realized. The doctrinal controversies and the fierce rivalries of factions diverted attention from the care of the people. The schools and libraries supported by the imperial government had been professedly reared on classic and Christian foundations, but the old Greek spirit had departed, and Christianity had degenerated into a lifeless form. The grandest service done by the later Oriental Church was to preserve the pagan classics and the ancient works of art, which at a later period were to be most important aids in the revival of learning in Western Europe.

Education in the Eastern Church.

¹ Schmidt: Op. cit., s. 145.

² See the inscriptions contained in Plates iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii and their translation in Appendix. These will supply a most valuable comment on the condition of literature and education for the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries.

CHAPTER VI.

CARE FOR THE DEAD IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

FROM time immemorial the peoples from whom the converts of the early Church were drawn had shown careful thought for their dead. They manifested deep interest in the repose and destination of the soul, and maintained a close relationship between the living and the departed. The Old Testament Scriptures contain many touching accounts of the anxiety of the Jews relative to the places of their sepulture. The embalming in the case of Jacob and Joseph, the carrying of Jacob to his home to be buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah, the grievous mourning for seven days, are indications of burial customs which seem to have been widely observed. The washing and embalming of the body, the winding in a cloth, the wrapping about with linen bands, the covering of the face with a napkin, the use of costly spices, etc., are found in the account of the burial of Christ. To have this care for the dead was the sacred duty of the living. To remain unburied was considered the most dreadful calamity; hence the most fearful curse pronounced upon the violators of God's law is that their bodies shall be left a prey for the fowls of heaven, or as filth in the streets, or as dung in the fields (Psa. lxxix, 2; Jer. ix, 22; xvi, 4). Even enemies and executed criminals received burial before sunset. The custom of burial feasts seems to have been quite common among the Jews (Deut. xxvi, 14; Jer. xvi, 7; Hos. ix, 14; et al.). The lamentations for seven and even thirty days, the rending of the garments, the scattering of dust and ashes upon the head, were common; yet the law interdicted certain excessive exhibitions of grief, because of their connection with the practices of the heathen nations around them (Lev. xix, 27, 28; Deut. xiv, 1).

Burial was the almost universal custom among the Hebrews. Only in exceptional cases was burning practiced, and even then the bones were to be gathered and interred. That burning was abhorrent to the Hebrew mind appears from the fact that it was adjudged a punishment to be visited upon those who had been guilty of heinous crimes (Lev. xx, 14; xxi, 9). Since the law regarded the dead body as a source of ceremonial defilement, the places of burial were somewhat removed from the dwellings of customs.

Jewish burial

Burial and not burning.

the living. While there was a cemetery, or place of public interment, there was ever a great desire among the Jews to gather the deceased members of the family into close proximity; this is seen from the fact that "to be gathered to his fathers" is equivalent to one's death and burial. Hence, even after the dispersion, the Jews strove to have separate cemeteries, and this desire measurably continues to the present day.

The location and form of the grave depended upon circumstances. Frequently in Palestine the numerous natural grottos in the limestone rock afforded a place of sepulture, either by hewing out spaces in the face of the rock, or by making perpendicular excavations. Three kinds of graves have been distinguished by investigators: the body was either laid upon Three kinds of graves. a bench or shelf hewn out of the rock, over which an arch was constructed, or placed in a box-like cavity made in the wall, or laid away in an excavation in the floor of the grotto.¹ The marking of these places of sepulture by monuments of a costly and artistic nature was not common among the early Hebrews. A few ac- Jewish monuments. counts of the erection of a stone or pillar are met, and, in later times, of monuments possessing some artistic merit, also some attempts at ornamentation. This is especially noticeable in the Jewish catacombs upon the Appian Way in Rome. In these are galleries and chambers, and some attempts at artistic adornment by painting, and the incorporation into the monuments of elements which are plainly heathen, thus showing that the Jews of the dispersion were more ready to admit into their art principles which were interdicted during their independent national life.

Among the Greeks there was an equal care for the dead. In Athens, by statutory provision, one seeking to fill high public office must first show that he had been guilty of no neglect Greek sentiment. with respect to the burial of his parents. The refusal of enemies to permit the burial of those who had fallen in battle was terribly avenged. When the body could not be secured, it was regarded as a duty to erect some monument, and over any corpse found in the way at least a handful of earth must be strewn. The preparation of the body for burial was somewhat similar to that practiced by the Jews. To close the eyes, to wash and anoint the body, to array in white garments, and to bedeck it with flowers and wreaths were the usual practices Both burying and burning practiced. among the Greeks. The mode of sepulture differed at different periods of their history. In the historic period burial was most usual, although burning was also practiced. In

¹ v. Tobler: Golgotha, s. 201. Wilson: Pictureque Palestine, pp. 95. 96.

Sparta alone cremation was common, and this only during the period of Roman rule. On sanitary grounds burning was instituted for a season, but when the extraordinary circumstances passed away the return to burying was quite general. Also burning was practiced in case of soldiers who had fallen in battle on distant fields, in order that their ashes might be more easily transported to their native country.

A common burial-plat was used only by the poor; the rich or well-to-do citizens had separate tombs either along the most public streets, or in grounds ornamented with trees and works of art. The tomb was usually of the nature of a chamber of sufficient size to admit the friends, and the body was laid upon a shelf of masonry. The Greeks wrought out their sarcophagi with equal pains on every side, whereas the Romans only cared for the front and ends: this shows that the Greek sarcophagus occupied a position in the centre of the burial-chamber, while the Roman was designed to be placed against the wall. The purpose of the Greeks seemed to be to disarm death of its terrors, as far as possible, by placing in the tomb objects which were most familiar and dear to the deceased while living, or by decorating the burial chamber with various ornaments, as vases, lamps, weapons, etc. The numerous elegant vases found in Greek graves now constitute a special department of art history. The decorations of the monuments themselves were chiefly in plastic; sometimes, especially in case of cenotaphs, painting was used. The subjects treated in these works are chiefly taken from the popular mythology. They sometimes represent the ruthlessness of death in robbing us of our treasures, as when the Harpies are sculptured, but generally they are of a more cheerful character, and express the leading thought of the Greek mind that the design of a monument is to keep alive the memory of the dead, rather than to point to a hereafter, and to describe the state of the departed.

The Romans regarded burial as a thing rightfully due to all. Even criminals who had been put to death were to be cared for by the surviving members of the family, and in case of those who had fallen in battle for their country the state took the place of the family, and provided for their decent sepulture. This concern is also manifested in the fact that the living were careful to purchase plats and erect appropriate tombs, and to make testamentary provision for keeping alive their memories by the yearly celebration of the burial feasts. Rich patrons prepared places of common sepulture for clients, freedmen, and slaves, and it was considered a severe punishment to deprive these persons of the privilege. The indigent classes and small traders also organized themselves into clubs, collegia, for social or other purposes, but they were chiefly concerned for the appropriate burial of the deceased members. The legal provisions for the protection of the graves only embodied the average Roman sentiment. Every spot where a body was buried was judged sacred. The boundaries of the cemeteries and of the individual tombs were carefully defined. The area was regarded as inalienable, passing to the heirs in perpetuity. The removal of the dead was forbidden, and only by express permission could this be effected. The violation and rob-

Legal provisions.

Fig. 141.—A Roman columbarium.

bing of graves and the mutilation of monuments were visited with most severe penalties, and many inscriptions indulge in fearful execrations of those who may profane the tombs.¹

The method of disposing of the dead varied at different periods of Roman history. From numerous considerations it is evident that burial was the early Roman custom. In the law of the Twelve Tables both inhumation and burning are recognised. This double practice continued into the imperial period, but cremation had doubtless been promoted by the growing desire for display on the one hand, and by the certainty that thus a member of a collegium would have an urn in the columbarium. The Roman columbarium (Fig. 141), so named from Both inhumation and burning practiced.

Columbarium.]

¹ For examples on Christian tombs, v. p. 256, n. 3.

its resemblance to a dove-cote, consisted of a building in whose interior walls were parallel rows of semi-circular niches, in which were placed the cinerary urns. The arrangement in successive rows and sections permitted the gathering of the ashes of the members of a family or of a club into close proximity, and the easy identification of their place of sepulture. Over the niches were the names of the deceased, either upon plates or sculptured in the wall, and words as "Eutuchii," "Pancratii," etc., indicated the sodality to which they belonged. Cremation never became a universal practice among the Romans. Under the Antonines, on the contrary, burial was very frequent, and in the third and fourth centuries it became quite common among the best families of Rome.

The provision of the Twelve Tables, that nobody should be burned or buried within the city walls, was reenacted side the city walls. with even greater stringency in the imperial period.

This led to the custom of arranging the graves along the most frequented streets outside the city gates, thus keeping alive the thought of the dead by placing their tombs where they could be viewed by the passing multitudes. Thus opportunity was also given to gratify the growing desire for luxury. Since the Romans avoided, so far as possible, a common cemetery, but aimed to be grouped into families or sodalities, the building of imposing tombs along the highways, and the careful decoration of the areas, were the natural results of the attempt of the great families and collegia to rival each other in magnificent display. The tombs afforded the best examples of Roman art, hence the Via Appia and the Via Latina became the favorite drives Monuments on main streets. of the Roman nobility. Nor was this practice confined to the capital. The excavations at Pompeii reveal a like arrangement in a comparatively small provincial town. These have brought to light the street leading from Pompeii to Herculaneum. It (v. Fig. 142) proves to be the Via Appia of Pompeii, since it is bordered with tombs in the best art of the period, not, indeed, equalling in magnificence the gorgeous mausoleums of Rome, yet clearly illustrating the Roman conception of the use of mortuary monuments. Such, briefly, were the burial customs of the peoples from whom early Christianity gained its converts. It is presumable that here, too, as in other questions which have come under examination, the new religion would not so much create absolutely new customs as adopt those at hand, and give to them a deeper significance in accordance with the clearer revelations of truth which were vouchsafed by Christ to his Church.

The Christians shared the common desire to care for their dead.

Christian care for the dead. While the early Christian literature furnishes no formal treatise on the method of burial, the scattered notices are so numerous as to leave no doubt as to the Christian practice. In common with the non-Christian peoples, they regarded the neglect of the dead with special horror. This is clearly seen from the fact that the refusal of the civil authorities to deliver to their friends the bodies of those who had suffered martyrdom was felt to be a matter of peculiar hardship.¹

There seems to have been in the minds of some of the Church an apprehension that the appropriate burial of the body was necessary in order to a share in the resurrection; this greatly added to the affliction felt when the ashes of friends were widely scattered. So greatly disturbed were many, that the Christian teachers were constrained to correct this false notion by careful instruction respecting the doctrine of the resurrection. Nevertheless, the Church insisted upon decent burial whenever possible, and strongly condemned neglect of this sacred duty.² The importance attaching to Christian burial is also illustrated by the system of penitential discipline. Interment in Christian cemeteries was absolutely refused to unbelievers, and those under the ban of the Church looked with peculiar horror upon their exclusion from the common resting-place.

Fig. 142.—A street of tombs leading from Herculaneum Gate, Pompeii.

¹ v. Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., l. v, c. 1, where the account of the persecution in Lyons and Vienne is given, and the casting of the ashes of the martyrs into the Rhone.

² This is exemplified in the conduct of the Alexandrian Christians during the fearful pestilence in that city, to which reference has elsewhere been made.

The Christians buried their dead, never burned them. It is plain that this practice was influenced by their faith in the resurrection, as well as by the fact that they shared the common belief of antiquity that man could have no separate spiritual existence independent of corporeal substance. In most respects the Christians accepted the common methods of preparing the dead for burial, but a notable difference is seen in the fact that while the Roman separated the classes, or at least the family idea preserved, most allowed only members of the same family or sodality to be buried near each other, the Christian burial places recognised no such distinctions. All classes of the Christian society perpetuated after death that fellowship which they had realized while living. This is noticed more especially in the West, while in the East and in Egypt single graves were usual.

The earlier view, that the Christians were compelled to find secret places for the interment of their dead, has been shown to be quite erroneous. At first they were looked upon by the government as only a particular school of the Jews; hence they shared all the privileges and immunities which had from time to time been granted to the Jews. Their burial places were, therefore, adjudged equally sacred with others. At a later period, when the distinction between Jews and Christians was more clearly recognised, the latter were, at Rome especially, looked upon as one of the many collegia, banded together for special objects, but most of all to care for the decent burial of their fellow-members. Such burial clubs were specially encouraged, and were granted areas in which their dead could be interred, and where proper cellæ could be built for the celebration of the funeral feasts.¹ It is only in harmony with the Roman reverence for the dead that, while many of the collegia were suppressed from political considerations, the burial clubs were never disturbed.

The origin of the catacombs, at Rome and elsewhere, was most simple and natural. Like other burial clubs the Christians obtained an area which was devoted to sacred purposes, and the excavations below that area were begun and increased as the Church multiplied. The entrance to the catacombs was usually well known. No concealment was necessary, since the law judged all burial areas sacred. It has been satisfactorily established that among the Roman Christians of the first and second centuries were persons of social position and wealth, who gave land for purposes of Christian burial. The cemetery thus founded would take the name of its chief patron. It is believed that the grounds on which most of the Roman catacombs were excavated originally belonged to private persons, whose names would in themselves afford partial protection against abuse.

¹ Under Alexander Severus, about A.D. 230, the Christians of Rome were granted the privileges of a burial association, collegium funeraticium.

The entrance to them was usually by an excavation in the side of a hill, or by a staircase; in that to Santa Domitilla (Fig. 143), these are combined. For burial purposes narrow passages Description of catacombs. from two and a half to four feet wide, and from seven to ten feet high, were made in the soft tufa rock, in the faces of which rectangular cavities, each large enough to receive a body, were hewn. These ran lengthwise of the passages, and may be likened to so many shelves upon which bodies might rest. Several rows or tiers of graves, loculi, sometimes as many as seven, rose one above another (Fig. 144). As the demands for space increased, from the main corridors side aisles were constructed, thus making a complicated net-work of passages which none but the initiated were able to thread. In some of the catacombs these aggregate several miles in length. The accompanying plan (Fig. 145) of a portion of the Catacomb of St. Agnes, at Rome, will enable the reader to form some conception of the complexity of the system. Besides the multiplicity of aisles, the capacity of the catacombs was further enlarged by excavations at different levels, thus forming several stories (piani), in some cases as many as five, communicating with each other by staircases cut in the rock; in each story Extent of catacombs. was a like complexity of passages. Thus the entire area was honeycombed with graves to the depth of from twenty

Fig. 143.—The entrance to Santa Domitilla at Rome.

The method of Christian burial differed from that of the heathen, in that the latter allowed the body to be in view, while the former closed the grave, loculus, with a slab of marble carefully set in cement. This practice of the Christians came from the fact that the catacombs were often visited, and the effluvium from the dead bodies must be guarded against. At the intersections of the main passage-ways, rooms of considerable dimensions were formed, which often became the burial places of noted families, or of persons of peculiar sanctity. These were sometimes enlarged and decorated with paintings in fresco, or adorned with sculptured sarcophagi. Sometimes, also, a doorway led into an independent chamber or succession of chambers, cubiculum, cubacula, which seem, for the most part, to have been family vaults. The size and arrangement of these rooms would suggest a place for the gathering of a family to keep the funeral feasts, rather than a common meeting for the celebration of the eucharist. There can be little doubt that during times of severe persecution, when Christians were forbidden to closed.

The grave

Cubacula.

Not used for public worship.

Fig. 146.—An arcosolium from the catacombs.

visit the cemeteries, the entrances to the catacombs, which were before well known, were concealed, and the larger chambers were sometimes used for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. But the limited space in these rooms forbids the supposition that the catacombs could have been used as places of assembly for ordinary worship by the large numbers of Christians in Rome.

The tombs were of different sizes and forms, according to the ability of the family or the prominence of the deceased. The ordinary form was the shelf, hewn into the face of the rock. At times tombs were built up with masonry and covered with slabs of marble, as may now be seen in some modern churches. Again, an arched recess was excavated, and then a vault was hewn in the rock below to receive one or more bodies, which were separated from each other by partitions of stone. This form of tomb was called arcosolium (v. Fig. 146).

Arcosolium.

To naturally light all these intricate windings was evidently impossible. From some frescos which have been preserved it is seen that the fossores, or those who excavated the catacombs, worked by the light of torches or lamps. This must have been the usual method of pursuing their laborious task. But for the purposes of ventilation, as well as of lighting the larger rooms which were used for special services, shafts were extended through the soil to the surface. These were called luminaria (v. Fig. 147). When the location of the catacombs must be concealed, these were small, but in times of peace to the Church they were much enlarged.

The many miles of subterranean passages hewn out of the tufa rock, the millions of bodies laid away with tenderest care in these natural sarcophagi, whose enclosing plates of marble were inscribed with words and symbols indicative of the former faith and present happiness of disciples who wait the voice of their Lord to awaken them to eternal life, must continue to be the never-ceasing wonder of the Christian scholar, and remain as the most impressive example of the religious care of the early Christians for their dead. If we cannot speak of "The Church of the Catacombs," we can speak with entire truthfulness of a "Theology of the Catacombs," which may be formulated from the evidences herein contained.

Fig. 147.—The section of a chamber and a luminarium in the Catacomb SS. Marcellino e Pietro, Rome.

While the Roman catacombs are more extensive than any elsewhere found, those of Naples, Milan, Syracuse, Alexandria, etc., likewise contain many objects which have proved of great value in the study of early Christian art, life, and doctrine. As before said, it was the most usual custom of the Eastern churches to use single and isolated tombs. The discoveries of de Vogüé have demonstrated a condition of great prosperity among the churches of Central Syria during the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Many of the single monuments are elegant and imposing, while the entrances to some of the cemeteries have features reminding us of the Roman catacombs. Fig. 148 is a view of the exterior of a tomb at El-Barah, Central Syria.¹ The exterior somewhat closely resembles that of the Catacomb of Santa Domitilla (Fig 143); but the interior consists of a single chamber, in which separate sarcophagi are placed in arcosolia hewn in the face of the rock. They generally lack the passages so usual in the Roman catacombs, and more resemble the cubicula. The number of these subterranean tombs in Syria is very great, and they further confirm our impression of the scrupulous care of the Christians for their dead.

Fig. 148.—Exterior view of rock-hewn tombs at El-Barah, Central Syria.

The teachings of the symbols and inscriptions has elsewhere been treated;² also the marked resemblance of many of the heathen and Christian burial customs has been noted. But as in the case of symbolism, sculpture, painting, and architecture, so here, where the Church used such elements as were not contaminated with idolatry, she gave to them a deeper significance through the revelation of life and immortality in the Gospel.

¹ v. de Vogüé: Syrie Centrale, plate 79, no. 2, and vol. i, p. 107.

² v. Book I, chaps. ii, iii, vi, and vii.

A D D E N D A .

I.

GLOSSARY.

- ABACUS: The crowning plate of the capital of a column.
- ABRAXAS GEMS: Applied to a class of objects, bearing talismanic symbols, supposed to have been prepared by the Gnostics.
- AGAPE: The love-feast of the early Christians.
- ALE: Small rooms adjoining the atrium in a Roman house.
- ALTO-RELIEVO: Applied to sculptured figures which stand out prominently above the general plane of the block in which they are cut, and to which they are attached. Opposed to bass-reliefs, or basso-relievo.
- AMBO: A desk from which the readers (lectores) read the gospels and epistles. The gospel ambo stood on the south side, and the epistle ambo on the north side.
- AMPULLE: Blood-phials found in the catacombs.
- ANAPHORA: The second or main part of a liturgical service.
- ANTIPHONARIUM: A service book containing the music, chants, sentences, etc.
- ANTIPHONY: A responsive hymn or chant.
- APSE: The semi-circular recess in which a building terminates, usually covered by a half dome.
- ARCHITRAVE: The first member of an entablature, which rests immediately upon the supporting columns (v. Entablature).
- ARCOSOLIUM: Applied to a grave in the face of the rock over which an arched recess is hewn.
- AREA: The groundplat allowed by the Roman government to the collegia for the burial of their dead, and for the erection of suitable buildings for the celebration of the memorial feasts.
- ATRIUM: The chief room in the Roman house.
- BAPTISTERY: A room or building where the rite of baptism is administered. Sometimes it was a room in a church, sometimes a detached building.
- BASILICA: A spacious hall for public business. Afterward applied to a Christian church of a certain type, of one, three, or five naves.
- BEMA: In Byzantine architecture the name of the chancel.
- BIBLIA PAUPERUM: "Books for the Poor," generally applied to illustrated leaves of the Bible, or to Bible scenes, by which religious instruction might be given to the illiterate.
- BULLA: A small tablet of metal or ivory attached to a chain and worn around the neck. Slaves wore leather bullæ.
- BYZANTINE ARCHITECTURE: The style of architecture developed in the Byzantine Empire from about A. D. 328 to A. D. 1453. First period prior to A. D. 562; second period from A. D. 562 to the eleventh century; third period from the eleventh century to the conquest of Greece by the Turks.
- CADENCE: The fall of the voice in reading, especially in reading poetry.
- CALIPPIC CYCLE: one of seventy-six years.
- CANTHARUS: A fountain in the vestibule of a Christian church.
- CANTILLATION: Singing as a recitation or chant.
- CAPITAL: The head or crown of a column or pilaster. Each style of architecture had its distinctive capital.
- CATACOMBS: Subterranean vaults or excavations used for burial purposes.

- CATHEDRA: The chair of a high official, as bishop or teacher.
- CELLA: An enclosed space in a hypæthral temple, where stood the altar. Also applied to a recess in a church, and to a building in which burial feasts were held.
- CENSER: A vessel, to which chains are usually attached, in which incense is burned in public service.
- CERAMICS: The science of pottery.
- CHALICE: The eucharistic cup.
- CHARISM: An extraordinary gift conferred on the primitive Christians, as the gift of miracles, of tongues, etc.
- CHROMATIC: In music a scale consisting of thirteen intervals, eight scale tones and five intermediate tones.
- CIBORIUM: A domed covering, supported by pillars, rising above the high altar.
- COLLEGIUM: An association, a guild, a club, a fraternity.
- COLONNADE: A series of columns at regular intervals.
- COLUMBARIUM: A place of sepulture where the urns containing the ashes of the dead were placed in niches, resembling a dove-cote.
- COMPLUVIUM: The opening in the roof of a Roman house.
- CONFESSIO: A space beneath the high altar, where relics or a sarcophagus might be placed.
- CORONA: Applied to the jeweled halo encircling the head of a saint or of Christ.
- CRYPT: A vault beneath a building, or a portion of a catacomb.
- CUBICULUM: A sleeping or lodging-room in a Roman house; also a burial chamber in the catacombs.
- CUPOLA: The convex roof of a building, either circular or polygonal.
- CURSIVE: When applied to inscriptions it means running writing, or where the letters are joined together.
- DIATONIC: In music, a scale consisting of eight sounds with seven intervals, of which five are whole tones and two are semitones.
- DIPINTI: Inscriptions painted in colours, as red, or with coal, etc.
- DIPTYCH: Any thing folded together twice. Applied to tablets of metal or ivory covered with wax, used by the ancients for writing with a stylus.
- DISCIPLINA ARCANI: Privileges enjoyed only by those who had been initiated into the inner mysteries of a school or society.
- DOME: Literally, a cathedral; more properly a cupola, specially used in Byzantine architecture.
- DOMINANT: In music, the note on which the recitation was made in each psalm or canticle tune.
- ENHARMONIC: The musical scale which was used by the ancient Greeks.
- ENTABLATURE: The portion of a building which is immediately supported by columns; it consists of architrave, frieze, and cornice.
- EPIGRAPHY: The science of inscriptions.
- EPITHALAMIUM: A wedding song or hymn.
- EXEDRÆ: v. Cella. Also applied in Byzantine architecture to the recesses on either side the high altar which were occupied by the deacons.
- EXTRA-MURAL: Situated outside the walls of a town.
- FAÇADE: The front view or elevation of a building.
- FONT: The vessel containing the consecrated water to be used in baptism.
- FORMATIVE ARTS: Those fine arts which appeal to the eye, as sculpture, painting, and architecture, in distinction from those arts which appeal to the ear.
- FOSSORES: Literally, diggers. Applied to a class of men who prepared the graves for the burial of Christians.
- FRESCO: A painting executed in mineral or earthy pigments upon fresh or wet plaster walls.
- FRIEZE: The middle member of the Entablature; it lies between the architrave and the cornice. Its character depended upon the style of architecture.
- GLYPTICS: The science of engraving on precious stones.
- GRAFFITO: A rude inscription or figure scratched upon a soft rock or stuccoed surface.
- GYNECŒUM: The portion of a church edifice for the exclusive use of women.
- HEXAMETER: In poetry, having six feet to the line or verse.
- HIEROGLYPHICS: The sacred writings of the Egyptians. Now applied to any writing whose key is obscure or unknown.
- HARMONICS: The science of musical sounds.
- ICHTHUS MONUMENTS: Those which bear the name or figure of the fish.

- IMPLUVIUM: A depression or cistern in the floor of a Roman house to receive the rain falling through the compluvium.
- IN SITU: Monuments are said to be in situ when they occupy their original position, or have not been disturbed.
- LABARUM: The standard of Constantine the Great in which the χ supplanted the Roman eagle.
- LECTORIUM: v. Ambo.
- LOCULUS: A grave hewn in the face of the rock in the catacombs.
- LUNETTE: A semicircular space above a square window, or an orifice for admission of light.
- LYRIC: Applied to poetry which is appropriate for singing.
- MARIOLATRY: The cultus or worship of the Virgin Mary.
- MARMORARI: The Roman workers in marble.
- MAUSOLEUM: An imposing tomb.
- MEDALLION: A circular tablet on which figures are sculptured, painted, or wrought in mosaic.
- METONIC CYCLE: A cycle of nineteen years.
- MIME: A play in which mimicry is the main action.
- MINIATURE: An illustrated or illuminated manuscript; probably so called from painting the rubrics and initial letters with red lead (minium).
- MISSA CATECHUMENORUM: The services at which the catechumens were allowed to be present in company with the fully initiated members.
- MISSA FIDELIUM: The service which only the fully initiated could attend, especially the Eucharist.
- MONOLITH: A column consisting of a single stone.
- MONOGRAM: A combination of letters or forms symbolizing some name or fact.
- MONUMENT: Any sensuous object designed to perpetuate the memory of a person or event.
- MOsaICS: Ornamental work resulting from inlaying small pieces (teseræ), usually cubes, of glass, stone, etc., much used by the ancients in pavements, and by the Christians in the apses and triumphal arches of churches.
- MosQUE: The sacred building of the Mohammedans.
- MURAL: Pertaining to a wall; as mural painting, that upon the wall of a church, catacomb, etc.
- NAOS: Properly a temple. Applied to the sacred interior of a church.
- NARTHEX: The portico of the Byzantine church.
- NAVE: The part of a church building in which the general congregation assembled, usually lying west of the choir. The interior area of a church may be divided into three or five naves by longitudinal rows of columns.
- NICHE: A recess in a wall to receive a statue, bust, or other ornamental object.
- NIMBUS: The circle encircling the head of saints; called also a corona, when jeweled.
- NISAN: The first month of the Jewish year, beginning in March.
- NUMÆ: Marks accompanying the ancient musical notation, whose meaning has not been satisfactorily determined.
- NUMISMATICS: The science of coins and medals.
- OCTAVE: In music, the interval.
- OECUS: A recess in the rear part of the peristyle of a Roman house.
- ORANTES: The technical term used for figures found in catacombs, standing with extended arms in the attitude of prayer.
- ORATORY: A building for prayer.
- PALÆOGRAPHY: The science of deciphering ancient inscriptions and writings.
- PALÆONTOLOGY: The science of organic remains.
- PALLIUM: The outside loose garment worn by the Romans.
- PANTOMIME: A play in which the plot is revealed by action, and not by words.
- PERISTYLE: A court or square enclosed by a colonnade; sometimes it applies to the colonnade itself.
- PILASTER: A square half column, usually projecting from the face of the wall, for purposes of strength or ornament.
- PIX, PIXIS: An ivory box, generally placed upon the altar to contain the consecrated elements in the eucharist.
- PLAGAL: In ancient music, applied to the four modes added by Gregory the Great.
- PRESBYTERIUM: The portion of the church reserved for the officiating clergy.
- PROANAPHORA: The first portion of a liturgical service.
- PSALTER: As used in the early Church, the Book of Psalms.

- QUARTO-DECIMANIANS: Those in the early Church who celebrated the Christian passover uniformly on the 14th Nisan.
- REGULA FIDEI: A rule of faith.
- RHYTHM: In poetry is the division of the lines or verses into parts by impulses and remissions of the voice. In music, a periodic recurrence of the accent.
- ROTUNDA: A round building usually covered by a dome.
- SANCTUARIUM: The space within the apse where stood the altar and the sacred furniture was kept. The space set apart for the officiating clergy.
- SARCOPHAGUS: A stone coffin, usually covered by a stone slab or lid, which was carefully cemented to it.
- SCHOLA: A building in which the ancient clubs or guilds were accustomed to meet.
- SPANDEREL: The space between the arches and entablature in a basilica; or "the space included between the upper arch of a window or door and the square outer molding which form a frame thereto."
- SPHREGISTICS: The science of seals.
- SWASTIKA: A form of the cross often found in India (v. Fig. 15, lower form).
- TABLINUM: A recess in the atrium of a Roman house.
- TESSERÆ: Small cubes of glass or marble used in mosaic work.
- TETRACHORD: In ancient music a series of four sounds, the first and last of which constituted a fourth. The extremes were fixed; the others might vary.
- THRUST: In architecture, the outward pressure exerted upon walls, etc., by a superincumbent mass.
- TITULI: Inscriptions, properly so called.
- TRANSEPT: The portion of a church which intercepts the main nave at right angles, forming a cruciform structure. It was usually of nearly the same height as the main nave.
- TRIBUNE: v. Apse.
- TRICLINIUM: The dining or banqueting room in the ancient Roman house.
- TRIUMPHAL ARCH: In a basilica, the arch spanning the opening leading from the main nave to the apse. When a transept was introduced there might be more than one triumphal arch.
- TUNIC: The undergarment, reaching to the knees, worn by both sexes of the Romans.
- UNCIAL: A term descriptive of a kind of writing sharing the qualities of capitals and cursive writing. It inclines to change the angular outline of the capital to the rounded outline of the cursive.
- VAULTING: The arched surface of a ceiling, receiving different names from the character of the curve.
- VERD-ANTIQUÉ: A kind of green porphyry; sometimes applied to a mottled green marble.
- VESTIBULE: A hall or ante-room from which the main room of a building is entered.
- VESTIBULUM: v. Vestibule.

II.

ITALIAN CHURCHES AND CATACOMBS WITH EQUIVALENT ENGLISH NAMES.¹

Santa Agnese , Catacomb of.	Catacomb of St. Agnes.
Santa Agnese fuori le mura , Church of.	Church of St. Agnes outside the city walls.
San Alessandro , Cemetery of.	Cemetery of St. Alexander.
San Ambrogio , Church of.	Church of St. Ambrose.
San Andrea in Barbara , Church of.	Church of St. Andrews in Barbara.
San Apollinare in Classe , Church of.	Church of St. Apollinaris at the port of Classe.
San Apollinare Nuovo , Church of.	New Church of St. Apollinaris.
San Bernardo a Termini , Church of.	Church of St. Bernard at the Limits.
San Calisto , Catacomb of.	Catacomb of St. Calixtus.
San Clemente , Church of.	Church of St. Clement.
Santa Costanza , Church of.	Church of St. Constantia.
SS. Cosmas e Damiano , Cemetery of.	Cemetery of Sts. Cosmas and Damianus.
Santa Croce in Gerusalemme , Church of.	Church of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem.
Santa Domitilla , Catacomb of.	Catacomb of St. Domitilla.
San Francesco , Church of.	Church of St. Francis.
San Gennaro dei Poveri , Church of.	Church of St. Januarius for the Poor.
San Giovanni Evangelista , Church of.	Church of St. John the Evangelist.
San Giovanni in fonte , Church of.	Church of St. John (the Baptist) by the font.
San Giovanni in Laterano , Church of.	Church of St. John in the Lateran.

¹ This list is given for the benefit of such readers as may not be familiar with Italian, or may not have enjoyed the opportunity of visiting these spots.

Santa Lucina , Catacomb of.	Catacomb of St. Lucina.
San Lorenzo , Church of.	Church of St. Lawrence.
San Lorenzo fuori le mura , Church of.	Church of St. Lawrence outside the city walls.
San Marco , Church of.	Church of St. Mark.
Santa Maria in Cosmedin , Church of.	Church of St. Mary in Cosmedin.
Santa Maria Maggiore , Church of.	Church of St. Mary the Greater.
Santa Maria della Rotonda , Church of.	Church of St. Mary of the Rotunda.
Santa Maria della Sanita , Church of.	Church of St. Mary, the healthgiving.
Santa Maria in Trastevere , Church of.	Church of St. Mary in district of Trastevere.
SS. Nazario e Celso , Church of.	Church of Sts. Nazarius and Celsus.
San Nicolo in Carcere , Church of.	Church of St. Nicholas by the prison.
San Paolo fuori le mura , Church of.	Church of St. Paul outside the city walls.
SS. Pietro e Marcellino , Catacomb of.	Catacomb of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus.
San Pietro in Vincolo , Church of.	Church of St. Peter of the Fetters.
San Pietro in Vaticano , Church of.	Church of St. Peter in the Vatican.
San Ponziano , Catacomb of.	Catacomb of St. Pontianus.
San Prætestato , Cemetery of.	Cemetery of Prætextatus.
Santa Priscilla , Catacomb of.	Catacomb of St. Priscilla.
Santa Pudenziana , Church of.	Church of St. Pudentia.
San Sisto , Chapel of.	Chapel of St. Sixtus.
San Stejano , Church of.	Church of St. Stephen.
Colli di Sto Stefano , Basilica of.	Basilica of St. Stephen on the hills (in Tivoli).
San Vitale , Church of.	Church of St. Vital.

III.

TRANSLATION OF THE INSCRIPTIONS FOUND IN THE TEXT AND IN THE PLATES.¹

- | | |
|---|--|
| PAGE
 67. Victoria Constantini Aug.
 Victory of Constantine Augustus
 (or the Great).
 67. Hoc signo victor eris.
 In this sign thou shalt be conqueror.
 67. Felicitis Temporis Reparatio
 A restoration of the happy age.
 96. DN IHY XPS DEI FILIVS. Domi-
 Nus IHcYc XPicrc DEI FILIVS.
 The Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God.
 143. IVN. IUS BASSVS Vir Clarissimus
 QVI VIXIT ANNIS. XLII. MEN. II
 IN IPSA PRAEFECTVRA VRBI.
 NEOFITVS IIT AD DEVM. VIII
 KALendas SEPTembri EVSEBIO
 ET TPATIO Consulibus.
 Junius Bassus, of patrician rank, who lived forty-two years and two months. In the very year in which he became prefect of the city, a neo-phyte, he went to God on the 8th before the kalends of September, Eusebius and Hypatius being consuls.
 253. ¹ Hic jacet. ² Hic requiescit. ³ Hic jacet in nomine Christi. ⁴ Hic requiescit in pace.
 Here lies. Here reposes or rests.
 Here lies in the name of Christ.
 Here rests in peace.
 254. ¹ In pace. ² Ev cipiññ. ³ Vivas in
 Deo. ⁴ Vivas in aeternum.
 In peace. In peace. Mayest thou live in God. Mayest thou live forever.
 255. ¹ Diis Manibus. ² Diis Manibus sacrum. ³ Θεοῖς κατὰ χθονίαις.
 To the gods of the lower world.
 Sacred to the gods of the lower world. To the gods of the lower world.
 256. ¹ Θάψει τάτα μητὴρ οὐδεὶς ἀθάνατος.
 ² Domus aeterna. ³ Perpetua sedes.
 ⁴ ὁικος αἰώνιος.
 Rejoice, O mother dear, no one is immortal. The eternal home.
 The everlasting habitation.
 The eternal home. | PAGE
 256 n. ¹ Adjuro (vos) Viri Sancti omnes Christiani, et te, custe (custode) beati Juliani, Deo et tremenda die judicii, ut hunc sepulchrum nunquam ullo tempore violetur, sed conservetur usque ad finem mundi, ut prosim sine impedimenta in vita redire, cum venerit que judicaturus est
 vivos et mortuos. . . .
 I adjure you all, O holy Christians, and thee, O keeper of the happy Julian, by God, and by the fearful day of judgment, that this tomb may never at any time be violated, but may be guarded even to the end of the world, that I may without hinderance return to life, when he shall come and judge the living and the dead.
 ² Male pereat, insepultus jaceat, non resurgar cum Juda partem habeat, siquis sepulchram hunc violaverit.
 If any one shall violate this tomb, let him miserably perish, let him lie unburied, let him not rise again, let him have his portion with the Jew!
 ³ Perire. ⁴ Vita privatus.
 To perish. Deprived of life.
 257. ¹ Vale, have or ave, salve, χαῖρε.
 Farewell.
 ² Spiritus tuus in pace.
 Thy spirit in peace.
 ³ Pax tibi.
 Peace to thee.
 ⁴ In pace domini.
 In the peace of the Lord.
 ⁵ Pax tecum.
 Peace be with thee.
 ⁶ Vivas, vives, vivis.
 Mayest thou live.
 ⁷ Vivas, vives, vivis in Christo, in Deo, in gloria Dei, in Domino Jesu, etc.
 Mayest thou live in Christ, in God, in the glory of God, in the Lord Jesus Christ, etc. |
|---|--|

¹ These translations are made for the benefit of those who are not familiar with the classical languages. Some of the texts are fragmentary, some quite indistinct, and others of doubtful meaning. Some are characterized by incorrect orthography, others by very wide departure from classical construction, and still others by a barbarous commingling of Greek and Latin characters and words, v. p. 251.

INSCRIPTIONS IN PLATE III.

- No. 1. Severa in Deo vivas.
Severa, mayest thou live in God!
4. Florentius in pace.
Florentius in peace.
5. Μουσῆς ζῶν ἐποίησεν Ἀτῷ καὶ τῇ γυναικί.
Moses (?) while living erects this to Atus (?) and his spouse.
6. Aurelius Castus m. VIII. Fecit filio suo Antonia Sperantia.
Aurelius Castus (innocent ?) eight months old. Antonia Sperantia erects this to her son.
7. Vipas (vivas ?) Pondz (?) (Pontius ?) in seferuo.
Pontius, mayest thou live forever. (?)
8. Βηρατίου Νικατορας Λαζαριη καὶ Ιουλη καὶ Ονησιμηκον (ω ?) φίλους (οις ?) bene merentes. Obiunt . . . octa . . . uga.
Beratius (Veratius ?) Nicatoras to Lazarus (?) and Julia and Onesimachus (Onesimus ?) well-deserving friends. (?) They died on the eighth (day ? month ?) . . . ?
A barbarous combination of Greek and Latin.
9. Sabinus conjugī suæ Celerine, benemerenti quæ vixit annis LV Mensibus VI Diebus XV. In pace.
Sabinus to his well-deserving spouse, Celerina, who lived 55 years, 6 months, and 15 days. In peace.
10. Ἀρτεμισίος Β(V) ἀνέκνται συνβίῳ. Εὐ εἰρήνῃ.
Artemisios to his wife Vincentia. In peace.
12. A fragment whose reading must be conjectural.
13. Sabinaque (se)vixit (t) Annis XXVI Mensibus V.
Sabina who lived 26 years and 5 months.
17. Qui vixit ansis (nis) VIIII . . . ti in pace.
Who lived 9 years . . . in peace.
18. Varonius Fillumenus Varroniæ Fotiniæ filiæ suæ fecit.
Varonius Fillumenus made this (tomb) to his daughter, Varonia Fotina.
19. Πιστος ἐκ πιστων, Ζωσιμος ἐνθαδεκειμε Ζησας εἴπειν β. μ. η. α. κ. ε..
A believer of believers, Zosimus, here lies, having lived 2 years, 1 month, 25 days.
- No. 22. Marcus Aurelius Ammianus fecit sibi et conjug(i) suæ Cornelie ruf-rati (?) bene combenientibus.
Marcus Aurelius Ammianus made (this tomb) for himself and his wife Cornelia (ruferati ?) having lived happily together.
24. "Domna," with the anchor, implies the death of the departed in hope of the resurrection.
26. Rufinæ in Pace.
To Rufina in peace.
27. Agape quæ vixit annis + V + Mensibus + II + diebus + XXII. Irene quæ vixit annis + III + m + VII + diebus + V + Julius urbanus pater + fecit.
To Agape who lived 5 years, 2 months, 22 days. To Irene who lived 3 years, 7 months, 5 days. Julius Urbanus, the father, made (this tomb.)
29. + Vtt(?) Lucius Bene Merent.
(?) Lucius, well-deserving.
30. Lucilla in pace.
Lucilla in peace.
37. Romanus Sabinus.
41. A fragment of uncertain meaning.
42. Petrus — Paulus. — Asellu(io) bene merenti qui vixit annu(is) sex, mesis (mensibus) octo dies (diebus) XXIII.
Peter . . . Paul . . . To Asellus, the well-deserving, who lived 6 years, 8 months, 23 days.
43. Victoria quæ vixit cum Virginium suum annos (is) XIII menses (ibus) duo dies (ebus) XXII, deposita nonn. kalendas Augustas. In pace(e).
Victoria who lived with her husband Virginus 13 years, 2 months, 22 days. Buried the ninth before the kalends of August. In peace. (Barbarous Latin.)
45. In pace (above) VII. M. . X. D. V. D. on side.
In peace. 7 months, 10 days. (?)
47. Depositus est Januarius III Idus Sept qui vixit ann(is) II, m. XL. In pace.
Januarius was buried on the fourth of the Ides of September, who lived 2 years, 11 months. In peace.
48. A fragment—not capable of being translated.
49. Severæ virgini quæ vixit ann.
To the virgin Severa who lived (?) years.

INSCRIPTIONS IN PLATE IV.

- No. 5. Parentes filio Axungio bene merenti in pace qui vixit annis VI. m.X De Positus VII Kalendas Octobris.
The parents to Axungius well-deserving, in peace, who lived 6 years 10 months. Buried on the seventh before the kalends of October.
- No. 6. ? V Calendas Julias. Leo (ni) bene merenti qui vixit annus (is) XXVI dies (ebus) XXX.
The first part a fragment. The last runs, To Leo, well-deserving, who lived 26 years 30 days.
- No. 7. Ελλινος και Οτερα Ευσθηβω γλυκυτατω τελευτα ετων ι. Μ. ιβ.
Ellinus and Otera to the very precious Eusebius who died at 7 years and 12 months.
- No. 8. Depositus Eutropies VII Kalendas Octobris.
Eutropius buried the seventh before the kalends of October.
- No. 9. Aurelia Serice quæ vixit annis XXXI mensis III Diebus XVI. Fecit Aurelius Primus conjugi suæ dulcissime (æ) bene merenti in pace.
Aurelia Serice, who lived 31 years, 3 months, 16 days. Aurelius Primus erected (this) to his most precious spouse, well deserving. In peace.
- No. 10. Lucinia Ælidora ad Deo data, in pace, III Idsis Mar. Annorom. (?) Bene merenti in pace Fratri. (?)
Lucina Ælidora given to God in peace the fourth of the Ides of March. ?
- No. 11. Alexandra in pace.
Alexandra in peace.
- No. 14. Severa bene merenti fecerunt parentes in pace quæ vixit anno ? diebus XX.
To Severa well-deserving the parents erect (this) in peace who lived years ? 20 days.
- No. 15. A Fragment.
- No. 16. Januariæ conjugi bene merenti quæ vixit ? annis XX.
To Januaria the well-deserving wife who lived ? . 20 years.
- No. 17. Elis + et + Victoria parentes filię ben merenti quæ vixit annis II mensibus iii.
Elis and Victoria, the parents, to the daughter well-deserving who lived 2 years 3 months.
- No. 18. Eristitus et Felicia parentes Felici filio dulcissimo bene merenti qui vixit annis XIII mensis VII dies XVIII.
Te in pace.
The parents, Eristitus and Felicia, to Felix the dearest and well-deserving son, who lived 14 years, 7 months, 18 days. Thee in peace.
- No. 26. Lucifer pater filię Ursæ benemerent(i) quæ vixit annis III diebus XXI.
Lucifer the father to the daughter Ursa, well-deserving, who lived 3 years, 21 days.
- No. 31. Bibbeo v(b)ene merenti.
To Bibbeus well-deserving.
- No. 32. Flavia hic posita.
Flavia here buried.
- No. 37. Phocinn.
- No. 50. Aelia B(V)ictorina posuit Aureliæ Probæ.
Ælia Victorina placed (this) to Aurelia Proba.
- No. 52. Africane te in ? Maximinus et tu ? qui. vit. annos III m VII et ?
O Africanus thee in ? Maximinus and thou ? who lived 3 years 7 months and ?
- No. 57. ? se bene merenti filię dulcissimæ quæ vixit ann. XXII mensis XI dies XVIII. deposita die IIII Kalendas Maias, in pace. Parentis fecerunt.
? to the well-deserving and most precious daughter who lived 22 years, 11 months, 19 days. Buried on the fourth before the kalends of May. In peace. The parents erected (this monument).
- No. 58. Asurus + In p(ace) vixit an. VII.
Asurus in peace lived 7 years.
- No. 59. Vixit anis.
He lived years. ?
- No. 60. A Fragment.
- No. 61. A Fragment.
- No. 62. Firmia Victora quæ vixit annis LXV.
Firmia Victoria who lived 65 years.
- No. 64. Aurelio Felio qui b(v)ixit cum conjugio bone memorie b(v)ixit annos lv. Raptus eterne domus XII Kal. Januarius. (Barbarous Latin.)
To Aurelius Felius who lived with his spouse well remembered 55 years. Snatched to his eternal home the twelfth before the kalends of January.
- No. 65. Eleutherio in pace depositus III Kal. Jan.
To Eleutherius in peace. Buried the third before the kalends of January.

INSCRIPTIONS OF PLATE V.

- | | |
|---|--|
| No.
1. Decessit.
He has departed.
2, 3. Depositus. Buried. Sepultus. Buried.
4. Καθασεις Φαδιανης.
Burial. Phadianes (?)
5. Marco Aurelio. Augustorum, liberto. Proseneti a cubiculo Augusti. procuratori thesaurorum procuratori patrimonii procuratori vinorum ordinato a divo Commodi in castrense patrono piissimo liberti benemerenti sarcophagum de suo adornaverunt.
To Marcus Aurelius Prosenes, a freedman of the Augustii, of the cubiculum (?) of the emperor, the keeper of the treasury, overseer of the paternal estate, superintendent of the gifts, keeper of the wines, appointed by the divine Commodus in charge of the camp; to their patron most pious and well-deserving, his freedmen, of their own means, have adorned this sarcophagus.
5a. Prosenes receptus ad Deum. V. Non ??
Requiescens in . . . urbe ab expeditionibus scripsit Ampelius libertus.
Prosenes being received to God on the fifth of the Nones . . . Ampelius, his freedman, returning to the city (?) from his expeditions, wrote (this inscription).
7. Aurelia dulcissima filia quae de seculo recessit vixit annis XV. Mensibus IIII Severo et Quintino, Coss.
Amelia a much beloved daughter who has departed this life lived 15 years, 4 months, Severus and Quintinus being consuls.
8. Ἡρακλειτος (τω) θε(ω) φιλεστατος ἐζησεν ἐτ(η) ἢ παρα ἡμερας) τῷ ἐνοσησεν ἡμερας) εἰς, τελευτᾷ προῖα Κ(αλενδων) Μαί(ων) (Υλ)πιω και Ποντιανωρη (ατοις) | No.
'Αυρ(ηλιος) Ξανθιας πατηρ τεκνωγλυκωτερω φωτος και ζωης.
Heraclitus, the well-beloved of God, having lived almost 8 years and 13 days, being sick 12 days, died on the 11th before the Kalends of May, Ulpian and Pontianus being consuls. Aurelius, the father, held this child more dear than light and life.
9. Acliad . . . am possuit . . . XIII Kal. Aug. Emilianus II et Aquilino Cons. Dormit.
A broken inscription; the last reads: the thirteenth before the kalends of August, Emilianus the second time and Aquilinus being consuls. He sleeps.
10. Σεπτίμιος· Πρα(τεξτα)τος(ς) και Κ' ὁ δουλός· του (θεο)υ αξίως . . . ὅν μετ-ανοησα. καν ωδε σοι ὑπερσησα και ευ-κα(ρισ)τησω. τῷ ὀνοματι σου πα(ρεδοκε) την ψυχ(ην) (τ)ῳ θεῳ. τριαντα τριω(ν)
. . . εἰς μηνων.
Septimius Pretextatus (?) and . . . a servant of God (having lived) worthily. I cannot repent myself to have thus served thee, and I render thanks to thy name. He gave his soul back to God at 33 years and 6 months. (?)
11. Εὐμε(α)ρε(α)τω· ουρανια θυγατηρ·
'Πρωδρς' (?)
Mayest thou have good passage to heaven O daughter of Heroda. (?)
12. Αρμενια· Φηλικτας· Αλια· Ρηγινα.
Armenia· Felicitas· Aelia· Regina.
13. Januara co(n)jugi bene merente(i) Gorgono magistro· primo (?)
Januara to her well-deserving husband Gorgonus, the master.
14. Leontina (i)n Deo pax.
Leontina in God peace. |
|---|--|

INSCRIPTIONS OF PLATE VI.

BEING BRIEFLY OF DOCTRINAL IMPORT.

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. Vidua P (?) felicissima! In Deo vives.
O widow most fortunate! Mayest thou live in God!
2. Ursina vives Deo.
Ursina, mayest thou live in God!
3. Ἐντυχίς Σωπερη συμβίω καλως ἢ ξιωμενη ἐποιησα ζῇ ἐν Θεῳ. | Eutychis to Soterie my companion well honoured (?). I have made (this). May she live in God.
4. Fortunata vives in Deo.
Fortunata, mayest thou live in God! |
|---|--|

- No. 5. M E M ?
 Utulius (Vitulius ?) Calligonis semper in Deo vivas · dulcis anima.
 Vitulius Calligonis, mayest thou ever live in God, sweet spirit.
- No. 6. Faustina dulcis bibas in Deo.
 Sweet Faustina, mayest thou live in God!
- No. 7. Vibas in deo. feci Qui ?
 Mayest thou live in God. I have made (this). ? . . .
- No. 8. Bono atque (?) dulcissimo conjugi Castorino qui vixit annis LXI mensibus · V · dies X. Benemerenti uxor fecit. Vive in Deo.
 To her dear and well beloved husband, Castorinus, who lived 61 years, 5 months, 10 days. To him well-deserving the wife erects (this). Live thou in God!
- No. 9. Lucida in Deum. B(V)ixit annos XI. Lucida in God. She lived 11 years.
- No. 10. D. P.
 Lucifere conjugi dulcissime omnen (m) dulcedudinem cum luctu maxime (o) marito reliquit . . . et meruit titulum inscribi ut quisque de fratribus legeret roget deum ut sancto et iuncto spirito ad deum suscipiatur. Quae vixit annos XXII mens. VIII dies VI.
 D. P. (?)
 To Lucifera the dearly-beloved wife who left to her husband in the deepest sorrow all pleasantness and who deserves that this epitaph should be inscribed that whoever of the brothers shall read may beseech God that with a saintly and sinless spirit she may be received to God. Who lived 22 years, 9 months, 6 days.¹
- No. 11. Pactum (?) et fidelism (?) apud (?) deum et pro spirito.
 The translation is not easy on account of the fragmentary character of the inscription.
- No. 12. Bolosa deus tibi refugeret quae vixit annos XXXI recessit die XIII kal Octobres.
 O Bolosa (Volosa ?), may God refresh thee! Who lived 31 years. She departed on the 13th before the kalends of October.
- No. 13. Amerimnus Rufinae conjugi carissime bene merenti spiritum tuum Deus refrigeret.
 Amerimus to Rufina his precious
- No. 14. wife, well-deserving. May God refresh thy spirit!
- No. 14. Refrigera deus animam Hom. (?)
 Refresh, O God, the spirit of Hom (?)
- No. 15. Lais cum pace . . . ispiritus in bonum quescat. (Barbaric Latin) Lais with peace, that thy spirit may rest well.
- No. 16. A Fragment.
- No. 17. Regina vibas in domino Zesu.
 Regina, mayest thou live in the Lord Jesus!
- No. 18. Bibas in Christo Constantia in pace Quae vixit annos LV (?) fecit (?) bene. Mayest thou live in Christ! Constantia who lived in peace 55 (?) years. (made this) ?
- No. 19. Suscepta Colonica in X quae requievit vixit ann XI dep in Nov.
 Colonica who rested in peace received in Christ. She lived 40 years, having been Buried in November.
- No. 20. In X Aselus D ?
 In Christ Aselus ?
- No. 21. . . . Erre recept corpus Livi . . . X decem et quaterque binos hic . . . esteras terre solutus anima Christo reddita e-t.
 This is too fragmentary to furnish a key to the sense.
- No. 22. Mirae bonitatis adque inimitabilis sanctitatis totius castitatis rari exen (m)pli feminæ castae bonae b(v)itæ et pietate in omnibus gloriosae Bruttiae dignitati, quae vixit anno · XXXIII quæ sine lesione animi mei vixit me cum annos XV filios autem procreavit VII ex quibus si (e) cum habet dominum IIIII.
 To a female, of admirable goodness, and of inimitable sanctity, of entire purity a rare example, chaste, of good and pious life, renowned in all things, to Bruttia Dignitas who lived 33 years, who without vexation of my spirit lived with me 15 years. She bore 7 sons, 6 of whom she has with the Lord. (?)
- No. 23. B(V)ictorina in pace et in X.
 Victorina in peace and in Christ.
- No. 24. Anima dulcis incomparabili filio qui vixit annis · XVII non X · meritis vitam reddidit in pace domini.
 A sweet spirit! To an incomparable son who lived less than 17 years. Worthily he gave back his life in the peace of the Lord. (?)

¹ There has been much difference of opinion relative to the reading and interpretation of this inscription. Some prefer to read in the vocative the opening name, and understand reliquisti.

- No. 25. Merenti te cum pace? A fragment.
 26. A fragment.
 27. Ειρηνή τη ψυχῇ σου ο Ξυχολί.
 Peace to thy spirit, O Xucholis!
 28. Φιλουμένη εν ειρηνή σου το πνεύμα.
 Philomena, thy spirit! in peace!
 29. Ειρηνή σου τη ψυχῇ Ζωσίμη.
 Peace to thy spirit, O Zosimus.
 30. Agape vibes in eternum.
 Agapa, mayest thou live forever!
 31. Marcus puer innocens esse jam inter innocent(e)s coepisti quam stau(b)ile(i)s tui(b)i hæc vita est quam te lætum excipe(i)t mater ecclesiæ de hoc mundo revertentem comprematur pectorum genitus. obstruatur fletus oculorum.
 Marcus, thou innocent boy, thou hast already begun to be among the blameless. How permanent is that life which now is thine! How the mother, the Church, receives thee returning joyful from this life, that the sighings of the heart may be suppressed, that the weeping of the eyes may be stayed.
 D. Ma . . . Sacrum XL.
 32. Leopardum in pacem cum spirita sancta. acceptum. eunte abeatis innoc(e)ntem posuer . . . par . . . Q . . . Ann. VII. men . . . VII.
 Sacred to the gods of the lower realm. (XL?) Leopardus received in peace among the sacred spirits, hold ye him as innocent. (?) The parents placed (this inscription). Who lived 7 years, 7 months.
 33. Spirita sancta = sacred spirits.
 34. A fragment whose reading is conjectural.
 35. Maximianus Saturnina dormit in pace.
 Maximianus and Saturnina sleep in peace.
 36. Suscipe terra tuo corpus de corpore sumta retia cot baleas bibificante Δ sic Gregorini ὡμ truber in pace titulur in pace pa . . u . iter cum ejus Piperusa jugali ejus.
 Receive, O earth, a body taken from thy body.
 Thus of Gregory in peace together with his spouse Piperusa. (The whole reading is doubtful.)
 37. Vivere qui prestat morientia semina terre solvere qui potuit letalia vincula mortis . . Depositus Liberianus III Idus Augustas questas in pacem.
 He who can cause the dying germs of earth to live, who can

- No. break the fatal chains of death. . . Liberianus buried the third of the Ides of August. Mayest thou rest in peace!
 38. Hic mihi semper dolor erit in ævo et tuum b(v)enerabilem vultum liceat videre sopore conjunx Albana quæ mihi semper casta pudica relictum me tuo gremio queror quod mihi sanctum te dederat divinitus autor relictis tuis jaces in pace sopore merita resurgis temporalis tibi data requio. Quæ vixit annis XLV men . . V (?) dies XIII dormit in pace fecit Cyriacus maritus.
 Here there will ever be to me grief during my life, and it may be permitted to see in dreams thy venerated countenance, O my spouse, who wast ever to me chaste and modest. I sorrow that I am separated from thy embrace, since the Divine author had given thee to me as something sacred. Having left thine own thou liest in the peace of dreaming. O worthy one, thou shalt arise. The repose given thee is only temporary. Who lived 45 years, five months, 13 days. She sleeps in peace. The husband, Cyriacus, made (this monument).
 39. D M S.
 Florentius filio suo Aproniano fecit titulum benemerenti qui vixit annum et menses novem dies quinque cum sol do a(?)matus fuisset a majore sua et vidit hunc morti constitum esse petivit de eclesia ut fidelis de seculo . . . recessisset.
 Sacred to the Manes.
 Florentinus made this inscription to his well-deserving son, Apronianus, who lived a year, 9 months, and 5 days, and since he had been greatly beloved by his ancestor and saw that he was appointed unto death, he besought the Church that he, a faithful one, might retire from this life. (?)
 40. A very fragmentary inscription.
 41. Simplicio benemerenti qui vixit annis . II . et post adceptionem suam dies . XXVI . dep . . V nonas Feb . . in pace . . acrius qui vixit ann . . XII filio suo fecit in pace.
 To Simplicius (?) well-deserving who lived 51 years, and after his acceptance 26 days. Buried on the fifth of the nones of February in peace. (?) made this for his son who lived 12 years. In peace.

TRANSLATION OF INSCRIPTIONS ON PLATE VII.

INSCRIPTIONS OF POPE DAMASUS.

No.

1. Fama refert sanctos dudum retulisse parentes Agnem cum lugubres cantus tuba concrepuisset nutricis gremium subito lignasse puellum sponte trucidasse minas rubienque tyranni urere cum flammis voluisse nobile corpus. viribus in(m) mensum parvis superasse timorem nudaque profusum crinem per membra dedisse ne Domini templum facies peritura videret. O veneranda mihi sanctum decus alma pudoris ut Damasi precibus faveas precor inclyta martyr.

Report says that when she had recently been snatched away from her parents, when the trumpet pealed forth its terrible clangor, the virgin Agnes suddenly left the breast of her nurse and willingly braved the threats and rage of the tyrant who wished to have her noble form burned in flames. Though of so little strength she checked her extreme fear, and covered her nude members with her abundant hair lest mortal eye might see the temple of the Lord. O thou dear one, worthy to be venerated by me! O sacred dignity of modesty! Be thou favourable, I beseech thee, O illustrious martyr! to the prayers of Damasus!

2. O semel atque iterum vero de nomine Felix que intemerata fide contempto principe mundi confessus Christum cœlestia regna petisti. O vere pretiosa fides cognoscite fratres qua ad cœlum victor pariter properavit Adauctus. Presbyter his verus Damaso rectore iubente composuit tumulum sanctorum limina adornans.
O thou, once and again appropriately named Felix! and with a faith inviolate, defying the prince of the world and confessing Christ, hast reached the heavenly realms. O truly precious faith (recognise it, O brothers) by which Adauctus, a victor, has mounted steadily to heaven. . . . berus, the presbyter, by the order of Damasus, the rector, has built this tomb, adorning the habitation of the saints.

- 3, 4. Damasus Episcopus fecit. Heraclius vetuit lab(p)ros pecunia, dolere. Eusebius miseros docuit sua crimina

No.

- fieri. Scinditur partes populus gliscente furore seditio caedes bellum discordia lites. ex(tem)plo pariter pulsi feritate tyranni. integra cum rec or servaret fœdera pacis. pertulit exilium domino sub iudice lætus litore Trinacrio mundum vitamque reliquit Eusebio Episcopo et martyri.*

Damasus the bishop made (this). Heraclius forbade the lapsed to grieve for their sins. Eusebius taught these wretched ones to wash away their crimes by weeping. The populace was divided into parties; with swelling fury there are seditious, murders, war, discords, quarrels. For an example (or, according to a suggested reading, "straightway") by the cruelty of the tyrant both are driven into exile, although the rector was preserving intact the pledges of peace. He bore the exile joyfully under the Lord, his judge. On the Sicilian coast he gave up the world and life. To Eusebius, bishop and martyr.—On the sides, running vertically, is the following inscription: Damasi sui pappæ cultor atque amator Furius Dyonisius Filocalus scribit.

The fosterer and friend of Pope Damasus, Furius Dyonisius, Filocalus wrote (this).

5. A fragment.
6. Cum perituræ Getæ possuissent castra sub urbe inoverunt sanctus bella nefanda prius istaque sacrilego vertērunt corde sepulchra martyribus quandam rite sacrata piis. quos monstrante deo Damasus sibi papa probatos affixo monuit carmine iure coli. Sed periit titulus confracto marmore sanctus. nec tamen his iterum posse perire fuit. diruta Vigilius nam mox hæc papa gemiscens hostibus expulsi omne notavit opus.

When the Getæ had pitched their destructive camp under (the walls of) the city, they waged a nefarious warfare against the saints, and also directed it against the sepulchres once duly dedicated to the pious martyrs. Under the guidance of God, pope Damasus, of himself, gave notice in a poem inscribed on them, that they could be lawfully worshipped. But the marble having been shattered, this sacred inscription has perished. Nevertheless it was not possible to utterly destroy these, since immediately after the enemy had been driven out, the pope, Vigil, greatly sorrowing over these ruins, restored every work.

No.

7. A fragment.

8. Hic coniecta jacet quæris si turba piorum · corpora structorum retinent veneranda sepulchra. sublimes animas rapuit sibi regia cæli · hic comites Xysti portant qui ex hoste tropæa · hic numerus procerum servat qui altaria Xri · hic posita longa vixit qui in pace sacerdos · hic confessores sancti quos Grecia misit · hic juvenes puerique senes castique nepotes · queis magis virgineum placuit retinere pudorem · hic fateor Damasus volvi mea condere membra · sed cineres timui sanctos vexare piorum.

No.

Here heaped together rest a throng of pious ones, if thou art seeking for them. These venerated sepulchres hold the bodies of the saints. The regal heavenly palace has taken to itself their lofty souls. Here are the companions of Sixtus who bore the trophies from the enemy: here a number who ministered at Christ's altars: here is buried a priest who lived in long-continued peace (?): here the holy confessors whom Greece sent: here the youth and boys, the aged, the immaculate descendants who were pleased to maintain their virgin modesty. Here, I confess, O Damasus, have I wished that my members might repose. But I fear to disturb the sacred ashes of the saints.

TRANSLATION OF EPITAPHS OF PLATE VIII.

SECOND HALF OF THE FOURTH CENTURY.

1. Parentes · Dionysio filio · dulcissimo · vixit an. V, m. VII, d. IX · D. P. XVI · kal. Sept. Constantio X. Cos. in p. A. $\text{X} \overline{\text{V}}$ $\overline{\text{M}}$.

The parents to their most precious son, Dionysius. He lived 5 years, 7 months, 9 days. Buried on the sixteenth before the Kalends of September, Constantius being for the tenth consul. In peace in Christ Jesus.

2. A fragment. It has much interest from the variety of symbols which it contains. Its translation has been conjectured by de Rossi.

3. Theodora requisivit in pace die pridie Noni Septembris D. N. Juliano Aug. IIII et Salustio Cons.

Theodora rested in peace on the day before the Nones of September, our master Julianus Augustus, for the fourth time, and Salustius being consuls.

4. Lupicino et Jovino C. . . Victoriae Q. An. XXV . . . marito fecit An. . . XIII et pudicitia omniibus . .

The reading is conjectural as follows: Lupinus and Jovinus being consuls, Victoria was buried, who lived 25 years, and lived 13 years with her husband, and was known to all by her chasteness.

5. Miræ sapientiæ Augendo qui vixit Ann. plus min LXXII cum uxore fecit ann. XXX · depositus XVI kal. Octob. DN Gratiano Aug. II . et Probo Con. . . .

To Augendus of wonderful wisdom, who lived 72 years more or less; with his wife he lived 30 years. Buried the sixteenth before the Kalends of October our lord Gratianus Augustus, for the second time, and Probus being consuls.

6. Hic quiescit ancilla dei quæ de sua omnia possedit domum istam quæ(am) amicæ deflent solaciumque requirunt. Pro hui(us) unius(am) ora su(o) bolem quæ(am) superis item reliquisti . æterna requiem Felicita ? ? ? XVI ke (a) lendas Oc.ohris. Cucurbitinus et Abundantius hic simul quiesciunt d. Gratiano V et Theodosio Aug.

Here rests a servant of God who with respect to all her possessions has guarded this home, whom her friends lament and they seek for consolation.—The balance is obscure except the usual conclusion.

7. Theodora quæ vixit annos XXI m VII d XXIII in pace est biso-

No. mu(o) amplificam sequitur vitam cum casta Afrodite fecit ad astra viam Christi modo gaudet in aula restitit haec mundo semper Caelestia quaereus optima servatrix legis fideique magistra dedit egregiam sanctis per saecula mentem inde eximios paradisi regnat odores tempore continuo vernat ubi graminis rivis expectatque deum superas quo surgat ad auras hoc posuit corpus tumulo mortalia linqueus, fundavitque locum conjux Evagrius . . . tans dep . . . die . Antonio et Siagrio cons . .

Theodora who lived 21 years, 7 months, 23 days, in peace is in this bisomus, while chaste Aphrodite lived a still longer life. She has made her way to the heavens, and now rejoices in the court of Christ. She withstood the world, always seeking heavenly things; the most excellent guardian of the law and of the faith, she has given back to the saints her noble spirit forever. There amidst the delightful odors of paradise she reigns where the grass blooms perpetually by the water-brooks, she waits on God by whom she rises to those supernal regions. Her husband, Evagrius, pressing forward to join her, has placed this body in the tomb, leaving behind the mortal part, and has founded this place. Buried on the day . . . Antonius and Siagrus being consuls.

8. Quid loquor aut sileam prohibet dolor ipse fateri: hic tumulus lacrimas retinet; cognosce parentum Projectae fuerat primo quae juncta marito, pulchra decore suo solo contenta pudore. heu dilecta satis miserae gene(itricis amore! Accipe, quid multis? thalami post foedera prima, erepta ex oculis Flori genitoris abiit, aetheriam cupiens caeli conscendere lucem: haec Damasus praestat cunctis solacia fletus. Vixit ann XVI m IX dies XXV Dep. III kal. Jan. Fl. Mero-bande, et Fl. Saturnin. cons.

Respecting what may I speak, or keep silence? Grief itself prohibits me from speaking; this tomb retains my tears. Know the parents of Projecta (?) who had scarcely had union with her husband, fair in her comeliness, content with modesty alone. Alas! beloved enough in the affection of

No. an afflicted mother! Are you satisfied that I say more? (?) After the first union of the nuptial bed, snatched from the eyes of her father, Florus, she departed, longing to mount to the ethereal brightness of heaven. Damasus offers to all the solaces of weeping. She lived 16 years, 9 months, 25 days. Buried the third before the kalends of January, Flavius Merobandus and Saturninus being consuls.

9. Hic requiescit quod vult deus honeste recordationes (is) vir qui vixit annos LVII depositus in pace die V Idus Octobres cons . . s D . N . Arcadio Aug. quater et Honorio Aug. . . ter Consulibus.

Here rest (as God wills (?)) a man of worthy memory who lived 57 years, buried on the fifth of the Ides of October, our lords Arcadius Augustus for the fourth time, and Honorius Augustus for the third time, being consuls.

10. Hic caesnid (?) Bonifatia mulier quae bixset annus XLVI d X . Deposita in pace Cesario et Attico.

A piece of barbarous Latin. Probably meaning: Here reposes the wife Bonifatia, who lived 46 years, 11 days. Buried in peace. Caesarius and Atticus being consuls.

This is a genuine palimpsest. On the opposite side is found the inscription "Leo et Statia vivi fecerunt." Beneath a Greek inscription is found: 'Ευτυχίανου δουλοῦ Θεοῦ Ἰο(ν)λιανῆ συν(βίω).

11. Maxima in pace quae vixit annus plus munus XXXV cons dominis nostris Onorio iv c . . s . . . et Eutuchiano Cons. Pridae Nonas Septembres.

Maxima in peace. Who lived 35 years more or less, our lords, Honorius for the fourth time, and Eutuchianus being consuls. On the day before the Nones of September.

PAGE 393. n. v. Plate III, No. 19.

477. Μητρι Κατιανίλλῃ ἐργοποῦ.

To the Mother Katianilla the toiling one.

478. Amatrix pauperorum et operaria. The lover of the poor, and herself a laborer.

478. Leontiae cum laboronae suae. To Leontia together with her laborers (?)

IV.

LITERATURE OF CHRISTIAN ARCHÆOLOGY.¹

ENCYCLOPÆDIAS, DICTIONARIES, ETC.

- ERSCH u. GRUBER: Allgemeine Encyklopædie der Wissenschaften und Künste. Leipzig, 1883.
- GROVE: Dictionary of Music and Musicians. London, 1880-83. 3 vols.
- HEFELE: Conciliengeschichte. 2te Aufl. Freiburg, 1873. 7 Bde.
- HEZOG u. PLITT: Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie u. Kirche. 2te Aufl., Leipzig, 1878-85.
- KRAUS: Real-Encyklopädie der christlichen Alterthümer. Freiburg im Breisgau, 1880-86.
- LAMI: Dictionnaire des Sculpteurs de l'Antiquité au VI^e Siècle de notre Ère. Paris, 1884.
- LICHTENBERGER: Encyclopédie des Sciences religieuses.
- MARTIGNY: Dictionnaire des Antiquités chrétiennes. 2e ed. Paris, 1877.
- MANSI: Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio. Florence, 1759-98. Editio instaurata. Paris, 1885, seq.
- MCCLEINTOCK and STRONG: Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature. New York, 1869-81, with supplementary volumes.
- MENDEL: Das musicalische Conversations—Lexikon. Berlin, 1870-1883. 13 Bde.
- SMITH and CHEETHAM: Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, American reprint. Hartford, 1880. 2 vols.
- WETZER u. WELKE: Kirchen-Lexikon.

SYSTEMATIC TREATISES.

- AUGUSTI: Denkwürdigkeiten aus d. christl. Archäologie. Leipzig, 1817-31. 12 Bde., 8vo.
- Handbuch der christlichen Archäologie. Leipzig, 1836. 3 Bde., 8vo.
- BINGHAM: Antiquities of the Christian Church. Best edition by his grandson. Pitman. London, 1840. 9 vols., 8vo.
- BINTERIM: Vorzügliche Denkwürdigkeiten der christkath. Kirche. Mainz, 1825-41.
- BÜHMER: Die christlich-kirchliche Alterthumswissenschaft. Breslau, 1836. 2 Bde., 8vo.
- DE CAUMONT: Abécédaire d'Archéologie. Caen, 1869-70. 3 vols., 8vo.
- DIDRON: Manuel d'Iconographie chrétienne. Paris, 1845.
- DELATRE: Archéologie chrétienne de Carthage. Lyons, 1886.
- GUERICKE: Lehrbuch der christlich-kirchlichen Archäologie. 2te Aufl. Berlin, 1859.
- JAHN: Ueber das Wesen und die wichtigsten Aufgaben der archäologischen Studien.
- MALLET: Cours élémentaire d'Archéologie religieuse. Paris, 1883.
- MARTHA, JULES: Manuel d'Archéologie Etrusque et Romaine. Paris, 1884.
- MÜLLER: Archäologie der Kunst. Berlin, 1854.
- NEWTON: Essays on Art and Archaeology. London, 1885.

¹ Of the immense literature the works here given have been found to be among the most thorough and suggestive.

- OTTE: Handbuch der kirchlichen Kunst-archäologie des deutschen Mittelalters. 5te Aufl. Leipzig, 1884. 2 Bde.
- PIPER: Mythologie der christlichen Kunst von der ältesten Zeit bis ins sechzehnte Jahrhundert. Weimar, 1847-51. 2 Bde., 8vo.
- Einleitung in die monumentale Theologie. Gotha, 1867.
- RAOUL-ROCHETTE: Trois Mémoires sur les Antiquités chrétiennes. Paris, 1859.
- REUSENS: Éléments d'Archéologie chrétienne. 2er ed. Louvain, 1885.
- RHEINWALD: Die kirchliche Archäologie. Berlin, 1830.
- SCHULTZE: Archäologische Studien über alt-christliche Monumente. Wien, 1880.
- Die christliche Archäologie, in Zöckler's Handbuch der theologischen Wissenschaften.
- STARK: Handbuch der Archäologie der Kunst. Leipzig, 1880.

EPIGRAPHY.

- BOECKH: Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum. 3 vols. fol. Berolini, 1828-53.
- FRANZ: Elem. Epigr. Græc.
- Inscriptiones Britannicæ Christianæ. Berlin and London, 1876.
- HÜBNER: Inscriptiones Hispaniæ Christianæ. Berol. 1871.
- Article "Inscriptions," in Encyclopædia Britannica. 9th ed.
- HICKS: A Manual of Greek Historical Inscriptions. London, 1881.
- LE BLANT: Inscriptions chrétiennes antiques de la ville d'Arles. Paris, 1878.
- Manuel d'Épigraphie chrétienne, etc. Paris, 1869.
- MCCALL: Christian Epitaphs of the First Six Centuries. Toronto, 1869.
- MOMMSEN: On Latin Inscriptions, in Contemporary Review, May, 1871.
- Corpus Inscript. Latinarum.
- DE ROSSI: Inscriptiones christianæ urbis Romæ. I. Romæ, 1861.
- REINACH: Traité d'Épigraphie Grecque. Paris, 1885.
- RITTER: De Compositione titul. Christ. Berol, 1877.
- REINESIUS: Syntagma Inscriptionum.
- STEVENS: The old Runic Monuments of Scandinavia and England. London, 1865.
- WADDINGTON: Inscriptions grecques et latines de la Syrie. Paris, 1870.
- ZELL: Handbuch der römischen Epigraphik.

ON THE CATACOMBS.

- BELLERMANN: Ueber die ältesten christlichen Begräbnisstätten u. besonders die Katakomben zu Neapel. Hamburg, 1839.
- BOSIO: Roma sotterranea. Romæ, 1632; and the Latin translation of this work by ARINGHI. Roma, 1691.
- CARUANA: Hypogæne Tal-Liebru. Malta, 1884.
- GARRUCCI: Vetri ornati di figure in oro trovati nei cemiteri dei cristiani primitivi di Roma. 2d ed. Roma, 1864.
- KRAUS: Roma sotterranea. Freiburg, 2te Aufl., 1879.
- LENORMANT: Les Catacombes. Paris, 1858.
- NORTHOTE and BROWNLOW: Roma sotterranea. 2d ed. London, 1879. 3 vols., 8vo.
- PERRET: Les Catacombes de Rome. Paris, 1850, etc. 6 vols., fol.
- ROLLER, TH.: Les Catacombes de Rome. Paris, 1879-81. 2 vols., fol.
- DE RICHEMONT: Les Catacombes de Rome. Paris, 1870.
- DE ROSSI: Roma sotterranea cristiana. Roma, 1864-79. 5 vols., fol.
- SCHULTZE: Katakomben von S. Gennaro dei Poveri in Neapel. Jena, 1877.

WITHEOW: The Catacombs of Rome, and their testimony relative to Primitive Christianity. New York, 1877.

GENERAL HISTORIES OF THE ARTS OF FORM.

ALLARD: L'art païen sous les Empereurs chrétiens. Paris, 1879.

BAYET: L'Art Byzantin.

D'AGINCOURT: Histoire de l'art par les monuments. 6 vols., Paris, 1826.

CANINA: Via Appia.

CIAMPINI: Vetera Monumenta in quibus, etc. 2 vols., Romæ, 1694.

— De sacris ædificiis a Constantino Magno constructis.

ECKL: Die Madonna als Gegenstand christlicher Kunstmalerei und Sculptur. Brixen, 1883.

FÖRSTER: Bildnerei und Malerei von Einführung des Christenthums bis auf die neueste Zeit. 6 Bde., Leipzig, 1875.

— Mittel u. Unter-Italien. 2 Bde., München, 1868.

GARRUCCI: Storia dell' arte cristiana. 6 vols., Prato, 1873–81.

HEMANS: Ancient Christianity and Sacred Art. Florence, 1866.

— Historic and Monumental Rome. London, 1874.

KONDAKOFF: Histoire de l'Art Byzantin considéré principalement dans les Miniatures. Trans. from the Russian by Trawinski. T. I. Paris, 1886.

LABARTE: Histoire des Arts industriels. 2d ed. Paris, 1872.

LÜBBKE: Ecclesiastical Art in Germany during the Middle Ages; trans. from 5th German edition, with Appendix, by L. A. Wheatley. 4th English edition. Edinburgh, 1877.

LORD LINDSAY: History of Christian Art. 2d ed. London, 1885.

LÜTZOW u. LÜBBKE: Denkmäler der Kunst. Stuttgart, 1879.

REBER: History of Mediæval Art. New York, 1887.

SCHNAASE: Geschichte der bildenden Künste. 2te Aufl., 8 Bde., Stuttgart, 1866–79.

UNGER: Die Byzantinische Kunst, in Ersch u. Gruber's Encyclopædie.

WINCKELMANN: Geschichte der Kunst des Alterthums. 2 vols. 1776.

EARLY CHRISTIAN PAINTING.

CROWE and CAVLACASELLE: History of Painting in Italy. London, 1864.

HOTH: Geschichte der christlichen Malerei. Stuttgart, 1867.

LEFORT, LOUIS: Études sur les monuments primitifs de la peinture chrétienne en Italie, etc. Paris, 1885.

RIO: De l'art chrétienne. 2d ed. 4 vols., Paris, 1861–67.

WOLTMANN and WOERMANN: History of Painting; trans. from the German by Colvin. 2 vols., New York, 1880.

MOSAICS.

AGNELUS: Liber Pontificalis.

APPELL: Christian Mosaic Pictures. London, 1878.

ARTAND: Histoire abrégée de la peinture en mosaïque. Paris, 1885.

BARBET DE JOUY: Les Mosaïques chrétiennes, etc. Paris, 1857.

BARBIER DE MONTAULT: Les mosaïques chrétiennes de Milan; also articles in the Revue de l'Art Chrétien.

DIDRON: La Peinture en Mosaïque, in Gazette des Beaux Arts, vol. xi.

DUCHESNE ET BAYET: Mémoire sur une Mission au Mont Athos, etc. Paris, 1876.

FONTANA: Musaici della primitiva epoca delle chiese di Roma. Paris 1870, 1888.

- FROTHINGHAM: Une Mosâique constantienne inconnue a Saint-Pierre de Rome, in Revue Archeologique. Jan.-Feb., 1883.
- FURIETTI: De Musivis.
- GARRUCCI: Storia dell' Arte, etc., vol. iv Tav. CCIV-CCXCIV.
- GERSPACH: La Mosâique.
- HEUSER and KRAUS: Article "Mosaik," in Real-Encyclopædie der christlichen Alterthümer. Bd. ii, ss. 419-30.
- LABARTE: Histoire des arts industriels. 2er ed., Paris. 1872. v. vol. ii, pp. 333-414.
- LIBER PONTIFICALIS, sive, Anastasii Bibliotecarii, De Vitis Pontificum.
- MÜNTZ: Notes sur les Mosâiques chrétiennes de l'Italie, in Revue Archeologique 1875-1878.
- The Lost Mosaics of Ravenna, in Am. Jour. of Archaeology, vol. i, pp. 115-30.
- The Lost Mosaics of Rome, IVth to IXth Century, in Am. Jour. of Archaeology, vol. ii, pp. 295-313.
- Études d'Iconographie chrétienne.
- PARKER: Archaeology of Rome: Mosaics, Photographs.
- QUAST: Die alt-christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna. Berlin, 1842. Fol., with plates.
- RAHN: Ravenna; eine kunstgeschichtliche Studie. Leipzig, 1869.
- RICHTER: Die Mosaiken Ravennas. Wien, 1878.
- DE ROSSI: Musici Cristiani. Rome.
- SALZENBERG: Die altchristlichen Denkmale von Constantinopel von V. bis XII. Jahrhundert. Berlin, 1854.
- VENABLES: Article "Mosaics" in Dictionary of Christian Antiquities vol. ii, pp. 1322-1341.
- VITET: Études sur l'Histoire de l'Art. Paris, 1864.
- WYATT: Art of Mosaic; Geometrical Mosaics of the Middle Ages.

SCULPTURE.

- CHANOT: Les Figures criophores, in Gazette Archéologique, 1878.
- FEROUSSE: Rude Stone Monuments of all Ages. London, 1872.
- GORI: Thesaurus veterum diptychorum. Florentiæ, 1772.
- GROUSSET: Étude sur l'histoire des sarcophages chrétiens. Paris, 1885.
- HAHN: Fünf Elfenbein-Gefässe des frühesten Mittelalters. Hanover, 1862.
- HASENCLEVER: Der altchristliche Gräberschmuck. Braunschweig, 1886.
- HÜBNER: Die antiken Bildwerke von Madrid. Berlin, 1862.
- KING: Antique Gems: Their Origin, Uses, and Value. London, 1860.
- LÜBKE: History of Sculpture; trans. from the German by F. E. Burnott. 2d ed. London, 1878.
- LE BLANT: Étude sur les sarcophages chrétiens antiques de la ville d'Arles. Paris, 1878.
- MASKELL: Ivories, ancient and mediæval. London, 1872.
- MATZ und VON DUHN: Bildwerke in Rom.
- OLDFIELD: Select Examples of Ivory Carving, from second to sixteenth century. London, 1855.
- PULSZKY: The Fejérváry Ivories. London, 1865.
- VEYRIES: Les Figures criophores dans l'art grec, l'art gréco-romain et l'art chrétien. Paris, 1884.

ARCHITECTURE.

- BERTI: Sull' antico duomo di Ravenna. Ravenna, 1880.
- BROWN: From Schola to Cathedral; a study of early Christian Architecture and its relations to the life of the Church. Edinburgh, 1886.

- BUNSEN: Die Basiliken des christlichen Roms. Stuttgart und Tübingen, 1842.
- CANINA: Ricerche sull' architettura più propria dei tempi cristiani. Roma, 1843.
- DEHIO: Die Genesis der christlichen Basilika. München, 1883.
- DEHIO und BEZOLD: Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlandes. Stuttgart, 1884.
- DE FLEURY: Le Lateran. Paris, 1879.
- FERGUSON: History of Architecture. London, 1862-67.
- FOSSATI: Aya Sofia, Constantinople, as recently restored by order of H. M., the Sultan Abdul Mejid. London, 1852.
- HIRT: Die Geschichte der Baukunst bei den Alten. Berlin, 1822. 2 Bde.
- HÜBSCH: Die altchristliche Kirchen. Carlsruhe, 1862.
- KREUSER: Christlichen Kirchenbau. Berlin, 1851 and 1860.
- Wiederum christlichen Kirchenbau. Berlin, 1868.
- KUGLER: Geschichte der Baukunst. 3 Bde., Stuttgart, 1856.
- KNIGHT, H. GALLY: Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy. London, 1842-44. 2 vols.
- LANGÉ: Haus und Halle; Studien zur Geschichte des antiken Wohnhauses und der Basilika. Leipzig, 1885.
- LUEBKE: Geschichte der Architectur. 6te Auflage, Stuttgart, 1884.
- MOTHES: Die Baukunst des Mittelalters in Italien von der ersten Entwicklung bis zu ihrer höchsten Blüthe. 2 Bde., Jena, 1884.
- Die Basilikenform bei den Christen der ersten Jahrhunderte. Ihre Vorbilden und ihre Entwicklung. Leipzig, 1865.
- MESSMER: Ueber den Ursprung, die Entwicklung, u. Bedeutung der Basilika in der christlichen Baukunst. Leipzig, 1854.
- Ueber den Ursprung der christlichen Basilika. Leipzig, 1859.
- NORTON: Historical Studies of Church Building in the Middle Ages; Venice, Sienna, Florence. New York, 1880.
- PARKER: The House of Pudens in Rome, in Archæological Journal, vol. xxviii, 1871.
- The Archæology of Rome. 12 vols., Oxford and London, 1877.
- PLATNER, BUNSEN, GERHARD, u. ROSTELL: Beschreibung der Stadt Rom. Stuttgart u. Tübingen, 1830-42.
- QUAST: Die alt-christlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna. Berlin, 1842.
- RAHN: Ueber den Ursprung und die Entwicklung des christl. Central-u. Kuppelbaues. Leipzig, 1866.
- RICHTER: Christliche Architectur und Plastik in Rom, vor Constantin dem Grossen. Jena, 1872.
- ROSENGARTEN: Handbook of Architectural Styles. London.
- STOCKBAUER: Der christlichen Kirchenbau in den ersten Jahrhunderten. Regensburg, 1874.
- TEXIER et PAPPLEWELL PULLAN: L'Architecture byzantine. London, 1864.
- Églises byzantines. Paris, 1869.
- DE VOGÜÉ: Syrie Centrale: Architecture civile et religieuse du premier au septième Siècle. 2 vols., Paris, 1865-77.
- Les Églises de la Terre Sainte. Paris, 1860.
- Le Temple de Jerusalem.
- VALENTINI: La patriarcale basilica Laterana. Roma, 1832.
- La basilica Liberiana. Roma, 1839.
- La basilica Vaticana. Roma, 1845.
- WEINGÄRTNER: Ursprung und Entwicklung des christlichen Kirchengebäudes. Leipzig, 1858.
- WIEGEMANN: Ueber den Ursprung des Spitzbogenstils. Düsseldorf, 1842.
- ZESTERMANN: Die antiken u. die christlichen Basiliken, etc. Leipzig, 1847. 4to.

EARLY CHRISTIAN POETRY AND HYMNOLOGY.

- BÄHR: Geschichte der römischen Literatur. 2te Aufl., Leipzig, 1881. 4 Bde.
 — Die christl. Dichter und Geschichtschreiber Roms. 2te Aufl., Karlsruhe, 1872.
 BERNHARDY: Grundriss der römischen Literatur. 5te Aufl., Leipzig, 1879.
 BURGESS: Select Metrical Hymns and Homilies of Ephraem Syrus. London, 1853. 2 vols.
 — Metrical Hymns of Ephraem Syrus.
 CLÉMENT: Carmina e Poetis Christianis excerpta. Parisiis, 1854.
 CHRIST und PARANIKAS: Anthologie Græca Carminum Christianorum. Lipsiæ, 1871.
 DANIEL: Thesaurus Hymnologicus. Lipsiæ, 1841–56. 5 tom.
 DUFFIELD: The Latin Hymnwriters and their Hymns. New York, 1885.
 EBERT: Geschichte der christlichen lateinischen Literatur. Bd. i, Leipzig, 1874.
 GRIMM, W.: Zur Geschichte des Reims, in the Memoirs of the Berlin Academy of Sciences for 1851.
 HAHN: Ueber den Gesang in der griechischen Kirche.
 KORTUM: Des Silentiarius Paulus Beschreibung der h. Sophia u. des Ambon. Berlin, 1854.
 KOCH: Geschichte des Kirchenlieds und Kirchen-Gesangs in der christlichen, in besondere der deutschen evangelischen Kirche. Stuttgart, 3te Aufl., 1866–76. 8 Bde.
 JACOBI: Zur Geschichte des griechischen Kirchenlieds, in Brieger's Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte. Vol. v, Gotha, 1881.
 KÖNIGSFELD: Lateinische Hymnen u. Gesänge aus dem Mittelalter. Bonn, 1847–65.
 MONE: Lateinische Hymnen des Mittelalters aus Handschriften herausgegeben u. erklärt. Freiburg, 1853–55. 3 Bde.
 MORRIS: Select Works of S. Ephraem, the Syrian, translated out of the original Syriac. Oxford, 1847.
 MUNTER: Ueber die älteste christliche Poesie. Kopenhagen, 1806.
 NEALE: Hymns of the Eastern Church. Last edition. London, 1876.
 — Medieval Hymns and Sequences. 3d ed. London, 1867.
 — The Ecclesiastical Poetry of the Middle Ages.
 PIPER: Der Hymnus des Clemens von Alexandrien, in the Evangelischen Kalender, 1868.
 PITRA, Cardinal: Hymnographie de l'église grecque. Rome, 1867.
 — Analecta Sacra Spicilegio Solesmensi parata. T. i, Par., 1876.
 RAMBACH: Anthologie christlicher Gesänge aus allen Jahrhunderten der Kirche. Leipzig, 1817–33. 6 Bde.
 SCHAFF: Christ in Song. New York and London, 1879.
 TEUFEL: Geschichte der römischen Literatur. 4te Aufl., Leipzig, 1882.
 TRENCH: Sacred Latin Poetry, chiefly Lyrical. 3d ed. London, 1874.
 THIERFELDER: De Christianorum Psalmis et Hymnis usque ad Ambrosii tempora. 1868.
 WACKERNAGEL: Das deutsche Kirchenlied. Leipzig, 1864–77. 5 Bde.

EARLY CHRISTIAN MUSIC.

- AGUILLAR and DE SOLA: The Ancient Melodies of the Liturgy of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews.
 AMBROS: Geschichte der Musik. 2te Aufl. 5 Bde.

- BRENDEL: Geschichte der Musik.
- BURNEY: General History of Music from the Earliest Ages to the Present Period. 4 vols., 4to. London, 1776-1789.
- CHAPPELL: History of Music. London, 1874, et seq. 4 vols.
- CLÉMENT: Histoire de la Musique depuis les temps anciens jusqu'au nos jours. Paris, 1855.
- Historie generale de la musique religieuse.
- COUSSEMACHER: Histoire de l'harmonie au moyen Age.
- L'art harmonique aux XII^e et XIII^e Siècles. Paris, 1865.
- DELITZSCH: Physiologie und Musik in ihren Bedeutung für die Grammatik, besonders die hebraische. Leipzig, 1868.
- ENGEL: Music of the most Ancient Nations. London, 1864.
- FORKE: Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1788.
- FÉTIS: Histoire generale de la Musique. Paris. 4 vols.
- HAWKINS: General History of the Science and Practice of Music. London, 1853. 2 vols. 4to.
- HELMORE: "Gregorian Modes," in Grove's Musical Dictionary.
- KIESEWETTER: Geschichte der Europäischen-abendländischen oder unser heutigen Musik. Leipzig, 1846.
- LAMBILLOTTE: Antiphonaire de Sainte Grégoire. Facsimile du manuscrit de Saint-Gall. VIII^e Siècle. Paris, 1851. 4to.
- MARTINI: History of Music. Also "Notation," in Grove's Dictionary of Music.
- NAUMANN: History of Music. Translated by F. Praeger. London, 1885.
- REISSMANN: "Gregorianischer Gesang," in Mendel's musicalisches Conversations-Lexicon.
- Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik.
- ROCKSTRO: History of Music. London, 1886.
- SCHLETTNER: Geschichte der geistlichen Dichtungen und kirchlichen Tonkunst. Hanover, 1869.
- SAALSCHUTZ: Geschichte und Würdigung der Musik in übersichtlicher Darstellung. Leipzig, 1863.
- SCHUBIGER: Sängerschule St. Gallens vom achten bis zwölften Jahrhunderte.
- THIERFELDER: "Ambrosianischer Lobgesang," in Mendel's musicalisches Conversations-Lexicon, Part I, pp. 199, seq.
- VON DOMMER: Musik-Geschichte.
- VON WINTERFELD: Der evangelische Kirchengesang.
- WESTPHAL: Geschichte der alten und mittelalterische Musik.

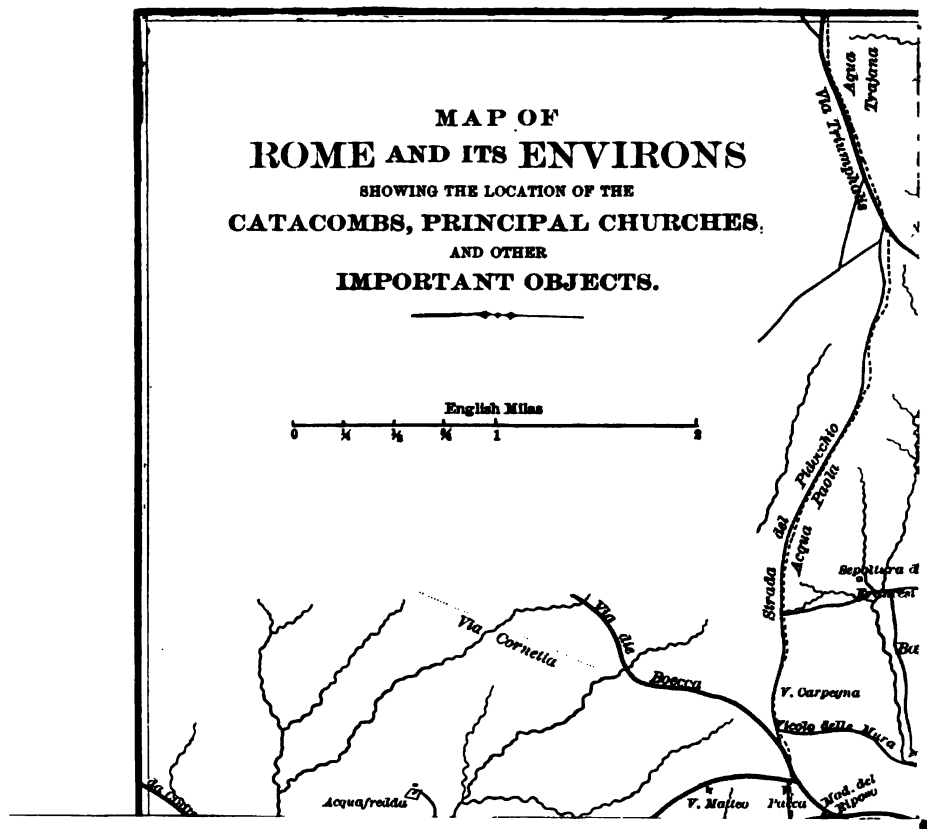

ON THE CONSTITUTION, WORSHIP, ETC., OF THE EARLY CHURCH.¹

- AUBÉ: L'Église et l'Etat dans la seconde Moitié du III^e Siècle. 4 vols., Paris, 1876-85.
- BANNERMAN: The Scripture Doctrine of the Church. Edinburgh, 1887.
- The Church of Christ. A Treatise on the Nature, Power, Ordinances, Discipline, and Government of the Christian Church. Edinburgh, 1868. 2 vols.
- BAUR: Ursprung des Episcopats. Tübingen, 1838.

¹ The literature is of immense volume and of growing importance. The recent works are characterized by great thoroughness of scholarship, and are generally written in a scientific rather than polemic spirit. Besides the patristic writings of the first six centuries, the standard Church histories, and the histories of Christian doctrines, the following may be found among the most thorough and suggestive.

English Miles

0 $\frac{1}{4}$ $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{3}{4}$ 1

- BAUR: Das Christenthum und die christliche Kirche der drei ersten Jahrhunderte. Tübingen, 2te Aufl., 1860.
- BICKELL: Geschichte des Kirchenrechts. Frankfurt, 1849.
- BRUCE: The Training of the Twelve. 3d ed. Edinburgh, 1833.
- BEYSCHLAG: Die christliche Gemeindeverfassung im Zeitalter des Neuen Testaments. Harlem, 1876.
- BRÜCKNER: Ueber die Zusammenhang der Liturgie im achten Buche der "Apostolischen Constitutionen," in Studien und Kritiken, 1883, ss. 7-32.
- COLEMAN: The Apostolic and Primitive Church, etc. Philadelphia, 1878.
- COX: The Literature of the Sabbath Question. Edinburgh, 1865.
- CUNNINGHAM: The Growth of the Church. London, 1886.
- DALE: Manual of Congregational Principles. London, 1884.
- DANIEL: Codex liturgicus ecclesiæ universæ in epitomen redactus. 4 vols. Lipsiæ, 1847-51.
- DEKSTER: Congregationalism: What it is; whence it is, etc. 4th ed. Boston, 1876.
- DÖLLINGER: The First Age of Christianity and the Church; trans. by Oxenham. London, 1866.
- DEKY: Neue Untersuchungen über die Constitutionen und Kanones der Aposteln. Tübingen, 1832.
- EDERSHEIM: Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah.
- FISHER: The Beginnings of Christianity. New York, 1887.
- FREEMAN: Principles of Divine Service. London, 1855-62.
- GEIKIE: Life and Words of Christ. New York, 1880. 2 vols.
- GILFILLAN: The Sabbath Viewed in the Light of Reason, Revelation, and History. New York, 1862.
- HARNACK: Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. Freiburg, 1886-87. 2 vols.
- Ueber den Ursprung des Lectorates und der anderen niederen Weihen. Gießen, 1886.
- HATCH: Organization of the Early Christian Churches. London, 1882.
- HAUSEMATH: History of the New Testament Times. The Times of Jesus. Trans. from the German by Poynting and Quenzer. New York, 1887.
- HEINRICI: Die Kirchengemeinde Korinths und die religiösen Genossenschaften der Griechen, in the Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1876.
- HESSEY: Sunday: Its Origin, History, and Present Obligation. Bampton Lectures. London, 1860.
- HEYLIN: History of the Sabbath.
- MILGMENFELD: Der Paschastreit der alten Kirche nach seiner Bedeutung für die Kirchengeschichte. Halle, 1860.
- HÖFLING: Das Sacrament der Taufe. Erlangen, 1846.
- Die Lehre der ältesten Kirche vom Opfer im Leben und Cultus der Christen. Erlangen, 1851.
- HODGE, C.: Discussions in Church Polity. New York, 1879.
- JACOB: The Ecclesiastical Polity of the New Testament. A study for the present crisis in the Church of England. 5th Am. ed. New York, 1879.
- KANNIS: Die Lehre vom heiligen Abendmahl. Leipzig, 1851.
- KAYSER: Die Canones Jacob von Edessa. Leipzig, 1887.
- KILLEN: The Ancient Church. Its History, Doctrine, Worship, and Constitution. New York, 1883.
- KÖSTLIN: Geschichte des christlichen Gottesdienstes. Freiburg, 1887.
- LANG: Life of Christ. Trans. from the German. Edinburgh, 1864.

- LECHLER: Das apostolische und das nachapostolische Zeitalter mit Rücksicht auf Unterschied und Einheit im Leben und Lehre. 3te Aufl. Karlsruhe und Leipzig, 1885.
- LEYERLEN: Die Entstehung des Episcopats in der christlichen Kirche, in the Zeitschrift für praktische Theologie, 1887, Heft ii, ss. 97-143; Heft iii, ss. 201-244; Heft iv, ss. 297-338. Against Hatch and Harnack.
- LIGHTFOOT: The Apostolic Fathers. London, 1885.
- The Name and Office of an Apostle, in comm. on Galatians. 7th ed. London, 1881.
- The Christian Ministry, in comm. on Philippians. 8th ed. London, 1885.
- LIPSIUS: Ueber Ursprung und Gebrauch des Christennamens. Jena, 1878.
- MONK: Lateinische und griechische Messen aus dem 2ten bis 6ten Jahrhundert. Frankfurt, 1859.
- MURATORI, L. A.: Liturgia Romana vetus. Venet., 1748.
- NEALE: The Liturgies of S. Mark, S. James, S. Clement, S. Chrysostom, S. Basil, or, according to the uses of the Churches of Alexandria, Jerusalem, Constantinople. London, 1859.
- NEANDER: The Planting and Training of the Christian Church. Trans. by Ryland. New York, 1844.
- PALMER: Origines Liturgicæ. 2 vols. London, 1845.
- PORTER: The Government of the Kingdom of Christ, etc. Edinburgh, 1872.
- POWERS: Irenæus and Infant Baptism, in the Am. Presby. and Theol. Review, 1857.
- PROBST: Kirchliche Disciplin in den drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten. Tübingen, 1873.
- RANAN: Rome and Christianity. Hibbert Lectures. Boston, 1880.
- Marc Aurèle et la fin du monde antique. Paris, 1882.
- Les Apôtres.
- RIGG: The Sabbath and the Sabbath Law before and after Christ. London, 1869.
- RITSCHL: Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche. 2te Aufl. Bonn, 1857.
- RITSCHL, OTTO: Cyprian von Carthago, etc. Göttingen, 1885.
- ROTHK: Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche und ihrer Verfassung. Wittenberg, 1837.
- RYCKERT: Das Abendmahl, sein Wesen und seine Geschichte in der alten Kirche. Leipzig, 1856.
- SCHERER: Handbuch des Kirchenrechts. Grätz, 1886.
- SCHÜRER: Die Paschastreitigkeiten des 2ten Jahrhunderts, in Zeitschrift für hist. Theologie, 1870.
- SEUFERT: Der Ursprung und die Bedeutung des Apostolates in der christlichen Kirche der ersten zwei Jahrhunderte. Leiden, 1887.
- STANLEY: Christian Institutions. New York, 1881.
- STEITZ: Der Paschastreit, etc., in Studien und Kritiken, 1856, 1857, 1859.
- SWAINSON: The Greek Liturgies. London, 1884.
- THIERSCHE: Die Kirche im apostolischen Zeitalter. 3te Aufl. Augsburg, 1879.
- VITRINGA: de Synagoga vetere libri tres. Weissenfels, 1726.
- WALL: History of Infant Baptism. Oxford, 1872. 2 vols.
- WARREN: The Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church. Oxford, 1881.
- WEIZSÄCKER: Das apostolische Zeitalter der christlichen Kirche. Freiburg, 1886.
- WISSELER: Die Christenverfolgungen der Cæsaren bis zum dritten Jahrhundert. Leipzig, 1875.
- Geschichte des Sonntags in der alten Kirche. Hanover, 1878.
- WORDSWORTH: Outlines of the Christian Ministry. London, 1872.

- WORDSWORTH: History of the Christian Church. Vol. i.
 ZAHN: Ignatius von Antiochen. Gotha, 1873.
 ——— Ignatii et Polycarpi Epistolæ Martyria Fragmenta. Lipsiæ, 1876.
 ZÖCKLER: Apostelgeschichte. Nördlingen, 1886.
 ——— Das Kreutz Christi. Gutersloh, 1875.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- ACKERMANN: The Christian Element in Plato and the Platonic Philosophy. Trans. from the German. Edinburgh, 1861.
 ALLARD: Les Esclaves chrétiens depuis les premiers temps de l'Eglise jusqu'au la fin de la domination romaine en Occident. Paris, 1876.
 ALT: Die heiligen Bilder, oder die bildende Kunst und die theologische Wissenschaft in ihrem gegenseitigen Verhältnis, historisch dargestellt. Berlin, 1845.
 BÄHR: Symbolik des mosaischen Cultus. Heidelberg, 1837.
 BECKER: Das Spott-Crucifix der römischen Kaiserpaläste. Breslau, 1866.
 ——— Die Darstellung Jesu Christi unter dem Bilde des Fisches. Breslau, 1866.
 ——— Die heidnische Weihformel D. M. Breslau, 1869.
 BEURATH: Zur Geschichte der Marienverehrung. in Studien und Kritiken, 1886.
 Heft i, ss. 7-94; Heft ii, ss. 197-287.
 BOURGON: Letters from Rome. London, 1862.
 BURCKHARDT: Cicerone. 5te Aufl., 1884. 2 Bde.
 BURNELL: Elements of South Indian Palæography from the 4th to the 17th Century, A. D. 2d ed. London, 1878.
 BUTLER: The Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt. Oxford, 1884. 2 vols.
 CHASTEL: Destruction du Paganisme dans l'Empire d'Orient.
 COCKER: Christianity and the Greek Philosophy. New York, 1870.
 COHEN: Description historique des Monnaies frappées sous l'empire romain, communément appelées médailles impériales. 2er ed. T. iv, Paris, 1884.
 CONDER: Survey of Western Palestine. Special Papers. London, 1881.
 ——— Christian and Jewish Traditions.
 CREUZER: Symbolik u. Mythologie.
 CROOKS and HURST: Theological Encyclopædia and Methodology. New York, 1884.
 CURTIUS, HIRSCHFELD, etc.: Ausgrabungen zu Olympia.
 CONTEARE and HOWSON: Life and Epistles of St Paul. 6th ed. New York, 1858.
 DIETRICK: Das philosophische System Platons in seiner Beziehung zum christlichen Dogma. Freiburg, 1862.
 DÖLLINGER: The Gentile and the Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ. Trans. from the German by Darnell. London, 1862.
 ——— Hippolytus und Callistus.
 DORNER: History of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ. 5 vols.
 DÜRSCH: Der symbolische Character der christlichen Religion und Kunst. Schaffhausen, 1860.
 ERHARD: Das Erziehungswesen der christlichen Zeit. in Der Schulfreund, 11te Jahrgang, Trier, 1855.
 EWALD: The History of Israel. Trans. from the German. London, 1874.
 FARRAR: Life of St. Paul. London, 1882.
 FORBES, LESLIE: The Early Races of Scotland and their Monuments. Edinburgh, 1876. 2 vols.
 FÖRSTER, TH.: Ambrosius, Bischof von Mailand. Eine Darstellung seines Lebens und Wirkens. Halle, 1884.

- FREEMAN: The Historical Geography of Europe. 2d ed. London, 1882.
- FRIEDLÄNDER: Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms. Leipzig, 1881. 3 & 4.
- GIBBON: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. New York, 1890. 6 vols.
- GREGOROVIVS: Geschichte der Stadt Rom im Mittelalter.
- IDLER: Handbuch der math. und tech. Chronologie. Breslau, 1825.
- JACOB: Die Kunst im Dienste der Kirche. 2te Aufl. Landshut, 1870.
- KING: The Gnostics and their Remains, Ancient and Modern. London, 1864. New edition, New York, 1887.
- KRAUS: Die christliche Kunst in ihrer frühesten Anfängen. Leipzig, 1873.
- Synchronistische Tabellen zur christlichen Kunstgeschichte. Freiburg 1880.
- KWENEN: Hibbert Lectures, 1882.
- LEA: Studies in Church History. Boston, 1883.
- History of Sacerdotal Celibacy. 2d ed. Boston, 1884.
- LECKEY: History of European Morals, etc. London, 1884. 2 vols.
- LOCHLER: Sklaverei und Christenthum. Leipzig, 1877-78.
- LEHNER: Die Marienverehrung in den ersten Jahrhunderten. Stuttgart, 1894.
- MARIOTT: The Testimony of the Catacombs and of other Monuments of Christian Art from the Second to the Eighteenth Century. London, 1870.
- Vestiarium Christianum.
- MÉRIVALE: Conversion of the Roman Empire. London, 1864.
- MILMAN: History of Latin Christianity. New York, 1881. 8 vols. in 4
- MOMMSEN: History of Rome. New York, 1870. 4 vols.
- OVERBECK: Verhältnisse der alten Kirche zur Sklaverei im römischen Reiche. Berlin, 1875.
- PALMER, W.: An Introduction to Early Christian Symbolism. London, 1884.
- RATZINGER: Geschichte der kirchlichen Armenpflege. 2te Aufl. Freiburg, 1884.
- V. RAUMER: Geschichte der Pädagogik. Stuttgart, 1843.
- REIDELBACH: Ueber den Zusammenhang der christlichen Kunst mit der antiken. München, 1881.
- REUSS: History of the New Testament. 2d ed. Trans. from the German by Houghton. 1884.
- ROHAULT DE FLEURY: La Sainte Vierge. 2 vols. Paris, 1878.
- SCHMID: Geschichte der Erziehung vom Anfang bis auf unsere Zeit. Stuttgart, 1884, seq.
- SCHMIDT: Geschichte der Pädagogik. 3te Aufl. Cöthen, 1874. 2 Bde.
- SCHLUMBERGER: Sigillographie de l'Empire byzantine. Paris, 1886.
- SCHÜRER: Der Gemeindeverfassung der Juden in Rom. Leipzig, 1879.
- The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ. Edinburgh, 1885.
- STANLEY: History of the Eastern Church. New York, 1863.
- STRZYGOWSKI: Ikonographie der Taufe Christi. München, 1885.
- TWINING, LOUISA: Symbols and Emblems of Early and Medieval Christian Art. London, 1882.
- TYRWHITT: Christian Art Symbolism. London, 1881.
- The Art Teaching of the Primitive Church. London, 1886.
- UHLHORN: Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism. Trans. from 3d German ed. by Smith and Ropes. Revised Am. Ed., New York. 1879.
- Christian Charity in the Ancient Church. Trans. from the German, New York, 1883.
- WALLON: Histoire de l'esclavage. 2er ed. Paris, 1879.
- WOOD: Discoveries at Ephesus. Boston, 1867. New ed., 1887.
- ZAHN: Sklaverei und Christenthum in der alten Welt. Heidelberg, 1879.

GENERAL INDEX.

In this Index f shows that the subject is continued on the next page; ff that the subject is continued on the following pages; n that the matter is contained in a note

- Abortion, frequency of among pagans, 463; not condemned by Romans, 464; how viewed by the Church, 465.
- Abraxas gems, as evidence, 21; nature of, 31;
- Absolution, stages of, 353.
- Acolyths, duties of, 374.
- Actors, v. Drama.
- Agnellus, biographies by, 206 f.
- Alberti, on Christian basilica, 157.
- Alexandria, important eucharistic fresco at, 82; schools of, 505 f.; theologians of, 506 f.
- Altar, names and forms of, 426; position of, 426; accompaniments of, 427 f.
- Ambo, situation of, 184; uses of, 184.
- Ambrose, on the phoenix, 71; contributions to hymnology, 291; musical reforms of, 304; musical modes of, 309; on trine baptism, 414 f.; quoted, 420.
- Amor and Psyche, significance of, in Christian art, 68 f.
- Ampullæ, controversy respecting, 156; opinions on the contents of, 156.
- Amusements, interdicted, 480.
- Anatolius, hymns of, 282.
- Anaphora, 440.
- Angels, guardian in art, 69.
- Antiphonarium, Gregorian, 314.
- Apostles, in Jewish Church, 326; significance of the Twelve, 327; first test of, 328; harmony of teaching of, 354.
- Apostolate, 323 f.
- Apostolic Constitutions, on baptism, 414 f.; on episcopacy, 361 f.; on Church government, 362.
- Apostolic succession, according to the Clementines, 346; according to Irenæus, 355.
- Apse, termination of law basilica, 177; significance of, in Christian basilica, 181; Christian, and pagan governed by different principles, 181 f.; origin of, 182; furniture of, 184.
- Archæologists, schools of, 74 f.
- Archæology, definition of, 13; divisions of, 13 f.; history of, 15; relations of Christian to classical, 16; limits of, 17; utility of, 19 ff.
- Archdeacon, appointment and functions of, 368; importance of, 368.
- Area, definition of, 170; sacredness of, 170, 513; carefully bounded, 172.
- Architecture, v. Basilica; transformations gradual, 197; germs of Gothic, 189; dome style of, 217; Byzantine, 232 f.
- Arians, churches of, 208; hymns of, in fourth century, 292; practise trine baptism, 414.
- Ark, symbol of, 261.
- Art, influences affecting, 51; helpful to faith, 51; presence of formative art in public services opposed by early Christian fathers, 52; how far and why opposed, 53, 131; relations of religion to, 55; subjects of uniform, 112; ecclesiastical control of, 108; last judgment in, 149; activity in West, 203.
- Asceticism, pertains to all religions, 467; heathen examples of, 467; encouragements to, 468.
- Ass, a caricature of Christ, 95 f.
- Atria, five classes of, 167 f.
- Augusti, 274 n., 276, 280, 284 n.
- Augustine, hymns of, 296; on public worship, 437.
- A. Q. monuments, chronology and significance of, 88; connected with other symbols, 89.
- Bähr, 283 n., 284, 285, 286, 288 n., 293, 295.
- Balancing, principle of, in early frescoes, 98 f.; in sarcophagi, 136, 140.
- Baptism, formula of, 389; Christ's peculiar, 389; meaning of, 390; nature of, 390; regenerative power of, 390; subjects of, 391; infant, 391 ff.; adult more common, 393; conditions of, 393 f.; ministrants of, 394 f.; mode of, 395 ff.

- when administered, 396; testimony of "Teaching" respecting, 397 f; pictorial representations of, 398 ff; by aspersion, 403 ff; mosaics containing, 404 f; uniformity of art testimony concerning, 406 f; liberty respecting, 407; clinic, why not encouraged, 407 f; reasons of delay of, 409; time of, 409; place of, 409 ff; preliminaries to, 412 f; sponsors in, 413; ceremonies of, 413 ff; trine, 413; reasons of trine, 414; why trine was discontinued, 414; unction following, 414; sign of the cross after, 415.
- Baptisteries, arrangement of, 410; size of, 410.
- Bardesanes, hymns of, 278.
- Baronius, 15.
- Basil, on trine baptism, 413; on canonical singers, 304; on education, 507 f.
- Basilica, origin of Christian, 157; theories discussed, 157 ff; Zoster's theory, 159; Alberti's theory of, 157; Weingartner's theory, 159 f; Meesmer's theory, 161; Delio's theory, 162; Lange's theory, 162; eclectic view, 162 ff; description of law basilicas, 175; derivation of, 175; uses of, 178; Christian basilica a growth, 178; earliest notices of, 180; resemblances to pagan basilica, 181, 186; differences from, 183, 186; parts of, 184; transformation of, 186; balancing of parts of, 186, 187; later development of, 187; influence on other forms of architecture, 188; how far original, 191; few remains of, 191; post-Constantine examples of, 195 ff; in Syria exceptional, 213; ceilings of, 213.
- Becker, opinion of respecting heathen caricatures, 94; on Diis Manibus, 255.
- Bernhardy, 285, 295.
- Beveridge, 278 n.
- Bishop, Ignatius on, 344 f; identical with presbyters, 338 ff; congregational, 345; the unifying power of, 348; the arbiter of doctrine, 347; mode of election of, 351; relation of to each other, 352; of Rome, 352; increased power of, 352; catalogues of, 355; depositaries of apostolic teaching, 356; become general officers, 358.
- Böhmer, 274 n.
- Boethius, 310.
- Bingham, on canonical singers, 303; on the notitia, 371 n; on absolution, 383.
- Bucher, quoted, 136 n.
- Bullæ, 476 f.
- Bunsen, quoted, 28 n.
- Burial, Jewish customs of, 510 f; lack of, a punishment, 510; duty of, among the Greeks, 511 f; preparation of body for, 511 f; Roman custom of, 512; legal provisions among the Romans, 513; revival of, at Rome, 514; Christian customs of, 514 f; shared in the common feeling, 515; doctrine of resurrection affecting, 515; the family idea preserved in, 516; Christian, protected by law, 516; no secrecy necessary in, 516; clubs for, 516; in catacombs, 517.
- Burial brotherhoods, influence of, on burial, 31, 516.
- Burgess, quoted, 272 n, 278 n, 279.
- Burnell, on lateness of South Indian inscriptions, 85 n; on lack of originality in the Indian Trinity, 85 n.
- Burning of the dead, seldom practised by the Jews, 510; custom among the Greeks varying, 511 f; also among the Romans, 512 f; not practised by Christians, 516.
- Business, v. Trades.
- Butler, on baptism in Coptic Church, 393 n.
- Byzantine Architecture, principle of, 232; periods of, 232; perfection of, in St. Sophia, 232 f.
- Byzantine art, early origin of, 34 n.
- Byzantine churches, in Constantinople, 40.
- Byzantine Empire, degeneracy of, 203; absolutism of, 231; good offices of, 231.
- Cælius Sedulius, 296.
- Cælius, his care for the cemeteries, 32.
- Canon Paschalis, sculptured, 135.
- Capella, 310.
- Capitoline Fragments, 166.
- Caricatures of Christ, 94 f; Tertullian's testimony to, 94.
- Carriere, on symbolism, quoted, 73 n.
- Catacombs, less used in 4th century, 35; of Syracuse, 35; of Malta, 36; description of, 56, 516 ff; origin of Roman, 516; entrance to, not concealed, 516; construction of, 517 ff; number of, 518; numbers buried in, 518; not used for public worship, 519; lighting of, 520.
- Carvings, in ivory, 150; of book-covers, 153; on paxes, 154.
- Cassiodorus, 310.
- Catholic Church, when the term first used, 357 f; meaning of, 358.
- Celibacy, early inculcated, 467 f; evils of among the Romans, 463; difficulties of enforcing, 468.
- Cellæ, uses of, 169; influence on Christian architecture, 170; examples of, 172; growth into churches, 206.
- Cemeteries, separate; desired by Jews, 510 f; removed from cities, 511;

- Christian, peculiar, 519; Jewish, at Rome, 511.
- Central style, v. Domed style.
- Chalice, richness of, 428; protests against richness of, 429.
- Chamber of the Sacraments, important fresco of, 81.
- Chant, original style of music in early Church, 301.
- Charisma, 324, 341; result of office, 351.
- Charities, under Roman government, 488; numbers relieved, 488; Stoics favourable to, 488; defects of pagan, 489, 490 f; of guilds and clubs, 489; selfishness in, 489; influence of collegia upon Christian, 490; idea of early Christian, 492; true inspiration of, in early Church, 491; in the early oblations, 491 f; influence of financial condition of the imperial period on, 492 f; influences adverse to, 493; scope of, 493 f; organized, 494 f; influence on pauperism, 495 f; opportunities for, 496 f; principles adverse to, 497 f; relation of Montanism to, 498; doctrine of good works connected with, 498; influence of union of Church and State on, 498 f; decay of, 499; influence of hospitals on, 499.
- Charles, Mrs., 295 n, 296 n.
- Charnay, on crosses in Central America, 83 n.
- Children, absolute property of, among Romans, 463; care for by Christians, 465; exposure of, 465.
- Chorepiscopi, when instituted, 371; functions of, 371.
- Christ, no portrait of, 76, 131; traditions concerning art representations of, 76 n; two general types of, in early art, 100; the earlier from Greek, the later from Hebrew influence, 100 ff; tendency to decoration in later frescos of, 103; reasons of change in type of, 104; crucifixion of, in art, 114; statues of, symbolic, 132; type of, in sculpture, 136; nativity seldom found in early art, 146; cross-bearing of, 148; crowning with thorns, 148; crucifixion of, in art, 152; divinity of, 267; date of birth unknown, 456 f.
- Christians, number of, 26, 51; high position of some, 26, 161, 165, 262, 516 f; judged a sect of the Jews, 163; their places of worship, 163; burial of, 515 ff.
- Christianity, rapid spread of, 25; a message to the poor, 28; cause of propagation of, 27; not hostile to art, 42; contaminated by heathen influences, 65; compared to Judaism respecting the priesthood, 79 n.
- Christian art, causes of encouragement of, 52; early forms of, 54; originality of, 54; symbolism in, 55; appropriated what was at hand but modified it, 55 f. 521; decorative in character, 57; naturalness of early, 58; pagan elements in, 59; mythologic elements in, 60 ff; contaminated by heathen influences, 65.
- Christmas, origin of, 457; conclusions concerning, 457.
- Choirs, female, organized by Ephraim of Edessa, 278; by Basil and Chrysostom, 304.
- Christian fathers, their art teachings compared with those of the reformers, 54 n.
- Churches, many destroyed, 35; traces of, in Egypt, 36; appropriation of pagan elements in, 62, 197; in private houses, 161; temples changed to, 198; ruined near Carthage, 211; in Egypt, 211 f.
- Churches, of Syria, 212 ff; ceilings of, 213.
- Church Discipline, design of, 378; incurred no loss of civil rights, 379; relation of, to the lapsi, 381; decline of penitential, 382; readmission to Church by, 382; stages of, 383; no merit in, 383; of the clergy, 383.
- Church, symbolized by Noah's ark, 93, 259; an organism, 181, 322; New Testament idea of, 321 f; a kingdom, 321; the body of Christ, 322; a temple, 322; the Brde, 322; names of members of, 322 f; believers, 323; brethren, 323; a fellowship, 325; officers of, 327; first organization of, 333; each congregation independent, 335 ff; general conclusions respecting, 341 f; government of, 350; priesthood of the entire, 359; a divine state, 362; government of, a development, 362; readmission to, 382; relations of, to slavery, 470 ff; relations of, to civil government, 470; encouraged labor, 477 f.
- Church constitution, influence of Gnostics on, 353; apostolic teaching respecting, 353 f; Irenaeus's principle of, 354 ff; Cyprian's teaching, 356 ff.
- Church government, republican type of early, 336; influence of destruction of Jerusalem on, 343 f; a congregational episcopacy, 350.
- Church letters, church unity promoted by, 348.
- Chrysostom, on canonical singers, 304; on Christian education, 537 f.
- Circular style, v. Do ed.
- Clement of Alexandria, 31, 53; opinion on Orpheus, 64; hymns of, 280.

- Clement of Rome, on episcopacy, 342.
 Clementines, on episcopacy, 346 f.
 Clergy, priesthood of, 359; sub-orders of, 373.
 Collegium, meaning and objects of, 512; for burial purposes, 513.
 Columbarium, meaning of, 513 f; arrangement of, 513.
 Commodianus, hymns of, 285.
 Communion, what, 419; infant, 419, 421.
 Compluvium, use of, 169; how guarded, 169.
 Conder, quoted, 39 n.
 Constantine, keen discernment of, 27; nature of his vision, 86 n.; great influence of, 86; statesmanlike qualities of, 196; donations of Churches, 196; luxurious reign of, 203; rescript of, respecting Lord's day, 445.
 Constantinian monogram, forms of, 86; on the Roman standards, 86; on coins, 87.
 Constantinople, motives for founding, 229 f; syncretism of pagan and Christian elements in, 230; art treasures of, 230, 509.
 Cousin, quoted, 318 n.
 Creeds, simplicity of early, 389.
 Crooks & Hurst, quoted, 19 n.
 Cross, wide diffusion of, 83; power of, 83 f; widely recognized by early Christians, 84; Indian derivation of, doubtful, 84; Charney's remark on, 83 n; forms of, 86; legend of finding the true, 87; the patibulary, 88.
 Crucifixion of Christ, the earliest art representation of, 152.
 Cruciform, v. Domed.
 Cunningham, on transubstantiation, 424 n.
 Cupid and Psyche, on Christian monuments, 62.
 Cubiculum, in Roman house, 168; in catacombs, 519.
 Curiae, influence on Christian architecture, 169.
 Cyprian, 31; on Church constitution and government, 356 f; on ordination, 358; on sacraments, 387; on clinic baptism, 407; on sacrificial character of Lord's Supper, 422 f; on infant communion, 434; on drama and shows, 484 f; on education, 504.
 Damasus, inscriptions of, 265; hymns of, 287.
 Daniel, 280, 281, 283 n, 287 n, 293 n.
 Deacons, first institution of, 329; qualifications of, 330; Irenæus on, 330; peculiarly Christian character of, 331 f; preaching of, 332; duties of, not sharply defined, 341; in post-apostolic Church 342; change in function of, 366; eligibility of, 367; seven continued, 368.
 Deaconesses, institution of, 331; qualifications of, 368; ordination of, 369; duties of, 369, 494 f.
 Decalogue, influence of, on art cultivation, 43; hindrance of, to art, 45.
 Dehio, 162.
 Delattre, 32.
 De Sola, on Hebrew music, 298.
 Dexter, 280 n.
 Dīs Manibus, conclusions respecting, 255.
 Diocletian, of edict for persecution, 32; destruction of monuments by, 34.
 Diptychs, Barberini mentioned, 60; in ivory, 150; consular, importance of, 150; uses of, 150 f.
 Disciples, the lamb, sheep, and fish, symbol of, 91 f.
 Divorce, Scripture ground of, 461; Justin Martyr's opinion of, 463; frequency of, among the Romans, 46 f.
 Döllinger, on Pentecostal baptism, 397 n.
 Domed style, diffusion of, 217; origin of, 218; resembled Roman baptisteries, 218; was it indigenous to the West, 219; principles of classification, 220 f; not a slavish imitation, 222; circular style of, 242 f; cruciform style of, 244 ff.
 Door-keepers, duties of, 374.
 Dormit, significance of, 263.
 Dove, a Christian symbol of innocence and peace, 92, 261; sometimes used as a means of decoration, 92; chronology of monuments containing, 92.
 Doxologies, specimens of, 296.
 Drama, low condition of Roman, 481; of Eastern, 481; actors in, under legal disabilities, 481 f; Tertullian's opinion of, 482; Cyprian's opinion of, 482 f; conciliary decisions respecting, 483; severe discipline of Church respecting, 483; actors in, excluded from the Church, 483.
 Dupin, 285.
 Easter, connection with passover, 452; time of celebration of, 452; disputes respecting, 452 f; opinion of Jewish party respecting, 452 f; of Roman party, 453; attempts to reconcile differences, 453; conciliary decisions respecting, 454; rule for celebration of, 454; different cycles 454 f; three periods of the controversy concerning, 455 n; ceremonies of, 455; two parts of the celebration of, 455; manner of observance of, 455; acts of clemency connected with, 456.
 Eastern Church, decline of music in, 316.

- Ecclesiastical divisions, explanations of, 369 ff; followed the political, 370.
- Education, of apostles difficult to determine, 500; Jewish care for, 500 f; influence of the law upon, 501; of the synagogue, 501; Paul's view of, 501 f; illustrated by character of apostolic writings, 502 f; by character of the family, 503; declining condition in the West, 503 f; Tertullian's views of, 504; influence of the catechumens upon, 505; influence of Greek thought on Christian, 505; influence of Alexandria upon, 505 f; Christian theory of, 507; Chrysostom's advice respecting, 507 f; more kindly feeling toward pagan culture, 507; Julian's influence on, 507; Basil's teaching on, 508; Jerome's views on, 508 f; effects of barbarian invasions on, 509; in the Eastern Church, 509.
- Egyptians, grotesqueness of art of, 101.
- El-Barah, churches of, 215.
- Elijah, translation of, in sculpture, 138 f.
- Epigraphy, definition of, 247.
- Epiphany, feast of, 456; when observed, 456; commemorates what, 456.
- Episcopacy, James' relation to, 333; Ignatius on, 344 f; of the Clementines on, 346 f; Hermas on, 347; Polycarp on, 348; a development, 351; becomes general, 358; theories of origin of, 363 ff.
- Ephraem Syrus, hymns of, 278 f; homilies of, quoted, 278 n.
- Eras, 252.
- Eucharist, v. Lord's Supper; symbolized by the $\text{I}\chi\theta\iota\varsigma$, 81 ff.
- Eudoxia, Empress, hymns of, 282.
- Eusebius, on Lord's day, 445.
- Euthimius, hymns of, 281.
- Ewald, 299 n.
- Excommunication, greater and lesser, 379 f; notice given of, 380; effects of, 380; appeal from the sentence of, 380.
- Exorcists, origin and functions of, 374.
- Family, a type of the Church, 461; Christ's sanction of, 461; Paul's teaching respecting, 462; teachings of the Christian fathers concerning, 462 ff; two threats to the, 468 f; Roman idea of, 463; decline of the life of under the empire, 463 f.
- Farrar, on Paul's lack of art sensibility, 50 n.
- Fasts and festivals, burial, when celebrated, 165; Easter, 452 ff; Quinquagesima, 456; Quadragesima, 456; Pentecost, 456; Epiphany, 457; Christmas, 456 f; multiplicity of, 457 f.
- Fish, a symbol of Christ, 71-83; of the disciples, 92.
- Formative arts, principles governing, 47; grotesqueness of Jewish, 48.
- Fossore, who, 520; modes of working and duties of, 520.
- Frescoes, eucharistic, at Alexandria, 82; teaching of, respecting baptism, 398 ff.
- Friedländer, 294 n.
- Galla Placidia, 120, 244, 245.
- Galerius, his edict of toleration, 34.
- Garrucci, 119, 154.
- Gibbon, 289.
- Glyptic art, utility of, 156.
- Gnosticism, illustrated by abraxas gems, 21.
- Gott's, 308 n.
- Good Shepherd, mistaken for Hermes-Kriophorus, 61; differences between, 53; associated with Amor and Psyche, 69; a symbol of protection among pastoral peoples, 90; not necessarily derived, 91; associated with other Christian symbols, 91; with swastika, 109; statues of, 132 ff; compared with Hermes-Kriophorus, 133; connected with inscriptions, 258 f.
- Genii, opinion of Christian fathers concerning, 69; how far used for decorative purposes in Christian art, 70.
- Graffiti, found on Palatine Hill, 94; Becker's conclusions concerning, 94; examples of, 268; work of pilgrims, 268.
- Gothic architecture, first germs of, 189; the consummation of the Christian basilica, 190.
- Grapes, symbol of, 261.
- Greeks, mythology and influence of, on art culture, 49; freedom of their worship, 49; could represent their gods, 50; their ideal of divine perfection, 101.
- Green and the Red, factions of, 29.
- Gregory, the Great, hymns of, 296; musical reforms of, 310; Antiphonarium of, 314; advice of, against trine immersion, 414.
- Gregory Nazianzen, hymns of, 281.
- Grimm, W., 288, 321.
- Grousset, his catalogue of Christian sarcophagi mentioned, 70 n; of sarcophagi containing the Good Shepherd, 91 n.
- Guido of Arezzo, 315.
- Guilds, burial, special privileges of, 170.
- Harmonious measures of, 278.
- Harnack, on baptism, 393 n.

- Hegesippus, on Gnostic influence, 354.
 Helena, traditional discovery of true cross by, 87.
 Hemans, remarks of, on Mercury-Kriophoros, 90 n.
 Hercules, a type of Christ, 64.
 Herder, quoted, 273 n.
 Hilarius, hymns of, 286.
 Hippolytus, statue of, 33; its chronology, 136.
 Holland, quoted, 53 n.
 Hospitals, rise of, 499; influence of, on Christian charities, 499.
 Hübner, 132.
 Hymnology, of early church, 272; favorable conditions for, 272; growth retarded by danger and persecution, 273; and by hesitation about using pagan forms of art, 273; germs of, in New Testament, 273; "psalm" and "ode," 274; probable use of, in second century, 274; reasons for scant information respecting, 275; councils upon use of, 275; Greek fathers favorable to, 276; relatively small number of hymns, 276; reason for, 276; of Syrian Church, 277; of Greek Church, 280; of Western Church, 283; narrative and lyric, 283 f; improvement under Constantinian rule, 287; influence of Julian's policy on, 289.
 Idolatry, trades connected with, 479 f.
 Ignatius, epistles of, 345 n f; on episcopacy, 344 f; on Lord's Supper, 421; on Lord's day, 445.
 Illuminations, reason of, 112; examples of, 113 f.
 Image worship, wars over, 29.
 Immortality suggested in inscriptions, 257, 264.
 Imposition of hands in baptism, 415.
 Indictions, 252.
 Industries, v. Trades.
 Infanticide, frequency of, among the Romans, 464 f.
 Inscriptions, unconscious testimony of, 21; two classes of, 77; late origin of S. Indian, 85; definition of, 247; early use of, 247; utility of, 247 f; number of, 248 f; classes of, 249; by whom prepared, 250; forms of writing used in, 250; how read, 250; punctuation of, 250 f; orthography of, 250; chronology of, 250 f; fewness of dated, 252 n; eras used in, 252; date how determined 253 f; subject and context of, 254 ff; carelessness in preparation of, 265; dogmatic character of, 264; indications of a belief in a future life in, 264; character of Damasene, 265; of fourth century, 266; aids of, to history illustrated, 270 f.
 Irenæus, theory of the Church, 353; on Church constitution, 354 f; on deacons, 330; on mysteries, 388 n; on infant baptism, 391; on Lord's day, 445.
 Ivory, carvings in, 150; diptychs of, 150; ἱεῖα monuments, chronology of, 77; interpretation of, 78 ff; de Rossi's opinion of, 78.
 Jacob, 286, 291.
 James, relation of, to episcopacy, 333; Hegesippus on, 334 n.
 Jews, exclusiveness of, 42; pastoral life of, unfavorable to art culture, 42; depressed condition of, 43; peculiarity of imagination unfavorable to arts of form, 45, 46; monotheism of, not promotive of formative art, 48 f; lyric poetry of, 48 n; special privileges of, 516.
 Jerome, on lyre and flute, 273; on baptism, 413; on Christian education, 508.
 Jonah, history of, in sculpture, 139 f.
 Judaism compared with Christianity respecting the priesthood, 79 n.
 Judgment, last, seldom found in early art, 149.
 Julian, attempt of, to restore heathenism, 37; influence of policy of, on Christian poetry, 289; influence of, on Christian education, 507.
 Junius Bassus, sarcophagus of, 60, 143-145; casts of, 143 n; subjects of, 144; baptismal scene in, 145.
 Justin Martyr, on music of Eastern Church, 301; on the Lord's Supper, 419; on public worship, 434 f; on Lord's day, 447 f.
 Justinian, 232, 234, 235, 240.
 Juvencius, hymns of, 286.
 Kalat Sem'an, church and convent of, 216 f.
 Kaltenbrunner, his three periods of the Easter controversy, 455 n.
 Kartüm, 282 n.
 Keary, similarity of use does not imply dependence, 90 n.
 Kherbet-Hass, 213.
 Kreuser, opinion of, respecting the Christian basilica, 159 n.
 Kugler, 207.
 Labarte, 119.
 Labor, encouragement of, by Church, 477; monumental evidence respecting, 477 f.
 Lactantius, hymns of, 285.

- Laity, limitation of rights of, 365; decline of influence in councils, 375.
 Lamb, a symbol of Christ, 76; forbidden by Trullan Council, 77.
 Lamps, materials of, 155; symbols upon, 155; artistic in form, 155.
 Lange, J. P., on the "Seven," 332 n.
 Lange, K., 162, 180.
 Laodicean Council, on Church music, 303.
 Lazarus, raising of, in art, 99 f., 140, 259.
 Le Blant, on number of inscriptions, 252 n.
 Leyrer, on proselytes, 396 n.
 Libertus, infrequently met, 476.
 Lightfoot, J. E., on origin of sacerdotalism, 360.
 Lights by the altar, 260.
 Lion, symbol of, 261.
 Liturgies, occasion of growth of, 438: connection of penitential system with, 438; modifications of, 439; classification of, 439; two parts of, 440; of St. Clement, 440; of St. James, 441; branches of, 441; of St. Mark, 441; the Western, 441 f.; the philosophy of, 442; central thought in Greek, 442; central thought in Latin, 443; idea in Protestant, 443 n.
 Loculi, defined, 56; number of, 517.
 Lombards, destruction of, 29.
 Lord's day, eucharist celebrated on, 444; reason for observing, 444, 446; relation of, to Jewish Sabbath, 444 f.; no enactment concerning, 445; Barry on, 445; imperial provisions concerning, 445 f.; New Testament idea of, 447; Constantine's rescript concerning, 445; Justin's opinion of, 447 f.; Tertullian's view of, 448; provisions for observance of, 448 f.; impossibility of literal observance of, 449; ground of sanction, 449 f.; Wuttke on, 449 f. n.; why legally sanctioned, 450; the Christian emperors had no reference to Mosaic law, 450 f.; legal supplanting the moral sanction of, 451.
 Lord's Supper, symbolized by $\text{IX}\Theta\Upsilon\Xi$, 81 ff.; symbolic, 416; a memorial, 416; when celebrated, 416; likeness to other feasts, 416; character of, 417; celebrants of, 417; modes of celebration of, 417; connected with the agape, 418; simplicity of early observance of, 418; "The Teaching" on, 418; Justin Martyr's account of, 419; Tertullian's account of, 419; ante-Nicene order of, 419; liturgical forms in, 420; theory of operation of, 421, ff.; how far a sacrifice, 421 f.; three views of, 423; teaching of the liturgies respecting, not uniform, 423; obligatory of, 424; where celebrated, 425; order of, 425; in one kind, 425; frequency of, 425; no elevation of host in, 426; magnified by the fathers, 426.
 Lotze, on Hebrew lyric poetry, 48 n.
 Luminarium, meaning and uses of, 520.
 Macrobius, 310.
 Magdeburg centuriators, 15.
 Magi, on monuments, 258.
 Maimbourg, on Gregory, quoted, 311.
 Malta, catacombs of, 36.
 Manuscripts, illuminated, 40.
 Mariott, quoted on subject of early frescoes, 108 n.
 Marriage, sacredness of, 462 f.; Church had oversight of, 466; Pauline doctrine respecting, 466.
 Martyrs, number of, 266.
 Muthias Flacius, 15 n.
 Menas, St., of Egypt, 154.
 Merivale, 276.
 Messmer, 161.
 Military life, aversion to, in early Church, 484; tainted with idolatry, 484; Tertullian on, 484; decadence of Roman, 485; milder views later held, 485; relation of clergy to, 486; monumental evidence respecting, 486 f.
 Milman, mistake respecting Solomon's temple, 47 n.; quoted, 317 n.
 Miniatures, examples of, 112 f.
 Mohammedans, iconoclasm of, 29.
 Monasticism, philosophy of, 468; its two principles, 468; evils of, 468 f.
 Mone, 393 n.
 Mosaics, classification of, 114 f.; in antiquity, 115; kinds of, 115; limited use in catacombs, 115; three types of, 116; uses of, 116; restorations of, 116; location of, 116; chronology of, 116 f.; style of, 117; examples of, 118 ff.; seriousness of later, 118 f.; transition in style of, 119; of Rome, 117 ff.; of Thessalonica, 116; of Ravenna, 121 ff.; of Constantinople, 127 ff.
 Mothes, quoted, 157 n.
 Monuments, fewness of, 28; where best preserved, 28; causes of destruction of, 28 f.; of first century, 29 f.; of second century, 30 f.; third century, 31 f.; fourth century, 34 ff.; fifth century, 36 ff.; sixth century, 39 f.; numerous in, 41.
 Münter, on hymn service, 275.
 Müntz, on mosaics of Santa Constanza, 118 n.
 Muratori, 289 n.
 Music, early Christian, 298; no tune of the first two centuries in existence, 298; probable adoption of existing

- Jewish forms, 299 f; testimony of Pliny respecting, 301; of Justin. Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius, 301; original style the chant, 301; time when Christian Church began a composition of its own, uncertain, 302; first recorded attempts, 303; action of councils respecting, 303; Council of Laodicea and the κρυπτοὶ ψαλμοί, 303; diverse interpretation of this action, 303 f; Basil's service of song, 304; Chrysostom's, 304; Syrian modes probably prevalent in East and West, 304; Ambrosian reforms of, 305; development of, under improved conditions of Church life, 305; musical notation among the Greeks and Romans, 307; harmonic arrangement first developed by Christianity, 308; Ambrosian notation, 309; reforms of, under Gregory the Great, 310; his Antiphonarium, 314; the numma, 314; later modifications of Gregorian system of, 316; decline of, in Eastern Church, 316.
- Mystery, confounded with sacrament, 388.
- Mythologic element in sculpture, 139.
- Neale, J. M., 282, 283 n, 284 n, 287 n, 293 n.
- Neander, quoted, 54 n; on canonical singers, 303.
- Neo-Platonism, influence of, 16.
- Nonus of Panopolis, hymns of, 282.
- Northcote and Brownlow, quoted, 142 n.
- Notation, Ambrosian, authentic, and Gregorian Plagal, 311.
- Numma*, of ancient music not capable of interpretation, 314.
- Numismatics, service of, 37; a special science, 156.
- Oblation, what, 419; by the whole Church, 420.
- Olympia, Christian remains at, 39.
- Optatus, 165, 180.
- Orantes, meaning of, 106; on inscribed monuments, 258, 260.
- Ordination, Cyprian's view of, 358; in the Apostolic Constitutions, 362.
- Origen, 31; on the music of the Alexandrian Church, 301; on baptism, 392.
- Orpheus, a type of Christ, 64; as anti-type, 64.
- Otto, on symbolical character of Christian art, 73 n.
- Pagans, externality of their religion, 49; defects of their charities, 489 ff.
- Painting, Christian, earliest in catacombs, 97; chiefly decorative, 97; similar to heathen, 97; how painted, 98; subjects of, peculiar, 98, 100; principle of balancing in, 98; in Santa Cecilia, 102; transitions in, 110 f; on gilt glasses, 111; fewness of, 111.
- Palm branch, a symbol of triumph, 262.
- Palm tree, symbol of paradise, 93.
- Palmer, 287 n.
- Palimpsest, 268.
- Pappa, signification of, 268.
- Paradise, indicated symbolically, 288.
- Parker, J. H., authority of, on painting, 30 n.
- Pastor, terms for, 266.
- Patriarch, when originated, 373; duties of, 373.
- Paul, St., want of susceptibility to art, 50 f; representations on gilt glasses, 112; associated with Peter, 112.
- Paul Silentarius, hymns of, 282.
- Paulinus of Nola, poems of, 290; theory of poetry of, 290.
- Pausanias, 39.
- Peacock, symbol of immortality, 93.
- Penitents, orders of, 381 f.
- Pentecost, meaning of, 456; mode of observance of, 456.
- Peter, representation of, on gilt glasses, 111 f; no primacy of, intimated, 112.
- Phenix, on coins of Christian emperors, 67; used by the Christian fathers, 70; symbol of resurrection, 71, 93.
- Piper, 17 n, 63 n, 75 n, 280 n.
- Pixes, in ivory, 154; uses of, 154.
- Pliny, on singing of early Christians, 301.
- Plumptre, on proselytes, 396 n.
- Poetry, Greek and Hebrew, contrasted, 48; Christian, a Hymnology.
- Polycarp, on episcopacy, 348.
- Pondi d'oro, how made, 111.
- Prayer, attitude in, as found on monuments, 145.
- Presbyters, common to Jewish and Gentile societies, 334; a council, 334; officers of administration, 335; a deliberative body, 336; Scripture account of, 337; in Gentile churches, 337 f; identical with bishops, 338 ff; why two terms, 339; duties of, not sharply defined, 341; decline of, in power, 352; change in functions of, 366; penitential, 382.
- Priests, not recognized by apostolic Church, 349.
- Primates, origin of, 372; how appointed, 372; functions of, 373.
- Proanaphora, 440.
- Property, in Roman empire, 492 f.
- Prudentius, hymns of, 293.
- Psalter, use of, in early Church, 273.
- Quadragesima, 456.
- Quast, 207.
- Quinquagesima, 456.

- Rainbach, quoted, 274 n, 276, 280 n, 281, 293 n.
- Ravenna, churches of, 38; a middle ground, 202; simplicity of its churches, 206, f.; four periods of architecture in, 207.
- Readers, duties of, 374.
- Reber, quoted, 317 n.
- Reneous, divisions of archaeology, 15 n.
- Richter, 180 n.
- Roller, on symbolism, quoted, 72 n, 75 n, 132 n.
- de Rossi, school of symbolism, 75 n; quoted, 174; on number of Christian inscriptions, 248 n, 249, 252 n, 265, 268, 400, 477 n; on slavery, 475 f.
- Roman house, arrangement of, 166 f; influence of, on early Christian architecture, 166; how lighted, 169.
- Rome, bishop of, 352.
- Rufinus, reference of, to the phoenix, 71.
- Sacerdotalism, rise of, 349; growth of, 359; origin of, 360 ff.
- Sacraments, meaning of, indefinite, 387; number of, not determined, 388.
- Sacrifice, in Lord's Supper, 422.
- Salzenberg, 282 n.
- San Apollinare, in Classe, 209 ff.
- St. Sophia, Church of, originality of, 234; difficulty of construction of, 234; present condition of, 235; vast preparations for building of, 235; injury of, 236; description of, 236; dimensions of, 236; dome support in, 239; lighting of, 239; decorations of, 240; arrangement of, 241.
- San Vitale, description of, 225 ff; mosaics of, lost, 226; contrast with Roman basilica, 228.
- Sarcophagi, preference for, 136; slight originality of, 136; subjects of, 137, 142; decorative and symbolic principle in, 137.
- Savonarola, 131 n.
- Schaff, 280 n, 281 n, 293 n, 295 n.
- Schletterer, 273 n.
- Schnaase, quoted, 178 n, 181 n.
- Scholar, influence of, on Christian architecture, 162, 164; examples of, 170 f.
- Schools, v. Education, Culture, Teaching; secular under the empire, 503; Tertullian's views of heathen, 504; of Alexandria, 505 f; catechumenical, 505; of Antioch, 506 f.
- Schultze, Victor, 75 n.
- Sculpture, in pagan cultus, 131; sensuousness of, 131; decadence of, 131; architectural principle in, 136; balancing of parts in, 136; Scripture subject of, 142.
- Serpent, a symbol of wisdom, or of healing, 93.
- Sexes, separated in ancient Church, 186.
- Sheep, symbol of disciples of Christ, 92.
- Ship, symbol of the Church, 93, 261.
- Sibylline Oracles, reference of, to the 'Ixiw 80; nature of, 80 n.
- Singers, duties of, 374.
- Sins, venial and mortal, 379.
- Slavery, a fixed institution in Roman empire, 470 f; no attempt at immediate abolition of by Church, 471; emancipation encouraged by Church, 472; Uhlhorn's opinion concerning, 472; Stoical teachings respecting, 473; slight amelioration of, in 2d and 3d centuries, 473; moral type of Christianity unfavourable to, 473; simplicity of Church opposed to, 474; in United States, 474 n; testimony of monuments respecting, 475 f; de Rossi on, 475 f; relations of labor to, 477; inscriptions relating to, 477 f.
- Slaves, condition of, under Roman government, 470 f; care of Church for, 472; eligibility of, to office, 474; equality of, in burial, 475; fewness of names of, on Christian monuments, 476.
- Smith, W. Robertson, on the principle of the 2d commandment, 45 n.
- Soldiers, v. Military life.
- Sophronia, hymns of, 281.
- Sponsors, duty of, 413.
- Stanley, opinion of, on Solomon's temple, 47 n.
- Statues, of Christ symbolic, 132; testimonies respecting, 132; conform to pagan morals, 133; of Good Shepherd and Hermes-Kriophoros compared, 133; of Hippolytus, 134; fewness of, 136.
- Stevens, on the value of rude dialects, 22 n.
- Sunday, v. Lord's day.
- Supernatural religion, author of, quoted, 59 n.
- Swastika, a Buddhistic symbol, 84.
- Symbolism, in Christian art, 55, 72; transition from, to literal representation, 55; not occasioned by desire for concealment, 55; definition of symbol, 72; used by Christ in teaching, 72; not arbitrary, 73; how interpreted, 72, 73; two schools of interpretation of, 74 f; in painting of later origin, 98; in Junius Bassus sarcophagus, 146.
- Symbols, the fish, 77 f; the cross and crucifix, 83 f; the vine, 89; the dove, 91; the sheep and lambs, 92; the ship, 93; the anchor, 93; the palm-tree, 93; the crown, lyre, phoenix, serpent, 93; commingling of,

- 259; the grapes, 261; the lion, 261; the ark, 261; the palm-branch, 262.
- Synesius, hymns of, 281.
- Synods, analogous to civil councils, 376; provincial, 375; metropolitan, 376; œcumenical, 376; by whom assembled, 376; by whom presided over, 376 f; subjects considered by, 377; method of voting in, 377; decisions of, how enforced, 377; decisions of, how far binding, 377.
- Syria, churches of, 38, 212; generous life in, 213; destitute of mosaics, 217.
- Tabernacle, furniture of, dictated, 44; artistic character of, 44; animal and vegetable forms allowed in, 44.
- Teaching, v. Education; Paul's estimate of, 501 f; a charism, 502; Christ's method of, 502.
- "Teaching of the Twelve," on apostles, 328 n; importance of, 397; chronology of, 397 n; statements of, concerning baptism, 398; on trine baptism, 413; on the Lord's Supper, 418; on public worship, 433.
- Tertullian, on number of the Christians, 26; opposition to image makers, 53; on the caricatures of Christ, 94 f; hymns ascribed to, 284; on music of early African Church, 301; on baptism, 392, 413; on unction, 414; on Lord's Supper, 419; on public worship, 436; on Lord's Day, 448; on trades, 482 f; on shows, 482; on idolatry, 482; on heathen schools, 504.
- Temple, Jewish, site of, sacred, 44.
- Teuffel, 285, 286, 294, n., 295.
- Thayer, 321.
- Theater, v. Drama.
- Theodoric, influence of, on architecture, 208.
- Tomba, three kinds of, among the Jews, 511; ornamentation of Jewish, 511; leading thought of, among the Greeks, 512; boundaries of, carefully defined, 513; sanctity of, 513; publicity of, in Roman towns, 514; at Pompeii, 514; gorgeousness of, 514; Roman idea of, 514; single, found in the East, 521; in Syria, 521.
- Tourmanin, church of, 215.
- Trades, trying position of Christians respecting, 479; certain ones condemned, 479 f; Tertullian's opinion of, 480 f; Apostolic Constitutions respecting, 480.
- Tradition, Cyprian's view of, 357.
- Transept, significance of, 187 f.
- Triclinium, influence on early Christian architecture, 161.
- Triumphal arch, how important, 188.
- Types, heathen gods and heroes used as, 61, 63 f; two, of Christ, 100; the earlier, the product of Greek influence, 100.
- Uhlhorn, on heathen guilds, 55 n, 276, 288.
- Ultzen, 287 n.
- Unction, what, 414; two are met, 414.
- Verantius Fortunatus, hymns of, 295.
- Vestibule, explained, 185.
- Victory, statue of, set up by Augustus, 66; on the early coin, 67.
- Vine, symbolic of Christ and disciples, 89; not necessarily borrowed from paganism, 89.
- Virgin Mary, no portrait of, 106; never symbolically represented, 106; examples of frescos of, 106 ff.
- Vitruvius, 157, 161, 166, 175, 219.
- de Vogüé, on Syrian churches, 212 f; quoted, 216, 217, 218.
- Wackernagle, 284 n, 293 n, 296.
- Weizsäcker, on presbyters and bishops, 339 n.
- Whitsunday, 456.
- Wilkie, 321.
- Wolmann, on seriousness of the later mosaics, 118; quoted, 119.
- Woman, position of, among the Romans, 463.
- Worship, places of, 164; suggestions of liturgy in early, 430; Jewish influences in, 430; spirituality of, in early Church, 430; forms of, different in different churches, 432; independent forms of, in Gentile churches, 433; "The Teaching" on, 433; heathen notices of, 434; Justin Martyr's account of, 334 f; order of service in, 435; Tertullian's statements concerning, 436; in third century, 436; Cyprian on, 436 f; Augustine on, 437.
- Zestermann, theory of, on the origin of basilica, 158; classification of, 159.
- Zöckler, quoted, 83 n.

